AT the same time King Frederick with a powerful Fleet infested Calabria, and Robert would certainly have been in a very bad Situation, if Death had not very opportunely come to his Relief; for while Henry was returning to Tuscany, from whence he was resolved with a strong Army to march against Robert, he was taken ill on the Way; and being arriv'd at Buonconvento, a Castle in the County of Sienna, on the twenty fourth of August 1313, he departed this Life. There are not wanting Writers who say, that his Death was occasion'd by the Florentines, who having bribed a Dominican Friar call'd Pietro di Caseltrinaldo, 'tis said, that when he desir'd the Viaticum, the Friar gave him a poison'd Host. Others deny it, and say that his Illness was occasion'd by a pestilential Air, and that he died of a Fever⁴. Be that as it will, Henry's Death put the Generals of his Army, and King Frederick into so great Consternation, that every one shifted for himself, and Frederick in great Perplexity return'd to Sicily; but King Robert being furiously enrag'd at him, for having broken the Peace, and upon the Emperor's Arrival declaring himself to be in his Interest; he drew together a Fleet of an hundred and twenty Provensale, Neapolitan, and Genoese Gallies, and embark'd himself with John and Philip his Brothers, in order to invade that Island. They were very successful in their first Attempt; for having taken Castello a Mare by Storm, and laid Siege to Trapani, they were in great hopes of becoming Masters of it; but they were outwitted by the Citizens, who in concert with Frederick promising to surrender, kept Robert so long in Suspence, that being in want of Provisions, his Army daily dwindling away, and King Frederick shunning to come to an Engagement, either by Sea or Land, he was forced to make a Truce with the Sicilians for three Years; and on the first Day of the Year 1315, with great Loss return'd to Naples.

NEVERTHELESS, upon King Henry's Death, Pope Clement V's Party having recover'd Strength, he published a Bull, whereby he repeal'd and annull'd the Emperor's Sentence against Robert. Which Bull we now read amongst the Decretals of the Popes; the Collectors of the Canon Law having inserted it among the *Clementines*⁵; and it is likewise to be found in the first Volume of Chioccarelli's M. S. Giurisdizionali.

KING Robert, being obliged sometimes to go to Provence, sometimes upon Expeditions against Sicily, and after to Florence, Genoa, and other Places, according to the Custom of his Predecessors, had appointed Charles Duke of Calabria his Son, to be Lieutenant of the Kingdom, by whom, as we have said, we have many Statutes made during his Lieutenancy in his Father's Absence. But Robert, having no other Sons, resolv'd to marry him, and concluded a Match between him and Katharine the Daughter of the Archduke of Austria; and he sent into Germany the Count Camerlingo, and the Archbishop of Capua his Ambassadors, with a great Retinue of Nobility, to conduct the Bride to Naples; but soon after her Arrival she died without Issue: so that Charles for his second Wife married Mary the Daughter of the Count of Valois, by whom he had three Daughters; of which hereafter.

MEAN while the Truce with the Sicilians being expired, King Robert resolv'd to pursue his Design upon Sicily; and having fitted out a great Number of Vessels, he so distressed that Island, and King Frederick's Army, that it was the general Opinion, if King Robert had continued the War with the same Vigour, he certainly would have recover'd that Kingdom; but Clement V. dying in the Month of April 1314, and John XXII. being elected in his Place, the Sicilians immediately sent some of the chief Men of the Island Ambassadors to congratulate him upon his Election, and to beg of him to endeavour to make a Peace, or a Truce, between the two Kings. For which end the new Pope sent a Legate to King Robert, who prevail'd with him to renew the Truce for other five Years.

C H A P. II.

The Emperor Lewis of Bavaria comes to Rome, and makes War upon King Robert. The Duke of Calabria dies, whereupon a Marriage is agreed upon between Joan, Robert's Daughter, and Andrew the second Son of the King of Hungary.

BUT new Troubles interrupted King Robert's Progress, and disturb'd his Quiet; for upon the Death of the Emperor Henry, the Electors being met in Frankfort in the Year 1314, were divided in the Election of a Successor; one Party electing Lewis of Bavaria, the other Frederick the Son of Albert Archduke of Austria. Pope John XXII. refused to confirm either of the two elected, and declar'd the Empire vacant. The two Pretenders made War upon each other in Germany, and their Partisans did the same in Italy. At last in the Year 1323, Frederick was defeated, and taken Prisoner with his Brother Henry by Lewis of Bavaria. The third Brother Leopold had recourse to the Pope, who pronounced Sentence against Lewis of Bavaria. This Prince appeal'd to a General Council, and a future Pope lawfully elected; on the other hand the Pope continued to act his Part, and excommunicated Lewis, and declar'd him a Heretick. Italy of course was disturbed by the Guelf Faction, Partizans of the Pope, and by the Ghibellins Adherents of the Emperor; but of the Guelfs our King Robert, and his Son Charles Duke of Calabria, signalized themselves the most. The Pope invited Robert, and rais'd Troops to make War upon Lewis's Faction. The Ghibellins seeing that the Guelfs were daily growing more powerful by the Conjunction of so potent a King, solicited Lewis to come to Italy. Accordingly he came, and being arrived at Trent, Cane della Scala Lord of Verona, Passerino Lord of Mantua, Azzo, and Marco Visconte, Guido Tarlati Bishop and Lord of Arezzo, the Ambassadors of Castruccio Castracani, and those of the Pisans, and all the Heads of the Ghibellin Faction, as well of Lombardy as of Romagna and Tuscany, went to meet him. A Parliament was held, wherein Lewis promised and swore to come to Rome, and to support the Ghibellin Name and Faction: And on the other hand the Princes and Ambassadors, who were present in the

* Baluz. Vitæ Papar. Aven. tom. 2. pag. 478.

Parliament, promised to give him an hundred and fifty thousand Florins of Gold, upon his Arrival in Milan.

IN this Parliament Lewis likewise caus'd a Process to be published against Pope John XXII. in which by the Sentence of those Bishops and Prelates that he had with him, the Pope was declar'd a Heretick, and guilty of Errors against sixteen Articles established in Councils, which were maintained by the Catholick Church, and then he came to *Milan*¹; and being invited by the Romans, he set out for Rome. King Robert weighing the Consequence of Lewis's coming to Rome, and that the Pope's Assistance would be but weak and too late, he did his utmost to prevent it. For which end he sent the Prince of the Morea his Brother with a strong Body of Cavalry to Rome, to keep Lewis out; he likewise sent a new Army into Sicily, the Truce being expir'd, in order to hold King Frederick in play, that he might not be able to send any Assistance to the Emperor: But all these Efforts were not sufficient to hinder Lewis from coming to be crown'd King in Rome; so that the King was forced to recall the Duke of Calabria, who had the Government of Florence, and to send him to guard the Frontiers of the Kingdom. On the twenty eighth of September 1327, the Duke, his Wife, and all the Barons he had with him, left Florence, and by the Way of Sienna, Perugia and Rieti, arriv'd in Aquila the same Day that Lewis with great Solemnity was crown'd in Rome; which happen'd on the sixteenth Day of January 1328.

BUT Lewis, by lingring in Rome, saved King Robert; it being then said, that he would not have been able to stand his Ground against the German, who had with him fifty thousand good Horse, if, without tarrying in Rome, after he had been crown'd, he had marched directly to the Conquest of the Kingdom. But nothing would serve him but he must make a new Pope; by whom he must be crown'd a second time, and new Laws, and give other Orders; so that when he intended to pursue the Conquest of the Kingdom, the Opportunity was slipt: insomuch that the King's Troops had again taken Ostia and Alagna, and having fortified the Passes, at last forc'd the Bavarian to leave Rome, and return to *Tuscany*².

THE Designs of Lewis and the Ghibellins proving unsuccessful, King Robert was not only freed from the Cares of War, but was grown very powerful, and with the Assistance of the Pope, become formidable to all his Enemies; so that having settled the Affairs of Tuscany, he was in a fair Way to have put an end to the Conquest of Sicily; but as in the height of Prosperity we are often made sensible of the Instability of human Affairs, it happened, that the Duke of Calabria being taken ill in Naples, on the first Day of November, the Vigil of S. Martin, in the Year 1328, he died, to the unspeakable Grief of his Father, and all the Kingdom, and was buried in the Church of S. Clara. 'Tis said, that when this Prince was carried to his Grave, the unfortunate Father seeing himself bereft of his only son, said, The Crown was fallen from his Head: As it really fell out through the Ruin and Troubles which afterwards came upon the Kingdom; for tho' while the Duke was in Florence, Mary of Valois his Wife brought him a Son, whom he named Charles Martel, yet he liv'd only eight Days; neither did he leave any Sons by Mary, but only two Daughters, and another with which she was big. The eldest was named Joan, who was afterwards Queen of Naples. The second was Mary, who died soon after, and was buried in the Church of S. Clara. The Dutches Dowager shortly after was brought to bed of another Daughter, who was also named Mary, and, as shall be related, was afterwards Dutches of Durazzo.

ALTHOUGH Charles Duke of Calabria could not be said to be a warlike Prince, yet he was adorn'd with all the other Virtues proper for a King. He was most religious, just, merciful and liberal, a Lover of good Men, and an Enemy to the Wicked; and he was such, that in a manner from his very Youth his Father entrusted the Government of the Kingdom to him. He made him his Lieutenant, which Office he executed so discreetly and prudently, that the King his Father was very well satisfied with him. The Tribunal of the Lieutenancy in his time was in a most flourishing State. He made Filippo Sanguineti Judge of it, with a Salary of an hundred and fifty Ounces of Gold yearly, and allow'd ninety Ounces for ten Horsemen, and sixteen Foot for a Guard and Ornament to that Tribunal. He was wont to make a Progress yearly over the Kingdom, in order to examine and redress any Hardships put upon the People by the Barons and King's Ministers. By means of many Statutes established by him, while he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, he made sundry Provisions and Regulations concerning good Government, and the right Administration of Justice, of which he was so zealous a Lover, that in order to represent his Virtue, we see engraven upon his Tomb under his Feet a Vessel full of Water, out of which a Wolf and a Lamb are drinking peaceably together.

AFTER the Solemnity of the Duke's Funeral was over, the King spar'd no pains to have the Infant that was to succeed him in the Kingdom well educated; and at the same time, like a Prince of a great and generous Spirit, he did not neglect the Government of the Kingdom, nor to provide for the War of Sicily.

BUT some time after, finding himself grown old, he was anxious to settle the Succession of the Kingdom; and although the Royal Family was then very numerous, such as Robert, Lewis and Philip, the Sons of the Prince of Taranto; Charles, Lewis and Robert, the Sons of the Prince of the Morea, and others, amongst whom he might have chosen one fit to succeed him in the Kingdom, by giving him his Grandchild in Marriage; nevertheless being mov'd, as 'tis thought, and as Baldus writes*, either by a Remorse of Conscience, because the Kingdom by Right ought to have been his Nephew's the King of Hungary, the Son of Charles Martel his elder Brother; or by some other secret Motive that obliged him to do it, he resolved to restore the Kingdom to that Branch from which it had been taken; and therefore he determin'd to pitch upon one of the Sons of the said King Henry of Hungary†: tho' the unhappy Consequences that attended this Match plainly demonstrated, how much human Judgment is liable to be deceiv'd.

FOR this end he sent a solemn Embassy to Carobert King of Hungary, who with much Joy receiv'd the Message; and having pitched upon Andrew his second Son, he dismissed the Ambassadors with rich Presents, and bid them acquaint King Robert, that in a few Days he and the Bridegroom would set out for Naples, which he did without Delay; for having left Hungary, with his little Son, and a great Train of his Barons, by the Way of Friuli, on the last Day of July 1333, he arrived at Vesfi a City of Puglia, situate at the Foot of Monte Gargano, where he was honourably received by John Prince of the Morea, sent thither by the King, with many Barons and Knights of the Kingdom. On the twenty sixth of September the same Year, the Ceremony of betrothing was perform'd between Andrew and Joan both of the same Age of seven Years; and about the end of October, the King of Hungary, joyful at having left a Son so well provided for, and secur'd of the Succession of so opulent a Kingdom, return'd to Hungary, leaving some of his Hungarians to attend his Son, already intitled, Duke of Calabria; and among the rest he left with great Authority a Religious named Friar Robert, who was to be the young Duke's Preceptor.

C H A P. III.

The War renew'd in Sicily, but interrupted by the Death of King Robert.

KING Robert having thus settled the Succession, all his Thoughts were now bent upon the recovering of Sicily, which all the Successors of King Charles I. had in vain attempted; for which purpose he sent a new Army into that Island, where, tho' they did much mischief, yet they could not reduce one fortified Place. But upon the Death of King Frederick, in the Year 1337, who was succeeded by Peter his eldest Son, Robert sent immediately to Avignon, to intreat Pope Benedict XII. who on the twentieth of December 1334, had succeeded John XXII. that he would be pleased to send an Apostolick Legate to Sicily, to require King Peter to surrender that Kingdom, and to observe the Articles of Peace made in the time of Charles of Valois; and this he did, not from any hopes he had of obtaining the Island by that means, but with a Design, that the Pope, being slighted by King Peter, might be a Sharer in the Charges of the War. Neither did he fail to send his Compliments to Queen Eleonora his Sister, and to endeavour to prevail with her to persuade her Son to give up that Kingdom, promising her, that he would assist him in the Conquest of the Kingdom of Sardinia with much greater Forces than what had been stipulated by the Treaty of Peace; but the prudent Queen answer'd him, That she had not so great Interest with her Son as was sufficient for that; but beg'd of her Brother, that he would rather look upon him as his Servant and Son; and especially since he himself had no Heirs Male, nor could leave the Kingdom of Naples, or any other of his Dominions, to any Person nearer in Blood to him than King Peter was. As this Message had little effect, so the Apostolick Legate succeeded no better; but finding that he could do nothing else, he excommunicated the King and the Island; which the King little regarding, caused himself to be crown'd immediately.

ROBERT therefore made all necessary Preparations for War, and on the fifth Day of May 1338, he sent a Fleet of sixty Sail of Gallies and Barks with twelve hundred Horse to harass Sicily, and soon after another greater, and better provided; but except the taking of Tremole by Siege, they performed nothing of any Consequence. The King not yet weary of this Undertaking, two Years after sent thither Giuffredi di Marzano Count of Squillaci, his High Admiral, which Expedition was better managed than any of the former, for the Count took Lipari, and defeated the Messinese. The taking of Lipari facilitated the Conquest of Melazzo by Ruggiero Sanseverino, who the Year following was sent to Sicily with a new Fleet; and this was the last Attempt that King Robert made upon that Island. But what in a Tract of many Years, and by many and obstinate Wars could not be effected, if Death had not prevented, would have been accomplished by the means of a small Incident: For King Peter, who had succeeded his Father, reign'd only a few Years, and at his Death, having left no other Son but Lewis, an Infant under the Tutelage of his Uncle; the Palizzi, very powerful Barons in Messina, with many of their kindred, and Federico of Antioch, with the Citizens of Lentino, Ventimiglia and Abati, to whom the Catalans were become more hateful than the French had been to their Predecessors, made themselves Masters of Messina, and from themselves, and from that City, sent to swear Homage to King Robert: But the Messenger found that the King had got the extreme Unction, and soon after died. An evident Instance of Fortune's sporting with Men; forasmuch as King Charles I.

Charles II. and King Robert, for the space of sixty Years successively, having harassed the Kingdom of Sicily with powerful Armies, and almost every Year attacked it with numerous Fleets, without being able to recover it, Fortune, as it were in Derision, had reserv'd the Offer of it to Robert, when he was at the Point of Death; whereas, if such an Opportunity had offer'd two Years before, without all doubt the Island had been recover'd; because a very few Troops would have been able to crush the Infant King, and wholly exterminate the Catalans from that Kingdom.

THIS wife King died, no less oppressed with Years, than with Vexation and Trouble, which in the latter end of his Days overwhelmed him with Grief. He saw, that in the six Years that Andrew Duke of Calabria had been in the Kingdom, and brought up in his Court, the Nursery and Seat of all Virtue, he had not in the least left off the barbarous Hungarian Customs; nor had such as he had seen daily made the least Impression upon him, but continued to converse with those Hungarians his Father had left with him, and with others, which from time to time came to visit him; insomuch that the King repented of his Choice, and pitied exceedingly his Grandchild Jean, a most excellent young Princess, (and who at that Age, which was not above twelve Years, not only exceeded in Prudence those of the same Age, but many Ladies of riper Years) who was to live with a stupid and worthless Man. The Dissentions which, like a prudent Prince, he foresaw would arise in the Kingdom after his Death, likewise griev'd him very much; for he knew that the Government would fall into the Hands of the Hungarians, who, by governing insolently, and not treating the Princes of the Blood as he had done, would oblige them to take up Arms, whereby every thing would go to Wrack and Confusion. Therefore, thinking to remedy this, he call'd a Parliament of all the Barons and Royal Cities, and made them swear to Jean alone as Queen, with design, that after his Death she should establish a Council altogether dependent upon herself, and that the Husband should have the Title of the Queen's Consort only.

TO this another Trouble was added, for at the very time when he saw, that his Life was drawing to a Period, and that there was no hopes of his Successor's being able to curb the Insolent, civil Dissentions arose in all the great Cities of the Kingdom, attended with great Blood-shed, which the Justices (the Title then given to the Governors of Provinces, whom we now call Presidents) were neither able to prevent, nor crush. Whence the Number of Outlaws was so great over all the Kingdom, that they became insupportable, and the King was forced to make a sort of a War upon them, by sending Troops in order to suppress them, which they found impracticable; because the Guilty not only dispersed themselves in different Places, but many Barons favoured, and receiv'd them into their Castles. Oppressed with these Vexations and Anxieties, on the sixteenth of January 1343, this great King died, after he had reign'd thirty three Years, eight Months and sixteen Days; and was buried behind the great Altar of the Church of S. Clara, under that stately Tomb which is to be seen at this day.

ROBERT died with the Character of the most prudent and gallant King of his Time, adorned with Wisdom, Justice, Liberality, Modesty, Courage, and all other Virtues both military and civil. As for his Justice, the Kingdom had never been so well and so prudently govern'd, as under him; which the many prudent Laws he left, the well-regulated Tribunals and Magistrates, and the Care he took in the Choice of able and uncorrupted Ministers clearly demonstrated. He studied to maintain Peace and Quiet among the People; he curb'd the Insolent, and exterminated the Banditti, and the Wicked that disturbed them: he suppressed the Violence of Ecclesiastics, who often oppressed their Vassals: and to this Prince we owe those Remedies which are now a Buckler and Defence against their Incroachments and Severities, which we call The Royal Prescriptions, of which we shall here discourse more fully.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Royal Preservatives.

N the Reigns of Charles I. and II. on the Occasions mentioned elsewhere, the Privileges and Immunities of the Clergy being grown to an excessive height; and (excepting in feodal Cases) being exempted from the Jurisdiction of the civil Magistrate, both in civil and criminal Cases, their Licentiousness and Freedom rose to such a pitch, that thinking their Excesses and Oppressions not liable to be redressed by the Lay Judges, the Prelates, the Priests, and even the Monks frequently insulted the Laicks, and sometimes the inferior Clergy. They invaded their Possessions, tyranniz'd over their Persons, oppress'd them with Injuries, Rapine, and other Hardships. King Robert himself tells us, That in his Hall of Audience no other Complaints, Groans, or Clamours were heard, but of those Violences and Oppressions¹. The prudent King, as a Remedy for this, prescribed a Rule to his Justices whereby to suppress so great Insolence, and to redress the Grievances. In that famous Statute, which begins, Ad Regale Fastigium, penn'd by the celebrated Bartolommeo di Capua, this King enacted, That the Justices were not to proceed upon these Excesses according to due course of Law, nor to seek Cognitionalia ordinare certamina, but only facta de injuriis, rapinis, & damnis illatis informatione summaria per facti notorium, vel rei evidentiam, famam publicam, aut designationem aliam attestantem commissam injuriam, to correct, and speedily redress them.

HE likewise prescribed to them, that for proving those Disturbances they had no more to do, but to issue out a general Proclamation; wherein, without specifying the Disturbers, they were to invite in general, Quicumque sua interesse putaverit, visurus accedat producendorum in causa testium juramenta, & oppositurus, quæ circa rei substantiam voluerit allegare.

WHOEVER will but read the many Reasons contained in this Statute, which Robert gives for justifying it, and to evince the Moderation of it, as not exceeding his Royal Power, cannot but be wonderfully surprized to see a King that had no other Intention but to preserve Peace and Tranquillity in his Kingdom, and for that end to banish Rapine and Violence out of it, that he might not in the least encroach upon the Ecclesiastical Liberties, speak with so much Reserve and Moderation, and with so many Clauses full of the utmost Respect and Reverence; as if it had not been lawful in Princes for the Quiet of their Dominions to make the strongest and most effectual Laws for extirpating those Evils and Disorders with which they were oppress'd. In the first Place he declares, That though his Power in every thing be not extended to the Persons of the Prelates and Clergy; yet as he was obliged to protect and defend all his Subjects from being oppress'd, he did this in Maintenance and Support of his supreme Authority. Moreover he consented, that his Judges should not proceed against the Persons of the Prelates and Clergy, and in their Causes according to due course of Law, and by formal Processes; he therefore ordain'd, that the Proceedings should be summary, and the Cognizance extrajudicial, with great Moderation, and respectful Reservation. He likewise declares and protests, That he was solely moved so to do out of Love to Charity and Compassion. Therefore he quotes the Example of King David, who reliev'd the oppress'd Israelites; of those who for a Refuge run to the Statues of Princes; that by the Law of Nature we were obliged to ward off the Injuries from our Kinsmen, or Neighbours; lastly, he cites the Example of Moses, who seeing a Hebrew ill used and oppress'd by an Egyptian, killed him upon the Spot.

BUT his Moderation will still appear greater, when we consider, that he established all this not by a Law, or solemn Edict, but by Royal Writs, so that he would not have this Regulation to be regarded as a Constitution, by virtue whereof his Magistrates could proceed of themselves, as they regularly did in all other Cases, as Executors of the Laws, without having occasion for any other special Power from the Prince; but he directed, That the Justices, in such Cases, should have recourse to the Prince, and from him receive special Writs, whereby that Power might be communicated to them, thereby meaning, that in such Cases they were not to proceed by virtue of their ordinary Authority, but by that thus conveyed to them by the Prince, who, by the oeconomic Power of governing his Dominions, has a Right upon extraordinary Occasions to proceed by uncommon and extraordinary Methods. Whence the same *Bartolomæo di Capua*¹, who penn'd the Statute, observes, that this was not a Statute, that is to say a Constitution, or Edict, Sed forma literarum Regiæ, quæ debet dirigi Officiali à Rege in pendent, alias Officialis ipse non potest procedere secundum formam hujus Capituli: Et ita se habet consuetudo Magnæ Curie Vicariæ, & omnium Civitatum Regni; so that as *de Bottis*² very much to the Purpose, observes, no Officer could proceed, nisi ex Regia commissione.

AND from this arose the Practice handed down to our present Time, that without the King's special Commission no Tribunal can proceed, servata forma hujus Capituli. In the Reign of the Aragon Family, and in the beginning of that of Austria, when, as we shall see, the Tribunal of the sacred Council of S. Clara was at its height, and in its greatest Splendor, and superior to all the rest, it proceeded without any other Royal Commission; but the Reason was, because that Tribunal in every thing represented the King's Person, and all was done in his Name; whence it came, as the same de Bottis testifies, that those Causes were frequently remitted to the High-Court of the Vicariate, to which Authority was given to proceed against Ecclesiasticks, Servata forma Capitulum Regni. Whence we find in the Archives of the said Tribunal many Processes drawn up according to the Statutes of the Kingdom. But afterwards in the time of the Austrian Kings the Tribunal of the Collateral Council being raised above all the rest, and having engrossed to itself all the supreme Pre-eminences, and oeconomic Power, and leaving the other Tribunals independent, with respect to Matters of Justice, that Custom was introduced, which is still observed, that from this Tribunal, as representing the King's Person, the Royal Writs are issued, by which the Sacred Court is ordered to proceed, Servata forma Capitulum Regni, and formerly they were likewise directed to the Chaplain-Major. But the Mystery is easily unfolded why these Writs cannot still be directed to the Deputy of the High Court of the Vicariate, or to the Presidents of the Provinces, who were anciently called Justices, and to other of the King's Officers. We have many such Writs directed by the same King Robert to the Deputy of the Vicariate, and its Judges, such as that which we read under the Title, de Spoliatis pro Laico contra Clericum, and it begins, Omnis prædatio; and the other which we read in Chioccarelli; to the Justices of Abbruzzo, Ultra & Citra flumen Piscarie; to the Justices of Val di Crati, and Terra Giordana; to the Justices of Terra di Lavoro; and to those of Contado di Molise. Charles Duke of Calabria his Son, Charles III. of Durazzo, Alphonfus I. and the other succeeding Kings did the same, as we shall see hereafter. But in our times, and in those of our Grandfathers, the Boldness and Indiscretion of the Prelates being greater than ever, in order not to expose those inferior Officers to their Censures, and to avoid Quarrels with them on that account, it was thought more expedient to direct those Writs to the supreme Tribunal of the Sacred Court, which proceeds regularly therein.

BUT King Robert's great Moderation and Respect were not sufficient to prevent the Prelates and Canonists from declaiming against this Regulation. From the time of *Luca di Penna*³, who wrote in the Reign of Queen Joan I. Hoc Statutum, as he says, multi Prælati & Canonistæ nitebantur infringere, dicentes Principem Secularem nihil posse contra Clericos, & eorum causas directè, vel indirectè statuere, sed ipsi circa hoc iniquè loquuntur; so that he was forced to write in order to confute their Errors. And in latter Times, the Licentiousness of the Ecclesiastical Writers being grown to a greater height, these Remedies were still impugn'd, and looked upon by them, as an Infringement upon the Ecclesiastical Immunity. In the thirteenth Tome of Chioccarelli's M. S. Giurisdizionali we have an Account of the many Controversies that have been between the King's Ministers and the Ecclesiasticks about these Regulations: We likewise read several Allegations from Law made in their Defence, and to shew the Justice of them; on the other hand we have an Account how much the Ecclesiasticks laboured to have the Observation and Execution of them abolish'd and laid aside; but notwithstanding all their Efforts, for several Ages they have continued firm and stable, and have been in force and practis'd under all our Kings since the Reign of King Robert, and are at present in full Force and Vigour.

BESIDES the Statute ad Regale fasligium, we have three other of King Robert's, directed, according as the Cases happened, to his Officers, which we find printed amongst the Statutes of the Kingdom, and which were made by him in the latter end of his Reign. The first is under the Rubrick, Conservatorium pro Laico contra Clericum, which begins, Charitatis affectus, directed to the Justices of the Further Abruzzo, at the Instance of Ruggiero Count of Gela on account of some Hardships put upon him by the Abbot and Monks of the Convent of S. Maria della Vittoria. The second, which begins, Finis præcepti charitas, and is under the Title, Conservatorium pro Clerico contra Clericum, was directed to the Justice of Val di Crati, and Terra Giordana, and was made at the Instance of Giovanni Tavolaccio di Castrovillari a Canon of Cosenza, on account of Injustice done him by Guglielmo and Oliviero Persona Priests of Rossano, and their Associates. The third was directed by Robert to the Deputy of the High Court of the Vicariate, and its Judges, and is under the Title, De Spoliatis pro Laico contra Clericum, and begins, Omnis prædatio; it was made at the Instance of Perotto Scarlese of Naples, who having been violently dispossessed of some Lands, which he held of the City of Capua by the Vicar of the Archbishop of that City, he had recourse to King Robert for Reparation. Besides these which are printed with the Statutes of the Kingdom, Chioccarelli collected from the Royal Archives some other such Royal Preservative Writs drawn up by the Order of the same King Robert, of Charles Duke of Calabria his Son, and of many other Kings his Successors for the same Purpose, and directed to their Officers.

CHARLES Duke of Calabria, while he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, in the Year 1322, directed the like Writs to the Capitano of Naples, obtain'd at the Instance of Francesco Cannavacciolo of Naples, on account of his being disturbed in the Possession of a House belonging to him, situate within the City of Naples, by the Abbot Guglielmo Caracciolo, and some other Clergymen. In the Year 1324 the same Charles ordered the Justices of Calabria, according to the Tenor of his Father's Statute, to take Cognizance of the Robbery of a Vineyard and certain Oxen from Giovanni a Canon of the Great Church of S. Mark, by Guglielmo Malopere, Vicar of the Archbishop of Cosenza. In the Year 1328, King Robert wrote to the Justices of Terra di Lavoro, Contado di Molise, and the Hither and Further Abruzzo, that Francesco Abbot of the Monastery of S. Maria of Cinquemiglia having represented to him, that the Bishop of Valve pretending that the said Abbey belonged to his Church, had designed to rob him of it, and ordered them to maintain him in the peaceable Possession of the said Monastery, Donec justa causa possessionis duraverit. The same Robert in the Year 1337 sent the like Writs to the Deputy and Judges of the Vicariate, ordering them to proceed juxta tenorem novi nostri Capituli upon the Complaint made to him by Tommaso Monsella di Salerno Master of Accounts of the High Court, that he being possessed of the Castle of S. George situate in Calabria, the Bishop of Melito, together with some Laicks disturbed him in it, and violently possessed the Territories thereof.

KING Charles III. of the Family of Anjou, in the Year 1383 wrote to the Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom, or his Lieutenant, and to the Judges of the High Court to redress the Grievances and Violence done by the Archbishop of Naples, or his Vicar, by the means of a Priest his Secretary in their Name, to Simone Guazza of Giugliano, in seizing by his own Authority some moveable Goods, while an Appeal was lodged against a Sentence given in favour of the said Secretary, for a Debt, which he pretended to pursue in the Name of the said Archbishop.

KING Alphonfus I. of Aragon in the Year 1440 directed the like Writs to the Bishop of Valenza President of his Council and Vice-Prothonotary of the Kingdom, and to his Counsellors, that according to the Tenor of these Regulations they would redress the Outrage done to Febo Sanseverino Bishop of Cassano by Gelisorte Spinello; who, notwithstanding that Sanseverino was advanced to that Bishoprick by Pope Boniface IX. and confirmed by Pope Martin V. and for many Years had peaceably possessed it, asserting that he was Bishop, by Force and Fraud had robbed him of, and intruded into the said Bishoprick. The same King in the Year 1478 wrote to his Viceroy, and his other Officers in Calabria, that Guglielmo di Cambini Priest of Mangano, an Appurtenance of the City of Cosenza, had represented to him, that he with other Priests for above twenty Years having possessed some Benefices, had been robbed of them by certain other Priests; therefore he ordered them, that if they found the said Robbery to be evident, they were to redress it, and maintain him in Possession both of the Benefices and Fruits.

KING Ferdinand I. in the Year 1481 wrote to the Bishop of Martorano not in the least to molest Palamede di Leandro Bishop of Catanzaro, nor to hinder him from gathering in the Fruits and Revenues of his Bishoprick; but if he had any Revenues or Rights within the Diocess of his Bishoprick, he should allow him to receive them according to Justice; and in the Year 1485 he wrote to the Castellan of Catanzaro, to protect him in the peaceable Possession of his Bishoprick, and in the Enjoyment of all its Revenues and Fruits. This King the said Year wrote to Carlo Carafa Lord of the Village of Monte Sarchio, telling him, That Fra. Jacopo of the Order of S. John of Jerusalem, Commendatory of the Commendam of the said Village, had represented to him, that being possessed of the said Commendam given him by his Order, he had been turned out of it by Fra. Ipolito d'Amelia, by vertue of certain Letters surreptitiously obtained from the Court of Rome; therefore he ordered him, that if the said Robbery was clear, he should restore him to the Possession of his Commendam.

THE Great Captain D. Gonsalvo de Cordua in 1503 wrote to one of the King's Officers, that the Abbot Guglielmo Germano di Maratea, by vertue of Apostolick Bulls being in Possession of the Abbey of S. John in the Diocess of Cassano, he had been robbed of it by Giovanni Caseo; therefore he ordered him, according to the Tenor of the Statutes of the Kingdom, to restore the said Abbot to the Possession of the Abbey, and to maintain him in it, donec justa causa possessionis duraverit. The same Great Captain in the Year 1506 ordered the Governor of Calabria, That if it was true, that the Abbot of S. John of Floria in Calabria had been actually robbed of some Churches and Barns annexed to his Abbey by the Priest Martino di Torpomisibus, to restore him to his former Possession, and to preserve him in it, Donec, &c.

THE Viceroy D. John of Aragon Count of Ribagorça in 1507 wrote to the Governor of Calabria, and to the other Officers of that Province, that Fra. Lodovico Nicotera Vicar General of the said Province of the Order of Observantins of S. Francis had represented to him, that many Prelates of that Province grievously oppressed the Friars Observantins of his Order; therefore he ordered the said Officers, that upon Application made by the said Vicar, they should proceed with the usual Remedies, and effectually prevent the said Prelates from using Violence against the said Observantins; but if they had any Claim they were to lay it before the Judges competent. This Count at the same time wrote to the Capitano of Cariati, telling him, That his Council having lately issued out an Edict agreeable to the Statutes of the Kingdom in favour of Tommaso Assagno Palæologo, who had complained that he had been disturbed in the Possession of the Village of Belvidere, and the Territories of Malapezza by the Bishop of Cariati; that when he was going to affix the said Edict upon the Doors of the Great Church of Cariati, and having the Beadle ready with the Edict in his Hand, in Presence of the Judge, Notary and Witnesses; the Bishop's Vicar, with the greatest part of the Clergy rushing out of the Church, snatched the Edict out of the Beadle's Hand, tore it, and at the same time abused both him and the Notary, to the great Reproach of his Council; therefore he commanded the said Capitano to order the said Vicar, and those Priests that were present to come to Naples within fifteen Days and present themselves before the Viceroy, and not to depart without his express Licence.

IN the Year 1574 Decio Caracciolo Abbot of the Royal Chapel and Abbey of S. Peter in Salerno having petitioned the Viceroy to be protected and maintained in the Possession of exercising some spiritual and temporal Jurisdictions which he had in that Abbey, in which he was disturbed by the Archbishop of Salerno, who pretended to rob him of them; the Matter was referred to the King's Chaplain-Major to be decided by him according to the Tenor of these Regulations, and the usual Summons being sent to the Archbishop, he appear'd, and the Matter being examin'd, the Abbot was maintain'd in the Possession of the Jurisdictions of his Church.

IN the Year 1593 Giovanni, Alfonso, Ferrante, and others of the Family of Buonuomo in the City of Pozzuolo, having represented to the Viceroy, that they having a Chapel, with a Tomb in the Great Church, the Bishop of Pozzuolo in the Night time had caused the said Tomb to be thrown down, and removed; they demanded, that as the Tomb had been removed, it ought to be again rebuilt in the same Place, and they restored to their former Possession. The Viceroy referred the Matter to the Chaplain-Major, who, according to the Tenor of these Regulations, issued out the usual Edict; and though the Bishop upon this Summons had had recourse to Rome, and had got the College of Cardinals to dispatch a Letter to the Nuncio at Naples, to order the Chaplain-Major under the Pain of Excommunication to revoke the Edict, and not to suffer the like Practice, as prejudicial to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction; nevertheless the Chaplain-Major and the Collateral Council having seriously deliberated upon the Matter, they advised the Viceroy to have no regard to the Pretensions of Rome, these Regulations having been observed in the Kingdom time out of Mind, and founded upon Justice, in order to prevent Robbery and Violence.

FOR the course of almost another Age down to our Time, the Custom has been constantly kept up, and the Archives of the sacred Council are full of Processes founded upon the Observance of these Regulations; insomuch, that at present they are never disputed, nor do they admit of the least Doubt or Difficulty.

C H A P. V.

Of the four Arbitrary Letters.

AMONGST the Statutes of King Robert, the four Arbitrary Letters are no less famous than the Royal Preservatives: This wise Prince was likewise Author of them, who sometimes using Severity, sometimes Clemency, according as the Quiet and Tranquillity of the Kingdom required, directed them to the Justices of the Provinces. We likewise find another directed to Giovanni di Haya Chief Justice of the Court of the Vicariate, which in some Copies goes under the Title, Litera arbitralis; in others under this, De Præeminentia M. C. Vicariæ, and begins, Si cum Sceleratis. This last contains the great Prerogatives, which were granted to the Lord Chief Justice and his Tribunal only, and not to the Justices of the Provinces; such as to proceed against Highwaymen, Homicides, Thieves, notorious Robbers, and others, on account of their heinous Crimes, without Accusation, or Warrant; and by a Process for Information only to proceed to torture the Criminals (a Prerogative which solely belongs to the Tribunal of the Vicariate) and as the four Arbitrary Letters were directed to the Justices of the Provinces, but not this, it was not reckoned among them, but went under the Title, De Præeminentia M. C.

M. C. Vicariæ. Girolamo Cala ¹ in the Treatise he wrote upon this Subject believes, that such a Prerogative was not given to that Tribunal by King Robert, but that it had been given to it before by King Charles II. his Father by the Statute in Accusatis; and that by the Statute, si cum Sceleratis, King Robert rather took it away, than granted it, seeing this Letter was directed to Giovanni di Haya, to whom alone such Authority was granted on account of his Justice, and other shining Virtues, and of the Hatred he bore against wicked Men; yet he says, that this Prerogative was restored to that Tribunal by King Robert's Statute, juris censura, and by that other provisa juris Sanctio. But there is no occasion to differ from the Opinions of our other Writer, that such Authority and Power was given by Robert to Giovanni di Haya, not on account of his eminent Virtues, but as Chief Justice of the Court of the Vicariate, by whom it was communicated to his Tribunal. This Author was much more mistaken, when he wrote, that Robert restored this Prerogative by the Statutes juris censura, and provisa juris sanctio, as if these Letters had been directed to the Chief Justice of that Tribunal. The Statute juris censura, as we shall see hereafter, was directed to the Capitano of Naples, an Officer, as we have said, at that time quite different and distinct from the Chief Justice of the Vicariate; and the other in general directed to all the Justices of the Provinces, and not to the Chief Justice of the Vicariate alone.

THEY were call'd Arbitrary Letters, not only because King Robert granted them revocable at his Pleasure; but because it was left in the Power of the Officers to proceed in criminal Cases at all times, either with, or without Torture, either upon Accusation, or for Inquisition, either mercifully to moderate the Punishment established by the Laws, or vigorously to put it in execution. Therefore the first of these Letters bears this Title: De Arbitrio concesso Officialibus. The second, De componendo, & commutatione pœnarum. The third, Quod Latrones, Disturbatores Stratarum, & Piratæ omni tempore torqueri possunt; and the fourth, De non procedendo ex officio, nisi in certis casibus, & ad tempus. That which was directed to Giovanni di Haya was likewise call'd an Arbitrary Letter, because in the End it contains these Words: In his enim tibi plenam potestatem meri & mixti imperii, ac arbitrium competens duximus concedendum. It is probable that it was penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua, since it is dated in 1313, the fifth Year of King Robert's Reign.

Fabio Montelione da Girace in that ridiculous Comment, which in the Year 1555 he made upon these four Arbitrary Letters, dedicated by him to Carlo Spinelli I. Duke of Seminara, is of Opinion, that the first Arbitrary Letter was that, which among the Statutes of the Kingdom we read under the Title, De non procedendo ex officio, &c. which begins, Ne tuorum; but if the Order of Time be to be considered, we shall find it the last. This was penned by Giovanni Grillo Vice-Prothonotary of the Kingdom, after the Death of Bartolommeo di Capua, in the Year 1329, the twenty first of King Robert's Reign, as the Date bears, which ought to be corrected, and instead of Regnorum nostrorum anno 20. it ought to be anno 21. In this Power and Authority is given to the Presidents and Capitani to proceed in some Crimes ex Officio, without Complaint or Accusation, that is to say in all such, as by the Laws deserve Death, or the Loss of a Member; in those whereby Injuries are done to Ecclesiastical Persons, Pupils and Widows; and lastly, in clandestine Murders, when no Accuser appears.

THAT which we read under the Title, De Arbitrio concesso Officialibus is certainly more ancient, which begins, Juris censura. This was penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua in the Year 1313, the fifth of King Robert's Reign, as is clear from the Date given us by Jacopo Anello de Bottis in his Additions to this Statute. To whom it was directed is left doubtful by the vulgar Edition, in which we read, Magistris Rationalibus, &c. and by de Bottis, who says, that in other Editions it is directed Jusficiaris Basilicatæ. But from the Body of the Letter we may easily perceive, that it was directed to the Capitano of Naples; since on account of the frequent Crimes which were committed in the Cities of Naples and Pozzuolo and their Districts, by notorious Robbers, Highway-Men, Incendiaries, Ravishers of Women, and other wicked Persons, he had full Power and Authority to proceed against these with all Severity and Rigour; laying aside all Method, and the Rules prescribed by the Statutes of the Kingdom, but regarding only the pure and naked Truth, with the Advice of his Judge to extirpate these Reprobates and Villains out of these Places, that therein Tranquillity might be restored, Nocendi facultas abeat, & pacis optata amœnitas suavis reviviscat. At this time the Capitano of Naples had likewise the Government of Pozzuolo and its District, as Camillo Tutini, in his Teatro de Gran Giustizieri del Regno has plainly demonstrated, and as we have related elsewhere.

THE third Arbitrary Letter which we read under the Title, Quod Latrones, Disrobatores, &c. and which begins, Provisâ juris Sanctio, without all doubt is likewise Robert's, and penned by Bartolommeo de Capua, seeing we have some Notes upon it written by that Lawyer. By this, Power is given to the Justices of the Kingdom, at all times, even upon the Feast of Easter, without observing any Rule, and without Accusers, to proceed to torture notorious Highwaymen, Housebreakers and Pirates, and others guilty of enormous Crimes.

WE read the fourth under the Title, De componendo, & commutatione pœnarum, and it begins, Exercere volentes benignè. Robert in this moderates the great Rigour hitherto practised, by empowering his Officers to compound, and commute into pecuniary Mulcts the Penalties established by the Laws against the carrying of Arms for clandestine Murder; to change the Punishment, which the Officers themselves may have imposed, or for the future shall impose by their Proclamations either upon Corporations or particular Persons; the Penalties in prohibitory Cases, de parendo juri, and in other arbitrary Cases, and in Fines. In all these Cases, after having had due regard to Poverty and Inability, or to any other reasonable Cause, he allows, in certa quantitate pecuniæ componere pro Curie nostræ parte.

KING Robert, on account of this arbitrary Letter, was by his Detractors accused of Avarice, which had eclipsed his other Virtues; and Scipione Ammirato says the same; and that he was looked upon to be the Cause of the many Discords and Divisions, which arose amongst the Citizens in many Cities of the Kingdom, because of the Compositions which he drew from his Subjects in Money, preferably to Blood; and that he was wont to alledge for his Excuse, that it was necessary for him to do so in order to have wherewithall to maintain the great Fleets, which almost every Year he was obliged to fit out for the Recovery of the Kingdom of Sicily. But whoever will consider, that Robert restricted these Compositions to certain slight Crimes with so much Reserve and Moderation, and with all regard to the Conditions of the Persons, and to many other Circumstances, will certainly not condemn him as a sordid and covetous Man.

THESE are the arbitrary Letters so famous with us, upon which in the Reign of Queen Joan I. the Vice-Protonotary Sergio Donnoroso wrote a Comment, which he mentions in his Notes on the Statutes of the Kingdom¹, as does also Pier Vincenti in his *Teatro de Protonotari del Regno*²; which Letters, together with the merum & mixtum imperium were afterwards granted to the Barons in the Investitures of their Fiefs; but they did not get them from Robert, for in his time they were directed to the Justices, not to the Barons, who then had no Jurisdiction in criminal Matters, nor merum & mixtum imperium, as the Justices of the Provinces had. Till the Reign of Alphonfus I. of Aragon, or, as some have believed, of Joan II. the Barons had only Jurisdiction in civil Matters. Before Alphonfus's time the Feudatories who possessed Lands with Vassals could exercise no other Jurisdiction, but the very lowest, which reached only to the settling of Differences and Quarrels amongst their Tenants; for which end they appointed some annual Officers called Chamberlains, who had no other Jurisdiction, but the taking Cognizance of, and deciding some trifling Causes.

THE Justices of the Provinces, and the Tribunal of the High Court were those Magistrates, who exercis'd eminent and full Jurisdiction over all Castles and Places of the Kingdom³. In the same manner as was practis'd in the time of the Romans, who in their Cities and Towns had inferior Magistrates, whom they elected out of their own Corporations call'd Defensores, who exercis'd a low Jurisdiction, which consisted in taking Cognizance of frivolous civil Causes.

IN place of those Defensores, as Andrea d'Isernia very well observes⁴, in our Kingdom the Bailiffs succeeded, who took Cognizance of civil Causes, of Petty Larceny, Weights and Measures, and other Causes of small Moment¹. But Matters of Consequence, and especially those relating to merum imperium, and the Jurisdiction in criminal Cases, according to the Roman Laws, belonged to the Presidents of the Provinces, in whose Place afterwards in our Kingdom the Justices of Provinces were appointed². And therefore it is no Wonder, that the Concessions of Lands with Vassals implied only that low Jurisdiction, as inherent to, and inseparable from them, and not the merum imperium, and Jurisdiction in criminal Cases, which could not be said to be inherent to them, and which formerly were not exercised by their own Magistrates, but by the Presidents; and afterwards not by the Bailiffs of the Places, but by the Justices of the Provinces.

*Marino Freccia*³ therefore testifies, that having read the special Grant of Charles I. when he gave the City of Salerno to his only Son, with the Title of Principality, with other Lands and Cities, such as Ravello, Amalfi, Sorrento, Nocera and Sarno, he gave him civil Jurisdiction only in these Places: And it was taken notice of as a rare thing, that in the City of Salerno he likewise gave him criminal Jurisdiction; however it was confin'd to the Circuit of the Walls, and reached no farther; but that was propter titulum sue dignitatis, as that Writer says, seeing at that time the Barons had no criminal Jurisdiction. The Opinions of our Authors about what King it was that first granted it are different. *Matteo d'Affitto*⁴, *Grammatico*⁵, *Caravita*⁶, the President *de Francòis*⁷; and others maintain, that King Alphonfus I. was the first, and this last Writer says, that it was not practis'd but by the Aragon Kings. Others, such as *Francesco d'Amico*⁸, Deputy *Capicelatro*⁹, and *Capobianco*¹⁰, carry it a little further back, viz. to the Reign of Queen Joan II. but if we may give Credit to that most grave Historian *Angelo di Costanzo*¹¹, we must allow our King Robert to have been the first. This Author speaking of the Generosity of that Prince, says, That by the innumerable Privileges granted to Barons and private Gentlemen, both of the City of Naples and of other Cities of the Kingdom, it may be seen how generous he had been to them, In giving them Titles, Castles and Fiefs, with criminal Jurisdiction, which before that time had very rarely been given to Counts; and this Historian himself likewise says, That King Ladislaus granted criminal Jurisdiction over Teverola to Antonello di Costanzo, where he and his Predecessors for eighty Years had had no other but civil Jurisdiction¹².

HOWEVER that may be, whether Robert, or any of his Successors did practise such unusual Generosity to some of their Favourites, it is certain, that Alphonfus I. and the other Aragon Kings his Successors did so; and criminal Jurisdiction was more frequently given in Concessions made to Barons; and in the Investitures they also had granted them the Power and Authority contain'd in these four Arbitrary Letters, and at present it is the Stile, and in a manner the set Form of all Investitures given, to insert also a Clause containing that Power.

WHENCE it came, that as formerly these Letters were revocable at the Prince's Pleasure, and under certain Restrictions, so as to what concerns the Persons of Barons, by the Concessions contained in their Investitures, they are irrevocable; and their Authority and Power are thereby greater, than what the King's Officers have, to whom (such as the Deputy of the High Court of the Vicariate, and his Judges, the Governors of Provinces, Capitani of Cities, and other Officers of the Kingdom) the Emperor Charles V. by his Pragmaticks¹³ prescribed a Rule in compounding of Crimes, and in commuting corporal Punishment into pecuniary Mulcts, and prohibited the doing of it without his, or the Viceroy's Consent, and without the Pardon of the Party offended, or in Crimes that ought to be punished with Death, or the Loss of a Member. And seeing that these Letters had been granted to the Barons, that their Power might be confined to due Bounds and Justice, the same Emperor Charles V. afterwards by another special Pragmatick ¹ established for the Barons and their Officers, order'd them not to make an ill use of their Authority, which they had of commuting Punishments, but to make use of it with all Discretion, and in a reasonable manner, threatening in case of Abuse to deprive them of their Privileges.

Of the Usages of the Royal Chamber.

IN the Reign of King Robert were likewise collected the Usages of the Royal Chamber. This Tribunal not only in the time of the Emperor Frederick II. was govern'd by the Masters of Accounts, but likewise in the Reign of these Kings of the Family of Anjou. These Officers had great Authority, and therefore we see Persons of the greatest Distinction employed in these Offices; and by Queen Joan I. their Prerogatives and Privileges were much enlarged. Their chief Business was to inspect the Royal Rights and Revenues, to oblige the under Officers, such as the Collectors of the Revenues, Treasurers and others, to give an account of their Administration, to take in the Accounts of their Collections, and to receive the Money in order to send it to the Royal Chamber. These Revenues for the most part rose from Tributes, Taxes, Customs, Royalties, and other Duties belonging to the Exchequer, as well old, as new. During the Reign of the Normans these Collections were confin'd to a small Number, and were very moderate, particularly in the time of King William the Good; but after the Emperor Frederick I. restored the Regalia, which were almost worn out of Use in Italy, and that other Princes, after his Example, had a mind to restore them in their Dominions, their Number encreased, and they became more heavy: So when this Kingdom went from the Normans to the Suevi, Frederick II. imposed new Collections; an Example, which was afterwards followed by the Kings his Successors, as very conducive to the enriching their Exchequer, whereby they could maintain greater Armies, and more numerous Fleets. Although the Kings of the Family of Anjou in their Statutes often promis'd to moderate them, and reduce them to what they were in the time of King William the Good; yet, by Reason of the long and obstinate Wars which they had upon their Hands, and particularly that of Sicily, they performed nothing; on the contrary, they from time to time increas'd them. By which means Duties paid into the Exchequer were distinguished by the old and new.

AS for the old, viz. those which were before Frederick II.'s time, in the Reigns of William and his Norman Successors, we find that Andrea d'Isernia made two Catalogues of them ¹; one of which we read in the Notes, which he made upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom under the Title, de decimis; and the other amongst the Usages of the Royal Chamber, also under the same Title ². They differ only in a few things, and in the Order; the Number which he inserted amongst the Constitutions is as follows.

OF the new in the foresaid Places we have two Catalogues by the same Author. These were introduced by Frederick II. by the Guelf Writers, who wrote during the Reign of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, reputed a Tyrant, and who oppress'd his Subjects with innumerable Taxes; of all the rest Andrea d'Isernia has used him the worst, and represented him as a cruel Prince, for which he sends him to the tormenting Fire of Hell. In his Notes upon the Constitutions¹ he says, That the Church would not take the Tithes of these Taxes, because they were unjust, and impos'd by Frederick in Opposition to God and Justice: De illis non vult Ecclesia Decimas, tanquam de malis oblatiis, quæ imposita fuerunt per illum contra Deum, & justitiam; per quod videtur ille Federicus quiescere in pice, & non in pace. And in the first Usage, under the Title, de jure Tinctoriæ, & Celandræ, speaking of these Taxes as new and odious, and that they ought rather to be suppress'd, than explain'd, he writes; Imposita fuerunt hæc ab eo, qui depositus fuit, a Regno, & Imperio; pœna sua propterea in inferno crescit semper, sicut pœna Arii, ut Augustinus dicit. But these were idle Complaints, and Words at random. He blam'd and hated Frederick for having introduced them; they were exclaimed against as impious and unjust; but for all that the Kings of the Family of Anjou, this same Robert, and Charles his Father, under whom he wrote, did not lay them aside; on the contrary Robert, for having too rigidly exacted and increased them, was accus'd of Avarice.

THE same *Andrea*², inveighing against them, says, That the Church would not so much as take the Tithes of them; and tells us, that Filippo Minutolo Archbishop of Naples, displeas'd with the Agreement made with Charles II. that Tithes should be paid for the two third Parts, leaving one, which was thought to be new and unlawful Taxes; thinking that he had been impos'd upon, entered an Action at Law; but after a long Dispute, it appeared, that by not taking the Tithes of the new Taxes, which amounted to a much greater Sum than those of the old, he was at a great Loss, and that therefore he must have Reparation; and troubling himself no more about the unlawful Exaction, he resolved not to insist upon it for the future; but begged of the King, that as a Favour he would be pleas'd to let him have the Tithes of the other third Part, and to allow him to gather in the two Thirds as formerly; and in order to remove all Scruple, the King consented, that for the Time to come he should have the two Parts entire; but the other third, of which he made him a Present, should be laid out upon the Edifice of the Cathedral Church of Naples, which being completed, the Payment should be continued with the Burden of praying for the Souls of his Father and Mother, and of erecting some Altars in that Church; and Isernia says, that it was done and paid in his time ¹.

THESE new Duties, according to the Number, which Isernia has inserted in the Constitutions of the Kingdom are

OF all these Duties paid into the Exchequer; of their Collections; of the Persons, who were oblig'd to pay them; of the Method of taking in the Accounts of them from the Collectors of the Customs, Toll-gatherers, and other inferior Officers; of their Mal-administration; of the publick Sales, advertis'd by Placards; of the pretended Discounts; and of all Controversies and Disputes that arose concerning the same between the Parties and the Exchequer; this Tribunal of the Chamber of Accounts was the Judge-competent. Besides the Deputy of the Great Chamberlain its Head, it was governed by the Masters of Accounts; so call'd, a rationibus quibus præsumt ². This Tribunal therefore was call'd Auditorium rationum; afterwards it was call'd, Audientia Summaria; and lastly, Camera Summaria ³. Of course there often happen'd many Doubts concerning all these Matters, and the Masters of Accounts decided them; and from their Decisions, which were always uniform and stable, proceeded sundry Usages and Methods of judging, and in process of time various Rules to be made use of in the like Cases. Before Andrea d'Isfernia these Usages and Rules could not be found, but in the Books of the Tribunal, where they were set down; and as it was a difficult Matter for every one to have a Copy of them, or an Opportunity leisurely to consider them, they were not universally known, and made publick. It is true, some Regulations concerning them were inserted in our Constitutions, as in that under the Title, De officio Magistrorum Fundicariarum, and in some others; but the same Andrea in the Notes upon that Constitution says, That Frederick's other Statutes relating to them were in the Custom-House, and were not inserted in that Volume of the Constitutions: Sicut dicunt alia Statuta Imperialia, quæ sunt in Dobanis, nec sunt redacta in hoc volumine. It was this grave Lawyer then, that extracted them from the Registers of the Custom-house, and from the Acts of that Tribunal collected and reduc'd them into that Form, in which they now are. It was not to be expected, that any other could have perform'd this Work with so much Care and Exactness, as he did. He had been made Master of Accounts by King Charles II. and continued such during all King Robert's Reign, which was thirty four Years more, till he was by Queen Joan I. made Lieutenant of this Tribunal; so that none was more capable to give us the Usages of it, or to collect them with so much Exactness and Learning, as he was.

THAT he was the Compiler of them is not to be doubted; by comparing the two Catalogues of the Exchequer Duties it may be seen that he was the Author of both. And it is also manifest by comparing what the same Andrea wrote in the Commentaries upon Fiefs, under the Title, Quæ sint Regalia, in §. Vectigalia, in add. num. 14. and in the Notes upon the abovemention'd Constitution, De officio Magistrorum Fundicariarum; and by what we read in these Usages under the Title, *de jure fundici*¹, where the same Words are repeated ad literam. The same Andrea in the last Usage de jure Dobanæ in the End quotes himself, and refers to what he had written in cap. unico, §. Sacramentum, de consuet. rect. feud. His cotemporary Authors, or those who flourished not long after him, also witness it. Luca di Penna was his Cotemporary, because he was coetaneous with Bartolo, and he attests, that Andrea was the Compiler of these Usages². Goffredo di Gaeta, who in the Year 1460, as he says in the second Usage, De decimis, compos'd Commentaries, or Readings upon these Usages, in many Places takes it for an undoubted Truth, that Andrea was the Author of them³. *Liparulo*⁴ in Andrea's Life, and the anonymous Author⁵ of the Notes upon the said Usages say the same. And lastly, we read it in Text Letters in the Volume of these Usages, which is preserved in the Archives of the Royal Chamber, and has in the Frontispiece this Title: Ritus Domini Andreae de Isfernia super universis juribus Dobanarum, & aliarum Regni Siciliae Gabellam.

THESE Usages were call'd by Andrea, jura Imperialia; not that the Emperor Frederick had caus'd them to be compiled in the manner we now find them, but because some Duties, which we read among them, were newly introduced by him, and therefore call'd, jura Nova, or Imperialia, to distinguish them from the ancient, call'd jura Vetera, which had been before his Time in the Reign of the Normans. Although Andrea d'Isfernia was at the Pains to collect this Work for his own private Study, and not by publick Authority, as the Usages of the High Court of the Vicariate were afterwards order'd to be collected by Queen Joan II. who by her Constitution gave them Force and Authority; yet these have always been, and still continue to be observed, and put in execution, and with us have the same Force, as our written Laws, as proceeding from an uninterrupted Custom, and the ancient Usage of this Tribunal⁶. It is true, that in the course of little less than four Centuries, since they were collected many things have been altered, and others new introduced, so that besides the Usages, we have many Decrees of this Tribunal collected by Deputy de Marinis; nevertheless, such of them as have not been altered by a new Law, or by a contrary Practice disus'd, have all Force and Authority.

ANDREA in this Work comprehended all the Duties both ancient and new; and the better to distinguish them, divided them into many Rubricks, and under each of which he placed more or less Usages, according as the Copiousness or Brevity of the Subject required. He also, by way of Appendix, treated of many things relating to the Officers, who have the Administration and Collection of these Duties, in separate Rubricks, as may be seen in the Rubricks 1, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37 and 38. It must be observ'd, that amongst these Usages we find some Decrees made by the Masters of Accounts since Andrea's Collection, and afterwards put in the Places adapted to the Subject; such as the Decree which we read under the eleventh Rubrick de Tracta, made in September in the Year 1382, and the like. Besides the Rubrick 38. which is the last, de Jure Falangæ, seu Falangagii, was added after Isernia's Collection, because that new Duty or Tax, which is a Branch of the Revenues of the Custom-house, was imposed in the Year 1385 by King Charles III. that Prince laid that Tax upon all the Coast of the Tyrrhenian Sea from Gaeta to Reggio *. Alphonfus I. afterwards in the Year 1452 extended it over all the Kingdom from the River Tronto to Reggio and along the Coast of the Adriatick Sea, between which two Seas the Kingdom is situate.

THE first who, something more than a Century afterwards, wrote Notes upon these Usages was Goffredo di Gaeta, the Son of Charles, who flourished under King Ladislaus and Queen Joan II. in quality of Attorney General. Goffredo his Son emulating the Father's Virtues, and following the same Footsteps, in the Reign of Queen Joan II. was a long time Master of Accounts. Alphonfus I. having afterwards added to the Chamber of Accounts four Presidents of the Long Robe, and two private Men, that King made him President of that Tribunal, in which Office he continued in the Reign of Ferdinand I. till the Day of his Death, which happened in the Year 1463; and it is probable he began this Work in the Reign of Alphonfus, and finished it under Ferdinand; for in the second Usage, de decimis, he says, That with respect to the time in which he wrote, viz. in the Year 1460, the Taxes impos'd by Frederick could no longer be said to be new, but ancient, it being then two hundred and sixteen Years since the Day of his being depos'd, which he places in the Year 1244. His Commentaries are learned, grave and adapted to the Subject he treats upon, without making Digressions to trifling Disputes foreign to the Purpose, which was then the common Fault of other Commentators. Therefore by the Professors of the succeeding Times they were exceedingly valued, and the Author was look'd upon to have been one of the greatest Lawycis of his time. He died in Naples in the Year 1463, according to the Inscription upon his Tomb, which is to be seen in the Church of S. Peter the Martyr in the Chapel of his Family, where he lies buried with Charles his Father.

ABOUT a Century afterwards we find, that those Notes, which we read upon these Usages, were written by an uncertain and anonymous Author; seeing he quotes Decrees and Sentences of the Chamber of Accounts pass'd in the Year 1554, such as in the first Usage, de jure Ponderaturæ, and in the Year 1565, as in the Usage 14. de Jure Fundici; and elsewhere he cites many other Writings and Decisions of that Tribunal made in these Years. He often quotes Goffredo di Gaeta, Matteo d'Affitto. and frequently Authors of the sixteenth Century also. These Notes are pertinent, learned and most useful, full of Remarks upon the Decrees and Sentences of that Tribunal, its Writs, Deliberations, Royal Writs, Registers, and upon all other Things, that might conduce to the right understanding of the Terms and Meaning of these Usages, and of the Alterations, and Additions, which had happened to his own time, and upon the Imposition of other new Duties and Taxes, their Rise, Progress and Abuse; so that it is a pity his Name should be buried in Oblivion.

WE have since that time had in our own Days another Comment, or as the Author calls it, new Additions, upon these Usages made by Cesare Niccolo Pisani a Neapolitan Lawyer, who in the Year 1699, together with the Commentaries of Gaeta and the Notes of the anonymous Author, caus'd them to be printed in Naples. They are not worthy to be compared, or put with the Works of these two famous Lawyers, being stuffed with idle trifling Things, and a Heap of absurd Enquiries foreign to the Subject; loose, insipid, and without Order, or Method, huddled together for no other end but to swell the Volume.

C H A P. VII.

Of Men famous for Learning, who flourished in the Reigns of King Robert, and of Queen Joan his Granchild.

AMONG the other Virtues wherewith King Robert was adorn'd, he was a great Lover of all the eminent learned Men of his Time, a great Scholar himself, and a Protector of Learning.

IT may justly be said of this Prince that he encouraged the Muses, and applied himself to them at the same time. Read but the many Panegyricks of *Giovanni Villani*¹, *Petrarca*², and *Boccaccio*³ his Contemporaries, who have so much extolled him on that Account. We read a Treatise of the moral Virtues compos'd by this King in different Tuscan Rhimes. Count Federico Ubaldini caus'd this Treatise to be printed in Rome in the Year 1642, together with some of Petrarca's Verses taken from his Original, the Tesoretto of Ser Brunetto Latini, and four Songs of Bindo Bonichi da Siena, which bears this Title, A Treatise of the moral Virtues by Robert King of Jerusalem. According to Ubaldini he strain'd his Wit even in his old Age, by applying himself to Poetry, and by this Work imitated the wisest Kings of the Earth, such as Solomon (for which end he would take no other Title in his Book, but that of King of Jerusalem) the Emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, who wrote twelve moral Books of his own Life (if they be not fabulous, as Cassiodoro took them to be) Basilus Macedo, Leo Isauricus, Emanuel Comnenus, and other Greek Emperors, who compos'd such like Books; and to go back to his own Predecessors Kings of Sicily, such as the Emperor Frederick II. King Manfred, Entius, and others, who, being all intent upon Love Matters, made Songs upon that Subject only. Besides the abovementioned Poems, he also wrote some Letters in Latin Prose, two of which are translated into Italian by Villani in his History, one of them sent in the Year 1333 to the People of Florence, and the other to Walter Duke of Athens in the Year 1341, when he took upon him the Government of Florence.

IN his Reign Learning was so much encouraged, that Professors of all kinds, though of mean Birth, were by him rais'd to the chief Honours, and with the greatest Gentleness he entertain'd and care's'd them; he went on Foot to hear the publick Lectures, which were read in Naples, and honoured the Scholars.

AND to pass over an infinite Number of Instances, when Petrarca came from France to take the Laurel Crown in Rome, he sent Gio. Barrile as his Ambassador in his Name to be present at the Ceremony in the Capitol, and to make his Excuse to Petrarca, that nothing but old Age would have prevented him from being present in Person with his own Hand to have put the Crown upon his Head; and he was very earnest to have Petrarca's Africa dedicated to him. He was a great Patron of Divines and Philosophers⁴, insomuch that in his Reign these Faculties began to flourish in Naples.

THE Scholastick Divinity in his time reduc'd to an Art, and made a Slave to Aristotle's Philosophy, according to the Method laid down by the Averroists, got footing, and grew very considerable by the famous Factions of the Thomists and the Scoists supported by two Orders, at that time very considerable, the Preaching Fri- ars, and the Friars Minors. The first followed the Doctrine of Albertus Magnus, and afterwards of S. Thomas, call'd the Angelical Doctor his Disciple, who afterwards became Head of the Sect of the Scholasticks, from him call'd Thomists. The last followed Alexander Hales of their own Order, and afterwards the famous John Duns, call'd the Doctor Subtilis, and Scotus, because he was a Scotsman; though some will have it that he was an Englishman, others an Irishman, who became Head of that Sect, and from him his Followers were call'd Scotists; whence proceeded the Division of these two Schools. Nevertheless some have made a third Faction, who following a new Method, were call'd Nominals, and one of the principal Heads of this Sect was William of Ockham in the County of Surrey in England; who, though he was of the Order of Friars Minors, differed from the rest, and made himself Head of this Sect, for which Reason he got the Title of Doctor Singularis. Their Schools were spread over all Europe, and in Robert's time their Masters being numerous in Naples, Divinity thus metamorphosed, was publickly, and with the greatest Applause taught, and the Professors were favoured by this Prince; for he made it his Business to get many of the best of them provided with Prelatures and Bishopricks in the Kingdom, and always respected them above the Lay Barons¹.

ON account of the great Number of Greeks, and the continual Commerce with the East, the Monks of the Convents founded under the Rule of S. Basil and S. Benedict in the two Calabrias and Terra d'Otranto did not embrace this Divinity but very late, they followed the Greeks and their Doctrine; and Barlaamo a Basilian Monk of Calabria, born in Seminara, a very learned and subtle Man, distinguished himself above all the rest, who having gone to Constantinople, was much caressed by the Emperor Andronicus, and employed by him in the most weighty Affairs of State, and also to reconcile and reunite the Greek Church with the Latin. He was sent to Naples by Andronicus to demand Assistance of our King Robert; but as he did not expect to succeed, without the Union of the two Churches, he also got a Commission for that Purpose. The Union was long treated of, but all Projects were rejected, and his Labour was lost.

HE had great and obstinate Disputes with Palamas his Antagonist; but after various Turns, at last seeing Palamas's Doctrine approv'd of in a Council held in Constantinople, and his own condemn'd, he left the East and return'd to the West, and sided with the Latin Church; whereupon he was made Bishop of Geraci in *Calabria*². He left us many of his Works, which he wrote against Palamas, and the Quietist Monks whom he persecuted, and accused as Renewers of the Errors of the Euchytes, and upon other Subjects.

HE wrote a Book De Primatu Papæ, De Algebra, and other famous Works, of which Allaci and Nicodemo made copious Catalogues³. He instructed many of our Countrymen in Discipline, and the Greek and Latin Languages, and he taught Giovanni Boccaccio, Paolo Perugino, a Lawyer and Library-Keeper to our King Robert, Leonzio of Theffalonica, and many others⁴.

AT this very time flourished in Otranto a Monastery of Basilian Monks about a thousand and fifty Paces distant from that City. It was dedicated to S. Nicholas, and its Monks professed not only Divinity, but Philosophy, and they were well skilled in the Greek Learning, and some of them also in the Latin. They instructed the Youth in the Greek Discipline and Language. Scholars flocked to them from all parts of the Kingdom, whom they very generously furnished with Masters, Lodging and Provisions gratis; insomuch, that the Greek Learning, which by the Decay of the Empire of the East was upon the declining Hand, was by them kept up, and restored in our Kingdom. *Antonio Galaeto*⁵ says, That in the time of his Great Grandfathers, which coincides with the Reigns of King Robert and Queen Joan, when Constantinople was not as yet in the Hands of the Turks, the renowned Philosopher Niccolo d'Otranto, named Niceta, was Abbot of this Monastery, who restored a famous Library, and spared no Charges in sending over all Greece to collect Books of all kinds to be placed in his Monastery, and among the rest many of Philosophy and Logick. On account of his Wisdom and Integrity he was employed by the Emperors of the East and the Roman Pontiffs in several Embassies, who in the Disputes between them, either on account of Religion or State, made use of him to reconcile them; and he was often sent from Constantinople to Rome by the Emperors, and from Rome to Constantinople by the Popes. In process of time, by the Negligence of our Latins, and their Contempt of the Greek Learning, some of these Books were carried to Rome to Cardinal Bassarione, and from thence to Venice; and the rest were all lost and destroy'd by the remarkable Pillage of Otranto by the Turks in the Year 1480.

ROBERT, besides his favouring the Divines, did not neglect the Philosophers and *Physicians*¹. He procur'd the best Professors of that Age to teach these Sciences in the University of Naples; and that these, as well as other faculties might be taught in Naples only, he renew'd the Edicts of the Emperor Frederick II. and prohibited Schools in all other Cities of the Kingdom²; he made the Privileges granted to the University by King Charles II. his Father to be better observ'd, which he inserted in that Statute of his, which begins, Universis; which we find among his Statutes, under the Title, Privilegium Coll. Neap. Studii. Seeing in his time Aristotle's Philosophy, according to the Method prescribed by the Averroists, was universally taught in the Schools, and it only in Vogue, all the other antient Philosophers, for the Reasons before given, were neglected: and Physick being taken from the Books of Galen only, Robert therefore, in Imitation of Frederick II. order'd Niccolo Ruberto a famous Physician and Philosopher of those Times, to translate Aristotle's Books of Philosophy, and Galen's of Physick; as we have it from the Royal Registers, and related by *Summonte*³.

ROBERT likewise took great pleasure in having his Court and Chancery fill'd with learned Men, and made it his chief Study to employ the most eminent of the Age: which, as Cosanzo very well observes, may be known by the Style and Phrases of his Statutes and Grants, which are more polite, and set off with many elegant Clauses, according to the Times, in which Eloquence and Elegancy in writing were not arriv'd at that Sublimity, which we have seen since in our Grandfathers and our own Times. And although, as the same Author subjoins, of all Learning he took the least Delight in Poetry, yet he was very desirous to have the famous Petrarca with him, and, as we have observed, to have him dedicate his Poem of Africa to him⁴. Upon that account, above all others of his Courtiers, he lov'd Giovan Barile, to whom he gave the Government of Provence and Languedoc, and Guglielmo Marmaldo, both learned Men and Friends of *Petrarca*⁵; and Petrarca and *Boccaccio*⁶ write, that he repented in his old Age of his having had so little regard for the Poets, and look'd upon it as his Misfortune to have been so late in discovering their Beauties and Wit, which in his old Age put him upon writing of the moral Virtues in Verse.

BUT those, who above all others flourish'd most in Robert's Reign, and in the peaceable Years of Queen Joan I. his Grandchild, were our Lawyers, who were rais'd to the first Honours of the Kingdom, and were in great Esteem and Reputation. Above all the other Lawyers Bartolommeo di Capua, and Niccolo d'Alife made the brightest Figure in Robert's Court. 'Tis needless to repeat here what has been said of Bartolommeo in the Reigns of Charles II. and Robert: this last rais'd him to be Great Protonotary of the Kingdom, and his Privy Counsellor, and all Matters were managed by his Advice and Pen: he not only advanced him to the chief Honours of the Kingdom, but gave him many Lands, and Castles which he erected in the County of Aitavilla. *Bartolo*⁷ a famous Lawyer in those Times bestows the greatest Encomiums upon him, and says, that for his Virtues he deserv'd to have been made Great Count by Robert. Luca di Penna, *Baldo*⁸, *Guido Pancirolo*⁹, and others, have celebrated the Learning of this great Man. And *Angelo di Cosanzo*¹⁰, to the time that he wrote his most excellent History, observes, that the many Rewards given by Charles and Robert to this renowned Lawyer might be justly said to be a great Indication of the Worth and Virtue of this Man; since, notwithstanding so many Revolutions that had happened in the Kingdom to that time, they had never been lost, but continued in his Posterity, who, by their war-like Exploits, had augmented them with the Titles of the Principalities of Molfetta and Conca, and of the Dukedom of Termole; and in our Days his Offspring, besides these, being enriched with greater Estates, is a clear Proof, no less of the Justice and Virtue, than of the Worth of this great Lawyer.

NICCOLO ALUNNO of the City of Alife was also one of the famous Lawyers, who flourished in the Reigns of Robert and Queen Joan I. his Grandchild. Pier Vincenti, in his Treatise of the Protonotaries of the Kingdom, makes him to be of the same Family with Giovanni d' Alife, who in 1262, under King Manfred, was Great Protonotary of the Kingdom. In the Reign of King Robert he was Secretary and Notary of the Chancery, and was afterwards made Master of Accounts by Queen Joan I. not by King Robert, as Costanzo has it. Upon the Death of the Bishop of Cavillon he was made Lord High Chancellor of the Kingdom, which Office he exercised till his Death, which fell out on the last Day of December 1367. He was buried in Naples in the Church of the Ascension without the Gate of Chiaja, which he had built for the Celestine Monks, where his Tomb is to be seen with a long Inscription upon it, recorded also by Eugenio in his *Neapolis Sacra*¹. He had a Grant of some Lands from the King in the Province of Bari, which he left to his Sons, one of which in the Year 1384 was made a Cardinal by Pope Urban VI². This Lawyer wrote nothing upon the Law, as Bartolommeo di Capua, Andrea d' Isernia, Niccolo di Napoli, Luca di Penna, and others his Contemporaries did.

THE famous Andrea d' Isernia flourished also in the Reigns of King Robert and Queen Joan I. On account of his profound Skill in the Law, and particularly in feudal Matters, in the Reign of King Charles II. he was made Attorney-General, and afterwards Judge of the High Court, and then by the same Charles made Master of Accounts, an Office at that time of great Authority: he likewise got many Lands and other Rewards from that King. Robert his Son continued him in the same Post of Master of Accounts, in which he officiated for many Years, till after Robert's Death, when Queen Joan made him her Counsellor, and Lieutenant of the Royal Chamber, a Tribunal in which he had serv'd many Years in the Quality of Master of Accounts.

SOME, following the Errors of *Ciarlante*³, believe, contrary to what ancient Writers have handed down to us, that he had been made Attorney-General by Charles I. and add, that Queen Mary his Wife from Attorney-General made him her Counsellor and Master of Accounts: altho' it be evident from all Authors, that he died at the Age of seventy three, yet they will have it, that he died a natural Death in 1316, in the Reign of King Robert, and not in 1357, in the Reign of Queen Joan a violent Death; attributing this last kind of Death not to this Andrea, but to another Andrea his Grandchild the Son of Roberto his Son, who, as they say, was likewise made Lieutenant of the Royal Chamber by Queen Joan, as his Grandfather had been by King Robert.

THIS Opinion, besides its having with clear Arguments been confuted by the incomparable Francesco di Andrea in his learned feudal Dispute⁴, is repugnant to all History, and by many Reasons prov'd to be fabulous. First, what is said of his Wife and Sons, and of the great Employments which they got from Queen Joan, is all fabulous, as has been demonstrated by the Bishop Liparulo, who very carefully, and with great Exactness, wrote the Life of this Lawyer. II. If they will make Andrea Attorney-General in the Reign of Charles I. they must say, that he was an older Doctor than Bartolommeo di Capua, which is false: Bartolommeo was not only Contemporary with Bartolo, but a more ancient Author than he: Bartolo, who in his Works makes honourable mention of that Lawyer, died in Perugia, as Baluzio proves⁵, in 1357, at forty six Years of Age⁶, twenty nine Years after Bartolommeo's Death, who, as we have observed, died in 1328. On the contrary Andrea was Contemporary with Baldo, and had Disputes with him upon feudal Matters, wherein Baldo was confuted: they were not in Friendship, and Baldo could not forbear abusing him, by calling him fickle and inconstant, and that sometimes he inclined one way, and sometimes another ¹. And 'tis well known to every body, that Baldo was Bartolo's Disciple, and liv'd many Years after him; and if we will believe Hofman, he died in 1400; but others will have it ², that he died in 1420, decay'd with Age, after having read the Civil Law in Bologna and Paria fifty six Years. Whence we see how widely the Counsellor de Bottis is mistaken, who writes, that he had read in an ancient Book of Commentaries of Andrea d' Iferniz some short Notes written with Bartolommeo di Capua's own hand; for besides it's being a very hard matter for de Bottis two hundred and fifty Years after, when he wrote, to be able to testify, that those Notes had been written with that Lawyer's hand, it seems altogether improbable, that so great a Man as he was in the Reign of King Robert, and who had the Management of every thing, would have condescended to write Notes upon the Commentaries of Andrea, a Doctor then of small Repute with him: to this may be added, that the same de Bottis says, that he had seen the like Observation written with Iferniz's own Hand, whereby he supposes, that Iferniz's Book had been printed, which if it had, it could not be in Bartolommeo's time, when the Art of Printing was not known in Italy. III. His fixing Andrea's Death in the Year 1316, and consequently before that of Bartolommeo, in order to carry it back to the Reign of Charles I. is repugnant to many ancient Records, and to the very Works of that Lawyer. We have some Notes of his upon the Statutes of King Robert, penn'd by Giovanni Grillo Vice-Protonotary of the Kingdom. After Bartolommeo's Death Grillo exercis'd that Office; for while he liv'd, being Protonotary, the Statutes were penn'd by him, and not by Grillo. We likewise find, that this same Andrea in the Preface to the Notes, which he made upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom ³, speaking of Innocent III. Author of the Decretal Cum Interest, wrote, that that Pope had then been dead above a hundred Years, and quoted the Chronicles, which he said could be brought to prove the Truth of it: therefore having carefully examin'd the Chronicles, he certainly found, that Innocent died in Perugia the sixth Day of July in the Year 1216; so that if at the time when Andrea wrote, there had above an hundred Years past from Innocent's Pontificate, 'tis evident that he wrote those Notes upon our Constitutions after the Year 1316. Moreover, in the very same Notes, and the same Preface, he frequently quotes Thomas Aquinas with the Title of Saint; on the contrary, in the Commentaries on Fiefs written before, he quotes that Author with the Title of Friar only, as Liparulo in many Places hath observ'd: Thomas was canoniz'd a Saint by Pope John XXII. in the Year 1323; 'tis plain then, that he wrote upon our Constitutions after the Year 1323.

ANDREA then, tho' born in the latter end of the Reign of King Charles I. about the Year 1280, four Years before that King's Death, began to shine, and give Proof of his Talents in the Reign of Charles II. who, for his profound Knowledge and Learning made him Attorney-General, and Judge of the High Court, and then Master of Accounts. In the latter end of that Reign he wrote Commentaries upon the Fiefs; and the Notes upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom were written in the Reign of King Robert, about the Year 1232, as the Writer of his Life has demonstrated ⁴.

BALDO his Rival, finding some Variation and Inconstancy of Opinion held by him in the Commentaries upon the Fiefs, which he afterwards alter'd in those upon the Constitutions, not able to deny his profound Learning, accused him of that Fault: and not only Liparulo, but the incomparable Francesco d' Andrea found out the Mystery. King Robert, charm'd with Bartolommeo di Capua, and seeing with no other Eyes but his, nor governing his Kingdom by any other Advice, was intent upon raising him above all others: Andrea was not so much taken notice of, nor rewarded according to his Merit. At King Robert's Accession he was Master of Accounts, which Office had been conferred upon him by King Charles his Father, and in which he continu'd during Robert's Reign; on the contrary all Honours were bestow'd on Bartolommeo, which so incens'd Andrea to see his Rival so much exalted, and himself depressed, that not able to be otherwise reveng'd on the King, he began by his Writings to lessen his Royalties; and as in the Commentaries upon the Fiefs, which he wrote in the Reign of Charles II. he shew'd himself a great Royalist, so afterwards in the Notes upon the Constitutions, which he wrote in the Reign of Robert, he discover'd himself to be quite the Reverse. Very many Instances of his being thus exasperated may be read in Liparulo ¹. and in Francesco d' Andrea ². And these Authors have observ'd, that in the Commentaries upon the Fiefs, whenever he had Occasion to mention King Charles I. and II. (which he often had) he never mentions them without Encomiums: On the contrary, in the Notes, which he wrote upon the Constitutions in Robert's Reign, although he had an hundred Opportunities, and sometimes necessarily to quote him, he never could be induced to mention him; insomuch that Matteo d' Afflitto ³, speaking of Andrea, greatly surpriz'd was once forc'd to say: Et satis miror, quod non alleget Capitulum Regis Roberti, cum ipse fucrit eo tempore, & usque ad tempus Reginae Joannæ I. And being obliged once out of cruel Necessity to mention that King, who in his time was reputed another Solomon, he speaks of him no otherwise, than if he had been a common Man, without any Elogy, tho' he wrote in his Reign, thus: Et fuit determinatum in Consilio, quando Rex Robertus erat Vicarius patris sui ⁴.

BUT upon Robert's Death, and the Accession of Joan his Grandchild, having no other Competitor, it was easy for him, on account of his Learning, to get into her Favour, by whom he was made Lieutenant of the Royal Chamber of Accounts, and her Counsellor, which Office he bore till 1353, the Year of his Death. When modern Writers bring us but slight Proofs, and weak Arguments about his Death, we ought not to depart from what the ancient have left us concerning it. Two very grave Authors, who wrote about a hundred Years after it happen'd, have given us such an Account of that untimely Death, as they might have had from their Grandfathers; these are Paris de Puteo ⁵, who flourished in the Reign of Alphonfus I. of Aragon, and was Preceptor to Ferdinand his Son and Successor, and Matteo d' Afflitto ⁶, who wrote his Commentaries upon the Fiefs in the Reign of the same Ferdinand, which they had from our Regifiers; they say, that Andrea having judg'd in a Cause of a German named Conrad de Gottis, against whom Sentence was pronounced, by which he lost a Barony which he possessed; Conrad, furiously enraged on account of his Loss, in the Night-time, accompanied with some of his own Countrymen, as Andrea was returning from Castel Nuovo to his House, near Porto Petruccia, attack'd him, and said, that as he by his Sentence had depriv'd him of his Estate, so he with his Arms would deprive him of his Life; and with furious Strokes his Assassins murder'd him. Matteo d' Afflitto speaks of this unhappy Event thus: Fuit autem interfectus præfatus Doctor insignis in Civitate Neapolis Die 11 Octobris 12 Ind. 1353, &c. and elsewhere: Et ego vidi Privilegium Reginae Joannæ I. vindicantis mortem Andreae de Isernia ejus Consilarii occisi tarda hora noctis, dum veniret a Castro Novo, prope Portam Petrutiam per quosdam Teutonicos, acriter condemnatos de crimine læsæ Majestatis. The Queen inflicted condign Punishment upon the Assassins; their Goods were confiscated, their Houses demolished, and themselves condemned to die in the same manner as if they had been guilty of High Treason, according to Andrea's own Doctrine, who, as if he had foreseen his own unhappy Fate, had taught, that he who kill'd a Counsellor of the Prince, was guilty of the Crime of High Treason, and ought to be punished with the like Punishment.

THIS renown'd Lawyer left us his incomparable Commentaries upon Fiefs, which he wrote in the latter end of King Charles the second's Reign: a Work in which he exceeded himself, and from Posterity gain'd him these Elogiums and Surnames Princeps, & Auriga omnium Feudistarum, Evangelista Feudorum, and the like, recorded by the Writer of his Life. Upon which Work our Professors have employ'd all their Talents; and it gain'd so great Authority, that it had no less Force than the feudal Laws themselves. Bartolommeo Camerario ⁷ employ'd the greatest Part of his Life in reading and correcting it; and he himself declares, that by his too much studying it, he lost an Eye. He was look'd upon, not only in his own Country, but in foreign Nations, to be the greatest Feodalist in all Europe in those Times: he confounded Baldo, and obliged him in his old Age to study the feudal Law ⁸, and was by our Countrymen, as well as Foreigners, intitled Prince of the Feodals.

HE likewise wrote in the Reign of King Robert about 1323, and the following Years, the Notes upon the Constitutions, and Statutes of the Kingdom: he collected the Usages of the Royal Chamber, and wrote other Treatises of Law, recorded by Toppi ¹. 'Tis likewise said, that he wrote some Treatises upon Divinity and the common Law; whence by succeeding Writers he got the Titles of Excelsus Juris Doctor, Theologus maximus, and utriusque Juris Monarcha.

HOWEVER 'tis true, that by the Fault of the Times in which he wrote, rather than by his own, his Style was barbarous and confused, and without Method; which gave occasion to Alvarotto ² to say, that he was more commendable for his abundance of Matter, than for his Method; and to our Loffredo ³ to complain, that he had treated of many things very obscurely and without Order, which he might have explain'd more distinctly and clearly.

LUCA DI PENNA, another famous Lawyer, also flourished in the latter end of King Robert's Reign, and much longer in that of Queen Joan I. He was Contemporary with Bartolo, as he himself in his Works testifies ⁴: this Doctor was in great Esteem with that Queen, and bore a great Sway in Law Matters. He wrote most copious Commentaries upon the three last Books of the Code 10, 11, and 12 ⁵; but the Subject which he undertook to trim up in those Times of little Learning, and in which there was but small Knowledge of the Roman Affairs, Customs, and History, things all necessary for that Work, lead him into a Multitude of Errors: yet it ought to be look'd upon as an Undertaking worthy of a great Genius, and of great Boldness. The Method and Style were a little more elaborate than what that Age generally afforded; and according to the Opinion of Francesco d' Andrea ⁶, in his Method of Teaching and Perspicuity, he far excel'd Andrea d' Isernia. As the Germans endeavoured to rob us of Pietro delle Vigne, so the French pretended that Luca di Penna was of their Country, and born in Thoulouse; but 'tis as clear as the Light of the Sun, that he was ours, and born in Penna a City of Abruzzo, as Niccolo Toppi in his Apologia has clearly demonstrated. Neither have the gravest French Authors disputed it, not even their famous Papinian Carolus Molinæus ⁷, who, in his Glossa Parisiensis, and elsewhere, calls him Parthenopeus, that is to say, of the Kingdom of Naples.

TO Andrea d' Isernia and Luca di Penna, we must add the famous Niccolo di Napoli, of whom we have some Notes upon the Constitutions and Statutes of the Kingdom. This Niccolo Spinello, call'd di Napoli, but born in Giovenazzo, was a great Favourite of Queen Joan I. He was Count of Gioja, and High Chancellor of the Kingdom, and employ'd by the Queen in her most weighty Affairs of State; and when Pope Urban VI. was elected, he was sent to Rome to congratulate him upon his Advancement to S. Peter's Chair, and to pay him Homage ⁸. These three Lawyers were reputed by Camerario to be of so great Authority and Learning ⁹, that he did not stick to say: Nos Andream de Isernia, Nicolaum de Neapoli, & Lucam de Penna, in nostri Regni Juribus interpretandis, non aliter venerari, quam veluti humanam Trinitatem.

THERE was likewise the Vice-Protonotary Sergio Donneroso, Master of Accounts, of whom we have some Notes upon the Statutes of the Kingdom: 'tis said, that he also wrote a Comment upon the four Arbitrary Letters, of which he makes mention in the said Notes: he was Vice-Protonotary in the Year 1352, when Neapelione Urino was Great Protonotary of the Kingdom. The Family of Donneroso was very ancient in Naples, and gave Name to one of the Gates of the City, anciently called Porta Donneroso, which was close by the Church of S. Peter a Majella, and was afterwards upon the last Enlargement of the City removed near the Church of S. Maria Constantinopoli ¹⁰.

TO these we may add the Judge Blasio da Morcone of the Family of Paccona: in the Reign of King Charles II. he was Disciple of Benevento di Mila da Morcone, who, as we have said, was Professor of the University, and taught the Civil Law.

He made wonderful Progress in that Study; insomuch, that King Robert, who succeeded Charles II. made him his Counsellor, and Domestick-Chaplain. He was also in great Esteem with Charles Duke of Calabria, who, when he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, gave him Power to plead, and appointed him Advocate in the Provinces of Terra di Lavoro, the County of Molise, Abruzzo, and Capitanata, and in the Year 1323 wrote him very favourable Letters full of Encomiums and Commendations¹. He left us many of his Works, amongst which the most remarkable was the Treatise of the Difference between the Roman and Longobard Laws, and the large Commentaries upon these Laws. *Marino Freccia*² tells us, That he had that Volume in MS. in his Custody, to which he often referred by quoting it. This Work makes us certain, that in those Times the Longobard Laws were not quite in disuse in our Kingdom. Although the Pandects, and the other Books of Justinian were publickly taught in the Academies of Italy, and in that of Naples, and had begun to have Force and Vigour, yet their Authority was not so great, as to turn the Longobard Laws quite out of Doors, as happen'd in the Reign of the Kings of the House of Aragon; even in which, as in that of the Spanish Kings, there were some Remains, whence Prospero Rendella took occasion to write that little Book, In reliquias juris Longobardorum. He also wrote some other Treatises, such as the Cautelæ, and the Notes upon the Constitutions and Statutes of the Kingdom³. The Writers of the succeeding Times make honourable mention of these his Works. *Francesco Vivio*⁴ calls him a Man of great Authority in the Kingdom, and especially on account of his Treatise of the Difference between the Roman and Longobard Laws. The Author of the Gloss upon the Pragmatic Dubitatio, de termino citandi auctorem in causa reali, praises him much, and all those, who have studied his Works, load him with Commendations. He was Cotemporary, and in great Friendship with Luca di Penna, as he himself testifies, when writing upon the Constitution, Majestati nostræ, de Adulteriis, and finding something that was doubtful, he went to ask Luca di Penna's Opinion of it, who, as he says, A me interrogatus sic de verbo ad verbum, respondit, &c. He spent some part of his Life in very low Circumstances in Cerreto, and was always grateful to his Master Benvenuto di Milo Bishop of Caserta; confessing in the Title, De Ædificiis dirutis reficiendis, that from nothing he had brought him to the Condition he was then in.

Giacomo di Milo his Countryman flourished in the same Rank of Counsellor to King Robert, which that King made him on account of his Learning and Wisdom, whereof the Patent may be seen in the Registers of the Years 1337 and 1338, Lit. B. fol. 28. so that Morcone, a Town in the County of Molise, became remarkable in those Times for three famous Citizens, a most learned Bishop, and two renowned Counsellors and Lawyers. About the same time flourished Filippo d'Isernia a notable Lawyer, and chief Professor of the civil Law in the University of Naples, at the same time that he was Counsellor, and Domestick to King Robert, with whom he was in so great Esteem, that he not only made him his Counsellor, but in the Year 1320 chose him to be Advocate for the Poor, and then his Attorney General⁵. There also flourished Bartolommeo di Napoli, Cotemporary with *Dino*⁶, Bartolommeo Caracciolo, who, in the Opinion of *Agnello Ruggiero di Salerno*⁷, was Author of the Chronicle published under the Name of Giovanni Villano; and some others recorded by Toppi, who not having left us any of their Works, their Memories are but obscure with us.

AS for Napodano Sebastiano, who flourished in the Reign of Queen Joan I. we spoke enough of him in the preceding Book; he died in the Year 1362, and we may say, that with him the Science of the Law was buried. The troublesome Times, and Revolutions that followed, and which continued for a whole Century, to the peaceable and quiet Reign of Alphonfus I. of Aragon, put a Stop both to the Study of the Law, and to all other Learning. From Napodano to Paris de Puteo, Goffredo di Gaeta, and Matteo d'Afflitto, in whose Times it began to revive, we have no Writer that has left us any Record of it. Which shews us the Vicissitude of the Jurisprudence in those Provinces, and how much it depends upon the Favour of learned Princes, and the Love of Peace.

IN the time of King Robert, and in the beginning of the Reign of Queen Joan his Grandchild, there flourish'd many eminent and famous Lawyers in the Universities and Courts of Italy, neither were those of the University of Naples, and the Court of our Kings inferior.

IN this fourteenth Century there began in Italy as it were a new Period of the Civil Law, and the Age of Commentators commenc'd; for after Accursio none made Glosses, but the Lawyers began now to illustrate it with full Commentaries. Those who distinguished themselves in the other Cities of Italy were Bartolo di Sassoferato, Baldo Peruzino his Disciple, Angelo Brother to Baldo, and then Alessandro Tartagna, Bartolommeo Saliceto, Paolo di Castro, Giasone Maino, Cino, Oltrado, Pietro di Bellapertica, Raffael, Fulgose, Raffaele Cumano, Ipolito Riminaldo and many others, who to the Body of the Civil Law added new Commentaries. We were nothing short of them in famous Lawyers, who flourished at the same time, such as Bartolommeo di Capua, Andrea d'Iernia, Luca di Penna, Niccolo di Napoli, and the others abovementioned. And truly, as Foreigners likewise confess¹, it was much to the Praise of Italy, that it distinguished itself in that above all other Nations. And although by the Ignorance of History, of Languages, and Learning, there be many things in their Commentaries to be found Fault with, yet that Fault ought not to be imputed to them, but to the unhappy Age in which they wrote. But they made sufficient Amends by the Perspicuity and Sharpness of their Wit, and by their long and indefatigable Labours, so that where History and the Languages, or the Knowledge of the Ancients were not absolutely necessary, they compassed their Ends by the mere dint of Reason, and their penetrating Wit. The farther Explanation was reserved for the following Century, when, as shall be related, by the Ruin of the City of Constantinople, Learning began to revive and flourish with us; the Glory of which is owing to our Italy, and with respect to the Jurisprudence, to Andrea Acciatio di Milano, who was the first that restored it to its Purity and Brightness.

BUT as in the Reign of King Robert, when the Kingdom was in the greatest Tranquillity, the Barons and Gentlemen covetous of Honour and Titles had Opportunities to shew their Courage in the Wars, which were carried on Abroad, sometimes in Sicily, and in other parts of Italy; sometimes in Greece and Palestine, and by their noble Behaviour in presence of the King, or his Generals, to deserve to be rais'd higher, and enriched with honourable Rewards; so that the Rise of their Families was owing to the Wars, and which they were enabled to keep up in Splendor for many Ages afterwards; so Men of Learning and good Behaviour by serving their Princes, were rais'd to divers and eminent Posts, and employ'd in the most weighty Affairs, whose Successors, to this very Day, are in Possession of the first Ranks and Titles; which shews us, that the handling the Pen, as well as the Sword, uses to make both Men and Families honourable and illustrious; and that these only are the two Fountains, from whence the Nobility and Grandeur of Families spring. But when by the Death of the wise King Robert, without leaving male Issue, the Line of those powerful and gallant Kings became extinct, and, amidst the Dissentions of a numerous Royal Family, the Kingdom fell to the Share of a Woman; and those Arms, which hitherto had been employed in making War upon others, and maintaining the Kingdom in Peace and Quiet, were made use of to ruin and destroy it: The Result was not only a change of Ministers, violent Deaths of Princes, the Destruction and Calamity of the People, but in the midst of Commotions and intestine Broils, Virtue and Learning also declin'd; neither did they revive with us, till after many Revolutions, which shall be the Subject of the following Books; at last the Kingdom came to be restored to its former Tranquillity under the Dominion of Alphonso I. of Aragon, a wise and magnanimous King.

C H A P. VIII.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of the fourteenth Century during the Residence of the Popes in Avignon, to the Schism of the Popes of Rome and Avignon.

It is the usual Fate of the Affairs of this World, that whenever they are arrived at the highest Pitch, that very Exaltation is the beginning of their Fall; so it exactly happened to the Roman Pontificate in this fourteenth Century; the Polity of which we are now about to treat of. Boniface VIII. following the Footsteps of his Predecessors, believed that he had raised the Pontificate to so great a height, that being crowned with the triple Crown, and clothed with the Imperial Mantle, he would have himself to be looked upon as Monarch, not only in Spirituals, but in Temporals; and that the greatest Kings and Princes of the Earth were subject to him even in Temporals, for besides his taking the two Swords for his Device, he declared it openly in that his extravagant Bull, Unam Sanctam. Therefore he set up for deciding the Controversies of Princes, and among others those of Edward King of England, and Guido Count of Flanders with Philip the Fair King of France. He undertook entirely to ruin the Ghibellin and Colonna Factions in Italy, and to let all Princes know his Power over them, in forbidding them by his Bull to exact any thing upon the Goods of Ecclesiasticks. These bold Resolutions highly offended Philip King of France, who being appris'd that the Prohibition, though general, concerned the Kingdom of France, he oppos'd it with all Vigour, and caused a Manifesto to be drawn up against the Bull; and on the other hand Boniface pursuing the Destruction of the Ghibellin and Colonna Factions, these were forced to fly to France, where they were kindly received by the King; whereupon the Disputes became more imbitter'd, which at last broke out not only into Affronts and Reproaches, but into Acts of Hostility; for Monsieur de Nogaret the King's Ambassador in Italy, assisted by Sciarra Colonna, entered Anagni, where the Pope was, and made him Prisoner; and though he was set at Liberty by the Inhabitants and fled to Rome, yet it grieved him so much, that he died soon after; and Dante, who was a Ghibellin, writes¹, that his Soul was impatiently expected in Hell by Pope Nicholas III. in order to place him among the Simoniack Popes.

THESE Quirrels, which in the beginning of this Century arose between King Philip and Pope Boniface, and more especially the Disputes, which grew so hot afterwards between Lewis of Bavaria and John XXII. and Benedict XII. were the Causes, whence the Roman Pontificate sunk not a little both in its Credit and Authority; for besides the Loss it sustain'd by removing the Apostolick See to Avignon, and the Schism that followed thereupon, of which hereafter: These Disputes between the Popes and Princes about temporal Authority occasioned a nice Enquiry into that Matter; whereas formerly it was not much minded, and Learning by Degrees beginning to revive among the Laity, there appeared Men of Wit, who, according to the Factions, began to dispute it, and the Ghibellins wrote particular Treatises upon it, whereby they endeavoured to discover the Usurpations, and to demonstrate, that the spiritual Power had nothing to do with the temporal, which belonged altogether to Princes.

Dante Alighieri a Florentine ought to be reckoned among the first, who, in his three Books De Monarchia, written in the time of Lewis of Bavaria, maintains it strenuously. About the same time William of Ockham of the Order of Friars Minors, who, though he was born in a Village, from which he takes his Name, in the County of Surrey in England, in the beginning of this Century being a Professor in the University of Paris, was of the same Opinion with Dante, and wrote a Treatise, De Potestate Ecclesiastica & Seculari, in order to defend Philip the Fair against Boniface; and he was afterwards one of the greatest Adversaries of Pope John XXII. who condemn'd him to Silence under the Pain of Excommunication. He afterwards declared openly for Lewis of Bavaria, and the Antipope Pietro di Corbaria, who took the Name of Nicholas V. and wrote against John XXII. who excommunicated him in the Year 1330. Then he left France, and went to the Court of Lewis of Bavaria, which was then at Munick, where he died in the Year 1347. John of Paris Doctor of Divinity of the Order of Preaching Friars, surnam'd Magister Parisiensis, about the Year 1322 also wrote a Treatise, De Potestate Regia & Papali. Arnoldus de Villanova a Catalan, Marsilio di Padova, and Giovanni Jande also impugn'd the Authority of the Popes over the Temporalities of Princes; but these knew not how to keep within Bounds, but ran upon Extremes; for Arnold advanced many Propositions against the Authority of the Church, against the Sacraments, the Clergy, and the Religious; and Marsilio and Giovanni by favouring Princes too much, attributed to them a Jurisdiction, which solely belongs to the Church. Radulfo Colonna, Leopold de Babenberg, Ralph de Prelles, and Philip de Mezieres famous Lawyers, in their Treatises also maintained the Rights of Princes; but in France, the most vigorous Defender of the Rights of King Philip of Valois against the Encroachments of the Ecclesiasticks, was Peter de Cunicres his Attorney-General in the Parliament of Paris. In the Year 1429, he had hot Disputes with Nicholas Bertrand Bishop of Autun, afterwards Cardinal, and with the other Prelates of France, about the Rights of Spiritual and Temporal Jurisdiction. The Clergy of France calumniated him, and artfully spread a Report, that under pretence of retrenching their Jurisdiction, he had a Desire to rob them of their Goods, although Cunicres in his Pleadings mentioned no such thing; so that King Philip afraid of raising new Troubles, and jealous of the Authority which the Clergy then had in France, did not think fit to recede from his Encroachments altogether, as was afterwards done by the Edict of 1539.

BESIDES the French and Germans, the Spaniards began afterwards to rouse themselves out of their long Sleep; for not only Arnoldus de Villanova the Catalan, but also Alvarus Pelagius of Galicia in Spain, of the Order of Friars Minors, and afterwards Bishop of Silva in Portugal, wrote a Treatise, De Planctu Ecclesiæ, an excellent Work upon the Reformation of the Discipline of the Church. About the end of this Century, and after the middle of the following, before and after the Council of Constance, Cardinal Francesco Zabarella Archbishop of Florence, Theodore de Nisines, Niccolo di Cusa, and afterwards Aeneas Sylvius, wrote upon the same Subject. And after their Example many others wrote large Treatises upon it; of all which Works *Simon Sebaraius*¹ made a Collection, and afterwards Melchior Goldastus in his Volumes of the Monarchy of the Empire made one much larger.

BY these Disputes they began in France and Germany to oppose the Ecclesiasticks in the exercise of temporal Jurisdiction, and in taking Cognizance of those, which they had drawn to the Episcopal Court, of which we made mention in the XIX. Book of this History. They were opposed in meddling with many civil Causes under pretence of Excommunication, of Sin, and of Oaths; it was also attempted to attack the Immunity of the Clergy, and of the Goods of the Church; and although the Ecclesiasticks boldly defended their Rights, yet some Abuses were redressed, and by Degrees they lost a part of their temporal Jurisdiction; and in Germany, from the time of Lewis of Bavaria, the Pontifical Law, especially that contained in the Decretals, began to lose its Authority and Force².

BUT it happened not so in our Kingdom under the Kings of the Family of Aricon; they had no Dispute with the Roman Pontiffs; on the contrary, they were more at their Beck than ever; and Robert, much more than his Predecessors, on account of the many Favours he had received from Clement V. John XXII. and Benedict XII. the Popes of Avignon, who preferred him to his Nephew in the Succession to the Kingdom; and they always assisted him against Henry VII. and Lewis of Bavaria, in the Sicilian Expedition, and against all his Enemies. Therefore this Prince followed not the Example of France, but maintained the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Immunity entire; and he carried his Complaisance so far, that as we have told in the XIX. Book of this History¹, he would needs include in the Immunity even the Concubines of the Clergy, leaving them to be punished by the Prelates of the Church². Whence it came, that in establishing the Preservatives against the Oppressions of the Clergy, he made use of so many Reserves, Cautions, and Considerations, in order to preserve their Immunity untouched; and whence it also came, that the Translation of the Apostolick See to Avignon made no Alteration in the Polity of our Churches; and that our Natives did not join in the Complaints of all the rest of Italy on account of this Translation, but chose rather to humour the French, than grieve with the Italians; of which we shall be obliged to discourse at large.

The Translation of the Apostolick See to Avignon.

THE Pontificate of Benedict, who succeeded Boniface, lasted only nine Months; he died in Perugia on the eighth of July in the Year 1304. and the Cardinals having assembled in Conclave there for electing a Successor, they quarrelled among themselves, and divided into two Factions, whereby the See was kept vacant for the Space of eleven Months. Matteo Orsini, and Francesco Gaetano Boniface's Nephew were at the Head of one Faction; Nepoleone Orsini dal Monte, and Nicholas de Prat, who, before he was made Cardinal, was of the Order of Preaching Friars, were at the Head of the other Faction. The Dispute between the French and Italian Factions running so high, that they could not agree upon a Person, at last it was resolved, that the Italians should propose three ultramontan Archbishops, and that the French Faction should chuse which of the three they liked best. The Italians, among the three proposed, named Bertrand Got Archbishop of Bordeaux; whereupon the Cardinal de Prat speedily acquainted Philip the Fair King of France, who sent for Bertrand, and told him, That it was in his Power to make him Pope, and that he would do it, if he consented to some Conditions: Bertrand most ambitious of that high Dignity, agreed to whatever the King was pleas'd to ask; whereupon the King wrote back to the Cardinal de Prat, to take care to get Bertrand elected, which was accordingly done upon the fifth of June 1305, and he was called Clement V. It is said, that among the Conditions agreed upon, he was to annul whatever Boniface had done against him and his Kingdom, and to raze it out of the Records; that he should restore to the Cardinalship Jacopo and Pietro Colonna, who had been degraded by Boniface; that he should extirpate the Order of the Templars, and that he should cause himself to be crowned in France. He actually revoked the Bull, Unam Sanctam, and Boniface's other Bulls; he restored the Colonna's to their Dignity; he declared void all the Sentences pronounced by that Pope; he absolved all those that had been excommunicated by him, excepting Nogaret and Sciarra Colonna; and he ordered the Cardinals to come to Lyons in France, because he was resolved to be crown'd there. The Italian Cardinals were very much offended at this; and *S. Antonino*¹ Archbishop of Florence, who had it from Giovanni Villani's History, says, That Cardinal Matteo Orsini, who was the eldest, could not forbear reproaching the Cardinal de Prat, by telling him: Affectus es voluntatem tuam in ducendo Curiam ultra montes, sed tardè revertetur Curia in Italiam.

CLEMENT, notwithstanding the Averseness of the greatest part of the Cardinals, was resolv'd to be obeyed; whereupon he went to Lyons, and on the eleventh of November was crown'd there, keeping the Promises he had made to the King of

France; and taking his Authority upon him, he created many Cardinals, partly Gascoons, and partly French, all of them the King's Favourites. He resided sometimes in Lyons, sometimes in Bordeaux, and sometimes in Avignon, where in the Year 1309 he settled, and remained till the Council of Vienna, which was held in the Year 1311; and during his Pontificate he passed his time in different Cities of France, but never thought of going to Italy. He died in Carpentras in April 1314, and at the same time the Cardinals entered the Conclave, where they continued till the twenty second of July, without being able to agree in the Election of a Successor; for the Italian Cardinals were for having a Pope of their Nation, who would go to reside in Rome; the Gascoons were resolved to have a Frenchman, who would take up his Residence in France; and the Dispute rose to that height, that the People, led on by the Nephews of the deceas'd Pope, went arm'd to the Conclave, demanding to have the Italian Cardinals delivered up to them, and a French Pope elected; which being denied them, they set Fire to the Conclave, whereupon the Cardinals having made their Escape, some fled one Way, and some another; and they continued dispersed for two Years¹. Philip the Fair endeavoured by all means possible to get them to meet, but to no purpose. Philip dying, was succeeded by Lewis Hutin, who sent his Brother to Lyons, who conven'd the Cardinals, and caused them to be shut up in the Convent of the Preaching Friars of that City, and told them, That they should never come out, and should be treated very harshly, if they did not immediately elect a Pope: The Cardinals, after they had been shut up for the Space of forty Days, at last in the Year 1316, elected James d'Esuse, a Native of Cahors, formerly Bishop of Frejus, and afterwards of Avignon, and was then Cardinal Bishop of Porto. This Pope after his Election took the Name of John XXII. and having caused himself to be crowned in Lyons on the fifth of September the same Year, went immediately to Avignon, where he fixed his Residence, not wandering from one City of France to another as Clement had done; whence his Successors kept their Court in Avignon; for John having held the Pontificate eighteen Years, he fixed the See the more firmly in that City, where he died in the Month of December 1334; and the Cardinals in the same Month elected, and crowned in the Church of Avignon Cardinal James Fournier Bishop of Pamiers, named Benedict XII. who shewed a great Inclination to reside in Italy; but having sounded the Bolognese, to see if they would receive him into that City, and finding them averse to it, he fixed his Residence in Avignon, as his Predecessor had done, where he remained till 1342, the Year of his Death. Clement VI. Innocent VI. and Urban V. his Successors did the same, till Gregory XI. who endeavouring to remove his Seat to Rome in spite of the French, gave Rise to that scandalous Schism, that after his Death broke out between the Popes of Rome and those of Avignon, which for a long time afflicted the Church, of which we shall have occasion to discourse in the following Books.

CONCERNING this Translation of the Apostolick See to Avignon, there is a great Dispute between our Italian Writers and the French. The Italian call it the Babylonish Captivity, because, while it lasted, the Church was under the Slavery of the French, particularly of Philip the Fair; they call it a betraying of the House of God; the Scandal of the Christian People, and the Ruin of Christianity². That the Popes who governed the Church in those Times were rather Monsters of Impiety and Wickedness, than Vicars of Christ; that they minded nothing but to heap up Money, in order to feed their Ambition and Pride, basely submitting themselves to the Kings of France. Therefore in their Works they represent the Popes of Avignon as Simoniacks, Luxurious, Cruel, Avaricious and Rapacious, and Avignon as another Babylon. Dante in his Comedy writes horrible things of *Clement V.*³. *Giovanni Villani*⁴, and S. Antonino Archbishop of *Florence*⁵, wrote a most bitter Satyr upon him; that he was Avaricious, Cruel, a Simoniack, Luxurious, and that he kept as his Concubine Brunifinde Countess of Perigord, a most beautiful Lady, Daughter of the Count of Foix, and Mother of Cardinal Talairande. Our Lawyer Alberico di Rosate writes, That the Extirpation of the Knights-Templars, and the Cruelty with which he treated them, were contrary to Justice, and done to please the King of France, which, he says, he had from one who had a Commission to examine the Cause, and who took the Deposition of the Witnesses; his Words are these: Destructus fuit ille Ordo tempore Clementis Papæ V. ad provocationem Regis Franciæ. Et sicut audiui ab uno, qui fuit Examinator causæ, & testium, destructus fuit contra justitiam. Et mihi dixit, quod ipse Clemens protulit hoc: Et si non per viam justitiæ potest destrui, destruat tamen per viam expedientiæ, ne scandalizetur charus filius noster Rex Franciæ. Whence many Writers look upon the Condemnation of the Templars as unjust, and that they were falsely accused of many Crimes, and their Confessions extorted by exquisite Torture, and the fear of Death; that Philip the Fair had been their Enemy for a long time, accusing them of having excited and fomented a Rebellion against him; that he had hated the Great Master in particular; and that he and Pope Clement had resolv'd to divide the Booty between them, although they gave it out, that they intended to employ their Riches in the Expedition to the Holy Land.

WHAT they relate of John XXII. his Successor is much worse. *Giovanni Villani*¹ makes him the Son of a Vintner, and that being brought up under Pietro de Ferrariis Chancellor to King Charles II. and bred a Scholar, he owed his Fortune to him; that as soon as he was made Pope, none was more eager upon squeezing Money out of every thing than he, nor so ready at inventing Ways and Means to heap up Riches. He bestowed many Bishopricks in France, and when a fat Benefice fell vacant, he was wont to give it to him who had one of a smaller Income, which he gave to another; and sometimes he would go so far as to make Provision for six, always translating from the Smaller to the Greater, and providing him, who had the least, of a new Benefice; so that all were satisfied, and all paid. He likewise invented the Annats, an Imposition upon Benefices unheard of before him; he corrupted the Discipline of the Church by so many Dispensations, that he most scandalously heaped up immense Treasure; and although he spent and gave away as lavishly as his Predecessors, yet at his Death he left many Millions². And Villani says, That after this Pope's Death, one of his Brothers, who was a Cardinal, was appointed to take an account of his Money, which he found to be eighteen Millions in coin'd Money, and seven Millions in Plate and Ingots, which he weighed. Lewis of Bavaria pursued him judicially, got him to be depos'd, and also declared a Heretick. His Constitutions call'd Joanninæ were deem'd to be both simoniacal and heretical. He is thought to be the Author of the Regulæ Cancellariæ, wherein many cunning Regulations are made for gathering of Money: In short, that he above all others had corrupted the Discipline of the Church, looking upon Kingdoms, Cities, Castles, Riches, and Possessions to be the Patrimony of Christ; and the Goods of the Church not to be the Contempt of the World, a zealous Faith, and the Doctrine of the Gospels, but Oblations, Tithes, Taxes, Collections, Purple, Gold and Silver.

THEY also write of his Successor Benedict XII. that he was a most covetous, obstinate, cruel, diffident and niggardly Pope; that he delighted in Buffoonery, and lewd Conversations; that he was luxurious, and kept many Whores, and that falling in Love with Petrarca's Sister, he pursued his Point so eagerly, that he got her in his Clutches, and debauched her³; that he was a great Wine-bibber, insomuch, that the common Proverb at drinking Bouts, when People had a mind to be merry, was, *Bibamus Papaliter*⁴. For which Reason, when he died in Avignon in the Year 1342, some body fixed these Verses upon his Tomb.

*Isle fuit Nero, Laicis mors, Vipera Clero,
Devius a vero, cuppa repleta mero*⁵.

THESE opprobrious Actions were no less laid to the Charge of Clement VI. than of Benedict, and that he as well as his Predecessor defiled himself with Whores. But he made himself much more the common Talk of the World by his Bull, which in the third Year of his Pontificate he published in Avignon; wherein, considering the Shortness of human Life, he restricted the time of the Jubilee to fifty Years; for in order to encourage all sorts of Persons to come to Rome from all Parts of the World, even without asking Leave of their Superiors, he assured them, that in case they should happen to die by the Way, they had fully gained the Indulgences, and the Remission of their Sins, and that their Souls should be immediately conveyed to Heaven, and therefore he commanded the Angels of God, that without the least Delay they should introduce them among the blessed in Paradise; these are the Words of the Bull: Et nihilominus prorsus mandamus Angelis Paradisi, quatenus animam illius a Purgatorio penitus absolutam in Paradisi gloriam introducant ¹.

THEREFORE they did not stick to say, that the Popes of Avignon and their wicked Lives were the Causes of the Rise of so many Heresies and Errors in this Century; and that they had given a Handle to Joannes Oliva a Friar Minor to write a Commentary upon the Apocalypse, and to adapt those Visions to his own Age, and to the dissolute Lives of the Clergy; and to open a Door to his Followers to represent the Church of Avignon as another Babylon, and therefore to promise themselves a new Church more perfect under the Auspices of S. Francis, as one who had established the true Evangelical Rule observ'd by Christ and his Apostles; and breaking out afterwards into other Blasphemies, they declared the Pope to be Antichrist, the Church of Avignon the Synagogue of Satan; and that therefore they ought no longer to pay Obedience to John XXII. nor to acknowledge him any longer as Pope.

ON the other hand the French Writers, too partial to their native Country, and their Countrymen, cannot hear without Indignation, what our Italian Authors have written concerning this Translation, and their Avignon Popes. In our latter Times the most active Man in their Defence is Stephanus Baluzius ², who shews us how much the Italians are in the wrong in comparing this Translation to the Babylonish Captivity; that they ought rather to have blam'd the Romans, who having filled Rome with Confusion, by Tumult and Faction, forced Clement V. to translate his See to France, which has always been a safe Refuge of the Roman Pontiffs; that the Italians had no other Reason to complain of this, but only because they were deprived of the Prerogatives and Profit, which the Court of Rome brought them; that if there was any room for Complaint, France had greater Reason to be sorry for this Translation to Avignon, which thereby receiv'd great Detriment, because the debauched Italians that came thither, corrupted the Manners of the French; whereas formerly they led an innocent and frugal Life; but the See was no sooner translated to France, than they learn'd from the Italians Luxury, Cunning, Simony, Deceit, and their wicked Customs; insomuch, that Nicholas Clemange ³ was wont to say, that with this Translation Depravation of Manners was first brought to France.

THE French also maintain, that the Residence of the Popes in Avignon did not in the least lessen the Authority of the Holy See, but that it was preserv'd there in the highest Degree and entire; and that it was not in Bondage, but was protected and revered by their Kings. That the Lives and Manners of the Popes of Rome, who governed the Apostolick See there before the Translation, and after it was re-established in Rome, being compared with those of the Popes of Avignon, were found to be much worse, and more scandalous. That we ought not to give entire Credit to Giovanni Villani, and the other Italian Writers who followed him, as being prepossess'd with Passion; neither ought the Extirpation of the Templars to be attributed to the Design that Clement V. and Philip the Fair had of seizing their Goods, but to their enormous Crimes, and execrable Heresies, proved by the reiterated Confessions of the Guilty. And Baluzius, in his Notes on the Lives of the Avignon Popes, employs all his Art in clearing Clement from what Villani lays to his Charge; he also defends John XXII. and frees Benedict XII. from the Rape of Petrarca's Sisters. He endeavours to make it appear that Clement VI.'s Bull about the Jubilee was apocryphal, and in short he takes upon him strenuously to defend all those Popes that resided in France.

BUT though the Italians differed in Opinion from the French, yet our Countrymen were forced to follow the Example of their Princes, and to side with the French in Opposition to all the rest of Italy. Our Kings of the Family of Anjou, as may be observ'd in the preceding Books of this History, lay under great Obligations to the Popes of Avignon, and consequently were at their Beck, and their Wills were to them as Laws. Clement V. had no sooner acquainted King Charles II. with the Resolution he had taken, and put in execution in France against the Templars, and at the same time requiring him to do the same in his Dominions, than immediately that King obeyed him; and he wrote to the Prince of Achaia also to put the Pope's Orders in execution in the Principality of Achaia, by immediately imprisoning all the Templars, seizing their Goods, and keeping them in the Name of the Apostolick See¹.

KING Robert, as has been said, had entered into stricter Bonds of Friendship with Pope Clement, and no less with his Successor John XXII. This last, before he was Pope, was brought up in Naples in King Robert's Court, and after the Death of Pietro de Ferrariis, he succeeded him in the Post of the King's Chancellor²; and afterwards at his Instance he was made Bishop of Avignon; and as soon as he was rais'd to the Pontificate they kept up a strict Friendship and Correspondence. Therefore the Orders of this Pope, which Germany and the other States of Europe, on account of the Quarrel which John had with Lewis of Bavaria, could not bear with, were inviolable Laws to us. He introduced the Regulæ Cancellariæ, and all the Ways and Means for raising Money were readily put in execution in the Kingdom by King Robert. Wherefore in those Times we find the Titles of Nuncio's and Apostolical Collectors more frequently mentioned amongst us; and they even laid their Hands upon the Revenues of vacant Churches.

Of Nuncios, or Apostolical Collectors residing in Naples.

FROM the time of Charles I. of Anjou we read of Apostolical Nuncio's residing in Naples; particularly we find in the Royal Archives of the Mint, that King Charles I. in the Year 1275, at the Request of Master Sinisi Clerk of the Pope's Chamber of Accounts, and Apostolical Nuncio, ordered Charles Prince of Salerno to cause to be deliver'd to the Protector of the said Nuncio some sequestrated Goods, notwithstanding the Pretensions of the Secretary of Terra di Lavoro and other Creditors, in order to have them agree the Matter with the Nuncio in his Court¹. We read such Letters written by King Robert, wherein he makes mention of Nuncio's in the time of Clement V. and in the Year 1311 he impowers M. Guglielmo di Balacro a Canon of the Church of S. Alterio, and Giovanni di Bologna Clerk of the Chamber of Accounts to Clement V. the said Pope's Nuncio's to exact and receive the Rents due to the Church of Rome on whatsoever Account, Legacies, Goods, Tithes, and others². As also in the Year 1335 he authorised M. Giraldo di Valle Dean of the Cathedral Church of Naples, and appointed him Nuncio of the Apostolick See in the Kingdom, to transact some Affairs which he had in Commission from the said Sec³; and in 1339 we read others of this King's Letters, wherein he gives his Royal Assent to the said Nuncio to put his Commissions in execution⁴.

THESE Nuncios were appointed as Collectors of the Revenues, which the Apostolick See had in the Kingdom; for, as we have said in the fourth Book of this History, it had some particular Patrimonies of an old standing in Naples, which during the course of many Centuries were still increasing. But till the Pontificate of John XXII. these Nuncios did not exact the Revenues of the vacant Sees; for, as we observed elsewhere, although in the Investiture given to Charles I. he was depriv'd of the Royalties, which the Kings of France and England had in their vacant Churches; yet, as for the Fruits of such Churches, nothing was altered contrary to the ancient Discipline, as may be read in the Investiture⁵: Custodia Ecclesiarum earundem interim libere remanente penes personas Ecclesiasticas juxta Canonicas Sanctiones; which Words certainly import, that the Goods of the deceas'd Prelate, or Incumbent, ought to be preserv'd for the future Successor, as being so ordained by the Canons, which was also established by Pope Honorius in his Bull and Statutes, as we have related elsewhere. But in the Pontificate of John, King Robert unwilling to thwart that Pope's Covetousness, and Desire of heaping up Money, the Apostolick Nuncio's seiz'd also upon the Revenues of the vacant Churches, and instead of leaving them to the Successors, they deliver'd them into the Apostolick Chamber; which being once introduced, was afterwards continued by Benedict XII. his Successor, to whom King Robert was no less beholden, than to his Predecessors, he having confirm'd Clement V.'s Sentence, whereby he had been prefer'd to the Succession of the Kingdom before the King of Hungary. Whence it is, that in the Royal Archives of the Mint we find many of this King's Letters, whereby he orders all Favour and Assistance to be given to these Collectors in gathering in the Rents of vacant Churches. For instance we read, that on the twenty eighth of November 1339 this King commanded all the Officers of the Kingdom to give all Favour and Assistance to Guglielmo di S. Paolo, appointed by the Apostolick See Collector of the Fruits and Revenues of the vacant Churches, in the Collection thereof for the Use and Benefit of the Church of Rome. And on the twenty sixth of June 1341, he also order'd all the Officers of the Kingdom to give all Favour and Assistance to M. Raymond de Camerate a Canon of Amiens, and to Ponce Parrete a Canon of Chartres appointed in Avignon by Pope Benedict XII. to be Commissioners to receive in the Name of the Apostolick Chamber the moveable Goods, and all the Debts and Rights, which Raymondo Bishop of Cassino, and Leonardo Bishop of Aquino had left at their Deaths ¹.

WHENCE we perceive, that as our Kings of the Family of Anjou were more obsequious to the Popes of Avignon, than the Kings of France, so their Laws were more strictly observ'd in our Kingdom, than in France itself. Clement VII. according to *Tommasino*², was the first of the Popes of Avignon that attempted to introduce into France the Custom of seizing the Goods of decers'd Bishops and Abbots, and the Revenues of the Churches and Monasteries during the Vacancies, and of appropriating them to the Apostolick Chamber; which he did in order to support his Court in Avignon, and thirty six Cardinals his Creatures, in the time of the Schism, when Urban VI. sat in *Rome*³. But King Charles VI. by his Edict⁴ published in the Year 1381, rendered that Attempt fruitless. In Conformity to which Edict in 1386 the King's Letters Patent were issued, and in 1394 renewed, whereby that Design was altogether crush'd in France; and although Pius II. had a Design to renew it in that Kingdom, yet Lewis XI. in 1363 also stifled it⁵.

BUT that Custom was more ancient with us; and the Roman Pontiffs had long before attempted it; for we read in the Constitutions of Boniface VIII. and Clement V. in the Council of Vienna, and of John XXII. that upon the Complaints of many, on account of the deplorable Abuses and Inconveniencies attending that Custom, they were forced to forbid it; whence we may see, that it had been attempted long before, but that Affair was managed according to the greater or less Resistance it met with from Princes. It was not in the least opposed by our Kings of the Family of Anjou; on the contrary, they rather forwarded the Design, and gave it all Assistance and Countenance. And although this Custom was prohibited by Pope Alexander V. in the Council of Pisa, and by the Council of Constance; and which Clement V. also confirmed afterwards by an Agreement made with the Nations that opposed it; yet with us the Abuse continued till the Reign of the Kings of the House of Aragon, as shall be mention'd in its Place.

OUR Kings of the Family of Anjou, and particularly Robert, were most observant to the Popes of Avignon, and their Laws; and when the Collection of the Clementine and Extravagant Constitutions which appeared in this Century were little minded in Germany, yet, for the Reasons already alledged, they had all Force and Authority with us.

Of the Collection of the Clementine and Extravagant Constitutions.

IN this fourteenth Century there appeared new Collections of the Pontifical Law. That the Popes of Avignon might not be short of the Popes of Rome, Clement V. comprehended in five Books both his own Constitutions, and those established in the Council of Vienna; and in a publick Consistory held in the Castle of Montile, near Carpentras in March 1313, he caused them to be published; but falling sick soon after, and dying in April following, he had not time to send them to be taught in the Universities, and they were suspended for four Years. *John Aventine*¹, who had it by relation from William of Ockham, writes, That Clement on his Death-bed considering, that these Constitutions contain'd many Things contrary to Christian Simplicity, ordain'd them to be repeal'd; but his Successor John XXII. who loved to heap up Money, finding them for his Purpose, in November 1317 caused them to be publish'd, and sent them to the Universities, and by his Bull commanded them to be receiv'd not only in the Schools, but in the Tribunals². They obtained two Names, first Clementines, and not to confound them with the Sixth, they were also call'd the Seventh of the Decretals, as *Giovanni Villani*³, Aventine, Michael di Cesen and others⁴ named them.

JOHN XXII. not fully satisfied with this Collection, to Clement's Constitutions thought fit to add twenty of his own, which were call'd profitable and wholesome, because of the great Advantage they brought to his Court; and since they were without Order, and not confin'd to the Body of the other Collections, they were call'd Extravagants. They likewise got the Name of *Joannine*⁵, as Cujacius also calls them⁶; and about the Year 1340, they were by private Authority collected together, and for want of a publick Sanction they were not receiv'd every where. This Pope was also thought to be the Author of the *Rules of the Chancery*⁷; the Contriver of the scandalous Annats, and of other cunning and artful Devices for heaping up Riches. After his Example the Popes his Successors established other Constitutions, such as Eugenius IV. Callistus III. Paul II. Sixtus IV. and others; and afterwards by private Authority there was a Collection made of all those Extravagant Constitutions, which was added to the Body of the Pontifical Law, and as well as the Decretals they had their own Glossators and Commentators⁸. But they were not universally received; and William of Ockham, who was Cotemporary with John XXII. testifies, that from their first Appearance they were found fault with, and condemn'd as heretical, false, and stuffed with Errors⁹. Nevertheless they were of Force and Authority with our Canonists; and during the Reign of the Family of Anjou, whatever the Popes of Avignon did, was readily complied with; whence it happened, that when France and Germany began to put a Stop to the Abuses, with us they were the more firmly established; and the Disorders that followed afterwards in the Reigns of Queen Joan I. and of the following Kings of the Family of Anjou (when not only the Civil State, by so many Revolutions, but the Ecclesiastical, by the scandalous Schism which arose, were turned upside down) put Affairs into greater Confusion, and oblig'd our Princes to employ their Thoughts about finding out a Remedy, as shall be shewn in the following Books of this History.

by the Canons, which was also established by Pope Honorius in his Bull and Statutes, as we have related elsewhere. But in the Pontificate of John, King Robert unwilling to thwart that Pope's Covetousness, and Desire of heaping up Money, the Apostolick Nuncio's seiz'd also upon the Revenues of the vacant Churches, and instead of leaving them to the Successors, they deliver'd them into the Apostolick Chamber; which being once introduced, was afterwards continued by Benedict XII. his Successor, to whom King Robert was no less beholden, than to his Predecessors, he having confirm'd Clement V.'s Sentence, whereby he had been prefer'd to the Succession of the Kingdom before the King of Hungary. Whence it is, that in the Royal Archives of the Mint we find many of this King's Letters, whereby he orders all Favour and Assistance to be given to these Collectors in gathering in the Rents of vacant Churches. For instance we read, that on the twenty eighth of November 1339 this King commanded all the Officers of the Kingdom to give all Favour and Assistance to Guglielmo di S. Paolo, appointed by the Apostolick See Collector of the Fruits and Revenues of the vacant Churches, in the Collection thereof for the Use and Benefit of the Church of Rome. And on the twenty sixth of June 1341, he also order'd all the Officers of the Kingdom to give all Favour and Assistance to M. Raymond de Camerate a Canon of Amiens, and to Ponce Parrete a Canon of Chartres appointed in Avignon by Pope Benedict XII. to be Commissioners to receive in the Name of the Apostolick Chamber the moveable Goods, and all the Debts and Rights, which Raymondo Bishop of Cassino, and Leonardo Bishop of Aquino had left at their Deaths ¹.

WHENCE we perceive, that as our Kings of the Family of Anjou were more obsequious to the Popes of Avignon, than the Kings of France, so their Laws were more strictly observ'd in our Kingdom, than in France itself. Clement VII. according to *Tommasino*², was the first of the Popes of Avignon that attempted to introduce into France the Custom of seizing the Goods of deceas'd Bishops and Abbots, and the Revenues of the Churches and Monasteries during the Vacancies, and of appropriating them to the Apostolick Chamber; which he did in order to support his Court in Avignon, and thirty six Cardinals his Creatures, in the time of the Schism, when Urban VI. sat in *Rome*³. But King Charles VI. by his Edict ⁴ published in the Year 1381, rendered that Attempt fruitless. In Conformity to which Edict in 1386 the King's Letters Patent were issued, and in 1394 renewed, whereby that Design was altogether crush'd in France; and although Pius II. had a Design to renew it in that Kingdom, yet Lewis XI. in 1363 also stifled it ⁵.

BUT that Custom was more ancient with us; and the Roman Pontiffs had long before attempted it; for we read in the Constitutions of Boniface VIII. and Clement V. in the Council of Vienna, and of John XXII. that upon the Complaints of many, on account of the deplorable Abuses and Inconveniencies attending that Custom, they were forced to forbid it; whence we may see, that it had been attempted long before, but that Affair was managed according to the greater or less Resistance it met with from Princes. It was not in the least opposed by our Kings of the Family of Anjou; on the contrary, they rather forwarded the Design, and gave it all Assistance and Countenance. And although this Custom was prohibited by Pope Alexander V. in the Council of Pisa, and by the Council of Constance; and which Clement V. also confirmed afterwards by an Agreement made with the Nations that opposed it; yet with us the Abuse continued till the Reign of the Kings of the House of Aragon, as shall be mention'd in its Place.

OUR Kings of the Family of Anjou, and particularly Robert, were most observant to the Popes of Avignon, and their Laws; and when the Collection of the Clementine and Extravagant Constitutions which appeared in this Century were little minded in Germany, yet, for the Reasons already alledged, they had all Force and Authority with us.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXIII.

THE renowned King Robert was no sooner laid in his Grave, than the City of Naples caus'd the Names of Joan and Andrew to be proclaimed every where; but, as Costanzo writes[†], a few Days produced as great a Difference as there is between Day and Night; for the Hungarians, by the Cunning of Friar Robert their Head, took the Government of the Kingdom upon them, and by Degrees turned out of the Council all King Robert's most faithful and prudent Counsellors, in order to manage every thing at their Pleasure; so that the poor Queen, who was only sixteen Years old, was nothing but nominal Queen, and in effect the Prisoner of those Barbarians; and what afflicted her most, was the Indolence of her Husband, who was no less under the Subjection of the Hungarians than herself. Queen Sancia, the Widow of King Robert, seeing the Royal Family in such Confusion, which in her Husband's time had been in so great Order, grown weary of the World, shut herself up in the Monastery of the Holy Cross, which she had built near the Sea, where in less than a Year she died with the Reputation of great Sanctity. Those of the Royal Family that were in Naples, seeing themselves depriv'd by Friar Robert of that Respect wherewith King Robert us'd to treat them, went all to their own Estates, which occasioned great Discontent in Naples. The Neapolitan Gentlemen, seeing King Andrew wholly given up to Idleness, and not the least mention of War, went and offer'd their Service to Robert Prince of Taranto, who was then making ready for an Expedition to Greece; and being honourably received by the Prince, they, with all their Followers, engaged in his Service, and many private Gentlemen of the Kingdom followed their Example, and went upon that Expedition; and with this Army the Prince regained as far as Thessalonica; and he was in great Hopes of recovering also the City of Constantinople, if the Commotions of the Kingdom (of which hereafter) had not obliged those Gentlemen, with almost all the other Cavalry, to return to the Defence of their own Properties. Friar Robert from these Proceedings foreseeing, that the Princes of the Blood had a Desire to use their utmost Power to wrest that Authority from him which he had usurp'd, sent to sollicite Lewis King of Hungary Andrew's elder Brother to come and take Possession of the Kingdom, as Heir to his Grandfather; but Antonius Bonfinius Author of the History of Hungary says, That King Lewis sent Ambassadors to the Pope to persuade him to give Orders to crown his Brother Andrew, and to give him the Investiture, not as the Husband of Queen Joan, but as Heir to Charles Martel his Grandfather; and that these Ambassadors for that end attended for a long time at the Pope's Court, which was then at Avignon, because they met with great Opposition; and Boccaccio writes, that it was with great Difficulty they obtained the Bull for the Coronation. In the mean time Joan had been solemnly crown'd in Naples by Cardinal Americo sent by Pope Clement VI. who likewise sent her the Investiture, and she was intitled, Queen of Sicily and of Jerusalem, Duchess of Puglia, Princess of Salerno, Capua, Provence and Ferraquier, and Countess of Piedmont; and on the last Day of August 1344 in the Church of S. Clara the Queen took the Oath of Homage from the Hands of the same Cardinal, and promised to pay the usual Tribute, as may be read in the Investiture recorded by Summonte, who copied it out of the Royal Archives, where it is preserved¹.

THE Pope had sent Cardinal Americo not only to take Joan's Oath, but had also made him her Guardian during her Minority; to whom he also gave Power to revoke all Donations and Concessions made by Robert and Joan in prejudice of the Church of Rome and the Kingdom²; but this Guardianship took no Effect³, because Friar Robert and his Hungarians had the whole Government. And although the Roman Pontiffs had always pretended to send Guardians, yet they never had any Share in the Government.

MOREOVER the Queen, like a prudent Woman, had sent for Charles Duke of Durazzo the eldest Son of the Prince of the Morea, and gave him her Sister for Wife, by whom he had one Son named Lewis, who died before he was a Month old, and was buried in the Church of S. Clara, where his Tomb is to be seen at this Day. And the same Year Lewis of Durazzo, the second Son of the Prince of the Morea, and Brother of Charles, married a Daughter of Roberto Sanseverino, by whom he had a Son, who was afterwards Charles III. King of *Naples*⁴.

IN the mean time it being known in Naples, that the Pope had granted a Bull for the Coronation of Andrew, and that the Ambassadors who were bringing it were arrived at Gatta; some Barons who had a Desire to prevent it, pushed on by the Princes of the Blood, who were for opposing it, (Andrew's Indolence, and the Insolence of the Hungarians still continuing) incited those, who had conspired to kill Andrew, to dispatch him speedily, fearing that if the Design were discovered, Friar Robert, upon the Arrival of the Pope's Order for Andrew's Coronation, would cause them to be seiz'd, and put to Death. In fine, the King and Queen went to Aversa, and lodged in the Castle of that City, where the Convent of S. Peter a Maiella was afterwards built⁵; and on the Evening of the eighteenth of September 1345, when the King was in the Queen's Bed-chamber, one of his Gentlemen came to tell him from Friar Robert, that there was Advice of great Importance arrived from Naples, which required him to be immediately upon his Guard; and the King leaving the Queen's Chamber, which was divided by a large Hall from the Room where publick Affairs were treated of, and being in the middle of the said Hall, a Cord with a Noose was thrown about his Neck, with which he was strangled, and thrown out of a Window, while the Hungarians (it being in the Night-time) lay buried in Sleep and Wine¹.

THE oddness of this Fact put all the City into a Consternation, especially there being none that durst be so bold as to enquire after the Authors of the Murder. The Queen, who was eighteen Years of Age, was so terrified, that she knew not what was fit to be done; the Hungarians had lost their Courage, and were afraid to be cut in pieces if they should pretend to govern any longer, so that the King's Body being carried to the Church, it lay some Days unburied; but Ursillo Minutolo a Neapolitan Gentleman and Canon went to Aversa, and at his own Charges transported him to Naples, and buried him in the Cathedral Church in S. Lewis's Chapel, where he lay in a mean burying Place till the time of Costanzo, when Francesco Capece Incumbent of that Chapel, vying with Ursillo in Generosity, erected him a Monument of Marble, and that Chapel being afterwards converted into the Vestry by the Archbishop Annibale di Capua, it was placed in the Wall opposite to the Door of the said Vestry, where it remains to this Day.

THE Widow Queen went immediately to Naples, and the Neapolitans, with such Barons as were in the City, went to condole with her for the Death of the King, and to beg of her, that she would be pleased to give Orders for the Tribunals to go on in the Administration of Justice, since Priar Robert and the other Hungarians were so dispirited, that they had not the Courage to appear in publick. The Queen being shut up with the most prudent and faithful of King Robert her Grandfather's Counsellors, in order to remove the Suspicion that was whispered Abroad, of her having had a Hand in the infamous Murder, with their Advice gave it in charge to Count Hugo del Balzo to make a strict Enquiry after the Authors of the King's Death, with full Power to bring those that should be found guilty to condign Punishment. Count Hugo, after he had caused two Calabrians, Gentlemen of King Andrew's Bed-chamber, to be rack'd to Death, ordered Filippa Catanesse with her Son and Grand-daughter to be seiz'd; and after all the three had been put to the Rack, he caus'd them to be set upon a Cart, and their Flesh to be torn off with red hot Pincers, but the miserable decrepit Filippa died before she came to the Place where she was to be beheaded².

ON the other hand, the News of this Fact coming to Pope Clement in Avignon, he reckoned, that it belonged to him and the Apostolick See to take Cognizance of this Crime, upon which he likewise began to proceed against the guilty. First he excommunicated, interdicted, and declared them infamous Rebels, and outlaw'd in general; but by reason of the Distance of the Place, all Enquiry for finding out who were the particular Persons being to no purpose, he, by his Bull drawn up in Avignon in the Year 1346, the fifth of his Pontificate, gave a Commission to Bertrando del Balzo Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom, Count of Montescaglioso and Adria, with full Power to proceed against the guilty; and in this Bull recorded by Camillo Tutini, and which he copied from the Royal Archives³, we read these Words: *Nos nolentes, sicut nec velle debemus, tam horribile, & detestabile, ac Deo, & hominibus odiosum facinus, cujus cognitio prima ad nos, & Romanam Ecclesiam in hoc casu pertinere dignoscitur, relinquere impunitum, &c.*⁴. And having also with the Queen's Permission made diligent Search, he found guilty, as Accomplices, Conspirators, and Authors of the Crime, Gasso di Dinisisco Count of Terlizzi, Roberto di Cabano Count of Evoli and High-Steward of the Kingdom, Raimondo di Catania, Niccolo di Miliczano, Sancia di Cabano Countess of Morcone, Carlo Artus, and Bertrando his Son, Cerrado di Catanzaro, and Corrado Umfredo da Montefusco. And though some of these resided in the Kingdom, yet it being a difficult Matter to seize them, both on account of the Protection they expected from those of the Blood-Royal, and because they had fortified themselves in their Castles, Count Bertrand had recourse to the Queen, that by her general Edict she would order the Empress of Constantinople, and Lewis of Taranto her Son, to send under a faithful and safe Guard Carlo, Bertrando, and Corrado Umfredo; and also to order the Prince of Taranto, the Duke of Durazzo, and their Brothers, and all Counts, and Barons, and especially the Citizens of Naples, in case the said Empress did not send them, to go with all their Possé to the Castles and Places where they were, and to make them Prisoners, offering also to go himself in Person, in order to bring them to condign Punishment; and besides, that she would write to the Bishops, Vicars, and their Officers, effectually to put in execution the Interdictions and Excommunications thunder'd against them by the Pope, by declaring the Castles, in which they were, interdicted, and their Abettors and Harbourers excommunicated, and strictly to observe and obey the said Interdictions. The Queen, in Conformity to these Demands, on the seventh of October 1346 issued out a severe Edict, which was drawn up by Adolfo Camano di Napoli Vice-Protonotary of the Kingdom, of which he sent many authentick Copies to all the Cities and Provinces of the Realm; and that it might be known and made publick to all, he caused Copies to be affixed in Naples upon the Gates of Casfel Nuovo, and of the High-Court. The Edict is recorded by Turni, in which we find likewise inserted the said Bull of Clement.

THE Queen, in order to clear herself of all Suspicion, sent the Bishop of Tropea to Hungary to King Lewis her Brother-in-Law to beg of him, that he would be pleas'd to take under his Protection herself a Widow, together with her young Son his Nephew, of whom there is mention made in the said Edict, by the Name of Carobert Duke of Calabria &c. But this Message had not the design'd Effect, for King Lewis being beforehand perswaded, that the Queen had been privy and accessory to Andrew's Death, answered her, according to Antonius Bonifolius, by a Letter of this Tenor; Impetrata fides præterita, ambitiosa continuatio periculatæ Regiæ, neglecta vindicta, & excusatio subleuata, te viri tui necis arguant consciam, & fuisse parturientem. Neminem tamen Divini, humanæ judicii penas nefario scelere debitas evasuram.

CHAP. I.

Queen Joan marries Lewis of Taranto. The King of Hungary invades the Kingdom, and forces the Queen to fly to Avignon: She returns, and with the Assistance and Mediation of the Pope makes Peace with the King of Hungary.

UPON the Bishop's return the Queen imparted the Answer to all her Council, who were unanimously of Opinion, that the King of Hungary was resolved to revenge his Brother's Death, by his blaming the Queen for having retain'd, and continuing to exercise the Royal Authority; they likewise concluded, that he pretended the Kingdom was his own; of which his asking of the Pope the Investiture of the Kingdom for his Brother Andrew, not as the Husband of Queen Joan, but as the Heir of Charles Martel his Grandfather, was a plain Indication. Therefore they all judg'd it necessary, that the Queen should make Preparations for defending herself; and that in order thereto, she ought in the first Place to take a Husband, Husband, who with his Power and Person might be able to make Head against so powerful an Enemy: Robert Prince of Taranto, who came to Naples to visit her, proposed his second Brother Lewis a gallant Prince, and in the Flower of his Age. All the rest of the Queen's Council approv'd of this Proposal, and it being above a Year since Andrew's Death, on account of the News of the King of Hungary's Preparations, the Marriage was immediately solemniz'd, without waiting for the Pope's Dispensation.

BUT the Report of the Power of the King of Hungary, the small Ability of the Queen's new Husband, and the general Opinion that the Queen had had a Hand in the Death of her late Husband, put the greatest part of the Barons and People to a stand; and although Lewis of Taranto with great Application endeavoured to make all possible Preparations, yet he had not that Obedience paid him that was requisite, and before the fourth part of the necessary Provisions was made, it was known, that the King of Hungary was arrived in Italy. Whereupon the Queen, who truly inherited the Wisdom of the great King Robert her Grandfather, by a prudent Resolution, in the Prime of her Youth, discovered what she was to be, and which she proved when she came to the Age of Maturity; for considering that it was not in her Husband's Power to make a Stand, and the Backwardness of her Subjects, she resolved to get the better of the Enemy by flight, since she could not do it by Resistance; and having call'd a Parliament, wherein were present all the Barons of the Kingdom, the Syndicks of the Cities, and the Governors of the City of Naples, she acquainted them with the coming of the King of Hungary; and after she had made a sad Complaint against some, who wrongfully accused her of so great a Wickedness, she told them, That for two Reasons she was resolved to leave the Kingdom, and to go to Avignon; the one in order to represent her Innocence to Christ's Vicar upon Earth, as it was manifest to God in Heaven; and the other to make it known to the World, by the Confidence she had in the Assistance of God Almighty. Nevertheless she was unwilling that her Barons and People should partake of her Sufferings, and therefore, though she was confident all her Subjects, were it but for the Respect they bore to the Memories of her Father and Grandfather, would not fail to appear in the Field to vindicate the Justice of her Cause; she chose rather to yield by retiring out of the Kingdom, and allowing them to submit themselves to the enraged King of Hungary; she afterwards absolved all her Barons, People, Castellains, and Tributaries from their Oaths, and ordered them not to make the least Resistance, but to carry the Keys of the Cities and Castles to the Conqueror, without waiting for Herald, or Trumpet. This Speech being delivered with a noble Grace, drew Tears from almost all present; and to comfort them, she said, That she trusted in the Justice of God, that by publishing her Innocence to the World, he would restore her both to her Kingdom and Honour. On the fifteenth of January 1347, she took shipping at Castel Nuovo for Provence, accompanied by her Husband and the Princess of Taranto her Mother-in-Law, who was intitled Empress, and by Niccolo Acciajoli a Florentine and faithful Friend of the House of Taranto, and a Man of exceeding Valour.

IN the mean time the King of Hungary with his Army had entered the Kingdom, and been received in Aquila, whither the Counts of Celano, Loreto, S. Valentino, and Neapolione Orsino, with other Counts and Barons of Abruzzo, went to wait upon him, and swore Homage to him; and after he had taken and pillaged the City of Salerno, by long Marches, without any Resistance, he advanced towards Naples; upon which the Princes of the Blood, confiding in the Relation they had to the King of Hungary, prepared themselves to meet him in a friendly manner, and expected to be courteously received; the rather, because they carried along with them, as King, young Carobert King Andrew's Son, who was then three Years old; and having conven'd a good Number of the principal Barons, the Prince of Taranto, Philip his Brother, Charles Duke of Durazzo, Lewis and Robert his Brothers set out from Naples and met the King as he was marching from Benevento to Aversa, who very lovingly kiss'd his Nephew, and received them all with great Demonstrations of Kindness; and besides, when he came to Aversa, a great many other Barons and Gentlemen flocked to him from all Parts to pay him Homage; and after he had halted there five Days, resolving to be in Naples the sixth, he put on all his Armour, ordered the whole Army to do the same, and then mounted his Horse; and as he came over-against the Place where King Andrew had been strangled, he stopt, and calling the Duke of Durazzo, he asked him out of which Window King Andrew had had been thrown: The Duke answered, that he knew not; whereupon the King shewed him a Letter written with the Duke's own Hand to Charles of Artois, telling him, that he could not deny his own writing, and caused him to be seized, and immediately beheaded¹; he ordered also, that he should be thrown out of the same Window out of which King Andrew had been thrown: By the King's Orders his Body lay unburied till the next Day, when it was carried to Naples, and buried in the Church of S. Lorenzo, where his Grave is to be seen at this Day. Such was the Death of the Duke of Durazzo, the Son of John, who was the fifth Son of King Charles II. who by Mary, the Sister of Queen Joan, left no Male Issue, but only four Daughters, Joan, Agnes, Clementia, and Margaret, of whom hereafter. King Lewis ordered the rest of the Princes of the Blood to be confined Prisoners in the Castle of Aversa, and some Days after sent them from thence into Hungary, together with young Carobert; and continuing his March towards Naples, he caused to be displayed and carried before him a black Standard, representing the terrible Spectacle of a strangled King: The greatest part of the Neapolitans coming to meet and welcome him, he put on a morose Countenance, and made as if he neither saw nor heard them, but entered Naples with his Helmet on his Head, and rejecting all Demonstrations of Respect, he went directly to Castel Nuovo, of which the Governor had already delivered him the Keys: Upon this the whole Inhabitants were put in a terrible Consternation, expecting, that their City was to be pillaged by the Hungarians, because they immediately began to plunder the Houses of the Princes of the Blood; the Duchess of Durazzo with great Difficulty escaped, and fled by Sea to her Sister in Provence. The King would give no Audience to the Magistrates of the City, but ordered them to be all changed, and new ones to be chosen in their Place, who were to do nothing without consulting the Bishop of Waradina Hungarian. The K. of Hungary remained two Months in Naples, went afterwards to Foggia, where he appointed Conrad Wolf a German Baron his Lieutenant; and having made Gilfort Wolf, Conrad's Brother, Governor of Castel Nuovo, and made great Preparations of War in different parts of the Kingdom, he embarked at Bari in a light Galley and landed in Salerna, and from thence went to Hungary, having remained only four Months in the Kingdom.

DURING these Transactions, Queen Joan, with her Husband Lewis, being arrived at the Pope's Court in Avignon, were most graciously received by Clement, who gave them a Dispensation for having married within the forbidden Degrees of Consanguinity², and the Queen in a publick Consistory defended her own Cause with so much Wit and Eloquence, that the Pope and the College of Cardinals, who had lying before them the Process against Filippa Catanesio and her Son Robert, wherein finding, that the Queen was not so much as mentioned, nor in the least blamed, they were persuaded that she was innocent, took her Cause under their Protection, and immediately sent an Apostolick Legate to Hungary to treat of a Peace. The Legate found the King very haughty, which proceeded either from the Passion he was in for his Brother's Death, or that he was puff'd up with his having taken Possession of so noble and opulent a Kingdom, which he looked upon as his own, since young Carobert died soon after his Arrival in Hungary; but notwithstanding the Difficulty of negotiating, the Legate was resolved not to leave Hungary, but from time to time studied, with all his Art, to smooth the Ruggedness of the King's Temper.

IN the mean time the Neapolitans were no sooner rid of the King of Hungary, than they heard of the Pope's Good-will towards the Queen; and finding themselves ill-us'd by Gilfort Wolf the Governor and King's Lieutenant in Naples, they began to mutiny; and many who had been King Robert's and the Queen's Favourites went to wait upon her in Provence, and encourage her to return, because the Power of the Hungarians was so much diminished, and the Hatred of their barbarous Customs so much increas'd, that a handful of Men from Provence would easily drive them out of the Kingdom. There were also many Barons, who by private Messages and Letters invited her, which were of great Service to the Queen, because by shewing those Letters to the Pope, it confirmed the Opinion he had of her Innocence; so that the Queen being assured of the Pope's Favour, and of the Love of the Barons of the Kingdom, she began to recover both her Reputation, and the Good-will of her Subjects, who thought, that her appearing before the Pope, the Father and universal Judge of Christians, and by him deem'd innocent, and worthy to be restored to her hereditary Kingdom, was binding upon them to behave themselves like good and faithful Subjects; whereupon the People of Provence, and of her other Dominions on the other side of the Mountains being encouraged, all of them strove who should be foremost in presenting and supplying her with Money, of which she stood in so great need, that she sold the City of Avignon to the Pope¹, with the Price of which, and the Money given her, she fitted out ten Gallies, and after taking leave of the Pope, she, with her Husband Lewis, departed. Angelo di Costanzo writes², that at her departing she did not sell, but made a Present of the City of Avignon to the Pope and the Church, which so endear'd her to the Pope, knowing that she was desirous of having the Title of King given her Husband, in giving him his Blessing he call'd him King; so that both being satisfied, and full of good Hopes, they went and embarked at Marseilles, and with a fair Wind arriving at Naples, the whole City went to meet them at the Bridge of Little Sebeto, two hundred Paces distant from the City, because the Gallies durst not enter the Harbour of Naples, Castel Nuovo, and all the other Forts, being garrison'd with Hungarians. After they had landed, and been received with incredible Demonstrations of Joy by all the People, they were conducted under a Canopy to a House prepared for them near the Seggio di Montagna. In a few Days many Counts and Barons came to wait upon the Queen, and to congratulate her upon her return, and to offer their Service in driving out the Hungarians. The Queen and King in return, so far as their present narrow Circumstances would bear, rewarded all those, who had expressed their Affection for them, with Privileges, Titles, Honours, and Dignities, and especially the Youth about their own Ages, who, more out of Love than for Pay, would be ready and willing to make up an Army able to drive the Enemy out of the Kingdom. And at this time the Custom was first introduced among us to give to Barons the Title of Duke, for formerly that of Count was wont only to be bestowed upon them, and the Title of Prince, or Duke, belonged to those of the Royal Family only; and the first who had this Honour was Francesco del Balzo, whom this Queen created Duke of Andria, and the second was the Duke of Sessa. King Lewis likewise appointed a magnificent Court, and made Niccolo Acciojoli a Florentine Lord High-Steward of the Kingdom; and because the Subjects were oppress'd by Conrad Wolf and his Hungarian Officers, he left the Castles of Naples besieged, and with a goodly Company of Counts and Barons, and of the Flower of the Neapolitan Youth, he marched against the Count of Apici, and having defeated him, advanced into Puglia, where he took Lucera, and from thence went to Bartetta. Puglia and Terra di Lavoro were for a long time the Theatre of a cruel and bloody War, and not only these, but the other Provinces of the Kingdom were in a Combustion. Conrad Wolf presently sent Advice of what had happen'd to the King of Hungary, who, upon receiving of it, made such Dispatch, that he arrived in Slavonia, and embarked for Puglia, before it was known that he had resolved to come: Upon his arrival in Puglia he found his Army composed of ten thousand Horse, and a prodigious Number of Foot. The War therefore grew more furious and obstinate, till both Parties being wearied, at last Pope Clement found means to make Overtures of Peace between the two Kings. For which end Clement sent two Legates, who, with all their Management, could only obtain a Truce for one Year; whereupon King Lewis returned to Hungary, leaving Garrisons in all the Cities he was Master of. But after that he arrived in Hungary, whether it was owing to the Dexterity and Prudence of the Apostolick Legate, who never left him, or that he had resolved to make War upon the Venetians, who had made themselves Masters of some Cities of Dalmatia belonging to the Kingdom of Hungary, at last he made Peace with King Lewis and Queen Joan, and out of Compliment to the Pope, and the College of Cardinals, he relinquished all his Pretensions, and set at Liberty the five Princes of the Blood, who had been four Years Prisoners in the Castle of Vicegrad. This Peace was concluded in April of the Year 1351. and some add, that the Pope, as Mediator of the Peace, having awarded, that King Lewis and Queen Joan should pay thirty thousand Florins to the King of Hungary for his Expences of the War, he generously refused to take it, saying, That he went not to Naples out of Ambition or Covetousness, but only to revenge his Brother's Death, and having done what he thought was fitting, he desired no more; for which he was much commended and thanked by the Pope and College.

KING Lewis and Queen Joan having got clear of these Troubles, they sent Ambassadors to thank the Pope and the College of Cardinals, and to desire his Holiness to send an Apostolick Legate to crown them, which was readily granted, and the Bishop of Braga was deputed for that Purpose. Therefore great Preparations were made in Naples, and the twenty fifth of May the Feast of Pentecost was appointed for the Coronation; and all the Kingdom inur'd to Hardships, Burnings, Death, and Rapine, began to rejoice; and besides the Barons, a Multitude of People from all Parts flocked to Naples to be present at this Solemnity, which was likely to make them forget their past Calamities. On the Day appointed the Legate being come to the Place where Preparation had been made, with great Pomp and solemn Ceremony he anointed and crowned the King and Queen, and many Tournaments, Tiltings, and sumptuous Feasts were made. And afterwards all the Cities and Barons solemnly swore Homage to the King and Queen, who gave a general Indemnity to all those, who in the late War had sided with the King of Hungary; and King Lewis, in Memory of this Coronation, as we have said elsewhere, instituted the Society of the Nodo, (Knot) into which he admitted sixty Lords and Neapolitan Gentlemen of different Families, the most gallant Men of those times.

C H A P. II.

King Lewis's Expedition against Sicily: Peace following thereupon, and his Death.

AS our Kingdom of Puglia was brought to a very happy State by the Peace, and the Presence and Clemency of King Lewis, so on the contrary the Affairs of Sicily grew daily worse and worse; for by the Weakness of the young King Don Lewis, the Quarrels among the Sicilians increasing, and all the Barons and People of the Island being divided, the Tillage of the Fields was neglected, which is the principal Revuene of that Kingdom; in like manner all other Traffick was laid aside, and nothing but Robberies, Burnings, and Slaughter were minded: Hence proceeded Indigence and Misery to the whole Island, as well as Poverty and Weakness to the King, the People being not only unable to pay the extraordinary Subsidies, but even the wonted and ordinary: Under these Difficulties the Barons divided themselves into two Factions; the Heads of the one were the Catalans, who had usurped the Guardianship of the King; and of the other those of the House of Chiaromonte, who were so powerful, that they were Masters of Palermo, Trapani, Syracusa, Girgento, Mazara, and many more of the best Cities of Sicily; and altho' they were not the King's open Enemies, yet they lorded it over all these Cities in every thing, the Title only excepted; and because those who governed the King were in Possession of the least part of Sicily, they were forced to draw out of it wherewithal to maintain the Royal Dignity of the King and his Household, and also to enrich themselves: The People being discontented began to mutiny, and the City of Messina, which was the chief of those in the King's Possession, not able to bear the harsh Government of Count Matteo Palizzi, the Citizens rose up in Arms, went to the Royal Palace, and killed him; and the other Barons with Difficulty saving saving themselves, retired to Catania. After the Example of Messina, the Inhabitants of Sciacca also murdered the King's Ministers that were there; and Count Simone di Chiaromonte having been the Author of this Commotion, and knowing that he should incur the Indignation of the King and his Council, sent to King Lewis in Naples, inviting him not to make a bare Attempt, as formerly King Robert had done, but assured him of certain Victory, seeing the Affairs of Sicily were in such a Situation, that with a very small Number of Troops he might easily conquer it.

THE late Wars had put King Lewis and the Kingdom into as bad a State as the Sicilians, and they had but just then begun to reap the first Fruits of Peace and Tranquillity; and those Forces, which in the time of King Robert were powerful and united, by the Presence of so many Princes of the Blood, amongst whom the Kingdom was divided, were then weak and separated; so that the King could not send that Number of Troops and Provisions which so great an Undertaking required; nevertheless, he sent the High-Steward Acciajoli with a hundred Cuirassiers, and Giacomo Sanseverino Count of Melito with four hundred Foot, aboard of six Gallies, and many great Ships of Burden, with what Provisions could be got. These arriving in Sicily, with the Assistance of Count Simone marched, and took Possession of Melazzo, where, in the King's Name, they left a Garrison and a Governor, and with a great Part of the Provisions they marched to Palermo, and the Citizens being in extreme want of all Necessaries of Life, they were joyfully received; and those of the House of Chiaromonte set up King Lewis's Standard in Trapani, Syracusa, and in all the other Cities they were Masters of; and although they had not Soldiers sufficient to garrison them all for King Lewis, yet so weak was the King of Sicily's Party, that without the Force of Arms, with the Provisions only, which were sent them from Calabria, they held out for the King of Naples.

UPON this Success the Governors of the King Don Lewis, earnest to prevent King Lewis's Men from settling in Sicily, before they could be reinforced used their utmost Efforts to recover Palermo, but to no purpose; because the Citizens, who had destroyed all the Provisions, continued faithful to King Lewis, and punctually obeyed the High-Steward and the Count of Mileto, who defended the City, so that they were forced to leave it.

IN a few Days the King Don Lewis died, and his younger Brother Frederick was proclaimed King, who being but thirteen Years of Age, was under the Management of the Catalans, by whose means Niccolo Cefario, the Head of a strong Faction in Messina, being banished out of that City, also joined King Lewis's Party; and having kept a Correspondence with some of his Followers, in the Night-time he entered Messina with some Soldiers and Adherents of the House of Chiaromonte, and attacked his Enemies. The People being all in an Uproar, gave Opportunity to two hundred Horse, and four hundred Foot, (sent by the High-Steward, and the Counts of Chiaromonte, as had been agreed between them) to enter the City, and driving out those of the opposite Faction, they set up King Lewis's Standard. Immediately upon the News of the taking of that City, which King Lewis looked upon as his own, since the other Cities were rather in the Possession of the Chiaromontese, than of his Officers, he, with Queen Joan, came to Reggio in Calabria, and sent fifty Spear-men, and three hundred Foot, with great Store of Provisions to the High-Steward in Messina, of which he was in great want. The Citizens were so overjoyed, that with this Reinforcement they attacked the Castle of San Salvatore and Mattagrifone, which were obliged to surrender with two of the King's Sisters, Blanch and Violante, who, with an honourable Convoy, were sent to Reggio to the Queen, and were very courteously and lovingly received and caressed by her. The King thought fit not to delay any longer, but with the Queen pass'd the Streights, and on the Eve of Christmas 1355, with great Pomp made their Entry into Messina, and were lodged in the Royal Palace, where, with the usual Ceremonies, every one swore Homage and Fealty to them.

A few Days after the Counts Simone, Manfredi, and Federico di Chiaromonte came to wait upon the King, who received them very graciously, as Heads of the Family, and Authors of the Conquest of that Kingdom; but Count Simone, desirous that King Lewis would give him Blanch, King Frederick's Sister for Wife, and persuading himself, that on account of his Merit, and as a Reward for the Kingdom he ought not to deny him, spoke confidently of it to the King. This Demand seemed to be of great Importance, not in itself, but in those Consequences which might attend such a Marriage; for King Frederick being the last of the Race of the Kings of Sicily of the House of Aragon, and of so tender an Age, and weak Understanding, that he was called Frederick the Simple, it might probably happen, that Blanch's Right being added to Count Simons's Power, he might drive out both King Frederick and King Lewis; so that then he neither gave him a Denial, nor a Promise; but shortly after he offered to give him for Wife the Duchess of Durazzo. Simone then, by this Offer, finding himself baulk'd, took it so much to Heart (because he presumed that he merited so much of the King, that he could not refuse him any Favour) that in a few Days he died of Grief; and the rest of that Family, as if Simone by his Will had appointed them to revenge that Injury, began to cool in their Affection for King Lewis. In the mean time he ordered Catania, where King Frederick was with his few Troops, to be besieged; but King Lewis's Men being repulsed, and routed, Count Raimondo del Balzo the High-Chamberlain was taken Prisoner, and the High-Steward Acciajoli with great Difficulty escaped. The News of this Defeat struck Lewis to the very Heart, insomuch, that he stripped his Queen of her Jewels, and sold them to raise Money for the Count's Ransom, which he sent by a Herald to King Frederick, who refus'd to accept of it; but bid the Herald tell him, that the Count's Liberty depended solely upon that of his two Sisters. And as Lewis had an extreme Value for the Count, he was satisfied to send him his Sisters honourably accompanied to Catania.

WHILE these Things were transacting, the Innovations which happened in the Kingdom obliged King Lewis to return to Naples; and being resolved not to quit his Design upon Sicily, which, because of the extreme Poverty of the Enemy, he looked upon as already conquered, he left the High-Steward Acciajoli his Captain General in that Island, and with the Queen returned to Naples. New Disorders and Confusions, not inferior to what were in the time of the Hungarians, began to break out afresh in the Kingdom; for the Prince of Taranto, who, because he was the King's elder Brother, thinking that he might govern both the King and the Kingdom, had conceived a Hatred against, and was persecuting many Barons, because they would acknowledge none for their Lords and Masters but King Lewis and Queen Joan. And Lewis of Durazzo, the King's Cousin, finding that himself and his Brother were not regarded but as two poor Barons of the Kingdom, joined the Count of Minorvino, who had been so bold as to possess himself of the City of Bari, and to take the Title of Prince of Bari, and Palatine of Altamura, besides other Titles, of which he was very vain; and he maintained a good Band of Spear-men, and so many Horse, that he seemed to vie both with the Prince of Taranto and the King; and in order to be able to support these Men, he over-run the richest Parts of the Kingdom, and put the Country under Contribution, without the least Regard either to the King or Queen. Wherefore King Lewis found himself under a Necessity of crushing the Insolence of this Man, and after divers Engagements, which put many Provinces of the Kingdom into Confusion, he at length subdued the Rebels; and Lewis of Durazzo remaining alone, and without Troops, on account of his Relation, the King and Queen were reconciled with him; and after the King had taken sundry Precautions for the Quiet of the Kingdom, he bent his Thoughts upon the War of Sicily.

ON the other hand the Sicilians of King Frederick's Party, seeing their Troops much inferior to those of King Lewis, managed Matters so, as to get their King to marry the Sister of the King of Aragon, but that new Alliance was of no stead since the Bride died soon after: In the mean time, by an Alliance which the Chisaramonteje made with the Count of Vintimiglia, the Head of King Frederick's Party, a Treaty was set on Foot between that Prince, and King Lewis and Queen Joan, which, after much negotiating, was at last concluded upon these Conditions. That King Frederick should take the Title of King of Trinacria: That he should take for Wife Antonia del Balzo the Duke of Andria's Daughter by King Lewis's Sister: That he should hold his Kingdom of King Lewis and Queen Joan, and as an Acknowledgment should pay to them yearly on the Feast of S. Peter three thousand Ounces of Gold; and when the Kingdom of Naples should happen to be attacked, to send a hundred Spear-men, and ten armed Gallies to defend it. On the other hand, that King Lewis should deliver up all the Cities, Towns, and Castles, which to that Day had been taken, or had set up his Standard.

THIS put an end to the Wars of Sicily, which had continued so many Years, and wherein so much Blood had been shed, and inestimable Treasure spent. But it is a thing truly worthy of Observation, that the Kingdom of Sicily, which the Roman Pontiffs claimed as their Fief, and that it belonged to them to give the Investiture of it, insomuch, that they made many Attempts to wrest it from the Kings of Aragon, and now become subject and tributary to the Kings of Naples, should in process of Time be altogether withdrawn from the Subjection of them all, and at present be looked upon more free and independent, than the Kingdom of Naples itself; since, after the famous Sicilian Vespers, by reason of the continual Wars with the Kings of the Family of Anjou, who had always the Popes for their Confederates, the Kings of Aragon never sought Investiture from the Apostolick See for that Island; and even after this Peace made with the King and Queen of Naples, they did not demand it; and in fine the King Don Frederick dying without leaving Male Issue, and in the Year 1368 his Daughter Mary succeeding him, she would neither be called Queen of Trinacria, nor take Investiture from the Pope. King Martin I. of Aragon, who in the Year 1402 succeeded Mary, and Martin II. his Successor followed her Example. And this last dying without Children, and in the Year 1411 Ferdinand of Aragon the Son of John of Castile being elected King of Aragon, Valentia, and Sicily, he transmitted the Kingdom of Sicily with the same Conditions to his Son Alphonfus, who in the Year 1416 succeeded him in all his Kingdoms, but never sought Investiture from the Popes, neither did any of his Successors; so that, as of old through Necessity, or the Circumstances of the Times requiring it, the Custom of taking the Investiture of that Island from the Popes was introduced: So now by Disuse, and the contrary Practice, that Custom is quite laid aside and abolished; insomuch, that at present that Kingdom continues altogether free and independent.

AND although by the Articles of this Peace made with King Lewis and Queen Joan, the Kingdom of Sicily became subject and tributary to the Kings of Naples; yet those Conditions were never fulfilled, nor put in execution; for though in a Bull of Gregory XI.'s quoted by *Inveges*¹, published in 1363. soon after the Conclusion of this Peace, the Kingdom of Naples being called the Kingdom of Sicily, and that of Sicily, Trinacria; yet none of the Kings of that Island intitled themselves Kings of Trinacria in their publick Writs, but of Sicily, ultra Pharus; and they called the Kingdom of Naples Sicily citra Pharus, as we read in the Letters Patent of King Martin, and of the Kings of Sicily his Successors. And these two Kingdoms being afterwards united in the Person of Alphonfus I. of Aragon, he was the first, who began to take the Title of King of both the Sicilies. Neither do we read that that Kingdom was ever acknowledged to be held of the Kings of Naples, or that on the appointed Feast of S. Peter the three thousand Ounces of Gold were paid, or the ten armed Gallies sent, as stipulated in the said Articles of Peace; for the Kings of Naples, till Alphonfus I. of Aragon, were involved in so many Wars, and distracted by so many intestine Commotions, that they could not think of any thing but their own Safety, and the Preservation of their own Kingdom, as shall be related.

THE War of Sicily being thus ended, and the intestine Commotions suppressed, our Kingdom began to enjoy Peace and Tranquillity; but it continued not long in that State, for in the Year 1362, King Lewis being seized with a violent Fever, died in the forty second Year of his Age. This Prince was exceedingly handsome, of a sweet Temper, and no less valiant than wise; but he was very unfortunate in his Undertakings, for finding the Kingdom involved in Troubles, and impoverished by so many Wars and Dissentions, he had neither Means nor Opportunity to employ his Courage, especially in the Expedition of Sicily.

Matteo Palmerio in the Life of the High-Steward Acciajoli writes, that Innocent VI. Clement's Successor, was grievously offended with King Lewis, because he did not pay him the usual Tribute, and therefore the King, in order to pacify him, sent Acciajoli and Giovanni Archbishop of Naples his Ambassadors to Avignon; and Bzovius adds, that Innocent gave Power to Bertrando Giovanni's Successor to absolve King Lewis in articulo mortis from the Excommunication, *Ob non solutum Romanæ Ecclesiæ censum*². King Lewis reigned five Years before he was crowned, and ten after his Coronation. His Body was sent to the Monastery of Monte Vergine near Avellino twenty Miles distant from Naples, and it was buried near the Grave of the Empress Margaret his Mother, where his Tomb is still to be seen supported by eight Pillars with his Effigies only, without Inscription. He left no Children, the two Daughters he had by Queen Jean having died while they were Infants.

NOT long after the Prince of Taranto died in Naples, and was buried in the Church of S. George the Greater, and he left Philip his third Brother Heir to the Principality, and to the Title of Emperor¹. This Prince a little before had married Mary the Queen's Sister, who died shortly after; and for his second Wife he married Elizabeth the Daughter of Stephen King of Poland, with whom he lived till 1368, the Year of his Death². He died in Taranto, where he was buried, and having no Children, left the Principality of Taranto, with the Title of Emperor to Giacomo del Balzo the Son of his Sister Margaret, and of Francis Duke of Andria. Lewis of Durazzo Count of Gravina and Morcone died also, and was buried in the Church of the Holy Cross, near Queen Sancia's Tomb; he left a Son named Charles, who, as shall be told, was afterwards King of Naples; and shortly after Robert Prince of the Moras, the Count's Brother, both of them Sons of John Duke of Durazzo, died in France; so that of the numerous Progeny of King Charles II. there remained no other Male Issue but Lewis King of Hungary, and Charles of Durazzo the Son of the abovementioned Lewis of Durazzo. And soon after, all that this Progeny was possessed of in Greece was lost; for while they were still in Possession of Cerfu and Durazzo, Queen Margaret the Wife of King Charles of Durazzo (while she governed in her Husband's Absence, who had gone to Hungary) having caused a Venetian Ship richly loaded to be seiz'd, and refusing to restore either the Goods or Ship, the Venetians, upon the King's Death, under this Pretence made themselves Masters of the Duchy of Durazzo, by which King Charles I.'s Race lost all footing in *Greece*³.

Queen Joan marries a third and fourth time, and the Rebellion of the Duke of Andria.

BY the Death of King Lewis of Taranto the Queen being left a Widow, in order to prevent the Princes of the Blood from meddling in the Government of the Kingdom; both the Neapolitans and the Barons were for having her to govern alone, and therefore those of the Queen's most favourite Courtiers began to encourage her immediately to take a Husband, not only for the Support of her Royal Authority, but likewise for the Quiet of the Kingdom, to endeavour to leave Successors; and presently the Infant of Majorca, named James of Aragon, a handsome and gallant Youth, was pitched upon to be her Husband, and the Queen being but thirty six Years of Age, it might reasonably be expected that they would have Children; and the Marriage being concluded in the Year 1363, the Bridegroom took shipping and came to Naples, where he was received by the Citizens as King. The Marriage being solemnized, the Queen created him Duke of Calabria; but such was the cruel Destiny of our Kingdom, that this Marriage proved very unfortunate; for the King of Majorca being at War with his Cousin the King of Aragon about the Counties of Roussillon and Ceritania, the Queen's new Husband must needs go to serve his Father in that War, wherein he was first made Prisoner, and afterwards ransomed by the Queen, but returning a second time, he died. The Queen continued many many Years a Widow, and governed with so much Prudence, that she gained the Character of the wisest Queen that ever sat upon a Throne; and being resolved not to venture upon another Husband, she began to think of settling the Succession of the Kingdom. She had brought up at her Court Margaret the youngest Daughter of the Duke of Durazzo, and of her own Sister Mary, whom she resolved to give in marriage to Charles of Durazzo with Apostolick Dispensation, because they were Cousin Germans; but there was a Stop for some time put to this intended Marriage, because the King of Hungary being at War with the Venetians, he sent to invite Charles of Durazzo to come and serve in that War. Though Charles was very young, yet he went with a goodly Company of Gentlemen, and served many Years, which startled the Queen, and made her suspect that the King of Hungary still harboured some Remains of the old Grudge, and therefore might induce Charles to revolt; nevertheless this Marriage, as shall be told, was at last consummated, which by other means proved the Queen's Ruin.

BUT on the other hand it appearing an easy Matter for any Man to surprize a Woman, in a manner left alone with the Burden of the Government of so great a Kingdom, and of so bold a People; though there were now no Princes of the Blood to disturb it, yet there were not wanting Neighbours, and powerful Barons. The first who attacked it was Ambrosio Visconte a Ballard Son of Bernabo Lord of Milan, who with twelve thousand Horse having entered the Kingdom by the way of Abruzzo, and taken by Storm some Castles, was advancing and ravaging the Country; but the Queen with her noble and masculine Courage soon crushed him, for having the best way she could assembled her Troops, she defeated his Army, and freed the Kingdom from that Invasion.

THE Queen overjoyed at this Victory, and the Kingdom being now in a peaceable State, went to visit Provence, and her other Dominions in France; but her principal Errand was to go to Avignon, to visit Pope Urban V. who had succeeded Innocent VI. Clement's Successor, by whom she was most graciously and honourably received*. After she had spent some Months in visiting these People, who very lovingly made her handsome Presents, she returned to Naples highly contented, because she had made the Pope her Well-wisher and Friend.

UPON her arrival in Naples, the Marriage of Charles of Durazzo with her Niece Margaret was consummated; and it was evident to every Body, that her Intention was to leave them the Kingdom after her Death; yet for all that, Charles would not quit the King of Hungary's Service, but with the Queen's Liberty, in the Spring of the Year 1370 he returned to serve that King against the Venetians, leaving Margaret with a Daughter of about six Months old, named Mary, after his Wife's Mother; and in the beginning of the Year following she was delivered of another Daughter, who was named Joan, after the Queen her Aunt, and was afterwards, as we shall observe, Queen of Naples.

BUT while the Kingdom was recovering itself, and free from foreign Invasions, it was again turned upside down by an intestine War, which was the Occasion of much Mischief; for all the other Princes of the Blood being extinct, Francesco del Balzo was left a most powerful Lord, because, as has been said, by the Death of Philip Prince of Taranto his Cousin, who had left Giacomo del Balzo his Son Heir to his Estate, as his Son's Tutor, he possessed a very great Lordship, and was thereby become formidable to all the Barons of the Kingdom; so that pretending that the City of Matera belonged to the Principality of Taranto, which was then in the Possession of a Count of the Family of Sanseverino, he went with open Force, and took it from that Count, threatening also to take some other neighbouring Cities from him. Upon this Insult the Sanseverini, who for Numbers and Estates were the most powerful Barons of the Kingdom, had recourse to the Queen, who immediately sent to tell the Duke, that if he was satisfied to refer the Matter to Arbiters, and not to shew so much Disrespect to her, she would chuse such as could not be suspected. But the Duke, rejecting all Advice, persisted in his Obstinacy of retaining the Cities by Force; whereupon the Queen, after having called all his Relations, and proposed many Expedients, willing to try every thing before she should be obliged to proceed by way of Justice, and seeing that the Duke continued obstinate, she ordered him to be summoned; and the Duke being still inflexible, upon a Day appointed for that Purpose, being seated on her Throne with all her Council about her, she pronounced Sentence against the Duke as a Rebel: Then she ordered the Sanseverini to go and possess themselves, not only of the Cities taken from them, but likewise of all the Cities belonging to the Duke in Puglia in the Name of the Royal Exchequer, as justly devolved to the Crown by his open Rebellion. It took a long time to subdue the Duke, who stood in his own Defence; at last he was overcome, and forced to fly the Kingdom; whereupon the Queen after she had taken Possession of all his Estates, and Tiano and Sessa had surrendered to her, in order to indemnify herself of the Expences of this War, she sold Sessa to Tommaso di Marzano Count of Squilacci for twenty five thousand Ducats, and Tiano for thirteen thousand to Goffredo di Marzano Count of Alisi; but to Tommaso she gave the Title of Duke of Sessa, and he was the second of the Kingdom next to the Duke of Andria. She likewise sent to take Possession of the Principality of Taranto, because the young Prince, after his Father's Flight, had retired into Greece, where he was possessed of some Lands.

BUT the Duke of Andria did not fail to make new Attempts, for Gregory XI. his Kinsman having succeeded Urban, he had recourse to him, and was very kindly received, and partly with the Money he got of him under Pretence of Subsistance, partly with some which he raised out of the Estate he had in Provence, he returned to Italy, where with great Facility he found Means to disturb both the Queen and the Kingdom; for Italy being then in profound Peace, many Ultramountain Soldiers of Fortune were out of Pay, so that with the Money he had gathered, and many fair Promises, they were easily persuaded to go along with him. He entered the Kingdom with thirteen thousand Horse and Foot Soldiers, and with great Expedition arrived at Capua before the Queen had time to make the least Provision for a Defence; so that the whole Kingdom was not only put in Confusion, but the City of Naples itself was in great Fear and Danger; nevertheless the Queen, who was loved and respected by every body, soon put herself in a Posture of Defence, and made every thing ready for assembling her Army at Nola, when the Duke, being on his March towards Aversa, went to visit his Uncle Raimondo del Balzo Lord High Chamberlain of the Kingdom, a Man much respected both on account of his Age and Loyalty, and of great Authority, who was then in a Village of his own called Casaluce. As soon as this great Man saw his Nephew he began to rebuke him, and at the same time to exhort him not to be both the Ruin and Reproach of the Family of Balzo, by pursuing so foolish and unjust an Undertaking; for he was very well informed, that though the People he had brought along with him were many in Number, yet but of little Courage, they would certainly be defeated, for he had not only to do with the Queen's Troops, but with the whole Barons of the Kingdom, to whom he was become odious on account of his insupportable Pride. The Duke being struck to the very Heart, and ashamed at the Words of the good old Gentleman, knew not what to reply, but that what he did was only for recovering his own Estate, which he found was by no other Means to be got, notwithstanding his sincere Repentance for his Rebellion. The Uncle replied, that the Way he had taken was bad, and likely to deprive him of his Estate for ever, and that the best Course now was to retire, and by the Mediation of the Pope, endeavour to pacify the Queen. The Authority of this Man was so prevalent, that the Duke, overcome by these Reasons, immediately with his Followers marched directly for Puglia, under pretence of recovering the Cities of that Province, and upon his arrival in the Plains of Andria, he caused a Ship to be prepared for him, in which he embark'd, and return'd to Provence to wait upon the Pope. The Duke's Men finding they were impos'd upon, in order to induce the Queen to give them honourable Conditions, they began to pillage some small Towns; and as she was a great Lover of Peace she agreed with them, that upon their receiving sixty thousand Florins, they should march out of the Kingdom. These Transactions lasted till the Year 1375, in which Raimondo del Balzo Lord High Chamberlain died, leaving a most honourable Reputation behind him; the Queen was sadly afflicted for the Loss of such a Baron, and in his Place she created Giacomo Arcucci Lord of Cirignola High Chamberlain.

AT this time the Queen, whether she had conceiv'd a Jealousy of Charles of Durazzo's too great Affection for the King of Hungary, and that she was afraid of what afterwards happened, or that she was stirred up by her Council, who saw her thus alone always forced to struggle with the continual Commotions of the Kingdom, was determined to take a Husband; for though she was in the forty sixth Year of her Age, yet she was so vigorous, that she seem'd to be very fit for bearing Children;

Children; therefore she married Otho Duke of Brunswick, a Prince of the Empire and of Imperial Race, a prudent and gallant Man¹, and of an Age suitable to her own, and it was agreed, that he should not take the Title of King, in order perhaps to keep Charles of Durazzo still in hopes of succeeding in the Kingdom. On the Feast of the Annunciation in the Year 1376, Otho came and made his Entry into Naples, conducted with great Honour under a Canopy through all the City to Castel Nuovo, where the Queen was, and where for many Days there were Royal Feasts.

THIS Marriage very much displeas'd Margaret of Durazzo, who at the same time brought forth a Son named Ladislaus, who was afterwards King; and though she was pretty sure that the Queen would have no Children, yet she was afraid that Otho and his Germans having once got footing in the Kingdom, would be so much Masters of the Fortresses, and of all the Kingdom, that it would be no easy Matter to dislodge them, and that she and her Husband might be deprived of the Succession. But the Queen stood firm to her Resolution of not giving her Husband the Title of King, reserving it to her Son, if it should please God to give her one; and in her Discourse she seem'd always to have a special care, that the Kingdom should remain in the Male Line of King Charles II. And to shew the Love and Regard she had for her Husband, she made him a Present of all the Prince of Taranto's Estate, devolved to her by the Rebellion of Giacomo del Balzo the Duke of Andria's Son, which Estate was equivalent to a Kingdom. After this Marriage the Kingdom continued in Peace and Quiet for the Space of two Years; and the Queen gave a second Husband to her Niece Joan of Durazzo the eldest Daughter of the Duke of Durazzo, and of the Dutchess Mary her Sister, by marrying her to Robert Count of Artois the Son of the Count of Arras.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Schism occasioned by the Popes of Rome and those of Avignon.

THE famous Schism which happened in the Years following, and which lasted till the Council of Constance, put the Kingdom in great Confusion and Disorder. Pope Gregory IX. had translated the Apostolick See from Avignon, whither in the Year 1305 it had been transferred by Clement V. and where it had continued seventy Years, to Rome, where he arrived the seventh Day of January this Year 1377, and where he died on the twenty seventh of March 1378. The Romans, who had been at a vast Loss during the Time that the Apostolick See was in France, resolved to lay hold of this Opportunity for re-establishing the Pope's Court in their City, by endeavouring to get a Roman elected, or at least a Native of Italy; on the other hand finding, that there were then but sixteen Cardinals, of which twelve were Ultramontans, and only four Italians, they were afraid, and very justly, that the first being most in Number, it was not likely that the Plurality of Votes would be in favour of an Italian Pope; therefore having raised a Tumult they took up Arms, and on the fifth of April 1378, when the Cardinals had entered the Conclave, a Multitude of People conven'd, surrounded the Palace, and began to cry out, We will have a Roman. This Cry lasted all Night; the Day following the People being assembled in greater Numbers, went with more

Fury to the Conclave, threatening to break open the Doors, and to cut the French Cardinals in pieces, if they did not elect a Pope that was a Roman, or at least an Italian. The Cardinals being frighted promised to the People that they would do so, but protested among themselves, that what they were to do was by Compulsion, and that the Election was to be void. At last in a tumultuous manner they elected a Person, who was not of the College of Cardinals, and who was so insignificant, that it would be an easy Matter to turn him out of the Papacy. This was Bartolommeo Prignano Archbishop of Bari, according to Pancinio, born in Naples of mean Parents; but our *Giovanni Villani*¹, and *Theodore de Nismes*² say, that he was born in the Village of Itri in the County of *Fondi*³. He had lived for the most part in France at the Court of the Popes, and had had a Post in the Apostolick Chancery, and afterwards had been Archbishop of Acerenza, and then of Bari. A Report being spread in Rome that the Archbishop of Bari had been elected, the People confounding him with John of Bar a Frenchman, and Domestick of the late Pope's, began their Outrages afresh. The Cardinal of S. Peter, in order to pacify the Mob, appeared at a Window of the Conclave, and many of them seeing him said, That's the Cardinal of S. Peter; whereupon the Populace immediately believed that he was the Cardinal that had been elected, and fell a crying, Viva viva S. Pietro. A short time after the Mob broke open the Doors of the Conclave, seiz'd the Cardinals, and robbed them of their Goods, still demanding a Roman Cardinal for Pope: some Domesticks of the Cardinals having said to them, Have not you got the Cardinal of S. Peter? they took the Cardinal, clothed him with the Pontifical Garments, placed him upon the Altar, and adored him, though he cried out, that he neither was, nor would be Pope. The Cardinals had much ado to save themselves, some running to their Houses, and others to Castel S. Angelo. The Archbishop of Bari in an instant became proud, austere, and very artful, for smelling the Intention of the Cardinals, assisted by the Magistrates, he forced some Cardinals to proclaim him. He took the Name of Urban VI. and wrote to all Christian Princes, notifying his Election; and in the beginning he very much curb'd the Cardinals, being afraid of what afterwards happened, viz. That they had a Mind to turn him out of the Papacy⁴. On the other hand the Cardinals, though they had been forced publicly to acknowledge him, wrote privately to the King of France, and other Christian Princes, that the Election was void, and that it was never their Intention to have acknowledged him for Pope; and shortly after, under pretence of shunning the Heat of the Summer, in the Month of May the twelve Ultramontan Cardinals left Rome one after another, and went to Avignon. But Cardinal Ursino the Count of Nola's Brother, under Pretence of coming to Naples to visit his Relations, got leave of Urban and came to wait upon the Queen; and being firmly persuaded that the Cardinals would make void the Election, he began to entreat her, that in that Case she would be pleas'd to intercede with the Ultramontan Cardinals, since there was a new Election to be made, in order to please the People of Rome, to elect him.

THE Queen, like a wise and prudent Woman, turned a deaf Ear to the Cardinal's Request, but sent Niccolo Spinelli di Napoli, and the Count of Gioja a famous Doctor of the Law and High Chancellor of the Kingdom to Rome, to congratulate Urban upon his Election, and to do him Homage. But this new advanced Pope seem'd so much to disregard the Respect paid him by the Queen, and the Person of the Chancellor, by treating him very unmannerly⁵, that the Chancellor, who knew him in a private Life, and to be an Upstart, and by his froward Disposition judging him unworthy of the Papacy, returned so ill satisfied with him, that it is thought, that from that time he resolved to be an Instrument of the Election of another Pope. To this was added, that soon after Prince Otho having gone to Rome to visit Urban, some say to get the Investiture of the Kingdom⁶; others will have it, to beg of him, that since the Kingdom of Sicily by Succession had fallen to a Woman, he would use his Interest to get her to marry Duke Baldassar of Brunswick his Brother; but be that as it will, it is most certain, that he not only did not obtain what he was asking, but was hated, and unhandsomely used. Theodore of Nismes, who was Urban's Secretary, tells us ¹, that Otho being one day present when the Pope was at Dinner, and, as the Custom is, taking a Glass to offer him Wine, the Pope, pretending to be discoursing of other Affairs, suffered him to continue a good while upon his Knees without drinking, till one of the Cardinals, who was his Confident, said to him, Holy Father, 'tis time for you to drink; for which Cause the Prince return'd in greater Indignation than the Chancellor.

THE same Author ², and he, who wrote Urban's Life, say, that he was more bent than ever any Pope had been upon enriching his Kindred with the Revenues of the Apostolick See; and from that time was resolved to give the Kingdom of Naples to Charles of Durazzo; taking it for granted, that he would get from him better Settlements, and greater Lordships in the Kingdom for Butillo and Francesco Prignano his Nephews, than he should have from Queen Joan and Prince Otho. The Duke of Andria, who had followed Pope Gregory XI. to Rome, in hopes that he would have got him restored to his Estate, was then in Rome in a very low Condition; and after Gregory's Death perceiving, that the new Pope was no Friend of the Queen's, he began to treat with him about his inviting Charles of Durazzo to attack the Kingdom, assuring him, that the Undertaking would be easy, and could not fail of a prosperous Success; because he had Advice from Naples, that the whole Kingdom was dissatisfied, and afraid of falling into the Hands of Otho; and that it was the earnest Desire of the Barons and Noble Neapolitans to see Charles of Durazzo the only Branch of the Family of Anjou in the Kingdom; and so much the more, because in the Service of the King of Hungary, he had become famous in the Art of War, not only by his personal Bravery, but likewise by his Conduct. With these Arguments it was no hard matter to persuade the Pope to do that, for which of himself he had the greatest Inclination; and therefore without delay Urban sent to invite Charles, who was in Italy making War in the Trivigiano against the Venetians, to come with a Body of Troops to Rome, because he had resolved to dethrone Queen Joan, and shut her up in a Monastery, and to give him the Investiture and Possession of the Kingdom ³. Charles at first received the Invitation very coldly, because the Regard he had for the Queen, and the Favours he had received from her, which deserved a grateful Return, straitened him on the one hand, and on the other the Difficulty of the Undertaking, being afraid, that if he should leave the King of Hungary in the Heat of that War, he could not expect to be assisted by him.

THIS underhand Dealing could not be kept so secret, as not to come to the Queen's Knowledge in Naples; whereupon she shut herself up with her Council, and consulted how to guard against it. Our Lawyer Niccolo di Napoli, a daring Man, and of great Sway in the Council, who bore the Pope a private Grudge, said, that the best Expedient that could be thought of to divert the Pope from this Enterprize, was to excite the Cardinals to make a new Election: this Proposal being approved of by Onorato Gaetano Count of Fondi, a very powerful Man in Campagna di Roma, and who having been Vicar General, and Governor of all the Ecclesiastical State of Compagna while the Apostolical See had been in France, in order to be restored to his former Posts, wanted to have the Pope's Court fixed any where but in Italy: it was agreed, and resolved upon, that a Council should be held in the City of Fondi. The French Cardinals, who in all haste had gone to Avignon, met there, and declar'd, that Urban's Election was void, as made contrary to their Inclinations and the usual Method; so that they no sooner heard of what had passed in Naples, than they all came to Fondi, where they had appointed the three Italian Cardinals to meet them; and at last on the twentieth of September having enter'd the Conclave, after a great deal of pains to remove all Dispute with the Italian Cardinals about the Election, and after having declared Urban's Election void, the Cardinal of Florence proposed to elect Robert Cardinal of Geneva, a German by Birth. All the Cardinals, except the three Italians, gave their Votes ⁴; he took the Name of Clement VII. and was crowned on the twenty first Day of the same Month. He was Brother to Amadeus Count of Geneva, and had been Bishop of Tervana, and afterwards of Cambray, and had been made Cardinal by Gregory XI. and now began the Schism. Urban with the Cardinal of S. Sabina alone kept Possession of Rome, but Castel S.

Angelo stood it out for Clement. The Romans besieged it, and at last took and demolished it. Urban immediately made a new Election of Cardinals, and wrote to all the Princes and Republicks of Christendom, notifying, that the Rebellion of the Cardinals was on account of their Wickedness, and not, that they doubted of his being lawfully created Christ's Vicar; and he persuaded them all, to look upon the Pope whom they had elected as Antipope, and them as Hereticks and Schismatics, and deprived of all Dignity and Holy Orders; declaring likewise, that this Rebellion was owing to the Fear the Cardinals had of a Reformation, which he intended to make, upon account of their wicked Lives. The Cardinals, which he made, were for the most part Neapolitans, and among the rest Friar Niccolo Caracciolo a Dominican, Inquisitor of Sicily, Filippo Caraffa Bishop of Bologna, Guglielmo da Capua, Gentile di Sangro, Stefano Sanseverino, Marino del Giudice di Amalfi Archbishop of Taranto and Chamberlain of the Apostolical See, and Fraancesco Prignano his own Nephew; and to strengthen his Interest in the Kingdom of Naples, he bestow'd upon them and their Adherents all the principal Churches and other Ecclesiastical Dignities in the Kingdom. Moreover in order to sow Dissention in the City of Naples, he deprived Bernard de Montore a Burgundian of the Archbishoprick of that City, and bestow'd it upon the Abbot Bozzuto, a Gentleman of great Authority and Parentage in the City; and at last he sent the Duke of Andria for Charles of Durazzo, who was then in Frioli. Upon this second Invitation Charles was a little more pliable than formerly, because he had receiv'd Advice from Naples, that the Queen, having conceiv'd a Jealousy of him, had bestow'd many Favours upon Robert of Artois, who was the Husband of Margaret's eldest Sister; so that being now jealous in his turn, he promised the Duke that he would come, provided the Pope would engage to obtain his Liberty, and some Favour and Assistance from the King of Hungary, because he had no Forces of his own, but about a hundred Neapolitan Horse, who had always serv'd with him in that War; and in the mean time he was making ready to go to Rome, as soon as ever he should hear from the King of Hungary.

URBAN having thus set the City of Naples at variance, in which he did not much confide, he drew to his Party many other Cities, Provinces, and Kingdoms. Almost all the Cities of Tuscany, Lombardy, together with the Romans, acknowledged him as Pope. Germany and Bokemia sided with him, Lewis King of Hungary acknowledged him; Poland, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden and Norway follow'd the Example of Germany; and in England, Deputies from the two contending Parties being heard in Parliament, Urban's Election was approv'd, and that of Clement rejected.

ON the other hand Pope Clement was acknowledged in France, Scotland, Lorrain, Savoie, and Spain, which last, tho' at first it espoused the Cause of Urban, yet afterwards it declar'd for Clement; but above all he was acknowledged and favoured by our Queen Joan; and when Clement left Fondi, and came to Naples, she receiv'd him most magnificently in Casfel del Uovo; and to do him Honour, she caused a Bridge of a great Length to be built in the Sea, where he alighted. The Queen, with all those that had gone to meet Clement, convened under the great Arch of the Castle, which was adorned with rich Tapestry, and there placed the Pontifical Chair in the usual manner; in which the Pope was no sooner seated, than the Queen, with Prince Otho, went and kissed his Foot, and after them Robert of Artois, with the Dutchess of Durazzo his Wife did the same, as also Agnes the Widow of the Lord of Verona, who had retir'd to Naples; and lastly Margaret of Durazzo her Sister, the Wife of Charles of Durazzo, who was then living in Naples: and then a great Number of Knights, Barons, Ladies, and young Gentlewomen richly clothed, likewise kissed his Foot; and afterwards having gone up to the Apartments of the Castle, the Pope with all the Cardinals were nobly lodged, and for several Days there was nothing but feasting and Rejoicings; and at the Queen's Desire the Pope made Gerardo di Gifoni, General of the Friars Minors, a Cardinal.

BUT in the midst of all this Mirth in Casfel del Uovo, the People of Naples began to murmur; though perhaps they would have been quiet, if they had seen that the Queen with greater Confidence had receiv'd the Pope in the City, and made the common People (who are always greedy of new Sights) partake of these Feasts; for it seem'd to many, who were of a factious Disposition, that the Queen, as conscious of her Error, durst not make that Shew in publick; therefore they exclaim'd against her, that by the bad Counsel of her Ministers, pushed on by their own Passions, she had a mind to support an Anti-pope of a foreign Nation, and to the great Scandal of all the World, to nourish a Schism against the Apostolical See, which had always favour'd her and her Predecessors, and against a Neapolitan Pope, from whom they had reason to expect both Honour and Profit; and as 'tis customary with the Vulgar, they spoke both licentiously and disrespectfully; and one of these Days it happen'd, that on the Piazza Sellaria a Tradesman speaking impudently against the Queen, he was reprimanded by Andrea Raxignano a Nobleman of Porta Nova; but the Tradesman persisting to say worse things than he had done before, Andrea rode up to him, and with a Blow beat out one of his Eyes; whereupon the People of that Street in great Rage rose up in Arms; and at the same time a Taylor came from the Piazza of Scalezia, named Brigante, Nephew to the said Tradesman, a seditious and insolent Man, who finding the People in Arms, with a loud Voice cry'd out, God save Pope Urban; and being follow'd by the Mob through all the lower Parts of the City, they plunder'd the Houses of all the Ultramontans, who liv'd there. Then the Abbot Luigi Bozuto, who, as we have observ'd, had been made Archbishop of Naples by Pope Urban, and had kept privately in his House for fear of the Queen, nor had he dar'd to take Possession of the Archbishoprick, came out, and with the Assistance of the Mob took Possession of the Church, and of the Episcopal Palace, by turning out Archbishop Bernard's Family.

THIS Mutiny in Naples with the Pillage of so many Houses in the neighbouring Villages, had so terrified Clement, that though the Nobility and the chief Inhabitants had taken Arms and quell'd the Commotion, and, to shew their readiness to serve the Queen and the Pope, had gone to wait upon them in the Castle, and offer'd to stand by them; yet all that was not sufficient to stop the Pope; but with his Cardinals he took shipping, and went first to Gaeta, and then to Avignon, where he re-established the Pontifical See, and where for a long time he was obey'd not only by France, but by Spain, Scotland, Lorrain and Savoy.

ALTHOUGH these Commotions had very much disturbed the Queen, yet with her usual Courage, relying on the Nobility, who had so readily put a stop to the Fury of the People, she ordered Raimondo Ursino the Count of Nola's Son, and Stefano Ganga Deputy of the Vicariate, with a good Body of Men to go out against the Robbers of the adjacent Parts of the City; and after they had cut a great Number of them in pieces, and taken many, who had their Flesh torn off with red-hot Pincers, and were afterwards quartered, they returned to the City, and by the Queen's Order went to Bozuto's House; but he being fled, and finding that the People had laid down their Arms, they caused his House in the Seggio Capuana to be pulled down, and his Lands to be laid waste. Brigante, with some other Heads of the Sedition, were immediately hang'd; so that the Commonalty, seiz'd with Fear, shut themselves up in their Houses.

NOT long after the City of Naples was again in Arms and Confusion, on account of a Dispute between the Nobility of the Seggi of Capuana and Nido, and those of Portanova, Porto, and Montagna; those of Capuana and Nido pretending, that by virtue of a Sentence of King Robert's, they had been prefer'd as well in the publick Deeds, as in the Government of publick Affairs to all the Nobility of the other three Seggi, whom out of Derision they call'd Mediani (middling Nobility) as if they had been a second State, betwixt the Nobility and the Commons. On the other hand the Nobility of the three Seggi framed a Genealogy of the Families of the other two, and made them to be of very mean Extractions, by deriving them originally from the Coast of Amalfi, and the Villages and Places in that Neighbourhood, where, as they said, their Relations were still Mechanicks. From Reproaches they proceeded to Blows, the Result of which was a great Slaughter on both Sides, and the City put into Disorder and Confusion. The poor Queen, who had Matters of greater Consequence to trouble her, and who had sent Prince Otho to S. Germano, in order to avert the impending Storm, was then unwilling to punish the Authors of this Tumult and Slaughter: but it being of great Importance to her to apply a speedy Remedy, she published an Indemnity, whereby she ordain'd, that both Parties should take an Oath from the Hands of Ugo Sanseverino Great Protonotary of the Kingdom to live quietly, and not to molest one another, and pardoned all those concerned in the late Commotion and Slaughter, till the Return of the Prince her Husband, when an end should be put to all these Disputes. This Indemnity, which is mention'd by Pier Vincenti ¹ in his Teatro de Protonotari, and likewise recorded by Summonte ² in his History, was drawn up in Castel Nuovo by Facio da Perugia a Lawyer and Vice-Protonotary of the Kingdom, on the third of September, 1380.

CHAP. V.

Charles of Durazzo is crowned King by Pope Urban, who deposes Queen Joan, and she adopts for her Son Lewis of Anjou, Brother to Charles V. King of France. Charles of Durazzo invades the Kingdom, defeats Otho, and makes the Queen Prisoner, whom he afterwards puts to Death.

IN the mean time Margaret of Durazzo, having secret Advice that her Husband had got the King of Hungary's Consent, and was preparing to go to Rome, ask'd a safe Conduct of the Queen to go to Friuli to her Husband; and the Queen, whether out of Greatness of Soul, or that she did not know for certain that Charles intended to invade her Kingdom, or that she might not provoke him, gave her what she demanded, and sent her away with an honourable Convoy; of which she had good reason more than once to repent, having had it in her power to detain her and her two Children Ladislaus and Joan, who both reign'd afterwards, and to have made use of them as Hostages in the Misfortunes which afterwards happened to her.

CHARLES, having obtain'd Leave of the King of Hungary, was at last come to Rome, where he was joyfully receiv'd by Urban. This Pope in the Month of July of the preceding Year 1370, had published a Bull ¹, whereby he declared Queen Joan excommunicated, a Schismatick, and accursed, depriving her of the Kingdom, and of all Possessions and Fiefs which she held of the Church of Rome, of the Empire, or of any Church, or Ecclesiastical Person, and absolved her Vassals from their Oaths of Fidelity, and ordered them never any more to obey her ²; so that upon Charles's Arrival in Rome, on the first Day of June 1380, he gave him the Investiture of the Kingdom by a Bull drawn up for that Purpose, and declared him King of Naples and Jerusalem, and anointed and crowned him ³. And Charles, with the Money he had got from the King of Hungary, list'd a great Number of Soldiers; but the Pope would not allow him to depart from Rome, till he had first given the Writ of Investiture of the Principality of Capua, and of many other Lands, to Butillo Prignano his Nephew. The Pope having got the Investiture for his Nephew, immediately sent for Count Allerico Barbiano, who was then a Soldier of Fortune in Italy, and had a good Body of Troops under his Command, and engaged the Count with his Troops in his own Service, and ordered them to join Charles; and he likewise sent with him the Cardinal di Sangro as Apostolical Legate, hoping, by the Conquest of the Kingdom, to have a good Share of it for his other Relations.

ON the other hand the Queen being assured of Charles's Coronation, presently sent for Otho her Husband, who was then at Taranto, and caus'd all the Barons of the Kingdom to be summon'd to their usual Service; and having conven'd the Magistrates of the City, she publish'd the coming of the Enemy, and obtain'd of the City a small Subsidy for putting in order and paying the Soldiers, which Prince Otho had brought with him from Puglia. But upon this Occasion it was found, that Charles's Party was very strong in the Kingdom, and that the many chief Families which Pope Urban had rais'd and adorn'd with the red Hat, oppos'd her with all their Might; and it was known too late, that the Queen had not sufficiently guarded against his Artifices, which should have been when Clement was in Naples, to have got him to make a great many Neapolitan Cardinals, who would have stood firm to her Interest, and not have contented herself with having got one single Friar made a Cardinal, from whom nothing could be expected. The Queen therefore diffident of her being able to stand her Ground with what Forces she had, fell upon an Expedient which proved very fatal and lamentable to this Kingdom, and which was the Occasion of the so many Revolutions and Calamities, which it suffered for two Ages following¹; and it was this, she sent the Count of Caserta to France to ask Assistance of King John I. of France, and to engage him the more, she sent Letters of Adoption in favour of the Duke of Anjou one of the King's Sons, named Lewis, and Brother to Charles V. King of France John's Successor, whereby she made him her Heir and lawful Successor of the Kingdom, and of her other Dominions; and she ordered the Count to procure the Consent of Pope Clement to this Adoption, who by his Bull dated the thirtieth of May 1382, gave the Investiture of the Kingdom to Lewis and Queen Joan, that is to say, to her during Life, and to Lewis for ever²; she likewise sent to Provence, and ordered ten Gallies which she had there to be fitted out in all haste and sent to Naples, that upon any emergent Occasion she might make use of the same Shift, which had so well succeeded upon the King of Hungary's Invasion.

THIS Step of the Queen's alienated the Minds of many from her; for though in general they had a great Esteem for her, yet when they knew of the Count of Caserta's going to France, and the Queen's Intention, they were much more desirous to have for their Lord Charles of Durazzo, born and brought up in the Kingdom, and a Blood Relation of many of the chief Lords and Barons thereof, than to have a new French Lord set over them, who of course would bring with him new Ultramontans, whom he would be obliged to enrich with the Estates and Goods of the Natives. Whence it came to pass, that when Prince Otho went to S. Germano to make Head against Charles, who was marching that Way, he was followed by very few Barons, insomuch, that without seeing the Enemy, he was forced to abandon the Pass, and to retire with all his Men to Arienzo. But Charles would not take the direct Road to Naples, judging it much better to go and find out the Enemy, and to beat them in the open Field, and thereby put an end to the War in one Day; for which end he marched to Cimitile near Nola, where the Count of Nola waited upon him, and received him as King. Prince Otho removed his Camp, and posted himself between Cancello and Maddaloni; and though Charles advanced in order of Battel to fight him, yet he kept close in his Camp, and by the Way of Acerra and Salice retired towards Naples; and Charles by the Road between Marigliano and Somma directed also his march towards Naples; so that upon the sixteenth of July 1381 about eleven of the Clock in the Forenoon he arrived with his whole Army at the Bridge of Sebeto without the Gate del Mercato, at the same time that the Prince arrived and encamped at Casa Nova without the Gate Capuana. These two Armies were encamped within Sight of one another; there were in Charles's Camp the Cardinal di Sangro Apollolick Legate, Count Alberico Captain General of the Pope's Troops, the Duke of Andria the Pope's Nephew, who took the Title of Prince of Capua, Giaunotto Protogiudice, who by his great Virtue and Experience in War had been made High Constable of the Kingdom by Charles, Roberto Ursino eldest Son of the Count of Nola, and many other Barons and Neapolitan Knights³ and other Soldiers of Fortune: There were not so many Barons in the Prince's Camp, but a great many private Neapolitan Gentlemen, and abundance of People of lower Rank, because the Queen would have those of greatest Credit to remain in Naples. The two Armies stood for the Space of three Hours, expecting one another's Motion; for Charles was then in suspense, not knowing the Inclinations of the People of Naples, whom it was not safe for him to attack, if they were still faithful to the Queen; but when he understood that the City was in the utmost Confusion, being divided into three different Factions, one of which was for him to be King, another cried out for the Pope, and the third sided with the Queen: Then Palamede Bozzuto, and Martuccio Ajes, two Napolitan Knights and Captains of Horse advanced with their Troops, and being guided by some of those who had come out of the City, they moved to the Sea-side, waded and entered the Gate della Conceria; for those within having trusted to its being washed by the Sea, it was neither lock'd, nor guarded; and from thence having marched to the Market-place, with a great Huzza they called aloud, God save King Charles of Durazzo and Pope Urban, and being followed by those who were on the Market-place, they easily beat off the Queen's Party, and forced them to retire to the Castle, while they opened the Gate del Mercato, at which Charles with all his Army entered, and having posted a strong Guard at that Gate, he marched to the Gate Capuana, where he also posted a good Guard, and sent another to that of S. Januario, while he with the rest of the Army took their Quarters at S. Clara; so that they could hinder the Enemy from entering by the Gates Donorob and Reale. Prince Orso having Advice that Charles's Cavalry were got into the City, marched with his Army to attack the Enemy's Rear-guard, but finding the Gates shut, he retired that same Evening to Sicciano a Village near Margliano.

THE next Day Charles laid Siege to Castel Nuovo, whither, besides the Duchess of Durazzo, with Robert of Artois her Husband, almost all the Ladies of the best Quality had flocked, who, because of their sincere Affection for the Queen, were afraid of being ill us'd; there were likewise there a vast Number of Noblemen with their Families, which occasioned so sudden Destruction; for the Queen, partly out of the Mildness of her Disposition, and partly because she hop'd, that the Gallies of Provence would quickly arrive, received and fed them all with the Provisions of the Castle, which perhaps would have been sufficient for the Garrison for six Months, but were consumed in one. The Prince, who during this Siege left no Means unattempted for relieving the Queen, returned to the Marshes of Naples, thinking that Charles would come out and fight him; but his Officers would not let him stir, because it was more for his purpose, that the Body of the Army should guard the City, and keep the Castle close block'd up, whither they knew so many People had retired, that in a short time they would be reduced to Famine, and forced to surrender; so that the Prince finding that all his Endeavours were to no purpose, retired to Aversa.

IN the mean time the Queen began to be in want of Provisions, and she had no other Hopes, but in the coming of the Gallies, with which she not only designed to make her escape, but to go in Person to persuade the King of France and Pope Clement to give her powerful Assistance, in order to return with her adopted Son, and drive out the Enemy. But the Gallies not appearing, and the Castle being reduced to great Straits for want of Provisions, on the twentieth of August the Queen sent Ugo Sanseverino Great Protonotary of the Kingdom to capitulate with King Charles, and to treat about a Truce, or some sort of Agreement. The King, who grounded all his Hopes upon the Queen's Necessities, though he gave Sanseverino an honourable Reception, because he was his Kinsman, yet he would give no longer delay than five Days, during which time, if the Prince did not come to relieve the Castle, and raise the Siege, the Queen must deliver herself up into his Hands; and Sanseverino being returned with these Conditions, Charles sent after him some Servants with a Present to the Queen of some Fowl, Fruit, and other Eatables, and ordered daily to be sent whatever she should think fit to command for her own Table, thereby thinking to induce her to surrender the more patiently, and with the greater Confidence; but what is more he sent to visit her, and to excuse himself, that he had sincerely esteemed her as Queen, and would continue to do so, and respect her; that he would not have taken the Kingdom by force of Arms, but would have waited till it had fallen to him by Succession, if he had not seen that the Prince her Husband, besides his having fortified so many important Cities of the Principality of Taranto, kept up a powerful Army; whence it appeared very plain, that he would have been in a Condition to keep Possession of the Kingdom, and to deprive him the only Branch of the Race of King Charles I. and that therefore he was come more to secure himself against the Prince, than to turn her out of the Throne, in which he was rather resolv'd to maintain her. The Queen seem'd to thank him, but at the same time sent to hasten the Prince to come and relieve her within the five Days; the twenty fourth of the Month had pass'd, and the next Morning, which was the last Day of the five, the Prince with all his Army march'd by the way of Piedigrotta, and when he had pass'd Echia, he began to beat down the Barricadœ made by King Charles, in order to send a Relief of Men and Provisions into the Castle; but King Charles march'd immediately and met him with his Army in order, and the Signal for Battel being given on both Sides, they fought with so much Bravery, that for a great while the Victory was doubtful; at last the Prince, who could not bear to be disappointed in his Hopes of such a Kingdom, rush'd forward towards King Charles's Royal Standard with so much Boldness, that none durst follow him; so that being surrounded with the best of the Enemy's Cavalry he was forced to surrender, and by his being made Prisoner his Army was routed. The next Day the Queen sent Ugo Sanseverino to surrender, and to beg of the Conqueror to take those who were in the Castle with her under his Protection. The same Day the King with his Guard and Sanseverino enter'd the Castle, and saluted the Queen, assuring her that he would perform whatever he had promis'd, and would have her to remain in an Apartment of the Castle, not as Prisoner, but as Queen, and to be serv'd by the same Servants as formerly.

THE Month being ended, on the first of September the ten Provensal Gallies under the Command of the Count of Caserta appear'd, in order to take the Queen and conduct her to France. King Charles went to visit the Queen, and to beg of her, that since she knew his Intention, she would be pleas'd to do him the Favour to make him her universal Heir, and likewise after her Death to yield to him her Dominions in France, and to send and order those Provensals that were in the Gallies to come ashore, as Friends; but the Queen suspecting that this smooth Behaviour was nothing but Artifice, and likewise calling to mind the Compact she had made with the King of France, by adopting Lewis Duke of Anjou his second Son, she also had a Mind to dissemble, and said, That if he would send a safe Conduct to the Captains of the Gallies, she would speak to them, and endeavour to persuade them to own their Subjection to him; the King immediately sent the safe Conduct, and being deceiv'd by the Queen's Countenance, who seem'd willing to please him, he allow'd the Provensals to enter her Chamber, without being present himself, or any Person for him. As soon as they were enter'd the Queen spok to them thus:

“ Both the Behaviour of my Ancestors, and the sacred Tie under which the County “ of Provence was to my Crown, required greater Dispatch than you have made “ in coming to relieve me, who, after having suffer'd all those Hardships, which “ are not only grievous to Women, but to the most robust Soldiers, even to the “ eating of the filthy Flesh of unclean Animals, have been forc'd to deliver my self “ up into the Hands of a most cruel Enemy; but if this, as I believe, has been “ through Negligence, and not out of any ill Intention, I conjure you, if there “ be remaining in you the least Spark of Affection towards me, or the smallest Re“ membrance of your Oaths, and of the Favours you have receiv'd from me, that
 “ by no Means you ever accept of this ungrateful Robber for your Lord, who
 “ from a Queen has made me a Slave; and even if ever any Writing shall be men“ tion'd to you, or shewn you, whereby I may have appointed him my Heir, don't “ believe it, but look upon it as forg'd, or extorted from me against my Inclinati“ on; because my Will is, that you should have the Duke of Anjou for your Lord,
 “ not only in the County of Provence, and my other Dominions beyond the Moun“ tains, but likewise in this Kingdom, to all which I have already appointed him “ Heir, and to be my Champion, in order to revenge this Treason and Violence; “ go then and obey him, and if you are not void of all Sense of Gratitude for the “ Love I have shew'd your Nation, and of Pity for a Queen under such Calamity,
 “ you will go and take Revenge with your Arms, and pray to God for my Soul;
 “ and I not only advise you to do so, but as you are as yet my Subjects, I command
 “ you.” The Provensals with sad Lamentation excus'd themselves, and appear'd most sensibly affected with her Captivity, and promis'd to do what she had order'd them, and then return'd aboard of their Gallies, and set sail for Provence, where they were no sooner arriv'd, than the Count of Caserta went directly to wait upon the Duke of Anjou. King Charles being return'd to the Queen to know what Answer the Provençals had given, and finding that it was not to his Mind, he began to take another Course, by placing Guards about the Queen, and keeping her as Prisoner, and in a few Days after he lent her to the Castle of the City of Muro in the Basilicata, which was his own Patrimony; and Prince Otho was sent to the Castle of Altamura, and after the City of Naples and all the Barons had sworn Allegiance to the King in the Archbishop's Palace, he took the Oath of Homage to the Apostolick See from the Hands of the Cardinal di Sangro the Legate. Then he wrote to the King of Hungary, giving him an Account of all that had pass'd, and ask'd how he should dispose of Jean; and it was answered, That she ought to be treated after the same manner as the late King Andrew had been; which, as a notable Instance of the greatest Cruelty, the Year following 1382 was put in execution¹, he having caused her to be smother'd with a Bolster in the Castle of *Muro*², and ordered her Body to be brought to Naples, and to be kept seven Days unburied in the Church of S. Clara, in order to be seen by every Body, and to put her Partizans out of all Hopes; then she was buried in a Place between the Sepulchre of the Duke her Father, and the Door of the Vestry without any Pomp, under a fine Tomb, which is to be seen at this Day.

SUCH was the End of Queen Jean I. a most excellent Lady, who, being brought up under the Tuition of King Robert, and of the virtuous and prudent Queen Sancia, govern'd the Kingdom in time of Peace with so much Prudence and Justice, that she acquired the Name of the wisest Queen that ever sat upon a Throne, as is clearly evinc'd by the few Laws she left, all of them fram'd for restoring the antient Discipline both in the Tribunals and Magistracy; and by the Testimony of two famous Lawyers who flourish'd in her Time, viz. Baldo, and Angelo da Perugia, who in their Works highly commend her. And though then by the Vulgar, and afterwards by some Writers she had been charged with having had a Hand in the Death of Andrew her first Husband; nevertheless from the many Proofs which she gave of her Innocence, the best and wisest Men of those Times look'd upon her to be altogether innocent; and the Character which Angelo gives her in his *Adversus*³, is a most convincing Argument of it, wherein he calls her, Most Pious, an Ornament to the World, and the Glory of Italy; which Epithet, as Costanzo very justly observes⁴, so famous and excellent a Doctor would have been very loth to have given her, if at that time the most judicious Men had not believ'd her to be innocent; since, if he had spoken it by way of Antiphrasis, every body would have taken it for Banter. But excepting this Blemish, with which those Writers pretended to stain her Reputation, in all the rest of her Life it was never known that she was guilty of any dishonourable or unchaste Action. Besides Collenuccio, Scipione Ammirato says⁵, That her marrying so many Husbands proceeded more from a Desire of leaving a Successor of her own Body, than of living under the sacred Tie of Matrimony, she being accustomed to satisfy her Lust another Way. But the grave and discreet Costanzo, as if he had a Mind to rebuke him, writes, That her taking so many Husbands was rather a Token of her Chastity; because those Women who resolve to satiate their Lusts, desire no Husbands, as being Obstacles to their Designs, and especially such as she took, who, except Andrew, were most gallant and prudent Men. All the time that she reign'd it was never known that ever she had any Courtier or Baron, on whom she bestow'd such extraordinary Favours, as to make her be suspected of lewd Conversation. Only Boccaccio writes, That in her Youth, and the beginning of her Reign, the Son of Filippa Catanse the Nurse of her Father the Duke of Calabria, and who had brought her up from the Cradle, was very much in her good Graces; but it is very surprising, that during all the rest of her Life, after she began to reign, she should be able to manage so artfully, that though she was daily conversing familiarly with Barons, Officers of her Army, Counsellors, and other Ministers, yet with such an unblemish'd Character, that her greatest Enemies could never see any thing wherewithal to reproach her, though Men are apt to put the worst Construction upon every thing, and to question all sincere Virtue. Neither does Collenuccio tell Truth, not only in charging the Queen with Incontinence, but likewise Mary Duchess of Durazzo her Sister, for whom he fancied that Boccaccio wrote those two Books, Il Filocolo, and La Fiammetta, and that her Head was struck off by King Charles; whereas Mary, as may be seen upon her Tomb in S. Clara, died some Years before, Wife of Philip Prince of Taranto; and it was not for her that Boccaccio wrote the Filocolo, but for Mary, the Bastard Daughter of King Robert, with whom he fell in Love in the Church of S. Lorenzo, as is evident from the beginning of the said Book; neither could it be this Mary Duchess of Durazzo, because Boccaccio was well advanced in Years, when she was in the Flower of her Age.

JOAN, according to the Character given her by Angelo da Perugia, was very religious; and the Monuments, which she has left us in Naples, are Proofs of her great Piety and Devotion. She built the Church and Hospital of S. Maria Coronata, where formerly a Court of Justice was held, and put them under the Direction of the Carthusian Monks; she built the Church and Hospital of S. Antonio di Vienna without the Gate Capuana, and endowed them with great Revenues; and she beautified and enlarged the Church and Monastery of S. Martin upon the Mount of S. Eramo.

THERE are some Writers who have blam'd her for having favoured the Schism against Urban VI. and adher'd to Clement. But if she committed any Error in that, it was not with regard to Religion, but to Policy, for her having thus so highly enrag'd Urban, and made him her implacable Enemy, was her utter Ruin. Her not having acknowledged him for true Pope, was not an Error in her alone, but in almost the half of Europe, which did not own him as such. His Election was look'd upon to be void and null by the most knowing Divines, as proceeding from Fear, and the Violence made use of by the People of Rome against the Cardinals in the Conclave.

AND though our Lawyer Baldo being in Tuscany, where Urban was acknowledged, and soon after this Election, having been desired, wrote his famous Consultation about the Validity of the Election; nevertheless the best Divines of France look'd upon Clement's Election to be valid, and that of Urban's null; and the greatest part of the French Writers were of the same Opinion: And in our time Stefano Baluzio in his Notes upon the Lives of the Popes of *Avignon*¹ maintains Clement's Cause against Urban; and retorting the Argument upon the Italian Writers, he brings the same against Pope Urban of Rome, that they had written against the Popes of Avignon; that Urban was a sham Pope, a Liar, Cruel, Proud, Inexorable, and Furious, and that he never would refer the Case of his Election to the Decision of a general Council². *Froffard*³, a famous Writer of the Affairs of France, tho' he ought not to be followed in what he writes concerning our Kingdom, as being a Stranger, and not well inform'd of the Affairs thereof, says, That the King of France having been advis'd of Pope Clement's Election, caus'd immediately the Estates of the Kingdom to be summon'd, and especially the Divines, in this Contrariety of Opinion to examine which of the two Popes was to be obey'd: The Matter was long debated, and at last the King's Brothers, the Peers, the Ecclesiasticks, and a great Number of Divines determined, that they ought to acknowledge Clement, and not Urban, as being elected by Force. The King was pleas'd with the Decision, which was publish'd, and dispers'd over all the Kingdom of France, that the People might know which of the two Popes they ought to acknowledge for the lawful one. Though Spain at first acknowledg'd Urban, yet being inform'd of the Violence made use of in the Election, afterwards acknowledg'd Clement for the true Pope⁴. The Count of Savoy, the Duke of Milan, and the Scots did the same; and the Province of Hainault in Flanders would neither acknowledge the one nor the other. Therefore what we have said in the eleventh Book of this History concerning the other famous Schism in the Reign of King Roger between Innocent II. and Adrian happens to be to the Purpose; and likewise what *S. Antoninus*⁵ Archbishop of Florence lays down for a Rule in the like doubtful Cases, who does not impute it as an Error in S. Vincenzo Ferreri his having sided with Benedict XIII. Clement's Successor. And Niccolo Tedesco, commonly call'd *Abbas Panormitanus*⁶, the Cardinal *Zabarella*⁷, and Cardinal *Gaetano*⁸ likewise maintained, that those who acknowledged Clement ought not to be reputed Schismaticks; and lastly, *Baluzio*¹ and *Lewis Maimburg*², against Odorico Rainaldo, make it appear, that as Men of the best Judgment did not take upon them to call Urban a false Pope, so neither did they use to call Clement an Antipope.

JOAN, with regard to Justice, was like her Father the Duke of Calabria; for, as far as the troublesome Times she lived in would bear, she took care to have severe and uncorrupted Magistrates, by chusing Men of the greatest Learning and Integrity that flourish'd in her Age; and in doubtful Cases of Law, and of Succession to Fiefs among the Barons, besides the Advice of her own best Lawyers, she likewise consulted the most famous foreign Lawyers that flourished at that time in Italy; of which we have a most clear Instance, when after the Death of Andrea d'Isernia, there having arisen a Doubt about feudal Succession with respect to uterine Brothers, the Queen sent to advise the Case with those two famous Lawyers, who flourished then in Italy, Baldo and Angelo, requiring them to give their real Opinions; to which they gave their Answer, which we read among Angelo's Consultations³. She was a great Lover of Men of Letters, and especially had the Lawyers and Universities much at Heart. She bestowed Honours and Pensions upon all those, who in the latter end of the Reign of her Grandfather King Robert had begun to flourish, and who in her own, though troublesome Reign, had advanced in Learning; among the rest she rais'd Niccolo Spincilo di Napoli; for besides giving him the County of Gioja, she made him High Chancellor of the Kingdom, and Steward of Provence, and employed him in the most weighty Affairs of State, such as Embassies, and Matters of the greatest Confidence. And she was so prudent and discreet in bestowing her Favours, that she was wont to say, that those Princes did ill, who taking into Favour and enriching some, left all the rest to pine away in Misery, and that Rewards and Benefits ought rather to be given moderately to many, than profusely to a few.

SHE was very careful to keep Naples well stored not only with things necessary for Life, but likewise for the Splendor and Ornament of the City. And in order thereto she encourag'd Merchants from all Nations to come thither with their Commodities; and in whatever Straits she was in, she never laid any heavy Duties upon them, as is usual for Kings, who are oppress'd by Invasions and Wars. There are still lasting Monuments of the Care she took, that Strangers in her time should be well us'd, and not be disturb'd; for which end she appointed the French and Catalan Streets, that these Nations being separated they might be the more quiet. She made between Casfel Nuovo and that of Uovo, a Street for the Provensals, which is now demolish'd, and where the Royal Palace is built; and she built a Piazza for the Genese, where now nothing but the Name remains. She was very moderate in her Table, and of a Beauty, which rather express'd Majesty than Wantonness and Effeminacy; and in fine, she spoke with such an agreeable Air, was so prudent in all her Proceedings, and so grave in all her Actions, that she seem'd truly to inherit the Spirit of the great Robert her Grandfather.

CHARLES III. by the Defeat of Prince Otho, and by his and the Queen's Imprisonment, being fixed in the Throne, all the Barons sent immediately to do him Homage, excepting the Counts of Fondi, Ariano, and Caserta, who were firmly resolved to adhere to the Queen; but Charles little regarding them, set about purging the Kingdom, by turning out of it all the foreign Soldiers that had served under the Queen; then in order to regulate the Affairs of Justice, he sent Governors and proper Officers to all the Provinces and Cities of the Realm. The Count of Nola Orsino being at this time a great Favourite, persuaded the King to call a Parliament against the Month of April following 1382, in order to obtain a free Gift; and the King, who well knew that it was necessary to make some Provision, since he foresaw that the Duke of Anjou having been adopted by the Queen would not readily give up his Right, sent Letters summoning all the Barons to Parliament; and to make his Court to Pope Urban, he caus'd Gerardo de Gifoni, created a Cardinal by Clement, to be made Prisoner, and carried to S. Clara, where having publickly made him to be stripped of the Cardinal's Habit, and the Hat being taken off his Head, they were all thrown into a Fire, which for that purpose had been lighted in the middle of the Church; he likewise made him abjure, and with the Tongue confess, that Clement was a false Pope, and himself an unlawful Cardinal, and then ordered him to be put in Prison, to be disposed of as Pope Urban should think fit¹.

IN November following, his Wife Margaret, with her two Children Joan and Ladislaus arriv'd, and on the Feast of S. Katherine with great Pomp she was anointed and crowned, and according to Custom led through the City under a Canopy. And in order to smother the hidden Grief, which, on account of the Queen's Death, was spread over all Naples, great Feasts and Tournaments were made for many Days, at which the King performed with great Applause; then in Imitation of King Lewis of Taranto, he instituted a new Order of Knights, which he call'd the Society of the Ship; alluding to the Ship of the Argonauts, that the Knights, whom he advanced to that Order, might rival the Argonauts in Valour.

NOW came the Day appointed for the meeting of the Parliament, on which all the Barons being met in Naples, the Count of Nola, a Man of great Authority, not only on account of his Age and Nobility, but likewise the great Valour of Roberto and Raimondo his Sons, proposed that every Baron and City subject to the Crown should supply the King with a good Sum of Money, and to give a good Example to others, he tax'd himself in ten thousand Duckets; and because it was dangerous to appear refractory, the King having his Army still about him, there was not a Baron that refus'd to tax himself, insomuch that the Sum amounted to thirty thousand Florins; and after the Parliament was over, all the Barons took leave of the King, each of them promising to send their Quota; and with this free Gift, and the Pope's Friendship it appear'd, that King Charles might be able to fix himself in the Kingdom, and not be afraid of the Invasion, which was now daily approaching.

CHAP. I.

The Ground of the Quarrel between Pope Urban and King Charles. Lewis I. of Anjou invades the Kingdom, and his Death. Charles besieges Urban in Nocera, who, with the Assistance of the Genoese, Ramondello Orsino, and Tommaso Sanseverino, makes his escape, and flies to Rome.

AFTER Pope Urban saw that King Charles was established in the Kingdom, and that he delayed to make good the Agreement made between them, when he gave him the Investiture, he was out of all Patience; insomuch, that he sent him a Brief, entreating him, that since he was now in Possession of the Kingdom, to put Buttillo in Possession of the Principality of Capua, and of the other Estates, which he had promised him; but the King by no Means could be persuaded to dismember the City of Capua from the Crown; and therefore in order to spin out the time he gave fair Words; whence began those Dissentions, which afterwards broke out into open War, to the great Detriment and Calamity of the Kingdom; for Urban seeing himself thus deluded, began to think of turning Charles likewise out of the Kingdom, and in order to have a strong Party, he made a new Creation of Cardinals, among which he promoted Pietro Tomacello di Napolione.

BUT while these things were transacting in Italy, Lewis Duke of Anjou, without any Obstacle made himself Master of the County of Provence, in which he was favoured by the Provençals, who, in obedience to Queen Joan's Commands, would acknowledge no other for their Sovereign but Lewis, who was likewise favoured by Clement, by confirming the Adoption, investing him with the Kingdom, and causing him to be proclaimed King of Naples in Avignon; and besides, he furnished Lewis with a good Sum of Money, which he hoped would enable him not only to make himself Master of Naples, but of all Italy. As soon as this was known in the Kingdom, many Barons that had taxed themselves in Parliament, not only did not send their Quota's, but besides resolved to set up the Duke of Anjou's Standard; and among these were Lallo Campanesco in Abruzzo, and Niccolo d'Eugenio Count of Lecce in Terra d'Otranto.

AT the same time Giacomo del Balzo the Son of the Duke of Andria, seeing that Otho Prince of Taranto was Prisoner, returned to the Kingdom, recovered all the Principality, and took to Wife Agnes Queen Margaret's Sister, and Widow of Cane della Scala Lord of Verona. This Alliance so much offended the Family of the Sanseverini, mortal Enemies of that of Balzo, that though they were akin to the King, they soon discovered themselves to be his Enemies; whereupon the King seeing that so many Barons in the greatest and most important Provinces of the Kingdom had revolted, and understanding that the Count of Caserta, who was then in France, kept a private Correspondence with many of them, he began to look about him; to this was added, that the Duke of Andria was displeas'd with the King, because he had expected, that immediately upon the Conquest of the Kingdom, he would have been entirely restored to the Possession of all his Estate as formerly, which the King had not done because of the Power of the Family of Marzano, which was in Possession of the Cities of Sessa and Teano. And lastly, while he was thus perplexed, there were some who began to make him jealous, that Giacomo del Balzo Prince of Taranto, who likewise intitled himself Emperor of Constantinople, had a Mind to make himself Master of the Kingdom, pretending that it belonged by right to Agnes his Wife Queen Joan's Niece, and elder than Queen Margaret. This Jealousy made so much the sooner Impression upon the King, because Pope Urban, naturally froward and turbulent, threatened to drive him out of the Kingdom, and it was probable he had pitched upon the Prince of Taranto as a fit Person for putting it in execution; and therefore the King in great Wrath, in order to secure himself against all those, who by any Claim might pretend to the Kingdom, caus'd the Dutcheß of Durazzo Queen Margaret's elder Sister to be imprisoned, and did what he could to have the Prince of Taranto likewise seiz'd, but he suspecting the King's Intention, fled in a Genoese Ship to Taranto, leaving his Wife in Naples, whom the King sent to Prison, and afterwards to the City of Muro.

IN the mean time Lewis of Anjou, having taken Possession of the County of Provence, and of the Queen's other Dominions beyond the Mountains, set out upon his Journey, and sent twelve Gallies before him to the Coast of the Kingdom, to encourage those of the Queen's Party, and to secure his own coming by Land. On the seventeenth of June 1383 these twelve Gallies appeared upon the Coast of Naples, and took Castello a Mare, and the Night following came unawares, and pillaged the Village of Carmelo, then they went to Ischia. King Charles seeing that so small a Fleet could do but little Hurt, made ready to go and meet King Lewis, who was coming by Land, and assembled his Troops to the Number of thirteen thousand Horse. But that Number was very small in Comparison of the vast Army of King Lewis, who, by the Connivance of Ramondaccio Caldora, who had the guarding of the Pass, entered the Kingdom; and his Army being joined by those Barons, who looking upon Charles's Troops as unable to stand their Ground, had gone over to King Lewis, was increased to thirty thousand Horse; therefore King Charles thought fit not to leave Naples.

THOSE who came from France with King Lewis were, the Count of Geneva Pope Clement's Brother, the Count of Savoy and his Brother, the Lord of Morlaix, Pier de la Couronne, the Lord of Monjoy, Count Henry of Britany, Bonjean Aimone, Count Beltran the German, and many other Ultramontans of less Note. Those of the Kingdom who went to meet him were, the High-Constable Tommaso Sanseverino, Ugo Sanseverino, the Count of Tricarico, the Count of Matera, Giovanni Luxemburgo Count of Conversano (though he was obliged to Charles for the Order Order of the Ship) the Count of Caserta, the Count of Cerreto, the Count of S. Agata, the Count of Altavilla, the Count of S. Angelo, and many other Barons and Captains¹. At last King Lewis, by the way of Benevento, having entered Terra di Lavoro (because Capua and Nola held out for King Charles) marched to Caserta, which had set up his Standard, and from thence sent and took Possession of Madaloni; but in the mean time the Forage and Provisions being consum'd, he was forced to march into Puglia; and though King Charles had endeavoured to stop his Passage, yet at last he led his Army safely into the Plains of Foggia.

KING Charles being disappointed in his Design, and hearing that Pope Urban had left Rome, and was on his way to Naples, lest that naturally proud and passionate Man should alienate the Neapolitans from him, he immediately set out for Naples, and by long Journeys arrived at the same time that the Pope came to Capua, whither he presently went to wait upon him, and came together to Aversa; they both dissembled with one another; but when they came to Naples, the King would not allow the Pope to lodge in the Archbishop's Palace, but under Colour of Friendship and good Manners conducted him to Castel Nuovo, where they discoursed of their Affairs; the Pope demanded of the King the Principality of Capua, with many adjacent Cities, such as Cajazzo and Caserta, which formerly belonged to the Principality; he likewise demanded the Dukedom of Amalfi, Nocera, Scafati, and a great Number of other Cities and Castles, and a yearly Pension of five thousand Florins to his Nephew Buttillo; and in return he promised to assist the King in the War, and to leave him the Kingdom in full Sovereignty, on the same Terms with which the Kings his Predecessors had held it. These Stipulations were agreed to, and adjusted to the great Joy of both Parties. The Pope obtained Liberty of the King to leave the Castle, and to lodge in the Archiepiscopal Palace, where he was received with great Pomp by the Archbishop Bozzuto, who had been restored to that See after the Queen's Disaster, whither the King and Queen went frequently to visit him, and by their Means two of the Pope's Nieces were married, the one to the Count of Monte Dirisi, and the other to Matteo di Celano, a great Lord in Abruzzo; and on the Eve of Christmas the Pope went down to the Church, and Vespers were sung with Pontifical Solemnity. At this very time there happened a great Tumult in Naples, for Buttillo Prince of Capua entered by force into a Monastery of Nuns, and ravished one of the most beautiful and noble of them, upon which the City was all in an Uproar; and the Magistrates having gone to complain to the King, he sent them to the Pope, to whom they made a grievous Complaint of this Outrage; but the Pope, though he was most severe in other things, was too indulgent and favourable to his own Relations; and he answered, that it was no great Matter, the Prince his Nephew had been spurred on by Youth: and Theodore de Nismes, who writes this, ridicules the Pope's excusing his Nephew on account of his Youth, who was at that time above forty Years of Age². The first Day of the new Year being come, and King Lewis's going on with Success in Puglia requiring Charles's Presence to make Head against him, the Pope said a solemn Mass, and declared King Lewis, whom he call'd Duke of Anjou, a Heretick, excommunicated, and accursed; and likewise published a Crusade against him, promising plenary Indulgence to whoever would take up Arms against him, and made King Charles Standard-bearer of the Church, and blessed the Standard, which the King held in his right hand during all the time of the Mass.

THEN Charles made ready for going to Puglia to drive out the Enemy, and ordered the Chancery to write to all the Feodatories to be in readiness; and as the Pope gave nothing but fair Promises and Indulgences, but no Money, he was forced to take from the Custom-house all the Cloth which was there belonging to the Florentines, Pisans, and Genoese, which he distributed partly to the common Soldiers, and partly to the Neapolitan Gentlemen, who had offered to follow him; and in April 1384 he set out for Puglia, and arrived at Barletta; and though King Lewis offered to come to a decisive Battel, King Charles, by the Advice of Prince Otho, who for that end had been taken out of Prison) would not accept of it, but the two Armies made several Skirmishes; so that Lewis seeing that he could not come to an Engagement retired to Bari, where he found Ramondello Ursino, to whom he gave in Marriage Maria d'Eugenio a very noble and rich Lady, who by the Right of her Father had succeeded to the County of Lecce.

WHILE these things passed in Terra di Bari, the Pope, out of all Patience with the tedious Promises of Charles, (who in effect was eluding what he had promised the Pope's Relations as much as he could) at last in great Wrath left Naples, and with all the Cardinals, his Relations, and Friends went to Nocera, which had already been freely given to Buttillo his Nephew, but not Capua, where the King had Garrisons in all the Forts. The Pope, as he was a passionate and proud Man, dropt some Words, which discovered his ill Intentions against the King; inso-much, that Charles was more afraid of him than of King Lewis, and he would certainly have been induced to leave the War of Puglia, if Lewis's Death, which on the seventh of October this Year 1384 happened very opportunely, had not freed him from that Trouble; for the French being left without a King, and in great Consternation, returned to France. Lewis of Anjou died in Bisceglia, a gallant and prudent Prince, who was the first Lewis of the House of Anjou, who reigned in a part of the Kingdom of Naples, though as to Name he was the second, with respect to King Lewis of Taranto, who was the first.

CHARLES then by the Death of so considerable an Enemy, being relieved from the War of Puglia, set out for Naples, where he arrived on the tenth of November, and with great Demonstrations of Joy was received by the Neapolitans; and after he had rested himself for some Days, he sent a solemn Embassy to the Pope in Nocera, to tell him, that he wanted to know the Reason of his leaving Naples, and at the same time to beg of him to return, because there were many things which required a Conference between them. The Pope, with his usual Stubbornness, answered, That if he wanted to confer with him, he ought to come to him, it being the Custom, that Kings should come to Popes, and not that Popes should go to Kings at their Pleasure; and he was so little Master of his Passion, that he could not forbear to bid the Ambassadors tell the King, that if he had a Mind to make him his Friend, he must immediately take off the Taxes which he had laid upon the Kingdom. The King having heard these things from the Ambassadors, answered, That he would have willingly gone to wait upon him, had he not been at the Head of a strong Army: That as for the new Taxes laid upon the Kingdom, it did not belong to the Pope to forbid them; let him meddle with the Priests, for the Kingdom was his own, which he had got by the force of Arms, and the right of his Wife; and that the Pope had given him nothing, but four Words written in the Investiture^r. The Pope replied, That the Kingdom belonged to the Church, and was given to him in Fief, with a Design that he should govern it with Moderation, and not to extort Money from his Subjects; and that therefore he and the College of Cardinals had Power to take it back again, and to give it to a more loyal and just Feudatory; which so incens'd the King, that he sent Count Alberico his High-Constable to besiege the Pope in the Castle of Nocera; which he did, because he was afraid, that if Pope Clement should happen to die in Avignon, Urban would be ready to confirm the Kingdom to the Sons of the deceas'd Duke of Anjou. The Pope seeing himself besieg'd, had recourse to his usual Weapons of Excommunications and Maledictions; he excommunicated King Charles, and thrice a Day from a Window, with the Sound of Bell and lighted Torches, he curs'd and excommunicated the King's Army, which was in his Sight. The five Cardinals that were with him, the chief of which was Cardinal Gentile di Sangro, seeing themselves in so great Danger, began to persuade him to be reconciled with the King, at least till he should be in Rome, because it was a very difficult Matter to withstand so powerful an Enemy, without any other Arms than the Sound of a Bell. Therefore, because they seem'd to be too desirous of a Pacification, and that a Cypher had been found, directed to one of the Cardinals, he became so suspicious of them, that he caus'd all the five to be seiz'd, and most cruelly tortured without respect of Persons, and Theodore de Nismes, who was present, and his Secretary, writes, That it was a comical thing to see the Pope walk up and down saying over his Beads, while the Cardinal di Sangro, a corpulent Man, was upon the Rack, and now and then stopping, and calling out, Tell me how the Conspiracy was carried on; at last, though none of them confess'd, he put them all five to Death. Collenuccio says, That there were seven Cardinals, and that when Urban made his Escape out of Nocera, in his Passage to Genoa, he caused five of them to be put in Sacks, and thrown into the Sea; and the other two being judicially convicted in Genoa, in Presence of the Clergy and People, he caused their Heads to be struck off with an Ax, and their Bodies to be dried in Ovens, and reduced to Powder, which was put into Bags; and when he travelled, he ordered these Bags, together with their red Hats to be carried before him upon Mules, in order to terrify those who might have a Design to murder him, or to conspire against him. Pantini makes the Number of Cardinals imprisoned and put to the Rack in Nocera to be six, viz. the Cardinal di Sangro, John Archbishop of Corfu, Lodovico Donati, a Venetian, Archbishop of Taranto, Adam, an Englishman, Bishop of London, and Eleazaro Bishop of Rieti: he will have it, that the first five were thrown into the Sea, and that at the Instance of Richard King of England the sixth was pardoned, but he makes no mention of the seventh.

POPE Urban seeing himself still more closely besieged, sent privately to Genoa to beg of that Republick to send him ten Galleys, which in a short time after were accordingly sent, and they appeared upon the Coast of Naples, but no body knew their Errand. At this time the Neapolitans, who were grievously offended at the Quarrel between the Pope and the King, went to beg of him, that he would be pleas'd to be reconciled to Urban, because the Result of such a Dissention could not fail to be a great Detriment both to his Crown and all the Kingdom; the King answered them, that he would always demean himself as an obedient Son both to the Pope and Holy Church; and as a Proof of it, he was willing to empower such Persons as the City of Naples should appoint, in his Name to make up all Differences with the Pope; and at last, though we have no Record of the Names of those deputed by the other Piazza's, yet we find that the Nobility of the Piazza of Nido sent Niccolo Caracciolo, according to Summonte, or, as Costanzo writes, Giovanni Carafa, and Giovanni Spinello di Napoli, in the Name of their Piazza to treat of a Peace between the King and the Pope. Mean while Urban, at the same time that he sent to Genoa for the Galleys, sent likewise to Puglia for Ramondello Ursino to come and force his Way through the Besiegers, and to conduct him aboard of the Galleys: Ramondello came, and with eight hundred choice Horse boldly made his Way in spite of Count Alberico's Army, and got safely into the Castle, where he was honour'd and thank'd by the Pope; and after he had known the Pope's Intention, finding that his Men were too few for carrying him in Safety through the Enemy, he persuaded him to send a Brief to Tommasino Sanseverino, to come, and with his Troops to set him at Liberty, and he offered to carry the Brief, and to conduct him. The Pope took his Advice, caused the Brief to be drawn up, and gave him above ten thousand Florins of Gold, and his Blessing. Ramondello departed in all haste, and at the end of thirteen Days returned with Sanseverino, and three thousand choice Horse, and by the Way of Materdomini entered the Castle, and having kissed the Pope's Foot, they mounted him a Horseback, and by the Way of Sanseverino and Gifoni conducted him to the County of Buccino, and from thence sent Orders for the Genoese Galleys to come to the Mouth of the River Sele, where the Pope embark'd. The Pope out of Gratitude gave to Ramondello the City of Benevento and the Barony of Flumari, consisting of eighteen Villages. Sanseverino return'd to Basilicata, and Ramondello to Puglia, and the Pope arrived safely at Civita Vecchia.

C H A P. II.

King Charles is invited to the Throne of Hungary, his Election, Coronation, and Death.

LEWIS King of Hungary, who came twice to the Kingdom of Naples in order to revenge the Death of his Brother Andrew, dying without Male Issue, the chief Men and Prelates of Hungary swore Allegiance to his eldest Daughter, an Infant, named *Mary*¹; and to shew that the Respect and Love they had had for the deceased King Lewis was intailed upon the Daughter, they made a Decree, that she should not be called Queen, but King Mary, and she was proclaimed so by all the People; but since her Mother Elizabeth, who was her Guardian and Tutorefs, governed every thing by the Direction of Nicholas Ban of Gara, (Ban in that Kingdom is a Title of Dignity, there being neither Princes, Dukes, nor Marquisses there) many other Barons out of Envy began to mutiny, and repent of their having sworn Fealty to King Mary; and the more, because they understood she was designed for Wife to Sigismund of Luxemburg, the Son of Charles IV. Emperor and King of Bohemia; and being acquainted with King Charles at the late King Lewis's Court, and in the Camp when he fought for that King against the Venetians, they judged him a proper Person to be their King, because of the Relation he had to the deceased King. Therefore they sent the Bishop of Zagrab Ambassador to invite and intreat him, that since their Kingdom wanted a warlike King, and not an Infant Queen, he would be pleased to come, and without the least Obstacle they would put the Crown of that most opulent Kingdom upon his Head. Queen Margaret no sooner heard the Ambassador's Message, foreseeing what afterwards happened, than she begg'd of her Husband by no means to accept the Offer; that he ought to be satisfied, that from a private Count God had been pleased to put him in Possession of this Kingdom, in which it would be more prudent to fix himself thoroughly, and drive out his Enemies, than to give them an Opportunity to drive her and her Children out, while he was robbing a poor Infant of her paternal Kingdom, at the Solicitation of a faithless and perjured People, who not having kept their Oaths to their Queen, the Daughter of so beloved and deserving a King, it was not to be expected that they would be faithful to him. On the other hand King Charles finding that Fortune had so favoured him, as to rid him of his two greatest Enemies, King Lewis being dead, and Pope Urban fled; and considering also, that King Lewis's Children were so young, that he would have time to take Possession of that Kingdom, without being in Danger of losing this: at last, on the fourth Day of September, he set out with a very small Retinue; for two Reasons, the one to shew the Hungarians that he was not come to take Possession of the Kingdom by Force of Arms, but only with their Consent; and the other, that he might leave his own Party the stronger against that of King Lewis: and having embark'd at Barletta, with a prosperous Voyage he arrived in six Days at Zagrab, where the Bishop entertained him with great Magnificence, and he staid there some Days, in order to give notice of his coming to the other Barons that were in the Plot, that they might the more openly, and without Regard, act against the Queen; and by Letters to several of his Friends, who still continued loyal to the Queen, he endeavoured to strengthen his Party, not only by promising to free them, but all the Kingdom from Taxes, and to grant them new Privileges, and an Indemnity to all that were in Exile. And by these Arts in a few Days he found he had gain'd Ground so much, that without any Trouble he might go and be crown'd King, because it seem'd as if none had continued faithful to the Queen but the Ban of Gara; so that he set out for Buda.

THE old Queen Elizabeth and King Mary, being well apprized of all these Transactions, very prudently in all haste sent for Sigismund, and solemniz'd the Marriage between him and Mary, lest King Charles, in order to facilitate his Possession of the Kingdom, should give out every where, that he was not come to dispossess King Mary, but to marry her to his Son Ladislaus Duke of Calabria, by which means he certainly would have drawn in all the rest of King Mary's secret Friends, who hating Sigismund the Bohemian, would have been contented with him; but after the Marriage had been consummated, Sigismund understanding that King Charles was advancing, in great haste went to Bohemia.

THE News of this Marriage was very shocking to King Charles, because he judged, that the Emperor Charles IV. Sigismund's Father, would never suffer his Son with his Wife to be turn'd out of their Kingdom, but would rather endeavour to drive him out; but the two Queens, after Sigismund was gone, very artfully dissembling, sent to ask King Charles whether he came as a Relation or an Enemy; because if he came as a Relation, they would pay him all the Respect due to him, in going to meet him, and receive him with all Demonstrations of Kindness; if as an Enemy, which they did not believe, they would wait upon him, and, as two unfortunate and abandoned Women, beg of him to have some Regard for them, not on account of their Parentage, but because they had never offended him either in Word or Deed. King Charles dissembling, answer'd, that he was come as the Queen's Brother, because he had heard of the Trouble she was in, occasioned by the Dissentions of the Kingdom; and as he had a great Regard for the Memory of King Lewis his Benefactor, he had ventured to leave his own Kingdom in Danger, in order to come and quiet the Kingdom of Hungary, and reduce it to the Obedience of King Mary, and that therefore they might be both very easy; and flattering himself, that the Queens believed him, he went the more boldly to Buda, being likewise persuaded that the Emperor would give Credit to what he pretended; and therefore would not move at the Desire of the two Queens to disturb him in his Design. But the Queens, tho' they did not trust to this Answer, seeing they could not resist with open Force, resolved to fight him with his own Weapons; and seeming to be overjoy'd at the King's coming, as a Brother, they caused a great Feast to be prepar'd in the Castle, and with great Pomp went out to meet him, with so much Dissimulation, that not only King Charles, but all the Hungarians truly believ'd that they were caught in the Snare, and that this Reception was no less sincere than apparent: and therefore as soon as Charles saw them, he dismounted from his Horse, and embraced them; and when they had entered the City together, to shew his Modesty, he would not go to lodge in the Castle, but went to a private Palace in the City, till he should find an Opportunity to get himself proclaimed King. The Day following having gone to the Castle to visit the Queens, with the same Dissimulation, the mutual Marks of Affection and Gratitude were repeated; and thus in appearance they had trick'd one another; tho' both Parties were suspicious, and kept secret Spies upon one another's Actions.

NICHOLAS Ban of Gara, a most faithful Servant to both the Queens, sensible that he was the Occasion of all this Mischief, never left them, and took care that their Guard was made up of most trusty Men, that no Violence might be offered. On the other hand King Charles, who took upon him the Title of Governor of the Kingdom, was watching an Opportunity to seize it, and enter the Castle; and the two Queens were as much upon their Guard as possible. But this Guard of the Queens rather promoted than obstructed Charles's Interest; for as soon as the Commonalty observed that there was little Access to the Court, because the Guards gave Admittance but to very few; they had them in Contempt, for all Business was done in the Governor's House; and therefore those, who had invited King Charles, went about stirring up the People, by telling them that the Government of Kingdoms did not belong to Women, who are born to spin and sow; but to gallant and prudent Men, who in War and Peace are able to defend, enlarge, and govern subjected Nations; and with these and the like Speeches they made the People rise up in Arms; so that the frighted Queens were not only in Danger of losing the Kingdom, but likewise their Lives. Nevertheless some Bishops and Barons, real Favourers of King Charles, appear'd, and under pretence of quelling the Tumult, promised to the People to set about the King's Election; and the Tumult still continuing, King Charles pretended to be afraid of it, went to the Castle, and finding the Guards in a Consternation, he posted some Italians, that came along with him, in their Places, and then went up to the Queens, and bid them take Courage; and soon after returning to his Palace, he found that he had been proclaimed King by the Commonalty, which not only many Barons, but every body approv'd of, some by Words, and others by Silence, because those of King Mary's Party, for fear of the People, durst not make Opposition; whereupon Charles persuaded the Barons, Prelates, and People, to depute one to tell King Mary, that for the Good of the Kingdom, which could not be well governed by Women, they had elected a new King, and to order her to resign the Kingdom and the Crown, and not to withstand the general Voice of all the People.

UPON this Message the poor Queens were for some time astonished, but King Mary, soon recovering herself, boldly answer'd: I will never renounce my paternal Crown and Kingdom; as for you, pursue the Methods you have taken; as for me, tho' I be not able to withstand, I hope, that when I beg of you for the sake of Lewis my Father, you will allow me to go to my Husband in Bohemia, and not be so inhuman, after you have robbed me of my hereditary Kingdom, as to deprive me of my Liberty and Honour likewise: this I request of you as the last Duty of the Allegiance which you have sworn to me, and which you have so soon forgot. But Queen Elizabeth, in order to qualify her Daughter's Answer, which was more daring than the time requir'd, begg'd of him who brought the Message, to signify to the Lords of the Council, that since the Weakness of Women was such, that without much Thought or Advice they could not come to a Resolution in an Affair of so great Importance, they would be pleased to give her and her Daughter time to answer; and as soon as he was gone, they, with all the Men and Women of the Court, cried out so lamentably, that they were heard all over the City, where many conscientious and good Men were walking very much dejected, and dreading lest God by a Miracle would shew his Wrath against a Kingdom that had forgot so many Benefits receiv'd, and that suffer'd so great a Wickedness. But a new Message being sent to the Queens to demand the Crown and Scepter from them, Queen Elizabeth, seeing that to withstand was to bring their Lives in Danger also, very prudently advised her Daughter to yield, and quit the Castle, before the tumultuous Rabble should come and turn them out; assuring her, that God the Punisher of Wickedness would some Way or other relieve her; and putting her in mind of the Savageness of the Hungarians, who to day, when enraged, are most cruel and furious Creatures, and to morrow, when their Rage is spent, are as tame as Sheep; and as they think not of what they do, soon repent of what they have done: she therefore took the Crown, and went to wait upon King Charles, leaving her Daughter overwhelmed with Grief; and being receiv'd by Charles with great Respect she spoke to him thus: Since I see, that by reason of the rugged and cruel Nature of the Hungarians, 'tis impossible that the Kingdom of Hungary can be well governed by Women, and that 'tis the Desire of all the People to have my Daughter depriv'd of it, I have encouraged her, and by the Authority which I have over her as a Mother, have commanded her to yield to their Will and to Fate; and I am pleased that you, who are descended of the Race of King Charles, should have it rather than any other; and all I beg of you, is to let us depart the Kingdom freely. The King answered very courteously, that she might rest contented, that he look'd upon her as his Mother, and her Daughter as his Sister, and that he would comply with what they desir'd: and such was the Prudence and Constancy of this Woman, and she knew so well how to dissemble her own and her Daughter's inward Grief, that it was rumour'd abroad in the City, that they had willingly renounced the Kingdom in favour of King Charles their Relation; and King Charles himself was so far deceiv'd, that he sent to invite them to the Solemnity of his Coronation, which was to be perform'd in Alba Regalis; and the two Queens with admirable Cunning went along with him, as if they had been likewise to be Sharers in the Solemnity, and not led thither to their great Grief and Confusion.

THE Day of the Coronation being come, and King Charles placed in the Royal Chair, he was crowned by the Archbishop of Gran, whose Office it is to crown those whom the Barons, Prelates, and People chuse for Kings; and when he came to that Part of the Ceremony of turning about upon the Scaffold, to ask the Spectators three times, if they would have Charles for their King, the more he raised his Voice, he was answered with the fewer Consents and clapping of Hands; for truly none answer'd the third time, but those who had had a hand in Charles's coming; and without doubt the Presence of the two Queens mov'd the Compassion of the greatest Part of the Crowd, especially of those who were most sensible of the Obligations that the Kingdom lay under to the Memory of King Lewis; and an universal Regret immediately appeared among all those who had comply'd with King Charles's Adherents, and a Coldness among those very Adherents, which was increas'd by an Accident that happened, and was looked upon to be a very bad Omen: when the Coronation was over, as the King was returning home, the Person, who according to antient Custom was carrying before him the Standard of King Stephen, (who for his Virtue was canonized a Saint) not having taken care to port, or lower it, struck it against the Architrave of the Door of the Church, and the Wood being very old, and the Standard much decay'd, the one broke, and the other was torn to pieces: and afterwards, on the very same Day, there came so great a Tempest of Thunder and Wind, that the Tiles of the Houses flew in the Air, and many old Houses were blown down, and a vast Number of People kill'd; and to this was added another Prodigy, that an infinite Number of Ravens, with a terrible Noise, entered the Royal Palace, and were so very troublesome, that they could by no means be driven out; which created a general Consternation: of which King Charles being apprized, he made light of it, and said, that these were natural things; and to be afraid of them was effeminate.

THE two Queens being retired to the Castle, had no other Comfort but the good Offices of Nicholas Ban of Gara, who never left them, but most zealously served and encouraged them; and because they had already perceived the Repentance of the Hungarians, and the little Satisfaction they had shewn at the Coronation of King Charles, they began to take Courage; and King Mary and her Mother discoursing one Day with Nicholas about what Course was necessary to be taken for recovering the lost Dignity and Kingdom, Nicholas told them, that if they pleased he would do all he could to procure King Charles's Death. The two Queens caught greedily at these Words, and both of them answered at the same time, that there was nothing in the World they desir'd so much; and Nicholas taking upon himself to find out an Assassin, left it to them to contrive Means how to get Charles to come to their Apartment; and while he was contriving how to perform his Part, the Queens with their usual Dissimulation found Means to induce the King to come to their Apartment; for Queen Elizabeth said, that she would do her Endeavour to persuade Sigismund her Daughter's Husband to give up the Kingdom, as they had done, provided the King upon certain Conditions would send his Wife to him in Bohemia; and King Charles having heard what the Queen had said, with great Joy sent to thank her, and beg of her to bring the Treaty to a Conclusion; and that for his Part he was ready, not only to allow the young Queen to go to her Husband, but likewise to carry with her all the Royal Treasure, both hidden and publick. After some Days, Nicholas having found out a very bold and intrepid Man, named Brasius Torgas, who undertook to kill the King, conducted him to the Castle; and after he had posted a great Number of his Confidants with secret Arms, some of them within the Castle, and some without; the Queens sent to tell the King, that they had receiv'd Letters with joyful News from Sigismund, and the King, who desired nothing more, went immediately to wait upon them in their Chamber; and while they were shewing him the Letter, Nicholas entered under Pretence of inviting the King and the Queens to the Wedding of one of his Daughters, and with him entered Brasius, who immediately with an Hungarian Sword gave the King a Stroke on the Head, which cleft him to the Eyes. The King crying out fell to the Ground; and the Italians, who saw him down, and the Blood gushing out, took care to shift for themselves; and the Men that Nicholas had posted gathering together in an Instant, Brasius had no Difficulty in making his Escape, but with the bloody Sword went out of the Castle; and Nicholas finding that the King's Guard and the Italians were in a Consternation, without the least Opposition placed Guards upon the Castle, composed of Men all well affected to the Queens. As soon as the wounded King was carried to his Chamber, and there was no hopes of his Life, the Italians began to fly, and make their Escape by the Favour of some Hungarians of King Charles's Party; the Night following, upon the Noise of so remarkable markable an Event, not only the Inhabitants of Buda, but of the neighbouring Villages, assembled in vast Multitudes, and cried out, God bless Mary the Daughter of Lewis, God bless King Sigismund her Husband, and let the Tyrant Charles with all his traiterous Followers die: and with the same Fury they plundered all the Houses of the Italian Merchants in Buda. The two Queens overjoy'd, caused King Charles thus wounded to be carried to Vicegrad, under Pretence of doing him Honour, in sending him to be buried in the usual Burying-place of the Kings of Hungary; and there are some who say, that lest he should not have died of his Wound, they caused him to be poisoned and choaked, because they understood, that John Ban of Croatia, the Head of Charles's Party, with a great Number of stout Men, was coming to his Assistance. The King's Body was buried in S. Andrew's Church amongst the other Kings; but soon after there came an Order from Pope Urban to take him up, and remove him out of the Church, because he had died excommunicated, and a Rebel to Holy Church.

THIS was the end of King Charles III. of Durazzo, who might have proved an excellent Prince, if he had not given way to Ambition, but contented himself with the Possession of that Kingdom to which he had a specious Pretence. According to what Paris de Putens[†] writes of him, he was a most gallant Prince, and a Lover of learned Men, tho' few of them flourished in his troublefome and unsettled Reign; he was most affable and liberal to all Men; he was only blamed for his Cruelty and Ingratitude to Queen Joan and his Wife's Sisters; for which he had no other Excuse, but his Fear of Pretenders to the Kingdom. We have no Laws of his. He lived forty one Years, and reigned four in Naples, from August 1381, to the first Day of January 1386. By his Wife Margaret he left two Children, Joan, already a Woman, and Ladislaus, who was but ten Years of Age.

Ladislaus proclaimed King. A new Magistracy instituted in Naples. A War with King Lewis II. of Anjou, Ladislaus's Competitor.

HE dismal News of King Charles's Death at last came to Naples; and though Queen Margaret found Means for some time to keep it secret; yet hearing that it had reached Pope Urban in Rome, not able to conceal it any longer, she published it to the City; and, with great Demonstration of Grief, she ordered his Funeral Ceremonies to be solemnized: She was left a Widow at thirty eight Years of Age, and the tender Years of her Son affected her no less than the Fear of her Enemies. There were many that advised her to cause herself to be proclaimed Queen, seeing the Kingdom belonged to her as Queen Joan I.'s Niece. But those prevailed, who persuaded her to have her Son Ladislaus proclaimed King, lest the Pope should say, that Queen Joan could not transmit the Kingdom to her Heirs, she having been deprived of it in her Life-time by a Sentence, as a Schismatick. Therefore on the twenty fifth of February 1386, King Ladislaus, who was then little more than ten Years of Age, was proclaimed over all Naples; and the first thing the Queen did, was to send Antonio Dentile Ambassador to the Pope, in order to soften him, and humbly to beg of him, that after the Example of him, whose Vicar he

he was upon Earth, he would be pleased to forget the Offences of the Father, and to take the innocent Child under his Protection, and what Cities of the Kingdom for his Relations he should think fit. The Pope, partly out of Compassion, partly satisfied with King Charles's Death, and partly with a Design to have the Disposal of a good part of the Kingdom, contrary to his Nature, gave a most gracious Answer, and made Ramondello Orsino Standard-bearer of Holy Church, and by an Apostolical Brief sent him to command his Troops, and to espouse the Interest of King Ladislaus, and by the Bishop of Monopoli, his Nuncio, sent him twenty thousand Duckets, in order to levy Soldiers for augmenting his Army, which gave the Queen some Comfort.

BUT Margaret, little skilled in Government, especially at such a time, being told by her Ministers, that Money was the Sinews of War, whereby Kingdoms were best supported, careſ'd those Ministers most, who brought most Money into her Coffers, without minding whether they did it by just or unjust Means; nor would she give Ear to those who came to complain. Besides, she was so covetous and intent upon heaping up Money, that she suspected all those who came to advise her to the contrary, without considering whether they were Men of Credit, or well-affected to her Party. To this was likewise added, that finding she had made an ill choice of her first Officers, and afterwards making others upon the Recommendation of the first, these proposed none but Persons depending upon themselves, little regarding whether they were capable or not; so that the Doctors of the Law, and other wise and judicious Men lost all Hopes of having any Share in the Government, or other Offices; whence both the Citizens and Nobility daily suffered a thousand Injuries. Therefore the five Seggi, joining with the People, resolved to redress themselves, and created a new Magistracy, which was called the Magistracy of the Eight Lords of Good Government, who were to take care that the King's Ministers should do no Injustice. Those eight were Martucella dell' Averſana, for the Seggio Capuana, Andrea Carafa, for Nido, Juliano di Costanzo, for Portanova, Tucillo di Tera, and Pasio Boccatorio, for Montagna, all Noblemen; and for Porto, Giovanni di Dura, likewise a Nobleman, and Ottone Pisano, and Stefano Marsato Commoners, who with great Authority began to exercise the Magistracy, one of them going every Day to the Tribunals, to see that no Injustice was done to any Person: So that in a short time the Officers of Justice were more afraid of them, than the rest of the City were of those first Officers; and though the Queen and her supreme Council did their utmost to abolish this Magistracy, yet they never could bring it about, which made them dread the Loss of Naples, as in a short time happened.

NEVERTHELESS Queen Mary, Widow of Lewis I. and Mother of young King Lewis, being under the Protection of Pope Clement, went to him in Avignon to obtain the Investiture, and the Re-establishment of her Son in the Kingdom; and during his Minority she had declared herself his Governante and Guardian; but Clement as well as his Predecessors pretending that the Guardianship belonged to the Apostolick See, would not allow of it, till first a Way could be found out for removing that Difficulty; whereupon the Affair being concerted between the Cardinals and the Queen's Ministers, it was resolved that Queen Mary in a publick Consistory should ask the Guardianship from the Pope and Cardinals, which was done, and Clement gave his Assent; then the King and Queen took the Oath of Fealty, and did Homage; and the Pope invested Lewis with the Kingdom, by giving him the Standard as a Symbol of the Investiture, and in May 1385 sent him the Bull of it¹.

THE Anjou Faction acknowledging another Pope, and another King, and among the rest Tommaso Sanseverino the High-Constable, and Head of that Faction, and of his own Family, no sooner heard of the State of the City of Naples, than he usurped the Title of Viceroy for Lewis II. Duke of Anjou; and for the publick Good assembled a Parliament at Ascoli, in which were present all the Barons of that Faction; and after the Example of Naples, which had created Eight for the good Government of the City, in this Parliament six Deputies were elected for the Good Government of the Kingdom. These were the said Tommaso, Ottone, Prince of Taranto, Vincisio Sanseverino Count of Venosa, Niccolo di Sabrano Count of Ariano, Giovanni di Sanfronzondo Count of Cerreto, and Francesco della Ratta Count of Caserta. It was likewise concluded in Parliament, that all the Deputies with all their Followers should meet at Montefusco, and accordingly two Months after the Parliament was over, they all appeared, to the Number of four thousand Horse, and two thousand Foot, and made an Attempt upon Aversa; but not succeeding, they marched and encamped within two Miles of Naples, and sent Pietro della Mendolea into the City to sound the Eight Lords of good Government, and to endeavour to persuade them to deliver up the City to King Lewis II. of Anjou, Queen Joan I.'s Heir. The Eight answered, That they were resolved to continue faithful to King Ladislaus, and went immediately to the Queen, and offered to assist her in the Defence of the City. The Queen enraged, complained that all this Mischief was occasioned by their Government, and was upon the Point of sending them to Prison, but was dissuaded from it by the Duke of Seffa, who bid them take care to defend the City, because they should quickly see the Standard-Bearer of the Church who was in the County of Sora raising Men in order to its Relief. Pietro having been two Days in Naples returned to the Camp with the Answer of the Eight, and said, That it could not be long before there was some Revolution in Naples, because he had left the common People ready to mutiny, and the Masters of the Villages complaining that they could not get out to their Vintage. What Pietro had prophesied came to pass, for the Camp continuing where it was, the Peasants were always running to tell their Masters what Damage the Soldiers did to their Vineyards; so that on the twentieth of September some Citizens went to S. Lorenzo to speak with the Eight, and to sollicite a Redress: These gave them fair Words, and hopes that in a short time they should see the Standard-Bearer with the Pope's Army come to their Relief; but the meaner sort of People, who at this Season were wont to go to the Villages to bring Grapes and other Fruits, seeing themselves deprived of that Liberty, at a time when they stood most in need, rose up in Arms, and in great Fury went to S. Lorenzo; and if they had not been prevented by many Noblemen and Gentlemen who ran to the Assistance of the Eight, and by the Interposition of some old Gentlemen and Citizens of Credit, they would not have stuck at any Mischief. The old Gentlemen and Citizens, positing themselves between the Mob and the Nobility, began to treat with the Eight about Means for quelling the Tumult, and at last the Eight, lest the Mob should open the Gate del Mercato to the Deputies of the Kingdom, were content to make a Truce, that the Citizens might go out to their Villages, and that thirty at a time of the Soldiers of the Army of the Deputies might enter the City, for what they wanted.

THE Queen, who out of Hatred to the Eight had been mightily pleased with this Tumult, in hopes that the Mob would have torn them to pieces, was grievously vexed when she heard that a Truce was concluded, whereby all her Council said, that Naples was inevitably lost; whereupon, in order to apply some Remedy, she got the Archbishop Niccolo Zanasio, who had succeeded *Bozzuto*¹, the Abbot of S. Severino, and some others of the Clergy to ride through the City, stirring up the Commonalty again, by telling them, that it was a Shame that so Christian a People, and so much beloved by Urban the true Pope, should suffer the Soldiers of the Schismatical Antipope to resort to Naples; and while they were thus haranguing up the People, some of the Nobles of Portanova began to rebuke them, by telling them, That it was not the Duty of good Pastors to go about to raise Sedition and Dissention, and especially among a People, who if once let loose, it would be a difficult Matter to quell them again; and the Archbishop and those that were with him, trusting to their sacred Functions, and answering very haughtily, some of them were pretty roughly handled, and soundly beaten. But two Days after, Advice being brought to the Queen that Ramondello was coming with a good Body of Men, the Queen's Ministers, with all those of the Durazzo Faction, without regarding the Eight, under pretence of driving out the Soldiers that had come into the City, rose up in Arms, and assaulted the Houses of some Gentlemen, who were thought to be Well-wishers to the Anjou Faction, who likewise arming themselves began to make a stout Defence; the Eight sent immediately to order both Parties to lay down their Arms, which Order, and the Night coming on, ended the Fray. But Advice being brought the next Morning that Ramondello was at Capua, the Eight, and those of the Anjou Faction afraid of being overpowered, sent to desire Tommaso Sanseverino to move his Camp nearer the City, which accordingly he did that Evening. At the same time arrived from Provence two Gallies sent by King Lewis with twenty five thousand Duckets for paying the Army, which Queen Margaret hearing, she left Castel Nuovo, whither she had retired, and seeing her Son's Affairs in a desperate State went to Gaeta, which had still been faithful to her and her Son, where she remained during all the time of this War, which lasted thirteen Years. But the next Morning after Sanseverino had moved his Camp, Ramondello arrived, and in a hostile manner entered the City at the Gate Capuana, which had been quickly opened to him, (for the City had hitherto been faithful to King Ladislaus) and cried out, God bless Pope Urban, and King Ladislaus. The Eight, with the greatest part of the Nobility, were under Arms at Nido, crying out, God bless King Ladislaus, and the Good Government. But Ramondello no sooner came to Nido than he attacked them, made a great Slaughter, and drove them to the Rails of S. Clara; then those of Portanova and Porto, who were of the Anjou Faction, went and opened the Gate Petrucchia, at which the Army of the Deputies entered, one part of which attacked Ramondello, crying out, God bless King Lewis and Pope Clement. Ramondello's Men giving way, obliged him to retire to Nola, so that Tommaso Sanseverino became entirely Master of the City, and being victorious, at the Desire of the Eight, by publick Proclamation he forbid any Violence to be offered to the Houses of the contrary Faction; and the Day following having given a safe Conduct to all, in the Church of S. Clara he made them swear Allegiance to King Lewis II. and caus'd himself to be proclaimed his Viceroy, and leaving a few Soldiers in the City, he distributed the rest among the Villages.

AFTER Tommaso Sanseverino had thus made himself Master of the City of Naples, considering that he could not hold it long against foreign Force, he proposed in a Parliament of the Barons, and many noble and powerful Neapolitans of the Anjou Faction, that the Baronage and the City should send to King Lewis and Pope Clement to acquaint them, that they had been brought to their Obedience rather by Affection than Force, and that of Necessity they must send powerful Assistance not only to protect the Anjou Party, but entirely to crush the Queen's and Pope Urban's Faction, against which with the Forces of the Kingdom they could not long stand their Ground. It was immediately resolved that they should send, and accordingly Ambassadors were appointed, who with a prosperous Gale arrived at Marseilles, where they found Lewis, saluted him King, and were most courteously received; then they pressed him either to go to Naples, where he was most impatiently expected, or to send a Supply of Men and Money. The Ambassadors, after they had been some Days in Marseilles, at last finding that Lewis was an indolent Prince, and not so well provided of Money, as to be able to send powerful and speedy Succours, went to Avignon to wait upon Pope Clement, by whom they understood that they would be more readily supplied, in order to crush Pope Urban's Faction. Clement was overjoyed at the arrival of the Ambassadors, and highly delighted when they told him, that Urban's Faction in the Kingdom was very inconsiderable, which in a short time they hoped to reduce to his Obedience; and in a publick Consistory after he had highly commended the Barons and the City of Naples, who knowing the Justice of his Cause, had shaken off all Obedience to the Schismatical Pope (such he called Urban) and had submitted to him, the true and lawful Pope; and who being mindful of the Benefits received from good Queen Joan, had chosen to adhere to King Lewis her lawful Heir, by turning out the Son of the Tyrant and Usurper, who with so much Ingratitude had deprived her of her Kingdom and Life, he promised powerful and speedy Assistance, and in a few Days to crown King Lewis, and with a great Army send him to Naples.

ALTHOUGH the Ambassadors had seen with what Eagerness the Pope had spoken, yet having received Letters giving them to understand that the Commonalty of Naples would ill bear the Inconveniencies of a Siege; and that Pope Urban and Queen Margaret were preparing to besiege the City both by Sea and Land, they thank'd the Pope for the Assistance he had promised, and entreated him to send it as soon as possible; and the Pope assuring them that there was nothing in the World he had more at Heart, and having given some of them Mandates for Benefices to their Relations, they departed very well satisfied. They arrived in Naples about the end of the Year, and the Account they gave of the great Preparations that were making both at Marseilles and Genoa, and of the Bounty, Mildness and Affability of King Lewis, with Pope Clement's Forwardness to assist them, so rejoiced the Neapolitans, that they all looked upon the War as already over.

WHILE these things were transacting in Provence, Ramondello Ursino and Queen Margaret were using their utmost Endeavours to hinder all Provisions from coming into Naples, in order to starve it, and oblige the Citizens to surrender; but by the Vigilance of Sanseverino, the City was delivered from the Terror of a Famine; and some Provensale Gallies sent by Pope Clement arriving with thirty thousand Crowns of Gold for paying the Army, and the City being furnished with Provisions, the Queen despaired of taking it by Famine, and returned to Gaeta. A few Days after the Queen's Departure the Provensale Fleet arrived at Naples, and in it came my Lord Monjoy with the Title of Viceroy and Captain General, which revived the Neapolitans, and all King Lewis's Adherents, not considering the Consequences; for Monjoy by his haughty Behaviour was rather the Cause of disturbing than of securing the Kingdom to King Lewis. For Tommaso Sanseverino being offended, because the King had not confirmed him in his Viceroyalty, in disgust retired to his Estate; and a few Days after Monjoy discoursing with Prince Otho, and not shewing him that respect, which was due to a Person of his Rank and Birth, and who had been married to a Queen, the Prince left him, and went to S. Agata de Goti. The Lords of Good Government went in a Body to Monjoy, and told him, That by his way of Management the Kingdom in a short time would be lost, for he alienated the most powerful Lords from the Government; and that it was necessary by all Means to endeavour to sooth Prince Otho; and though Monjoy promised them that he would pacify him, yet all he could do was to no Purpose, because the Prince insisted upon such Conditions, as were reckoned extravagant, and not to be complied with, not only by the Viceroy, but by all Men of Honour. And by this it was conjectured that the Prince was then making Terms for going over to the Queen's Party, which was afterwards confirmed, for he soon joined the Durazzo Faction. Therefore Angelo Costanzo believed that to be true which he had read in a Manuscript written by Paris de Putco, that the Prince had a Design to marry Queen Margaret, and that that most prudent Lady had given him some Encouragement; but afterwards she excused herself, by telling him, That he having been married to Queen Joan, her Aunt, the Pope had refused to grant a Dispensation; and thus she put him off, at a time, when in Honour he could not leave her, and to his Death he kept firm to her Interest; whereupon many Changes happened, and the Durazzo Faction began to have Hopes of being able to recover Naples, and the rest of the Kingdom that sided with King Lewis.

C H A P. IV.

*King Ladislaus marries the Daughter of Manfredi di Chiaramonte.
Pope Urban dies, Boniface IX. is elected in his Place, and King Lewis comes to Naples.*

IN the mean time Queen Margaret, who with many of her Adherents was still in Gaeta, not able to bear the trifling away of Time, as if all Hopes of recovering of Naples had been lost, was wholly intent upon contriving Means whereby to raise Money, in order to levy Men for recruiting the Army. But it happened that some Merchants of Gaeta, who had been to buy Corn in Sicily, in the Queen's Presence spoke much of the Riches of Manfredi di Chiaramonte, and of the great Beauty of his Daughter; whereupon the roving Mind of the Queen fixed upon a Resolution of sending to demand his Daughter for Wife to her Son King Ladislaus, who was then fourteen Years of Age; and as she was of a fiery Nature, and resolute in all her Actions, she immediately caused her Council to be called, and said, That after she had deliberated on all Methods for raising of Money, in order to renew the War, she had not found one so sure as that Marriage, which in all Probability would bring a very great Portion, and that therefore she was resolved to send to Sicily to treat about it. There was not one of the Council but commended the Queen's Wisdom, and with unanimous Consent the Count of Celano, and Bernardo Guasfaffero di Gaeta were pitched upon to go to Sicily to treat about the Marriage; the Count, because he was very rich, and could carry a splendid Retinue along with him, and Bernardo, because he was a Doctor of Law, and a knowing Man. These Ambassadors embarked at Gaeta, and with two Gallies arrived the fourth Day at Palermo. Manfredi di Chiaramonte was by Title Count of Modica, but in effect King of two thirds of Sicily, for taking Advantage of the King's Childhood, and the Dissension of the Barons, he had made himself Master of Palermo, and of almost all the chief Cities of the Island; and with his own Troops had conquered the Island of Gerba, from which he drew great Profit, not only by the Tribute which the Moors paid him, but likewise by the Gain which he made by the Merchants that traded to Barbary, and being naturally inclined to make a shining Figure, he received the Ambassadors in a most magnificent manner; and after that he had understood their Errand, the great Virtue and Merit of Queen Margaret, that King Ladislaus was a promising Youth, and the Certainty of driving his Enemies out of the Kingdom, if he was assisted with Money, he was very well satisfied, seeing he had not only an Opportunity offered him to make his Daughter Queen of a most potent Kingdom, but with the Assistance of his Son-in-Law to be able to make himself Master of the remaining part of the Island, and to be King; therefore without Delay the Marriage was concluded; and though the Neapolitans did all they could to hinder it, yet Manfredi was positive in his Resolution; so that Cicco del Borgo, King Ladislaus's Viceroy, coming to Palermo to conduct the Bride to Naples, Manfredi delivered to him his Daughter Constantia, and sent some of her Relations to accompany her with four Gallies, and besides her great Portion, gave her a vast Quantity of wrought Plate, Jewels, and Tapistry. Taking leave of Palermo with prosperous Gale, in a few Days they arrived at Gaeta, where the Queen and King with great Joy received the Bride, and for many Days made most sumptuous Feasts.

was

THE Feasts were scarcely over, when Ladislaus received the welcome News of the Death of Pope Urban, who had done him no Service; for on account of his cruel and froward Nature he was no less hated by the College of Cardinals, than by all the People under his Obedience; and having put many Cardinals to Death, and upon Suspicion degraded others, his chief Care was to be upon his Guard against Conspiracies, which he was afraid had been hatched against him. Urban died in the Year 1389, and Cardinal Pietro Tomacello was elected in his Place, and called *Boniface IX.*¹, who, as shall be told, was King Ladislaus's great Protector. There were few that lamented Pope Urban's Death; for though he was a Man of singular Integrity, yet he was naturally proud, stubborn, and intractable, and sometimes he knew not himself what he would be at: He was buried in S. Peter's Church in Rome with a homely Epitaph, but in Naples, in the Church of S. Maria la Nuova, in the Chapel of Francesco Prignano, near the Sepulchre of B. Giacomo, he had a famous Tomb with a Statue erected for him, which may be seen at this Day. His Successor, who was but thirty Years of Age, was made Pope on account of his good Life; but he was no sooner crowned, than he appeared in a quite different Shape, making it his chief Study to raise his Brothers and Relations; and because he might expect great things from King Ladislaus, who, whenever he should subdue his Enemies, who were very rich, would distribute a part of those Riches among his (the Pope's) Creatures; he resolved to assist him, and gave a most gracious Reception to Raimondo Cantelmo Count of Alvito, and Goffredo di Marzano Count of Alifi, who had been sent by Ladislaus and the Queen to congratulate him, and do him Homage; and he promised to give Ladislaus the Investiture of the Kingdom, which he could never obtain from Pope Urban. And a few Days after he sent the Cardinal of Fiorence to Gaeta to crown him, where, on the eighth of May 1390 the Coronation of the King and Queen Constantia with great Solemn-nity was performed, and the Bull of Investiture read, which was the same with that made by Pope Urban to King Charles III. And the same Day the King and Queen rode a Horseback through Gaeta with their Crowns on their Heads.

THE Neapolitans seeing King Ladislaus in so prosperous a State, sent Baldassar Cossa, who was afterwards Cardinal, and then Pope, to King Lewis in Provence, to tell him, that their common Cause was in great Danger, and daily grew worse and worse, by the excessive Pride of my Lord of Monjoy, who had alienated the Barons from him, and especially the Sanseverini, who were Masters of all the Arms and Troops of the Kingdom, and that his Presence was necessary; for at that time, of four parts of the Kingdom three were his, which his Presence would not only secure to him, but likewise be a Means to reconcile the Differences among the Ministers, whereby in a short time he might expect to drive out his Enemies, and be Master of the whole Kingdom. Upon this Message, and by the Persuasion of Pope Clement, King Lewis, who the Year before, in the Presence of the King of France, had been solemnly crowned King of Sicily in *Avignon*¹, having drawn together twenty Vessels, some of them Gallies, and some of them Brigantines, and three large Ships, in July embarked at Marseilles, and on the fourteenth of August came in sight of Naples, when he was overtaken by a Storm, and by great Difficulty in the Admiral's Galley he got near the Shore, and landed upon a Bridge, on purpose prepared at the Mouth of the River Sibeto, where he found a great Number of Noblemen and People, with some Barons, who received him with great Acclamations, and mounting a Horseback, he rode to Formello, where he found Deputies from Naples, who presented him with the Keys of the City: Being arrived at the Gate, he was received by eight Knights under a Canopy of Cloth of Gold; and in passing through the Seggi of the City, he knighted many young Noblemen, and at Night went to Castel Capuana, the whole City being highly delighted with his Presence; for he was a Prince of a noble Aspect, fit to gain popular Applause, and which expressed both Clemency and Humanity. The Day following all the five Seggi confirmed their Oath of Allegiance, which they had taken from the Hands of Tommaso Sanseverino when he was Viceroy, and then the Merchants and People swore. Then the Barons began to come in, and the first were the Count of Ariano of the Family of Sabrano, Marino Zurlo Count of S. Angelo, Giovanni di Luxemburgo Count of Conversano, Pietro Sanframondo Count of Cerreto, Corrado Malatacca, &c. and some of the principal Foreigners who possessed Lands in the Kingdom. These brought above eleven hundred Horse with them. But afterwards came the Sanseverini, who exceeded all the rest in Magnificence, Number, and the Quality of their Followers; for they brought with them eight hundred Horse, all well equipped, as if they had been going to an Engagement, that thereby the new King might see of what Importance they were to his Crown, which was looked upon to be very arrogant in them. These were Tommaso the High-Constable, the Duke of Venosa, the Count of Terra Nuova, the Count of Melito, the Count of Lauria of the same Family; then came Ugo Sanseverino from Terra d'Otranto, with Gaspare Count of Matera, and others of the same Name, who had Lands in that Province: After them came the Lords of Gesualdo, Luigi della Magna Count of Boccino, Mattia di Borgenza, Carlo di Lagni, and other Barons of less Note. But from Abruzzo there came only Ramondaccio Caldora with some others of that Family, for the rest were all of King Ladislaus's Party.

I MUST not pass over in Silence what that most grave Historian Angelo di Costanzo says of the Times we are now speaking of, in comparing them with the Age in which he wrote, viz. in the Reign of Philip II. He writes, that though the City of Naples was in a most flourishing State in his time, and abounded in illustrious Cavaliers fit for warlike Exercises, yet it would have been a difficult Matter to adjust a Tournament, or even to raise a thousand Men at Arms completely mounted in the whole Kingdom: therefore he says, That if he had not known it to be Matter of Fact, and found it vouched by Men of undoubted Veracity, and likewise seen it recorded in the Registers, he would scarcely have been able to believe what he was writing concerning those Times, in which so great a Number of Horse was so ready at a Call; now if that grave Author was so much surprized at the Difference between the Age in which he wrote and that of which we are treating, what would he have said if he had lived in our Days, wherein, to our great Shame,

Luxury hath infinitely increased beyond what it was in the Reign of Philip II ? But all this, says he, ought to be attributed to the change of Times, which likewise alters Customs. At that time every little Baron was well provided of Horse and warlike Men, for fear of being turned out of his House by some more powerful Neighbour ; and the Neapolitan Nobility living with great Frugality, minded nothing so much as to be well provided of Horse and Arms, in which they placed their chief Delight: They did not lay out their Money in garnishing their Tables, even those of Princes were not served with costly Dishes; they wore no gaudy Apparel, all their Revenues were spent in maintaining gallant Men, and feeding their Horses. Now by Reason of the long Peace, the Minds of every body are set upon magnificent Buildings, sumptuous and dainty Living ; and we now see that the House which formerly belonged to the High-Steward Coracciolo, who in the time of Queen Joan II. was in a manner absolute Master of the Kingdom, having fallen into the Hands of Persons, without Comparison of Estate and Rank inferior to him, is enlarged with new Buildings, the old, wherein he, who at his Pleasure gave and took away Lordships and Estates, lived so much envied, not being sufficient for them. I speak not of Tapestry and other Furniture, since it is well known, that many Noblemen have bestowed as much upon the Furniture of two Rooms, as would have maintained two hundred Horse a whole Year ; and Cosanzo having spoken of the Grandeur of Princes, he gives us one instance of that of a private Man, viz. that he had seen the Houses of five Noblemen turned into one for a Tradesman: So that we may readily believe, that if our present way of living could be known to our Ancestors, they would wonder no less at us than we do at them.

IF Angelo di Cosanzo who wrote in the Reign of King Philip II. was surprized that the Houses of five Noblemen were not sufficient for one single Tradesman, what would he say now if he saw, that all those large and stately Edifices, which like so many new Cities have been added to the old, are not sufficient for the Inhabitants ? And what would he say if he saw the Pride and Vanity of those of our present Age, who squander away their Incomes in such a manner, that they could scarcely raise a Troop of a hundred Horse ? But leaving it to the Judgment of the Readers, whether it be more commendable in Men to give their Minds to Arms and Horses, and to the severe and toilsome Exercise of War, or to Ease and Luxury, we shall return to where we left off.

AFTER King Lewis had received the Oath of Allegiance from all Ranks and Degrees of People both of the City and Kingdom, he assembled a Parliament at Santa Clara, in which Ugo Sanseverino Great Protonotary of the Kingdom proposed to give the King a thousand Men at Arms, and ten Gallies at the Charges of the Barons and People till the War was at an end, which was very readily agreed to, to the great Joy of the King ; because at that time France being engaged in a War with England, he could expect but small Assistance from Provence and the Duchy of Anjou. Lewis therefore very prudently began to make up his Household of noble Neapolitans, and other Subjects of the Kingdom, allowing them all honourable Pensions, which seemed to lighten the unusual Burden, newly laid upon the Kingdom, and gained him the Good-will of the Neapolitans.

WHILE these things were transacting in Naples and other parts of the Kingdom, Queen Margaret conven'd all the Barons of her Party, and sent Count Alberto di Cunio to levy Soldiers, resolving to try the Fortune of War; for with her Daughter-in-Law's Portion and the Pope's Favour she had augmented her Army. Giacomo di Marzano Duke of Sessa, and High-Admiral of the Kingdom, Goffredo his Brother Count of Alifi, and High-Chamberlain, Count Alberigo High-Constable, Cecco del Borgo Marquis of Pescara, Gentile d'Acquaviva Count of S. Valentino, Berardo d'Aquino Count of Loreto, Luigi di Capua Count of Altavilla, Giovanni d'Atrezzo Count of Trivento, Giacomo Stendardo, Cola and Cristofano Gaetani, Gurrello Carafa, and Malizia his Brother, Gurrello Origlia, Salvatore Zurlo, Florido Latro, and Onofrio Pesce immediately met in Gaeta, and consulted where they should begin the War. It was resolved, first to go and subdue the Sanseverini, who kept their Men dispersed in different Places ; but after several Skirmishes, at last the Sanseverini gained the Victory. Whereupon Renzo Pagano Governor of S. Eramo, who held out for King Ladislaus, entered into a Treaty for delivering up the Castle to King Lewis, for which he made a good Bargain, having got the Bailiwick of S. Paolo, the Office of Judge of the Students, the Duty upon Meal, and other other Advantages. But Andrea Mormile Governor of Castel Nuova, notwithstanding the many and great Rewards offered him, could never be prevailed upon to surrender, till extreme Necessity obliged him; and all the Reward he sought, was the Safety of himself and Garrison, and when King Lewis entered the Castle he highly commended him, there being found in it Provisions only for one Day. Martuccio Bonifacio Governor of Castel del Uovo, being likewise unable to hold out any longer, surrendered upon honourable Conditions. Great Demonstrations of Joy were made through all the City for this prosperous Success, and it looked as if the War would soon be at an end; for after the Castles had surrendered, there was nothing but Peace and Contentment in Naples, and a hearty Affection for King Lewis.

C H A P. V.

King Ladislaus divorces Queen Constantia, and his Progress in recovering the Kingdom, which at last returns under his Dominion.

BY the Poverty of King Ladislaus on the one hand, and the pacifick Nature of King Lewis on the other, the Kingdom was for some Months in perfect Tranquillity. But during that time there happened great changes in the Island of Sicily, for by the Death of Frederick III. without Male Issue, that Kingdom had devolved to Mary an Infant, and Daughter to the late King of Aragon; and in the Year 1386 the Sicilian Barons had married her to Marino the Son of the Duke of Monblanco, who was Brother to John King of Aragon, and was called King Martin, who in the Year 1390 with his Father and a strong Army landing in Sicily at the same time that Manfredi di Chiaramonte died, easily recovered Palermo, and all the other Cities which had been possessed by Manfredi; and a Report was spread, that the Duke of Monblanco the King's Father had amorous Conversation with Manfredi's Widow. Queen Margaret, whether induced by this Report, or that by marrying the King to another Woman, she was in hopes to get Money for renewing the War, persuaded him to go to the Pope and endeavour to obtain a Divorce; because it was dishonourable for one of his Birth and Rank to have for a Wife the Daughter of the Concubine of a Catalan; besides by taking another Wife he might get both a new Portion and Assistance. The King being young, and his Mother's Advice prevailing more upon him than the Love of his Wife, went to Rome, where he was honourably, and with many Demonstrations of Kindness received by Pope Boniface, and not only obtained the Divorce, but a good Supply of Money, in order to renew the War. The Pope, by an unprecedented Instance, sent with him the Bishop of Gaeta, to perform the Solemnity of the Divorce; and the first Sunday after the King's return, in the Cathedral Church of Gaeta, whither the King and Queen had gone, as the Queen thought to hear Mass only, the Bishop in presence of all the People read the Bull of Divorce, and went from the Altar and took the Wedding-Ring from Queen Constantia and returned it to the King; and the unfortunate Queen, with an old Woman and two Maids, was conducted to a private House prepared for that Purpose, whither, by way of Alms, Victuals were sent from Court for herself and Servants; all Queen Margaret's best Friends loudly condemned this Action, so full of Cruelty and Inhumanity, Baseness and Ingratitude;

tude; that the King having with much Importunity obtained her of her Father a few Years before, together with a Portion wherewith his Necessities were relieved, should afterwards unjustly divorce her, at a time when her Family and Relations were in such calamitous Circumstances, that it might have been expected, she as a Queen should have been in a Condition to entertain and relieve them, rather than be sent back to them deprived both of her Crown and Portion; but Pope Boniface was loaded with much more Hatred, for having out of Ambition, and for his own private Ends, granted this Divorce.

THIS being over, King Ladislaus ordered all the Barons to meet him the Spring following in the Plain of Trajetto, for being now of Age fit for Arms, he designed to encounter his Enemies; but by Reason of the Defeat of the preceding Year the Barons were so ill provided, that all the Month of June was spent before they were ready; however about the end of July they all met under Trajetto, and encamped upon the Banks of the Garigliano; and the Barons, leaving their Men there, went to wait upon the King in Gaeta, with whom having held a Council of War about what was fit to be done, after much Reasoning it was concluded, that they should undertake nothing that Campaign but the Siege of Aquila, which alone of all the Cities of Abruzzo obstinately held out for Lewis; because they might raise as much Money in that City, which was very rich, as might enable them to augment the Army the Year following, and be in a Condition for greater Undertakings; since the King had then no more than three thousand Horse, and sixteen hundred Foot. The Council of War being over, the young King in Armour went with Queen Margaret to the Cathedral Church to hear Mass; and after it was ended, having taken leave of his Mother, who gave him her Blessing, and with many Tears recommended him to the Barons, armed Cap-a-pee he mounted his Horse, and Cecco del Borgo Marquis of Pescara went and gave him the Truncheon, and said, Most serene King, be pleased to take the Truncheon, which I have for many Years carried in my Hand in your Majesty's Name, and I pray to God, that as I deliver it to you this Day, so he may deliver all your Rebels and Enemies into your Hands. The King took the Truncheon, and once more taking leave of his Mother, and saluting the By-standers, he departed with a passionate Desire of Glory, and fully bent upon noble Exploits, amidst a thousand Blessings of the People, who with a loud Voice prayed to God to preserve him, and give him Victory. Being arrived at the Camp the next Morning he marched with all the Army against the Counts of Sora and Alvito, both of the Family of Cantelmo, and divested them of their Estates, because they had not obeyed his Orders, and were suspected of having a Design to go over to King Lewis's Party. Then by the County of Celano he entered Abruzzo, whither a great Multitude of People flocked from all Parts to see him, and make him Presents, and a great Number of young Peasants, taken with the King's Presence, both on Horseback and a-Foot followed the Army as Volunteers. The Aquilans, upon hearing that the King was coming against them, had sent to King Lewis for Succour, which he had promised them, but it could not be there in time, because he was obliged to send for the Sanseverini and their Men, who were dispersed up and down in several Provinces; so that they made the best Terms for themselves they could; and that the City might not be given up to be plundered, they paid forty thousand Duckets, and surrendered to King Ladislaus. This Prince, encouraged by so successful a beginning, marched against Rinaldo Ursino Count of Manupello, who in a few Days with all his Estate fell into the King's Hands. The Caldori retired all into the Castle of Palena; and the King not willing to lose time in besieging them, through the County of Molise returned to Gaeta, enriched with a great Booty, and a good Sum of Money, partly got in Presents, and partly in Ransoms from the contumacious Cities and Barons; and he gave Liberty to all the Barons to go home, ordering them to be ready against the next Spring. But the great Sickness with which Ladislaus was seized the following Year 1394, after he had made every thing ready, and was on his March to besiege Naples, frustrated his Design; for when he came to Capua he was taken so ill, that it was rumoured over all the Kingdom that he was dead, and had been poisoned, yet with strong Remedies he was cured, but was a Stammerer to his Death; so that the Design upon Naples was delayed, and he returned to Gaeta. In the mean time there was a Treaty of Peace set on Foot between him and King Lewis, but it came to nothing; for it was said, that as Ladislaus himself was pretty backward in it, he was besides advised by Pope Boniface not to make Peace. The War therefore was renewed with greater Fury: King Lewis besieged Aversa, which held out for Ladislaus; but the Fidelity of the Aversans, and the quick Relief which Ladislaus threw into it, rendered Lewis's Attempt fruitless: Ladislaus having relieved Aversa went to Rome to wait upon the Pope, from whom he expected a Supply for the next Year. He was very much honoured, caressed, and made welcome this second time by Boniface: The manner how they were to carry on the War was debated, and it was concluded, that the Pope should pay the King twenty five thousand Florins; and the King in return gave to the Pope's Brothers the Counties of Sora and Alvito, which he had taken from the Cantelmi, and the Barony of Montefusco, with many other Lands, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of Boniface; because though two Years before Ladislaus had given them the Duchy of Amalfi, and the Baronies of Angri and Graguano, yet they had not been able to take Possession of them, because the Duchy was in the Possession of the Sanseverini; and after the Death of Pietro della Corona, King Lewis had given the Baronies to Giacomo Zurlo. Some rich Cardinals followed the Pope's Example, and upon the King's promising to give their Relations Cities and Villages, then in the Hands of the Enemies, they furnished the King with Money, and he gave them Investitures. With this Money, and large Promises from the Pope, Ladislaus left Rome, and on the nineteenth of November 1394 returned to Gaeta, and those who had been with the King gave out, that he had received much more Money from the Pope than he really had.

ON the other hand, as soon as King Lewis heard of these Preparations, he sent Barnabo Sanseverino to Pope Clement in Avignon, to acquaint him with the great Assistance which Boniface had given Ladislaus, and to ask the like of him, since in the Spring following he expected to be vigorously attacked both by Sea and Land. Barnabo got from Clement wherewithal to hire six Gallies, and a Sum of Money besides. And this was the last Supply that he gave; for Clement having promised to the King of France, who was endeavouring to remove the Schism, to enter into a Treaty for restoring the Peace of the Church; and the University of Paris having given their Opinion about the most ready Means for putting an end to the Schism, and proposed, that by the mutual Consent of the two contending Parties, the Difference should be referred to the Decision of a general Council, was much surprized at such Propositions, and the more, when he found that his own Cardinals thought them just; which so much afflicted him, that he died on the sixteenth of September that same Year 1394¹. But the Pope's Death did not put an end to the Schism; for the Cardinals who were in Avignon, in spite of the King of France, proceeded to the Election of a new Pope, and on the twenty eighth of the same Month elected Peter de Luna an Aragonese Cardinal Deacon of S. Mary, who was named Benedict XIII. This Pope immediately shewed himself as willing to assist King Lewis as his Predecessor had been, and the Governor of Provence had sent him three Gallies newly fitted out, with some Money; Benedict likewise sent him fifteen thousand Duckets. The two Kings being thus supplied by the two Popes, with greater Vigour renewed the War, which Ladislaus had carried to the very Gates of Naples. But the Bravery of Ladislaus, and the frequent and vigorous Assistance sent him by Pope Boniface; and on the contrary King Lewis being more fitted for the Arts of Peace than those of War, the slow and small Succours sent him from France, and the little Hopes of getting more, obliged the High-Constable Tommaso Sanseverino seriously to consider of the Danger King Lewis was in, and consequently of the irreparable Ruin of himself, and of all his Family, if some Remedy was not immediately found; therefore he told the King, that since they could not so strengthen their own Party as was requisite, they must do their utmost Endeavours to weaken that of their Enemies, adding, that he had thought upon Means for bringing over the Duke of Seffa from King Ladislaus; and he made no doubt of Success, if he (the King) would be pleased to demand the Duke's Daughter in Marriage, because he believed, that the Duke would prefer the Grandeur of his Family, by making his Daughter a Queen, to the Love he bore King Ladislaus. The King, who was of a pliable Temper, commended the Thought, and with the unanimous Advice of his Council, sent Ugo Sanseverino to treat of the Marriage, who in a few Days, partly by his own Interest, which was very great, partly by the Assistance of the Duchess, who was of the Family of Sanseverino, most ambitious, and fond of being the Mother of a Queen, and partly by the Duke's own

Ambition of so great an Honour, concluded the Marriage, and returned to Naples; and Lewis immediately sent my Lord Monjoy to the Bride with Royal Presents, and in his Letters gave her the Title of Queen Mary. Pope Boniface, extremely vexed at this Alliance, and the Duke's changing sides, sent Giovanni Tomacello his Brother to endeavour to bring back the Duke to King Ladislaus's Party; but many Obstacles intervening he could do nothing then, the Duke giving only fair Promises, without performing any thing; at last King Ladislaus seeing the Indolence of King Lewis, marched against the Duke of Sessa; but Pope Boniface, desirous of a Reconciliation, which in a short time would be able to reduce the whole Kingdom to the Obedience of Ladislaus, sent Giovanni again to treat of an Accommodation, and to persuade the King to hearken to it, which five Months after was accordingly made, upon Condition that the King should receive the Duke and his Brother into favour, and restore them to their Estates, and that they, upon the Pope's Surety, should go and again swear Allegiance to the King. By this Treaty and Reconciliation the Marriage of the Duke's Daughter with King Lewis was quite laid aside; and though she was afterwards married to another Man, yet she still retained the Title of Queen given her by Lewis when he sent her the Presents.

AT this time King Ladislaus (whether of himself, or by the Advice of his Mother, or of others is not known) moved with Compassion for Constantia di Chiaramonte formerly his Wife, who had lived in great Patience, Modesty, and Chastity in a low Condition, from the time of her Divorce, gave her in Marriage to Andrea di Capua the eldest Son of the Count of Altavilla, of the same Age with himself, and his Favourite, and the Marriage was solemnized with great Magnificence: But for all that this great Woman did not fail to shew that she had a Soul worthy of her former State; for that Day her Husband conducted her to Capua, being got upon Horseback, in presence of many Barons and Gentlemen, who were going to accompany her, and of a Multitude of People, she said to her Husband: Andrea di Capua, you may look upon your self to be the happiest Man in the Kingdom, since thou hast for thy Concubine the lawful Wife of King Ladislaus thy Lord and Master. These Words raised Compassion and Admiration in all that heard them, and when they were told the King, he was struck with Remorse and Confusion.

IN the mean time Ladislaus having laid close Siege to Naples both by Sea and Land, King Lewis was advised to leave the City and go to Taranto. The Neapolitans wearied with so long a War, after sundry Treaties so well and minutely related by Angelo di Costanzo, at last surrendered the City to Ladislaus, who having granted them many Articles and Conditions which they demanded, entered the City; and in order to quiet the Minds of all, he conferred many more Favours upon the City than he had promised, and gave the Magistrates that Jurisdiction which they still have over those who furnish the Necessaries of Life¹.

ADVICE of the Surrender of Naples coming to King Lewis in Taranto, he was extremely afflicted, and despairing of being able to recover it, and looking upon all other parts of the Kingdom, which were under his Obedience, as lost, he resolved to go Provence. Ramondello Ursino to no purpose did all he could to divert him from his Resolution, demonstrating to him, that though Naples had surrendered, yet he was still Master of two Thirds of the Kingdom, and had many Barons at his Devotion; that with the Fleet which Pope Benedict had sent for the Relief of Naples, and a few Months hence by assembling the Land-Forces, it would be an easy Matter to recover the whole Kingdom; and seeing Queen Margaret, with the Possession of Gaeta only did not despair, without any other Assistance, to recover the Kingdom to her Son, it would be a great Reproach to him, who was possessed of so many larger Cities than Gaeta, and of great Dominions in France, to go away and abandon so noble a Kingdom. But the King, either offended at Ramondello, who could never be persuaded to march his Men, and join those of the High-Constable, or tired with those Proceedings, embarked in the Fleet, and the greatest part of the Neapolitan Gentlemen, who were of his Household, went with him, and having sailed about Calabria, he steered along the Coast of Naples, looking upon it with great Grief, and sent to treat with King Ladislaus, to allow Charles of Anjou his Brother, and the French Garrison, with Bag and Baggage, to march out of Castel Nuovo, which should be delivered up to him: All which was readily agreed to; so that having sent Gallies to take aboard his Brother and the Garrison, he set sail for Provence, to the great Grief of all those of his Party. Thus in the Year 1400, Naples, and almost all the Kingdom, came under the Dominion of Ladislaus; and Taranto alone continued faithful to King Lewis, and held out for a long time.

C H A P. VI.

King Ladislaus first marries Mary Sister to the King of Cyprus, and then the Princess of Taranto. His Expedition against the Kingdom of Hungary, which proved unfortunate.

AFTER Ladislaus had driven his Rival out of the Kingdom, crush'd the Sanseverini, and ruined the Duke of Sessa and his Family, and taken Possession of their Estates, he thought it time peaceably to enjoy the Kingdom, and to have Children, who might succeed him; so that he began to think of taking a Wife. Pope Boniface hearing of the King's Resolution, took it upon him to find him one; and in the mean time there came Ambassadors from Leopold Duke of Austria to demand Joan the King's Sister in Marriage for their Master; to which the King consented: and though he was making ready to accompany her to the Borders of the Dutchy of Austria, yet the Journey was delayed, because Boniface had already concluded a Marriage between him and Mary Sister to the King of Cyprus; whereupon Ladislaus resolved to celebrate his own Marriage first, and immediately sent Gurrello di Tocco, with the Archbishop of Brindisi, and many other Gentlemen, to Cyprus for his Bride. In a very short time this Princess came, accompanied by the Lords of Lamech and Barut her Uncles; and in the Month of February 1403, were affectionately and honourably received in Naples by the King, and Queen Margaret his Mother; and the Marriage was quickly solemnized with great Magnificence.

AT this time the Hungarians, displeased with their King Sigismond, had revolted, and some of the Barons had imprisoned him, declared for King Ladislaus, and proclaimed him King, as the Son and Heir of Charles III. Ladislaus, fond of enlarging his Power in divers Kingdom, accepted of the Sovereignty; but considering the Fickleness of that Nation, and if what his Adherents had promised should miscarry, he should be obliged to return to Naples, with the Loss of his Reputation, under Pretence therefore of accompanying his Sister to Austria, he resolved to set out; and having left his Wife Queen Mary Regent of the Kingdom, which she was to govern by the Advice of the Archbishop of Consa, Gentile de Merolinis di Sulmona, Gurrello Origlia, and of Leonardo d' Afflitto her Counsellors¹, he went with Joan his Sister, and embarked at Manfredonia, and landed at Friuli; and having committed the Care of his Sister to many Barons of the Dutchy of Austria, who had come there to attend her, he went on to Zara a City of Hungary, in order to make his first Attempt upon that Kingdom. The Gates of Zara were opened to him without Resistance, and imagining he had done enough for this time, he fortified that City, left the Lord of Barut with a sufficient Garrison, and returned to Naples. Some have written, that before Ladislaus returned he was crowned on the fifth of August this Year King of that Kingdom by the Bishop of Gran, to the great Joy of all the People, and of many Hungarian Barons and Prelates, who had met him at Zara. Others that Pope Boniface caused him to be crowned by the Cardinal of Florence, and remitted him the Tribute due to the Church of Rome for the Kingdom of Naples, which was above eight hundred thousand Florins, and likewise granted him the Tithes of the Kingdom for three Years, for maintaining the War; and that after the Coronation Ladislaus sent to Hungary as his Viceroy Tommaso Sanseverino Count of Montescaglioso with five hundred Spearmen, designing to be there himself soon after. Some others, such as Cosanzo, say, that these Events happen'd some Years after, to wit, after the Death of Queen Mary, and after the Death of Pope Boniface, which fell out in the Year 1404, whose Successor was Innocent VII. and after King Ladislaus's Marriage with the Princess of Taranto, which was concluded in the Year 1406, in order to recover the Principality of Taranto, which had the desired Effect. Then it was, says Cosanzo, that the Hungarian Ambassadors came to acquaint Ladislaus, that Queen Mary being dead, the Hungarians, not able to bear the Tyranny of King Sigismund, had imprisoned him, and set up his Standard; they therefore begg'd of him with all haste to make ready, to go and take peaceable Possession of an opulent Kingdom, and that Dispatch was more necessary than Force. Ladislaus, both out of a Desire to reign, and to revenge his Father's Death, with a choice Body of Troops went with the Ambassadors, and embarked at Manfredonia, and with a prosperous Gale in a few Days arrived at Zara; and having sent the Ambassadors before him, to acquaint the chief Men of the Kingdom with his Arrival, in a short time after he understood, that King Sigismund was set at Liberty, and was assembling a great Army of Bohemians; for which Cause, remembering the Fate of his Father, he continued some Days in Zara, consulting what was fit to be done. But it happen'd, that one Day some Soldiers and Seamen having gone ashore to gather Grapes in the Vineyards, the Citizens of Zara rose in Arms, and kill'd twenty of them; nor was that enough, being yet in Arms they went to the Palace where the King was, and with barbarous Insolence told him, that if he did not curb his Men, they wanted neither Arms nor Resolution to keep them in awe. The King being offended at so great Insolence, began to consider how savage the People of that Kingdom bordering upon Scythia and the Rhiphaean Mountains must be, since those of Zara in the Neighbourhood of Italy were such: and upon this Disgust, new Advice coming, that King Sigismund was entered Hungary with his Army, and that that King's Adherents had put to flight and dispersed the opposite Party, Ladislaus resolved to be revenged of the Citizens of Zara, and to give over that dangerous Undertaking.

THEREFORE he entered into a Treaty with Francesco Cornaro, Leonardo Monzenigo, Antonio Contarino, and Fautim Michele, Venetian Ambassadors, for selling Zara to that Republick, to which the People of Zara were bitter Enemies; and the News of that Treaty being carried to Venice, the Senate sent an hundred thousand Duckets of Gold, and a sufficient Number of Soldiers for a Garrison to that City, and King Ladislaus put them in Possession of it. Then being disgusted at the Hungarians, as Bonfinius in his History of Hungary relates, he wrote to King Sigismund, excusing himself, that this Expedition was none of his own chusing, but having been invited by others, he was willing to see if it was the Will of God, who gives and takes away Kingdoms, that he should sit upon the Throne of Hungary; but having found the contrary, and experienced the fickle Nature of that Nation, who would change their Kings every day, he had resolved to yield to him, and likewise shew himself his good Friend and affectionate Kinsman; adding, that he could do him no greater Pleasure, than to use the Traitors as they had endeavoured to use him: and then he returned to Naples. Nevertheless, not only Ladislaus, but Queen Jean II. and all the Kings of Naples their Successors, amongst their other Titles, always kept that of King of Hungary.

S E C T. I.

King Ladislaus's Expedition against Rome.

THE Death of Pope Boniface freed Ladislaus from all the Promises he had made him, and from the Respect he owed him as his Benefactor and Friend. This Pope, had it not been for the excessive Love he had for his Relations, which obscured his Reputation, was otherwise a Man of great Worth; but his Passion for them was such, that he did not stick to give them plenary Indulgences, in order to be sold: but that Impiety was afterwards attended with adequate Punishment; for his Brothers Andrea Duke of Spoletto, and Giovanni Count of Sora and Alvito having procured many other Lands to sundry of their Relations, in a very short time were deprived of them, and left in great Poverty.

COSMATO MIGLIORATO Cardinal of the Holy Cross, who took the Name of Innocent VII. being elected in Boniface's room, shewed himself to be no Friend to Ladislaus: on the other hand the King undervaluing him, and seeing himself peaceably possessed of the Kingdom, and not engaged in any other War, as he was naturally of an active enterprising Disposition, and covetous of Empire and Glory, he resolved to make himself Master of Rome. There never could have been a more favourable Opportunity; for the Romans, wearied by the long Schism, and out of Hatred to the Memory of Boniface, and that which they now entertained against Innocent, on account of his having put many of their Fellow-Citizens to Death, in the Beginning of his Pontificate, raised great Commotions in Rome; for they demanding to have the Freedom of the Capitol restored, and an End put to the Schism. Innocent was so much enraged at their Insolence, that he sent for Lodovico Marquis of La Marca his Nephew, and a good Number of Soldiers, in order to be revenged of the Romans. The People revolted, and invited Ladislaus to come to their Assistance. The King came immediately to Rome: so that the Pope and his Nephew were forced to leave the City, and retire to Viterbo. Ladislaus being Master of Rome, went and took Possession of Peruggia; but the Romans in an instant changing their Minds, recall'd the Pope, and the King's Soldiers were driven out by Paolo Orsino. Ladislaus finding the Fickleness of the Romans, left all things at random, and returned to the Kingdom, in order to assemble a strong Army, and be revenged of them; but while the King was fully bent upon this Expedition, on the sixth of November this Year 1406, Pope Innocent departed this Life. The King of France, who was still endeavouring to have an end put to the Schism, did what he could to prevent a new Election; but Innocent's Cardinals, who were then in Rome, instead of deferring the Election, on the thirtieth of the same Month elected Angelo Cornaro a Venetian, who took the Name of Gregory XII. All those Cardinals before the Election had sign'd a Writing, whereby they bound themselves, that whoever of them should be elected should renounce the Papacy, provided Benedict and his Cardinals would do the same, in order afterward to proceed to the Election of a lawful Pope. Gregory XII. protested, that he was ready to renounce, if his Competitor did the same. The King of France endeavoured to get the two contending Parties to renounce; but neither of them had a mind to do it, but put it off with cunning Shifts. At last it was agreed to by both Parties to meet in Savona, in order to treat of an Accommodation. Benedict and his Cardinals went thither; but though Gregory had left Rome in order to be there likewise, yet upon several Pretences he shun'd the Conference. Ladislaus took Advantage of this Confusion; for in the Beginning of the Year 1407, when he found that the Pope had left Rome, he assembled his Army, consisting of fifteen thousand Horse, and eight thousand Foot, and marched towards that City. Rome was at this time under the Care of Paolo Orsino, a Man of great Authority, and on account of his great Bravery much belov'd and esteem'd by the Romans. Paolo with two thousand Horse, and the Citizens that were able to bear Arms, prepared to defend the City, and having posted Guards in all the proper Places, the King despair'd of being able to enter by Force; but the Galleys entering the Tiber, and the King having taken all the Castles upon the Teverina, and given strict Orders that no Provisions should be allow'd to go down that River to Rome, he was forced to surrender himself and the City upon honourable Terms; and on the twenty fifth Day of April 1408, Ladislaus made his Entry into Rome as Lord thereof under a Canopy of Cloth of Gold, carried by eight Roman Barons, and at Night went to the Capitol.

THE next Day a Florentine, who held out Castel S. Angelo for Pope Gregory, capitulated to surrender it, for which he got Quarata, a good City in Puglia; and the King went to lodge in the Vatican, S. Peter's Palace. He made Riccardo di Sangro Governor of Rome, and Giannotto Torto, a great Baron in Abruzzo, Senator; and remain'd there till the twenty fifth of July. Thus did Ladislaus make himself Sovereign of Rome. He was the first who to his other Titles added that of King of Rome: whence it is, that in his Deeds and Letters Patent we read Rex Romæ; a Title that heretofore neither the Goths, Longobards, nor the French, though Kings of Italy, durst take, some out of Respect, others standing in Awe of the Emperors of the East, who were the true Sovereigns thereof.

BUT Ladislaus, perhaps, according to Costanzo, allur'd by the Charms of the Fair Sex, left Rome, and returned to Naples, where he spent all the Summer in Wantonness and Feasts; and while he was thus wallowing in Pleasures, neglecting his new Conquest, he had Advice that Rome had revolted; for Paolo Orsino, partly disgusted that he had preferred Giannotto to him in the Office of Senator, and partly not able to bear that Giannotto should use the Romans severely, without taking notice of him, persuaded the People of Rome to rise in Arms, and go to the Capitol to make the Senator Prisoner; and he with his own Troops attacked those of the King, who were going to the Senator's Assistance, and kill'd Francesco di Catania a noble Capuan, with many other gallant Soldiers; whereupon every one cried out, God save the Church of Rome, and down with the Tyrants; the King's Troops having retired without making further Opposition. This News gave the King a great deal of Uneasiness, but the Winter drawing on, he did not think of doing any thing that Year.

SECT II.

A Council call'd in Pisa, in order to put an end to the Schism, which proved unsuccessful.

WHILE these things were transacted in Italy, the King of France was still pursuing his Design of bringing the two contending Parties to renounce, in order to have a lawful Pope elected; but Gregory would not so much as hear of renouncing: whereupon his Cardinals, offended at his Conduct, deserted him, went to Pisa, and appealed from the Sentences which he pronounced against them to a future Council; but Gregory notwithstanding continued to proceed against them. On the other hand the King of France gave Benedict to understand, that he must absolutely renounce, and consent to an Accommodation, otherwise he would withdraw himself from his Obedience: but Benedict, no less obstinate than Gregory, immediately put forth a thundering Bull against the King's withdrawing, and sent it to France. The Bull had but a bad Reception, and those who carried it were arrested, and ignominiously treated; the Bull was torn, and a Neutrality published in France. Benedict, who was in Avignon, retired to Aragon. Gregory, to shew that the Accommodation had not failed on his Side, began to exculpate himself, and wrote a circular Letter, laying the Blame upon Benedict, that the Accommodation had not been concluded, and call'd a Council in Aquileia. Benedict, who had retired to Aragon, made the like Protestation, and convened another Council in Perpignan. The Cardinals of both Parties, seeing that by this Division the Church of God was without a Pope, and that the Estate of the Church was possessed by several Tyrants, having a secret Correspondence amongst themselves, call'd another Council in Pisa. Thus in the Year 1408 three Councils were call'd, the first in Perpignan by Benedict's Bull: the second in Aquileia by Gregory's Bull, which he published on the second Day of July, whereby he appointed the opening of the Council to be on Whitsunday following; and the third by the Letters of the Cardinals of both Parties, dated at Lezborn the fourteenth of July; whereby they intimated the opening of the Council to be in Pisa on the twenty fifth of March, 1409. Benedict was beforehand with them all, and opened his Council on the first Day of November, 1408. There were present at this Council in Perpignan the Bishops of Castile, Aragon, Navarre, and many other Prelates of France, Gascony, and Savoy, to the Number of an hundred and twenty, besides the four Archbishops honour'd with the Title of Patriarchs. When the Affair of the Schism came to be debated, the greatest Part of the Bishops left Perpignan, and the Council was then reduced to eighteen, who acknowledged Benedict for lawful Pope; therefore in order to unite the Church they advised him to renounce, in case his Competitor should either do the same, or die, or be deposed; and to send Legates to the Cardinals that were in Pisa with full Power to appoint a Treaty.

WHILE the Council in Perpignan was proceeding in this manner, the Cardinals of the two Colleges were employ'd in engaging all Princes to acknowledge their Council, and to approve of their Proceedings. Therefore on the twenty fifth Day of March, 1409, they opened the Council. First of all they summoned Pietro di Luna and Angelo Cornaro, the pretended Popes, and none of them appearing, the Council declared them contumacious. Then it was decreed, that the united College of Cardinals had Power of calling a Council, and that a General Council being convened, could proceed to a definitive Sentence. Then it was order'd, that no Person should obey the two pretended Popes: and lastly, having taken Cognizance of their Conduct, it was declared, that they had forfeited the Right which they pretended to the Papacy, and by a definitive Sentence they were deposed. The two Colleges proceeded afterwards to the Election of a lawful Pope, according to the Decree of the Council, and elected Pietro Filareto di Candia, Cardinal of Milan, of the Order of Friars Minors, who took the Name of Alexander V. and presided in the following Sessions of the Council, which he put an end to on the seventh Day of August, 1409. This Council was composed of twenty two Cardinals, four Patriarchs, twelve Archbishops, sixty seven Bishops in Person, eighty five Delegates, a great Number of Abbots, Generals and Deputies of Orders and Chapters, and of sixty seven Ambassadors of Kings and other Sovereign Princes.

ALEXANDER V. was acknowledged by the greatest Part of the Princes of Europe as true and lawful Pope; and though he was a Franciscan Friar, he had been many Years Archbishop of Milan, and afterwards made Cardinal by Pope Innocent VII. and being a Man of great Experience in worldly Affairs, he was no sooner crown'd than he resolved to restore the Apostolical See to its former State and Reputation; and seeing that King Ladislaus was preparing to make himself Master of Rome and the Estate of the Church, he enter'd into a League with the Florentines, who were already jealous of the Greatness and Courage of Ladislaus; and being likewise favour'd by France, which acknowledged him for true Pope, he sent thither to invite King Lewis, in order to oppose King Ladislaus in his Designs, and engage him in a new War.

ON the other hand Gregory had not neglected to open his Council in Aquileia, or Udine, on the Feast of the Holy Sacrament this same Year 1409; but it was very thin, there being but a very small Number of Prelates present: nevertheless, he got it declar'd in Council, that he and his Predecessors had been canonically elected; and that not only Pietro di Luna, and his Predecessors, but likewise Pietro di Candia, newly elected, were Intruders, and that they had no Right to the Papacy. Therefore he declar'd, that he was ready to renounce the Papacy really and de facto, provided Pietro di Luna and Pietro di Candia should renounce personally, and in the same Place. He created new Cardinals as well as Benedict had done: so that now, after the Council of Pisa, instead of two Popes there were three, by whom the Church was miserably rent. As soon as Gregory had put an end to the Council, not thinking himself safe in Udine, he went in Disguise to Abruzzo; whereupon Ladislaus having discover'd Alexander's Intrigues, immediately sent for Gregory, who was then with two Cardinals at Pietra Santa; and readily embracing Ladislaus's Invitation, he embark'd in the Port of Luna, and came to Gaeta, where he fixed his Residence, and where the King receiv'd him with great Respect as true Pope, and order'd him to be acknowledged as such in the Kingdom, and all his other Dominions. Gregory being acknowledged as Pope by no other Prince but Ladislaus, had a very thin Court. On the contrary, Alexander V. was own'd as lawful Pope by almost all Christendom, excepting our Kingdom, (which alone obey'd Gregory) and the Kingdoms of Aragon, Castile, Scotland, and the Dominions of the Count of Armagnac, Armagnac, which acknowledged Benedict. Germany was divided, for Robert King of the Romans hinder'd Alexander from being acknowledged, because in many Letters he had given the Title of King of the Romans to Wenceslaus King of Bohemia.

C H A P. VII.

King Lewis II. upon Pope Alexander's Invitation, returns to the Kingdom ; Alexander deposes Ladislaus, and gives Lewis a new Investiture.

WHILE Matters were in this Situation, King Lewis being invited by Pope Alexander ; and remembering of what Importance the Friendship of a Pope was to any one who desired to conquer, or keep Possession of the Kingdom of Naples, immediately embark'd, and with some Vessels that were in the Port of Marseilles, came to Leghorn, and from thence to Pisa to kiss the Pope's Feet ; by whom he was receiv'd with great Honour in a publick Consistory, and exhorted, according to the Example of his most Christian Predecessors, to take the Church under his Protection ; and that he might the more lawfully proceed to the Conquest of the Kingdom, the Pope, in another Consistory, pronounced King Ladislaus excommunicated and a Schismatick, depriv'd him of the Kingdom, and gave King Lewis new Investiture of it, declaring, that the Investiture he had got from Clement, who was not a true Pope, was invalid ; and it was resolved, that Braccio da Montone, Sforza da Cotignola, and Paolo Orsino, all of them Officers of great Renown, should be engaged in the Service. Whereupon Lewis went to Florence, to induce the Republick, by vertue of the League, to contribute towards the Pay of these three Officers, and Pope Alexander went to Bologna ; but being seventy Years of Age when he was chosen Pope, he was taken ill there, and on the third Day of May this Year 1410 he died. The Cardinals enter'd the Conclave, and on the fifth Day unanimously elected Baldassare Cossa a Neapolitan, and Cardinal of Bologna, who had been recommended by King Lewis, and who took the Name of John XXIII. This Pope, naturally as fiery and troublesome as Ladislaus, began his Pontificate with a Resolution of turning Ladislaus out of the Kingdom ; and because the Florantines were in Suspence, and unwilling to advance Money, before they knew whether the new Pope would confirm the League, King Lewis went to Bologna to adore him, and found him much readier to favour him than Alexander had been ; for he not only agreed to bear a Share of the Charges of the Land-Army, but had likewise hired a great Number of Genoese Gallies, which being joined with the French Fleet expected from Provence, were to attack the Kingdom by Sea.

MEAN while Ladislaus lost no time, for he no sooner heard of Pope Alexander's being taken ill, than he with his Army marched from the County of Sora to Rome ; and as that City was without a Garrison, and pretending to reduce it to Pope Gregory's Obedience, who was then in Gaeta, he took it without Opposition ; he there hearing of the Preparations of his Enemies, left Perretto d' Ibreia Count of Troja, and Gentile Monterano in Rome with three thousand six hundred Horse, and distributed the rest of his Army amongst some Cities of Compagna, giving Orders to the Officers, in Case of Need, to go to Rome and assist the Count of Troja, and went himself to Naples to raise Money, and to guard against any Attack that might be made upon the City by Sea. Having raised a great Sum of Money by selling Cities and Villages Villages at a very low Price, he fitted out eight Ships and six Galleys; and having thus taken care of the Sea-Affairs, he assembled all the Barons with a Design to go to Rome. But King Lewis having drawn near to that City, the Romans, at the Instigation of Paolo Orsino, who had come to Porta di S. Pangrazio, rose up in Arms; and though the Count of Troja made Resistance, he was at last forced to surrender. King Lewis having made himself Master of Rome, and appointed Magistrates in the Name of Pope John, he was eager to enter the Kingdom, and pursue the Victory; but Braccio, in order to recover some Cities of S. Peter's Patrimony, which held out for Ladislaus; and Paolo Orsino, in making himself Master of some Castles in Campagna spent so much time, that Ladislaus had leisure to look about him, and assemble a powerful Army. And in this place Angelo di Costanzo, very much to the Purpose, considers the Misfortune of the Kings of these Times, who rather serv'd than were served by the Soldiers of Fortune, who had their own Interest more at heart than the Victory of the Princes that paid them; of which Ladislaus was so sensible, that after he was of Age to fight for himself, he never made use of them, but when he could not do otherwise, always employing his own Subjects, or Foreigners, who had not so many Men as might make it dangerous to dismiss them, when they did not punctually obey his Commands.

AFTER Paolo and Braccio had driven Ladislaus's Soldiers out of those Places, they marched with Lewis, and by the Via Latina advanced with the Army towards the Kingdom. On the other hand Ladislaus with thirteen thousand Horse and four thousand Foot marched for Capua, and arrived under Rocca Secca about the same time that Lewis with his Army came to Ceprano; and King Lewis advancing a little further, encamped within a Mile of him. Both Parties consider'd, that to consume Time would occasion a Scarcity of Money for paying the Soldiers, who consequently would desert, therefore they willingly came to an Engagement. The Battel was begun about Evening, and with great Bravery on both Sides, lasted till it was dark Night; but at last Lewis's Army obtained the Victory; and Ladislaus, who to the very last struggled hard to defeat his Enemy, despairing of Victory, retir'd to Rocca Secca, and changing his Horse, went to S. Germano, whither all that escaped likewise went that very Night. Tho' Lewis gained the Battel, yet he knew not afterwards how to make use of the Victory; and it was very strange, that his victorious Army, led by the most skilful Commanders in Italy, did not pursue the Victory, whereby, without Dispute, he might easily have conquer'd the Kingdom. After the Victory King Lewis's Soldiers refused to march further till they were paid, expecting that Pope John would have sent Money upon the first News of the Victory; so that Lewis, instead of going forward, was obliged to return, with Braccio and Sforza to the Pope in Bologna. Pietro d' Humile, who was present at the Battel, writes, that Lewis's Army was so poor, that the Horsemen, who had made those of King Ladislaus's Army Prisoners, after having taken their Arms and Horses from them, and, according to the Custom of those Times, set them at Liberty, offer'd to return them both their Arms and Horses for eight or ten Duckets. Therefore King Ladislaus order'd Tommaso Cecalese his Treasurer to give Money to those who could not provide themselves from home; and it was not long before a great Number of Soldiers Boys went with a Trumpet from S. Germano, and return'd with Horse and Arms; so that in a short time King Ladislaus's Army was in a manner compleat again. To this was added, that Ladislaus beyond his Expectation was at full Liberty to do what he thought fit; for when King Lewis arriv'd at Bologna, to ask Succour of Pope John, he found him in great Trouble of Mind, because the Emperor Sigismund, mov'd with Christian Zeal for putting an end to the Schism, which had lasted so many Years, not only went in Person to some, but sent Ambassadors to all the rest of the Christian Princes to exhort them to join with him in order to force Benedict XIII. who was in Catalonia, Gregory XII. who was in Gaeta, and John XXIII. to come to a General Council, where it might be decided which of them was the true Pope, and to exclude him that did not come. And having got all the Princes to consent, he had caused Prelates from all Nations to be assembled in Constance, which had been pitched upon for holding the Council, and at that time he had sent to require Pope John to go to the Council: wherefore the Pope, doubtful of himself, was forced to tell King Lewis, that it behov'd him to mind his own Affairs, and make use of his Soldiers against the Tyrants, which upon the Noise of this Council had risen up against him, advising him to defer the War against the Kingdom of Naples to a more fit Opportunity; upon which Speech King Lewis left him in great Disgust, and went to Provence, where he died soon after, leaving three Sons, Lewis, Renatus, and another, of whom hereafter.

C H A P. VIII.

King Ladislaus makes new Attempts upon Italy. His Death, Virtues, and Vices; and in what Condition he left the Kingdom to Queen Joan II. his Sister and Heir.

LADISLAUS, beyond all Expectation, being freed from his Anxiety by Lewis's Departure, in order to be revenged of Pope John, began to infest the Ecclesiastical Estate. The Pope was at this time in the greatest Perplexity; for having shut himself up with his most trusty Friends to consult about his going to the Council, he found them of different Opinions; for many of them advised him not to go, and among these Cosmo di Medici a Florentine, a Man of great Wisdom, was one who told him, that it was inconsistent with the Decorum of the Pontifical Authority and the Dignity of Italy, upon an Order to go and deliver himself into the Hands of Barbarians, and be subject to their Determination: but being a Man of great Spirit, and trusting to the Justice which as it seem'd to him was on his Side, having been elected universal Pope by those very Cardinals who had rejected Benedict and Gregory as Anti-Popes, he resolved to go; and in Answer to all Reasons to the contrary, he gave a very plausible one, saying, that it would be of very ill Consequence, if by his Contumacy he should give them an Opportunity of electing another Pope in Germany, who afterwards, with the Emperor's Assistance, might come to Italy, when he was at War with King Ladislaus, and turn him out of the Chair. However, before he went, he endeavour'd to make Peace with Ladislaus; for which end he sent Cardinal Brancaccio, a Man of an excellent Life, and venerable for his Age, to Naples, who managed Matters so dexterously, that though Ladislaus knew very well, that the Pope was put to his Shifts, yet he got him to accept the Peace, by virtue whereof the King set at Liberty a Brother and some Relations of the Pope's, who were Prisoners, and the Pope paid him eighty thousand Florins.

THIS Year 1412, Queen Margaret, who had been many Years in Salerno, which, with other Cities, and that of Lefina, had been given her as her Dowry, being obliged to leave that City on account of the Plague that raged there, went to Acqua della Mela, a Village belonging to S. Severino, where she fell sick, and on the seventh of August died in the Arms of the King her Son, and was honourably interr'd in the Church of S. Francis in Salerno, where he caused a stately Monument of Marble to be erected, with an Inscription according to the Custom of those Times, which is to be seen at this Day.

POPE John being now resolv'd to go to the Council, appointed Braccio General of the Church, in order to subdue Francesco di Vico, who had revolted from her, and intitled himself Prefect of Rome. King Ladislaus, who was impatient of Ease, hearing of the Pope's Departure, assisted the Rebel: wherefore Braccio wrote to the Pope, that the King had broken the Peace. But the Affairs of the Council went so cross with John, that he did not mind those of Italy; so that Ladislaus, without any Regard to the Peace, the Year following, 1413, made himself Master of Rome, and very artfully, not only engaged Sforza in his Service, but likewise Paolo Orsino; for it was the Custom of those Times, that Soldiers of Fortune, after they were discharged from the Service of one Prince, went to serve another, without retaining taining any Grudge for the first whom they had serv'd: Nevertheless, Paolo knowing the King to be of a revengeful Temper, was doubtful; and thinking his bare Promise not sufficient, would have Security from the King, which was given him. Therefore Paolo and Orso Orfini came with a good Body of Troops well arm'd and accoutred, and the King put on a chearful Countenance. The better to conceal the Design he had of putting them to Death, he pretended to have a great Regard for Sforza; and though he hated him, as he did all Soldiers of Fortune, yet he carried fairer, and was more cautious of breaking his Engagements with him, than with the other two. Ladislaus was now ready to enter into a War with Tuscany; and the Florentines, jealous of his Ambition, were preparing to defend their Liberty. But Ladislaus, in order to surprize them, made a shew of marching his Troops another Way; so that having left Rome, and with great Ease taken Possession of all the Cities belonging to the Church, he distributed his Army amongst those Cities; and he staid himself in Perugia, with a Design not to discover his Intention for some Days, in order to keep the Cities of Tuscany, Romagna, and Lombardy in Awe, and to draw Contribution from them: whereupon Florence, Lucca, Sienna, Bologna, and other Cities, immediately sent Ambassadors, all which he receiv'd with great Complaisance, but spoke to them ambiguously, now and then pretending to be going to Lombardy. But at last accepting Presents from the other Cities, he put off the Florentine Ambassadors with fair Words. They, finding that he had a mind to attack Florence, had recourse to Treachery; for understanding that the King had an Intrigue with the Daughter of a Physician of Perugia, with whom he had familiar Conversation, 'tis said, that with a great Sum of Money they bribed the Physician, by the means of his Daughter to poison him: and that the Physician, through Avarice, preferring his own Profit to his Daughter's Life, perswaded her to anoint her privy Parts with a poisonous Ointment, when she was to lie with the King, making her believe, that it was a Composition of such Ingredients as would give the King so much Pleasure in the Act of Copulation, that he would still be the more in Love with her; and that by this means the King was seiz'd at first with a lingring unknown Illness; at which time Paolo and Orso coming to visit him, he caused them both to be secured, and put into close Prison; and all the Commanders having come to intreat him not to break the Promises he had given, the King answer'd them, that having been inform'd, that Paolo kept a Correspondence with the Florentines in order to betray him, for his own Safety he was obliged to have him secur'd; but if it was not true, he should be set at Liberty. This Solicitation prov'd very lucky for their Safety; for the Disease increasing, and the King having gone from Perugia to embark at Ostia, when the Commanders saw that he was resolved to carry the Prisoners with him, they pitched upon the Duke of Atri, who was to accompany the King, to take care that the Prisoners should not be thrown into the Sea. Upon the King's Arrival at Ostia he embarked in great Agony, and in a manner delirious declar'd, that he had no other Intention, but that the Prisoners might not escape; and arriving at Naples on the second of August this Year 1414, he was carried from the Shore to the Castle in a Litter; and he was no sooner laid in his Bed than he order'd Paolo to be beheaded. The Duke of Atri spoke to Joan the King's Sister, who managed every thing, (for the Queen was used rather like a Prisoner than a Queen) and told her how prejudicial it would be both to the King's Soul and his Dominions, if so great a Man, without any just Cause, should be put to Death; and he prevailed so far, that those who should visit the King the next Morning were order'd to tell him, that Paolo had been beheaded and quartered. Nor did the extreme Pleasure which this gave the King in the least abate the Violence of the Dis-temper, of which, on the sixth Day of August, he died, with the Character of a bad Christian. Joan, because he had died under Excommunication, order'd him to be buried without Pomp in S. John's Church; but she afterwards caused a stately Royal Tomb to be erected for him, which is to be seen there at this Day.

LADISLAUS, according to Sannazzaro, died before he had reign'd thirty Years complete; and he liv'd thirty nine Years. As the Example of the Prince has usually a great Influence upon the People, so in this Reign Arms flourished, and Learning was neglected; therefore we read of no such famous Lawyers, or other learned Men in these Times, Times, as flourished in the Reigns of King Robert and Queen Joan his Grandchild. The many Wars in a divided Kingdom, where often two Kings reign'd, oblig'd the People to have Arms more in their Hands than Books; whence we see, that in order to the better establishing the Civil and Political Government, no new Laws were thought upon for regulating the Tribunals and University: Amongst the Statutes of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, we have only one of Ladislaus; and the two contending Kings, Lewis and Ladislaus, keeping each of them his own Court, occasion'd that Confusion which in these Times we observe among the seven Officers of the Crown, of whom there can be no certain and continued Series and Succession set down. For the same Reason we likewise read of two High Constables, and two Great Protonotaries at the same time; and so of the rest.

Mors vetuit sextam claudere Olympiadem.

AS the warlike and undaunted Spirit of Ladislaus restor'd military Discipline in the Kingdom, so it increased the Number of Barons; and his selling and giving away so many Fiefs did not a little diminish the Royal Patrimony, which produced a remarkable Change in the Baronage. Formerly there were but few Barons, and much fewer Counts; as for Dukes, (seeing those of the Royal Family only, or their near Relations, had Principalities) there were none but the Duke of Anania, of the Family of Balzo, and the Duke of Sessa, of that of Marzano: Afterwards, in the Interval between the Death of Queen Joan I. and the Reign of Ladislaus, some Lords, who entertain'd military Men, possessed themselves of Cities, and usurp'd Titles at their Pleasure; and of these Vincilio Sanseverino was one, who, seeing the Title of Duke in the Families of Balzo and Marzano, likewise usurp'd the Title of Duke of Venosa. The Duke of Atri, of the Family of Aquaviva, did the same; and though the Marquis of Bellante, descended of this Duke, told Angelo di Costanzo, that the Family of Aquaviva possessed the Title of Duke by a Grant from Queen Joan II. some Years before she died; nevertheless Costanzo writes¹, that before that time he found the Title of Duke in that Family in a Book belonging to the Duke of Monteleone, the Paper and Character of which was so ancient, that it was plain it had been written in those Times; and that he had likewise read of it in the Annotations of Pietro d' Humile, who very accurately wrote the Transactions of Ladislaus, and Part of those of Queen Joan II; whence both the one and the other may be true; and that this Duke of Atri, who was alive when Ladislaus died, and the Father, who was General at Taranto, may have been call'd Dukes before they had that Grant from Queen Joan II. And it is truly worthy of Observation, that amidst the many Revolutions and Changes which in the Course of many Ages have happen'd in this Kingdom, this Family only has retained the Title of Duke, and with the Title the Possession of those very Lands, which by the noble Exploits of the illustrious Men of this Family for so many Ages were acquir'd. Some others, such as the Family of Sanseverino; the Ruffi, of the County of Sinopoli; that of Capua, of the County of Altavilla, retain also the Title of Counts, which their Predecessors had, but not of Dukes. The Dutchess of Andria and Sessa are more ancient, but are possessed by other Families.

AS for Marquisses, although such a Title began to be in Use in the other Parts of Italy, yet it was not known in our Kingdom till the Reign of Ladislaus, wherein we find Cecco del Borgo Marquis of Pescara; and Costanzo observes, that before him no other had had the Title of Marquis in the Kingdom of Naples.

ALTHOUGH, not only in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, but likewise in the Times of the Suevi and Normans, there were a great many Counts, yet in the Reign of Ladislaus their Number was hugely increased, of whom Summonte has given us a long Catalogue; and this Prince, by the Concession of so many Fiefs, much augmented the Number of Barons. Besides his being often in great Straits for Want of Money to maintain so many Wars, which oblig'd him to sell Fiefs at a very low Price, he was out of all measure most liberal; and whether he had, or wanted, he made use of just and unjust Means indifferently in order to have Money. Being a Lover of gallant Men, and frequently diverting himself with Tournaments and warlike Exercises, in which he was very skilful, he thought he could never give enough either of Honour and Riches to the Man he saw give Proof of his Skill in these Exercises. When he triumph'd in Rome the second time, hearing of the Preparations which King Lewis, with the Assistance of the new Pope Alexander, was making to invade the Kingdom, he left Rome, and came to Naples to raise Money; and Angelo Costanzo ¹ writes, that he then, according to the Registers, sold a vast Number of Cities and Villages at a very low Rate, not only to Neapolitan Gentlemen, but to many of the Commonalty, and Jews newly baptiz'd. He likewise sold many Offices, and even the Order of Knighthood, which he afterwards was wont to make a Jest of; and of some Cities he made different Grants at the same time to different Persons. Afterwards, when he was making Preparation for the War of Tuscany, he likewise came to Naples to raise Money, and began to sell Cities and Villages not only belonging to those who had been forfeited for Rebellion, but likewise to those who were not in the least suspected. There is a great List to be seen in the Royal Archives of Cities and Villages bought by Gurrello Origlia at a very low Rate. And 'tis truly wonderful to consider the Riches of this Gurrello, who, in dividing what he had acquir'd among his Sons, reckoned up more than sixty, Cities, Towns and Villages, and of six Sons, there was not one, to whom he gave less than eight; but that Felicity was of short Duration; for Queen Joan, who succeeded, deprived him of every thing. This Prince also, in order to fix Sforza the more in his Interest, gave to Francesco his eldest Son Tricarico, Senisi, Tolve, Crachi, Salandra, and Calciano, and was as profuse in giving to the Stendardi, Mormili, and others, of whom Costanzo ² has made a long Catalogue.

WHENCE it came to pass, that whereas formerly there were but few Counts that possessed Counties, but very many Barons, in this Reign the Number of Counts increas'd, and that of the Barons in proportion; for not only Citizens of the other principal Cities of the Kingdom, but likewise many Families of the City of Naples, though not belonging to the Seggi, had Fiefs and Villages; and whereas before the Ruin of so many great Barons expelled by Ladislaus, there were no more than seventeen Families in all the Seggi that had Cities and Villages, and those but few and small; at his Death it was found, that more than twenty two other Families had been added, particularly to the Seggi of Porta Nova and Porta, the Nobility of which were his special Favourites, and that besides those that did not belong to the Seggi, who were possessed of Baronies either by Gift or Sale.

ALTHOUGH Ladislaus had three Wives, Constantia, whom he divorced; Mary, Daughter to the King of Cyprus; and the Princess of Taranto; yet he had no Children by any of them; therefore his Sister Joan succeeded him in the Kingdom. Besides these Wives, being a most lustful Prince, he had many Concubines, viz. the Daughter of the Duke of Sessa, another call'd Contessella, whose Name or Sirname Costanzo could not find; and he kept these two in Castel Nuovo, from whence they never mov'd, not even when he married the Princess of Taranto; at which she was so much offended, thinking herself slighted, that he sent them to Castel dell' Uovo, where Maria Guindazzo, another of his Concubines, staid. He had also some others in Naples and Gaeta, where he had his Pimps for furnishing him with the most lively and beautiful Women, after the manner of the Sultans of Egypt, and the Ottoman Emperors now-a-days. His Sister Joan would not have it said, that she came short of her Brother in that; for she was no sooner left the Duke of Austria's Widow, than she took care to provide herself with Gallants: so that we may say, that King Charles III. and Queen Margaret his Wife brought into the World two prodigious Monsters of Lust and Filthiness. Of all his Concubines only one Lady of Gaeta bore him a Bastard Son named Rinaldo, to whom he gave the Title of Prince of Capua, though without Lands, whom he married to a Daughter of the Duke of Sessa. During all the Revolutions that happened in the Reign of Queen Joan his Aunt, Rinaldo, not thinking fit to stay in Naples, retired to Foggia, where he ended his Days, and was buried in the great Church of that City, in the same Chapel where the Corpse of King Charles I. the Stock of the Family of Anjou had been deposited. He left one Son, named Francesco, and many Daughters. Francesco had only one Son, after his Grandfather named Rinaldo, who having married Camilla Tomacella, died soon after, and was buried in the same Chapel, where his Father, who soon followed him, caused a Monument to be erected to him, with an Epitaph, transcribed by Summonte ³, which is still to be seen.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXV.

Y the Death of King Ladislaus, much lamented by all the noble Neapolitans, who followed the Art of War, all military Discipline was at an end, and nothing but Confusion come in its Place; for the Soldiers wanting Pay, listed themselves under Fabrizio and Giulio Cesare of Capua, the Caldori and Count of Troja, who carried them to their own Estates, where they maintained them, expecting to be employed by other Princes, as some of them afterwards were. And in this manner in a short time that great Army, which had fought under the Banners of this valiant King, was dispersed. And of so many Cities taken in Compagna di Roma, Ostia alone remained in the Possession of Joan the Widow of the Duke of Austria, and the Castle of S. Angelo in Rome; and the same Day that her Brother Ladislaus died, she was proclaimed Queen by the Neapolitans, without seeking Investiture. Sforza hearing of the King's Death came to wait upon Queen Joan in Naples, and entered into her Service.

ALTHOUGH there was but a small Number of Noblemen of the Anjou Faction left in the City of Naples, many of them having gone to France, and those who had staid were very poor; yet during the Reign of Ladislaus they were in great great Reputation, not only for the Art of War, which was then in vogue, and brought great Honour and Advantage to many Noblemen, but much more on account of Estates, which either by Gift or Sale Ladislaus had distributed among the Families of all the Seggi, and others. But in the beginning of the Reign of Queen Joan II. such a change of Government was discovered, that many wise Men prophesied, that in a short time the Durazzo Faction would be in no better State than that of Anjou, to the utter Ruin of the Kingdom; for Joan, when she was Duchess of Austria, had fallen in Love with her Cup-Bearer, or as others will have it, her Carver, named Pandolfello Alop, to whom she had privately prostituted her Person; but afterwards when she came to be Queen, shaking off all Fear and Shame, she likewise prostituted the Government of the Kingdom; for having made him High-Chamberlain, whose Office, as we have told elsewhere, is to have the charge of the Royal Demains and Revenues of the Kingdom, and suffering him to manage every thing as he thought fit, the whole Kingdom was in a manner at his Disposal. But Sforza conversing in the Castle with the Queen about Affairs relating to his Command, and she jesting familiarly with him, and blaming him for not marrying, Pandolfello became jealous; for though Sforza was about forty Years of Age, yet he was of a comely Stature, robust, and had a Soldier-like Countenance, fit to inflame the Queen's natural Lasciviousness; and without giving them time to go on in their Discourse, he said to the Queen, That Sforza was in King Lewis's Interest, and had sent to invite his Army to come to the Kingdom, in order to take Naples, the Castle, and her self; and that he had had Advice of this from very sure Hands, and which required immediate Provision for preventing it. The Queen being put to a stand, bid him look to it; and gave Orders, that the first time that Sforza should come to the Castle he should be told, that she was in the Tower Beverella; so that Sforza having come, found People there who disarmed him, and forced him to go down to the Prison where Paolo and Orso were.

WHEN this was known in Naples, the Durazzo Faction was grievously offended, and especially those who had been of Ladislaus's Council, who immediately went and told the Queen, that they were very much surprized, that by the Advice of Count Pandolfello alone she had caused so famous and able a General as Sforza to be imprisoned, when it required the Advice not only of all the most knowing Men of Naples, but of the whole Kingdom, because both the Interest of the Crown and Kingdom was at stake, and nothing but Blood and Confusion would be the Consequence, if Paolo's Soldiers should join with those of Sforza for setting their Generals at Liberty. The Queen answered, That she had ordered the Count to advise with the Council, but the Danger being so imminent, he had not had time; and that she would give Orders to have the Matter judicially examined, and if he was found innocent he should be set at Liberty. Those Counsellors urged again, that Stefano di Gaeta a Doctor of the Law should take Cognizance of the Matter, which was ordered accordingly.

C H A P. I.

Queen Joan II. marries James Count de la Marche, of the Blood Royal of France.

HIS Expostulation very much perplexed both the Queen and Count Pandolfello, but especially the Count; and so much the more, that all those of the Council in a Body went and represented to the Queen, that she being the only remaining Branch of the Stock of King Charles, and of the many Kings that had reigned for a hundred and fifty Years, she ought to take a Husband in order to have Children, and to secure the Quiet of the Kingdom, which, in the State it was in, could not be long without some Commotions. To this was added, that Ambassadors from England, Spain, Cyprus and France, arrived in Naples at Christmas to treat about the Marriage, which induced the Queen to come to a Resolution. And as the Infant Don John of Aragon, the Son of King Ferdinand, seemed to be the best Match, because Ferdinand was in Possession of the Island of Sicily, from whence he could quickly send Assistance to the Queen against her Competitors; the Council persuaded her to send Messer Goffredo di Mont' Aquila a Doctor of Law, and Friar Antonio di Tassi, Head of the Conventuals of S. Francis to Catalonia to treat about the Marriage; from Catalonia they went to Valencia, where, to the great Joy of that King they soon concluded it. But when the Ambassadors returned to Naples, and told, that the Infant Don John was only eighteen Years of Age, the Queen being then forty seven, a Messenger was sent to undo all that had been agreed to, and James Count de la Marche of the Blood-Royal of France, but at a great Distance from the Crown, was pitched upon, judging that he might be treated with upon easier Terms than the others, who might pretend to greater Titles; and it was agreed with the French Ambassadors, that he was not to take the Title of King, but should be contented with that of Count, and Governor General of the Kingdom; as to the rest the Queen was to use him with all the Respect imaginable. The Ambassador, after having been solicited by many to hasten the Count's coming, left Naples, and with this the Minds of the People were at Ease. But Pandolfello thinking, that though the Queen's Husband was only to have the Title of Count, yet that was not sufficient for his Security, and knowing that he was envied by many, who wanted to have him ruined, resolved to strengthen himself by Friends and Alliances; for which end, in order to make court to Sforza, he went to visit him in the Prison, and made him believe, that the Queen, at the Instigation of others, had made him Prisoner, and that he himself was doing what he could to have him set at Liberty. Sforza, who was naturally a downright and sincere Man, taking what he said to be true, thanked him, and promised to do him all the Offices of Gratitude in his Power; Pandolfello bid him take Courage, for he would get Catarinella Alop his Sister, a great Favourite of the Queen's, to interpose in his Behalf. A few Days after having imparted his Thoughts to the Queen, he persuaded her to agree to what he was about, and returning to the Prison, he told Sforza, that he had not only obtained his Liberty, but his Advancement also; and that the Queen had granted him his Liberty expressly upon Condition that he should marry Catarinella, who had been at so great Pains to procure it for him; and that instead of a Portion she would make him High-Constable, with eight thousand Duckets a Month for paying his Soldiers. Sforza came out of Prison, son, and the Marriage was celebrated with great Pomp; but the Council were highly offended with the Queen on account of this Marriage, looking upon it as a most scandalous thing, that a pitiful Cup-bearer (for so they called him) should have the Disposal both of the Queen's Mind and Person; but the Servants of King Charles III. and King Ladislaus were much more enraged to see the Memory of these two glorious Kings dishonoured, and among the rest Giulio Cesare di Capua seemed to be the most affected, who having entertained a great Number of Ladislaus's Soldiers upon Sforza's Imprisonment, aspired at great Matters; but when he saw him set at Liberty, and joined with Pandolfello, it seemed that these two had set up for a Duumvirate, that should be able to cope with the Count de la Marche, and share out the Kingdom; so that when Advice came that the Count was in Venice, and in a few Days would be at Manfredonia, Giulio Cesare, with some Barons, without any Order, went to meet him in the Plains of Troja, and was the first that dismounted, and saluted him King, and the rest followed his Example. Then he told him in what a miserable State the Kingdom was, and the great Hopes the People had of being relieved by his Majesty, for the Queen, being madly in Love, had basely given herself up a Prey to a Scoundrel, who having contracted Alliance with another Villain, a Commander of Soldiers, disposed of and tyrannized over the Kingdom, to the great Reproach of the Crown and the Blood-Royal; and therefore it behoved him, with the Character of King, and not of Count, to take the Government upon him, and not to suffer these two Hangmen to strangle him, as King Andrew, the Husband of another Queen Joan, had been served; for whenever the Queen should find herself debarred from her Amours with a Man she loves so much, she would not fail to lay Snares for his Life. King James was struck with Grief and Shame, for not having brought an Army with him, it looked as if he was uncertain of Empire, but very certain of Danger and Infamy; nevertheless he thanked Giulio, and promised, that he would take his Advice in every thing, and trust to his Courage. The next Day Sforza, being sent by the Queen with a great Train of Attendants, met the King about six Miles from Benevento, and without dismounting saluted him, not as King, but Count: The King, with a stern Countenance, made him no other Answer, but asked how the Queen did; whereupon those that were in Company with him, seeing Sforza so coldly received, and understanding that the Count had been proclaimed King, went and kissed his Hand as such. But Sforza coming afterwards to wait upon the King, Giulio Cesare, with a Design to please the King, meeting him on the Stairs, said to him, That it did not become him, who was born in a Village of Romagna, not to give that Lord the Title of King, which the native Barons of the Kingdom had given him; and Sforza answering, That though he was born in Romagna, with Sword in Hand he would make it appear, that he was a Man of as much Honour as any Lord in the Kingdom; and both of them, with a great Noise, drawing their Swords, while the other Gentlemen who were present were endeavouring to part them, the Count of Troja came out of the King's Chamber, who, as High-Steward, had Power to punish Insults offered in the King's House, and caused them both to be locked up in different Rooms; but Giulio Cesare was set at Liberty that same Evening, and Sforza was put into a Dungeon.

THE Queen having Advice that same Night of what had happened, sent the next Morning to call the Magistrates of Naples, and told them, that her Husband being to make his Entry into the City the Day following, they must take care to receive him as King. The Neapolitans accordingly received and saluted the Count as King, who, upon his arrival in the Hall of the Castle, found the Queen there, who dissembling her inward Grief, received him with the greatest Demonstrations of Joy imaginable; and the Archbishop of Naples being likewise in the Hall with the Queen in his Pontifical Garments, the Marriage was solemnized with the usual Ceremonies, and they both went to the Bed-chamber, where there were two Royal Seats; and the Queen holding her Husband by the Hand, turned towards the Ladies, Gentlemen and others present, and said, You see this Lord to whom I have given the Government of my Person, and now I give him that of the Kingdom: Let whoever loves me, and has a regard for my Family, call him, acknowledge him, and serve him as King. These Words were followed by an universal Acclamation, crying out, God bless King James and Queen Joan our Sovereigns. The rest of the Day was spent in Balls, Concerts, and was concluded with a Supper, and then the King went to Bed to the Queen.

THE Day following, when the Ladies and Gentlemen returned in order to continue the Feast as was expected, they perceived by the Countenances of the King and Queen that their Thoughts were taken up with more serious Matters than Feasting; for Sforza had been brought from Benevento in Chains, and as a remarkable Instance of the Vicissitude of Fortune, was committed to the same Prison, out of which a few Days before he had been taken with so much Grandeur.

THE next Day the King caused Count Pandolfello to be taken, and carried to Prison in the Castle dell' Uovo, where he was most cruelly tormented, and confessing all that the King wanted to know, he was condemned to die, and on the first of October he was led to the Market-place, where he was beheaded, and his Body was afterwards shamefully dragged through the City, and then hung by the Feet, to the Queen's great Grief, and the great Joy of all the Servants of King Ladislaus.

KING James having found what Giulio Cesare had told him of the Queen's dishonourable Life to be true, resolved to deprive her of the Means of getting a new Gallant; for which end he dismissed all her Favourites from Court, and in their room took as many of his own Frenchmen; and he began to keep her so close, that no Person whatever could speak to her, unless an old Frenchman, pitched upon for that purpose, was present, and who performed his Office with so much Severity, that without his Permission the Queen could not so much as retire to go to Stool.

IF King James, after he had thus curbed the Queen, had known how to ingratiate himself with the Barons, every thing would have gone on to his Heart's Desire, because all the Barons so much detested the Memory of the time of Pandolfello, and the dissolute Life of the Queen, who was ready to prostitute herself to every vile Fellow, that they were overjoyed to see her humbled; and they were more willing to obey the King, than be in danger of being tyrannized over by a new Gallant. But though the King used them with a great deal of Courtesy, yet his bestowing all Offices upon Frenchmen, much alienated them from him; so that it seemed as if they had fallen out of the Frying-Pan into the Fire; but of all the rest Giulio Cesare was the most disgusted; and being naturally ambitious, and having always aspired to be one of the seven Officers of the Crown, he could not bear to see the Offices of High-Constable, High-Chamberlain, and High-Steward given to Frenchmen, and himself, who had advised the Count to take the Title of King, neglected. Besides, the Queen's Confinement was a great Loss and Inconveniency both to the Neapolitan Nobility and Commonalty; for not only a great Number of those who had been employed in her Court were discarded, and without Support, but all the rest had lost Hopes of having wherewithal to live as Matters then stood; moreover, there being no more Balls, and the Youth not having the usual Pleasure of making their Court to the Queen, by their Dexterity at Tournaments, nor the Ladies an Opportunity of partaking of the Diversions of the Court, Melancholy was spread over all the City; therefore it being now three Months since the Queen had been seen, a great Number of Gentlemen, and Citizens of Credit met, went to the Castle, and said, That they wanted to see the Queen their Mistress; and although the old Frenchman told them that the Queen was retired diverting herself with the King, and would receive no Messages: all of them said, that they would not depart without seeing her. The King seeing this Obstinacy came out, and with a chearful and mild Countenance told them, That the Queen was indisposed, and that if they wanted any Favour, he was as ready to grant it, as the Queen. Then they all cried out with a loud Voice: We want no other Favour of your Majesty, but that you would use our Queen well, and as becomes her, who is descended of so many Kings our Benefactors, for by so doing we shall have Reason to love your Majesty. These Words, which seemed to be spoken with a strong Emphasis, put the King to a stand, and he answered, That for their Sakes he would do so.

Giulio Cesare being informed of what had passed, pushed on by Indignation and Ambition, resolved to be revenged of the King's Ingratitude, and to endeavour (by setting the Queen at Liberty) to succeed Pandolfello; and coming to Naples, after he had with great Diffimulation and profound Respect waited on the King, he said, That he would gladly visit the Queen. The Courtiers knowing the King had an entire Confidence in him introduced him to her Chamber, and gave him Opportunity to speak whatever he had a Mind. Then out of the height of Folly, trusting himself to a Woman whom he had so grievously offended, he told her, that he had a great

a great Mind to put the King to Death, and thereby put an end to her present Bondage and Misery. The Queen suspected that it was a Contrivance of the King's for feeling her Pulse; whereupon, in order to sweeten the King and be revenged of Giulio, she resolved to discover the whole, and in the mean time to say that she was very well satisfied. The Queen imparted the Secret to the King, and that he might hear it with his own Ears, it was agreed, that when Giulio returned the King should be placed behind the Hangings. He returned, and the King heard after what manner he was to assassinate him, but when he went out of the Court, and was putting his Foot in the Stirrup, he and his Secretary were seized, and carried to Castel Capuano, and being convicted, two Days after they were led to the Market-place and beheaded. All these things happened in five Months after King James's arrival at Naples.

BY this Instance of Giulio Cesare, the King finding what sort of Men he had to deal with, began to be upon his Guard, and to keep at a Distance those Barons and Gentlemen, with whom he was wont to be very familiar; and besides he daily enlarged the Queen from her Confinement, and seemed to be sensible of the Obligation he lay under to her, for the Fidelity she had shewed him; but yet he would suffer no Person to visit her, and the importunate old Frenchman was still continued as a Guard upon her, which still kept up the Discontent of the People, for very few had access to the King, and none to the Queen; and in this manner did they live from the beginning of the Year 1415 to the Month of September following.

IN this Month it happened that the King gave the Queen Liberty to dine in a Garden belonging to a Florentine Merchant, and as soon as it was heard in the City that the Queen had got abroad, a great Number of the Nobility and Commonalty run thither to see her; and they saw her in such a Condition, as raised their Compassion; and she very artfully, with Tears in her Eyes and Sighing, looked upon them all with a gracious Countenance, and as if, with a pitiful Silence, she demanded their Assistance. Among the rest Ottino Caracciolo and Anacchino Mormile a Gentleman of Porta Nuova, and a great Favourite of the People, had gone to see the Queen. These two having agreed to set the Queen at Liberty, went to stir up the Nobility and People, and with a great Multitude of armed Men, returned at the very instant that the Queen was stepping into her Coach; and making Way through the Courtiers, they bid the Coachman drive to the Archbishop's Palace. The Queen with a loud Voice cried out, My faithful People, for the Love of God don't forsake me, for I put both my Life and Kingdom into your Hands; and all the Multitude, with a loud Voice cried out, God save Queen Joan. The terrified Courtiers run all to Castel Nuovo to tell the King of the Tumult, and that the Queen was not returning to the Castle. The King, afraid of being besieged in Castel Nuovo, went to Castel dell' Uovo. A vast Number of Ladies went immediately to wait upon the Queen; and the most antient Nobility of all the Seggi joined in a Body, and judging that it was not convenient for the Queen to be in that Palace, they carried her to Castello di Capuana, and made the Governor deliver it up to her. The Youth were much delighted with this Hurly-burly, and cried out, Let us besiege the King; but the most prudent of the Nobility were of Opinion, that the present Fermentation of the City was to be allayed in such a manner, as they might not fall out of the Frying-pan into the Fire; for they foresaw that the Queen, seeing herself free of all Restraint, would give herself and the Kingdom up into the Hands of some other more insupportable Gallant. Therefore they began to think of Means, whereby they might put a Stop to the insolent Behaviour of the King, and at the same time keep a Check upon the Queen; whereupon Deputies were sent from all the Seggi, to treat of an Accommodation with the King, who being destitute of all Assistance, was forced to yield to whatever Terms were proposed, and these were the Conditions they agreed to: That upon the Faith of the Neapolitans he should come and live with his Wife: That he should allow the Queen, as lawful Sovereign of the Kingdom, to appoint and establish a suitable Court, and that the Kingdom should be Hers, as had been stipulated at first, when the Marriage was made: That he should retain the Title of King, and have forty thousand Ducquets yearly for maintaining his Court, which for the most part should consist of Neapolitans.

C H A P. II.

King James's Imprisonment; his Release by the Mediation of Martin V. elected Pope by the Council of Constance; his Flight and Retreat to France, where he turned Monk; and the Coronation of Queen Joan.

THE Queen, in appointing her Court, pitched upon Sergianni Caracciolo to be her High-Steward; Sergianni was above forty Years of Age, but in his Person handsome and robust, and a Gentleman of great Prudence. She made Marino Boffo, a Doctor and a Gentleman of Pozzuolo, President of her Council, to whom she gave for Wife Giovannella Stendarda a rich Heiress: She gave the Office of High-Chamberlain to the Count of Fondi of the Family of Gaeta; and her Court was made up of handsome and gallant young Men; the chief of which were, Urbano Origlia and Artuso Pappacoda; and she caused Sforza to be taken out of Prison, and restored him to the Office of High-Constable; and being in love with Sergianni, her whole Thoughts were employed to dispatch the King, in order to enjoy him at her Pleasure. But Sergianni very prudently told her, That if she should offer any Violence to the King, all the City of Naples would immediately come to his Assistance, since the Accommodation was made upon the Faith of the Neapolitans, and that she ought first, with Favours and good Offices, to gain the Good-will of the chief Men of all the Seggi, that thereby, for their own Advantage, they might by Degrees desert the King; whereupon it was concerted, that the Queen should dispose of the Offices in such a manner, that not only the Nobility, but the chief Men of the Commonalty should partake of them. By this Means the City was fully satisfied: Only Ottino Caracciolo and Anneccchino Mormile were exceedingly offended, complaining of the Queen's Ingratitude, who, having been relieved by them from so rigorous a Bondage, had entirely neglected them; of which Sergianni being apprized, he got the Queen to give Ottino the County of Nicastro, which put Anneccchino in a much greater Rage. And Sergianni being jealous of Sforza, who was in a higher Station, and more powerful than he, and being at Court might gain the Precedence in Council, and turn him out of the Queen's Favour, whose Lasciviousness he very well knew: He found an Opportunity to have him sent from Court; for Braccio da Montone, a famous Soldier of Fortune, having made himself Master of Rome, had laid Siege to Castel S. Angelo, which held out for the Queen; whereupon he proposed in Council, that Sforza should be sent to relieve it (perhaps expecting that Braccio would defeat and ruin him) and accordingly the Queen ordered him to go.

HAVING got Sforza removed, he resolved to rid himself likewise of Urbano Origlia, who by his Comeliness and Valour was daily creeping into the Queen's Favour, and under Colour of doing him Honour, he got the Queen to send him her Ambassador to the Council of Constance, which was endeavouring to remove the Schism that had lasted so many Years, and where the Ambassadors of all other Christian Princes met the Emperor Sigismund, in order to acknowledge the Pope that should be elected in that Council. Sergianni having thus made himself Master of the Queen's Household, he began now to think of making himself Master of her Person likewise; and he had such Influence upon the Queen, that one Night as she was at Supper with the King, she told him, That she would have all the French turned out of the Kingdom; the King answered, That they must first be paid for their Service in following him out of France; and the Queen replying in a haughty and imperious manner, That she would have them turned out in spite of him, the King not able to bear so great Insolence, rose from the Table and went to his Chamber, and the Queen put him under a Guard of Men that were there for that Purpose. The next Day she issued out a Proclamation, ordering all the French, in the Space of eight Days, to leave the Kingdom. The French, seeing the King a Prisoner, made haste to be gone.

THUS both the Kingdom and Queen fell into the Hands of Sergianni, who being resolved to make use of his time, got the Queen to restore the Count of Nolæ to his Estate, and the Office of Lord Chief Justice, provided he would marry one of his Sisters; and he gave another of them in Marriage to the Brother of the Count of Sarno; it looked very odd, that two Women, who a few Days before had been upon the Point of marrying two Gentlemen of no great Quality, without Portions should rise so high.

THIS so sudden absolute Sway of Sergianni created him much Envy, and equally drew great Infamy upon the Queen, especially with those of the Durazzo Faction, and those that had been Favourites of King Charles III. and King Ladislaus, who saw the Memories of these two glorious Kings, and the Name of the most antient Family in the World dishonoured by such abominable Wickedness; and they went about murmuring and stirring up the Nobility and People, saying, that they ought not to suffer an innocent King, to whom so noble and honourable a City had pledged its Faith, to be kept Prisoner in the very same House where the Adulterer lay with his Wife; and that perhaps all France would revenge the Injury done to their Royal Blood, and of all the rest Annechino Mormile was the most violent.

BUT Sergianni, who was one of the most artful and prudent Men in those times, caused all the Pensions that had been given to the French to be distributed among the principal Gentry and Citizens; and to make good his Interest with the Common People, who were the most easily provoked, he bought with the Queen's Money great Store of Provisions, and sold them at a very low Price, and by this Art he rendered all the Attempts of his Enemies fruitless.

HE was now afraid of none but Sforza, who having relieved Castel S. Angelo, was returned very much dissatisfied with him, saying, That Sergianni had not sent Money to pay the Soldiers in due time, on purpose to oblige them to mutiny and take Service under Braccio; and therefore he had halted at Mazzone, and from thence, without coming to wait upon the Queen, he marched into Basilicata. By this Sergianni found that Sforza bore him a Grudge, and in order to strengthen himself, and that Sforza might not have all the Troops of the Kingdom under his Command, he immediately engaged in the Queen's Service Francesco Orsino, who at that time had the Reputation of a good Officer; he likewise caused Giacomo Caldora to be set at Liberty, and gave them Money, in order to go to Abruzzo and levy Men; and under pretence of a Correspondence with Sforza, he caused Annechino to be imprisoned, lest upon Sforza's coming he should stir up the People to receive him and his Men into the City.

WHILE Affairs were thus transacting in the Kingdom, after much debating the Cardinals and Deputies of the Council of Constance entered the Conclave, and on the Feast of S. Martin 1417 unanimously elected Odone Colonna Cardinal Deacon by the Title of S. George, who took the Name of Martin V. on account of the Day of his Election, who was acknowledged over all Christendom, which put an end to the Schism, that for so many Years had rent the Church. The French immediately solicited the new Pope to intercede with the Queen for King James's Liberty, of which Urbano Orsilia presently advised the Queen. But Sergianni found out a Remedy for that, by immediately sending Belforte Spinello di Giovanazo Bishop of Cassano his trusty Friend, and Lorenzo Teologo Bishop of Tricarico Ambassadors to the Pope in the Name of the Queen to congratulate him upon his Election, and to offer him all the Forces of the Kingdom for recovering the Estate and Dignity of the Church, promising, upon his arrival at Rome, to give him Castel S. Angelo and Offiz.

ON the other hand Sforza returned to Naples, and drawing up his Troops in order at the Gate del Carmelo, he entered and made them cry out, God save Queen Joan, and down with her corrupt Council. Francesco Orsino with his Men immediately diately stood to their Arms, and attacked Sforza with so much Fury, that he was obliged to retire, and by the hollow Ways he marched to the Prince's Village, from whence by Letters and Messages he solicited all the Barons that were his old Friends to free themselves from the Tyranny of Sergianni. At last he brought over many of them to his Party, and on the second of October he came with his Army to the Fragola, and from thence he laid waste the Villas of the Neapolitans; whereupon there arose a great Tumult in Naples, and the Scarcity of such things as were daily wont to be brought and sold in the City increasing, by being intercepted by Sforza's Horse, in order to prevent greater Mischief, some old Men proposed, that Deputies should be appointed, as was done in the time of Queen Margaret, who should have the care of the good Government of the City; to which the Nobility and Commonalty with one Voice consented, and immediately twenty Deputies were chosen, ten out of the Nobility, and as many out of the Commons, who by a publick Instrument swore a perpetual Union between the Commons and Nobility. These Deputies pitched upon ten of themselves, five of the Nobility and five of the Commons to go to Sforza and learn the Reason of this Defection from the Queen and the City, where he had so many Well-wishers, and to entreat him to put a Stop to all Hostilities for some Days, that Means might be found out for satisfying him in every thing that was just; they were honourably received by Sforza, who answered them very courteously, that he was the Queen's faithful Servant, and looked upon himself to be a loving Citizen of Naples; and that he had come there to be revenged of Sergianni, wondering, that so many powerful Noblemen and gallant Gentlemen, as were in Naples, should suffer themselves to be under so shameful a Slavery; that he was come to relieve them, and at last concluded, that he would lay all his Grievances before the Lords Deputies. These replied, That what he said was so honourable, that he should find the City willing and ready to second him; and a Day was appointed for a meeting between him and all the Deputies, in order to treat about what was fit to be done; and in the mean time Sforza assured them, that the Citizens might freely come out to their Villas, and he would forbid plundering.

THE Deputies returning to the City very well pleased, went to the Queen to beg of her, that she would be pleased to consent to such things as Sforza justly demanded, and thereby free the City from so great Danger, and to their Request they added some Protestations. The Queen in a pannick Fear could make no other Answer, but said, Go and see what Sforza wants of me, and return. The Deputies did not fail to go and wait upon Sforza at the appointed time, and they got from him the Articles and Conditions that he would have, the principal of which were these: That Sergianni should be turned out of the Government and Court: That Annecchino and some other Prisoners should be set at Liberty: That he himself should have what Pay was due to him to that Day, and twenty four thousand Duckets for the Loss he had sustained by the Defeat given him by Francesco Orsino. The Queen took the Articles, and said, That she would advise with her Council what was fit to be done, and would give her Answer in two Days. Then Sergianni seeing that he was not able to withstand the City joined with Sforza, prudently chose to yield to the Times, rather than to endanger the Queen; and in her Presence she made him sign his own Sentence of Banishment to the Island of Procida, promising to fulfil all the other Conditions: He was the first that performed his part of the Articles, because he knew that Sforza could not stay long in Naples, and that his Banishment would be soon at an end; the other Conditions were quickly performed by the Queen.

IN the mean time Pope Martin V. having been often solicited by the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy to procure King James's Liberty, had sent to Naples Antonio Colonna his Nephew to ask that Favour of the Queen, morelike an Inferiour than an Equal or Superior, because he had a Mind to make use of the Queen's Troops for recovering the Estate of the Church out of the Hands of the Tyrants. Besides the honourable Reception which Sergianni got the Queen to give Antonio Colonna, he himself in particular gave him so kindly an Entertainment and Promises, that he laid such Obligations on him, which, as shall be related hereafter, proved very advantageous to him; but as for setting the King at Liberty, the Queen promised to do it when it should be consistent with her own Safety, and when the Pope should be nearer at Hand to protect her against the frequent Commotions.

SERGIANNI's Banishment to a Place so near, in Appearance only, seemed to have diminished his Authority, for in effect there was nothing done in Council or at Court, which was not communicated to him by continual Messages; and in the mean while Antonio Colonna laboured so much to pacify Sforza, that he was not so intent upon depressing him. Mean time the Pope had come from Mantua to Florence; whereupon the Queen pitched upon Sergianni to go and do him Homage in her Name, and to restore him those Fortresses, which King Ladislaus had garrisoned in the Estate of the Church. Antonio Colonna accompanied him, and before they went to Florence, Sergianni delivered up Ostia, Castel S. Angelo and Civita Vecchia, and they went to Florence. Thus did Joan make a Present to Pope Martin of all that Ladislaus had conquered of the Estate of the Church; but she continued still to take the Title of Queen of Rome, as her Brother had done; whence in her Writs and Statutes, among her other Titles, we see *Romæ Regina*¹.

SERGIANNI being arrived at Florence, was graciously received by the Pope, and in treating or discoursing of the present State of Affairs, either with respect to the Church of Rome, or the Kingdom, Sergianni shewed himself a Man, who no less by his Prudence than Comelines deserved the Queen's Favour. He demonstrated to the Pope, that of all the Christian Princes, the Kings of Naples were fittest for supporting the Roman Pontiffs; and on the other hand, that no Power was so able to secure the Kings of Naples in the Possession of their Crown as Popes; and by this Artifice he got the Pope to send a Cardinal Apostolick Legate to anoint and crown the Queen, and to give her the Investiture of the Kingdom², which she had in vain sought from Baldassar Cossa, who called himself *John XXIII.*³; and besides the Pope caused a perpetual League to be published between him and the Queen. Then Sergianni, in order to gain the Pope's Favour, and the Friendship of the Family of Colonna to himself, promised to give his Brother and Nephews great Estates in the Kingdom, and then they parted well satisfied with their Negotiations; and because at that time Braccio was in Possession of almost all the Estate of the Church on the other side of the Tiber, he promised to the Pope to send him all the Queen's Forces with Sforza the High-Constable, and then he set out by Land for Pisa, and from thence he went to Leghorn, and embarked in the Queen's Gallies, which had been sent thither on purpose, and landed at Gatta, where he staid some time, pretending to be sick, and he wrote to the Queen, giving her an Account of his Transactions, and desiring her to provide Sforza and his Men with Money, that they might quickly begin their March; because he was afraid, that if he should return with a much greater Reputation than he had before he went away, Sforza out of Envy might find Means to have him sent to finish his Exile in Procidia. The Queen, out of the great Desire she had to see Sergianni, immediately gave Sforza what Money he wanted, and sent him to Tuscany to assist the Pope; and Sergianni came to Naples, and was received by the Queen and his own Adherents with so great Honour, that it seemed as if by this League entered into with the Pope, he had for ever secured the Queen and the Luzazzo Faction; and from that time he called and subscribed himself High Steward; this was in the Year 1418.

IN January the Year following, the Apostolick Legate, who came to crown the Queen, accompanied with Giordano Colonna the Pope's Brother, and Antonio Colonna his Nephew, made his Entry into Naples. The Queen in her Royal Mantle, and the High-Steward went and met the Legate and the two Colonna's, and paid them extraordinary Honours. The first thing they began to treat of was King James's Liberty, for which, they said, the Pope was teased by the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy; and at last they obtained it; and that the King might recover his lost Reputation, the Colonna's, with a great Cavalcade, accompanied him through the City, and shewing a Reluctancy to return to Castel Nuovo, he went to that of Capuana, and said, That his Friends, who were glad to see him at Liberty, ought to endeavour to maintain him in it, and not desire him to go to a Place, where it was in the Queen's Power to make him Prisoner whenever she thought fit; which drew Compassion from all Men of Discretion.

THE King persisting in his Resolution of staying in Castello di Capuana, every body thought it very improper that he should continue divested of all Authority, and that in Castel Nuovo every thing should be managed at the High-Steward's Pleasure; therefore some of the chief Nobility of each Seggio were appointed to treat with the Legate and the Colonna's about a firm Reconciliation between the King and Queen; and some of them proposed to have the King crowned at the same time with the Queen, and that they should swear Fealty to him. This Proposal very much disturbed the High-Steward, because it was the only way to lessen his Authority, and therefore he resolved to win the two Colonna's, in hopes, by their Means, to put a Stop to the Proposal; and he ordered Matters so, that he got the Queen to promise, that immediately after her Coronation she should give the Principality of Salerno to one of them, and the Dutchy of Amalfi, with the Office of High-Chamberlain to the other. In the mean while he got Antonio Colonna to be married to Maria Ruffa, who was Marchioness of Cortone and Countess of Catanzaro, who died afterwards without leaving Children, and the Estate fell to Er-richetta her Sister. The two Colonna's and the Legate made the Deputies of the City to be satisfied with this Agreement: That the Governor of Castel Nuovo with the Garrison should be changed, and the Government of it given to Francesco di Riccardo di Ortona, a Man of great Virtue and Fidelity, who should chuse a Garrison, and take an Oath to the Apostolick Legate not to suffer the Queen to use Violence to the King, nor the King to her, whereupon the King went and bedded with the Queen.

BUT a few Days after the King seeing that he had only recovered his Liberty, but no manner of Authority; and likewise seeing that the Queen was above fifty Years of Age, and past Child-bearing, so that they could have no Issue, he resolved to go to Taranto, and from thence home to France; and one Day after having ridden through Naples he went to the Mole, dismounted, and embarked in a Genoese Vessel, in which some of his Confidants had taken shipping before, and with a prosperous Gale in a few Days arrived at Taranto, where he was honourably received by Queen Mary, who procured him a safe Passage for France, and furnished him plentifully with whatever he stood in need of; and thus he set out for France, where it is said that he turned Monk*. The Queen being rid of his so troublesome Company, gave Orders for her Coronation, which was performed in Castel Nuovo on the second of October, being Sunday, upon a most magnificent Theatre; the Queen receiving the Crown from the Hands of the Legate, and the Investiture sent by the Pope was read, which, on account of the fatal Instances, which have happened during the Government of Women in our Kingdom, excludes them from the Succession while there are Males of the fourth Degree, as may be read in the said Investiture recorded by Chioccarelli and Summonte†, and the Neapolitans took an Oath of Fealty to the Queen.

C H A P. III.

Lewis III. of Anjou being invited by Sforza, invades the Kingdom. The Queen has recourse to Alphonsus V. King of Aragon, whom she adopts; and a War between Lewis and Alphonsus ensues thereupon.

QUEEN Joan, by the Departure of the King her Husband, being Mistress of her self, and the High Steward, who now wanted nothing but the Title of King, abusing his Authority, and puffed up with Prosperity, despising all others, and even the Queen herself, brought greater Troubles and Calamities upon the Kingdom; for there was none left now but Sforza, who could, and was wont to thwart him, and keep a Check upon him, but there happened an Opportunity, which gave the High Steward hopes of being able to crush him. Sforza, as we have said, had been sent by the Queen to fight Braccio, who kept Possession of the Estate of the Church; and having come to an Engagement in the Territories of Viterbo, Sforza was routed, and lost so many of his Veteran Soldiers, that it was thought he would never recover the Loss, nor recruit so many Men, as to be able to return to the Kingdom, and make that Figure he formerly had done; so that it seemed, what by the Love of the Commonalty, what by the Friendship of the Colonna's, and the Ruin of Sforza, the Power of the High Steward was so well rivetted, that he had nothing more to fear: therefore he became intolerably insolent, and began to revenge himself upon the Nobility, who had been Mediators in the Agreement between the Queen and Sforza. He very much retrenched the Court, cut off many from their Pensions, and filled the Court with his own Creatures and Relations: So that the Nobility of Naples were extremely anxious to see Sforza once more in their City; and although the Pope wrote frequently to the Queen, pressing her to send Money to Sforza, in order to recruit the Army, yet upon several Pretexes the High Steward opposed it, and instead of Money he sent nothing but fair Promises, expecting every Minute to hear that Braccio had entirely ruined him; and that he might not incur the Pope's Displeasure, whenever there came a Brief or Message, he got the Queen to give some Town to the Prince of Salerno and the Duke of Amalfi.

SFORZA seeing himself thus abandoned, and being solicited by Letters from many Barons of the Kingdom to come to Naples, sent his Secretary to Lewis Duke of Anjou, the Son of King Lewis II. inviting him to come and conquer his paternal Kingdom, likewise demonstrating the Facility of the Undertaking by the Letters of the Barons; and by what appeared afterwards, this was done with the Pope's Consent.

THE Duke gladly accepted of the Invitation, and by the Secretary sent Sforza thirty thousand Duckets, and appointed him to be Viceroy and High-Constable, and with this Money having recruited his Army, in all haste he marched towards Naples, and he had no sooner entered the Borders of the Kingdom, than he sent the Queen her Standard and the Truncheon; and then exhorting his Men to behave themselves discreetly upon the March, he displayed King Lewis III.'s Standard (for so they called the Duke) and encouraging the People as he marched along, he very quickly quickly came before the Walls of Naples, and advanced to the same Place, where he had encamped the time before, and began to stop Provisions from being carried into the City, and to sollicite the Neapolitans to declare for King Lewis their true and lawful Lord.

THIS so unexpected Arrival very alarmed the Queen and the High-Steward, for this Revolt seemed to be of a more dangerous Nature than the former, as being supported by foreign Troops, and the Name of the Family of Anjou, which for so many Years had been buried in Oblivion. There was a most terrible Confusion in the City, for those of the Anjou Faction, who from the time that King Ladislaus drove out King Lewis II. the Father of this Lewis, of whom we are now treating, had been poor and despicable, but began now to take Courage, and hoped to recover their Estates possessed by those of the Durazzo Faction; and keeping a secret Correspondence with Sforza, many went daily out of the City to the Camp. But what disturbed the High-Steward most was, that the Durazzo Faction being divided among themselves, they were not so firm in the Queen's Interest as her present Circumstances required; for a great many of them were treating with Sforza about declaring for King Lewis, provided Sforza would assure them that the King would give an Equivalent to those of the Anjou Faction for their Estates, which they (the Durazzo Faction) were possessed of, that they might not be obliged to restore them to the first Owners; besides this the Common People impatient of Inconveniencies, to which they were not accustomed, were murmuring and ready to revolt. And although the High-Steward found Means to bring Provisions into the City by Sea; yet when certain Advice was brought from Genoa, that in a few Days King Lewis's Fleet would be upon the Coast, which would put a Stop to the getting Provisions by Sea, it was thought the Danger was such, that they must surrender to the City.

THE High-Steward foreseeing the impending Ruin, caused the Queen's Supreme Council to be frequently assembled, and after much debating, it was concluded to send an Ambassador to the Pope, with Orders, that if he could get no Assistance from him, he should go to the Duke of Milan, or to Venice; and Antonio Carafa surnamed Malizia, a Gentleman of great Prudence and Credit, was pitched upon for this Embassy. He upon his arrival in Florence represented to the Pope the Danger that the Queen and Kingdom were in, and begged of his Holiness to give them Relief; and if the Forces of the Church were not sufficient, to prevail with the other Powers of Italy to take Arms in Defence of a Kingdom, which was a Fief of the Church; and then with smooth Words he demonstrated, that by so doing both the Dignity of the Church, and the Grandeur of his own Family would be maintained, because the Queen, in Recompence for this good Office, would in a manner share the Kingdom with his Holiness's Brothers and Nephews. The Pope answered, That he was sorry that those evil Counsellors, who, either out of Avarice, or for some other Reason, having neglected to send Money to Sforza, had both drawn so dangerous a War upon the Queen their Mistress, and deprived him of all Means of assisting her; for what Relief could he give her at a time, when with the Bounty of the Florentines he could scarcely maintain a Shadow of the Papal Dignity? Or what Hopes could he have of obtaining Assistance for the Queen from the Powers of Italy, when he had not been able to obtain it for himself against a simple Soldier of Fortune, such as Braccio, who was in Possession of S. Peter's See, and all the Ecclesiastical Estate? Although what the Pope said was true, yet he spoke it with so great Passion, that Malizia immediately suspected that the Pope had a Hand in King Lewis's Invitation, and therefore he found that he must make his Application somewhere else.

ALPHONSUS King of Aragon at this time had fitted out a Fleet in order to attack Corfica, an Island belonging to the Genoese; and the Pope had sent him monitory Letters, forbidding him to make War against that Republick, which was under the Protection of the Apostolick See; and especially that Island, which had been given by his Predecessors to the Genoese, who were obliged to pay a Quit-Rent; and King Alphonsus had sent Garcia Cavaniglia, a Gentleman of Valentia, his Ambassador to the Pope in order to justify the Occasion of the War; who getting no better Answer than Malizia had got, went about complaining to the Cardinals of the Wrong done his King; and one Day Malizia meeting him said, that the Design upon the Island of Corfica was below a Prince of so great Fame as King Alphonsus, especially when it would offend the Pope; and that it would be an Undertaking undertaking worthy of so great a King, to send that Fleet to the Relief of the Queen his Mistress, who was oppressed, and in very calamitous Circumstances, which would not only redound to his Advantage, but to his eternal Glory, by adding to the Kingdoms he was already possessed of, not Corfica, which was a barren and desert Rock, but the Kingdom of Naples, the greatest and richest of all the Kingdoms in the Universe; for the Queen, who was old and without Children, seeing herself under so great an Obligation, would not only appoint him to be her Heir after her Death, but in her Life-time would give him a Part of the Kingdom, and some fortified Places for securing the Succession. Malizia made all these Promises, because he had daily Advice from Naples, that the Necessity increased, and that the City could not hold out without a speedy Relief, or the Hopes of it. Cavaniglia said, that he was very sure, that the King, out of his Generosity, and for the Offers made, would embrace the Opportunity, and encouraged him to go to Sardinia, where he would find the King. Malizia immediately sent Advice to the Queen of what had passed, and sent Pascale Coisso her Secretary, whom he had taken along with him, in a Frigate, to tell the Queen, that if she thought fit that he should go to treat about this Matter, she would be pleased to send him full Power, and Instructions suitable to an Affair of so great Importance; and having taken leave of the Pope, he went to Piombino to wait for a Return. The Secretary made such Dispatch, and found the Queen and her Friends in so great a Fright, that little time was spent in consulting; so that in seven Days he returned to Piombino with all the Power that either could be given or desired; and Malizia immediately taking Ship, with a prosperous Gale arriv'd in Sardinia; and having obtained an Audience of King Alphonfus, he laid before him how much the Queen stood in need of his Assistance; and in order to encourage him the more, he told him, That he had full Power from her by way of Adoption to transfer to him the Right of Succession to the Kingdom, after the short time that she could live, and likewise in her Life-time to put him in Possession of a good part of it. The King answered, That he was heartily sorry for the Distress the Queen was in, and that of his own Inclination he was resolved to assist her, without expecting a Kingdom as a Reward, of which he had as many as were sufficient for him; but that it was necessary for him to advise with his Council; and the next Day having called a Council, all present unanimously dissuaded him from the Undertaking; but Alphonfus, without discovering his own Sentiments, sent for Malizia, and told him the Opinion of the Barons; but yet he would assist the Queen, and presently send along with him sixteen well armed Gallies, with a good Sum of Money for levying Italian Soldiers, and afterwards he would come in Person to wait upon the Queen. Malizia commended his Majesty's Resolution, and promised, that the Queen should add as much of her own Money as would engage Braccio in her Service, who at that time was looked upon to be the ablest General in Italy, and Sforza's bitter Enemy. The Day following the King called a Council, and declared his Intention of assisting the Queen; then he ordered Raimondo Periglios, who was one of the chief Barons of his Court, and reputed a Man of great Courage, to have the Gallies in readiness to put to Sea with the Queen's Ambassador. Malizia overjoyed, in order to animate the Besieged, immediately dispatched Pascale with Advice, that a Relief should be with them in a few Days; and to quiet the Minds of the Catalans, who were dissatisfied with the Undertaking, by a publick Instrument in Name of the Queen he adopted King Alphonfus, and promised to put him in Possession of Castel Nuovo, Castel dell' Uovo, and the Province of Calabria with the Title of Duke, usually given to the next in Succession to the Kingdom; then he took leave of the King, and together with Raimondo embarked in the Fleet.

WHILE these Preparations were making for the Queen's Relief, King Lewis with his Fleet unexpectedly arrived at Naples, and having landed his Men, he joined Sforza, and laid close Siege to the City, which would have surrendered to him, if very opportunely the Aragon Fleet commanded by Periglios had not arrived. The Queen overjoyed gave Periglios a most kind Reception, and to convince Alphonfus and his Council of the Steadiness of her Resolution, the Day following, by a publick Act, she ratified the Adoption, and all the Articles stipulated in Sardinia, and ordered the Arms of Aragon to be quartered with her own, and painted upon the Standards and many publick Places; and the Adoption and perpetual League were published over all the City. The Queen likewise sent to engage Braccio da Perugia in her Service, who refused, unless, besides his Pay, she would give him the Investiture of Capua and Aquila.

IN the mean time Aversa had surrendered to King Lewis, and the Anjou Faction still increasing, Braccio after much Sollicitation came, and with three thousand Horse defeated Sforza, who disputed his Passage, and arriving at Naples, he was very graciously received by the Queen.

KING Alphonfus had gone to Sicily, and though he had been often pressed by the Queen to come, yet he delayed from time to time; but upon hearing that Braccio was come to Naples, he left Sicily, and with his Fleet came to Ischia. The Queen sent the High-Steward with some Barons to wait upon him, and after they had thanked him in the Queen's Name, they invited him to come with his Fleet to Castel dell' Uovo, from whence the Queen designed he should make his Entry into Naples with such Pomp and Magnificence, as became so great a King and her Deliverer. The Comeliness of the King's Person, his Courage, Magnanimity and Prudence put the High-Steward to a stand; and besides he was afraid that the Company of so many Barons of Aragon, Castile, Catalonia, Sicily, and of other Nations subject to the King, would in a short time lessen his Authority. and perhaps put an end to it altogether; and he very well remembered the Fate of Count Pandolfello, and dreaded his own might happen to be worse, inasmuch as this King was a Man of greater Wit, Courage and Power, than King James was; nevertheless he endeavoured to cover this Jealousy, and caused great Preparation to be made for Alphonfus's Entry into Naples. The King on the Day appointed, after having ridden a Horseback with great Pomp through the City, was conducted to Castel Nuovo where the Queen came down to the Gate, and received him with all Marks of Affection and Gladness; and after she had embraced him she delivered him the Keys of the Castle, and the rest of that Day and many following were spent in magnificent Feasts and Rejoicing; and now in presence of many Barons, and almost all the Nobility and People, the Adoption and all the Articles lately stipulated with Periglios were ratified by King Alphonfus and the Queen; and upon the eighth of July this Year 1421 a new Instrument was drawn up, which we not only read in *Chioccarello*¹, but Tutini caused it to be printed in his Book De G. Constabili.

UPON the arrival of Alphonfus with his Fleet at Naples, the War with King Lewis became more bloody in Terra di Lavoro; for he having fortified himself in Aversa, had put that Province in terrible Confusion. On the other hand Alphonfus, spurred on by the High-Steward, marched and laid Siege to Accerra, which was then possessed by Gio. Pietro Origlia an Enemy to Sergianni. And at the same time Braccio having defeated Sforza's Army, he made pressing Instances to be put in Possession of Capua; and being put off from Day to Day by the Queen, he made his Complaint to King Alphonfus, who, to prevent Braccio from being disgusted, persuaded the Queen to give it him. Alphonfus still continuing the Siege of Accerra, Martin V. fearing that that King (whose Enemy he had discovered himself to be, by his having had a Hand in inviting King Lewis) might at last prove successful, sent two Cardinals in order to negotiate a Peace between these two Kings; and while they were treating with Alphonfus about the Conditions of Peace, Alphonfus, afraid that they were only come to amuse him, would not quit the Siege of that City, but began to batter it more furiously than before, notwithstanding the gallant Defence of the Inhabitants.

THE two Cardinals seeing the great Slaughter that attended the obstinate Defence of the Place, and that Alphonfus's Design would prove fruitless, they begged of him not to expose his Men to so great Danger, promising, that Pope Martin should take Accerra in Sequestration, so that it should not be troublesome to the Queen's Dominions, and upon the Conclusion of the Peace perhaps he would deliver it up to her. The King complied with the Request of the Cardinals, and raised the Siege; and Lewis having recalled the Garrison, ordered Accerra to be given in Sequestration to the Apostolick Legates; and King Alphonfus retired to Naples, and Braccio with his Men to Capua. A Truce was concluded between the two Kings for so long time as was necessary for the Treaty of Peace; and soon after King Lewis went to wait upon Pope Martin, and left Aversa and the other Places in the Hands of the same Legates: and Sforza by an Article of the Truce was allowed to go and reside in Benevento, which belonged to him.

ALPHONSUS kept Martin V. in Awe, for although the Schism had ended with the Council of Constance, and Gregory XII. and John XXIII. had submitted to that Council, and divested themselves of the Papacy; yet the Antipope Benedict XIII. held still out with great Obstinacy, and had fortified himself in an impregnable Place in Spain, called Paniscola, where with four Cardinals he stiffly kept the Name and Badges of the Papal Dignity, and was resolved to die with the Title of Pope, although he was acknowledged by no Nation. Pope Martin afraid of King Alphonfus, who had declared, that if he did not favour his Interest, he would order all his Kingdoms to acknowledge the Antipope, in a few Months after not only delivered up Acerra, but all the Places, which the Legates had in Sequestration, to Alphonfus. There was great rejoicing in Naples, because the War seemed to be at an End, there being no other Place but Aquila alone that held out for King Lewis; so that Alphonfus, in order to have Braccio out of the Way, commanded him to go and lay Siege to it: Braccio was very well satisfied with the Order, because by the Agreement made when he engaged in the Queen's and Alphonfus's Service, it had been promised him. Thus was the Province of Terra di Lavoro freed from the Miseries of War, and the Queen's Party lived very quiet in Naples.

C H A P. IV.

Discords between Alphonfus and Queen Joan, who revokes his Adoption, and adopts Lewis for her Son.

BUT this Tranquillity in the Kingdom was of a short Duration, for in the middle of the Spring of this Year 1422 a Plague broke out in Naples, which obliged the King and Queen to go to Castellamare; but that City not being able to maintain two Royal Courts, they both went to Gasta, where they were no sooner arrived than Sforza left Benevento, and came to pay his Respects to Alphonfus, who gave him a very friendly and courteous Reception; insomuch, that being surprized at the Gentleness of his Behaviour, he went about crying up the Generosity and Mildness of so great a King. This gave Encouragement to a great many Barons of the Anjou Faction to follow Sforza's Example; wherefore many who had offended the Queen and the High-Steward, trusting to what Sforza had said, with great Confidence went and paid their Respects to Alphonfus, who receiving them very graciously, they swore Allegiance to him, which highly displeased the Queen.

HITHERTO every thing had been managed with great Unanimity, but from this time forth there arose such Jealousies and Heart-burnings as were afterwards the Cause of infinite Mischiefs; for the High-Steward, who had the Queen at his beck, could not bear to see that Alphonfus had made the Cities that had been taken, and the Barons that had come to wait upon him swear Allegiance to him, because it looked as if he had a Mind to take Possession of the Kingdom before the Queen's Death, contrary to the Articles of Adoption; of which having made the Queen sensible, it increased her Jealousy, and obliged her to love him the more, seeing the Care he had of the State and of her Safety; for he told her, That some time or other Alphonfus would seize her and send her Prisoner to Catalonia, in order to take Possession of the Kingdom, and afterwards of all Italy. This struck such a Terror into the Queen, that she resolved to be upon her Guard, and all of a sudden left Gasta, and came to Procida: from thence she went to Pozzuolo with a Resolution to go to Naples, where the Plague, after having made great Havock, had begun to cease.

cease. King Alphonfus, who had believed that the Queen would have returned from Procida to Gaeta, hearing that she was gone to Pozzuolo with a Design to be in Naples, in order to remove all Jealousy, with a small Retinue he went to visit her in Pozzuolo; but it had a quite contrary Effect, for the frightened Queen became still more jealous; so that Alphonfus had no sooner gone to see Aversa than she went by Land to Naples, nor would she go to Castel Nuovo, but went strait to Castello di Capuano. While the King was in Aversa he received an account of the Queen's Proceedings; and knowing her Fickleness, and the Cunning and Ambition of the High-Steward, was afraid they were hatching some Innovation, upon which he came immediately to Naples, and lodged in Castel Nuovo; and now there passed no more Visits between the Queen and him; so that it was the Opinion of all Men of Judgment, that it could not be long before it came to an open Rupture. Alphonfus sensible that this Alteration in the Queen proceeded from the Suggestions of the High-Steward, thought, that if the Author of the Misunderstanding were removed, he could get the Queen to do whatever he pleased; therefore on the twenty seventh of May this Year 1423 he caused him to be put in Prison, and then went to wait upon the Queen, whether with intent to excuse himself to her for the Imprisonment of the High-Steward, or with design likewise to seize her, and when he should find that it was not in his Power to make her alter her way of living, to send her to Catalonia, is uncertain. But the High-Steward was no sooner made Prisoner than the Queen had an account of it, and seeing the King coming, she caused the Gate of the Castle to be shut upon him; whereupon Alphonfus being so rudely repulsed, returned to Castel Nuovo, and a great Confusion and Disorder ensued between the Spaniards and Catalans on the one side, and the Neapolitans of the Queen's Party on the other.

THE Queen in great Consternation, and shut up with the chief and most faithful of her Courtiers, consulted what was fit to be done, and with unanimous Consent it was resolved to send and invite Sforza, and to entreat him, that in regard of former Friendship he would come and relieve the Queen. Sforza, who was then in Benevento very poor, having been many Months out of Pay, was overjoyed at this Message, hoping that it would turn to account, for he was confident, either to get King Alphonfus's Adoption to be revoked, and his Friend King Lewis to be adopted, or to have the Queen in his Power, as also the Kingdom so far as it obeyed her; and without delay, having drawn together his veteran Soldiers, whose Arms had grown rusty, and their Horses lean, he set out for Naples. Alphonfus hearing that Sforza was coming, sent Bernardo Centiglia, with all the Catalan and Sicilian Barons, and all the Soldiers of the Fleet to meet him; and having engaged near the Walls of Naples, Sforza defeated Alphonfus's Army, and having entered the City, he besieged Alphonfus in Castel Nuovo; and after having waited upon the Queen, who received him with great Honour, calling him her Deliverer, he left Naples in order to besiege Aversa.

ALPHONSUS after this Defeat finding himself thus left alone, and without Money for raising another Army, was in the utmost Perplexity; however there were two things which kept up his Spirits, the one was his having many Months before ordered another Fleet to be fitted out in Catalonia, because he had no mind to drop his Design upon Corfica, so that he sent immediately to hasten it to come to his Relief: the other was Braccio's Army, which was besieging Aquila; but he laid no great Stress upon that, not only because Braccio was bent upon taking of Aquila, but likewise he did not expect that that Army would come to his Assistance without being paid; nevertheless he sent to invite it, and what he expected happened. But fifteen Days after the Defeat, John Cardona Captain General of the Fleet arriving at Gaeta with ten Gallies and six great Ships, and hearing in what Situation his King was, immediately set sail for Naples. It was said by many, that this Fleet had been ordered to come, with Design to carry the Queen to Catalonia, in case the King's Intention of seizing the Queen had succeeded; and it was the more probable, because the Kingdom being at that time in Peace and Tranquillity, there was no Occasion for a Fleet.

THE Fleet arriving at the Mole of Naples, the King ordered the Soldiers to be landed; and a great part of Sforza's Army being within the City besieging Castel Nuovo, a cruel and obstinate War was kindled within the Walls, and what by Pillage, what by Fire, the City was turned upside down, for the Particulars of which we refer the Reader to Costanzo. The Queen perceiving so many Revolutions in the City, became so terrified, that she fancied herself to be already in Chains among the Catalans, so that she often recommended to the Gentlemen that were with her in the Castle to take care of her Person, and sent immediately to Sforza, who was at Aversa, begging of him in all haste to come and relieve her from a greater Danger than the former. Sforza came to Naples, relieved the Queen and conducted her to Nola; and then having taken Aversa he conducted her thither, where a new Adoption was carried on, which proved a Source of perpetual Troubles and Revolutions in this Kingdom.

ON the other hand King Alphonfus's Army, being joined by Braccio's Troops, increasing daily, Sforza, in order to make a more vigorous Opposition, resolved to strengthen the Queen's Party; for which end he prevailed with the Queen to make use of the Power of the Anjou Faction; and on the first of July this Year 1423, by a solemn Instrument, having got her to revoke the Adoption formerly made in favour of Alphonfus, on account of the ungrateful Return, which he said that King had made her, he persuaded her to adopt King Lewis; and since the Queen saw herself in a manner forsaken, and that many whom she had done Favours to, out of Hatred to the High-Steward, either privately or publickly adhered to Alphonfus, she not only condescended to send for King Lewis, but recalled all those of the Anjou Faction, who had left their native Country, and restored them to their Estates.

AND as the Queen had vouchsafed to follow Sforza's Advice in this, so Sforza, who knew that she had a longing Desire to have the High-Steward released, gave way to a Treaty for exchanging him with some Catalan or Aragon Baron. The Queen, who longed for nothing more, sent every Day to treat with Alphonfus about the Exchange; but he knowing her Folly to be such, that without the least Shame, rather than not have the High-Steward released, she would give her Crown in exchange for him, sent to tell her, that neither one nor two Barons would serve, but that she must give all the Catalan and Aragon Prisoners for Sergianni. Whereupon the Queen making a Present to Sforza of many Lands, got all the Prisoners he had, which were these, Bernardo Centeglia who was Captain General, Raimondo Periglios, Juan de Moncada, Mossen Baldassa, Mossen Coregia, Raimondo de Moncada, Frederico Ventimiglia, the Count Henriques, and the Count Juan Ventimilia, who were all sent to the King in exchange for the High-Steward, who to his great Joy was set at Liberty; and as soon as he came to Aversa, mindful of what had passed between him and Sforza, he endeavoured to make him his Friend; and in order to cement it by Alliance, he took great Pains to get Sforza to give Chiara Attendola his Sister in Marriage to Mario Caracciolo his Brother. Sergianni, who was now in greater Favour with the Queen than ever, commended the Queen's having revoked the Adoption of King Alphonfus for his Ingratitude; and likewise insisted to have King Lewis adopted, who was still at Rome with Pope Martin; for like a wise Man thinking that his having a Hand in bringing in a King of Royal Blood, would remove the Envy and Calumny raised against him, as if he had a Mind to make himself King; therefore Ambassadors were sent to Rome to treat with King Lewis about the Adoption, who found it a very easy Matter; and they not only concluded the Adoption with him on such Terms as they thought fit, but likewise engaged the Pope to take the Queen under his Protection against King Alphonfus, which they obtained the more easily, because the Pope, besides his being highly offended with Alphonfus, who, though secretly, supported Benedict XIII.'s Faction, anxious to have the Church restored to her antient State and Reputation, was desirous rather to see King Lewis in Possession of the Kingdom, who was not very powerful, and would always want the Assistance of the Roman Pontiffs, than that it should fall into the Hands of Alphonfus, a most powerful King possessed of other great Kingdoms, whereby he was not only able to give Laws to the Roman Pontiffs, but to all Italy. The Adoption being concluded, the Ambassadors without Loss of Time carried their King Lewis along with them, upon this Condition, that he was only to have the Title of King, because he was to contend for the Kingdom with another King; but in effect he was only to be Duke of Calabria upon the same Conditions as had been settled in the Adoption of King Alphonfus.

THIS Adoption gave this second Race of the Family of Anjou a double Right to this Kingdom; for to that of Queen Joan I. by which Lewis I. the Grandfather of this Lewis, was called to the Kingdom, this of Queen Joan II. was added; whence afterwards the Kings of France, to whom those Rights devolved, laid claim to the Kingdom by a double Title. Whence arose the so many and obstinate Wars, which the two Lewis's, Charles VIII. and Francis I. carried on against the Families of Aragon and Austria, which for many Ages miserably afflicted the Kingdom.

* Chiocc. tom. 1. MS. Giurisd.

UPON King Lewis's Arrival at Aversa, he was received by the Queen with all Marks of Honour, and Demonstrations of Friendship, and after much Feasting the Queen caused a great Sum of Money to be given to Sforza, in order to put his Army in a Condition to be able to recover Naples. The Pope sent Luigi Colonna General of the Ecclesiastical Troops, and many other inferior Officers to the Queen's Assistance; and he afterwards got Philip Visconti Duke of Milan (who at that time was formidable to all Italy, and who had become jealous of the overgrown Power of Alphonfus) likewise to espouse the Queen's Interest.

C H A P. V.

Alphonfus leaves Naples and goes to Spain; and Naples surrenders to Queen Joan. The Insolence of the High-Steward; his Ambition, and unhappy Death.

WHEN King Alphonfus heard of the new Adoption of King Lewis, and that the Pope and the Duke of Milan had entered into a Confederacy against him, he began to be afraid of losing Naples; for hitherto the Neapolitans of the Anjou Faction had been so much kept under and crushed by the High-Steward, that they had gone over to the Aragon Party, and were pleased to see the Queen and the High-Steward reduced to the low State they were in; but as soon as they heard of King Lewis's Adoption, buoyed up with the Hopes of retrieving their Affairs, they were by all Means for restoring the City to the Queen; and it was known, that many went every Day publicly to wait upon King Lewis, and many, who had not the Courage to visit him openly, sent him secret Messages. Therefore Alphonfus sent for Braccio, who was still labouring to reduce Aquila, to come with his Troops to Naples. But Braccio, expecting that the Place would surrender in a few Days, answered, That it was of much greater Consequence to conquer that rich City and that warlike Province, obstinately addicted to the Anjou Faction, than to keep Naples, which usually fell into the Hands of those who were Victors in the Field; and therefore he sent him Giacomo Caldora, the chief Man of his Army next to himself, Bernardino della Carda, and Riccio da Montechiaro Colonels of Foot. These, with twelve hundred Horse and a thousand Foot, marched immediately to Capua, and hearing of the Arrival of some Ships and Gallies with fresh Troops from Barcelona, from thence they marched to Naples.

ON the other hand Sforza, having put his Troops in order, persuaded King Lewis to attack Naples, and on the first of October they set out from Aversa, and arrived at the Gate del Mercato; and having come to an Engagement, wherein Sforza was victorious, King Lewis was in great Hopes of taking the City. While Alphonfus was in this Perplexity, he received Letters from Spain, advising him, that John King of Castile his Cousin-German and Brother-in-Law, who was entirely guided by the Advice of D. Alvara de Luna, an Enemy to the House of Aragon, had imprisoned D. Henry of Aragon his beloved Brother, because he had married ried D. Catarina, the King of Castile's Sister without his Consent ; therefore Alphonfus resolved to go to Spain, in order to set his Brother at Liberty ; and likewise, lest the King of Castile, by the Instigation of D. Alvaro, should endeavour to possess himself of the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia, while he was making War in Italy. Therefore having made ready for his Voyage, he left D. Peter his youngest Brother Lieutenant General of Naples, and having set sail with eighteen Gallies and twelve large Ships, by the way all on a sudden he attacked Marfeilles, a City belonging to King Lewis, took and pillaged it, and carried off with him the Body of S. Lewis Bishop of Toulouse ; but unwilling to diminish his Army by leaving a Garrison in the Place, he abandoned it, thinking he would have enough to do with his Men in the War of Spain, where he spent many Years in getting his Brother set at Liberty.

IN the beginning of the following Year 1424 the Duke of Milan's Fleet arrived, and having taken Gaeta, which held out for Alphonfus, it steered directly for Naples, where the Army was landed at the Gate del Mercato ; King Lewis's Affairs being in this prosperous Situation, induced Caldora to go over to his Party in this manner. The King and Queen, finding that the Duke of Milan's Army was sufficient for the Siege of Naples, sent Sforza with his Army to relieve Aquila, which was still besieged by Braccio, but in passing the River Pescara Sforza was drowned : Whereupon Caldora, confident of obtaining the Post of High-Constable, and of being the Head of the Queen's Party, surrendered the City of Naples to her ; and the Infant D. Peter with the choice of his Soldiers retired to the Castle. The whole City was overjoyed, the People run and plundered the Houses of the Spaniards and Sicilians, and the Queen sent back the Duke of Milan's Army to Lombardy very well satisfied.

THERE remained in the Kingdom Braccio's Army alone, that sided with King Alphonfus ; but the King and Queen appointed Caldora to be Captain General, and sent him to fight Braccio ; and upon his arrival in the County of Celano, being joined by Pope Martin's Troops, he engaged and defeated Braccio's Army, in which Action Braccio was killed, and Nicola Paccinino made Prisoner.

ALTHOUGH King Alphonfus had an account of the Loss of Naples, and that the Infant had retired to the Castle, yet he would not give over his Design upon the Kingdom, but sent to reinforce the Castle ; and a few Days after arrived Artale de Luna, sent by the King to relieve the Infant, who having left a strong Garrison, and great Store of Ammunition and Provisions, took shipping, and went to Sicily. So the Queen and King Lewis continued in Peace and Quiet, while Alphonfus was employed in the Affairs of Spain ; and though Castel Nuovo held out for King Alphonfus, which it did for a long time after, yet the Queen lived many Years in Quiet, during which time she applied her self to reform the Tribunal of the High-Court of the Lieutenancy by means of the Usages, which she caused to be collected, to institute the College of Doctors, and to study Peace and Religion, of which in their Places.

MEAN while the High-Steward seeing himself arrived at the height of all Felicity, lest King Lewis should endeavour, as Alphonfus had done, to humble him, he never would allow Castel Nuovo to be closely besieged ; but made frequent Truces with Arnaldo Sanz the Governor, in order to be a Restraint upon King Lewis, that if ever he offered to thwart him, he would recal King Alphonfus. And in this manner the Castle held out eleven Years, till the Death of Queen Joan ; and it seemed very odd, that during the Truce the Governor should send to buy in the City whatever he stood in need of, and take the Title of Viceroy of the Kingdom.

KING Lewis, who was of a meek Disposition, was always very obsequious to the Queen, which made the High-Steward persuade her to give the Duchy of Calabria to Lewis, and with the hired Troops send him to drive King Alphonfus's Officers out of it ; and he himself remained absolute Master of all the rest of the Kingdom ; nor had he any other that stood in his way, but Giacomo Caldora, and the Prince of Taranto, who was a Man of great Power in the Kingdom ; therefore in order to win them over to his Interest, he gave one of his Daughters in Marriage to Antonio Caldora, Giacomo's Son, and the other to Gabriele Orsino, the Prince's Brother, to whom he gave the County of Acerra as her Portion. Thus did he secure himself, that there was none to oppose or gainsay him ; which proved the Ruin of many Families, such as the Origli, the Mormili, the Costanzi and the Zurli, whose

Estates

Estates he seized, and gave them to his own Creatures and Relations; and he bestowed Towns and Villages upon many of the Family of Caracciolo. Whence it came, that during the War between three Lewis's of Anjou, and Charles III. Ladislaus and Queen Joan, we find Grants and Investitures of many Lands to different Families contrary to one another; and that many Villages changed two Lords in one Year, according as those Kings whom they followed were victorious. The High-Steward not satisfied with so great Authority, always aspiring after greater things, asked of the Queen, that seeing by the Death of Braccio the Principality of Capua had devolved to the Crown, she would invest him with it, and immediately on the twenty second of October this Year 1425 she granted it; but then he was so modest, that he would never take the Title of Prince, although his Relations pressed him to do it.

POPE Benedict XIII. having died the preceding Year, and the Schism being still countenanced by King Alphonfus, because Pope Martin had invested King Lewis with the Kingdom, the two Cardinals that had continued with him, this Year elected Egidio Munion a Canon of Barcelona Pope, who took the Name of Clement VIII. and created Cardinals, and performed all Papal Functions. And although Alphonfus was taken up with the Affairs of Spain, yet he never gave over his Pretensions to this Kingdom, but kept Pope Martin still in suspense, till at last in the Year 1429 they were reconciled; whereupon Martin sent the Cardinal de Foix Legate into Spain, to prevail with the Anti-Pope to lay down his Charge, and by order of Alphonfus he was forced to renounce his Right, but declared, that he did it purely for the sake of Peace. The Cardinals whom he had created likewise voluntarily renounced their Titles, and the two old Cardinals, whom Clement had made, were put in Prison, where soon after they died of Grief and Want. Thus ended the Schism, which had lasted for the Space of fifty one Years; and Martin V. was acknowledged sole Pope by all the West.

POPE Martin, after he had been thus acknowledged, lived only two Years, for on the twentieth of February 1431 he died in Rome, where he was buried in the Lateran; and on the fourth of March Michaele Condolmerio a Venetian and the Son of a Sister of Gregory XII.'s, who had made him Bishop of Sienna, and raised him to the Dignity of Cardinal, was elected in his room, and took the Name of Eugene IV. This Pope was no sooner placed in S. Peter's Chair, than he began to persecute the Colonna, because it was said, that they had all the late Pope's Treasure in their Hands; the Colonna, depending upon the great Estate their Uncle had given them in Compagna di Roma, and upon that which they possessed in the Kingdom of Naples, prepared to defend themselves against the Pope's Troops, and for that end listed Soldiers. But the Pope aware of that, immediately renewed the League with the Queen upon the same Conditions that had been stipulated in that with Pope Martin, and required the Queen to send him Assistance against his Rebels. The High-Steward, who wished for nothing more than the downfall of the Colonna, that he might thereby raise himself still higher upon their Ruin, sent him Count Marino di S. Angelo his Brother with a thousand Horse, and likewise sent a Message to the Colonna, threatening, that if they continued in Rebellion against the Pope, he would deprive them of the Lands they had in the Kingdom; and they persisting obstinately, the Pope excommunicated them and confiscated their Estates. The High-Steward likewise prevailed with the Queen to divest them of the Principality of Salerno and the Counties which they possessed in the Kingdom; and not content with being Duke of Venosa, Count of Avellino, Lord of Capua, and many other Lands, he asked the Principality of Salerno and the Duchy of Amalfi of the Queen, telling her, that though she had given him Capua, he was unwilling to take the Title of Prince of it, because he was sure, that whoever succeeded her would take it from him as a City which, for its Importance, ought always to be annexed to the Crown.

AT this time the Queen was very much broken by Age, but much more by an ill Habit of Body, and looked quite decrepit and loathsome; and therefore the High-Steward, who was likewise well advanced in Years, had left off the secret Conversation which he used to have with her; so that Love was not only abated in her, but grown quite cold, which made her refuse to give him either Salerno or Malfi; for which Cause the High-Steward, grievously offended, began both in Words and Deeds to despise and hate her. The Queen's greatest Favourite at this time was Covella Ruffo Dutches of Sessa, a Woman of a very rugged Temper, and on account of her being the Daughter of an Aunt of the Queen's, descended of a most noble Family, and Heiress of a vast Estate, was very proud, and could not bear the Insolence of the High-Steward; and therefore always as she found a fit Opportunity, she pressed the Queen not to suffer so much Ingratitude in a Man, whom, to the Reproach of Nobility, from the lowest State of Life, and the greatest Poverty, she had so much exalted; and though the Queen gave ear to what the Dutchess said, yet she was become so silly with Age, that she never answered to the Purpose. But the High-Steward coming one Day to speak with the Queen, in a fawning manner asked the Principality of Salerno and Amalfi again; and she giving him a flat Denial, he was so enraged upon finding her so much changed from what she had been for eighteen Years, during which time she had never refused him any thing, that he began to call her Names; and, as if she had been the meanest Woman, to upbraid her with her lewd Life, insomuch that she wept bitterly: the Dutchess, who was in the next room, hearing the Queen weep, entered as the High-Steward was coming out, and seeing the Queen thus insulted by fresh Injuries, she chid her severely for having so much Patience, and advised her immediately to curb such a Monster of Insolence, who some time or other would not stand to take her by the Throat and strangle her. The Queen seeing so great Demonstration of Love and sincere Affection, embraced her very kindly, and said, That she spoke well, and that by all means she would have him humbled: The Dutchess imparted the whole to Ottino Caracciolo an Enemy to the High-Steward; then Ottino conferred with Marino Roffa and Pietro Palagano bitter Enemies to Sergianni. They resolved to apply to the Dutchess, and persuaded her to be very earnest with the Queen, and offered to find her Men that would dispatch the High-Steward: The Dutchess was not slow in managing the Affair, for at this time a new Alliance having been set on Foot between Giasomo Caldora and the High-Steward, who was to have his only Son Trojano Caracciolo married to Caldora's Daughter Maria; upon this the Dutchess acquainted the Queen, that it was talked over all Naples that this Match was intended for depriving her of the Kingdom, and dividing it between themselves, so that she ought to be upon her Guard, and get the High-Steward to be put to Death. The Queen answered, That she was fully resolved to have him humbled, and to strip him of the Government; but she was not for having him killed, because she was old, and would very soon be obliged to answer for it to God. The Dutchess, seeing she could obtain nothing else, seemed satisfied with having the Government taken from him, and begged of her, that she would be pleased quickly to discourse with Ottino Caracciolo about what was fit to be done. The Dutchess having told Ottino what had passed, they resolved to get from the Queen what they could, and to obtain an Order for putting him in Prison, which would afford an Opportunity to kill him, and thus it was agreed. The Queen called for Ottino, and told him, That she left it to him to find out Means for putting him in Prison. While these things were transacting, the High-Steward concluded the Marriage of his Son with Caldora, and to please the Queen, he resolved to make a Feast in Castello di Capuano, where the Queen lodged, hoping thereby to be reconciled with her, and to induce her to make a Present to the new married Couple of the Principality of Salerno, which he coveted so much. The Day appointed for the Feast being come, which was the seventeenth of August this Year 1432, and it being spent in Balls and Music, and part of the Night in a most sumptuous Supper, the High-Steward went down to his Apartment, and being already asleep, Ottino and the other Conspirators, having bribed one of the Grooms of the Queen's Chamber named Squadra, a Native of Germany, took him with them, and made him knock at the High-Steward's Chamber-Door, and tell him, That the Queen, having been seized with an Apoplectick Fit, was very ill, and bid him come to her immediately. The High-Steward got up, and beginning to dress himself, he ordered the Door to be opened, that he might the better hear what the Matter was. Then the Conspirators entered, and with Rapiers and Battle-axes murdered him. The next Morning the News of this unlooked for Fact being spread over the City, every body run to see the miserable Spectacle, a remarkable Instance of the wretched State of Man: To see one, who a few Hours before had lorded it over a most powerful Kingdom, taking and giving Cities, Towns and Villages to whom he thought fit, lye on the Floor with one Stocking on, and the other off (not having had time to dress himself) and not one offering either to cover his Nakedness, or bury him. The Dutchess of Sessa seeing the dead Body said, Behold the Son of Isabella Sarda, who pretended to vie with me ; shortly after four Priests of S. John a Carbonara, where he had built a magnificent Chapel, which is yet to be seen, came and took the Corps, bloody as it was, and disfigured with the Wounds, and put it in a Bier, and with two lighted Torches only, in a most pitiful manner buried him. His Son Trojano caused a most magnificent Tomb with his Statue to be erected afterwards in the same Chapel; and Lorenza Valla, famous for Learning in these times, composed that Inscription which we read upon the Tomb. Although the Queen was dissatisfied with his Death, yet she ordered all his Estate to be confiscated as a Rebel; and she gave an ample Remission to all the Conspirators, which was penned by Marino Boffa; and it is said, that when the Tenor of the Pardon was read to her, which contained these Words, That the Queen had ordered the High-Steward to be put to Death for his Insolence, she declared publickly, that she never gave any such Order, but only to imprison him.

C H A P. VI.

King Alphonfus endeavours to be restored to the Queen's Favour, but in vain. King Lewis's Marriage with Margaret the Daughter of the Duke of Savoy; his Death, and soon after Queen Joan dies.

WHEN King Lewis who was in Calabria, and had fixed his Residence in Cosenza, heard of the Death of the High-Steward, he believed, that the Queen would immediately send for him to Court; but the Dutchess of Sessa, who by that Death was become most powerful, persuaded the Queen not to invite him; and to keep him where he was, she carved out new Business for him in that Province; which made People believe, that as by too great Ambition King Alphonfus had lost this Kingdom, so by too little King Lewis would probably have the same Fate. At this time Alphonfus was in Sicily, and upon the News of the Death of the High-Steward was overjoyed, and much more so, when he understood that the Dutchess of Sessa was at the Helm of Affairs, in whom he confided so much, that he was in hopes to be recalled by the Queen, and have his former Adoption confirmed. In order not to lose this first Opportunity, he came with some Gallies to Ischia, which held out for him, and by private Messages began to treat with the Dutchess, and beg of her to induce the Queen to restore him to her Favour, and perhaps he might have succeeded, if his too great Eagerness had not spoiled all; for not content with having employed the Dutchess, he sent a Message to the Duke her Husband, offering to make him the greatest Man in the Kingdom, provided he would espouse his Interest; of which the Dutchess, who mortally hated her Husband, was no sooner apprised, than not only instead of a Friend she became an Enemy to Alphonfus, but she accused her Husband of hatching a Rebellion against the Queen, and got Ottino Caracciolo and the other Counsellors to send Troops to the Duke's Estate to prevent his Followers from favouring Alphonfus, who, seeing that both his Plots had miscarried, made a Truce with the Queen for ten Years, and little to his Credit returned to Sicily.

THE following Year 1433, Margaret Daughter to the Duke of Savoy was betrothed to King Lewis, and having set out from Nizza, was overtaken by a terrible Storm, and arrived at Sorrento very much out of order by the Fatigue of the Voyage; the Queen had a Mind to have her conducted to Naples with suitable Honour, and to invite the King to come from Calabria, in order to have the Marriage pompously celebrated in that City; but the Dutches of Seffa advised her to the contrary, telling her, That by no Means she ought to do it, because it would occasion Disturbance in the State, and that during the short Remainder of her Life, she ought to live and die Queen without a Competitor. And therefore the Queen, who was of a fickle Humour, sent only to compliment the Bride upon her Arrival, and to offer her some Presents, and from thence that Lady went to Calabria, where the Marriage was solemnized in Cosenza with as much Grandeur as the Time and Place would allow. But that Knot was soon untied, for in November the following Year 1434, King Lewis, after having spent that Summer in making War upon the Prince of Taranto, being retired into Calabria, what with the Fatigues of that War, and the Embraces of his Spouse, he contracted a Fever, of which he died, without leaving Issue. He made a Will, wherein he ordered his Body to be carried to the Cathedral of Naples, and his Heart to be sent to Queen Violante his Mother in France, which last was quickly done; but the Body remained in the Great Church of Cosenza, where his Tomb is to be seen at this Day, because no body took care to send it to Naples. This King was of such an agreeable Temper, and so much beloved by the People of Calabria, that it is thought the Calabrians ever after continued to have a liking for the Family of Anjou.

UPON the News of his Death the Queen was very much grieved, and commended the great Patience of that Prince with respect to her self, and the Obedience he always paid her, and she was very sorry for not having honoured and treated him as he had deserved. And in the beginning of the Year 1435, labouring under great Uneasiness of Mind, and oppressed with Years and Diseases, on the second of February, the Feast of the Purification of the blessed Virgin, in the sixty fifth Year of her Age, after having reigned twenty Years and six Months, she gave up the Ghost. She ordered her Body to be buried in the Church of the Annunciation in Naples without the least Pomp, in a poor and mean Sepulchre, where she now lies.

THIS Queen was the last of the Family of Durazzo; and having had no Children, either by her first or second Husband, and her Hatred against King Alphonfus still continuing, she made a Will, wherein she appointed Renatus Duke of Anjou and Count of Provence King Lewis's Brother her Heir, and in the Will expresth the Reasons that had moved her so to do. Here follows a part of that Will, as it is printed in Tutini's Treatise, *De Contestabili del Regno: Præfata Serenissima, & Illustrissima Domina nostra Regina Joanna fide digna, & veridicè informata, quod bonæ memoriæ Dominus Papa Martinus V. per quasdam Bullas Apostolicas olim concessit claræ memoriæ Domino Ludovico III. SHE left fifty thousand Duckets in the Treasury to be employed for the Benefit of the City of Naples, and maintaining the Kingdom faithful to King Renatus; and she appointed sixteen Barons of her Council and Court to govern the Kingdom till he should arrive.

C H A P. VII.

The Polity of the Kingdom under the Governors appointed by Joan. The Government of Queen Isabel the Wise and Regent of Renatus of Anjou. The Wars between Renatus and King Alphonfus; by whom he was at last forced to leave the Kingdom.

NOT only Queen Joan's Death, but her last Will involved this Kingdom in greater Troubles than before; whereas there had been only two Pretenders, but now a third starts up, viz. the Roman Pontiff. Pope Eugenius no sooner heard of the Queen's Death, than he gave the Neapolitans to understand, that the Kingdom being a Fief of the Church, he could not conceive how it could be given to any other but to him, whom he should name and invest with it; and that in the mean time it belonged to him to take the Administration of it into his own Hands, and to appoint a Guardian to govern it. Alphonfus laid claim to it by vertue of Queen Joan's Adoption, and Renatus by vertue of her Will.

BUT the Neapolitans, who were at this time almost all in the Interest of the Family of Anjou, understanding the Pope's Pretension, opposed him Tooth and Nail, and declared, that they would have no other King but Renatus, and till such time as he should come to take the Government upon him, they would fulfil the Queen's Will; in fine, the sixteen Barons whom the Queen had appointed were confirmed in the Government, and they were these: Raimondo Orsino Count of Nola; Baldassare della Rat Count of Caserta; Giorgio della Magna Count of Pulcino; Perdicasso Barrile Count of Montedorisi; Ottino Caracciolo Count of Nicasstro, and High-Chancellor; Gualtieri and Ciarletta Caracciolo all three of the Family of Rosso; Innico d'Anna High-Steward; Giovanni Cicinello, and Urbano Cimmino, the one a Nobleman of the Seggio di Montagna, and the other of Portanova; Taddeo Gattola di Gaeta, and others mentioned in the Queen's Will. The Neapolitans, lest such a Government might at last be converted into Tyranny, elected twenty out of the Nobility and People, who were called Guardians of the Kingdom. These were for sending immediately to France to notify the Queen's Will and the Inclination of the City to Renatus, and to hasten his coming as soon as possible; and accordingly three Noblemen were dispatched, and mean while, in order to defend themselves against King Alphonfus, they sent for Giacomo Caldora, and gave him Money to raise Men; they likewise engaged in their Service Antonio Pontudero with a thousand Horse, and Micheletto da Cotignola with as many; and in this manner was the Kingdom governed from the time of the Queen's Death to the arrival of Queen Isabel Renatus's Wife; whence in the publick Deeds during that time no

Reign

Reign is mentioned, but in place thereof was put, Sub Regimine Illustrium Gubernatorum relictorum per serenissimam Reginam Joannam claræ memoriæ.

ON the other hand King Alphonfus, upon the News of the Queen's Death, being persuaded, that, as it was talked abroad, the Will had been extorted from the Queen, immediately prepared for War, and drew many over to his Party, such as the Dukes of Sessa and Fondi, the Prince of Taranto, and some others; and being spurred on by these he left Messina, and came to Sessa, from thence he went and besieged Gaeta. The Siege of that Place, which lasted a long time, was like to have quite ruined Alphonfus, and had it not been for the Generosity of the Duke of Milan, the War would have been at an end; for that Duke having pressed the Genoese to relieve that City, and not suffer the best Port in the Tyrrhenian Sea to fall into the Hands of the Catalans their Enemies, the Genoese sent a strong Fleet to Sea: and on the other hand Alphonfus put to Sea with another much stronger, in which, besides Alphonfus, were the King of Navarre, D. Henry Great Master of the Order of S. James, and D. Peter his Brothers, the Prince of Taranto, the Duke of Sessa, the Count of Campobasso, the Count of Montorio, and a great Number of other Barons of the Kingdoms of Sicily and Aragon; and on the fifth of August this Year 1435, having come to an Engagement near the Island Poncia, which lasted ten Hours, at last the Genoese overpowered Alphonfus's Fleet, and made the King himself, the King of Navarre, D. Henry, the Prince of Taranto, and the Duke of Sessa, with many Knights and Barons, to the Number of about a thousand, Prisoners; only D. Peter saved himself by flying with his Ship to Ischia. The Prisoners were carried to Savona, and from thence to Milan, where the Duke received King Alphonfus as a Guest, and not as a Prisoner. And so great was the Duke's Generosity, that he not only gave Alphonfus his Liberty, but being persuaded by him that it was the Security of his State to have the Aragonians in Italy, and not the French; for if Renatus should get Possession of the Kingdom of Naples, he would not fail to stir up the King of France to strip him of his Dominions; they entered into a League together, and with an unparallel'd Generosity he set Alphonfus, his Brother, and all the other Prisoners at Liberty; and before the Articles of the League were concluded, the Duke allowed the King of Navarre, and the Great Master of the Order of S. James to go Spain to make new Preparations for the War of Naples; and the Prince of Taranto, the Duke of Sessa, and the other Barons of the Kingdom to go to Naples to animate Alphonfus's Party, who believed, that he would never be able to set Foot in the Kingdom any more. Soon after the League was concluded, and the Duke sent to the Genoese to have their Fleet in readiness to go with the King upon the Expedition against Naples.

WHILE these things happened in our Seas, the Neapolitan Ambassadors who had been sent to France to hasten Renatus, found that the Duke of Burgundy, who in a Battel had made him Prisoner, and had afterwards, upon his Parole to return, set him at Liberty; had required Renatus to perform his Promise by returning to him, and whether it was out of Envy, in seeing him called to so great a Kingdom, or to do Service to King Alphonfus, when he did return, the Duke put him in Prison; which afforded Matter for Reasoning, which of the two was greatest, the Folly of Renatus in returning, or the Brutality of the Duke in putting him in Prison; and what made this Action of the Duke of Burgundy appear the more dishonourable and inhuman was, that it happened at the same time that the Duke of Milan had behaved so generously towards King Alphonfus. The Ambassadors not finding him, persuaded his Wife Isabella to go along with them, and as Regent to take Possession of the Kingdom in name of her Husband; and accordingly with her two young Sons John and Lewis she embarked, and with four Provensale Gallies, on the first of October arrived at Gaeta, where she was received by the Citizens with great Honour, and whose Fidelity she much commended, and granted them many Privileges. Then she went to Naples, where she arrived on the eighteenth of October this Year 1435, and with the greatest Joy was received by all the Inhabitants, to whom the Government of the Guardians and Governors had become loathsome; and the Count of Nola swore Fealty to her, whose Example was followed by almost all the Barons; and as Regent for her Husband, she began to govern the Kingdom.

THIS Queen, by her great Prudence and Beneficence, in a short time had gained the Hearts of every Body, insomuch, that had it not been that Fortune smiled exceedingly upon Alphonfus, and frowned upon her Husband Renatus, she would have established the Kingdom in his Posterity. But the League entered into with the Duke of Milan when it was least expected, and the matchless and incredible Generosity with which that Duke set Alphonfus and his Brothers at Liberty, put the Queen and the Anjou Faction into a terrible Consternation. To this was added, that Gaeta, which had stood out against so many Assaults, and so great an Army, by the Means of a Storm, which overtook D. Peter Alphonfus's Brother, fell into the Hands of the Aragonians; for D. Peter, with five Gallies, having set out from Sicily in order to go to Porto Spezie to receive Alphonfus, who was then at his Liberty, being arrived at Ischia, by a violent Storm was detained upon the Coast of Gaeta; and there being a Plague in that City, the chief Nobility and rich Citizens had left it, and by chance the Governor being dead, some Gaetans, who sided with Alphonfus, delivered up the City to him. D. Peter staid in Gaeta, and sent Ramondo Periglios with the Gallies to Porto Venere, where he found the King, who upon hearing that Gaeta was in his Brother's Possession, immediately set sail towards it, and on the second of February this Year 1436 he arrived there, and he spent many Months without undertaking any thing, but going between Gaeta and Capua, which had likewise surrendered to him. To all these was added the Revolt of the Counts of Nola and Caserta, and of many other Barons, who went over to Alphonfus.

THIS prosperous Fortune of Alphonfus made the Queen and those of her Party resolve to demand Assistance of the Pope, and Ottino Caracciolo and Giovanni Cossa were sent to Pope Eugene for that end, who very readily granted their Demand; for the Pope, knowing the Ambition of the Duke of Milan, who by himself alone endeavoured to be Master of all Italy, thought, that since he was in Alliance with the King of Aragon, and many other Kingdoms, he would be more bold; therefore he sent Giovanni Vitellisco da Corneto Patriarch of Alexandria, a better Soldier than a Clergyman, with three thousand Horse, and as many Foot to the Queen's Assistance, which very much encouraged the Anjou Party; insomuch, that by this Means they acquired the Friendship of the Genoese, who had become mortal Enemies to the Duke of Milan and the King of Aragon, and with the greatest Faithfulness they continued to assist that Party to the end of the War.

THE War was carried on by both Parties with doubtful Success; and while the War was hot in many parts of the Kingdom, the Duke of Burgundy having received a great Ransom, set Renatus at Liberty, who without Loss of Time embark'd at Marseilles, and with a prosperous Gale arrived at Genoa, where on the eighth of April he was honourably received; and being reinforced with seven Gallies from the Genoese under the Command of Battista Fregoso, he set sail, and by a favourable Voyage, on the ninth of May he landed at Naples; and getting up on Horseback, he rode through the City accompanied by his eldest Son John, being welcomed with Huzza's and Acclamations; and the Fame of his great Exploits in the Wars of France against the English gave new Life to the Anjou Party, which was not at all lessened here by his Presence and Actions; for he was no sooner arrived and received in Naples, than he began to review the Soldiers that were in the City, as also the Neapolitan Youth, and to exercise them, whereby he equally raised his Reputation, and gained Esteem. He immediately sent for Caldora, with whom he consulted how the War was to be carried on; and they resolved, after taking Scafati, to march into Abruzzo, and besiege Sulmona.

BUT while Renatus was in Abruzzo with the greatest part of the Neapolitan Youth, King Alphonfus, who had got a great Reinforcement of Gallies from Sicily and Catalonia, marched with fifteen thousand Men, and encamped near Naples upon the Banks of the River Sebeto. The Neapolitans by the Absence of their King were at first much disheartened, but afterwards by the Assistance of the Genoese they made a vigorous Defence; so that Alphonfus was forced to raise the Siege, and retire to Capua, in which Siege he lost his Brother D. Peter, who was killed by a Cannon Bullet.

RENATUS, after having reduced all the Cities of Abruzzo to his Obedience, hearing of the Siege of Naples, by the way of Capitanata and Benevento, immediately came to its Relief; and after having taken S. Vincent's Tower, he was in hopes of recovering Castel Nuovo, which had been for so many Years in the Hands of the Aragonians; therefore he ordered the Governor of S. Eramo to batter it, for there being a Scarcity in it both of Powder and Provisions, it was impossible for it to hold out, and the Genoese Gallies cut off all Means of Succour from coming to it from Castel dell' Uovo, which likewise held out for Alphonfus. In the mean time there arrived in Naples two Ambassadors from Charles VI. King of France, who fearing that his Cousin Renatus might be driven out of the Kingdom by the overgrown Power of Alphonfus, sent to treat of a Peace between these Kings; and first of all they treated about delivering up the Castle. But King Renatus, whose Money had been exhausted by the Charges of the War, got a Year's Truce to be proposed to Alphonfus, and offered to be satisfied with the Sequestration of the Castle in the Hands of the Ambassadors, and at the Expiration of a Year to restore it to Alphonfus furnished with Provisions for four Months. But Alphonfus, who saw Renatus's Power at a low ebb, chose rather to lose the Castle, than to give him so long a breathing-time, as by new Alliances to gather more Strength; so that the French Ambassadors returned without doing any thing, but to be Spectators of the Surrender of the Castle, which was delivered up on the twenty fourth of August this Year 1439, upon Condition, that the Garrison should march out with what Effects each Soldier could carry: to the great Reproach of Alphonfus, who was an Eye-witness to the Loss of that Castle, which had held out for eleven Years, and was now lost at a time, when with so great an Army he was in Possession of three Fourths of the Kingdom.

HOWEVER Alphonfus made up this Loss by the Conquest of the City of Saleruo, which surrendered without Opposition, and with which he invested Ramondo Orsino Count of Nola, and gave him the Title of Prince, to whom the Year before he had given for Wife Dianora of Aragon his Cousin, with the Dutchy of Amalfi, and then he quickly returned to Terra di Lavoro.

THE sudden Death of Giulio Caldora a famous Captain of these Times, which happened on the fifteenth of October, very much weakened Renatus's Army; for though Renatus had given his Son Antonio Caldora all his Father's Estates, and the Office of High-Constable*; and besides had sent him a Patent to be Viceroy of all that part of the Kingdom, which was under his Obedience; yet it being afterwards suspected that Caldora kept a secret Correspondence with Alphonfus, he caused him to be imprisoned, which turned to his great Prejudice; for Caldora's Soldiers having mutinied, he was forced to set him at Liberty. Upon this Affront Antonio having assembled his Army made a Truce with Alphonfus for fifty Days, and after an Interview, Caldora with all his Men went over to him. In the mean time Acerza and Aversa in the Year 1441 surrendered to Alphonfus; so that Renatus being left very weak by the Desertion of Caldora, and seeing his Footing in the Kingdom so much diminished, he sent Queen Isabel and his Sons to Prevence, and began to treat about an Agreement, and to offer to yield the Kingdom to Alphonfus, provided he would adopt John his eldest Son, that after the Death of Alphonfus he might succeed him in the Kingdom. But the Neapolitans, who continued most obstinate, and abhorred to be under the Dominion of the Catalans, encouraged him, and begged of him not to abandon them; for as soon as Pope Eugene, Count Francesco Sforza, and the Genoese, who were all against the Kingdom's falling into the Hands of the Catalans, should hear of Caldora's Desertion, they would send fresh Succours; and by this Means they made him give over all Thoughts of a Treaty of Peace: and what they said proved true, for the Genoese sent fresh Succours, and Count Francesco told them, That he would send a powerful and speedy Relief.

BUT all these Reinforcements were not sufficient to put a Stop to Alphonfus's extraordinary Success; for the following Year 1442 being in Capua, very unexpectedly, a Priest of the Island of Capria came and offered to deliver up the Island to him: Alphonfus immediately sent six Gallies with him, and without Difficulty the Island was delivered up; and though it seemed to be but a small Conquest, yet in a little time it proved to be of great Consequence; for a Galley that was coming from France being overtaken by a Storm, and the Captain, thinking that the Island was in the Interest of King Renatus, landed his Men, who were all made Prisoners by the Islanders, who seized the Galley, and found in her eighty thousand Crowns, which were designed as a Supply for Renatus; this was a most severe Stroke to Renatus, for with that Money he would have been able to spin out the War a long time.

* Tutin. de Contest. pag. 145.

KING Alphonfus seeing that Fortune fought for him, marched and laid Siege to Naples; and perceiving that the City was so thin of Troops that they were scarcely sufficient for guarding the Gates and the Walls, he sent a part of his Army to besiege Pozzuolo, which, after a stout Resistance, surrendered upon honourable Terms; then he ordered an Attack to be made upon Torre del Greco, which quickly surrendered: afterwards in order to block up the City of Naples closer, he divided his Army into two Bodies, one of which he left at the Marshes, which lye on the East-side of the City, with D. Ferdinand his Bastard Son, and with the other he marched to Eschia, and encamped at Pizzofalcone. The City made a noble Defence, but Alphonfus's Men having entered it through an Aqueduct, on the second of June this Year 1442 it was taken; and though the Aragonian Army, provoked by the long Resistance, had begun to pillage the City; yet King Alphonfus, out of his great Clemency, rode through the Streets with a Detachment of Horse and choice Officers, and under Pain of Death forbade the least Violence or Injury to be offered to the Citizens, so that the Pillage lasted only four Hours; nor was there any thing lost, but such things as the Soldiers could hide, for he caused all other things to be restored.

RENATUS, having retired to Castel Nuovo, allowed Giovanni Cossa, Governor of Castel di Capuana, to deliver up that Castle in order to save his Wife and Children; and the next Day two Ships arriving from Genoa full of Provisions, he embarked in one of them with Ottino Caracciolo, Giorgio della Magna, and Giovanni Cossa, and set sail, still looking upon Naples, sighing, and cursing his bad Fortune, and with a fair Wind arrived at Pisa; and from thence he went to wait upon the Pope who was then in Florence, where, though out of Time, he gave him the Investiture of the Kingdom; and to encourage him, said, That there should be a new League made for recovering it to him: Renatus, who found there was nothing to be got but idle Words, answered him, That he had a Mind to go to France, lest the treacherous Italian Generals should make Merchandize of him, and because he owed a great Sum of Money to Antonio Calvo, a Genoese, whom he had left Governor of Castel Nuovo; since he saw that he was like to have nothing from Pope Eugene but fair Words, he wrote to Antonio, that in order to recover the Money he owed him, he might sell the Castle to King Alphonfus, which accordingly he did.

THUS at last ended the Reign of the Family of Anjou in this Kingdom, who, from Charles I. of Anjou, to Renatus's Flight, had governed it a hundred and seventy seven Years. Thus was it conveyed to the Family of Aragon, which held it seventy two Years. But Renatus carried with him to France such Seeds of Discord and cruel Wars, as for a long time disturbed the Kingdom; for his Right and that of his Son John devolving to the Kings of France, they often contended for it; and though always with bad Success, yet they occasioned terrible Confusion and Disorder, as will be seen in the following Books of this History.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Usages of the High-Court of the Vicariate ; and of the Lawyers who flourished in the Reigns of Queen Joan II. and Renatus ; and by whom the famous Pragmatick called Filingiera was penned.

ALTHOUGH during the Government of this Queen and Renatus the Kingdom was in great Confusion, and laboured under cruel Wars, insomuch that Learning and the liberal Arts were little improved, and much less practised, and Joan by her lewd Life had sullied the Royal Throne, and turned the Kingdom upside down; yet Learning had not quite left us, and even in the midst of so much Lewdness some Rays of Virtue still shined in that Queen; for she was a great lover of Justice, and wholly intent upon reforming the Tribunals, from which she banished all Avarice in the Ministers and their inferior Officers. That Justice might be duly administred, and the Parties not be imposed upon in the Fees of the Courts, with the Advice of her Counsellors she put a stop to many Abuses, and reformed many things. To which end she reduced the Usages of the Tribunal of the High-Court into a better Form, and established many other new ones.

THIS Tribunal was still reputed the Supreme Court, not only of the City, but of all the Kingdom, to which that of the Vicariate being united, these two Courts thus joined became the most eminent Tribunal of the Kingdom. Although the City of Naples had the Court of its Capitano, yet that Court could only take Cognizance of Criminal Causes within its own District, but not of Civil, and much less of Feodal, High-Treason, or of many other more weighty¹; and as Appeals were allowed from that Court, as well as from all the other Courts of the Cities of the Kingdom to the High-Court, it was not much regarded; and it declined so much afterwards, that in the Reign of the Family of Aragon it was quite suppressed, and the Cognizance of its Causes were transferred to the Tribunal of the Vicariate.

As has been observed in the twentieth Book of this History, this Tribunal was composed of two Courts, viz. that of the Chief Justice, called Curia Magistri Justitarii, and that called Curia Vicarii, or Vicarie. By many Regulations of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, the Jurisdictions of these two Courts being mutually communicated to one another, in process of time they became one, called The High Court of the Vicariate; it being thought needless to consider them as two distinct Tribunals, and to employ many different Ministers, who had the same Power and Authority. The Lord Chief Justice being Head of the High-Court, he came likewise to be President of that of the Vicariate; whence all Decrees and Orders, which are dispatched from the High-Court, are published under the Name of the Lord Chief Justice. Formerly he had Power of appointing his own Lieutenants or Deputies, but he lost that afterwards, and it was reserved to the King and his Viceroy to name them.

FROM this Tribunal's being composed of two Courts, in these Usages the Queen frequently mentions them thus: *In nostris Magnæ, & Vicariæ Curis*²; and elsewhere¹, Judices ipsarum Curiarum. Likewise in the Privileges which she granted the Neapolitans, and which are recorded among these Usages², she says, Quod nulla Curia Civitatis Neapolitanæ, tam Scilicet M. Curia Domini Magistri Justitiarum Regni Siciliæ, seu ejus Locum tenentis, ac Regentis Curiam Vicariæ, quam Capitaneorum, vel aliorum Officialium, &c.

THIS manner of writing continued during the Reign of the Family of Anjou, including King Renatus the last of them; for his Wife Isabel, while Regent, in 1436 directing one of her Edicts to Raimondo Orsino Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom, which we likewise read among these Usages³, writes thus: Magnifico Raymundo de Ursinis, &c. Magistro Justitiarum R. Siciliæ, & ejus Locum tenenti, nec non Regenti Magnam Curiam Nostræ Vicariæ, &c.

BUT afterwards in the Reign of Alphonfus, these two Courts being jumbled together, without any Distinction, even in the Name, this Tribunal was always called the High-Court of the Vicariate; whence, some have said, that this Union happened in the time of Alphonfus, and not before, of which we have discoursed at large in the abovementioned Book.

NEVERTHELESS Queen Joan made many Regulations for this Tribunal concerning the Method of proceeding in Causes, both Civil and Criminal; what was to be observed in drawing up of Processes, that the Suit might be valid; a Rule for clearing the Deeds, for Citations, for Cases of Contumacy, Examination, Proofs, and all that regards judicial Proceedings. She prescribed the Number of Judges, Mastrodatti, and their Clerks, and fixed their Fees and Emoluments; and above all she recommended the due Administration of Justice, reforming many Abuses, which had crept into this Tribunal during the many Troubles and Revolutions that had happened in the Kingdom.

AMONG all the Usages which this Queen caused to be published, the two hundred and thirty fifth deserves our Attention most; for though during the Reign of the Family of Anjou, and especially her own, every thing was done according to the good liking of the Popes; yet this Queen did not allow to be abolished that antient Custom practised in the High-Court, of taking Cognizance of the Validity of Ordination, and obliging a pretended Clergyman to appear personally before her Officers, in order to prove what was requisite, and to subject himself to her Courts of Justice; any thing in the Decretals to the contrary notwithstanding⁴, as is expressed in the Usage itself⁵. Yet this was not sufficient to prevent the Ecclesiasticks afterwards in the Pontificate of Pius V. from breaking through that antient Custom, and endeavouring to set aside the Usage, which had been observed for so many Years, as shall be seen in the following Books of this History, when we shall have occasion to treat of the Government of the Duke of Alcala Viceroy of this Kingdom.

THESE Regulations were not established all at once by Queen Joan, but from time to time by the Advice of her able Lawyers; and it is thought, that the greatest part of them were issued between the Year 1424 and 1431, which were the Years wherein she had some Peace and Tranquillity; for during all the rest of her Reign, her Unsteadiness involved her into so many Troubles and Anxieties of Mind, that she had no time to think of any thing but her own Defence and Liberty.

THESE Usages were afterwards collected into one Body, to which she prefixed a Constitution by way of Preface, whereby she gave them the Force and Vigour of Laws, ordering them to be inviolably observed, not only in Naples in the High-Court of the Vicariate, and the other Courts of that City, but also throughout the whole Kingdom: She likewise ordained all other Usages, except these which had been hitherto observed, to be abolished and annulled, and to be of no Force or Effect in the Courts. Whence proceeded that common Opinion of our Authors, that what was observed in the Tribunal of the Vicariate, was a Rule to all the inferior Tribunals of the Kingdom.

THE Authors, who either in writing small Notes or long Comments upon these Usages for the greater Distinction, and that when quoted they might the more easily be found, divided them by Numbers, so that now they amount to three hundred and eleven.

⁴ Cap. si Judex Laicus, de Sentent. in 6.

⁵ Rit. 235. Quamvis jura Canonica his prædictis videantur aliquantulum refragari.

AMONG these they inserted an Edict, which Isabel, the Wife of King Renatus and Regent of the Kingdom, put forth in the Year 1436, directed, as we have said, to Raimondo Orsino Lord Chief Justice¹: the Inscription runs thus; Isabella Dei gratia Hierusalem, & Siciliæ Regina, &c. & pro serenissimo, & illustrissimo Principe, & Domino coniuge nostro Reverendissimo Domino Renato, eadem gratia, dictorum Regnorum Rege, Vicaria Generalis, with this Date; Datum in Regio, nostroque Castro Capuane Neap. per manus nostræ prædictæ Isabellæ Reginae, A. D. 1436, die 14. mensis Aprilis 14. Indict. Regnorum vero dicti Domini Regis II. And this is the last Statute, which the Kings of the illustrious Family of Anjou left us.

AND it is likewise to be observed, that though in the latter end of the Reign of the Kings of that Family, the Roman Laws had been revived and restored to their ancient Force and Authority, yet the Longobard Laws were not quite abolished and in disuse in our Kingdom: There were still some who lived according to these Laws²; therefore the Mundualai were given to the Women, without which, both their Consent and Contracts were invalid³. And although Annibale Troisio and Prospero Caravita declare, that these Usages were fallen into disuse, that perhaps may be very true with respect to the Times wherein they wrote their Commentaries, but it was not so in the Reign of Queen Joan, who would have bestowed her Labour to very little purpose in making Regulations concerning them, if there had been none in the Kingdom that lived according to the Longobard Laws. Besides, we know not if it be true, even with respect to the Times of these Commentators, since in our time in some parts of the Kingdom, the Notaries, where Women are concerned, still insert the Mundualdi; and when that is not done, they use to say, that the contracting Parties live Jure Romano; of which we have taken Notice elsewhere.

THESE Usages, both for their Usefulness, and as containing a vast many Regulations, especially concerning the drawing up of Processes, and judicial Proceedings, were first explained with small Notes, and afterwards with full Commentaries by our Authors.

THE first was of Annibale Troisio, commonly called Cavense, because he was born in Cava, whom Gomarus has mentioned in his Bibliotheca. He ended his Commentaries the first of November 1542, as he testifies in the End of the Work. Cesare Perrino di Napoli, Giovan Michele Troisio, and Giralamo de Lamberti made some small Additions to his Commentaries, and they acquired no small Authority in our Courts, and were always very much esteemed. Giovan Francesco Scaglione a Neapolitan Doctor, but originally of Aversa, likewise made some small Commentaries upon these Usages, and made some Observations upon what he had seen practised while he was Advocate in the High-Court; and his Commentaries were for the first time printed in Naples in 1553.

THE Fame of both these was eclipsed by Prospero Caravita of Eboli, who began his Commentaries in Eboli, where he was born in March 1559, and ended them in August 1560. There past not a Day in which he did not employ his Studies, sometimes in Eboli, sometimes in Salerno, where he was Attorney-General; they were very learned and copious, insomuch that he was reputed the greatest Doctor of all that ever wrote upon these Usages.

LASTLY, In our time appeared Deputy Petra, who wrote four Volumes upon them; they rather deserve the Name of a Store-house, than of Commentaries; for besides what was necessary for explaining them, he stuffed his Volumes with so much Variety of Matter, that they contain all that he knew himself, and what he had learned from others; he deviated into sundry Disputes and Points that had happened upon recent Causes, and discussed in his own time; so that he has crammed his Work with many Quotations, and a Multitude of other things quite foreign to the Subject he was about. It may be useful on account of the many Instances of Causes resolved in his own time, and for the modern Practice and Custom, both of the High Court, and of the inferior Tribunals.

S E C T. I.

Of the Lawyers of these Times, and by whom the Statute called Filingiera was penned.

THE Lawyers, who flourished in the Reigns of Queen Joan II. and Renatus down to Alphonfus, are not to be compared either in Number or Knowledge to those, who lived under King Robert and Queen Joan I. his Grandchild. They left us none of their Works or Writings. The only Man in these Times that made himself famous was Marino Boffa da Pozzuolo, who being employed by the Queen in the most weighty Affairs of the Kingdom, was raised by her to the supreme Office of High-Chancellor; but afterwards having had a Quarrel with the High-Steward Sergianni, who so far prevailed upon the Queen, that in the beginning of the Year 1419 she turned him out of his Office, and put Ottino Caracciolo in it¹, which clears the Difficulty started by *Toppi*², viz. how Marino, who was Chancellor in the Year 1418, when the Statute Filingiera was made, was not in that Office in 1428, when the College of Doctors was instituted.

THERE also flourished Giovanni de Montemagno, Pietro di Pistoja Judge of the High-Court, and Giovanni Arcamone Judge of Appeals in that Court. Biaggio Ciso, Carlo di Gaeta, Gorrello Caracciolo, Carlo Molicello, the Judge Giacomo Griffo, and the Abbot Rinaldo Vassallo di Napoli had the Reputation of grave Doctors. At the same time flourished likewise Bartolomeo Bernalia di Campagna, of whom *Toppi*³, makes very honourable mention, and others of less Fame. These were the Lawyers with whom the Queen consulted in her most serious Deliberations.

THESE were employed in the so famous Statute called Filingiera made by the Queen at the Request of the High-Steward Sergianni, upon an Occasion which we shall relate. Sergianni had married Catarina Filingiera, the Daughter of Giacomo Count of Avellino, who in his Testament had appointed his eldest Son Gorrello Heir to his Feodal Estates, and Caterina, with three others of his Sons, Alduino, Giovannuccio, and Urbano to his Burgage Estates; and besides he left eight hundred Ounces of Gold to Caterina, which was given to Sergianni as her Portion. Gorrello died afterwards without Issue, and the other three remaining Brothers likewise died one after another while they were Minors. The Succession was claimed by Filippo their Uncle Giacomo's Brother, by Riccardo Matteo Filingiero, Son and Heir of Riccardo Filippo's Brother; by the Exchequer, which pretended that the County was devolved to it, and by Caterina, Sergianni's Wife. This last petitioned the Queen, that in regard of her own Service, and those of her Predecessors and Husband, she would not let her go to Law with her Relations, nor the Exchequer; but would be pleased to refer the Decision of the Matter to such Doctors, as her Majesty thought most fit, who, without a formal Process, by examining the Rights of the Parties, should determine whether she or her Relations ought to succeed to the County of Avellino, or whether it was devolved to the Exchequer. The Queen granted the Desire of her Petition, and pitched upon Barino Boffa the High-Chancellor, and the other abovementioned Doctors for deciding the Cause, who, after having maturely discussed and examined the Point, determined, that Caterina ought to succeed, notwithstanding her having got her Portion from her Brother, seeing the Portion was no part of his Estate. The Queen not only agreed to their Decision, but made it a general Law of the Kingdom; and in the Year 1418 published an Edict, whereby it was established, that among those, who lived Jure Francorum, the married Sister, who had not got her Portion out of the Brother's Estate, ought not to be excluded from the Succession to his Estate: on the contrary, with respect to those who live Jure Longobardorum, the Sister is excluded, if she has got her Portion, either from the common Father, or the Brother. This is that so famous Statute called Filingiera, which is dated the nineteenth of January 1418, and it was drawn up in Castel Nuovo, and is now inserted in the second Volume of our Statutes, under the Title De Feudis *, which hath occasioned much Writing, and many Disputes among our Lawyers.

The Institution of the College of Doctors in Naples.

THE University of Naples, which flourished so much under King Charles I. and II. and Robert his Son, who adorned it with so many Prerogatives and Privileges, had at first its Rector, who was one of the chief Doctors, then called Masters of the University, to whom Charles and Robert gave very ample Jurisdiction over the Scholars. This University had likewise its own Judge, and inferior Officers. Afterwards, as we have said elsewhere, the Presidency was given to the Chaplain-Major, who had the Care and Superintendency of it. The University gave the Degrees of Doctor and Licentiate, or Batchelor, as is now practised in the Universities of France, and other Kingdoms of Europe. Yea, the Power of conferring Degrees was by some looked upon to be so necessary and essential in an University, that without it the Academies did not deserve the Name of Universities †. This Doctorship, in the manner it is now conferred, was not known among the Romans, nor many Ages after, till the Pontificate of Innocent III. And Conringius ‡ observes, that in the Time of Alexander III. who flourished thirty Years before Innocent, there was no Doctorship, and it was allowed to all, who had Erudition and Capacity, to teach in the Universities and Schools; and the first of the Chancellors of Paris who was honoured with the Title of Master (which in those Times was the same with Doctor now-a-Days) was Peter Poitiers, who flourished in the Time of Innocent III. §. And Multius and Vitriarius were of Opinion, that these Degrees were introduced in the twelfth Century. Both the Universities of Naples and Salerno regularly conferred them before Queen Joan's Reign; nor was it that Queen who first instituted them, for by her own Writ of Institution, we see, that there were Doctors and Rectors in the Universities appointed for the Creation of others.

QUEEN Joan II. resolved to make a separate College of Doctors by chusing them, partly out of the University, and partly out of the other Societies, to which alone she gave Power of conferring the Degrees of Licentiate and Doctor. The first Doctors that were chosen, and who are named in the Writ of Institution drawn up in Castel di Capuana in the Year 1428 were Doctor Giacomo Mele who was made Prior of the College, Andrea d'Alderiso, U. Bishop of Tiano U. I. D. Goffredo di Gaeta Knight and Doctor; Carlo Mollicello U. I. D. and Knight; Girolamo Miroballo U. I. D. and Francesco di Gaeta likewise U. I. D. all Neapolitans. In the same Writ of Institution she likewise granted the Superintendency and Jurisdiction, as well in the Criminal as Civil Causes of the Doctors and Scholars, to the High-Chancellor of the Kingdom, which at that time was Ottino Caracciolo, without Prejudice however to the Jurisdiction of the Judge of the Scholars¹; and she put the College under the Direction of the High-Chancellor, or his Vice-Chancellor, whom he should chuse, and assigned them a Beadle, a Secretary and a Notary.

THE first and chief Prerogative which she gave to this College, was to confer the Degrees of Doctor and Licentiate of the Civil and Canon Laws. She prescribed the Presents or Fees, which the Scholars were to give the Vice-Chancellor and the other Doctors of the College, when they received the Degree of Doctor; and among other things she ordered, That the Archbishop of Naples should be present at the Acts of Doctorship, and have a Cap and a Pair of Gloves², which in process of Time fell into Disuse, because the Archbishops of Naples, being raised to greater Pomp and Grandeur, thought it below them to be present at these Functions, and slighted such small Presents. Lastly, she fixed the Number of the Collegiates, their Election, and the Method to be observed in the Acts of Doctorship; she settled the Precedency, both in sitting and voting, and many other particular Provisions were made, which may be seen in the Charter of Foundation which is printed at large in the Works of Deputy *Tappia*³, and *Matteo degli Afflitti*⁴ likewise makes mention it; and *Summonte*⁵ says, That upon many Occasions Copies of it have been laid before the High-Court; and at last *Muzio Recco*⁶ likewise printed it with his Glosses which he made upon it, full of Puerilities, and useless Reasoning.

THIS College was composed of Doctors of the Civil and Canon Laws only; therefore it was necessary to establish another of Philosophy and Physick; and the Queen, at the Desire of the High-Chancellor, was very ready to do it: A Year and nine Months after, on the eighteenth of August 1430, she granted another Charter for its Foundation. She likewise put this College under the Direction and Government of the High-Chancellor, or his Vice-Chancellor. She gave it a Prior, and for that Office pitched upon Salvatore Calenda Prior of the College of Salerno, who was also her own Physician. She assigned to it a Notary and a Beadle; and for Members of it, besides Salvatore Calenda, she chose Pericco d'Attaldo d'Aversa Physician, and Professor of Physick in the University of Naples; Raffaele di Messer Pietro Maffei della Matrice, Physician and Professor in the said University; Antonio Maffrilla di Nola Physician; Battista da Falconibus di Napoli Physician, and likewise Professor in Naples; Angelo Galeota di Napoli, Physician and Professor in the said University; Nardo di Gaeta di Napoli, Knight, and her own Physician; Luigi Trentacapilli di Salerno, Knight and Doctor of Physick; Maestro Paolo di Mola di Tiamonti, Physician; Roberto Grimaldo d'Aversa Physician; and Paolino Caproscola di Salerno, her Domestick and Physician.

HAVING likewise put this College under the Jurisdiction of the High-Chancellor, she ordained him to be Judge-competent both in the Civil and Criminal Causes of the Collegiate Physicians; she also prescribed the Fees, which the Candidates for the Doctorship were to give; she ordered the Trial of the Skill of the Candidates to be upon the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, and the Books of Aristotle's Philosophy and Physicks. The Archbishop of Naples was likewise to be present at the Functions, and to have a Cap and a Pair of Gloves; the Divines were also to have a Pair of Gloves, and so of the rest, as may be seen in the Charter. She fixed the Method of conferring the Degrees, and prescribed the Number, Election, and Precedency of the Collegiates.

IT is to be observed, that not only the Natives and Citizens of the City of Naples were admitted into these two Colleges, but also the Natives of the Kingdom, who for four Years successively had publickly taught in the Schools. *Afflitto*¹ mentions this Charter likewise; and Summonte attests², that a Transcript of it has upon Occasion been laid before the High-Court, and Deputy Tappia caused it to be printed in his Jus Regni.

TO these two was afterwards added the College of Divinity, composed of Divines, and for the most part of Claustal Superiors and Professors. They teach Theology, and give Letters of Licentiate. This College is also under the Jurisdiction of the High-Chancellor, and acknowledges him for its Head and Governor: So the College of Naples is now composed of three Orders of Doctors, viz. those of the Civil and Canon Laws, of Philosophy and Physick, and of Divinity. A College, which though it yields to that of Salerno in Antiquity, yet, according to the Vicissitude of worldly things, it hath been so much exalted above the other, that now it not only contends for the Preheminency, but for the Number and Learning of its Professors; and so much hath it become superior, as the one City excels the other in Magnificence and Eminence.

THE succeeding Kings of the Houses of Aragon and Austria established many Regulations concerning the Administration and Government of this College, the Requisites necessary in those that were to take Degrees, all which we read in the Volume of our Statutes; and Deputy *Tappia*³ collected many of them under the Title, De officio M. Cancellarii. *Giovan Domenico Tassone*⁴ likewise treats of them in his Promptuarium de Antefato; and lastly *Muzio Recco*⁵ caused a Volume of them to be printed, wherein he gives us a long Catalogue of all the Doctors of this College from the Year 1400 to 1647, which Catalogue has by others been continued to our Time.

CHAP. X.

The Polity of our Churches during the time of the Schism, to the Reign of the House of Aragon.

THE Revolutions which happened between the Death of the wise King Robert, and the quiet and peaceable Reign of King Alphonfus, disturbed no less the political and temporal State of this Kingdom, than the ecclesiastical and spiritual of our Churches. The Schism that arose on account of the Elections of Urban VI. and Clement VII. made us acknowledge at one and the same time not only two Kings, but two Popes; and the Kingdom being divided into Factions, as these miserably afflicted the State, so they put the Priesthood into Confusion, and continual Convulsions and Disorders. Whoever had the Favour and Countenance of our Kings, was looked upon among us to be the true Pope. The Indisposition of the Head made all the other Members languish; whence the Prelates of our Churches were at one time installed, and at another turned out of their Sees, according to the various Fortune of the contending Princes. Urban VI. in the beginning of his Pontificate, which was in the Year 1378, was acknowledged by us for Pope; but the Defects of his Election being afterwards discovered, and that the Cardinals had a Mind to declare it void, and elect another, our Queen Joan I. for the Reasons given in in the XXIII. Book of this History, favoured and assisted the Cardinals in their Design, and got the Election to be made in Fundi within her Dominions, where that same Year they elected Pope Clement VII. who was by her received and adored in Naples as true Pope. This occasioned terrible Disorder in our Churches, and especially in Naples; for the Archbishop Bernardo, who was in Possession of the See, having adhered to the Queen's and Clement's Party, was deposed by Urban, and the Abbot Lodovico Bozzuto created Archbishop in his room, who, raising a Commotion among the People, got Possession of the See, and turned out Bernardo's Family. But the Queen, having quelled the Tumult, drove out Bozzuto, caused his Houses to be pulled down, ruined his Lands^a and restored Bernardo, who governed that Church, till Charles III. of Durazzo took Possession of Naples. Charles being invited by Urban, who had excommunicated the Queen, and given him the Investiture of the Kingdom, caused the Queen to be strangled, possessed himself of the Kingdom, and cruelly oppressed all her Adherents, divesting them of their Fiefs, Dignities and all their Goods. On the other hand Urban, in order to be revenged of those, who had adhered to Clement, immediately sent Cardinal Gentile di Sangro as his Legate into the Kingdom, who, greatly outdoing Charles in Cruelty, barbarously persecuted all the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priests, and in a Word all the Clergy of the Kingdom that had sided with Clement, imprisoning, tormenting, and stripping them of all Dignities, Benefices, and Goods, not pardoning either Age, Rank, or Condition whatsoever; and Urban, commending the Rigour of his Legate, in order to add to the Misery of the Sufferers, and to deprive them of all Hopes, put others immediately in their Places: and it is told as a thing very extraordinary, that in one single Day he created thirty two Bishops and Archbishops, for the most part Neapolitans; and he had a singular Regard for those who had assisted King Charles in the Conquest of the Kingdom, requiring no other Merit but that^b. The Legate not content with this, one Day in the sight of King Charles, his chief Courtiers, and of the People of Naples, caused ignominiously to be brought to him, in the Church of S. Clara, Girardo di Giffoni General of the Order of the Friars Minors of S. Francis, who had been made a Cardinal by Pope Clement; James de Viss a Frenchman Archbishop of Otranto, and Patriarch of Constantinople, made Cardinal by Clement, and sent into the Kingdom as his Legate; Casello Bishop of Chieti, and a certain Abbot named Masello, who had been in the Queen's Interest, and forced them to abjure Clement, and acknowledge Urban: then he caused them to be stript of their Habits, red Hats, Mantles, and their Episcopal Hoods, and a Pile of Wood being kindled, he caused these Spoils to be burnt; afterwards they were led back to a dark Prison, where they remained for a long time^c. And Theodore de Nismes^d relates, that the Cruelty which the Cardinal di Sangro exercised in the Kingdom against the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priests, and the other Clergy in the Queen's Interest, and who had acknowledged Clement, was such, as could not be mentioned without Horror.

BUT soon after Urban's Partizans were interrupted, for Lewis I. of Anjou having been adopted by Queen Joan, and invested with the Kingdom by Pope Clement, in 1383 came to conquer it. Urban opposed him, and left nothing unattempted in order to frustrate his Design; and coming to Naples, he declared him a Schismatic, excommunicated him, and published a Crusade against him, granting plenary Indulgences and Remission of all Sins to all those who should take up Arms against him, and made King Charles Standard-bearer of the Holy Church, and blessed the Standard, which he delivered him at a solemn Mass in the Cathedral Church of Naples. And Money being wanted to support this cruel War, he empowered Filippo Gezza and Poncello Orfino two of his Cardinals to sell and mortgage the Lands and Goods of all the Churches, although the Prelates and Chapters should dissent; and then a terrible Havock was made of our Church Lands, for the pressing Necessities of the War requiring it, Charles was forced to sell them at a very low Price^e. While Charles lived, the Anjou Faction gained little or no Ground: but upon his Death King Lewis invaded the Kingdom, turned Queen Margaret, the deceas'd King's Widow, with her Son Ladislaus out of it; and in the Year 1386 confined them to Gaeta.

WHEREUPON Clement's Faction prevailing in the Kingdom, that of Urban was quite humbled. In the mean time, Bernardo dying in the Year 1380, Clement in his room had made Tommaso de Amanatis Archbishop of Naples, who, during Bozzuto's Intrusion, and while Urban's Faction prevailed, resided always in Avignon, where Clement likewise made him a Cardinal, and where he died; Writers differ no less about the Year of his Promotion, than of his Death¹; and Clement immediately appointed Guglielmo to succeed him in the Archbishoprick. On the other hand Urban, Bozzuto dying in the Year 1384, did not fail to name Niccolo Zanafe to be his Successor; but he, by sticking fast to Queen Margaret's Party, as well as Tommaso, died in Exile from his Church, which he had resigned in Cremona in the Year 1389. Urban notwithstanding before he died in the Year 1386 having named Guindazzo to be his Successor, who, with great Constancy adhering to Urban's Party, and the Anjou Faction prevailing, could not enjoy peaceable Possession of his Church; for Queen Margaret and Ladislaus being confined to Gaeta, and the City of Naples and the Kingdom being under Subjection to King Lewis and Pope Clement; the Archbishop Guglielmo was acknowledged by the *Neapolitans*².

POPE Clement was resolved not to be behind hand with Urban in opposing Ladislaus, who, being now grown up to Man's Estate, was preparing to make an Attempt upon the Kingdom, in order to drive his Competitor Lewis out of it; whereupon Clement, residing in Avignon, empowered King Lewis, and those of his Party who governed the Kingdom, to make use of all the Gold and Silver Vessels of the Churches for coining Money to support the War against Ladislaus; which was accordingly done, for all the Church Plate was partly coined, and partly sold, to the inestimable Damage of the Churches³. Yet we don't find, that Clement used the Bishops and Abbots in his Rival's Interest, so cruelly as Urban did by the Means of the Cardinal di Sangro.

POPE Clement's Party prevailed till the end of the Year 1389, when Ladislaus, having gathered Strength, and his Party Courage, regained a good part of the Kingdom; and now our Churches were involved in greater Confusion than ever; for in the Heat of the War, as the Fortune of the contending Princes changed, the Prelates and the other Clergy had the same Fate. Nor was the Death of Urban, and that of Clement soon after, sufficient to put an end to the Schism; for as the Cardinals of Urban's Faction elected Boniface IX. in his room, so Clement dying in Avignon in the Year 1394, his Cardinals immediately elected Benedict XIII. and as Boniface favoured King Ladislaus, so Benedict sided with King Lewis, whom he confirmed in the Possession of the Crown, by granting him new Investiture. And the Kingdom being thus divided, Boniface was acknowledged by his Party, and Benedict, who resided in Avignon, was owned by all the Anjou Faction, and the Prelates were always afraid of being turned out; whence Ladislaus, in order to strengthen his Interest, assured the Friends of the timorous Prelates, that they should not be deprived of their Sees, and gave his Promise to Galeotto Pagano, that his Brother Niccolo Pagano, who was in Benedict XIII.'s Interest, should not be turned out of the Church of Naples, but that he would do his utmost to maintain him in it; as he likewise promised to Giacomo di Diano to continue Niccolo di Diano his Brother Archbishop of Naples, and not suffer him to be removed or translated upon any Account whatsoever; as may be seen in the Letters of that King recorded by *Cicciacchi*⁴. And as long as the Anjou Faction was able to make Head against Ladislaus, our Churches were no less harassed than the Cities, till at last that Faction being crushed, and King Lewis returned to France, and Boniface IX. Innocent VII. and Gregory XII. his Successors being attached to Ladislaus, they recovered greater Power and Vigour.

WHILE Benedict XIII. kept his See in Avignon, and Gregory XII. his in Rome, the Cardinals of both Colleges, in order to remove the Schism, agreed upon an Expedient to join in Council in Pisa, and to elect a new Pope, and depose both Be- nedict and Gregory, as they did, by electing Alexander V. but that Council was of no Service to us, because King Ladislaus continued to acknowledge Gregory, and received him into the Kingdom; he ordered all his Subjects to own him for lawful Pope, and assigned him the Castle of Gaeta for a secure Sanctuary, where he remained for a long time, in spite of Alexander, who therefore employed Baldassar Cossa Cardinal Deacon, who soon found Means to make himself Master of Rome, to drive out Ladislaus's Officers, and fix Paolo Orsino there. But Alexander, who was seventy Years of Age when he was elected Pope, did not live long after his Election; he died in Bologna in the Year 1410, and Baldassar Cossa, a bitter Enemy to Ladislaus, succeeded him, and took the Name of John XXIII. This Pope, who had been favoured in his Election, and recommended by King Lewis II. of Anjou Ladislaus's Rival, was no sooner fixed in S. Peter's Chair, than he resolved to strip Ladislaus of the Kingdom of Puglia; and at last raised a great Army against him, with which he marched to Capua, defeated him, and returned in triumph to Rome. But Ladislaus, who was a Prince of an invincible Spirit, soon recovered himself so, as to oblige the Pope to be willing to be at Peace with him, which was made with this Condition, That he should turn Gregory out of his Dominions, and get John to be acknowledged in them for true Pope. Ladislaus put the Treaty in execution, so that Gregory was forced to seek Refuge in Marca d'Ancona, under the Protection of Carlo Malatesta, where he remained till the Council of Constance. Gregory, who to the Year 1412 had been obeyed as true Pope in Naples, being thus discarded, John was after that acknowledged as such there till the Year 1415, when he was deposed by the Council of Constance, and at last submitting to the Sentence, he stripped himself of the Pontifical Habit.

NO other Pope was acknowledged in our Kingdom during the time between John's Deposition, and the Election of Pope Martin V. by the Council of Constance, which was in the Year 1417. so that for almost two Years and a half the Apostolick See was looked upon with us to be vacant; whence in all Writings penned in Naples during that time, the Name of no Pope was mentioned, but Apostolica sede vacante; for as John was no more to be reputed Pope after his Deposition by the Council, so Gregory and Benedict being deposed were much less accounted such with us. But Martin V. being elected by the Council, as he was acknowledged by almost all the Catholick World for true and lawful Pope, so by our Princes, and all the Churches and People of the Kingdom he was respected and owned for the only and true Pope; and although King Alphonfus, in order to keep Pope Martin in Awe, still sided with Benedict XIII. and he dying in 1424 espoused the Interest of Clement VIII. his Successor, elected by two Cardinals only, who had continued with him; yet that made no Alteration among us, as well because Alphonfus did not hinder his Subjects from acknowledging Martin, as that he had his own Ends that prompted him to protect Clement's Party; besides, he was disgusted at Martin because he had invested Lewis III. his Rival and Competitor with the Kingdom. But their Quarrels being made up, Alphonfus sent the Cardinal de Foix his Ambassador to Spain to get Clement to yield, who in the Year 1429 was forced to renounce all his Right in the Hands of the Ambassador; and the Cardinals which he had made, likewise renounced their Cardinalships; and thus ended the Schism, which for the Space of fifty one Years had miserably rent the Church; and Martin V. remained sole and only Pope, acknowledged by all the West.

BY this Means Peace was restored to our Churches, which were not in the least disturbed by the Schism renewed by the Council of Basil, which in the Year 1439 having deposed Eugene IV. Martin's Successor, had confirmed the Election made by their Commissaries of Amadeus Duke of Savoy, who took the Name of Felix V. for tho' Alphonfus, for Reasons, which shall be told in the following Book, favour'd him, yet he was never acknowledged for Pope by our Churches, they still continuing in their Obedience to Pope Eugen, as, after his Death, which happen'd 1447. they did to Nicholas V. his Successor, by whose Election the Schism ended; for he being a mild and peaceable Man, readily gave ear to the Proposals of Accommodation which were made him by the Christian Princes; and, on the other hand, Felix and his Adherents, being likewise disposed to Peace, he was induc'd to renounce the Pontifical Dignity; and it was agreed, that he should continue to be the first among the Cardinals, and perpetual Legate of the Holy Church in Germany.

THE Council of Constance remedied the preceding Disorders of our Churches, seeing for the Sake of Peace, and to prevent Disputes between the two Factions, which of the two contending Parties ought to be reputed the true and lawful Pope, and by consequence, what Elections and Provisions made by them ought to be valid, it took care that the Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots, benefic'd Persons, and all the Officers, whichsoever of the two they obeyed, should be maintained in the Possession of their Benefices and Posts; and that the Dispensations, Indulgences and other Favours granted by either of the two Popes. as also the Decrees, Dispositions and Regulations made by them ought to take effect¹. Thus did our Churches remain in Peace, as also the Church of Rome, after the Election of Nicholas V. till the end of this Century; and the Popes busied themselves more afterwards in the Wars of Italy, and in taking care to maintain their temporal Power, and establish their own Families, than in Ecclesiastical Affairs. They were likewise taken up with those who usually came to Rome for the Canonization of Saints: For obtaining Privileges to Monasteries: For the Affairs of so many and different Religious Orders: For obtaining Indulgences and Dispensations, with Disputes between Churches and Ecclesiasticks, which were all drawn to Rome, whither Collations of all Benefices, Reservations, gratie expectative, Anticipations, Annats, and all Elections to Bishopricks and Abbeys, and other Provisions of Benefices were likewise drawn, with Disputes between the secular and regular Clergy about the Administration of Sacraments, and with many other Affairs; whence they had Occasion to establish so many Bulls and Decrees, which in process of time grew to so great a Number, that they are now collected and make five large Volumes, under the Title of *Bullarium Romanum*².

Of Monks and Temporalities.

DURING the time of the Schism, our Churches made no remarkable Acquisition of Temporalities, for the Clergy were in little Repute; on the contrary the obstinate Wars that happened, often obliged our Princes, with the Permission of the Popes, to make terrible Havock of the Church Lands, even to sell and mortgage them, and to make use of the Gold and Silver Plate for paying the Soldiers. The old Monks, having now lost the Reputation of Sanctity, were not regarded. All the Devotion of the People centered upon the new Religious Orders which were daily starting up; and as we have observed elsewhere, in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, the Orders most in vogue were the Mendicants, and of these the Preaching Friars and Friars Minors were in the greatest Esteem. Queen Joan II. to make Amends for her lewd Life, at last began to have a great Regard for them, and to give her Mind to Works of Piety. Besides her having founded a new Hospital in the Church of the Annunciation of Naples, and endowed it with great Revenues, and her having enlarged the Hospital and Church of S. Nicholas, out of Affection for the Friars Minors she repaired the Monastery of the Cross in Naples, and ordained, That all those, who in her own time, Queen Margaret's, and Ladislaus her Brother's, had robbed the Publick, should be acquitted, by paying two per Cent. of what they had robbed; and for that end a Trunk was placed within the Monastery of S. Maria della Nuova, whither the Robbers were to carry the Money, which she designed for the Reparation of that Monastery¹. Out of Regard for Sister Clara, formerly Countess of Melito, she gave many Farms to the Monastery of S. Anthony of Padua; and confirmed the Privileges and Concessions granted by Queen Joan I. to the Monastery of S. Martin above Naples, of having the Direction of the Hospital dell' Incoronata founded and endowed by the said Queen Joan I. exempting the Church and all its Moveables and Immoveables from paying any publick Burdens, that the Sick might be the better treated; the Estate and Franchises are still remaining, *but the Hospital, as Summonte says*¹, is laid aside, and where the Sick were taken care of, there are now Magazines of Wine.

THIS Queen had likewise a great Regard for Giovanni da Capistrano a Friar Minor, and Disciple of S. Bernardino of Sienna, who in his Youth having applied himself to the Study of the Law, became eminent in that Profession, and was made Judge of the High-Court of the Vicariate; but afterwards renouncing the World, he turned Monk, of the Order of S. Francis, and became more famous for his Expeditions, than his Treatises upon the Laws and Morality which he left us, and whereof *Toppi*² made a Catalogue. He took upon him the Command of a Crusade against the Fraticelli, and the Hussites, and went in Person at the Head of the Troops that were making War upon the Bobemians. Queen Joan likewise gave him a Commission to hinder the Jews of our Kingdom from taking Usury, and to force them to wear the Hebrew Letter Thau, as a Badge to distinguish them from Christians. He was also renowned for the surprising Relief, which he gave the City of Belgrade besieged by the Turks, and for his other martial Atchievements, which he performed in Hungary, where in the Year 1450 he ended his Days.

THE Rise of a new Order in these Times afforded an Opportunity to our Princes of the House of Aragon, to shew themselves as profuse in bestowing Riches upon the Monks, as those of the Family of Anjou had been. This was the Order of Monte Oliveto instituted in Italy by three Siennese, who having retired to the County of Monte Alcino to lead a solitary Life on a Mountain called Oliveto, and being charged as Broachers of new Superstitions, they were forced to appear before Pope John XXII. to vindicate their Institution, who gave it in Commission to the Bishop of Arezzo, in whose Diocess Monte Oliveto is situate, to prescribe a Rule to them, whereby they were to live: The Bishop caused them to be clothed with white Garments, and gave them the Rule of S. Benedict; and they having built a Monastery on that Mountain, which is now the Head of this Society, in a short time after many others of the same Order were built in Italy; so that in the Year 1372. Pope Gregory XII. approved of this new Order, and Martin V. likewise confirmed it. These new Religious were introduced into Naples by Gurrello Origlia a Gentleman of Porto, Great Protonotary of the Kingdom, and in great Favour with King Ladislaus, who in the Year 1411 built for them from the Foundation a Church and Monastery, endowing it with a hundred and thirty three Ounces of Gold yearly for the Maintenance of twenty four Monks, and fourteen Lay-Brothers. He likewise assigned them many Farms and other Revenues, and among others the Fiefs of Savignano, Cotugno, and Casa Alba in the Territory of Aversa; the Territories of Echia, with the vast Revenues which they yield, only reserving to himself and Successors a Wax Candle of a Pound weight, which the Monks were obliged to present yearly on Candlemas-Day, as a Symbol of Patronage, which he reserved to himself as Founder of that Church³.

BUT afterwards in the Times of the Kings of the same Family of Aragon, their Acquisitions and Riches grew much greater; and Alphonfus II. above all others, a great Admirer of this Order, was most lavish in heaping Riches upon them, for besides having given them a vast deal of costly Furniture, and Plate, and enlarged their Monastery, and beautified it with excellent Pictures: he likewise gave them three Villages, viz. Teverola, Aprano, and Pepona, with both Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction. Which Example was followed by the other Kings of the House of Aragon, whose Reign we are now going to relate.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXVI.

WHEN the Kingdom of Naples was transferred from the Family of Anjou to Alphonfus King of Aragon, although it came under the Dominion of a most powerful King, possessed of so many hereditary Kingdoms, such as Aragon, Valencia, Catalonia, Majorca, Corfica, Sardinia, Sicily, Roussilion, and many other flourishing Dominions; and new Families, new Customs, and Fashions were brought to it from Spain, yet it luckily happened that this magnanimous King did not treat it as a foreign Kingdom; nor did he look upon it as a Province of the Kingdom of Aragon, but had as great a Regard for it as if it had been his antient and native Kingdom; yea, what is more, he erected a Tribunal in the City of Naples so eminent, that, by way of Appeal, he ordered not only the Causes of these our Provinces, but all those of his other vast Dominions to be brought before it.

WHETHER it was upon account of the Sweetness of its Climate, or its Grandeur, and the vast Number of its illustrious Barons and Nobility; or whether it was his Love for his dear Lucretia Alagna, it is evident that he preferred this Kingdom to all his other Dominions, and it never was in so flourishing a Condition, as in his Reign. He fixed his Royal Residence in Naples, where he resolved to pass the Remainder of his Life; and, as if he had forgot his paternal Dominions, all his Care, and all his Thoughts were employed about this Kingdom. Sicily, which had been divided from Naples ever since the famous Sicilian Vespers, was now united, and likewise reaped great Advantage. By the Union of these two Kingdoms, Alphonfus began to take the Title of King of both the Sicilies, Ut & hinc, as Fazzello says ¹, Pontificum Romanorum auctoritatem non improbare, & vetustam observationem non negligere videretur, non ignarus, cum eruditissimus esset, illius usurpatam esse, & novitiam vocem; which Title, the Kings his Successors, who governed both these Kingdoms, likewise took. But the chief Cause, that, even after the Death of Alphonfus, this Kingdom maintained its own Dignity, and preserved its own Kings, and did not depend upon foreign Princes, who having their Residence elsewhere must govern by their Ministers, as it happened afterwards in the Time of Ferdinand the Catholick, was, that Alphonfus took care, in case he should have no lawful Heirs of his own Body, that the Kingdom of Naples should not go with his hereditary Dominions to his Brother John and his Successors Kings of Aragon; therefore he legitimated, and, with the Consent of the People, invested Ferdinand of Aragon his Bastard Son with it, in whose Race it continued for many Years, till the Death of Frederick of Aragon the last King of that Line; so that the Kingdom was governed by its own native Princes till the Reign of Ferdinand the Catholick; for they having no other Kingdoms, the Kingdom of Naples was their only Seat and native Country.

THEREFORE the City and Kingdom of Naples are much indebted to Alphonfus, who, neglecting his other Dominions, fixed his Residence in that City; and to the antient Norman, Suevian, and French Nobility adding another a new one, which he brought from Spain, he augmented and adorned it with new illustrious Families; such as the Carvagli, the Guevara, the Cardenes, the Avalos, and many others, which are still among us; and with their noble Blood grace this Kingdom; besides the Villamarini, Cardona, Conteglia, Periglios, Cordova, and many other noble Families now extinct. He settled the Affairs of the Kingdom by frequent Parliaments, better Laws, and new Tribunals.

IT is not my Intention, neither would it answer the Design of this Work to relate his noble and excellent Actions; there are particular Authors who have accurately and at large given Account of the famous Exploits of this Hero, viz. the two Antonies, Zurita, Panormita, Bartolommeo Facio, Æneas Sylvius, Pope Pius II. the famous Costanzo, Spiegello, Gaspere Pellegrino, and many other renowned Historians. Therefore it will be sufficient for our Purpose to relate what belongs to the Government of the Kingdom under this Prince; what Novelties were introduced, and what Changes and Alterations happened, as well in the Ecclesiastical and Spiritual, as in the Civil and Temporal State.

C H A P. I.

Of the Articles and Privileges granted to the City and Kingdom of Naples, and to the Barons thereof.

AFTER Alphonfus had entirely crushed the Anjou Faction, and reduced all the Kingdom to his Obedience, he resolved to call a general Parliament, in order to settle many things which the late Wars had disturbed and confounded. He summoned it to be held in Benevento, and sent Letters over all the Provinces to the Barons and Royal Cities to meet there on an appointed Day; but the Neapolitans begged of him, that he would be pleased to hold it in the City of Naples, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, with which he complied: In this Parliament there were only two Princes, for at this time there were no more in the Kingdom, viz. Balzo Prince of Taranto, and Orfino Prince of Salerno, the first High-Constable, and the other Lord Chief Justice; all the other five Officers of the Crown were likewise present; four Dukes, Marzano Duke of Sessa, Orfino Duke of Gravina, Sanseverino Duke of S. Marco, and Caracciolo Duke of Melfi: (Acquaviva Duke of Atri, and other Barons, who had sided with Renatus were likewise summoned, but durst not venture to appear before the King) two Marquisses, Centeglia Marquis of Cotrone, and Aquino Marquis of Pescara; many Counts, and very many Barons and Knights, of whom Costanzo and Summonte have made long Catalogues.

AT the opening of this Parliament the King said, That since he had freed the Kingdom from foreign Invasions, in order to maintain it in Peace for the future, and to defend it against any that should endeavour to disturb it, there was a Necessity to lay a yearly Tax upon the whole Kingdom for maintaing Men at Arms for its Defence, which being taken into Deliberation, it was concluded, to lay a Tax of a Duckett upon every House, to be paid yearly over all the Kingdom; in Consideration of which, the King was to give to every House a Tommolo of Salt, and to take off all former Taxes¹. At the same time that this Offer was made, they sought other Favours of the King, who accepted the Offer, and promised to pay a thousand Men at Arms, and ten Gallies for guarding the Kingdom both in Peace and War, and generously granted all the Favours that were asked.

HE granted many Privileges, which are now printed in a particular Volume; among others it was established, That all poor and indigent People should have a publick Audience every Friday: That an Advocate should be appointed for them, with a yearly Salary to be paid out of the Exchequer: That in place of the Lord Chief Justice, his Lieutenant, or Deputy, should always be present in the High-Court of the Vicariate for the Administration of Justice: That the Privileges granted to the Barons should be preserved entire: That they should be freed from the Tax called Adoa: That every House, upon Payment of ten Carlins, should be furnished with a Tommolo of Salt; and other Privileges and Favours were granted, not only to the City of Naples, but to all the Corporations and Cities of the Kingdom.

ALPHONSUS's Example was imitated by the Kings his Successors, who on the like Occasions having demanded new Taxes and Donatives of great Sums, granted other Favours to the Cities and Kingdom. Many of which were granted by Ferdinand I. Alphonfus II. Ferdinand II. Frederick, and Ferdinand the Catholick, and his Plenipotentiary the Great Captain, Charles V. and Philip II. so that in the Year 1588 their Number was such, that Niccolo de Bottis thought fit to collect them into one Volume, which he caused to be printed in Venice, and dedicated it to the President de Franchi.

BUT in process of time, other Favours being granted by King Philip II. III. and IV. Charles II. and in our Time by the Emperor Charles VI. to the great Advantage of the Publick, another Volume has been collected and printed in Naples in 1719, wherein are contained the remarkable Privileges and most signal Favours granted to the City of Naples and Kingdom by our present most august and most clement Prince; which, as Occasion offers, we shall mention in this History.

C H A P. II.

Ferdinand of Aragon, Alphonsus's Son, declared Successor of the Kingdom. Peace concluded with Pope Eugene IV. who gives them Investiture of the Kingdom.

IN this Parliament the Succession of the Kingdom was likewise declared in favour of Ferdinand Alphonsus's Son; for the King's most favourite Barons, being sensible of the Affection he had for this Son, though a Bastard, whom he had legitimated^a, and declared capable of succeeding to all his Dominions, particularly to the Kingdom of Naples; and knowing it would be very acceptable to the King, proposed to the rest to ask the Favour, that he would be pleased to appoint Don Ferdinand to be his Successor, and give him the Title of Duke of Calabria, usually given to the eldest Sons of our Kings; whereupon Onorato Gaetano, who had been unanimously deputed by all the Barons, kneeling before the King, begged of him, that seeing his Majesty had settled Peace in the Kingdom, and granted so many Favours, in order to perpetuate them, he would be pleased to declare the most illustrious Lord D. Ferdinand his only Son, Duke of Calabria, and his Successor^b; and the King, with a joyful Countenance, ordered his Secretary in his Name to make the following Answer: His most serene Majesty the King reckons himself infinitely obliged to his illustrious, worthy, and magnificent Barons for the Request made in favour of the most illustrious Lord D. Ferdinand his most beloved Son; and in Compliance with your Desire, from this time forth he entitles and declares him Duke of Calabria, and immediate Heir and Successor of this Kingdom, and is content, that from this Day an Oath of Fidelity be sworn to him. Whereupon D. Ferdinand with great Rejoicing was proclaimed Duke of Calabria, and Successor of the Kingdom; and all the Officers and the said Barons, Ore & manibus, took an Oath of Fidelity to him; of which a publick Instrument was drawn up this Year 1443 in presence of many Barons, which is inserted in the Volume of the abovementioned Privileges. The Day following the King with D. Ferdinand, accompanied by all the Barons, went to the Monastery of the Nuns of S. Ligoro; and after having heard a solemn Mass, the King put the Sword into Ferdinand's right Hand, and the Standard in his left, and placed the Ducal Circle, or Coronet, upon his Head, and ordered, That they should all call him Duke of Calabria, and look upon him as his lawful Successor; of which also a publick Instrument was drawn up, which we find in the aforesaid Volume.

BUT all this was not sufficient to secure the Succession of the Kingdom to a Bastard Son, though legitimated, if this Oath and Declaration had not been ratified by the Pope, who, out of Hatred to Alphonfus, would never have given him the Investiture; and the Pope's Ill-will was evident, for all the Potentates of Italy sent to congratulate Alphonfus upon his Victory, and the Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom, except Pope Eugene alone; on the contrary, Renatus's Misfortunes in being obliged to quit the Kingdom vexed him to the very Heart. Therefore Alphonfus, who wanted to be Friends with him, not only for rendering the Peace of the Kingdom more complete, but for getting the Investiture for the Duke of Calabria, bent all his Thoughts upon a Reconciliation with Eugene, and left no Stone unturned in order to bring it about.

ALPHONSUS had formerly, as we have told, upon finding Eugene obstinate, kept a secret Correspondence with Amadeus Duke of Savoy the Anti-Pope, for no other end, but to obtain of him what he could not get from the true Pope. The Schism, which was renewed after the Death of Martin V. by the Council of Basil, had put every thing into Confusion. Whatever Pope Eugene established, was by the Council declared null; and on the other hand the Pope, looking upon that Meeting to be a Conventicle, condemned and anathematized whatever was determined in it. The Council summoned the Pope, and he not appearing, was declared Contumacious; at last on the seventh of May 1438 those Prelates, of which the Council of Basil was composed, deposed him, and deputed some Commissioners for electing a new Pope. The Commissioners elected Amadeus Duke of Savoy, who, as we have said, had retired to Ripaglia in the Diocess of Geneva, where he lived like a Hermit. His Election was confirmed by the Council, and he was called Felix V. who immediately went to Basil to preside in the Council. Pope Eugene had opened another Council in Florence, and they alternately condemned one another. France continued to acknowledge Eugene for Pope. But Germany began to waver, and proposed to have a new Council called for deciding which of the two Popes had the best Right. Eugene still continuing his Enmity to Alphonfus, the King, in order to keep him in Awe, sent Luigi Cescalles his Ambassador to Felix, and suffered some Prelates his Subjects to acknowledge him for true Pope. On the other hand Felix, to engage Alphonfus openly to espouse his Interest, and all the Subjects of his Dominions to pay him Obedience, offered to Luigi his Ambassador, to confirm the Adoption made by Queen Joan II. and to grant the Investiture of the Kingdom, and besides to give him two hundred thousand Duckets of Gold *. But the most prudent King perceiving, that the Council of Basil was daily dwindling away, and that on the tenth of August 1442, Felix, with some of his Cardinals, had retired to Lausanne, and that at long run every thing would be undone, wisely resolved to side with Eugene, and to keep Felix in suspense, he ordered his Ambassador to answer to the Offer made him, that the two hundred thousand Duckets must be paid at one Payment: That he was content to keep the City of Terracina for the Sum of three thousand Duckets, in part of what was owing him for the War made upon him by the Patriarch Viellesco, when he broke the Truce; and that it was then stipulated, that he should keep Possession of Terracina till he was fully satisfied: That if Felix was willing to perform these Conditions, he would not fail to defend and obey him; and besides, he would send Ambassadors to the Council, and likewise get the Prelates of his Kingdoms to go thither, and that he would also endeavour to persuade the King of Castile and the Duke of Milan to do the same, and enter into a Confederacy with the House of Savoy.

THUS did Alphonfus amuse Eugene, without Design of concluding any thing; and at the same time he had given it in charge to D. Antonio Borgia Bishop of Valeria, who was afterwards Cardinal, and then Pope, named Calistus III. to do his utmost to make up the Differences between him and Eugene; the Bishop begged of the Pope that he would vouchsafe to be reconciled with the King, and to receive him as a dutiful Son and Feudatory. Lodovico Scarampo Patriarch of Aquileia and Cardinal of S. Lorenzo Eugene's Treasurer, whose Advice he usually took in his most weighty and important Affairs, helped to bring about the Treaty of Peace; so that Eugene, moved by their Insinuations, and besides considering that he could not assist Renatus, and that his being at Enmity with King Alphonfus might prove prejudicial to him, resolved to make Peace, and on the ninth of April this Year 1443. ordered a Bull of Legation and Commission to be drawn up and given to the aforesaid Cardinal, empowering him to go and treat of a Peace with the King, and of the Investiture to be given him of the Kingdom. The Bull of this Legation is recorded by Cicciacarelli in the first Volume of his MS. Giurisdizionali.

THE King was at this time in Terracina, where he received the Legate with great Honour, and after much debating, on the fourteenth of June the same Year, the Peace was concluded on these Conditions:

THAT the King for ever should forget all past Injuries and Offences, and not only he himself, but all his Dominions should acknowledge Eugene for the only, true, and undoubted Pope, and universal Pastor of the Holy Church, and that as such he and his Kingdoms should pay him Obedience.

THAT he should look upon all the Cardinals, Adherents of the Anti-Pope Amadeus, as Hereticks.

THAT on the other hand the Pope should give King Alphonfus the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, and confirm his Adoption made by Queen Joan II. with a Clause, that his having conquered the Kingdom with the Sword should not derogate from the Adoption.

THAT he should vest Alphonfus with all that Authority, which had been granted by former Popes to the ancient Kings of Naples, and that he should capacitate D. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria to succeed his Father. And on the other hand the King should promise to be a faithful Vassal and Feudatory of the Church, and to assist her in recovering la Marca, which was in the Possession of Count Francisco Sforza.

THAT when the Pope had a mind to make War against the Infidels, the King should be ready with a good Fleet to join that of his Holiness.

THAT the King in name of the Church should keep Possession of the Cities of Benevento and Terracina during his Life, and that during the same time he should leave in the Pope's Hands Citta Ducale, Acumoli and Lionessa, most important Cities of the Province of Abruzzo.

THAT the King should furnish the Pope with six Gallies for six Months in the War against the Turks. And for recovering the Cities and Fortresses possessed by Count Francisco Sforza in la Marca, it was agreed, That the King should send four thousand Horse and a thousand Foot.

THAT the Pope should grant the Bull of Legitimation in favour of D. Ferdinand, that by the Investiture both he and his Heirs might be rendered capable of succeeding in the Kingdom.

THAT the Charges of the six Gallies, and the Troops to be sent to La Marca should be deducted out of the Quit-rent, which the King was to pay by virtue of the Investiture.

THAT the Government of the Cities of Benevento and Terracina should be given to D. Ferdinand and his Successors for ever; and that the Church should have the Government of Citta Ducale, Acumoli, and Lionessa in the same manner.

THESE Articles of Peace were concluded on the fourteenth of June this Year 1443 in Terracina by the King, and by the Cardinal of Aquila the Apostolick Legate, in presence only of Alfonso Cicciacarelli a famous Doctor of Law and Apostolick Protonotary, and of Giovanni Olcina the King's Secretary, and are recorded by Cicciacarelli in the first Tome of his MS. Giurisdizionali.

POPE Eugene by a particular Bull dated the sixth of July the same Year, likewise recorded by Cicciacarelli, confirmed the aforesaid Articles, and in order to their being put in execution, the same Year he dispatched several Bulls also recorded by the same Author.

IN the first Place, on the thirteenth of July he published a preliminary Bull, whereby he absolved the King and his Ministers from all the Excommunications and Censures they had incurred by the Wars and Offences against the Church of Rome during the Schism, and for usurping the Church Lands and Goods. Then Eugene dispatched the Bull of Investiture dated in Sienna the fourteenth of the same Month, whereby he gave King Alphonfus the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples for himself and Successors, Male and Female, lawfully descended of his own Body in a direct Line.

OUR Writers speak differently of this Investiture: Scipione Mazzella ¹ says, that it likewise comprehended the Kingdom of Hungary, with which the Pope invested Alphonfus by vertue of the Right of Joan his adoptive Mother; and that thereby he also enabled Ferdinand his Ballard Son to succeed him in that Kingdom. Cardinal Baronius ² says, that by this Bull Alphonfus was not only invested with the Kingdom of Naples, but likewise with that of Sicily. But they are both widely mistaken. The Investiture was only of the Kingdom of Naples, in the Pontifical Bulls called, Regnum Siciliæ, & Terram citra Pharam. There is no mention made of Sicilia ultra Pharam, and much less of Hungary, or of capacitating Ferdinand, which is plain from the Bull now printed in the third Tome of Summonte's History, and inserted by Chinccarelli among the rest of this Pope's Bulls in the first Tome of his MS. Giurisdizionali; wherein Eugene enumerates the Reasons that moved him to give the Investiture, viz. the Adoption of Queen Joan II. The Dangers Alphonfus had undergone for so many Years in getting Possession of the Kingdom: His Victory over his Enemies: His having settled Peace in the Kingdom: The Good-will of the Barons, who desired him, and had received him for their King and Lord, and taken the wonted Oath of Fidelity to him; (things relating all to the Kingdom of Naples only) his own and King Ferdinand his Father's Merit; for all which Reasons he invested him with the Kingdom, with the usual Clauses, which were inserted in the Investiture given to King Charles I. and the Payment of eight hundred Ounces of Gold as a Quit-rent yearly; and that the Barons and Commons should not be burdened with new Taxes, but should enjoy the same Liberty, Franchises and Privileges, which they had in the time of King William II.

THERE could no mention be made in this Investiture of the Kingdom of Sicily ultra Pharam, of which the Kings of Sicily the Predecessors of Alphonfus never sought Investiture from the Popes since the famous Sicilian Vespers; and Alphonfus had succeeded to it in the Year 1416. by the Death of King Ferdinand his Father, and of which he was in Possession before his Adoption. The Words of the Bull of Investiture are likewise a convincing Proof of what we have advanced, where it is said to be granted, Pro Regno Siciliæ, & tota terra ipsius, quæ est citra Pharam, usque ad confinia terrarum ipsius Ecclesiæ. This will more clearly appear from the Oath of Fealty, which Alphonfus afterwards in the Year 1445 swore to Eugene in these Words: Ego Alphonfus Dei gratia Rex Siciliæ plenum homagium, & Ligium, & Vassalagium faciens vobis Domino meo Eugenio Papæ IV. & Ecclesiæ Romanæ, pro Regno Siciliæ, & tota terra ipsius, quæ est citra Pharam ³.

THE Date of this Oath sets the Matter yet in a clearer Light, and leaves no room for Dispute, where, by Sicilia, & tota terra citra Pharam, is only meant this Kingdom of Naples. The Date runs thus: Datum Neapoli per manus Nostri prædicti Regis Alphonfi, anno a Nativitate Domini 1445 die vero secundo mensis Junii octava Indictionis, Regnorum Nostrorum trigesimo; hujus vero SICILIÆ, ET TERRÆ CITRÀ PHARUM anno Regni XI. Therefore without all Controversy, this Investiture was given of the Kingdom of Naples only, as Cosanzo, Summonte, Chinccarelli, and all our most famous and grave Authors, taking it for granted, have written.

THIS very Year, besides this Investiture, Eugene published other Bulls in favour of Alphonfus, one of which is dated the fourth of September, whereby he remits a considerable Sum of Marks Sterling, which Alphonfus was obliged to pay to the Apostolick Chamber on account of the Concession and Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples. And by another Bull dated the twenty ninth of the same Month he remits all that past Quit-rent he owed for the aforesaid Kingdom; and all the Money, which the King, his Officers and Ministers in his Name had exacted to that Day, on whatsoever Account due to the Apostolick Chamber, or from the Prelates, Dignitaries, or other Ecclesiastical Persons. Moreover the same Day he published another Bull, whereby he promises to send to the King the Cardinal of S. Lorenzo, or any other Person to crown him, when and where he should think fit; but that Coronation was not solemnized, nor was Alphonfus ever crowned ⁴.

AFTERWARDS on the thirteenth of December the same Year other new Bulls were dispatched in favour of Alphonfus. By the first it is granted, that the Penalty of forfeiting the Kingdom, in case of Intrigement of the Conditions of the Investiture, may be commuted into a pecuniary Mulct of fifty thousand Duckets to be paid by the King to the Apostolick Chamber, to last only during Alphonfus's Life. The second allows two Years for the King's taking the Oath to the Apostolick See for the Investiture of the Kingdom, notwithstanding, that by the Tenor of the Investiture, he ought to take it within six Months, if the Pope was in Italy, and if out of Italy, within a Year. The third remits the eight thousand Ounces of Gold yearly, which the King was to pay of Quit-rent, to last only during Alphonfus's Life. The fourth allows the King not to suffer his Rebels to return to the Kingdom, and to turn them out of it, and confiscate their Estates, notwithstanding the Oath given by the King for observing the Conditions of the Investiture, whereby he is bound to receive his Rebels into the Kingdom, and to restore them to their Estates, from which Oath he is absolved by this Bull. By the fifth, that although it be stipulated in the Investiture, that the King cannot impose Taxes or Subsidies upon Churches, Monasteries, Religious and Holy Places, the Clergy, other Ecclesiastical Persons, and their Goods, excepting in Cases allowed de jure, or by the antient Custom of the Kingdom, nevertheless during his Life-time he may impose Taxes and Subsidies upon the aforesaid Places and Ecclesiastical Persons, in Cases of Necessity, notwithstanding the Conditions of the said Investiture. In the sixth it is said, That King Alphonfus having represented, that by the antient Custom of the Kingdom he could impose Taxes and Subsidies upon Churches, Monasteries, Holy and Religious Places, the Clergy, and Ecclesiastical Persons and their Goods; and that he was not bound to receive, or admit Prelates elected, named and provided into the Kingdom, if he had probable Ground to suspect their Loyalty: the Pope grants, that he had Power to impose Taxes and Subsidies, and not to receive the said Prelates, if by the Custom of the Kingdom it was lawful, notwithstanding the Condition of the said Investiture. By the seventh, at the instance of the said King, the Pope dispenses with the Conditions of the Investiture, which allow only the Male Issue born, or to be born, lawfully descended in a direct Line of the said King to succeed him, and allows collateral Heirs to enjoy the Succession of the said Kingdom. By the eighth he confirms the Adoption made by Queen Joan II. The last dispenses with the three hundred Men at Arms, which Alphonfus by the Investiture was obliged to send to the Field, and at his own Charges to maintain for the Space of three Months in the Service of the Apostolick See.

ON the fourteenth of July the following Year 1444, according to the Articles of the aforesaid Treaty of Peace concluded in Terracina, Eugene sent the Bull of Legitimation in favour of Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, whereby he legitimated and capacitated him to succeed in the Kingdom of Naples; and on the first of April 1445, by another Bull he appointed D. Giovanni Abbot of the Monastery of S. Paul in Rome, to go and, in the Name of the Apostolick See, administer the Oath to Alphonfus, which he was obliged to take on account of the Investiture, and which he took in the abovementioned Words.

C H A P. III.

Ferdinand Duke of Calabria marries Isabella di Chiaromonte, the Prince of Taranto's Niece. Pope Eugene dies, and the Cardinal of Bologna is elected in his Place, and takes the Name of Nicholas V. who confirms all that had been granted to Alphonfus by his Predecessor Eugene.

AFTER King Alphonfus had made Peace with Pope Eugene, he was wholly bent on securing the Succession of the Kingdom in the Person of the Duke of Calabria, and on fulfilling the Articles of the said Peace. According to the first Article he made all his Subjects and Prelates acknowledge Eugene for true Pope; and since the famous Canonist Panormitanus had been present in the Council of Basil, and had had a great Hand in what was done there against Eugene, for which he had been made a Cardinal by Felix V. the Anti-Pope, he caused him to be recalled, and obliged him to renounce the Purple, and return to his Archbishoprick of Palermo, where in the Year 1445 he died of the Plague. But finding that D. Ferdinand was but little beloved by his Subjects, because he had discovered himself to be proud, covetous, double and perfidious, he began to be afraid that after his Death the Kingdom might fall into other Hands; whereupon, seeing he had appointed him to be his Successor, he resolved to strengthen him by Alliance; and hearing that the Prince of Taranto had with him in Lecce a Daughter of the Countess of Copertina his Sister, a young Lady of great Virtue, and whom the Prince loved as his own Daughter, he sent to ask her in Marriage for the Duke of Calabria; to which the Prince very readily consented, and in a splendid manner conducted her to Naples. Thus did he fix the Prince of Taranto in D. Ferdinand's Interest; and in order to strengthen him more, he contracted Alliance with the Duke of Sessa, who was equal in Power to the Prince, by marrying D. Lionara his Bastard Daughter to Murino di Marzano, the Duke's only Son, to whom he gave the Principality of Rossano, with a great part of Calabria, as her Portion.

BUT while Alphonfus is wholly intent upon settling the Succession of the Kingdom upon his Son, and fulfilling the Articles of Peace to the Pope's Contentment, Eugene, being seized with a violent Sicknes, died on the twenty third of February this Year 1447. By this Death great Tumults were raised in Rome, for the Orsini on the one hand, and the Colonna on the other were forcing the Cardinals to elect a Pope to their liking; but the King, being then at Tivoli, sent Ambassadors to the College of Cardinals to exhort them not to proceed in the Election by Cabals; for he would not suffer any Violence to be offered to them, but that they might go on with all Freedom without Passion or Fear. The Cardinals being protected by Alphonfus, immediately with unanimous Voice on the sixth of March elected the Cardinal of Bologna, a mild and peaceable Man, who may be placed among the rare Examples of Fortune; for though he was but the Son of a poor Physician of Sarzano, a small Village situate on the Borders of Tuscany and Lusigiana, yet in one Year he was made Bishop, Cardinal and Pope, and took the Name of Nicholas V. The King was very well pleased with this Election, and sent four Ambassadors to be present at the Coronation, and in his Name to do him Homage.

THE Face of Affairs in Italy were altered in an instant; for a Pope, who was a great Lover of Peace and Quiet, having succeeded one of a warlike Disposition, Italy and the Church of Rome were soon settled again in Peace and Tranquillity; for Nicholas immediately began to manage a Peace between the Venetians, Florentines, and the Duke of Milan. He quickly extinguished all the Remains of Schism, for he readily gave Ear to the Proposals of Accommodation that were made to him by the Christian Princes. The Anti-Pope Felix and his Adherents, being likewise inclinable to Peace, facilitated the Agreement, which was concluded upon Conditions advantageous to both Parties, viz. That Felix should renounce the Papal Dignity, but should be first among the Cardinals, and perpetual Legate of the Holy See in Germany: That both Parties should revoke all Excommunications and other Censures fulminated either by Councils, or the contending Popes against those of the opposite Party: That the Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots, Beneficed Persons, and the Officers of the two Parties should be continued in their Posts: And that the Dispensations, Indulgences and other Favours granted by Councils, or either of the Popes, as also the Decrees, Deliberations, and Regulations, which they had made, should be valid: Lastly, That Nicholas V. should call a General Council to be held in France within seven Months after the Agreement: and all these Conditions, except the last, were performed. Felix renounced the Papacy, and Nicholas was acknowledged every where for Pope, who employed all the rest of his Pontificate in quieting the Disturbances of Italy, and from this time to the end of the Century, the Church of Rome enjoyed Peace.

NICHOLAS was very courteous and kind to Alphonfus; he not only confirmed what had been stipulated with his Predecessor, but in Consideration of the great Expences which the King had been at in the War of La Marca, and of other Assistance furnished a few Days after his Accession to the Papacy, on the twenty second of March the same Year he sent him a Bull, whereby he restored to him the Cities of Acumulo, Civita Ducale, and *Lionessa*¹, given by Alphonfus to Eugene in exchange for the Cities of Benevento, and Terracina, to be held by Alphonfus and his Successors, without paying any Quit-rent, except a Tribute of two Hawks yearly; and in 1452, by another Bull he exempted him from the said Tribute of the two Hawks, which the King owed that Year to the Apostolick See for the aforesaid Cities of Benevento and Terracina.

BY another Bull dated the fourteenth of January 1448, he confirmed all the Concessions and Favours that had been granted by Eugene either to Alphonfus, or his Son Ferdinand; and by another Bull dated the twenty seventh of April the Year following, he confirmed the Duke of Calabria's Legitimation, and enlarged his Succession, by making him capable of succeeding to his Father in his other Kingdoms.

SO Alphonfus, favoured by Fortune in every thing, disengaged from the Cares of War, and enjoying a sweet and settled Peace, after having made a Progress in Tuscany, returned to Naples, where, upon his Arrival, he found that the Dutches of Calabria his Daughter-in-Law had brought forth a Son, who was afterwards King Alphonfus II. and at the time of his Birth a Beam of Fire appeared in the Air above Casfel Nuovo, which was a Presage of his terrible Disposition. The Neapolitans gave many Demonstrations of Joy for the King's return, who having taken up his Residence in that City, he continued there for a long while, and spent his time partly in Diversions, partly in building, and partly in restoring the Tribunals of Justice to their former good Order.

C H A P. IV.

The Origin and Institution of the Sacred Court of S. Clara, now called Capuana.

AMONGST the many Endowments wherewith King Alphonfus was adorned, the most shining of all the rest was the great Esteem he had, not only for military Men, but likewise for the Learned and Judicious. He was such an Admirer of the Roman Grandeur, their magnanimous Enterprizes, their Wisdom and Prudence both in civil and military Affairs, that his chief Delight was in reading their Histories, and especially Livy, of whom he was such an Admirer, that out of Love to the Memory of so great an Historian, he prevailed with the Venetians to send him one of his Arm Bones from Padua, where his Bones lay, and with great Ceremony he caused it to be transported to Naples. He conferred with the most learned Men, which he kept always about him, upon what he read in these Histories.

IN his time Constantinople having come under the Yoke of the Turks, and the Greek Empire being at an end, many great Men who flourished in that City, in order to shun their Barbarity fled to Italy, whither they brought the Greek Learning. At this time Gaza, Argirolopilus, Fleto, Philephus, Lascaris, Poggius, Valla, Sipontinus, Campanus, Bessario, and many others came to Italy : So that the restoring of Erudition and polite Learning, and the banishing of Barbarism are owing to the Fall of Constantinople. Alphonfus entertained many of them at his Court, inasmuch that he had not only excellent Latin, but Greek Professors. He kept with himself the famous Trapezuntius, Crisolora and Lascaris, Grecians, and of Latins the famous Laurentius Valla, Bartholomæus Facius, Antonius of Bologna, called Panormitanus, Paris de Puteo, and many others. He had likewise about him Men of fine Knowledge and Judgment, and, among the rest, the renowned Alphonfus Borgia Bishop of Valencia, who was a Native of Xativa in the Diocess of Valencia, and had performed his Studies in the University of Lerida, in which having made wonderful Progress, he took the Degree of Doctor, and became an excellent Preacher. He was afterwards elected a Prebendary of that City, and, on account of the Fame of his Learning, he was in great Favour with Alphonfus, who made him one of his Privy Counsellors and Chaplain : Soon after he was made Bishop of Valencia; and while he governed that Church, Alphonfus having undertaken the Expedition to the Kingdom of Naples, he brought him along with him; and as we have said, the Bishop being employed in that weighty Affair of the Peace with Pope Eugene, he did the King signal Service, and brought it to a happy Conclusion.

WHEN Alphonfus, after so much Fatigue, became peaceable Possessor of the Kingdom, and turned his Mind upon re-establishing it, introducing a better Form of Government, and reducing the Tribunals into a better Order, the Bishop of Valencia was his chief Minister and Counsellor; he had the greatest Share in the most weighty Deliberations, and the King depended more upon his Advice than upon any other whatsoever. The Abuses, which, by Reason of the Appeals made from the Sentences of the High-Court of the Vicariate to the King, had been practised in Naples, were the Occasion of erecting this new Tribunal of the Sacred Court. This Tribunal, composed, as we have said, of those of the High-Court and the Vicariate, was the supreme Tribunal both of the City of Naples and the Kingdom, and its Judges were the ordinary Magistrates, from whose Sentences there was no Appeal, because there was no superior Judicature where Appeals could be lodged. There was no Retraſting, which we now call Reclaiming, and which among the Romans was used in Law-Suits depending before the Præſectus Prætorio only; ſo that for redreſſing Grievances, there was only one Remedy left, which was to have recourſe to the King by way of Petition and Memorial. Sometimes the King was wont to appoint certain Perſons, whom he ordered to peruſe ſuch Memorials, and examine into and make a Report to him of the Merit of them, and of his own Authority he redreſſed the Grievances, and theſe Perſons were called Judges of Appeals of the High-Court; whence it came, that before the Election of this Tribunal, theſe Judges are often mentioned in the Writs of theſe Times. But the Kings more frequently, without confining themſelves to a certain Perſon, ſent the Memorials ſometimes to one Lawyer, ſometimes to another to have their Opinions, according to which they determined, and the Deciſion was called Royal ¹. This Cuſtom was attended with Abuses and Diſorders, for Matters of the greateſt Conſequence were often decided according to the Opinion of one ſingle Perſon. Appeals of this ſort likewiſe encreaſed; for they came not only from the Tribunals of the City of Naples, but from the Provinces of the Kingdom; and Grievances, which ought to have been examined into by a meeting of the ableſt Men of the Profeſſion, being left to be redreſſed by the Judgment of private Lawyers, occaſioned great Confuſion.

THE Practice was different in the Kingdom of Valencia, where there was a particular Council for aſſiſting the King, of which he was the Head, wherein the Appeals to the King from the ordinary Tribunals of that Kingdom were examined, and the Grievances redreſſed. Therefore in Imitation of the Council of Valencia, King Alphonſus, by the Advice of Biſhop Borgia, reſolved to eſtabliſh ſuch another in Naples, to be compoſed of the moſt ſkilful Lawyers, and of the graveſt and moſt judicious Men, who, in his own Preſence, ſhould examine ſuch Appeals, and as he was Author, ſo he declared himſelf Head of this Council.

THE Cardinal of Lucca ² is of Opinion, that Biſhop Borgia, afterwards Cardinal and Pope, framed this Council not only after the Form of that of Valencia, but he having lived a long time in Rome, took many Rules from, and modelled it after the Tribunal of the Roman Rota, which at this Time was in a flouriſhing State, and that in framing this Senate the Rota of Rome was as much followed as the Council of Valencia; and, as this Tribunal took the Name of Council from that of Valencia, ſo likewiſe the Place where it was kept got the Name of Rota from that of Rome; and as in the Roman Rota Bills of Proceſs are not uſed, as in the ordinary Courts, but Petitions, Supplications, or Memorials directed to the Pope, for whom the Keeper of the Seals ſigns and files them; ſo likewiſe in this Tribunal Bills of Proceſs are not uſed, as in the inferior Tribunals of the City and Kingdom: but Petitions directed to the King, for whom the Preſident of the Council ſigns and files them.

THIS Tribunal therefore was erected in Naples chiefly for the Appeals, which were brought to the King from the Sentences of the High-Court of the Vicariate, and of the Inferior Courts, not only of the City of Naples, but of the Provinces of the Kingdom. It was called the Tribunal of Appeals, becauſe it was the Supreme Court where Appeals were lodged from all the other Judicatories. This Tribunal having the King for its Head, and its Members being Perſons famous for their Nobility and Learning, came to acquire the greateſt Prerogatives and Pre-eminencies of all the reſt. Whence, as we have ſaid, Law-Suits are not commenced by way of Bills of Proceſs, but by Petitions, which muſt be directed to the King, which being afterwards ſign'd and filed acquire the Force of Bills of Proceſs. Whence it comes, that no Appeals can be made from its Deciſions, but only Reclamations. It got the Name of Sacred on account of the ſacred Perſon of the King, who declared himſelf Head of it; and becauſe it was his own particular Council wherein he ſat in Perſon; and for the ſame Reason the Court of Otranto is likewiſe called Sacred, becauſe King Alphonſus II. preſided once in it ³, and becauſe this Province was afterwards divided into two Provinces, viz. of Otranto and Bari, that of Bari was also called *Sacred*¹. Whence the Nobility are not allowed to enter this sacred Tribunal with their Swords or other Arms, nor even those, who can wear their Swords in the King's Closet. Whence it alone is the chief, and takes Cognizance of all the Tribunals both of the City of Naples and of the Kingdom: its Sentences are put in execution, Manu forti, & armata, and it is adorned with many other Prerogatives and Pre-eminencies, of which *Tassoni*² and *Toppi*³ have composed long Catalogues; and in our time the Doctor *Romano*⁴ hath collected a very large Volume of them.

BUT of all its Prerogatives, the greatest was that of taking Cognizance by way of Appeal of the Causes of all the Tribunals of the City of Naples and of the Kingdom; and at its very Rise Appeals were made to it, even from the Decrees pronounced by the Royal Chamber of Accounts, as *Marino Freccia*⁵ and Giovan Batista Bolvito in a short Latin Discourse, which he composed upon this Tribunal, which is preserved in Manuscript in the Library of the Holy Apostles in Naples, which was transcribed by Summonte in his History⁷, witness; and as is likewise evident from a Letter⁸ written by King Alphonfus, recorded by Toppi, who likewise shews, that sometimes when the Chamber of Accounts was to decide some point of Right, it had recourse to the Council of S. Clara, which gave Sentence in it by way of Appeal⁹.

BUT what is most surprising, this renowned King raised this Tribunal to such a Pitch of Eminency, that he ordered the Causes of his other numerous Kingdoms and Provinces to be brought to it by way of Appeal. Behold what he says in one of his Royal Writs dated the thirteenth of August 1440 recorded by *Toppi*¹⁰, speaking of this Council and its Ministers: Quibus decrevimus omnes causas Regnorum nostrorum Occidentorum, & Regni nostri Siciliae ultra Pharam, esse remittendas. And, as we have said, this great King was possessed at this time of the Kingdoms of Aragon, Valencia, Majorca, and Sardinia; as also of Corfica, the County of Barcelona, Roussillon, and Sicily on the other side of the Phare; and as long as he lived, having fixed his Royal Residence in Naples, Causes from these remote Parts were brought to this Council by way of Appeal; and we have still Remains of many Processes, whereby it appears, that at that time this Tribunal was Judge of Appeals from all these Kingdoms and Dominions. Whence we are convinced of the Vanity of the Opinion, that this Kingdom from the beginning of Alphonfus's Reign became dependent upon the Crown of Aragon. This Prerogative was lost afterwards, when Ferdinand the Son of Alphonfus having succeeded in the Kingdom of Naples only, he had no more to do with the other Kingdoms of Spain, in which John of Aragon Alphonfus's Brother succeeded.

WE have the Origin, the Name of, and the Reason of instituting this Tribunal: We have likewise the Time when, and the Author; but as to this last, the Statute 2. under the Title, De officio S. R. C. leaves some doubt; and *Surgente*¹¹, founding his Opinion upon that Statute, believes, that Alphonfus was not the Author of it, but Ferdinand I. his Son; but that Statute is either apocryphal, or incorrect, as repugnant to the Testimonies of cotemporary Authors, and the publick Records.

*Michel Riccio*¹² a famous Lawyer and Historian, who flourished in the Reign of Ferdinand I. and was President and Vice-protonotary of this very Tribunal, in his grave and learned History of the Kings of Naples and Sicily confirms it; these are his Words: Alphonfus, &c. reddendi juris adeo studiosus, ut Consilium constituerit, quod omnes appellarent ex toto suo Regno; cui praefecit Episcopum Valentiae (qui postea Nicolao V. successit, & Calistus est appellatus) cum prius ad Vicariae Tribunal, aliosque minores Regni Judices confugere cogerentur, & inde jus petere.

OUR famous *Matteo d'Afflitto*¹³ who flourished at the same time, and under the same Ferdinand was a Countellor of this Council, likewise says: Sic fuit senti- atum in Sac. Consilio tempore immortalis memoriæ Regis Alphonsi I. de Aragonia, tempore quo præsidebat Episcopus Valentia, qui postea fuit Papa Calistus III. Marino Freccia in the very same Words of Michel Riccio relates the same; and the most accurate Writers of our History, such as Summonte ¹, Chioccarello ², Deputy Tappia ³, Tassone ⁴, and all the rest down to Toppi ⁵, are of the same Opinion.

THE Charters of Alphonsus I. inserted by these Authors in their Works, wherein this King makes mention of this Tribunal instituted by him, are convincing Proofs of the same: Chioccarello ⁶ has recorded three of them, two in November and December 1449, the other in February 1450. Summonte ⁷ two others, one the twenty third of November 1450, the other the second of August 1454. and many more may be seen in Toppi in the Places above quoted.

TOPPI ⁸ believed the Statute attributed to Ferdinand I. to be apocryphal and forged, seeing it is not to be found in any of the antient printed Volumes of our Statutes; and we see it in the last Editions only, and without a Date; this Author moreover declares, That he had carefully searched in the Chancery for it, where all the Statutes of the Kingdom are set down, but could never find it. Nevertheless, be that as it will, it is more probable, that this Statute, by a Mistake of the Compilers or Printers, instead of having the Name of Alphonsus in the Title of it, that of Ferdinand has been put. And truly whoever considers the Words of it, they are by no means applicable to Ferdinand, but exactly fute Alphonsus. This King could call the Kings of Aragon his Predecessors; but Ferdinand, who was never King of Aragon, nor succeeded to the paternal Kingdoms of Spain, but only to the Kingdom of Naples by right of Investiture, Legitimation, and the Voice of the Neapolitans, could not; much less could these Words be applied to him: Igitur cum Neapolis Siciliae Regnum, jure quodam legitimo, & hereditario nobis debitum nostræ nuper ditioni restitutum sit, idque non armis tantum nostris, quantum immortalis Dei beneficio, &c. What Alphonsus asserts is, that he had made himself Master of this Kingdom rather by the Force of Arms, than by vertue of the Adoption. Ferdinand had more occasion to fight with his Barons, than with foreign Enemies, and with Difficulty enjoyed the Kingdom that his Father had acquired with his Arms and the Sweat of his Brow. It is not to be doubted then but Alphonsus was the Author of this illustrious Tribunal, and that all its Disposition and Form was owing to the Bishop of Valencia, to whom Alphonsus committed the Care and Inspection of it.

S E C T. I.

Of the Place where this Tribunal was erected: Of the Dignity and Condition of the Persons of which it was composed, and of their Number; and how they grew so numerous, that they were afterwards divided into four Benches, of which it is now composed.

NAPLES having now for a long time been the Royal Seat, and the Metropolis and Head of all the Kingdom, this supreme Tribunal, to which all the Causes of the Kingdom were to be referred, and whereof the King had declared himself Head, and that it was his collateral Council, could not be so conveniently fixed in any other City. Whence Alphonsus, in the abovementioned Statute ¹, said: Sacrum in eodem Regno, supremumque Consilium ordinavimus, cui sedem, locumque in Urbe Neapolitana, & Regni Urbium Suprema, ac Metropoli constituimus. This Tribunal was not always held in one Place of the City, but was removed according to the State of the Times, and of its Presidents. Alphonfus often held it in the Hospital of Santa Maria Coronata a Royal Church, where his Predecessors, with great Solemnity, were wont to be crowned. Sometimes in Castel Capuano, and more frequently in Castel Nuovo; and there are Letters of Alphonfus dated in 1449, mentioned by *Toppi*¹, in which he orders it to meet in Castel Nuovo, while he was in Naples; and in his Absence, in the House of his Vice-Chancellor, or in any other fit Place as he thought fit. Very often it was assembled in the Houses of its Presidents; so we read, that in 1457 it met in the House of the Patriarch of Alexandria Bishop of Urgell, who was then President of it. Sometimes in the Archbishopal Palace, as in the time of Oliviero Caraffa Archbishop of Naples, and afterwards Cardinal, who was likewise President of this Tribunal; in 1468, D. John of Aragon the Son of Ferdinand I. being President of it, whose Palace was in the Monastery of Monte Vergine, of which he was Commendatory Abbot, this Tribunal was likewise held in his House. *Matteo d'Afflitto*² likewise testifies, that in his time this Tribunal used to meet in the Convent of S. Domenico Maggiore of this City. And thus being removed to different Places, which Toppi has been pleased to search out too narrowly, at last in the Year 1474 it was removed to the Monastery of Santa Chiara, where it remained till 1549. On account of its long Continuance there, it got the Name of the Council of S. Clara, which it kept for a long time. At last in the said Year 1540, being removed with all the other Tribunals to Castel Capuano, where it remains to this Day, it acquired the Name of Capuana.

TO this supreme Council Alphonfus appointed a President³, to whom he committed the Inspection of the Tribunal. Both he and the Kings his Successors of the House of Aragon adorned it with many Prerogatives, of which *Tassoni*⁴ and *Toppi*⁵ have made long Catalogues. He always pitched upon Men for that Office, no less famous for their Learning than Probity, Nobility of Blood, and who held eminent Posts. There were some of them Bishops, Archbishops, and other remarkable Prelates of the Church. The first was Alphonfus Borgia Bishop of Valencia, who presided in it till 1444, in which Year he was made Cardinal, and the Year following Pope, by the Name of Calistus III. He was succeeded by Gaspere de Diano Archbishop of Naples, a famous Lawyer of those Times, first Bishop of Tiano, then Archbishop of Consa, and lastly in 1437 of Naples. King Alphonfus made him President in 1446, in which Post he continued till 1450, when he died⁶. To him succeeded Arnaldo di Roggiere Patriarch of Alexandria, and Bishop of Urgell. In the Year 1465 Ferdinand I. made the famous Oliviero Caraffa Archbishop of Naples, President, who, though in 1467 Pope Paul II. made him Cardinal, did not quit his Presidency of this Tribunal, till, being called by the Pope, he was obliged to go to *Rome*⁷. To Oliviero succeeded D. John of Aragon the Son of Ferdinand I. Archbishop of Taranto, perpetual Commendatory of the Monasteries of Monte Cassino, Cava, and Monte Vergine, afterwards Cardinal and Bishop of Salerno. In 1499 D. Lewis of Aragon Grandchild of King Ferdinand I. Bishop of Aversa, and afterwards Cardinal, was also President of this Tribunal.

BUT what reflected the greatest Splendor upon this Tribunal, was to see the Sons of the Kings and the chief Barons of the Kingdom elected Presidents of it.

THE Duke of Calabria King Alphonfus's eldest Son was President of it in the Year 1454, with the Title of his Father's Lieutenant General; as also John of Aragon, Ferdinand I.'s Son, afterwards Cardinal: Lewis of Aragon his Grandchild, and Ferdinand of Aragon the Son of King Ferdinand and Brother of King Frederick. Of the chief Barons, in 1450 Onorato Gaetano Count of Fondi; and in 1479 Ferdinand of Aragon Count of Nicastro, and natural Son of Ferdinand I. were Presidents; besides a great many others of most noble Descent.

THE greatest Lawyers and learned Men of those Times, who, either on account of their Works, or their Gravity and Probity, or their Knowledge of the Civil Law, deserved it, were elected Presidents. Michèl Riccio a famous Lawyer and Historian: Giovan Antonio Caraffa a great Doctor of those Times, much commended by Matteo d'Afflitto: Luca Tozzoli, of whom the same Author makes honourable mention: the celebrated Antonio d'Alessandro, Andrea Mariconda, Antonio di Gennaro, Francesco Loffredo, Girolamo Severino, Tommaso Salernitano, Gio. Andrea di Curte, Antonio Orefice, *Gio. BESIDES the President, the second Place in this Council was held by two great Barons of the Kingdom, who, by Alphonfus, were added to the Counsellors skilled in the Law to be Assistants in this Tribunal; for not only Matters relating to Justice were discussed in it, but likewise Affairs of the Government and State. These, for the most part, were elected from among the Barons; they were not Lawyers, but military Men, and their greatest Salary was a thousand Duckets yearly, whereas the Counsellors of the Long-Robe had only five hundred. They were called Counsellors Assistants; and as long as the Reign of Aragon lasted, the S. C. * still enjoyed this Prerogative, and the being Counsellors of this Tribunal added Lustre to the Nobility.

* Henceforward by S. C. this Council or Tribunal is meant.

IN the time of Alphonfus, besides Onorato Gaetano Count of Fondi, who, sometimes as Great Protonotary, sometimes as President, and sometimes as Counsellor Assistant, graced this Tribunal, there were the famous Petricone Caracciolo Count of Burgenza, Niccolo Cantelmo Count of Alvito and Popoli, and afterwards Duke of Sora; Marino Caracciolo Count of S. Angelo, and Giorgio d'Alemagno Count of Pulcino, who in the Year 1450 were made Counsellors Assistants by Alphonfus.

WE likewise read, that on the twenty third of January 1454 Alphonfus made Francesco del Balzo Orfino Duke of Andria, Son to the Prince of Taranto, Counsellor *Assistant*³; and on the fifth of November the same Year Innico Avalos was made a Counsellor by Ferdinand I. Orso Ursino of the Family of the Counts of Nola, in 1453 was also by Ferdinand made Counsellor *Assistant*⁴; and lastly, in 1485 Pietro Bernardino Gaetano Count of Morcone Son to the Count of Fondi; of all which Toppi, in his second Volume of the Origin of Tribunals, discourses at large.

AMONG the Persons, of which this Tribunal was composed, there was likewise the Vice-Protonotary. This is a very intricate Point of History, and so difficult, that *Toppi*⁵ knew not how to extricate himself. King Alphonfus, at the Erection of this Tribunal, and in the choice of the Counsellors, of which it was to be composed, always protested, that by this new Council he did not intend to derogate from the Pre-eminency of the Great Protonotary of the Kingdom: In the Letters Patent recorded by *Chioccarelli*⁶ and *Toppi*⁷, dated the twentieth of November 1449, these are his Words: Posteaquam reformationi nostri Sacri Consilii debito libramine moderavimus, in quo salva præeminencia Officii Logothetæ, & Protonotarii Regni hujus, & præsentis Rev. in Christo P. Gasperis Archiepiscopi Neapolitani, ejusdem S. C. Præsidentis, nonnullos famosissimos U. J. D. fideles nostros elegimus, & deputavimus, &c. And elsewhere in another Patent⁸ dated the thirteenth of August the same Year: Salva tamen in omnibus, & per omnia prærogativa, & præeminencia Officii Logothetæ, & Protonotarii hujus citra Forum Siciliæ Regni, vel Reverendo Archiepiscopo Neapolitano, cum in Curia præsentis fuerint. Toppi, very much surprized, says, What Business had the Great Protonotary, or his Deputy in this new Council, or what common Interest could they have together? But this Surprize proceeded from Toppi's considering that Office according to the Appearance it made at the Time when he wrote, and which it still retains; but it made another Figure in the Time of Alphonfus, and of the Kings of that Family his Successors. At present the Great Protonotary is an empty Title and without Function; and his Vice-Protonotary, whom he has not Power to make now, but is directly appointed by the King, has lost all the Prerogatives he had, excepting that of making Notaries, and the Judges of Contracts, by the Roman Law called Judices Chartularii: Of inspecting their Protocols, and taking care of all that belongs to their Office: Of taking Cognizance of their Causes both Civil and Criminal; and of legitimating bastard Children, according as it has been established by our Statutes ¹.

BUT in the Reigns of the Normans, Suevi, and of the Families of Anjou and Aragon, the Office and Power of the Great Protonotary was too extensive: His chief Business was not to make Notaries and Judges, but, as we have said elsewhere, to receive the Memorials and Petitions which were presented to the King: All Letters Patent passed through his Hands, and were registred by him: All new Laws, Constitutions, Edicts, and Statutes, which were established, were by him penn'd and recorded: Whatever was decreed, or ordained by the Prince, either in his Council, or in any other Court, was drawn up by him, either as a Sentence, Patent, or Grant; and while the famous Bartolommeo di Capua was Great Protonotary, we have seen how extensive and eminent that Office was.

WHENCE it came, that Alphonfus having instituted this new Tribunal, wherein many things were to be discussed, which concerned the Office of the Great Protonotary, such as receiving the Petitions directed to the King, recording the Decrees of this supreme Judicatory, and many other things within his Province; although the King had granted equal Power to the President to act in these Matters, nevertheless he would not allow the Prerogatives of the Great Protonotary, or his Deputy to be thereby prejudiced, when they were present in the Council; so that when either of them was present, they were not hindred from performing the Duties incumbent upon them. Whence it is, that in the old Patents we frequently read, that Onorato Gactano Count of Fondi had presided in this Tribunal, either as Great Protonotary, or as President of it, and even frequently as Counsellor Assistent. Whence we also read, that at pronouncing of Sentences, the Great Protonotary, or his Deputy was present with the Counsellors. So, as the same *Toppi*² witnesseth, at a Sentence of the S. C. pronounced on the twenty ninth of January 1452, Onorato Gactano Count of Fondi Great Protonotary of the Kingdom, and Giorgio d'Alemagna Count of Pulcino Counsellor Assistent were present; so the same Count of Fondi, as Great Protonotary, before he was President, in 1474 committed a Cause to Luca Tozzoli his Vice-Protonotary. Moreover in 1485 the Count of Morcone Great Protonotary with his Vice-Protonotary and the Counsellors were present at pronouncing the Sentences in this Tribunal on the twentieth of September the said Year.

FROM this likewise proceeded the Custom that when one advanced to the Office of Great Protonotary was to take Possession of his Charge, seeing the Great Protonotaries performed the chief and most solemn Functions in the S. C. they took Possession in this Tribunal by being present at pronouncing the Sentences there; and this was deemed to be actual Possession. So we read, that D. Ferdinand of Toledo, having been made Great Protonotary by the Emperor Charles V. on the twenty second of May 1537 took Possession of his Office in the S. C. and was present that Day at all the Sentences pronounced by that Tribunal; and Antonio di Gennaro, who was then President of the Council, made a very learned and elegant Oration in his Praise³. D. Ferdinando Spinello Duke of Castrovillari and Count of Cariati, on the last Day of June 1526, according to *Passero*⁴, or as *Rosso*⁵ says, on the twenty sixth of April, when he was made Great Protonotary by Charles V. he took Possession of it by being present with the President and all the Counsellors at all the Sentences pronounced that Day in the S. C.

WHENCE also proceeded the Custom, which still continues, and was introduced in the Time of our Grandfathers, that the Office of Vice-Protonotary should be indissolubly annexed to that of President of the S. C.; for the Great Protonotaries, being Persons in a high Station, and employed in other Affairs, began to think it below them to be personally present in the S. C. but sent their Vice-Protonotaries to the Tribunal, who, as well as the President, performed their Duty; so that the Counsellor *Matteo d'Afflitto*⁶ in many of his Decisions assures us, that the famous took Possession of the Office of the Protonotary of the Kingdom in the S. R. C. of Clara with great Solemnity, and was accompanied by all the Nobility and Gentry.

Antonio Alessandro, though he was not then President, was present in the Council as Vice-Protonotary, and together with the other Counsellors voted in the Causes, and presided in the Tribunal. Michel Riccio, before he was President, committed sundry Causes to the Counsellors as Vice-Protonotary ¹. We likewise read the same of Luca Tozzoli, and of many others besides. Whence it came, that one single Person being sufficient for that Duty, the Office of Vice-Protonotary is now annexed to that of President.

BUT it is likewise very true, that it was not so at first, for the Vice-Protonotary by his Office having the Power of making Notaries and Judges, a Function quite distinct from, and independent of the S. C. and consequently brought very great Emoluments, some, though not Presidents, procured it for themselves, and many Deputies obtained it. So in the Year 1540, Girolamo Colle Deputy of the Chancery obtained that Office, though he was not President, and exercised it till 1549, when, being made Vice-Chancellor in Spain, he went thither; ² and that Post being then vacant, it was bestowed upon Girolamo Severino, who was at that time President. But Severino, on account of his great Age and continual Indisposition, having laid down the Office of President, kept that of Vice-Protonotary, as more profitable, and less troublesome, which he continued to exercise as long as he lived, and in 1558 when he died, it was given to Afonso Santillano then President, who kept it till 1567 the Year of his Death.

BUT upon the Death of Santillano, the Duke d'Alcala the Viceroy gave it per interim to Deputy Villano; and Tommaso Salernitano being made President of the S. C. in the room of Santillano, and finding that the Office of Vice-Protonotary was exercised by Deputy Villano, sent his Allegations to the King in Spain, whereby he endeavoured to prove, that the Office of Vice-Protonotary being annexed to that of President, it ought not to be separated from it. While he was expecting the King's Decision, Deputy Villano died, and he got the Post; but afterwards from President being made Deputy of the Chancery, he kept the Vice-Protonotaryship, and left the Presidentship to Gio. Andrea de Curte, who succeeded him in 1570 in the one but not in the other. The President de Curte had recourse to Spain, laying hold of the same Allegations formed by Salernitano his Competitor; and these Allegations having had such weight with the Council of Spain, the King reunited the two Offices; so that from that time to this they have still continued united in the same Person. It is true, the King in his Royal Patent grants them both expressly, because if the Patent mentioned the Presidentship only, it would not be sufficient to include the Office of Vice-Protonotary. Although they be two Offices united in one Person, yet they are distinct from one another, being of different Natures, and having separate Functions, at least as to what concerns the making of Notaries and Judges; so that even in our time, the Deputy Aguir having obtained a Patent to be President, and the Office of Vice-Protonotary not being mentioned therein, he was forced to have recourse again to the King, who gave it him.

IN this new Tribunal then we have a President, two military Counsellors Assistants, and often the Vice-Protonotary also: Now follow the Counsellors Doctors of Law, who make up the greatest part of it. The ablest Lawyers have always been pitched upon to be Counsellors of this Senate. Alphonfus, Ferdinand his Son, and all the other Kings their Successors were very nice and circumspect in that Choice. They were for having the most learned Men: Viri juris insignibus decorati, docti, graves, severi, insontes, mites, Justi, faciles, lenique, qui in Judiciis exercendis, non precibus, non pretio, non amicitia, non odio, neque denique ulla re corrumpantur; these are the Words of Alphonfus ³. Whence it is, that from the time of its Institution we read, that there sat in this Tribunal the most learned and the most judicious Men, such as Michel Riccio, Francesco Antonio Guindazzo, Nicol' Antonio de' Monti, Paris de Puteo, Antonio d'Alessandro, Gio. Antonio Caraffa, Matteo d'Afflitto, Giacomo d'Agello, Antonio Capece, Loffredo, Salernitano, Tappia, Gambosa, Miroballo, and many more, of whom Toppi ⁴ has a long Catalogue, and of whom, as Occasion offers, we shall make honourable mention.

FROM the Institution of this Tribunal, to the Reign of the House of Austria, the Counsellors were not perpetual, but only during the King's Pleasure ¹, who, trusting to their Learning, Integrity and Prudence, at the same time that they were Counsellors, made them Presidents of the Royal Chamber, and with great Exactness they performed both their Offices. Severino di Diano, Pietro Marco Gizzio, Bartolommeo di Verino, Andrea and Diomede Mariconda, and many others, as Toppi observes ², at the same time that they were Counsellors, were made Presidents of the Royal Chamber, and exercised both Charges. That ought not to seem impossible, since in those Times this Council sat only three Days of the Week, viz. Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday ³.

THE publick Professors of the University were frequently made Counsellors, yet for that did not leave their Chairs, but employed their Learning as well in the University as in the Senate. Such were Matteo d'Afflitto, Camerario, and many others, as may be seen in Toppi ⁴.

AS to their Number, it has always been various and uncertain from its Institution, but afterwards it was fixed and determined. When Alphonfus I. instituted this Tribunal, besides the President, he chose nine Doctors for Counsellors ⁵. Afterwards in the Year 1449 putting it into a better Form, he appointed two of the Nobility for Counsellors Assistants, and lessened the Number of Doctors, ordaining, that there should be only six. Shortly after, recalling that Order, he added a seventh; but in process of time in the Years 1483 and 84, they were ten, and often twelve in Number. They all assembled in one Hall; hence it is, that in the Decisions of Counsellor Afflitto, we often read some Causes to have been unanimously decided per totum Sacrum Consilium.

CHARLES V. was the first, who, by his Letters Patent dated in Bologna the twenty sixth of February 1533, ordered this Tribunal to be divided into two Benches, in each of which, besides the President, four Doctors Counsellors were to be present, whereby their Number was to consist of eight ⁶, which was put in execution in Castel Capuano by his Viceroy D. Peter de Toledo. But the Number of Causes increasing, at the Request of the City and Kingdom, on the second of March 1536, he allowed two other Counsellors to be added, which made five to each Bench. Afterwards two others were added, who were to assist the criminal Judges of the Vicariate, who were to take their Turns every two Years, always leaving five to each Bench of the Council ⁷.

BY whom the Number was encreased afterwards, and the third Bench added, is very uncertain. It is probable that it happened in the Reign of Philip II. since he in some of his Royal Writs dated in Madrid the twenty fourth of December 1569 makes mention of this third Bench ⁸.

BUT it is very clear, that the fourth was added by King Philip II. who, at the Request made him in the Parliaments held in 1589 and 1591 by the City, for the greater Dispatch of Causes, by his Royal Letters dated the seventh of September 1596 increased the Number of Counsellors, and ordained, That a fourth Bench should be added to the other three, wherein five other Counsellors were to assist: So that the Number of Counsellors amounted to twenty two, of which twenty were to be distributed among the four Benches of the Council, and two to be present in the criminal Bench of the Vicariate, in order to mitigate the Rigour of that Tribunal, as is still observed to this Day. There are two others who don't reside in Naples, one of which has the Inspection of the Government of Capua, and is changed every two Years; the other is either sent to the Court of Rome to take care of the Affairs relating to Jurisdiction, or is appointed for the Government of some Province, or any other Charge the King is pleased to intrust him with. This at present is the ordinary Number of Counsellors, two Thirds of which must be Natives of the Kingdom, and the third as the King thinks fit ⁹. But now by a special Favour granted by his present Majesty the Emperor Charles VI. ¹⁰ six are only left at the King's Pleasure. The Kings have sometimes made Supernumeraries, at other times they have removed these, and reduced them to the ordinary Number, according as the Exigency of Affairs required, or as some eminent Person deserved.

THESE are the Members of which this supreme Tribunal is composed. It had also, as it has to this Day, its inferior Officers; such as a Secretary, a Sealer, thirteen Masfiredatti, many Clerks, sixteen Examiners, nine Messengers, and fourteen Porters.

FROM this Tribunal, which, for the most part, was always composed of the ablest Lawyers, proceeded those many Decisions, whereof we have now so many Collections. Its Decisions from its very Rise were so much commended, and of so great Authority, that not only with us, but likewise with foreign Lawyers, they were highly esteemed and regarded, of which among others, Philippus Decius bears witness. The first that collected them was the famous Matteo d'Afflitto, who for that alone, above all others, deserves to be celebrated, because he was the first in Italy, who introduced the Custom of setting down the Decisions of the Tribunals, and making particular Collections of them. The Cardinal de Luca ¹ was of Opinion, that this Lawyer in that had imitated the Custom practised in the Rota of Rome, the Decisions of which, before the Erection of this new Tribunal of S. C. had become famous, and were quoted by many Writers. However that may be, it is not to be doubted that he was the first who introduced this new manner of Writing, and those private Collections. His Example was afterwards followed, not only by our other Writers, but also by the Lawyers of other Nations. Among ours, the nearest to him were Antonio Capece, the two Tommasi, Grammatico and Minadoi, and the famous Vincenzo de Franchis. Then followed the others, of whom Toppi ² made a long and exact Catalogue. So that after the antient Glossators, after the Commentators, the Writers of Treatises and Additions, Repeaters, and Consulters, another new Class of Writers started up among us, called Decisionists; of whom we shall have Occasion to discourse elsewhere.

CHAP. V.

Alphonfus re-establisheth the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber; and how it was reunited to the Tribunal of the Royal Mint, under the Direction of the Masters of Accounts.

AMONG the many Virtues wherewith Alphonfus was adorned, our Writers ¹ have not neglected to observe one Vice, into which he was led by his too great Liberality and Magnificence. He, by his immoderately enriching and raising some Families too high, reduced the Royal Treasury to such Straits, that, in order to repair the Loss occasioned by the excessive Grants and Expences, he was forced to have recourse to new Taxes, and to invent other burdensome Ways and Means for raising Money. Therefore he resolved to re-establish the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber, that his Ministers might be more careful and diligent in providing him with Money.

THIS Tribunal, as well as that of the High-Court of the Vicariate, was composed of two Tribunals, which being formerly divided, were in process of time reunited, and made one single Tribunal, where the King's Patrimony was managed in the same manner, as at present. The Masters of Accounts, as we have said in the preceding Books of this History, formed their Tribunal, which was call'd the Tribunal of the Mint; and they were likewise call'd Masters of Accounts of the High-Court. What their Authority and Office were, we have sufficiently explain'd elsewhere. It was a very honourable Employment, and therefore was bestowed, for the most part, upon the Nobility, and the chief Lawyers of these Times. The Masters of Accounts formerly held their Tribunal in the Castle of S. Salvatore a Mare, which we now call Castello dell' Uovo, as may be seen in the Reign of Charles I. of Anjou; and their Number was much greater than it is at present. In the Reign of King Ladislaus their Number amounted to sixty five; in that of King Alphonfus it was reduced to thirty six, and afterwards in 1585, to eighteen¹.

QUEEN Joan I. in the Year 1350 gave them most ample Privileges, which are recorded by Deputy *Capece Galeota*²; but they making a bad use of them afterwards, and endeavouring to extend their Jurisdiction to Causes, which did not fall under their Cognizance, Sorgente says³, That the same Queen, in the Year 1370, restricted their Authority, forbidding them to intermeddle with other Peoples Business, or to stretch their Authority beyond its just Limits.

BESIDES this Tribunal, there was another of a very old standing, which had likewise the Care of the Royal Patrimony, called Regia Camera, or Regia Audientia, Curia Summaria, and lastly, La Regia Camera della Summaria, a Name, which it retains to this Day⁴. It was managed by the Magistrates, who were formerly called Auditores (whence the Tribunal was called Regia Audientia) and afterwards they were called Presidents of the Royal Chamber.

SEEING the Officers of these two Tribunals, as being employ'd in one and the same Business, acknowledged one and the same Head, viz. the High-Chamberlain, or his Deputy, and us'd frequently to meet together, their Union into one Tribunal became therefore the more easy, and the Prerogatives of the one were with the more Facility conveyed to the other.

THE manner in which these Officers managed the Affairs of the Royal Patrimony, both under the Kings of the Anjou and Aragon Families, King Alphonfus himself, in one of his Patents recorded by *Toppi*⁵, *Surgente*⁶, and others of our Writers, describes it to us. All those who had the Administration of the Exchequer, and collected the Royal Revenues, were obliged to give in their Accounts in particular stich'd Sheets of Paper to the Royal Chamber. These Accounts being brought to the Chamber, were to be revised by the Presidents and the Masters of Accounts jointly, but cursorily; that is to say, by separating the doubtful Articles from the clear, and what remained unpaid of the clear Articles, the High-Chamberlain and the President dispatched mandatory Letters, directed to the Treasurers, for exacting Payment from the Debtors of the Sums therein marked. The doubtful Articles were remitted to the Masters of Accounts, to be by them revis'd, discuss'd, and finally determin'd. Only when Difficulties occurred in point of Law, it was communicated to the Presidents, who determin'd it summarily: Hinc evenit (as Surgente very well observes⁷) ut Camera Summaria sit appellata, cum prius Audientia Rationum appellaretur.

IN the Reign of King Ladislaus it began to be introduced, that the Presidents, as well as the Masters of Accounts, fully discuss'd and determin'd the doubtful Articles, and gave Acquittances. But Alphonfus, by his Writ dated in Castel Nuovo the twenty third of November 1450 ordered, That the Accounts brought to the Royal Chamber should not only summarily, but fully be discuss'd and determin'd by the Presidents; and that the Masters of Accounts should not meddle in the Decision and Determination of them; transferring to the Presidents all the antient Authority, Prerogatives, and Pre-eminencies, which the Masters of Accounts formerly had in that Matter; this was the Reason, that afterwards the Office of these Masters was confined to the reporting and proposing the Doubts, and waiting for the Decision of the Presidents. Whence proceeded the great Difference, which we see between the antient Masters of Accounts, and the modern ones of our Times.

FORMERLY the care of the Royal Patrimony belonged wholly to the Masters of Accounts, but afterwards Charles I. of Anjou committed it to the Royal Chamber ¹. And this Tribunal was afterwards by Alphonfus exalted above all the rest; for he extended its Cognizance to many Causes, which formerly belonged to the High-Court, or the Sacred-Council. He ordained, according to what Costanzo relates ², that it should not only have the care of the Royal Patrimony, but should take Cognizance of Feodal Causes. Hence it was, that Alphonfus's Successors, in Imitation of him, so much favoured this Tribunal, by extending its Jurisdiction to all Causes, wherein the Exchequer was either Plaintiff, or Defendant; to take Cognizance of the Regalia, of Causes concerning Jurisdiction, wherein its own Interest was at stake, of Investitures, of Fiefs, of Feodal Succession, of Liege Homage, of Oaths of Fidelity, of Fines, of Taxes, of the Devolution of Fiefs, of Royal Patronages, of Ecclesiastical Dignities, and the Collation of Benefices, or Royal Presentations; and to have the Inspection of all vendible Offices; the care of the Royal Gallies, of the Royal Castles and Forts, of their Victuals and military Stores, of the Cannon, Powder, Salt-petre, and, in a Word, of all the necessary Equipage of the Army; the Inspection of the Universities of the Kingdom, of the Exportation of Merchandise, of Taxes, of Customs, and of the Product of Cockets; to revise the Accounts of all the King's Ministers, and of the Custom-House; to have the Inspection of the Royal Mines, Treasures, Streets, Bridges, and Passes; in short, of all that concerns the Royal Patrimony, and the Rights of the Exchequer.

BY having the Inspection of, and Jurisdiction over all these, the Royal Chamber came to have the Direction of other inferior Tribunals; such as those of the Clerk of Accounts, of the Treasurer General of the Kingdom, of the Custom-House of Naples, and of all the other Custom-Houses of the Kingdom; those of the King's Huntsman, of the Port-reeves over all the Kingdom, of the Royal Mint, of Weights and Measures, and of a vast Number of other Tribunals.

Angelo di Costanzo ³ says, that Alphonfus having extended the Jurisdiction of this Tribunal so much, he therefore appointed four Presidents that were Lawyers, two private Men, and a Director, and that the first Director was Vinciguerra Lanario, who had served Alphonfus in many important Affairs. This does not agree with the List of Presidents and Deputies collected by Toppi ⁴; for before Alphonfus's time this Tribunal was governed by the High-Chamberlain, or his Deputy, who was the Head of it; and Vinciguerra was Deputy of it long before Alphonfus's Reign. The first Deputy in the Reign of Alphonfus was Niccol' Antonio de' Monti a Nobleman of Capua in the Year 1450. when this Tribunal was reformed; and he was under Francesco d'Aquino Count of Loreto High Chamberlain, who upon no account would be present in the Tribunal; pretending, that a Person of his Quality might serve by means of a Deputy, and it was allowed him ⁵; so that Niccol' Antonio was appointed his Deputy, and from that time forth the High-Chamberlains never assisted in the Tribunal, but their Deputies, of whom, down to our time, Niccolò Toppi has made a long Catalogue; whence, in process of time, the High-Chamberlains not much regarding this Tribunal, it came, that the Kings appointed the Deputies, and the High-Chamberlains had nothing left them but an empty Title without Function.

THE Number of Presidents, as well as that of Counsellors, was always various; and they were likewise removeable at the King's Pleasure, going alternately from one Tribunal to another. According to Costanzo, there were only four of the long Robe, and two private Men in the time of Alphonfus; afterwards their Number increased wonderfully; insomuch, that in the Year 1495. there were twenty six Presidents belonging to this Tribunal, all of them famous, both for the Nobility of their Birth and Learning ⁶.

THIS exorbitant Number occasion'd the Reform; so that the same Year 1495. under Ferdinand II. the Tribunal was reform'd, and only five Presidents were left, who sat in one Bench, as the Counsellors of the S. C. used to do. But in process of time, the Royal Revenues still increasing, it became necessary to augment their Number; and consequently one Bench not being able to contain them, King Philip II. by his Writ dated the twenty fourth of December 1596. directed to Count Olivares the Viceroy¹, ordained, That the Tribunal should be divided into two Halls, in each of which three Presidents of the long Robe, and one private Man should be present, and the Deputy, sometimes in the one, and sometimes in the other, according to the Circumstances and Weightiness of Affairs, should preside. But this was not sufficient for the immense Affairs of the Tribunal; so that in 1637: for the greater Dispatch of Business, the Count of Monterey, who was then Viceroy, was obliged to add a third Bench. At present their fixt Number is twelve, eight of the long Robe, and four private Men, who, saving the Dignity of the Gown, and that they do not vote when Points of Law are to be decided, have the same Prerogatives with the Gown-men, and sit next them. Philip II. in 1558. among the Privileges granted to the City and Kingdom of Naples, order'd, that two parts of the Presidents should be Natives, and the third as the King thought fit²; but in the Reigns of the other Kings of the House of Austria, this Tribunal was always governed by four Italians and four Spaniards; and although the private Men, who were Presidents, were for the most part Natives, yet frequently some of them were Spaniards. At present, by the *Novelle Grazie*³, three of the Long Robe, and one private Man are as the King thinks fit.

THIS Tribunal has an Attorney General and Solicitor, who are scarce sufficient for the vast Load of Business; so that Tassone in his time wish'd that there had been two Attorney Generals. In our Days there have been two, but at present there's only one. 'Tis true, that Want has been in some measure supplied by adding an Attorney of Accounts, whom we call Cappa corta, (short Cloak) who sits next the Attorney General, and has a thousand Duckets of Salary⁴. This Tribunal had likewise twenty Masters of Accounts, but their Number is now restricted to fifteen; twelve for the Affairs of the twelve Provinces; two for the Royal Patrimony, and one for the Custom-House of Foggia, whose Authority, although it be much diminished, and for the most part transferred to the Presidents, yet with respect to the reporting of Causes, and the examining of Accounts, it is great. They are of the King's appointing as well as the Presidents, Attorney General and Solicitor; and from Masters of Accounts, it is an easy Step to rise to be Presidents in the Rank of private Men, which, as Toppi witnesseth⁵, was practised in the Reign of the Kings of the Family of Aragon, and of Charles V. and they enjoy all the same Prerogatives, Pre-eminencies, and Exemptions, with the other Officers of the Tribunal.

IT has its own Notary, or Secretary; and though it be a vendible Office, yet it must be confirm'd by the King. It has three Masters of the Rolls, according to the three Archives that are there; that of the Royal Mint; that of the Books of Accounts, and the third of the Records, of whom and their Prerogatives, *Toppi*⁶ has made a long Discourse, and copious Catalogues.

IT has likewise a Sealer and four Mastrodatti, who have Power of making eight Writers, two for each, besides twelve others, whom the Deputy appoints, all Natives; many ordinary Clerks, and a vast Number of extraordinary, and Porters, all Natives; over all which the Tribunal has the Cognizance both of their civil and criminal Causes.

IN this Degree of Eminency is this Tribunal at present, possessed of so many Privileges and Prerogatives granted to it not only by the Kings of the Family of Aragon, but likewise by the Austrian Princes their Successors; so that it is become supreme and independent of any other Tribunal with respect to the Administration of the Royal Patrimony. It resembles the Procurator of the Roman Emperors. It has Power of Retraction, as well as the Tribunal of the S. C. so that from it there is no Appeal to any other Tribunal, but by way of Reclamation, it revises its own Decrees; without stopping Execution. From it, as well as from the Tribunal of the S. C. come forth Decisions, Ordinances, and general Decrees, which, in the Kingdom, have Force no ways inferior to the Laws and Usages of the other supreme Tribunals. Whence, besides the Ordinances and general Decrees, of which we have discoursed at large in the XXII. Book of this History, it has its own particular Writers, who have collected its Decisions; such as Deputy Revertera, Ganavero, Moles, Ageta, and others. And in the Reign of the Family of Aragon, before the Year 1505. when the Spaniards erected the Collateral Council, this Tribunal was the next in Rank to that of S. C. by which, at all Times and in all Places, except in its own Hall, where the Presidents sit on the right side, and the Counsellors on the left, it has always been preceded.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Order and Number of the Provinces of the Kingdom in the Reign of Alphonsus, and how they were managed by the Royal Chamber; and how the Families of each City and Village were numbered.

DON'T see whence Marino Freccia * learnt, that King Alphonsus divided this Kingdom into six Provinces. From the time of the Emperor Frederick II. as may be seen in the XVII. Book of this History, it was divided into eight Provinces. Principato, which, by reason of its large Extent, was afterwards divided into two, the Hitber and the Further. Calabria, for the same Reason, was likewise divided into two, viz. Terra Giordana, which we now call the Further, and Val di Crati, which is now called the Hitber Calabria. Puglia, was also divided afterwards into two, Terra d'Otranto, Terra di Bari, and Apruzzo, which were divided into two Provinces; so that to these eight, other four being added, viz. Terra di Lavoro, Basilicata, Capitanata, and Contado di Molise, their Number amounted to twelve, as at present. And Alphonsus was so far from restricting their Number, that it has been the constant Opinion of our Writers, that in order to remove the Disputes that were wont to arise among the Collectors of the Taxes and Revenues, he divided Apruzzo into two Provinces †. But the most convincing Proof, that the Number of Provinces was twelve in the Reign of Alphonsus, is the Writ containing the general Subsidy imposed in the Year 1443. for Alphonsus's triumphal Entry into Naples. This Writ was printed by Camillo Tutini ‡ in his Book of the seven Offices of the Kingdom, and which he extracted from the Archives of the Royal Chamber. In this Writ the Province of Otranto is not mentioned; but we are ignorant whether that be owing to devouring Time, or because the greatest part of that Province being then in the Possession of the Prince of Taranto, the King's Relation, it had therefore been excepted; and of the Number of the Cities and Towns of all the other Provinces, the patrimonial Cities are also wanting, upon which, it is probable, a separate Tax had been laid. The Recorders however have committed an Error in the Rubrick, because instead of saying: Triumphus Regis Alphonsi, they have said: Tassa Collectarum felicitis Coronationis Regis Alphonsi noviter imposita ad recolligendum in Baronibus Provinciarum Regni, ultra Terras Demaniales; for although in the Year 1445. Alphonsus had obtained a Bull from Pope Eugene, by which he promised to send him the Cardinal of S. Lorenzo, or some other Person to crown him; yet that Solemnity was never performed during his Life. In this Writ are set down all the other eleven Provinces, with the Baronage Cities and Towns, and their Barons, in this order: Principato citra, & ultra. Basilicata. Terra di Lavoro, e Contado di Molise. Apruzzo citra. Apruzzo ultra. Provincia Calabrie Vallis Cratis. Provincia Calabrie ultra, Capitanata. Provincia Terre Bari.

THUS we see, that in the Reign of King Alphonsus the Provinces of the Kingdom were not less in Number than what they are at present. This proves that Guicciardino was mistaken¹ when he wrote, that Alphonsus changed the Denomination of the Provinces; and in order to facilitate the Collection of the Revenues, divided the whole Kingdom into six principal Provinces, viz. Terra di Lavoro, Principato, Basilicata, Calabria, Puglia and Apruzzo; of which Puglia was divided into three Parts, viz. Terra d'Otranto, Terra di Bari, and Capitanata. An Error as it is pardonable in that Writer, who was a Foreigner, and could not be rightly informed, so it is unpardonable in Marino Freccia a Native, and one of the King's Ministers in Naples.

BUT what is remarkable in the time of this King is, that not only all the Islands adjacent to these Provinces, of which more hereafter, are assign'd to Calabria, and not to Sicily, but likewise the Island of Lipari.

THIS Prince also enlarged the Province of the Further Principato, by adding to it the City of Benevento, and he extended the Borders of Terra di Lavoro further upon the Estate of the Church of Rome than they are at this time; and he also added to the Kingdom the Sovereignty over the State of Piombino.

THE City of Benevento, as may be seen in the preceding Books of this History, for the Reasons therein alledg'd, was long possess'd by the Roman Pontiffs; and altho' their Possession was frequently interrupted by Robert Guiscard, Roger I. King of Sicily, William II. the Emperor Frederick II. and by other Kings, according as the Circumstances of the War, or Enmity required; yet by the Treaties of Peace it was always restored to the Church, as being looked upon to be no part of the Kingdom; because when these Provinces were formed into a Kingdom, it had been before divided and separated from it, and under the Dominion of the Popes; hence it is, that in all Investitures it was always excepted. In the Reign of Charles III. Urban VI. gave the Government of it to Ramondello Orsino, who was afterwards Prince of Taranto, for his having deliver'd him from the Hands of Charles, when he was by that Prince besieged in Nocera. Alphonsus being invited to the Conquest of the Kingdom by the Adoption of Queen Joan II. upon the arising of those Disputes, which at last broke out into a bloody War: Alphonsus, who had two Popes his Enemies, possessed himself of Benevento, with a Design never to part with it, as the other Kings his Predecessors had done. In the Treaties of Peace held in Terracina with Pope Eugene's Legate, there was much debating about its Restitution, which was not agreed to by the King, but only, that together with Terracina he should keep it in Name of the Church all the Days of his Life; but that on the other hand Citta Ducale, Acumoli, and Lionessa, most important Cities of the Province of the Further Abruzzo, should be left in the Possession of the Pope. But afterwards Pope Nicholas V. succeeding Eugene, the said Cities of Montagna dell' Amatrice were restored to Alphonsus; hence it was, that, in order to remove all occasion of Dispute about the Limits of the County of Acumoli, bordering upon that of Norcia, in 1589. the Count of Miranda published an Edict², whereby all manner of Alienation of the Territories of Acumoli, situate upon the said Borders, to Strangers, and especially to the Norcians, was prohibited; and Benevento and Terracina also remained in the King's Possession, without being obliged to pay the Tribute of the two Hawks, due to the Apostolick See for the said two Cities; so that the Province of the Further Principato during all the time of the Reign of Alphonsus, with respect to the temporal Polity, acknowledged Benevento for its Head and Metropolis. Nor after the Death of Alphonsus was it restored to the Church; for Ferdinand I. his Successor likewise kept Possession of it for a long time: But afterwards there having been several Treaties with Pope Paul II. he restored it to him; from that time forward, with uninterrupted Possession, it has continued to this Day under the Dominion of the Apostolick See, and is reputed a City without the Kingdom. In the time of our Grandfathers Alfonso di Blasio a Beneventan Gentleman wrote an exact and full History of Benevento; and the fourth Volume contains this last State of its Subjection to the Popes. Blasio, in a Letter of his dated in 1650. mentioned by *Toppi*¹, gives us a Hint of that Work; and says, That it cost him thirty Years Labour, and that according to its various Conditions (before it was subdued by the Romans: The Time when it was under their Dominion in the Form of a Colony; under its own Dukes and Princes; and lastly, under the Popes) he had divided the Work into four Volumes. He maintains that Benevento was formerly the antient City of Samnium, and rejects the Opinions of Gluerius and Salmasius, who deny that there ever was such a City as Samnium. But dying before he could finish the Work, whereby he expected to have rendered his Name immortal, his Manuscripts lie buried in Darkness, and none have taken care to have them printed.

IN the Reign of Alphonfus the Province of Terra di Lavoro reached much farther within the Estate of the Church of Rome than it does at present. The Popes pretended, that the City of Gaeta belonged to the Dominion of the Church; and they founded that Pretension, as we have said in the preceding Books of this History, upon the Bounty of Charles the Great, when he pretended to take it from the Greeks, in order to make a Present of it to the Church of Rome, as he had done of Terracina, and other Cities taken from the Greeks. But at that time Arechis Prince of Benevento opposing it, their Design was blasted, and he got that City to be immediately restored to the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, who sent thither their Officers to govern it. But that did not prevent the Popes, whenever an Opportunity offered, to make Attempts upon it; and when they saw that they could not maintain it, they invested some powerful Prince with it. So we read, that Pope John VIII. yielded it to Pandolphus Count of Capua, who died in the Year 882.², and *Lione Ostiense*³ writes, that at that time Gaeta belonged to the Pope; but it soon returned under the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, and in the succeeding times, the Normans having conquered all that the Greeks had remaining in these our Provinces, they made themselves Masters of it; hence they took the Title of Dukes of Gaeta. The Normans being succeeded by the Suevi, and these by the Family of Anjou, to whom Alphonfus and the other Kings of the House of Aragon; and lastly, that of Austria succeeding, this City by a continued and uninterrupted Possession has been held by our Kings, and has always been reputed one of the Cities of this Province.

BUT Terracina had not the same Fate, till the time of Alphonfus. This City being taken from the Greeks by Charles the Great, he gave it to the Church of *Rome*⁴; but the Normans having driven out the Greeks, laid claim to it⁵. Nevertheless the Popes did not part with it; so that sometimes the Popes, and sometimes our Kings possessed it; and it was always disputed, till at last Alphonfus, by Agreement and Capitulation with two Popes, firmly annexed it to this Province; and for a long time the Borders of the Kingdom on that side were extended to this City. Pope Eugene IV. as we have said, in exchange for Acumoli, Citta Ducale, and Lionessa, gave Alphonfus the Government of Benevento and Terracina during his Life; afterwards the Grant was extended to Ferdinand and his Successors for ever. Nicholas V. his Successor confirmed what Eugene had done, and restored these Cities to Alphonfus, without his being obliged to pay any Quit-rent. In the Reign of Alphonfus, and the beginning of that of Ferdinand his Son, Terracina was retained. But Ferdinand afterwards, in order to keep up Friendship with Pope Pius II. who had given him the Investiture which Calistus had denied him, was obliged to restore it⁶, together with Benevento, so that the Roman Pontiffs incorporated them again with their Dominions, from which it has not been possible ever since to wrest them; hence arose the so many Disputes about the Limits between the Apostolick See and our Kings, who have always kept up these Rights, in order to recover the said Cities, when an Opportunity should offer; and Cibiccanelli in the twenty first Tome of his M. S. Giurisdizionali has made a particular and exact Collection of all these Rights ¹.

ALPHONSUS did not neglect his Rights to other Places of this Province, likewise claimed and usurped by the Roman Pontiffs. The Castle of Pontecorvo, only eight Miles distant from Monte Cassino ², where the Bishop of Aquino now resides, was certainly within the District of this Province of Terra di Lavoro. It was built in the Territories of Aquino near a crooked Bridge, from which it had its Name, by Rodoaldo the Castellain in the time of the Emperor Lewis, according to Ostienſe ³. The Monastery of Cassino, to which it was given in the Year 1105. by Richard Prince of Benevento, kept it for a long time ⁴; but the Abbots of Cassino at this time pretended to possess all the Lands and Towns belonging to their Monastery, as absolute Lords, without depending upon any Prince, or acknowledging any other supreme or superior Dominion; therefore they independently gave Infeoffment to their Vassals, and took their Oaths of Fealty and liege Homage; of which Oaths the Abbot of Nuce ⁵ gives us two Forms. The same Author likewise has set down the Investiture, which the Abbot Oderisio gave of the Half of the Town of Cassino to Giordano Pinzast during his Life only, but that after his Death it should return to the Monastery. In these Times they made good this Pretension; for they were become so haughty as to send Armies into the Field, and in these troublesome times to make War, by defending their Towns with armed Force. But in time, such petty Lords being brought under Subjection, and these Provinces having been formed into a Kingdom under the famous Roger I. King of Sicily, the Lands of this Monastery were treated by the Norman and Suevian Kings, and those of the Family of Anjou as the Lands of the other Barons were, of which the Kings had the supreme and sovereign Dominion and Jurisdiction. Whence we read, that in the Reign of Charles I. the Abbots of Monte Cassino, designing to renew their old Pretensions, were curbed by that Prince, who, in the Year 1275. wrote to his Officers; telling them, That the Lands possessed by the Monastery of Cassino were subject to him, in the same manner as all the other Lands and Vassals of the Kingdom were, and that that Monastery and its Abbots had no other Right but that of Vassalage; therefore he ordered them not to suffer the Abbot to oppress the Vassals of the said Monastery. In 1292. Charles II. his Successor, while that Monastery was governed both in Temporals and Spirituals by the Bishop of Tripoli, sent two Commissioners to clear the Marches between the Territories of Rocca Guglielma and Pontecorvo, and to set Bounds to them; and in 1307. he wrote to the Justice of Terra di Lavoro and the County of Molise, to do Justice to the said Abbot and Monastery in not suffering them to be molested in the Possession of any Heritage, Rights and Vassals, which they had in the District of Pontecorvo, but to maintain them in the Possession they had.

IN the Year 1311. King Robert ordered the Abbot of Cassino to keep a strong Guard in the Forts and Places belonging to the said Monastery that were exposed to his Enemies, and especially in S. Germano and Pontecorvo; and in 1324. a new Dispute arising about the Marches between Rocca Guglielma and Pontecorvo, he ordered the Justice of Terra di Lavoro and the County of Molise to divide the said Marches, and fix Boundaries.

IN 1343. Queen Joan I. ordered the said Justice not to proceed ex officio against the People of the Town of Pontecorvo, Vassals of the Monastery of Cassino, for Crimes committed by them, excepting such as belonged to him de jure. And in 1431. Queen Joan II. made Niccolo di Somma of Naples a Knight, Governor of Pontecorvo for that Year.

WE likewise find by the Royal Records, that the Town of Pontecorvo, from the time of King Charles I. to that of Queen Joan II. was always taxed in the general Subsidies, and paid in its Quota to the Royal Chamber, as all the other Towns of the Kingdom did, as in the Years 1274, 1275, &c. down to 1423. which Documents were all collected by Chioccarelli in the eighteenth Tome of his MS. Girisdizionali.

BUT the Monastery of Cassino having undergone many Changes, sometimes having been given in Commendam by the Court of Rome to some Bishop or Cardinal, and sometimes restored to its former Condition, the Popes disposing of it at their Pleasure, it was by them much diminished by appropriating a great part of its Estate to themselves; so that Pontecorvo being taken from the Monks, at last it fell into the Hands of the Apostolical See. The Popes would not acknowledge our Kings as sovereign Lords of Pontecorvo, though they had formerly owned the Abbots of Monte Cassino as such, but usurped all Right over it to themselves. But King Alphonfus, during the Enmity between him and Pope Eugene IV. took it by force of Arms, and kept it as long as he reign'd, and at his Death transmitted it to King Ferdinand his Successor. In the War which this King had afterwards with John the Son of Renatus, so well described by Pontano, it was taken from him by John; but Ferdinand having entered into a League with Pope Pius II. who rais'd a strong Army against John, the Pope's Army drove John out of those Places he had taken, and Pontecorvo returned to Ferdinand its right owner¹. But the Roman Pontiffs, who never slip Time and Opportunity of regaining what they once have possessed, were always upon the catch to recover it; and, by the supine Negligence of the Ministers of our Princes, found Means to retake it, and by uninterrupted Possession kept it for a long time, and at last they took upon them, in the Investitures of the Kingdom, to reserve it to themselves, as they did *Benevento*²; and in fine, that the Bishop of Aquino might live in a more secure Place, they have changed his Residence, and instead of residing in Aquino the ancient Cathedral See, he now resides in Pontecorvo, which they pretend to be without the Dominion of our Kings³. But what is more, they renewed the old Debate about the Marches, and pretended to extend them to Rocca Guglielma; so that in the Pontificate of Paul V. the Viceroy D. Peter Count of Lemos was obliged to send Fulvio di Cosianzo Marquis of Corleto to S. Germano, who, with the Archbishop of Chieti, Apostolick Commissioner sent by the Pope, composed these Differences, and on the thirty first of May 1612. there was an Instrument drawn up between the said Archbishop and the Marquis for dividing the said Marches between Pontecorvo and Rocca Guglielma, in which their Commissions for that purpose were inserted⁴.

KING Alphonfus not only claim'd Pontecorvo from the Roman Pontiffs, but likewise the small Islands lying in the Sea of Gaeta. There are in that Sea four Islands called Ponza, Summone, Palmerola, and Ventotene. In some Maps Summone and Palmerola are call'd S. Maria and le Botte. The Popes likewise laid claim to these Islands, although they were comprehended in the Kingdom of Naples, and were always reckoned to be in the Diocess of Gaeta, and still governed by our Kings.

In 1270. King Charles I. ordered his Officers of Terra di Lavoro not to molest the Abbot and Convent of S. Maria in the Island of Ponza of the Order of Cisterciens in the Diocess of Gaeta, in the Possession of some Lands they had in the Diocess of Sessa; and Fr. Marcellino d'Avana having surreptitiously obtained an Order for putting himself in Possession of the said Monastery, King Alphonfus, having discovered the Cheat, ordered him to be turned out of Possession of the said Abbey, and of the Fruits thereof.

ALPHONSUS's Successors maintained their Possession of these Islands; and in the Reign of the Emperor Charles V. we find, that the Count of S. Severina Viceroy of the Kingdom, in 1525. sent several Orders to the Castellains of Ponza and Ventotene, carefully to defend them against the Turks.

BUT in the Reign of King Philip II. the Popes heightened their Pretensions, and besides having made over their Right to the said Islands to Cardinal Farnese and the Duke of Parma, they attempted to build some Forts in the Island of Ponza; of which the Duke d'Offuna having advised the King, in the Year 1584. Philip returned him for Answer, That he must take special care not to suffer any Person whatsoever to usurp his Right, and to send him a full Account of what pass'd, with his Opinion. The Viceroy consulted with the Royal Chamber, where, with great Exactness, it was demonstrated, that the said four Islands were a part of the Kingdom, and that the Pope could have no Title to them; nor the Duke of Parma; who was only a simple Farmer, having in the Year 1582. paid thirteen thousand Crowns for a Lease of them for twenty two Years; whereupon the King by another Letter dated the third of November the said Year 1584 ordered the Viceroy to continue to preserve his Rights, and not to suffer any Person to make the least Encroachment upon them.

THE Count of Miranda succeeding afterwards in the Government of the Kingdom, Cardinal Farnese, by the Means of Count Olivares then Ambassador in Rome, proposed a Treaty with King Philip, for granting these Islands in Fief to the Duke of Parma his Cousin-german; and, by Reason of the Circumstances of those Times, the King inclining to do it, in 1587. he wrote to the Count to send him a particular Account if his doing so would be attended with any Inconveniences, but in the mean time not to suffer any Fortification, or Mole, or Harbour, to be made in the said Islands, till he should be fully informed of all, that he might resolve upon what was best for his Service. And the Count of Miranda having given him a full Account of the Matter, the King was determined to invest the Duke of Parma, and advised the Viceroy of his Resolution; and on the twenty second of September 1588. he wrote to the Count of Olivares his Ambassador at Rome, that according to what he had written to the Viceroy, he had given the said Islands in Fief to the Duke of Parma by erecting them into a County¹.

AT last Alphonfus enlarged the Kingdom, by the Acquisition of the Sovereignty of the State of Piombino (situate upon the Sea between Pisa and Sienna) and the small Island of Giglio, (Lilly) Castiglione della Pescara and Gavarra. In the War which Alphonfus carried on in Tuscany for inducing the Florentines to make Peace, and recalling their Troops from the Siege of Milan, the Siennese having granted him Passage, he thought, that the best Way he could march his Army against the Florentines, would be through the State of Piombino, where there was a Harbour fit for receiving his Fleet from Sicily. Rinaldo Orfino was then Lord of it, who at first had sided with Alphonfus, but had now begun to keep a Correspondence with the Florentines, with whom he at last joined against the King. Alphonfus therefore resolved to make War upon him; so that after having carried on the War in Tuscany during the Spring of 1488. in the beginning of July he marched and encamped before Piombino, to which he laid close Siege. Rinaldo called the Florentines to his Assistance, who accordingly made all the Haste they could²; and the two Fleets having engaged, Alphonfus obtained the Victory; and his Fleet, after having taken the neighbouring Island of Giglio, entered the Harbour of Piombino, and in order to reduce the City he made an attack upon it, but his Army being seized with a great Pestilence, he was forced to raise the Siege; and a Treaty of Peace being set on Foot between the King and the Florentines, and the other Potentates of Italy, it was concluded upon these Conditions, that Castiglione della Pescara, Giglio, the State of Piombino, and Gavarra should be delivered up to Alphonfus; but the Florentines insisted, that Rinaldo should likewise be included in the Peace, and it was agreed, that he should continue to be Lord of Piombino, by acknowledging the King for his Sovereign, to whom he should pay a yearly Tribute of a Vessel of Gold worth five hundred Crowns.

THIS State belonged to the most noble Family Appiano, and Gherardo Lionardo Appiano was the last Lord of it. Lionardo being married to Paola Colonna, by which Marriage there being no Male Issue, but only one Daughter, named Caterina Appiana, ordered, in case his Brother Giacomo, as it happened, should die without Male Issue, that his other Brother Emanuele should succeed him in his Dominions, and not his own Daughter Caterina. But Gherardo dying, Paola his Wife having married Caterina her Daughter to Rinaldo Orfino, took care to have her Son-in-Law Rinaldo put in Possession of the State, by excluding Emanuele, and by means of the Florentines got Alphonfus to accept of the Vessel of Gold as a Tribute. Rinaldo afterwards dying, Caterina his Wife sent Ambassadors to King Alphonfus, to beg of him not to molest her for the Faults of her Husband, seeing she was willing to continue to acknowledge him for Sovereign by rendering him all Obedience, and paying the Tribute. The King was satisfied, and Caterina continued in Possession of the State during her Life; but she dying soon after, the Citizens of Piombino immediately invited Emanuele, as their lawful Lord, to come and take Possession of the State. Emanuele was then in Troja, a City of the Kingdom, situate in the Province of Capitanata, whither he had retired under the Protection of Alphonfus. The King was very well satisfied with his Vassals for having invited *Emanuele*¹, and in order to keep him firm to his Interest, when he should have Occasion for him against the Florentines, he sent one of his Secretaries to Piombino to signify to that People, that he was very well pleased with their having done their Duty in recalling Emanuele, for whom he had a great Regard. Then Emanuele having taken the Oath of Fidelity to the King, and promised to pay to him and his Successors the yearly Tribute of a Vessel of Gold worth five hundred Crowns, it was likewise stipulated with the Subjects of the State, that all those who should succeed to that Lordship should be bound to acknowledge the King and his Successors for their Sovereigns. Upon Emanuele's arrival in Piombino he was received and acknowledged by all as their Lord, and he governed his People with Prudence and Affection, and was always very much beloved by King Alphonfus; and he dying, was succeeded by his Son Giacomo, and the Family of Appiana governed this State for many Years after. But afterwards it being extinct, there arose many Disputes among the Pretenders, in deciding of which our Kings, as Successors to Alphonfus, to whom the Right of Sovereignty belonged, had always a great Share; hence *Summonte*² says, That in his time the Viceroy of Naples sent to sequester it, and keep it in the Name of King Philip II. Hence are derived the Rights of our Kings to the Sovereignty of this State, and of which they have given the Investiture to several other Families since.

THE State then of the Provinces, of which our Kingdom is now composed, in the time of Alphonfus was at its greatest Height and Extent; and seeing his Excess of Generosity had led him to be too much bent upon increasing the Royal Patrimony: the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber, which had the Direction of collecting the Royal Revenues, and the Inspection of the Collectors of the Customs, Treasurers, and all the other inferior Officers of the Provinces appointed for that End, became more numerous, and overcharged with Business. Hence proceeded the Custom, which still continues, of distributing the Provinces among the Presidents and Masters of Accounts of the said Tribunal, to the end that every one might have his particular Charge; and of sending a President to Foggia to inspect the Management of the Royal Custom-house with respect to the Duty upon Cattle, whence the King drew immense Sums, which is now looked upon to be one of the greatest Revenues of the Royal Patrimony.

ALPHONSUS likewise increased the Royal Patrimony by exacting a Ducket from each Family; hence the numbering of Families was introduced into the Kingdom. Formerly under the Norman Kings the Revenues of the Exchequer were collected by Valuation; that is to say, every twelve Marks of Income paid three Florins³, and this Tax was let out to Farmers; which Custom continued to the Reign of the Emperor Frederick II. who, that the Poor might not be oppressed by the more rich and powerful, prohibited the Collection in that manner; and in 1218. having called a general Parliament in Castel del Uovo of all the Barons and Feodatories of the Kingdom, with the Syndicks of the Cities and Towns, he ordained, that for the future the Royal Revenues should be received by Collections, so that those who possessed much were to pay accordingly, those who had little, proportionably, and from those that had nothing, as little was required. Thus were the first Collections very moderate; but soon after, these not being sufficient to supply the Necessities of the Kingdom, the second were introduced, and so from one to another the Collections came to be six; which, according to *Andrea d'Isernia*⁴, *Luca di Penna*⁵, *Antonio Capece*⁶, and Fabio Giordano in his Chronicle, were called the extraordinary Exchequer Payments.

THIS Method continued to the Reign of Alphonfus, who, as we have said, in the first Parliament held in Naples in 1442. ordained, That, in place of the six Collections, each Family should pay ten Carlins. Afterwards in 1449. as it is recorded in the Registers of the Royal Chamber⁷, while Alphonfus resided in Torre del Greco, he called another Parliament, wherein he declared, That as he maintained great Armies and Fleets for the Defence of the Kingdom, and the Royal Revenues not being sufficient, he was forced to augment them; so that he was of Opinion, that it would be for the publick good, that five Carlins more were laid upon each Family, besides the ten; and in Recompence, he promised to give each Family of the Kingdom a Tommolo of Salt; which was unanimously agreed to.

THUS was the numbering of the Families introduced into the Kingdom; and the first was made by the same Alphonfus in the Year 1447. which is to be found in the great Register. The others were made by the Kings his Successors, the second in 1472. the third in 1489. the fourth, which was not completed, in 1508. the fifth in 1522. the sixth in 1532. the seventh in 1545. and the eighth in 1561. which, though not entire, are to be found in the great Register. There were some others afterwards, which are preserved by the Masters of Accounts, viz. in the Years 1595. 1642. 1648. and 1699. which is the last we now have¹. Besides these ordinary Payments, which, after the Example of Alphonfus, were by his Successors from time to time still augmented, the King has a vast Number of perpetual Funds, whereby he receives prodigious Sums from the City of Naples, the Provinces, and Barons, of which Mazzella has made a long Catalogue, and which (it being now an Age since he wrote it) are immensely increased; but the Spaniards having made the Natives willing to buy off their Chains, because they could never have been otherwise free of them, those Funds are in a great Measure conveyed away and alienated from the Crown.

Alphonfus increased the Number of Titles and Barons, to whom he gave Criminal Jurisdiction. His Death, and the Laws he left us.

ALPHONSUS created a great many more Nobility and Barons than formerly had been in the Kingdom. Before his time there were only two Princes, those of Taranto and Salerno, to whom he added the Prince of Rossano, five Dukes, and a few Marquisses; there were a good many Counts, and many more Barons; but Alphonfus, according to *Summonte*¹, doubled their Number. In some Seggi of Naples there were no Nobility; and the first in the Seggio of Nido were the Counts of Borrello and Bucchanico of the Family of Alagna. These were two Brothers of the famous Lucrezia d'Alagno the Daughter of a Gentleman of Nido, with whom Alphonfus was so much in love, that he endeavoured to obtain a Dispensation from Rome for repudiating his Wife, who was the King of Castile's Sister, in order to marry Lucrezia; and among the other remarkable things he did for her, he no sooner enjoyed her, than he created one of her Brothers Count of Borrello and High-Chancellor, and the other Count of Bucchanico; and Trifano Caracciolo in his Book De Varietate fortunæ, mentioned by *Costanzo*², writes, that these were the two first Noblemen of the Seggio of Nido.

BUT what the following Ages had no Reason to commend Alphonfus for, was his granting the Merum & mixtum imperium to the Barons. This Prince, by his unbounded Liberality having exhausted all the other Funds, began likewise to be lavish of the supreme Regalia, which by no means ought to be alienated from the Crown; whereas the Kings his Predecessors were so jealous of these Rights, that King Charles I. having given to his only Son the City of Salerno with the Title of Prince, with some other Cities and Towns in the Neighbourhood, granted him only civil jurisdiction over them; and in Salerno alone, within the Circuit of its Walls, granted him criminal Jurisdiction¹; and the other Kings, as we have seen in the preceding Books, very seldom gave it, and then only as a Reward to some well deserving Baron for his singular Service; hence it was, that the Grants and Investitures made before the Reign of Alphonfus did not comprehend criminal Jurisdiction, it being always excepted and reserved; for it was the Custom in those Times, that the Feudataries, who possessed Lands with Vassals, could only exercise that low and base Jurisdiction of adjusting Differences and Quarrels, which are wont to arise among the Inhabitants of the Places; and therefore the Barons and Feudataries chose only annual Chamberlains, who exercised Jurisdiction in taking Cognizance of, and judging these trifling Differences²; for the High-Court exercised Jurisdiction over all Places and Cities of the Kingdom. And the Reason was, because, as has been wisely observed by the Counsellor Giuseppe de Rosta, our most accurate Lawyer³, in the Cities and Lands with Vassals, there was only that Jurisdiction which is called base, and which, according to the Civil Law, was exercised by the inferior Magistrates, whom the Romans called Defensores, and consisted in taking Cognizance of civil Causes; in place of those Chamberlains, as Andrea d'Isernia hath observed⁴, with us the Bailiffs of the Places succeeded, who took Cognizance of civil Matters, petty Larceny, Damages, Weights and Measures, and other Causes of small Moment⁵; but the more weighty Matters, and especially those which regarded the Merum Imperium and Criminal Jurisdiction, according to the Roman Law, belonged to the Presidents of the Provinces, in place of whom, in our Kingdom, as we have seen in the preceding Books, the Justices were appointed⁶, whom we now call Presidents; from whom by way of Appeal those weighty Causes were carried to the High-Court of the Vicariate, the supreme Tribunal to which all the Justices of the Kingdom are subjected. Thus the Investitures, which, before the Reign of Alphonfus, were granted to the Barons of Cities and Lands with Vassals, comprehended only that base Jurisdiction, as coherent to, and inseparable from them, and not the Merum Imperium and Criminal Jurisdiction, which could not be said to be coherent to them, as not having been formerly exercised by their own Magistrates, but by the Presidents; and afterwards not by the Bailiffs of the Places, but by the Justices of the Provinces.

IN the Reigns of Alphonfus and the other Aragon Kings his Successors, as we have said elsewhere, the Custom of granting Criminal Jurisdiction, and the four Arbitrary Letters in the Investitures of Fiefs, began to be practised⁷. Whence in process of time every petty Baron, as well as the Great, had the Merum and Mixtum Imperium in their Fiefs, to the great Detriment of the King's Regalia, and the Loïs of the Subjects. Charles VIII. King of France, during the few Months that he reigned here, thought of depriving the Barons altogether of it, by reducing them to the Usage of *France*⁸; but his short Reign, and the Difficulties that occurred, prevented his putting that Design in execution; much less can it be expected at present, seeing the Mischief is inveterate, and that without great Revolutions and Disorder it could not be accomplished.

AFTER this Prince had thus re-established the Kingdom, although, in the latter end of his Days, the War had been renewed with the Florentines; and that his not restoring some Gencefe Ships taken by his Cruisers, had made that Republick his Enemy: Yet being decayed by his Amours with Lucrezia d'Alagno, he immediately made Peace with the Florentines, and was in no Pain about the Gencefe, but employed the rest of his Life in Hunting, Feasting, Tournaments, and other Diversions; and when he was now old, the Duke of Milan sent Ambassadors to treat with him about a double Marriage with his Royal Family, because the Duke was much afraid, that the King of France might favour the Duke of Orleans, who pretended, that the Dutchy of Milan belonged to him, as being the Son of Valentina Visconte lawful Sister to Duke Philip : and in that case he thought he could not have a more faithful Ally than Alphonfus, who was still jealous of Renatus, who continued to keep up a secret Correspondence in Italy : So in a short time the double Marriage was concluded, and Hippolita Maria, the Duke's Daughter, was married to Alphonfus, the eldest Son of the Duke of Calabria, and Leonora, the Duke of Calabria's Daughter, was betrothed to Sforza the Duke of Milan's third Son, and the Bridegrooms, as well as the Brides, were not above eight Years of Age.

THIS Year 1455. Pope Nicholas V. died; and after the Apostolick See had been fourteen Days vacant, in the Month of April Alphonfus Borgia Cardinal of Valencia was elected in his room, who took the Name of Callistus III. and who, as we have said, had been for many Years much in favour with King Alphonfus, and his chief Counsellor. Callistus, though very old, projected such great Undertakings, as would have required a Man's whole Life-time to accomplish. As it usually happens, that the greatest Favourites of Princes, when rais'd to the Papacy, are wont to become their most bitter Enemies; so Callistus had no sooner mounted the Throne, than he began to belittl himself, and oppose Alphonfus's Designs; and not pleas'd with this new Alliance concluded with the Duke of Milan, he left no Stone unturn'd in order to put a Stop to the Marriages; but Alphonfus, perceiving the Pope's Design, made the more Haste to have them solemniz'd; so that in the beginning of the following Year 1456. they were celebrated with great Pomp, and Eleanora was conducted to Milan to Sforza her Spouse.

AT this very time John King of Navarre, King Alphonfus's second Brother, was much displeas'd with his eldest Son Don Carlos, who intitl'd himself Prince of Viana; and the Reason of this Displeasure was, because the Kingdom of Navarre had belonged to the Prince's Mother, who was then dead, and King John had married for his second Wife, the Daughter of the Admiral of Castile. The Prince could not bear to see the Queen his Mother-in-Law sit on his Mother's Throne, and he himself lead a private Life; for the Mother-in-Law had got so much the Ascendant over her Husband, now old, that there was nothing done either in the Kingdom of Navarre, or in that of Aragon, of which John was Viceroy, but what she thought fit; therefore the Prince had endeavour'd to get himself proclaim'd King of Navarre, because, both on account of his Virtue and the Memory of his Mother, the native Queen of that Kingdom, he was much beloved by that People. His Design not succeeding, he came to visit King Alphonfus his Uncle, who allowed him twelve thousand Duckets a Year for his Maintenance; but because he was a Prince of a handsome Mien, and courteous Behaviour, fit to gain Respect, Alphonfus was not very fond of his Company in Naples, but sent him to the Pope to beg of his Holiness, that he would be pleas'd to make up the Difference between him and his Father. The Prince went, and the Pope received him very graciously, and gave him wherewithal to subsist; but finding that the Pope made no great haste in reconciling him with his Father, and that Alphonfus was so much decayed that he could not live long, he settled in Rome, in hopes that the Barons of the Kingdom, who were not well pleas'd with the Duke of Calabria's Conduct, would invite him to be King after Alphonfus's Death. In the mean time in the beginning of May 1458. Alphonfus began to fall ill, and growing still worse, it was rumour'd abroad that he could not recover; whereupon the Prince came from Rome to visit him, which much disturb'd the King; for the Prince arriving three Days before he died, when he had been given over by the Physicians, it redoubled the Agony of Death, the King knowing well that he had come to endeavour to possess himself of the City of Naples; and that being lodged in Castel Nuovo, the Governor would be more ready to obey him than the Duke of Calabria, especially seeing the Garrison consisted of Catalans, Subjects to King John, who was to succeed in the Kingdoms of Aragon and Sicily, order'd it immediately to be given out, that he was better, and that it was the Opinion of the Physicians that he should be carried to Castello dell' Uovo for the Benefit of the Air, which was immediately done, leaving the Charge of keeping Castello Nuovo to the Duke of Calabria; and on the twenty seventh of June 1458. the Day after he was carried to Castello dell' Uovo, in the sixty fourth Year of his Age, he ended his Days *.

THUS died a great King: A Prince most worthy of praise for the innumerable Virtues wherewith he was adorn'd, and especially for his Liberality and Magnificence. He most generously enriched many with valuable Presents, and raised others, by giving them vast Estates. He was most magnificent in bestowing publick Shews upon the People, in which he strove to vie with the Roman Grandeur, as was seen when he received in Naples the Emperor Frederick III. and Leonora the Daughter of the King of Portugal by his own Sister, who was to be married to Frederick. His Generosity likewise appeared in the other great Feasts, hunting Matches, Tournaments, and such like Entertainments, wherewith he regaled the Citizens of Naples, who were most covetous of such Diversions. He had his Palace furnished with most costly Tapestry wrought with Gold and Silver, and other sumptuous Household-stuff. He was likewise very munificent in adorning Naples with stately Edifices, whereby he put it upon a Level with the most famous Cities in the World: He enlarged the great Moie, and began the great Hall of Castel Nuovo, which is certainly one of the most surprizing modern Buildings in all Italy: He enlarged the Arsenal of Naples, and the Grotto in the Way between Naples and Pozzuolo, and built a Royal Magazine, and many other Edifices for different Uses.

HIS Death was bitterly lamented by the Neapolitans, because they were thereby not only deprived of so generous a Prince, but the Kingdom was like to be involved into new Troubles and Calamities by a long War. His Corps, never enough to be lamented, was, with funeral Pomp, put in a Coffin, and deposited in the Castle where he died; and although in his Will he had order'd it to be carried to the Church of S. Peter the Martyr, and from thence, as soon as possible, sent to the Monastery of S. Maria a Pobleto in Spain, where the antient Kings of Aragon are buried; yet it remain'd in Naples, where, with great Respect and Veneration, it was expos'd by the Dominican Monks in the Vestry of their Church.

NOT having had Children by Queen Mary, the Daughter of Henry III. King of Castile, in his Will, which he made the Day before he died, he appointed D. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria his bastard Son, legitimated, to succeed him in the Kingdom of Naples; and D. John King of Navarre his second Brother and his Posterity, in the Kingdoms of Aragon and Sicily, according to the last Will of D. Ferdinand his Father, which is preserv'd in the Royal Archives of Barcelona, from whence Alphonfus order'd a Copy of it to be sent him before he died; and he left many Legacies for pious Uses¹. S. Antoninus Archbishop of Florence writes, that before he died, he did not neglect to put the Duke of Calabria in mind, that he left him the Kingdom of Naples; but in order to govern it peaceably, he must keep at a Distance all the Aragonians and Catalans that he had rais'd, and instead of them, employ Italians, and make up his Court of them; and he enjoin'd him to have a special Regard for the Natives of the Kingdom, on whom he ought to bestow the Offices, and not look upon them with an evil Eye, as if he were jealous of them. That he was sensible he had burden'd the Kingdom with new Taxes and Impositions, such as the People were not able to bear; that therefore he advis'd him to ease his Subjects of them all, and reduce them to the antient Custom. And lastly, to cultivate the Peace he left him in with the Princes and Republicks of Italy; and above all things to keep in Friendship with the Roman Pontiffs, on whom, in a great measure, depended the Preservation or Loss of his Kingdom; patiently to suffer their Arrogance and Pride, and in order not to give them any Cause of Complaint, to behave himself with Humility and Respect towards them, which had been the only way that he had taken to abate their Ambition.

THIS Prince, besides his having left us so many shining Monuments, good Regulations, and new Reforms, left us also some Laws. Alphonfus, according to some Authors, after so many and long Wars, which he carried on during the Life of Queen Joan II. and after her Death with Renatus; at last, after having triumph'd over his Enemies, and made himself peaceable Possessor of the Kingdom, made it his chief Study to re-establish it, and repair the Losses it had sustain'd during the late Wars. For which end he establish'd many Laws, and began to erect the Tribunal of the S. C. to which he afterwards join'd many others. These Laws, according to *Toppi*², were formerly to be found in Naples, but now they are lost. We have only a few of them remaining, which are now scattered up and down in the Royal Archives and the Volumes of our Statutes³. We read the first under the Title,

De Possessoribus non turbandis, which in some Editions has this Title: Edictum Pentimæ Gloriosissimi, & Divi Alphonsi Regis clementissimi. This Edict was published by Alphonsus in the Year 1443. the second of his peaceable Reign, after he had finished the War with Renatus; on account of which War, there having been many Suits at Law commenc'd among his Subjects about the Possession of Fiefs and Estates, by this Edict he ordered, that the Possessors should not be disturbed, but be suffered to keep Possession of what they had got; and that the Judges should not take Cognizance of such Causes without his Consent and Commission. This Law was published in the Camp of Pentima, a Place situate in Abruzzo, near Sulmona ¹.

THERE is such another Edict extracted from the Register of the Laws of Alphonsus, and printed with our Statutes ², which in 1446. was by this King established in Mazzone delle rose near Spedaletto, not far from Capua, and read and published with the other Laws in Castel Capuano, whereby he ordain'd, that those who before the Death of King Ladislaus, had by themselves, or their lawful Predecessors possessed, and were in Possession of Lands, Villages, and other Estates, should not be disturbed, nor forced to produce their original Rights and Titles, which would be the undoing of many People of all Ranks and Conditions; which Law Capec takes Notice of in his Decisions ³. The second Edict which we read under the Title, De Off. S. C. is likewise his, and, as we have said, not Ferdinand's.

THE other ⁴, which we also read among our Statutes, is that remarkable one, which treats of the Quit-rents, wherein Alphonsus inserted the Bull established in 1451. at his Desire by Pope Nicholas V. for regulating the Quit-rents. The King by this Statute confirmed the Bull, and ordered, that in his Kingdoms it should have the same Force and Vigour with his other Laws, and added some other Regulations concerning the said Quit-rents. This Edict was made in Torre del Greco, where, in order to be near his beloved Lucretia d'Alagno, the King resided in the latter end of his Days, and is dated the twentieth of October 1451. There are other Edicts, Patents and particular Laws made by Alphonsus to be seen in the Royal Archives, some of which several Authors, according to the Subjects they were treating of, have inserted in their Works: Toppi printed many of them in his Dell' Origine de' Tribunali; some others have been transcribed by Moles, Tappia, Galeota, and by many others; but these we have mentioned, as being contained in the Body of our Statutes, have with us the Force and Vigour of Laws: As for the rest, they may be useful with respect to the History of the Times, the Institution of the Tribunals, and for illustrating the other Laws and Edicts of this King.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXVII.

At the latter end of the Reign of King Alphonfus was quiet and peaceable, so that of Ferdinand was full of Distraction and Confusion. The old Calamities were renew'd, and the Kingdom, sometimes by intestine Commotions, was again turn'd upside down, and sometimes invaded and harass'd by foreign Enemies. Charles Prince of Viana practis'd upon the Neapolitans to induce them to proclaim him King. The Pope claim'd the Kingdom, as devolv'd to the Holy See. The Barons conspiring together, invited King John to come and conquer it, as being acquir'd by the Troops of the Crown of Aragon, and not without great Toil to himself. King John refusing the Invitation, they had recourse to John of Anjou, the Son of Renatus, who claim'd it by vertue of his Father's Right, and therefore had taken the Title of Duke of Calabria; but this Attempt proving likewise unsuccessful, they enter'd into a new Conspiracy, and were join'd by Pope Innocent VIII. who made War upon Ferdinand. So many Storms, so many troublesome and powerful Enemies had this King to struggle with, in order to maintain himself in the Possession of the Kingdom.

KING Alphonfus was no sooner dead, than the Prince of Viana, who, as we have said, came to Naples for that purpose, by means of many Catalan and Sicilian Barons, who had been much in favour with Alphonfus, endeavour'd to persuade the Neapolitans to proclaim him King. As the Son of King John he pretended to be the lawful Heir of the Kingdom, and that it was not in the Power of King Alphonfus to leave it to Ferdinand his bastard Son, because it had been acquired by the Troops of the Crown of Aragon. Besides, not only the Hatred which the Pope had against Ferdinand, and the Aversion some of the Barons had to him, but the Affection which the Prince, by his Humanity and gentle Behaviour, had gain'd among the People, gave him some Hopes of Success. But the City of Naples, and many Barons, mindful of the Oaths and Promises made to Alphonfus, immediately cried out, God bless King Ferdinand our Lord; who, riding through the City and the Saggi, receiv'd the Acclamations of all the People. When the Prince saw this, he quickly gave over his Design, took shipping in a Vessel that lay in the Harbour, and departed for Sicily, and with him embark'd all those Catalans that had not got Estates in the Kingdom from King Alphonfus.

BUT though Ferdinand had got rid of the Prince of Viana, he was not secure from the Snares laid for him by Pope Callistus; for though by Messages and Letters full of Respect and Submission, he had endeavour'd to make him his Friend, yet he found the Pope very obstinate. Callistus had fully resolv'd not to confirm the Succession of the new King, and to declare the Kingdom devolv'd to the Holy See. He said, That it was not in the King's Power to give it to D. Ferdinand, who was neither his lawful, nor bastard Son: That he had dealt very unjustly with King John, in depriving him of the Kingdom of Naples, which having been conquer'd by the Troops of the Crown of Aragon, and not without great Trouble and Fatigue to King John, ought not to be dismember'd from the other Kingdoms of Aragon and Sicily. All those things were directed to the End, which he pursued, of depriving Ferdinand of the Kingdom, and investing another with it, and therein to raise Pier Luigi Borgia, his Nephew, whom he had already made Duke of *Spoleto*¹. But though Ferdinand was appris'd of all these Things, he never lost his Courage, but was the more earnest in fixing himself upon the Throne, for which end he call'd a general Parliament of the Barons and Commons, of whom the greatest part quickly appear'd, and, without the least sign of Discontent, swore Allegiance to him. In this Parliament were likewise present two Ambassadors from the Duke of Milan, who, both in publick and private, persuaded the Barons to be faithful to the King, and preserve that Peace, which, for sixteen Years, without Intermission, they had enjoy'd under King Alphonfus, whereby the Kingdom had become so opulent; and they declared publicly, that the Duke of Milan was fully resolv'd to hazard both his Dominions and Life in the King's Cause. Whereupon the Barons and Syndicks of the Cities return'd Home with Hopes of living in Peace.

BUT on the other hand Pope Callistus on the twelfth of July this same Year 1458. publish'd a Bull, whereby he revok'd that of Pope Eugene, and declared the Duke of Calabria incapable of succeeding in the Kingdom, saying, That the said Bull had been surreptitiously obtain'd, and that the Duke was supposititious, and not the true Son of King Alphonfus, and therefore he declar'd the Kingdom devolv'd to the Church of Rome; absolv'd from their Oaths those who had sworn to Ferdinand; and order'd all the Prelates, and other Ecclesiastical Persons, the Barons, Cities, and People of the Kingdom, under the Pain of Excommunication and Interdiction, not to obey him, nor acknowledge him as King, nor to swear Allegiance to him, and in case they had done it, he absolv'd them from their Oaths; and he caus'd Bills to be posted up in several Places of the Kingdom, wherein all these Particulars were contain'd². *Angelo di Costanzo*³ writes, that this Bull was Matter of Surprise not only in the Kingdom, but over all Italy, seeing that Callistus, (as if the Papacy metamorphos'd Men) who had been for a long time Alphonfus's Confident and Counsellor, and by whose Favour he had been made Cardinal, and afterwards Pope, was now so ungrateful to his Son Ferdinand. Some began to suspect, that what the Pope said might be true, that Ferdinand was not really the Son of Alphonfus, but supposititious, since no Man could know it better than he, who had been his Confident; and that therefore out of true Zeal he had been moved to have the Kingdom fall into the Hands of King John. In fine Costanzo says, that those Bills that were posted up in different Parts of the Kingdom, were the chief

Cause of confirming in their Resolution those Barons, who had designed to revolt, and of encouraging others that had not before thought on it; and that without doubt, if Pope Callistus had not very opportunely died, King Ferdinand would have lost the Kingdom before he was crown'd.

IN the mean time the King did not neglect to countermine the Designs of Callistus; in presence of his Nuncio he declined his Jurisdiction as a partial Judge; he appeal'd from the Declaration of the Kingdom's being devolv'd to the Church, and in Answer to the Bull he wrote to him, that he was King by the Grace of God, the Favour of his Father King Alphonfus, and the Acclamation and Consent of the Barons and Cities of the Kingdom, who had acknowledged him as such, and that if more was needful, he had likewise had the Concessions of two Popes his Predecessors, Eugene and Nicholas; and as he possess'd the Kingdom by so many just Titles, his Menaces and unjust Anathemas did not in the least discourage him. He wrote likewise very obsequiously to the College of Cardinals, telling them, That being Men of so great Prudence, they ought to endeavour to preserve the Peace of Italy, and to soften the Pope, and set him to Rights again: That they must be sensible that it would be very ignominious for a Prince of a generous Soul to part with a Kingdom, unless at the same time with his Life too. Some Cardinals interpos'd for a Peace, but to no purpose. The Duke of Milan sent likewise to beg of the Pope to desist, and to give him to understand, that if he did not, he was obliged to defend the King, not only on account of their Relation, but by the Articles of the League they had entered into. Callistus still implacable and obstinate, rejected all Proposals and Intercessions; so that King Ferdinand and his Friends resolved to send Ambassadors to the Pope in Name of the Kingdom, to lodge such another Appeal against the Declaration, as the King had made. To these Ferdinand added Ambassadors of his own, who being arrived in Rome, were received as the Ambassadors of the King and Kingdom. They found the Pope indisposed, so that they had no Audience; but their Business not admitting of Delay, each of the Ambassadors, in Name of those that had sent them, did what was incumbent upon them. By publick Instruments they objected against the Person of Callistus, as being suspected by the King and Kingdom: They appeal'd anew from the Declaration made by him; and in Name of the Kingdom declared, That as they acknowledg'd King Ferdinand for their lawful King and Lord, so they begged of the Pope, that as such, he would be pleas'd to give him the Investiture of the Kingdom.

WHILE these things were transacting, the Pope grew still worse and worse, so that the King was resolved to undertake nothing till he could know the Issue of his Distemper; but his great Age, the many Vexations he had undergone, and especially the melancholy News of King John's refusing to disturb Ferdinand in the Possession of the Kingdom, put an end to his Days on the sixth of August 1458. after a Pontificate of three Years and four Months. Thus did his vast Designs, and his Ambition to raise Pier Luigi his Nephew come to nothing.

THE King overjoyed, immediately wrote to his own and the Kingdom's Ambassadors, and to the Archbishop of Benevento, who were then at Rome, to use their utmost Efforts to get a Person elected Pope that was in his Interest, as a Matter of the greatest Consequence to his Kingdom; and the Cardinals being shut up in the Conclave, on the nineteenth of the same Month of August, elected Enca Silvio Piccolomini of Sienna, who took the Name of Pius II. a Man of great Learning, as the Works he left us testify; notwithstanding his Advancement to the Papacy made him alter his Sentiments; for when he came to be Pope, he wrote in a different manner from what he had done when he was private Secretary to the Emperor Frederick III. Nevertheless he was a lover of Peace, and a well-wisher to the Memory of King Alphonfus; because when he was the said Emperor's Secretary, and came along with him to Naples, Alphonfus bestowed Favours and Presents upon him. The King, upon the News of his Election, dispatched Francesco del Balzo, Duke of Andria, to congratulate him upon it, and do him Homage, to whom the Pope was so complaisant, that he granted him whatever he ask'd. Antonio d' Alessandro, that famous Lawyer, was afterwards sent to demand the Investiture, which was granted; but upon this Occasion the Pope regarding the Interest of his See, it was clogged with many Conditions, viz. That the Arrears of Quit-rent should be paid: That he should always send Assistance to the Pope as often as required: That he should restore Benevento and Terracina to the Church; and other Conditions were agreed to in Name of the Pope by Bernardo Bishop of Spoleto, and in Behalf of the King by Antonio d' Alessandro. On the second of November this same Year 1458. Pius II. dispatched a Bull, whereby he confirmed the Articles agreed on between the Pope and the King concerning the Investiture of the Kingdom, the Quit-rent, Coronation, and the Restitution of Benevento and Terracina. Afterwards on the tenth of the same Month the Bull of Investiture was drawn up, which was examined, and for the most part penned by Antonio d' Alessandro. On the second of December following, two other Bulls¹ were dispatched: In the first the Pope advised Ferdinand that he was to send Cardinal Latino Apostolick Legate to crown him King of Naples, to whom he was to swear Liege-homage: In the second he revokes the Bull of Calistus III. whereby the Kingdom had been declared devolved, and gives the Reasons that moved him to revoke it. He likewise dispatched another Bull of Commission to Cardinal Latino for the Coronation, who left Rome, and came to Naples, and from whose Hands Ferdinand took the Oath and was crown'd. Zurita will have it that he was crowned in Bari, but Costanzo, and other more accurate Writers² say, that the Coronation was performed in Barletta on the fourth of February 1459. with great Pomp and Ceremony, in presence of almost all the Barons. *P. Beatillo*³ still insisting upon the fabulous Coronation with the Crown of Iron, which he believed was antiently practised in Bari, writes, that he was crowned in the Church of S. Nicholas in Bari with the Iron Crown, and afterwards in Barletta with that of Gold; but as we have said elsewhere, that Coronation with the Crown of Iron in Bari is altogether a Dream and fabulous.

IN Memory of this Solemnity Ferdinand ordered new Money to be coined, which Pieces were therefore called Coronati. He did not intitle himself, as his Father had done, King of the two Sicily's, but, both upon his Coin and in his Writs, he made use of this Title: Ferdinandus Dei gratia Rex Siciliae, Hierusalem, & Ungariae; for both the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and that of Hungary belonged to the Crown of Naples. The King, on the Day of his Coronation, was very munificent and liberal to every Body; for there was no Person of the least Merit, that did not return home well satisfied; he treated the Barons and Nobility in a most engaging manner, giving them Titles, Offices, and Dignities, and he knighted almost all the Syndicks of the Cities. He likewise honoured many Vassals of Barons with Knighthood; which, as Costanzo observes, and was known afterwards, he did out of Policy, in order to retain them as Spies upon the Steps and Actions of the Barons. He granted new Favours to his Subjects in general, by easing them of many Taxes. He promised his Favour and Friendship to such Spaniards as were willing to remain in the Kingdom, and generously gave many Presents and Liberty to those that had a Mind to return to Spain. He was thankful to the Pope for his Favours, for in 1461. he gave Mary his natural Daughter in Marriage to Antonio Piccolomini, Pius's Nephew, and, for her Portion, gave him the Dutchy of Amalfi, the County of Celano, and the Office of Lord Chief Justice, vacant by the Death of *Raimondo Orsini*⁴; so that it was thought, on account of the Pope's Friendship, the Duke of Milan's Relation, and the Favours he had bestowed upon the Barons and the People, those that had revolted would have submitted.

C H A P. I.

The Princes of Taranto and Rossano with other Barons, after the Invitation made to John King of Aragon, which was rejected, invite John of Anjou, the Son of Renatus, to come and conquer the Kingdom: His Expedition, Conquests, Loss, and Flight.

BUT this Tranquillity in the Kingdom was of short Duration; for, though some Barons, who did not know the Bottom of Ferdinand's imbitter'd Heart, believed, that his Reign would prove both peaceable and mild; nevertheless, many others, who knew his mischievous and reserved Nature, looked upon this Clemency and Generosity to be nothing else but Disguise and Dissimulation; and the chief of these were the Princes of Taranto and Rossano, both of them the King's Relations, who, on account of their Riches, suspected, and were afraid, that the King, who had beheld his Father live in so great Splendor upon the Revenues of so many Kingdoms, seeing himself possessed of one single Kingdom only, would always enrich himself to their Cost, and therefore they durst not venture to go to visit him; nay, the Prince of Taranto grew so jealous, that he was daily thinking of new Methods how to secure himself; and in order to weaken the King, and strengthen himself by new Friends and Alliances, he desired the Favour of the King, that he would be pleased to restore the Marquis of Cortone to his Estate, to whose Son he had promised to give his Daughter in Marriage; and he ask'd the like Favour for Giosia Acquaviva Duke of Atri and Teramo, the Father of Giulio Antonio Count of Conversano, his Son-in-Law. Although the Request was arrogant, yet the King, in hopes, that not only the Prince, but the Duke and Marquis by this Favour would alter their Minds, granted it, and sent two Commissioners, the one to Abruzzo, and the other to Calabria, to give the Duke and Marquis Possession of their Estates, which had been till then confiscated to the Crown; and after the Prince's Messengers had been nobly regal'd, he sent them back to the Prince, who then resided in Lecce, and with great Dissimulation the Prince sent to thank the King, and from that time frequent Messages and Letters went between them. But the Prince, who knew that he had offended the King, by pressing him to put Arms in the Hands of his mortal Enemies, the more friendly the King's Letters were, was the more jealous, because he knew him to be naturally covetous, cruel, and revengeful, and ever ready to dissemble the Sentiments of his Heart. Therefore, not finding himself secure from some secret Treachery, while his House was so much frequented by Ferdinand's Servants, by whom he was afraid to be either stabb'd or poison'd, he began to think it better to come to an open Rupture. For which purpose, with the Consent of the Marquis of Cortone, the Prince of Rossano, and the Duke or Giosia, he resolved to send secretly to sollicite King John of Aragon to come and take Possession of the Kingdom, which belonged to him by lawful Succession after the Death of his Brother Alphonfus. It was very lucky for Ferdinand, that King John had then Wars upon his Hands in all his Dominions, and especially in Catalonia and Navarre, because his Subjects of these two Nations could not bear that the King, at the Instigation of his Queen, who was the Daughter of the Admiral of Castile, should treat his eldest Son so ill, and use him like an Enemy, who was beloved by every body, and should seemingly design to leave his Dominions to

D. Ferdinand, the Son of his second Marriage; for if he had been disingaged from these Wars, he would certainly in a short time have driven King Ferdinand out of this Kingdom; so that King John returned for Answer to these Barons, that for the present, he desired them to be faithful to D. Ferdinand his Nephew, that he could easily part with his Right to the Kingdom, provided it continued in the Family of Aragon. On the other hand King Ferdinand having got some Intelligence of these Intrigues, sent immediately into Spain Turco Cicinello, a Knight of consummate Prudence, and the famous Antonio d' Alessandro, likewise a Knight and a most excellent Doctor, to beg of King John, that he would continue to favour the King his Nephew, and that he might look upon this Kingdom to be more his own, than those belonging to the Crown of Aragon. These Ambassadors had no great Difficulty in diverting that King from making any Attempt upon the Kingdom of Naples, for had he been willing, he wanted Troops. But they found Difficulty in compounding another Matter; for Queen Mary, the Wife of King Alphonfus, died in Catalonia a few Days before, and had left King John Heir to her Dowry, which was four hundred thousand Duckets; and he said, that it must be paid out of the Kingdom of Naples, and the Treasure that King Alphonfus had left; and these two Knights had much ado to compound the Matter by agreeing to pay that Sum in the Space of ten Years, alledging, that King John might as well demand the Kingdom, as so vast a Sum at that time, when a certain and dangerous War was impending over it.

THE Prince of Taranto seeing his Design thus blasted, made a new Attempt, in which, besides the aforesaid Barons, he would likewise have the Prince of Rossano engaged, who mortally hated the King; because it was reported, that the King had committed Incest with the Princess of Rossano his own Sister, the Prince's Wife; for which purpose he sent Marco della Ratta to beg of him, that since the Invitation given the King of Aragon had not had the desired Effect, he would join in inviting John of Anjou Duke of Calabria, who was then in Genoa.

THIS Prince came to Genoa before Alphonfus died, when that King obstinately refusing to restore to the Genoese the Ships that had been taken from them by his Cruisers, they out of Despair (since they could get no Assistance from the Powers of Italy) submitted to Charles VII. King of France, who sent John, the Son of King Renatus, to govern them; who, as we have said, had taken the Title of Duke of Calabria; therefore it was unanimously resolved to send the same Marco della Ratta to invite him. This Marco married a Daughter of Giovanni Cossa, who, as we have said in the preceding Book, went from Naples with King Renatus, and from that time had still continued in France with the Character of a loyal and brave Man; and for that Reason King Renatus made him Tutor to his Son Duke John; it was therefore an easy Matter to persuade the Duke to accept of the Invitation, to which he was not only of himself inclined, but was advised and encouraged by Giovanni Cossa, who, after an Exile of nineteen Years, was fond of returning to his native Country: so that at the same time that he sent to King Renatus in Marseilles to make Preparations of War, he fitted out Gallies and Ships at Genoa; and on the other hand the Prince of Taranto, who, as High-Constable of the Kingdom, had the charge of the Forces, put such Officers at their Head as depended upon him, and gave them Money to put themselves in order, and at the same time reinforced them with Recruits from Marca and Romagna; and now things seemed to be ripe in Puglia and Abruzzo for breaking out into an open War: And on the other hand the Marquis of Cortone had managed Matters so in Calabria that the People were ready to revolt. And while King Ferdinand was wholly intent upon suppressing these Commotions, he received Advice, that Duke John, with twenty two Gallies and four large Ships, was arrived upon the Coast of Scilla, and landed between the Mouths of the Rivers Garigliano and Vulturno; so that in an Instant a cruel intestine War was kindled in the Kingdom.

A full Account of this War, which broke out in the beginning of King Ferdinand's Reign, was written by Gioviano Pontano, a celebrated Scholar in those Times, and a cotemporary Writer, for he was King Ferdinand's own Secretary. Michele Riccio, likewise a cotemporary Author, treats of it also, though but briefly. Angelo di Costanzo ² has since described it more minutely, and with greater Exactness; protesting, that if he had enlarged in many things which Pontano had omitted, he took them from the relation of Francesco Puderico, who was ninety Years old when he died, and who, together with Sannazaro, pressed him to write his History. Antonio Zurita, who for the most part follows Pontano, Summonte, and others, have likewise written of it at large; so that this War having been so fully described by these Authors, and it not being to my purpose, I refer the Reader to their Histories.

TO be short, Duke John was received by the Prince of Rossano, pushed forward with his Fleet to the Port of Naples, and invaded a great part of Terra di Lavoro. Then he marched to Capitanata, and found the Barons and People all inclined to join him. Lucera quickly opened its Gates, and Luigi Minutelo surrendered the Castle; Troja, Foggia, Sansevero, Manfredonia, and all the Castles of Monte Gargano followed the Example of Lucera; and Ercole da Este, who was Governor of that Province for the King, seeing that all the Cities within his Jurisdiction had revolted, joined the Duke. Giovanni Caracciolo Duke of Melfi, Giacomo Caracciolo Count of Avellino his Brother, Giorgio della Magna Count of Bucino, Carlo di Sangro Lord of Torre Maggiore, Marino Caracciolo Lord of Santo Buono, who in Capitanata and the County of Molise had many strong Castles, came and swore Allegiance to him; and Aquila, by the Persuasion of Pietro Lallo Camponeseco, set up the Standard of Anjou. The Prince of Taranto, who was then at Bari, came as far as Bitonto to meet the Duke, and conducted him to Bari, where he was received with Royal Pomp. The Prince of Rossano lay in wait for the King, in order to assassinate him; but his Army was defeated near Sarno. All Principato, Basilicata, and Calabria as far as Cosenza set up the Anjou Standard, and the Marquis of Cortone had already made all the rest of Calabria revolt; and whoever reads the History of this War written by Pontano, may judge what a vile Opinion the Barons and People had of King Ferdinand, that not only those that had sided with King Alphonfus his Father, or their Children, conspired to drive him out of the Kingdom, but his very Catalans, and even Pope Callistus who had been his Preceptor.

Ferdinand's Affairs were reduced to so low an ebb, that it was reported (which Pontano takes for granted) that Queen Isabella di Chiaramonte his Wife, seeing her Husband's Affairs in a desperate Condition, accompanied by her Confessor, left Naples under the Disguise of a Franciscan Monk, and went to the Prince of Taranto her Uncle, and throwing herself at his Feet, begged of him, that since he had made her a Queen, he would make her die a Queen, and that the Prince answered her, that she might rest contented, it should be done.

THE Duke of Milan, who had entered into this War for supporting King Ferdinand, and who, on account of the Pretension of the Duke of Orleans to the State of Milan, run the same risque with the King, finding Ferdinand's Affairs in such a Condition, bethought himself of saving the Kingdom to him by means of a Peace and Reconciliation; and he sent Roberto Sanseverino Count of Cajazza to the King's Assistance, with Instructions to advise him to endeavour to be reconciled with the Barons, and by Degrees recover the Kingdom: And because he was sensible, that the Barons knew the King to be of such a cruel and revengeful Nature, that he never observed Conditions nor Oaths, in order to glut himself with the Blood of those that had once offended him, he sent a Commission to the Count, empowering him, upon the Faith of a trusty Prince, and in his Name to secure such Barons as were willing to submit to the King¹. The coming of the Count of Cajazza gave a lucky turn to the King's Affairs, for being of kin to the Count of Marfico, he enter'd into a Treaty with him about his returning to the King's Allegiance, and accordingly it was agreed to; the Count willingly accepting of the honourable Conditions granted him by the King, amongst which were the Concession of the City of Salerno with the Title of Prince: The Power of coining Money: That the Estates of the Vassals forfeited for Felony should belong to the Prince, and not to the King, and other very honourable Conditions recorded by Cossanzo. The Count of Marfico, who, from this time forward, was call'd Prince of Salerno, sent immediately to Pope Pius for Absolution from the Oath he had taken to Duke John, when he created him Knight of the Crescent, to whom he return'd the Badges of the Order; and *Chioccorelli*² relates the Bull of Pius II. dated the 5th of January 1460. whereby he absolves from their Oaths all those who had taken that Order from Duke John, and dissolv'd that Society, which was call'd the Order of the Crescenti.

THE Agreement of the Prince of Salerno with the King contributed much to Ferdinand's Safety, for the Prince not only gave him free Passage through his Towns, and open'd to him the way to Calabria, but, together with Roberto Orsino, accompanied him in recovering it; and he reduced all the Towns from Sanseverino belonging to himself, the Count of Lauria, the Count of Capaccio, or to any other of his Followers, as far as Cosenza, to the King's Obedience. Cosenza was taken and pillag'd: Scigliano, Martorano and Nicastro surrender'd: Bisignano was taken by Force, and, in short, almost all that Province submitted to the King.

POPE Pius sent Antonino Piccolomini, his Nephew, with a thousand Horse and five hundred Foot to the King's Assistance, with which he recover'd Terra di Lavoro. At the same time the Duke of Milan sent him a new Reinforcement, by which many Towns in Abruzzo were reduc'd to his Obedience. The King march'd into Puglia in order to lay waste the Country of Lucera, where Duke John, with a good Body of Troops, was expecting the Prince of Taranto. Sanseverino, Draginara, and many other Towns of Monte Gargano surrender'd to the King; and, at last, he took S. Angelo, where he found all the Riches of Puglia had been brought. It was pillag'd with the utmost Avarice and Cruelty, and the King went down to the subterraneous Church of that famous Sanctuary, where he found a vast Quantity of Silver and Gold, not only what had been given out of great Devotion for that Sanctuary, but what had been carried thither from the neighbouring Places and put under the Custody of the Priests. The King having caused an account to be taken of it, seiz'd it, promising, that after he had recover'd the Kingdom, every thing should be restor'd, and he immediately caused this Silver to be coin'd into that Money which was call'd the Coronati di S. Angelo; which serv'd him in good stead in this War.

WHILE Affairs were in this State, there likewise arriv'd an unexpected Reinforcement to King Ferdinand; for George Castriote, surnam'd Scanderbeg, a Man most famous in those Times for his Exploits against the Turks, came from Albania to his Relief with a good number of Ships, in which were seven hundred Horse and a thousand Veteran Foot. He, not unmindful, that some Years before, when the Turk came to attack him in Albania, of which he was Prince, King Alphonfus had sent him Relief; and hearing that this War lay heavy upon King Ferdinand, he resolv'd to assist him in this manner; and his coming had so great an effect, that Ferdinand's Enemies were afraid to attack him.

CARDINAL Rovarella, the Apostolical Legate, who was then in Benevento, endeavour'd to bring over Orsino to the King's Party; and soon after the Marquis of Cortone made his Peace with the King, and the Count of Vicastro follow'd his Example.

ALPHONSUS Duke of Calabria, the King's eldest Son, who was but fourteen Years of Age, was sent by his Father, under the Direction of Luca Sanseverino, to subdue the rest of Calabria, who shewing from his Childhood what was to be expected from him when grown up to Man's Estate, with the utmost Diligence and Boldness accomplish'd the Design. On the other hand, the King beat his Enemies in Capitanata, took Troja, and brought that whole Province under Subjection; so that the other Barons, seeing the King so successful, and the Anjou Faction in such a declining State, came and submitted to him, and Giovanni Caracciolo, Duke of Melfi did the same.

THE Prince of Taranto, at last finding that he was no longer able to resist the King, who was coming to besiege him, resolv'd to send Ambassadors for making his Peace with him¹. Ferdinand consented, and sent Antonello di Petruccio, his Secretary, with Cardinal Rovarella, the Pope's Legate, to treat about Conditions with the Prince's Ambassadors, between whom it was agreed, that the Prince was to drive Duke John out of Puglia and all his Towns. The Prince retir'd to Altamura, where he shortly after died, not without suspicion that the King had caused him to be strangled.

NOTHING now remain'd to be done, but to reduce that Part of Terra di Lavoro, which lies on the other side of Vulturno and Abruzzo, where Duke John and the Prince of Rossano had fortify'd themselves. However, the War was carried on against Sora, which the Pope's Troops, though solicited by Ferdinand, refus'd to attack; alledging, that the Pope had not sent them to assist the King, because the Duke of Anjou's Party having been brought so low, he stood no longer in need of their Assistance, but only because his Holiness pretended, that the Dutchy of Sora, the County of Arpino, and that of Celano, having once belong'd to the Church of Rome, they ought to be restor'd to it. The King, that he might not involve himself in new Disputes, fell upon an Expedient of giving the County of Celano as a Portion to Antonio Piccolomini, the Pope's Nephew, and his own Son-in-Law, upon Condition of his acknowledging the King for his supreme Lord; and then Pope Pius dying, he gave the Dutchy of Sora to Antonio della Rovere, Pope Sixtus's Nephew, upon the same Condition. At last the Prince of Rossano likewise sent to treat of a Peace, and by means of Cardinal Ravella it was concluded, upon Condition, for the greater Security, that it should be confirm'd by a new tie of Alliance, viz. That the King should give Beatrice, his Daughter, who was afterwards Queen of Hungary, in Marriage to Giovan-Battista Marzano, the Prince's Son, and accordingly she was immediately sent to Sessa, to Eleonora Princess of Marzano, as a Pledge of Security, and a certain Peace. But quickly after the King caused the Prince to be imprison'd, and sent to take Possession of his State, and order'd the Princess, together with her Children and his own Daughter, who had been promised in Marriage to the Prince's Son, to come to Naples.

DUKE John seeing himself depriv'd of his Partizans, agreed with the King to go whithersoever he should think fit, and having got a safe Conduct, he went to Ischia; and the King, after having entirely reduc'd Puglia, Aquila and all Abruzzo to his Obedience, had nothing more to do but to reduce Ischia, whither the Duke of Anjou had retir'd, and was guarded by eight Gallies, which daily infested Naples; and the King not being able to compass his Design, was forced to send to Catalonia, to King John of Aragon, his Uncle, to get him to send Galzerano Richiens, with a Squadron of Catalan Gallies, in order to put an end to the War: whereupon the Duke seeing all his Adherents were either dead, or imprison'd, or in extreme Necessity, resolv'd to quit the Kingdom, and having embark'd, he sail'd for Provence with two Gallies: After his departure, the Catalan Squadron being arriv'd, Toreglia, who commanded the Island of Ischia, by the Mediation of Lupo Zimenes d'Urrea, Viceroy of Sicily, propos'd a Treaty for surrendering it, but King Alphonfus having made Ischia a Colony of Catalans, King Ferdinand, afraid that the Catalans would set up the Standard of the King of Aragon, his Uncle, and make him think of attacking the Kingdom, contented himself with granting Toreglia most honourable Terms, and setting at Liberty his Brother Charles, who a little before had been made Prisoner, and giving him fifty thousand Ducats, and restoring him two Gallies that had been taken; which was immediately put in execution, and Ferdinand put in Possession of the Island.

GIOVANNI Pontano writes, that Duke John, at his leaving the Kingdom, left a very noble Character of himself in the Minds of the People, and especially of the Nobility, for he was of a most courteous Behaviour, singular Fidelity, great Constancy and Resolution, an excellent Christian, extremely liberal, grateful, and a Lover of Justice; and what is not natural to the French, he was grave, severe and circumspect. The extraordinary Virtues of this Prince mov'd many Gentlemen of the Kingdom to follow his Fortune, and go with him to France, amongst whom were Count Nicola di Campobasso, Giacomo Galeotto, and Rossallo del Giudice; and the two last gain'd such Reputation in the Wars, that Galeotto was the King of France's General at the Battle of S. Albino, where he obtain'd a great Victory^{*}; and Rossallo was the same King's General in the War of Roussillon against the King of Aragon, where he perform'd many notable Actions; and the King gave him the Title of Count of Castres.

BUT Duke John, upon his arrival in Provence, was not long idle, for he was invited by the Catalans, who had revolted from King John of Aragon, which prov'd doubly favourable to King Ferdinand I. because it freed him at once from three Rivals, Duke John, King Renatus his Father, and the King of Aragon, which last, if he had not had Duke John to deal with, had certainly begun to give

* Costanzo lib. 20.

King Ferdinand that Trouble, which afterwards King Friderick gave King Ferdinand the Catholick, who succeeded him. The County of Barcelona had rebel'd against King John, and invited King Raniero to be their Lord, who was born of a Sister of King Martin of Aragon, and who claim'd the same Right to that State, and the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valencia, that the Father of King Alphonfus had, and that this King John pretended, who was the Son of the other Sister. Our King Ferdinand being adviled of this, sent some Companies of Men at Arms to Catalonia to the Assistance of his Uncle; and Duke John, after he had left our Kingdom, upon his arrival in France, went immediately upon this Expedition, as his Father's Vicar, and commanded till 1470, in which Year he died in Barcelona: And to keep up the Pretensions of the French to this Kingdom, he convey'd his Rights to Lewis and Charles, Kings of France, in the manner as hereafter shall be related.

C H A P. II.

The Marriage of Alphonfus Duke of Calabria with Hippolita Maria Sforza, the Daughter of the Duke of Milan: Of Eleonora, the King's Daughter with Hercules d'Este, Marquis of Ferrara; and of Beatrice, another of his Daughters, with Mathias Corvin, King of Hungary. The Death of Pope Pius II. and the Disputes which arose between Paul II. his Successor, and King Ferdinand, which, in the Time of Pope Sixtus IV. his Successor, were ended.

AFTER King Ferdinand had triumph'd over so many Enemies, and brought the Kingdom under his Obedience, he was resolv'd to repair the Damages it had sustain'd by a seven Years continual War, which had quite overturn'd and put it in disorder; but first of all, for greater Security, he endeavour'd to strengthen himself by new Alliances, and to put in execution the Treaty, which, many Years before, he had made with the Duke of Milan, of marrying the Duke of Calabria to Hippolita, his Daughter; therefore in the Spring of this Year 1464. he sent Friderick, his second Son, with six hundred Horse to Milan to conduct the Bride.

FREDERICK, upon his arrival in Milan, in the Name of his Brother, marry'd Hippolita, who having left Milan, and been entertain'd for two Months in Sienna, from thence came to Rome, and at last to Naples, where she was receiv'd with great Pomp by Alphonfus, her Husband, and the King caused many Feasts and Tournaments to be celebrated. Some Years after the new Alliance was concluded with Hercules d'Este, Marquis, and afterwards Duke of Ferrara, to whom the King gave Eleonora, his Daughter, in Marriage; and the Duke sent Sigismond, his Brother, to Naples to conduct his Bride to him, whom the King sent, accompanied by the Duke of Amalfi and his Dutcheß, by Francesco di Capua, Count of Altavilla, and his Countess, by the Count and Countess of Buchianico, by the Duke of Andria, and other Noblemen.

THEN was likewise concluded the Marriage of Beatrice with Mathias King of Hungary; and the Time being come, that the Bride was to be conducted to her Husband, her Coronation was appointed to be before the Church dell' Incoronata, where a most magnificent Theatre was erected, whither the King came in his Royal Robes, and the Crown upon his Head, accompanied by his chief Barons; a little after came Beatrice, who, with great Pomp, was crown'd Queen of Hungary by Cardinal Oliviero Caraffa, Archbishop of Naples, assisted by many Bishops; and the Day following, the new Queen, after having visited all the Seggi of the City on Horseback, with the Crown upon her Head, accompanied by all the Barons, left Naples, and was attended by the Dukes of Calabria and S. Angelo, her Brothers; and being arriv'd in Manfredonia, they embark'd in the Gallies of Naples, and conducted her to Hungary. These Princes were attended by some of our Advocates, who, as Duarenus writes, by their Intrigues and Subtleties involved Hungary in inextricable Controversies; insomuch that they were turn'd out of the Kingdom, in order to restore it to its former State of Peace and Tranquillity.

ALL these Feasts were interrupted by the Grief, occasion'd by the Death of Queen Isabel, a Lady of a most exemplary Life, and truly Royal Virtues. She was lamented by every body; and with most pompous Obsequies her Corpse was bury'd in the Church of S. Peter the Martyr.

BUT what more perplex'd King Ferdinand, was the Death of Pope Pius, which happen'd on the 19th of August 1464, which was follow'd the same Year by that of the Duke of Milan, and soon after by that of George Castriote Prince of Albania, his best Friends and greatest Supporters: For Pius being succeeded by the Cardinal of S. Mark, a Venetian, who took the Name of Paul II. naturally avaritious, began to press King Ferdinand for the Payment of the Arrears of Tribute, which was owing to the Church of Rome, and had not been paid for many Years: Ferdinand being oppress'd by the excessive Charges of the late War, and quite exhausted of Money, not only excused himself on account of his Inability to pay them, but he begg'd of the Pope that he would remit them. And at this very time they would have come to an open Rupture, if the Pope, who had a Mind to humble the Sons of the Count of Auguilara, had not wanted the King's Assistance, to whom he made Application for some of his Troops, which Ferdinand readily granted him. But the Expedition against Auguilara's Sons being over, these Differences, which had lain dormant some time, were reviv'd again; for the Pope began to demand the Tributes with more Rigour than he had done at first, and obliged the King to be plain with him, and he not only pretended, that the Tributes ought to be remitted, even upon account of the Charges he had lately been at in giving him Assistance, but that for the future, the Tribute, which formerly amounted to 8000 Ounces yearly, ought to be lessen'd; because formerly that Tribute was not only paid for the Kingdom of Naples, but for that of Sicily; therefore Sicily being in the Possession of John King of Aragon, his Uncle, he ought not to pay the whole Tribute. On the other Hand, the Pope magnify'd the Assistance, which the King had had from his Predecessor, who had kept him in Possession of the Kingdom, and alledged the Investiture given upon that Condition, and the so many Merits of the Church¹. And sometimes the one complaining, sometimes the other, both were waiting a favourable Opportunity to make good their Claims; but Ferdinand, in order to make the Pope yield to his desire, brought another Pretension upon the Carpet, and made pressing Instances for the Restitution of the Towns which the Pope possess'd within the limits of the Kingdom, to wit, Terracina in Terra di Lavoro, and Civita Ducale, Acumoli and Lionessa in Abruzzo, on the Borders of the State of the Church; and that by virtue of the Agreement made in 1443, between Pope Eugene IV. and King Alphonfus, his Father; as also he claim'd the Restitution of Benevento, which he had restor'd to Pope Pius, his good Friend, but had no mind to have a Pope enjoy it, whom he both suspected and hated. The Pope seeing the King thus exasperated, not able either by force or cunning to resist him, immediately sent Cardinal Rovarella, his Legate, to Naples in order to pacify the King, who perform'd his part so well, that for that time there was no more mention made of the Arrears of Tribute, nor of the Restitution of the said Towns.

THERE arose afterwards some other Disputes about the Lordship of Tolfa; for the Pope pretending, that the Rock-alum that grew there was his, besieged the Place; but the King's Army coming unawares, the Pope's Troops immediately raised the Siege and fled¹. The Quarrels, which our Kings have had with the Roman Pontiffs, were always very bitter; they not only pretended, that the Alum of Tolfa, but that which was made in the Fields of Pozzuolo and Agnano belonged to the Apostolical See, of which Controversies Cbioccarello treats in his M. S. Giuridizionali. The Death of Pope Paul, which happen'd on the 18th of July 1471, and the Election of Cardinal Francesco della Rovere, who took the Name of Sixtus IV. put an end to all these Disputes; for Pope Sixtus, provided that Ferdinand's Pretensions should be no more mention'd, in 1475, sent him a Bull, recorded by *Cbioccarello*², wherein he remits him all the Arrears of Tribute; and that during his Life he should not be obliged to pay any, but in lieu of the Tribute, he should be bound to send yearly, on account of the Investiture, a white Spanish Genet, with all his Trappings³; and Ferdinand, finding that this Pope was a Man of a great Spirit, was resolved to be allied to him; and for that End gave the Dutchy of Sora, which he had taken from Giovan-Paolo Cantelmo, to Antonio della Rovere, and gave him in Marriage Catharina, the Daughter of the Prince of Rossano, by Dionora of Aragon, his own Sister.

C H A P. III.

The Splendor of Ferdinand's Royal Household, who having settled Peace and Tranquillity in the Kingdom, improved it with new Laws and Regulations; encouraged learned Men and Learning, and introduced new Arts.

FERDINAND, treading in the Footsteps of King Alphonfus, his Father, and seeing the Kingdom in Peace and Quiet, did not neglect in these happy Years to improve and enrich it with new Arts, and to furnish it with provident Laws and learned Men, famous for all sorts of Sciences, and especially Professors of the Civil and Canon Laws; whence it came, that in his Reign, besides the Splendor of his Royal Family, the Lawyers and Learning were in a most flourishing Condition with us. And Naples, at this time, was in the same glorious State, in which it was in the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou, on account of the many Princes of the Blood that adorn'd his Court. Ferdinand, as well as Charles, had many Sons, who were shining Ornaments of his Royal Household. By Queen Isabella of Chiaromonte, besides Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, appointed to be his Successor in the Kingdom, he had Frederick, a Prince of such Goodness and Wisdom, that his Father first made him Prince of Squillace, then Prince of Taranto, and afterwards of Altamura. He had Francis, whom he created Duke of S. Angelo. He had John, who was made a Cardinal by Sixtus IV. and call'd Cardinal of Aragon. He had also Eleonora and Beatrice, his Daughters, the one married to the Duke of Ferrara, and the other to the King of Hungary.

QUEEN Isabella dying in 1477. King Ferdinand married his Cousin Joan, the Daughter of John King of Aragon, his Uncle, by whom he had only one Daughter, whom he call'd Joan after her Mother. Besides these he had Duke Henry and Duke Cesar, his natural Sons, and some Daughters begotten the same way, whom he married to the chief Lords and Barons of the Kingdom.

TO so many of the Royal Blood of Naples was likewise added the Family of the Duke of Calabria, who, as we have said, being married to Hippolita Sforza, Daughter to the Duke of Milan, had three Children by her, Ferdinand the eldest, Peter and Isabella; but Peter died both before his Father and Grandfather; and Isabella was married to John Galeazzo, Son to John Galeazzo Duke of Milan, who dying, the Son was put under the Guardianship and Tuition of Lewis, his Uncle, who, as shall be told, put Italy all in a Flame, and was the Occasion of so many Revolutions. The Royal Family of Naples in those times had no reason to envy any Court even of the greatest Princes of Europe, and Camillo Tutini, lamenting its Misfortune, in the Supplement of the Vicissitude of Tristano Caracciolo's Fortune, writes, that one day, at a Feast celebrated in Naples, there appear'd above fifty Persons of this Family, insomuch, that it was thought it never could be extinguish'd; and it was supported with the greatest Splendor and Magnificence, as well upon the occasions of solemnizing so many Marriages and Coronations that were made, as with Respect to so many Courts as those Princes of the Blood kept, and the great Number of the superior and inferior Officers of the Royal Household, which was kept up with vast Pomp while the City of Naples was the Royal Seat.

THE Pomp and Splendor of the Royal Family was not only maintain'd, but Ferdinand was resolv'd likewise to restore the Officers of the Crown, whose Offices, being exercised, for the most part, by those rebel Barons, whom he had extinguish'd, by the preceding Revolutions and Confusions, were become vacant. By the Death of the Prince of Taranto, the Office of High Constable being vacant, he invested Francesco del Balzo, Duke of Andria, in it. By the Ruin of the Prince of Rossano, the Office of High Admiral being likewise vacant, he gave it to Roberto Sanseverino, Prince of Salerno. By the Rebellion of Ruggiero Acclocciamuro, he made Antonio Piccolomini, Duke of Amalfi, Lord Chief Justice. He pitch'd upon Onorato Gactano, Count of Fondi, to be Great Prothonotary: Girolamo Sanseverino, Prince of Bisignano, to be Lord High Chamberlain: Giacomo Caracciolo, Count of Brienza, to be Lord High Chancellor; and Pietro di Guevara, Marquis del Vasto, to be Lord High Steward. During the Reign of the Aragonians these Officers were in their antient Splendor and Pre-eminency, but now since Ferdinand had no other Dominions, he therefore endeavour'd to raise their Prerogatives, in order to have his only Kingdom make the more shining Figure.

ALTHOUGH this Prince had dealt very roughly with his Barons upon account of the late Rebellion, and had therefore got the Name of cruel and inhuman; nevertheless, he gain'd the good Will of his Adherents, by raising them to Honours and Dignities. He augmented the Number of Titles, and especially of Counts, of which he created many, for in 1467, he made Matteo di Capua Count of Palena: Scipione Pandone, Count of Venafro: D. Ferrante Guevaro, Count of Belcastro, and many others; so that he encreased the Number of Titles in the Kingdom much more than King Alphonfus had done, as may be plainly seen by the List, which Summonte made, far exceeding those made either in the Reign of Alphonfus, or the other Anjouian Kings, his Predecessors.

HE likewise, as has been said, among the other Orders of Knighthood instituted a new one, call'd dell' Armellino (of the Ermine) with which he was wont to adorn many. He instituted this Order upon account of the Quarrels he had with the Prince of Rossano, who, as we have said, having taken Part with Duke John of Anjou, not able to overcome the Enemy by force, had recourse to Deceit and Treachery; for at the same time, that, by the means of a new Alliance, he had made his Peace with the King, and seem'd to have left Duke John's Party, he enter'd into a new Conspiracy with the Duke against the King; of which Ferdinand being apprised, caused him to be seiz'd, and sent Prisoner to Capua, from whence he was afterwards brought to Naples. Many advis'd the King to order him to be put to Death, but he would not consent, saying, that it was not reasonable to imbrue his Hands in the Blood of his Kinsman, though a Traytor. Afterwards having a Mind to make his generous Sentiments of Clemency known, he devised an Ermine, which so much values the Purity of its whiteness, that it chuseth rather to be taken by the Hunters, than be defiled with the Dirt, which they usually spread about the Mouth of its Hole, in order to catch it. Therefore the King wore a Collar adorned with Gold and Jewels, with an Ermine hanging at it, with this Motto: Malo mori, quam fœdari. In opposition to Duke John and his Knights of the Crescent, Ferdinand instituted this Order of the Ermine, and made many Knights of it; and *Pigna*¹ writes, that among others he made his Son-in-Law, Hercules d'Este, Duke of Ferrara, a Knight Companion of this Order, to whom he sent the Collar by Giorvan-Antonio Caraffa, a Neapolitan Knight.

FERDINAND, besides his having been at so much Pains in adorning the Kingdom, like a provident Prince, who delighted in the Plenty and Riches of his Subjects, facilitated the Traffick of the Merchants, and encouraged their Commerce to all Parts, both of the East and West: but above all, his having introduced into Naples, and improved many Arts, and particularly that of manufacturing Silk, and weaving Cloth of Gold and Silver, ought to be acknowledged by this City as the chief Cause of its Grandeur, and of the encrease of its Citizens and Riches.

THIS Art had already been introduced into many Cities of Italy; therefore after the Death of Queen Isabella, his Wife, in 1465. he resolved to introduce it into Naples also, and having made many skill'd in it to be invited from different Places, at last he pitch'd upon Marino di Cataponte, a Venetian, an experienced Master in this Art, to whom the King having lent a thousand Crowns for carrying on the Work: Cloths of Silk and Gold were woven here; and, in order to encourage this Manufactory the more, he not only exempted every thing that was necessary for this Work from all Duties and Taxes, but likewise the Silk, gold Thread, Cochineal, and whatever was useful either for dying, or weaving, or making Cloth of Gold and Silver²: Besides he commanded, that all the Artificers of this Manufactory should be treated and reputed in every thing as Neapolitans: That in all their Causes, as well Civil as Criminal, they could not be sued before any Tribunal or Officer of Justice, excepting their own Consuls: That all those, of what Nation soever they were, who should come to exercise this Art in Naples, should enjoy the same Liberty, and be judged by their own Consuls only: That all those who had a mind to exercise, or shall exercise this Art, whether they be Merchants, Masters, Apprentices, or Journeymen, must enter themselves into a Roll or Book belonging to their Art, in which, as soon as they are inroll'd, they are to enjoy all the Privileges and Conditions granted, or that shall be granted by the King and his Successors in the Kingdom: That every Year on the Feast of S. George, they shall meet and chuse three Consuls, who every Saturday shall meet and administer Justice to them. Many other Privileges were granted by Ferdinand to this Art and Marino Cataponte. He likewise granted others to Francesco di Nerone, a Florentine, to whom he promised to pay three hundred Ducats, yearly Salary, that he might assist in and exercise this Art in Naples. He also granted other Privileges to Pietro de Conversi, a Genoese, and others to Girolamo di Goriantè, a *Florentine*³. The succeeding Kings likewise ennobled this Art with other Privileges, insomuch that a new Tribunal was erected in Naples, which is call'd, The noble Society of Silk-Weavers. It is composed of the Consuls, a Judge, or their Assistant, and the Advocate Fiscal of the Vicariate may likewise be present⁴. From the Decrees of this Tribunal there's no Appeal but to the S. C. where the Judge makes the Reports standing and bare-headed, nor gets he the Title of Magnifico, as Tasseri says in his Maggazzino Universale.

WE ought not to pass over in silence what *Summonte*⁵ relates in his History of Naples, which was written above a hundred Years ago, that by this Art Naples was so much encreased, and the Kingdom ennobled, that many flocking from all Parts to practise it, and the Natives applying themselves to it, the City was crowded with Inhabitants, the half of which liv'd upon the Profits arising from this Art; for they not only came from the neighbouring Cities and Towns of the Kingdom, but whole Families came from different Parts of Europe, so that in his Time, he says, that the Number of Inhabitants was so great, that the City was enlarged very near a third part more than ever it had been.

THUS writes this Author, when Luxury and Prodigality were not arriv'd at that height and excess we have seen them in our time. At present Things are grown to such a Pitch, that there is not the meanest Wench, or Clown, or Tradesman, but what wear Silk, whereas in the times of those Aragonian Kings, Kings, as the Counsellor Matteo d'Afflitto reports¹, Silk was not worn but by Lords and Ladies.

FERDINAND not only brought this Art among us, but a few Years after, in 1480, he introduced the Woollen Manufactory, and granted much the same Privileges to its Consuls. He order'd, that all those who practis'd that Art, should be enter'd in a Roll or Book, and be judged by their own Consuls only². Therefore another Tribunal was erected, and call'd, The Woollen Manufactory, which is compos'd of the Consuls, and their Judge or Assistant, where the Advocate Fiscal of the Vicariate may be present whenever he thinks fit. Besides, there are no Appeals from their Decrees excepting to the S. C. where the Reports are made in the same manner as those of the Tribunal of the Noble Art of Silk Weaving.

IN the Years 1458, and 1474. Ferdinand also rais'd the Goldsmiths Trade, by allowing them to chuse their own Consuls, to whom he gave Power of inspecting the Faults committed in the Workmanship³; and he prescribed the Methods and Rules whereby to prevent Frauds; being equally solicitous to have all the other Arts flourish, and to prevent deceit.

CHAP. IV.

How the Art of Printing was brought to Naples, and its Improvement. How the Prohibition of Books, or the Licence for Printing them proceeded from thence; and what Abuses crept in, as well with respect to the Prohibition, as the revising of them.

BUT what Naples, the whole Kingdom, and all learned Men ought chiefly to praise this Prince for, was his having been the first who brought the Art of Printing to this City. Ferdinand was not only a Lover of Learning, but likewise a very learned Prince himself; whence it was, that so many learned Men in all Professions flourished in his Reign, as we shall have occasion to mention. The Art of Printing was found out in the Beginning of this Century, about the Year 1428. But if we may give credit to Polydore Virgil, it was invented in 1451. by John Gutterberg, a German, who brought it first to Harlem, a City of Holland. It was afterwards divulged in the Cities of Germany, and in France. Two Brothers, Germans, according to Volteranus, brought it to Italy in the Year 1458. one of them went to Venice and the other to Rome, and the first Books that were printed in Rome were those of S. Augustin, De Civitate Dei, and the Divine Institutions of Laetantius Firmanus. King Ferdinand soon after caus'd it to be brought to Naples. Possaro writes, that in the Year 1473. Arnold of Brussels, a Flemming, brought it hither, who being received by the King with great Marks of Esteem, many Privileges and Franchises were granted him. Others relate, That in the Year 1471. a Priest of Strasburg, named *Sixtus Rufingerus*¹ brought it to us. Be that as it will, Ferdinand encouraged the Artists, and set them at work; so that Books began to be printed in Naples. The first Books that were printed here, were the Commentaries upon the second Book of the Code of the famous Antonio di Alefsandro; and the Books of Angelo Catone of Supino, Professor of Philosophy in Naples, and King Ferdinand's Physician, who having corrected and enlarged the System of Physick, composed by Matteo Salvatico of Salerno, dedicated to King Robert, in 1474, caused it to be printed in Naples by that German, who a little before had brought the Art hither from his own Country¹. Afterwards from time to time other Books were printed, such as the Works of Avello Arcamone upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom, and a great many more.

KING Charles VIII. came afterwards to Italy, and having conquer'd the Kingdom of Naples, where staying six Months, which was exactly the time he kept it, some French Printers, expert in the Art, came quickly hither, and brought it to a much greater Perfection, reducing it to a better Form, whereby it became more correct than it had been formerly. Thus by degrees, as it usually happens to all other Arts, it was brought to a more noble Form with us, as may be seen by the Impression of some Books printed in those times, and among the rest of Sannazaro's Arcadia, which Pietro Summonte, his Friend, while the Author was in France following the Fortune of King Frederick, his Master, caused to be reprinted in Naples upon very fine Paper, with an excellent Character, it having been twice printed at Venice full of Errors, and very incorrect: Nevertheless, Summonte desired the Cardinal of Aragon, to whom he dedicated it, to excuse him, if the Print was not so fine, as formerly it used to be in Naples, and as was then usual in the other more peaceable Cities of Italy; for Naples being all in Confusion by reason of the Wars and Revolutions, it was with difficulty he had got the use of that Character.

BUT the Emperor Charles V. coming afterwards to Naples, at the Persuasion and Solicitation of the famous Agostino Nifo da Sessa, a renowned Philosopher, and the Emperor's Physician, this Art was much more encouraged and improved; for in the Year 1536, this Emperor granted great Privileges and Immunities to it and its Professors, exempting them from all Duties, Taxes, or other Payments whatsoever, as well for Paper and Characters, as for all other Things necessary for bringing the Art to Perfection; of which Privileges, besides *Summonte*², among our Writers, *Toro*³, and the Counsellor *Altimari*⁴, bear witness. So that by the Encouragement of this Prince, the Art of Printing was promoted in Naples: The learned Men seeing themselves so much countenanced, endeavour'd to shew their Talents in print; for the Books of the Antients, which had formerly been written with the Pen upon Parchment, and were scarce, being now printed, turn'd to their great Advantage, not only by having Books easily, but also very correct. Whence the Academies began to flourish, and the Number of learned Men encrease not only in Naples, but in the other Cities of the Kingdom, whither the Art of Printing had likewise been carry'd, such as Aquila, Leccce, Cosenza, Bari, Benevento, and some others. And the Editions proved most correct, upon fine Paper, and of excellent Characters, as may be seen by some Books printed in those times; and among the rest, by the Poems of Bernardina Rota; the Law Works of Cesare Costa, Archbishop of Capua, and many others, of which first Editions there are many Copies in the Library of the S. Domenico Maggiore of this City.

AS the Invention of this Art was look'd upon in those times to be extremely useful and necessary for the Communication of Learning, so in the subsequent times it became equally prejudicial; for Men being taken up in reading of so many Books as were publish'd, though they loaded their Memories with infinite Erudition, yet they fail'd in Judgment and Invention, so that there appear'd but seldom Men of great Genius, who by making a good use of their Talents, were able of themselves to improve the Arts and Sciences. Besides, in the preceding Century it was the occasion of bringing Inconveniencies and Confusions among us; for all pretending to be learned and judicious, by reason of the readiness of Printing, and the small Charges, Men of Letters were seiz'd with an universal Itch for printing whatever happen'd to be the Product of their Fancies or Pens, in whatsoever Profession; so that in the seventeenth Century, an infinite number of Volumes were publish'd in print, for the most part by the Monks and Lawyers, generally insipid, and stuffed with vain and trifling Things. The Printers encouraged them, and in order to make their Charges the more easy, they caused a Paper of a worse sort to be made, which they made use of in printing their Books, and which they afterwards call'd Printing-Paper. But for all that, they did not leave off making use of the finest Paper and Characters upon other Occasions. Such is the Greediness and Avarice of the Tax-gatherers of our Times, that notwithstanding the Emperor Charles V. had exempted the Printers from paying Duty for the fine Paper, which they were to use in Printing, yet they pretend that that Exemption ought to be confin'd to the Printing Paper, and not extended to the Paper of a better Quality; as if the last could not be made use of in Printing, or that, before the first was invented, the fine Paper had not been, at all times, used in Printing the Works of the Learned.

S E C T. I.

Abuses in the Liberty of the Press, and Prohibition of Books.

THE useful Art of Printing, from which the World has reap'd so many Advantages, by the Corruption of Authors, and the Facility and Readiness, which many had in publishing the Productions of their Brains, was afterwards perverted to a bad use. The Heresy of Luther, which being spread over Germany, and diverse Books dispersed by means of the Press, threaten'd the other Parts of Europe: Therefore it was necessary for the Princes to have a watchful Eye upon it, and to regulate the use of it by Laws. The Popes, as being liable to receive greater Detriment from the Liberty of the Press, than secular Princes, kept a very strict Eye upon it: Therefore, after the Art of Printing came to be practis'd, both the Popes and Princes, at different times, made many Prohibitions and Restrictions.

BUT the Popes afterwards attempted to make Encroachments with respect to these Prohibitions; for they pretended, that they only had a Right either to forbid Printing, even upon Pain of temporal Punishment, or to grant the Liberty of the Press. Cardinal Baronius, in the XII. Tome of his Annals (writing in his own Defence, when Philip III. prohibited his XI. Tome, in which, though he had little Reason, he must needs impugn the Monarchy of Sicily) was the first that boldly maintain'd it¹; but being suitably chastis'd by that Prince, none dar'd to defend what the Cardinal had advanced: For, as we have said in the second Book of this History, the ancient Discipline of the Church was, that when Religion was the Matter in question, the Censure belonged to the Bishops, but the Prohibition to the Prince. The Emperors, after the Censure of the Bishops and Council, prohibited the Books of Hereticks upon Pain of temporal Punishment, and condemned them to the Flames; of which we have many Examples in the Theodosian Code. The Fathers of the Council of Nice first condemned the Books of Arius; and then Constantine the Great made an Edict, prohibiting and condemning them to be burnt; and the Books of Porphyry had the same Fate². The Fathers of the Council of Ephesus condemn'd the Writings of Nestorius, and the Emperor publish'd a Law prohibiting the reading of them³. The Council of Chalcedon condemn'd the Writings of Eutyches; and the Emperors Valentinian and Marcian made Laws condemning them to be burnt⁴. The same was practis'd by Charles the Great⁵, and by other Princes in their Dominions. And to come nearer to our own Times, in 1550, Charles V. publish'd a terrible Edict in Brussels against the Lutherans, in which, among other Things, he rigorously prohibited the Books of Luther, Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, Bucer, and John Calvin, which had been printed thirty Years before, and all Books of that kind, which had been mark'd in an Index made by the Divines of Louvain for the purpose⁶; for it is the Province of Princes to secure their Dominions from being disturb'd, not only by satyrical, seditious and scandalous Books, or such as are stuffed with false Doctrine, but also from being poison'd by pernicious Heresies. And as the Censure belongs to the Bishops, that the Discipline and Doctrine of the Church may not be corrupted; so it concerns Princes to take care that the State be not corrupted, nor their Subjects infected with Opinions repugnant to good Government; against which they have more reason to guard now than ever, when there are so many new Doctrines introduced contrary to those of the Antients, as well as their Interests and supreme Regalia; for from those arise Opinions that occasion Parties, which afterwards end in Factions, and at last in cruel Wars. They are Words 'tis true, but which by consequence have often drawn Armies to the Field.

OUR Kings have always vigorously opposed those Attempts, and the Censure alone was left to the Bishops, but they could not prohibit Printing upon pain of temporal Punishment; nor did those Prohibitions belong to them, for they were made by our Kings and their Viceroys, and such has always been the practice.

ON the fourth of May 1525. Pope Leo X. publish'd a Bull, which he got the Lateran Council to approve of, whereby he prohibited Books to be printed without a Licence from the Ordinaries and Inquisitors of the Cities, where they were to be printed; upon this Penalty, that those who should print without such Licence should lose the Books, which were to be burnt. Moreover he imposed a pecuniary Mulct of a hundred Ducats to be paid by the Transgressors to the Fabrick of S. Peter's Church at Rome; and that the Printers should be suspended for a Year from exercising their Employment: He likewise declared them excommunicated, and if they continued under the Censure, they were to be punish'd according as the Laws require.

BUT this Bull, as to the pecuniary Mulct, the Suspension, and the loss of the Books, did not take place in our Kingdom, and was only in force in the State of the Church.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Council of Trent, in the fourth Session, which was open'd the eighth of April 1547, had prohibited the Printers to print the Books of the Holy Scripture, Annotations and Expositions upon it without Licence of the superior Ecclesiasticks; and that they should not print Books treating of sacred Things without the Name of the Author; nor sell, nor keep them unless they shall be first examined and approved by the Ordinaries upon pain of those pecuniary Mulcts and Excommunication imposed by the last Lateran Council; yet, with respect to that Article of the pecuniary Mulct, it was not receiv'd in our Kingdom, and the Power of imposing spiritual Punishment was only left to the Ordinaries.

OUR Kings, or their Viceroys, kept Possession of such Prohibitions, and establish'd many Statutes and Edicts, whereby they prohibited Printing without their Licence; and we find, that D. Pedro de Toledo, the Viceroy, in the Reign of the Emperor Charles V. made Regulations also concerning the printing of Books; and on the fifteenth of October 1544, he publish'd an Edict, whereby he ordain'd, that seeing the pestilentious Heresy of Luther was spread in Germany, and began to corrupt the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of Rome, Books of Divinity and the Holy Scripture, that should be found to have been printed within these twenty five Years last past, should not be re-printed, and such as had been printed within that time should not be kept, or sold, unless they be first shewn to the Chaplain Major, that, they being revised and examined by him, he may order such of them to be publish'd as he shall think fit. Moreover, that those Books of Divinity, and the Holy Scripture, that have been printed without the Name of the Author, and those likewise whose Authors have not been approv'd, should not by any means be sold or kept. And on the thirtieth of November 1550. he publish'd another Edict, whereby he commanded, that no Book whatsoever should be printed or sold without the Viceroy's Licence.

THE Duke d'Ossuna, the Viceroy, at the same time that Pope Sixtus V. establish'd the Congregation of the Index, on the twentieth of March 1586. in the Reign of Philip II. publish'd another Edict, whereby he ordain'd, that Neapolitan Authors, or such as liv'd in the Kingdom, should not cause Books to be printed either in, or out of the Kingdom, without the Viceroy's Licence in Scriptis. And lastly, the Count of Olivares, who was Viceroy in the Reign of Philip III. on the thirty first of August 1598. put forth an Edict, prohibiting Printers to open their Presses, or Printing-Houses, without an express Licence from the Viceroy in Scriptis.

WHENCE came the Custom with us, of a Minister, or other Person being appointed by the Viceroy for revising Books; and this has been practised ever since the time of the Duke d'Alcala, the Viceroy, who, on the twenty third of November 1561. sent a Commission, which was afterwards renewed on the eighth of May 1562. to P. Valerio Malvasino, a Person, whom he knew to be of great Integrity and Learning, appointing him Royal Commissary for revising and examining Books imported into the Kingdom from Germany, France, and other Parts; that finding them infected with Heresy, he might prohibit them to be sold or kept¹. Afterwards a Minister of State of known Zeal for the King's Service, and of eminent Learning was appointed; which Custom we find continued to the Time of our Grandfathers; but now these Revisals are usually committed to private Persons, and often to Men of little Veracity and much less Learning; which is an Abuse that deserves a proper Remedy.

THERE is a Custom which still prevails with us of prohibiting Books containing any thing contrary to good Manners, the Rights of the Prince, or the Nation, or against the good Name and Reputation of any Person; as in our time the Viceroy and his Collateral Council prohibited a most nonsensical Book, and stuffed with silly ridiculous things, publish'd by the Marquis Gagliati, with this Title, Capricciose Fantasia.

THOSE Prohibitions were, and are still practised against any Book or Writing whatever, even penn'd by Prelates or other Ecclesiastical Persons, being design'd for the Press. In the Reign of Philip II. the Pope's Nuncio residing in Spain, complain'd to that King of the Duke d'Alcala, his Viceroy in Naples, who had prohibited the Printers to print any thing without his Licence, whereby the Archbishop of Naples, and all the other Prelates of the Kingdom were hinder'd from printing such Things as concern'd their Offices: Of which King Philip wrote to the Duke, who, on the seventeenth of April 1569. sent him a full account of the Matter, telling him, that he had publish'd that Order, because the Vicar of Naples, as well as all the other Prelates of the Kingdom, had caused many Edicts to be printed, which were prejudicial to the Royal Jurisdiction, as also Bulls, to which the Exequatur Regium had not been obtain'd². The Nuncio's Mouth being thereby stopt, afterwards, whenever the Bishops had a Mind to print the Acts of their Synods, Edicts, or Briefs of Indulgencies granted by the Pope to their Churches, and such like Things, had recourse to the Viceroy and his Collateral Council for a Licence. So we read, that Annibale di Capua, Archbishop of Naples, having a Mind to cause the Acts of a Provincial Council to be printed, on the first of February 1580, sought a Licence from the Collateral Council, which was given him with this Reservation, that if there was any thing in them contrary to the Royal Jurisdiction, the Licence should be looked upon as void, and of no force. The Archbishop of Capua, by means of the Vicar, sought Liberty to get a new Kalendar printed, concerning the observance of the Feasts of his Diocess, and having given it to be revised by the Chaplain Major, he on the fifth of November 1582. made a Report of it to the Viceroy, that Liberty might be given.

The Bishop of Avellino asked the Exequatur Regium, and a Licence for printing a Brief of Indulgence granted by the Pope to his Church on the Feast of S. Modestinus; and having committed the Affair to the Chaplain Major, he on the twenty sixth of April 1577. made a Report to the Viceroy, that he might give the Exequatur to the Brief, and a Licence for printing it². This has always been observed since that time, as often as the King's Ministers have paid any regard to their Duty, and have had their Master's Service at heart.

Abuses committed in Rome, with respect to the Prohibition of Books which they pretend ought to be implicitly obey'd.

WE must likewise confute another Pretension of the Court of Rome, concerning the same Subject of the Prohibition of Books. They pretended that Christian Princes ought implicitly to make all the Decrees take place in their Dominions which were pronounced in Rome by the Congregation of the Holy Office of the Index, whereby Books were prohibited, and that those Decrees were not subject to their Placita Regia, so that they ought to be put in execution by us, without the Exequatur Regium. The Necessity and Justice of which shall be at large treated of in the following Books of this History.

BUT that has been vigorously opposed, as a most prejudicial Attempt upon the Sovereignty of Princes, not only in France, Spain, Germany, Flanders, and in all the other Dominions of Catholick Princes, but in our Kingdom, as often as it has been duly observ'd; insomuch, that all the Bulls, Rescripts, and other Provisions that come from Rome, are not allow'd to be publish'd and receiv'd without the Placitum Regium: So likewise the Decrees made for prohibiting Books are liable to the same Examination. But if ever Princes and their Ministers ought to have a watchful Eye upon the other Writs that come from Rome, they ought to have yet more strict upon these Decrees; as well because the Method of prohibiting Books in Rome is well known, as also the end for which they are prohibited, and the Disorders and Scandals which such Prohibitions might occasion in their Dominions if they should suffer them implicitly to take place.

'TIS well known, that the Cardinals, of which these two Congregations are composed, whence such Decrees proceed, do not examine those Books: Some by reason of their Insufficiency, others because they are diverted by Employments, which they look upon to be of greater importance, cannot apply themselves to those Affairs; and much less the Pope, of whom it would be Impertinence to expect it. They commit the Examination to some Divines, whom they call Consultori or Qualificatori, for the most part Monks, who, according to the Prejudices of their Schools, regulate their Censures. Whatever does not quadrate with their Maxims, they look upon as Novelty, and, as heretical Opinions, condemn them. The Casuists, who have made Morals to answer their own ends, judge also according to their own Principles. But the greatest Inconvenience arises, when the Examination of Books concerning Matters of Jurisdiction is committed to the Curiali, [certain Officers belonging to the Pope] and the Officers and Prelates of this Court; it may be easily imagin'd, how far Flattery in raising the ecclesiastical, and depressing the temporal Jurisdiction, may prevail in that case. 'Tis well known to what an extravagant pitch they exalt the Pope above all other Princes of the Earth, and do not stick to say, that the Pope can do every thing, and that his Will is a Rule and Law in all things: That Princes and Magistrates are human Inventions; and that they are to be obey'd by force only; so that to disobey their Laws, to cheat them in their Taxes and publick Revenues, is not sinful, but only subjects the Transgressors to Punishment, which by Flight or Deceit they may shun, without being guilty in the Sight of God, the risk they run being a sufficient Atonement: But on the contrary, that the least Nod of the Ecclesiasticks, without any more ado, ought to be taken for a Divine Precept, and as binding upon the Conscience. They are extremely watchful and solicitous, that nothing be publish'd contrary to their ill conceived Opinions. And long Experience has taught every Body, that the Court of Rome studies nothing so much as to prohibit all Books, which by maintaining the Rights of Princes, their Prerogatives, Statutes, the Customs of Places, and the Privileges of their Subjects, contradict these their new Maxims and pernicious Doctrines.

THESE Qualificatori having made their Censures, carry them to the Cardinals, who, without examining them, agreeably thereto, condemn the Books. And the Style at present, in which these Decrees are written, is likewise very partial.

tial: A Book is finally condemned, without censure, without expressing, or pointing out any particular Error, which, perhaps, might have given occasion to the Prohibition, but in general, as containing heretical, schismatical, and erroneous Propositions, contrary to good Manners, offensive to pious Ears, and such like things: And without taking the trouble to specify which are heretical, erroneous, &c. they bring themselves off with one word, respective, leaving the Authors and Readers in the same uncertainty and obscurity as before. Experience has taught us, that by these kinds of Prohibitions grievous Disputes have arisen among Divines themselves, which have frequently disturbed the State; for the Monks obstinately maintaining the contrary Opinion, their Quarrels and Disputes have never ended.

TO these Decrees there are usually added some penal Clauses against the Readers and Keepers of prohibited Books, which often touch upon the temporal Concerns of Subjects, or disturb the Privileges and Customs of Nations. Frequently on account of some Errors which are found scatter'd here and there in a Book, which would be most useful to Professors and the Commonwealth, the whole Book is prohibited, so that the State is thereby very much prejudiced.

FOR these and many other Reasons, not only the most judicious Divines¹, but the unalterable Practice of all the Nations of Europe, have made it evident, that it concerns a Prince to keep as strict a watch over these Decrees, as over any other Provisions that come from Rome. No Decree whatsoever sent from Rome by these Congregations, nor Edict made by the Master of the sacred Palace, whereby Books have been prohibited, was exempted from the Placitum Regium, but was always liable to Examination; as the Custom of all the Nations of Christendom, which had its rise ever since these Prohibitions began to be sent from Rome, demonstrates. And it appears by the Index itself, commonly call'd, The Index of Trent, order'd to be made by Pope Pius IV. soon after the Council was ended, that the said Custom was practis'd.

ACCORDING to the antient Discipline of the Church, the Censure of Books belong'd to the Councils, pursuant to which the Councils of Nice, Ephesus, and Chalcedon condemn'd the Books of Arrius, Nestorius and Eutyches. The Fathers of the Council of Trent having a Mind to tread in the same Steps, after it had been resum'd under Pope Pius IV. propos'd in a Congregation held in Trent, on the twenty sixth of January 1562. that the Books publish'd since the Heresy had been broach'd in Germany, and elsewhere, should be examin'd, and subjected to the Council, to the end that what should seem meet might be determin'd: It was concluded, that the care of making a Catalogue, or Index, of them, and the their Authors should be committed to some Fathers; and accordingly a Commission was given by the Presidents to eighteen Fathers, who afterwards, by a Decree of the Council, were charged diligently to examine the Books, and then to report to the Synod what they had observ'd, in order to provide against them². The Conclusion of the Council being afterwards hurry'd on, nothing else was done in the Affair of the Index, but only on the very last day the Decree of the eighteenth Session being read, it was ordain'd, that, because of the vast number and variety of Books, the Council not being able to go through that Affair, whatever the Fathers appointed to make the Index, had done, should be by them laid before the Pope, by whose Authority and Opinion the Index should be determined and published.

HEREUPON the Council being dissolv'd, the Fathers presented to Pope Pius IV. an Index, wherein were pointed out the Authors and Books, which they judged ought to be prohibited. The Pope, as appears from his Bull published for that purpose in form of a Brief, which begins: Dominici Gregis, order'd the Index to be examin'd by other learned Prelates, and says, That he himself had read it; therefore he caus'd it to be publish'd with some Rules, which for that reason are call'd, The Rules of the Index, in which Bull he commands, that the said Index, with the Rules thereto annex'd, be receiv'd and observ'd by all Persons upon pain of the most severe Punishments and Censures. All those, who shall read or keep the Books contain'd in this Index, are threatn'd: He declares, that three Months after the Bull shall be publish'd and affix'd in Rome, this Prohibition shall be binding upon all Persons in the same manner, *ac si ipsimet hæ literæ editæ, lætaque fuissent*¹.

THIS Index was divided into three Classes. In the first, the Names of the Authors were only set down, but not of the Books, that every Body might know, that not only the Works already printed were prohibited, but such likewise as should be publish'd by them hereafter. In the second are pointed out the Books, which, on account of the corrupt and suspected Doctrine contain'd in them, are rejected, though the Authors be not separated from the Church. The third comprehends those Books, which had been publish'd without the Names of the Authors, and which contain Doctrine contrary to good Discipline and the Church of Rome, therefore it was thought fit to condemn them.

BUT upon the Publication of the Decrees of the Council in Rome, as those concerning Discipline and Reformation were not generally receiv'd in other Countries of Europe, as shall be mention'd in its place, so likewise upon the Publication of this Index in Rome, notwithstanding the Bull of Pope Pius, it was not receiv'd nor accepted in all its parts in France, Spain, Flanders, and other Christian Countries.

THE Index was given to be examin'd by the Colleges, by the Universities, and by the most learned Men of each Country. In France, 'tis well known, that the University would have nothing to do with it, nor did they receive it in its full Extent.

KING Philip II. caused it also to be examin'd by his Colleges and Universities in Spain, neither was it wholly received here; for among other Books, the Works of Carolus Molinæus, inserted in the Index of Trent among the Authors of the first Class, were not all prohibited, some were allowed, others, with a little Castration, were also permitted. Whence came in Spain and elsewhere the Indices Expurgatorii, for the Prelates, Universities and Colleges of each Country were desirous of having a Hand in it, and were of Opinion, that their Censures might be better adapted to the Countries they liv'd in, and that the Prince could better judge of what might produce quiet, or hurt, or disorder to his State, than Strangers. Thus was the Custom of making these Indices introduced into Spain. And from the Index Expurgatorius, which Cardinal Gaspar de Quiroga, Archbishop of Toledo, and Inquisitor General of Spain, order'd to be made, and printed in 1601. it manifestly appears, that the Index of Trent was never wholly, and according to its full extent, receiv'd in *Spain*².

BESIDES this, Philip II. resolved to take the same care in his other Dominions as he had done in those of Spain; and as he had good Reasons for thus treating the Decrees of the Council, so he had much greater for ordering the Index of Trent to be dealt with in the same manner. When it was publish'd in Flanders, it was not implicitly receiv'd, but by Royal Authority was given to be examin'd. And it being found that many Books of all Faculties and Sciences were thereby prohibited, which being castrated and purg'd of some Errors and false Opinions, might prove very useful, and turn to great Advantage: *Van-Espen*³, a learned Priest, and great Divine of the University of Louvain, relates, that the Duke d'Alva, then Governor of the Spanish Flanders, in Name of King Philip II. order'd, that those Books condemn'd by the Roman Index should be preserv'd, and only caused the Works of Hereticks to be burnt. But that those Books, thus preserv'd, might not produce ill Consequences, he enjoyn'd the Prelates, Universities, and the learned Men of those Provinces to examine the Books, mark and expunge the Errors, and to make a particular Index of them. He instituted a College of Censors in Antwerp, wherein a Bishop presided for the Ecclesiastical State; and in the King's Name the celebrated Divine Arias Montanus was appointed to preside, the same who had assisted in the Council of Trent. These Censors, with great Care and mature Deliberation, re-examin'd the Books contain'd in those Catalogues, compared the Places mark'd by the first Censors, with the Originals, and compos'd an exact Censure of them, putting forth afterwards a Book, to which they gave this Title, Index Expurgatorius. In 1570. this Index, by a special Writ was approved of by King Philip II. and by his Royal Authority order'd to be printed, which was accordingly done, and all those Provinces made use of it afterwards, and not of the Roman Index. These two Indices differ'd from each other: In this Index Expurgatorius of Flanders, many Books, that by the Roman Index had been absolutely condemn'd, after a small Castration and Correction, were approved of, and allow'd to be read; such as, to pass over many others, the Works of Carolus Molinæus, altogether prohibited, and wholly condemn'd by the Roman Index, which, with a small Correction, were allow'd of. The Commentary of the same Molinæus was preserved intire, without the least Correction, it being said; In hoc opere nihil est, quod hæresin sapiat, quapropter admittitur. As for his Treatises, De donatione, & inofficioso testamento; it was likewise said: Nihil habent, quod Religioni adversetur, aut pias aures offendere possit, quapropter admittuntur. And the same Judgment was given of many other of his Works.

THIS was the Practice, which began in the Dominions of Christian Princes, at the same time that they began in Rome to make the prohibitory Indices of Books. It was much more in use afterwards, when the Princes found, that they were very intent upon this Affair at Rome, and that they had begun to pretend to the sole Power of prohibiting Books, and that without any other Publication and Acceptation, than what was made in Rome; whatever was there establish'd was to take place in all other Countries. For which end, in the Pontificate of Sixtus V. a new Congregation of Cardinals was instituted, call'd the Congregation of the Index: And both this, and that of the Holy Office, and the Master of the Sacred Apostolical Palace had nothing else to mind. But for all that, the Princes did not fail to assert their Right and Prerogatives in their Dominions, as well in not suffering any Book to be printed without their Licence, nor the Prohibitions of Rome to take place without the Exequatur Regium, as in prohibiting Books themselves, as above.

THEY grew much more vigilant, when they perceived, that Prohibitions were more frequent in Rome, than formerly; and that whatever Book was publish'd, wherein the Rights of any Prince were defended, or the Encroachments of the Court of Rome upon the Authority and Jurisdiction of Princes, and the Law of Nations were expos'd: The Decrees of the Congregation of the Index, and the Edicts of the Master of the Sacred Palace were ready to prohibit it.

FOR which Cause they were upon their guard not to suffer such Prohibitions to take place in their Dominions. The Kings of Spain, according to *Salgadus*¹, as well as the Kings of France, having been apprised, that such Books were altogether prohibited in Rome, only because they maintain'd the Regalia and Jurisdiction of Kings, and the Rights of their Subjects, in order to remedy so great a Grievance, order'd, That the Apostolical Briefs, and such like Decrees, should be carried to the supreme Inquisition of Spain, and, according to the most usual Custom of the Kingdoms of Spain, be kept there, and that they should not be suffer'd to be publish'd, and much less put in execution, that the Consciences of the Subjects might not be insnar'd by these Prohibitions, intended for no other end, but to destroy the Rights of Princes and the Law of Nations.

THEY order'd the same to be practis'd in the Provinces of Flanders, and, what is worthy of Observation, likewise in our Kingdom of Naples, so near Rome, where the Spaniards, in order to obtain the better terms for their own Kingdoms of Spain, frequently suffer'd the Court of Rome to commit Insults.

POPE Clement VIII. augmented the Roman Index more than Sixtus V. had done, and having caused it to be printed and published anew, during all the time of his Pontificate, kept the Congregation of the Index, and the Master of the Sacred Palace, so employ'd, that there was not a Year, but prohibitory Decrees and Edicts were issued in Rome. From the Year 1601. to the end of his Pontificate, nothing else was put forth in Rome but these Decrees and Edicts, whereby many Books, upon almost all Arts and Sciences, were successively prohibited, only because, either the Authors were separated from the Church, or because they maintain'd the Regalia, or other Rights of Princes, or that some Error had been overlook'd. Many Law Books were prohibited, among the rest, with great Rigour, the Works of Molinæus, the Treatises of Alberico Gentile, Giovanni Casio, Scipione Gentile, and of many others.

AMONGST these our Regent Camillo de Curte, who, as shall be told, was one of the most renown'd of our Professors in those times, in 1605, publish'd in Naples a Work of his intitled, Diversorij Juris Feudalis prima, & secunda Pars: In the second part of which he treats of the Remedies, which are wont to be applied in the Kingdom for the Defence of the Royal Jurisdiction, that the Royal Rights might receive no Injury, nor the Subjects be oppress'd by the Prelates, by usurping the Royal Jurisdiction: In this Book he lays down the wonted Method, by long Custom establish'd, for resisting them; to wit, at first to send them one, two, or three perswasory Letters; and when these prove ineffectual, to summon them; and upon their not obeying, to sequestrate their Temporalties, and imprison their nearest Relations, Servants, and even their Friends: and lastly, in case they continue obstinate, to turn them out of the Kingdom. Methods lawful, allow'd, and approv'd of by the ancient practice of all the Kingdoms of Europe. But the Book was no sooner publish'd, than the same very Year an Edict was sent from Rome, whereby, among other Books, this is likewise strictly prohibited in these Words: *Camilli de Curtis secunda pars Diversorii, sive Comprensorii juris Feudalis, Neapoli apud Constantinum vitalem 1605, omnino & sub anathemate prohibetur*¹.

THE Count of Benevente, who was then Viceroy of Naples, hearing of the Prohibition, by no means would grant the Exequatur to the Edict; on the contrary, on the fourteenth of December the same Year, he sent a serious Advice to King Philip III. wherein, among other things that occur'd in Matters of Jurisdiction, he gave him an account of this Prohibition of the Regent's Book made in Rome, only because in it were shewn the Remedies and Rights, which his Majesty has upon the like occasions, representing to him, that of necessity he must make use of strong and effectual Remedies against this Abuse, because if it were suffer'd, none would take in Hand to defend the Royal Jurisdiction².

MOREOVER in 1627. in the Pontificate of Urban VIII. on the fourth of February, the Congregation of the Index put forth a Decree, wherein, besides, the Prohibition of some Law Treatises, written by Treutlerus and Hugo Grotius, and of the History of the Pontifical Jurisdiction by Michael Roussel, a Book was likewise prohibited, which D. Pietro Urries had then publish'd in Naples in Defence of the 235th Usage of our High Court of the Vacariate, concerning the necessary Requisites of the Clergy, of which that Tribunal has the Cognizance; and because that Usage, though antient, however never interrupted, opposeth the new Maxims of the Court of Rome, the Book was immediately prohibited in Rome under this Title: *Petri de Urries liber inscriptus: Aestimatum ad repetitionem Ritus 235, M. C. Vicariæ Neapolitanæ*³. But the Duke d'Alva, then Viceroy, did not suffer that Decree to take Effect in the Kingdom, but wrote of it to the King, from whom he receiv'd an Answer on the tenth of August the same Year, wherein he seem'd surpriz'd at the Prohibition of that Book in Rome, which only defended the most antient usage of the Vicariate of the Kingdom⁴.

THIS Vigilance was observed with us, whenever we had resolved to maintain our Rights, and the Laws and Constitution of our Native Country; for, that the Bulls, Briefs, Decrees, Edicts, and in short, all Provisions coming from Rome might not be receiv'd without the Exequatur Regium, we have a written Law made by the Duke d'Alcala, when he was Viceroy, and which we read in the Volumes of our printed Statutes⁵: A Requisite, which, in Conformity to the Law, was necessary, and practis'd even with respect to the Decrees, which came from Rome, whereby Books were prohibited; and in that our Kingdom has no reason to envy either France, or Spain, or Flanders, or the best instituted and regulated State in all the Catholick World.

'TIS well known, that such Bulls, or prohibitory Decrees of Rome are of no force in France: They are nicely examin'd, and if they are found to be just, they are put in execution, if otherwise, they are rejected. Of this we cannot have a clearer Proof than in the Case of the Prohibition of the Works of Carolus Molinæus. The Court of Rome having found that notwithstanding the Roman Index, whereby they were altogether prohibited, yet they were read in all the Kingdoms of Europe, particularly in France and Flanders, whose Universities and Censors, having only purged them of some Errors, approved of them, so that they were in the Hands of all the Lawyers and learned Men, and held in great Esteem: Clement VIII. looking upon this as a great Contempt of the Apostolical See, on the twenty first of August 1602, put forth a most terrible Bull, whereby, upon most grievous Pains and Censures, he anew absolutely prohibited all his Books, even those that had been purged, saying, that Non aliter quam igne expurgari possint. In the mean time he revoked all the Licences given, and order'd, that none should be given for the time to come. Whence proceeded the modern Style of the Congregations of the Holy Office, and the Index, that in the Licences, which are granted, though most ample, to read the most obscene and pernicious Books, they always add: Exceptis operibus Caroli Molinæi. This Bull was publish'd in the usual manner in Rome on the twenty sixth of August 1602, and affixt ad valvas Basilicæ Principis Apostolorum in acie Campi Floræ, adding, that upon all, Ita ardent, ac afficiant, perinde ac si omnibus, & singulis intimatæ fuissent.

But to what Purpose? This Bull took no Effect either in France, or Flanders, or any where else: The Works of this renown'd Lawyer lost nothing of their value, nor were the Professors less fond of them than before, all Lawyers and all Practitioners had them in their Hands, and this Author was more studied, and more frequently quoted at the Bar, than Bartolus or Baldus: and he became so necessary, that, as Bertrandus Loth. writes¹, in France and Flanders, no famous Practitioner or Advocate could be without him, particularly in Artois, where the Customs of that Province being the same with those of Paris, the Writings of this Author are more esteem'd than those of any other, and have gain'd great Authority in their Tribunals.

THEY are so familiar to the French Lawyers, that there is no Harangue or Discourse upon any Subject whatever, whether of the Civil or Canon Laws, but what are full of Quotations taken from them. But the most convincing Proof, that such a Prohibition was not regarded in France, is, that beautiful and correct Edition of all the Works of this Author lately printed at Paris, by the Labour and Diligence of Francis Pinson, the younger, a famous Advocate of that City, who, besides his having added to them some very learned Notes of his own, and adapted to the modern Practice, subjoin'd likewise to the said Works some others concerning Ecclesiastical Matters, which make up the fourth and fifth Tomes. This Edition was publish'd in Paris in five Volumes, with the King's express Privilege, that it might the more plainly appear, that the Prohibition of Rome was not in the least regarded in France.

AND indeed the Works of this Author did not deserve so severe a Censure, for, though in his Life-time he did not comply with the Church of Rome, yet he died a Catholick; and, as *Van-Espen*², very much to the purpose, observes, if the Works of Gentiles, though full of Obscenity and Filthiness, apt to corrupt the Manners of Youth, are allow'd; why should not the Works of a Lawyer so renown'd for Gravity and Learning be allow'd, since so great Profit may be reap'd from the reading of them? So much the rather, that tho' there be some things interspersed in them that are not agreeable to the Doctrine of the Church of Rome, yet Gabriel de Pinau and Francis Pinson have remedied that by their Notes and Animadversions, so that Youth are in much more Danger of being corrupted by the reading of the lascivious Books of Gentiles, than a Christian Lawyer can be of deviating from the Doctrine of the Catholick Church by reading them.

OTHER Instances not less remarkable and convincing might be alledged both from France and the Provinces of Flanders: Such as the Prohibition made in Rome of the Book of Cornelius Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres, intitled, Augustinus, and the Bull issued out on that Account in the Year 1643, by Pope Urban VIII. which begins In Eminenti. The Decrees pronounced in Rome on the sixth of September 1657. by the Congregation of the Holy Office, whereby, among others, the Letters, commonly call'd the Provincial Letters, were prohibited: The Bull of Alexander VII. publish'd in Rome 1665, whereby two Censures of the Faculty of Doctors of Paris were condemn'd, none of which were regarded either in France or Flanders, and many others, of which Van-Espen treats at large¹.

NEVERTHELESS we have thought fit, on this occasion, to observe, that all the Princes of Europe have been very vigilant, that Books which defend their Jurisdiction, and the Privileges of their People, might not be prohibited by Rome; and though they have been prohibited, they never allow'd such Prohibitions to take place, nor the Decrees to be receiv'd in their Dominions, so that without scruple they are read, and the Prohibitions slighted; for they have discover'd the Secret of Rome, and of what Importance it is to them, that their Subjects be not tainted with Opinions repugnant to good Government.

IN the Kingdoms of Spain, as we have said, the Decrees sent thither from Rome prohibiting Books, which defend the Royal Authority, are stopt, and the Execution suspended².

NOTHING is more evident in France, and amongst the Proofs of the Liberty of the *Gallican Church*³, we read a Speech made by Dominick Talon, the King's Advocate, in the Royal Council, upon occasion of such a Decree issued from the Congregations of the Holy Office and Index, wherein he shews, that such Decrees ought not to be publish'd, as being extremely prejudicial to the Crown and State; and observes, that the publishing of them would occasion great Disorders; for these Congregations are continually encreasing the prohibitory and expurgatory Indices, and daily prohibiting Books to the Prejudice of the King's Regalia, and the Liberty of the Gallican Church; and had even taken upon them to prohibit the very Arrêts of the Parliament against John Castelli, the Works of the renown'd President Ttuanus, the Liberty of the Gallican Church, and other Books concerning the King's Person and his Royal Jurisdiction.

IN Flanders the Council of Brabant having the same Opinion of those Decrees, gave the Archduke Leopold an account of them, and in 1657. drew up a Consultation, wherein they intimated to him, that the neglecting of that Point would be the ruin of the Government; because long Experience had taught them, that the Court of Rome made it their study to condemn such Books, as defend the Royal Authority, so that to receive those Decrees without Examination and the Placitum Regium, is the same, as to acknowledge, that the Pope can prohibit the King to make Edicts, or to order Books or Writings to be printed, by which his Royal Rights, and the Privileges of his Subjects, are defended. And confirming all this by Instances of a later Date, they put him in mind, that about four Years ago, two Treatises were printed in Flanders, one under the Title: Jus Belgarum circa Bullarum receptionem; the other: Defensio Belgarum contra evocationes, & peregrina judicia: In these no receiv'd Opinion, or Article of Faith were brought into Dispute, but only his Majesty's Rights of not admitting Bulls without the Placitum Regium were defended: Notwithstanding, by a Pontifical Decree they were condemn'd in Rome: So that the Council of Brabant was obliged by a Decree to make void and annul the Prohibition, as may be seen by the Sentence recorded by Van-Espen in his Treatise, *De Placito Regio*⁴.

OUR Viceroys once used the same Vigilance, and especially, as we shall see in the following Books of this History, the Duke d'Alcala: The Count of Benevente and the Duke d'Alva likewise observed it with respect to the Prohibition of the Books of Curte and Urries; but how it comes now that that Vigour and Zeal, which ought to be employ'd in serving the King and the Publick is laid aside, and that the King's Ministers are, in a manner, indifferent about so important a Point, is what mov'd me to make this Digression. Books, most prejudicial to the Rights of the King and his Subjects, are now not only publish'd in Rome, but are suffer'd to be brought into the Kingdom, and the reading of them is not forbidden; but what deserves Resentment rather than Admiration, is to see, that on the contrary, all Books, wherein the King's Rights, and the Law of Nations are maintain'd, against the Attempts of the Court of Rome, are, without the least Scruple, daily prohibited in Rome, and without those Decrees or Bulls having ever been receiv'd here, without having obtain'd the Exequatur Regium, which with us, by a written Law, is indispensibly necessary to all the Provisions that come from Rome, they are suffer'd to take their design'd Effect; the Observers of them are not punish'd, and 'tis believ'd that a Subject sins in reading whatsoever is prohibited in Rome, but not in breaking the Law of his Prince, by which those Provisions, when not invigorated by the Placitum Regium, are reputed null, of no force or effect, and as if they had never been. And what greater instance of Stupidity could there be, than what reign'd among us of late Years, when a Dispute happening between the Court of Rome and our King about Benefices, which are of right bestow'd upon Natives, and had been so order'd by an Edict of the Prince, three excellent Treatises, which defended the Edict, and demonstrated it to be conformable not only to the Laws, but the Canons, had no sooner appear'd, than Clement XI. by a particular Bull prohibited and condemn'd them to the Flames; and this we bore patiently, without the least Resentment: But on the contrary, whatever was written against the said Treatises, was dispersed freely, without the least Impediment: Yea, we are so over-aw'd, that no body ventures upon Printing the most useful Works, only because they are afraid of these Prohibitions from Rome.

BUT however it fares not so with the Books of Rome, which are printed and reprinted a hundred times, and are dispersed every where, whereby the People become tainted with Opinions, most prejudicial to the King's Authority and the Rights of his Subjects. Perhaps some will say, that we ought not to regard that, nor be always quarrelling about idle Words: However Rome does not mean them as such. They are Words 'tis true, but, as we have said elsewhere, such Words as have frequently drawn Armies into the Field: Words, which being continually buzz'd into the Ears of the People, persuade them at last, that whatever is advanc'd in those Books is true; whence proceed Aversion, Obstinacy, and a Ruggedness of Temper, which renders it almost impossible to bring them back to the right way; therefore upon occasions, they condemn the Prince's Conduct, they look upon us as Infidels, and that we design to crush them by main force. They instil false Doctrine into the Minds of Men, which is very prejudicial to the State: Hence it is, that some believe, that they may freely commit Frauds in the Payment of the Taxes and Customs; and if they are laid on without the Liberty of the Apostolick Sec, they think, that they are not due, because they read so in the Bull, In Cœna Domini, and in the Writings of the Casuists and Divines. This is the Cause of so many high Notions of the ecclesiastical Power and Jurisdiction, and of so many low ones of the Power of Princes¹. But enough of this, let those, who can, and whose Business it is, look to it. As for this Work of mine, whatever it be, I well foresee that it will be censur'd; but if that shall happen, I take God to witness, who searches the Hearts of all Men, and from whom nothing is hidden, that I undertook to write it, neither out of hatred or complaisance to any Person, but solely out of love to Truth, and for the Benefit of such as shall take the trouble to read it; and I earnestly beg of God that he would be pleased to bless it, and instil into the Minds of others Principles of Justice and Benevolence.

King Ferdinand I. reforms the Tribunals and the University: He enlarges the City of Naples, and resettles the Provinces of the Kingdom.

THE City and Kingdom of Naples are not only indebted to this Prince for his introducing so many excellent Arts, and bestowing so many Prerogatives upon them; but much more for the particular Care he took to reform the Tribunals of this City, and to provide them with learned and uncorrupted Judges, that Justice might be administred. He enlarged the Tribunals of the sacred Court and the Royal Chamber with new and better Institutions, and put them into a better Form than what Alphonfus, his Father, had left them in. He reform'd the Tribunal of the High Court of the Vicariate, and to our Usages, added new Regulations concerning the Method of entering Actions and Complaints, and prescribed a better Form for proceeding in Civil Causes and Compromises, as may be seen by his Edicts, which he publish'd in 1477¹. from whence our more modern Practitioners, and among the rest Bernardino Moscatello Lucrino, took the Form, which still, in a great measure, at present regulates the judicial Proceedings of our Tribunals.

HIS chief Study was to furnish this Tribunal with the best Judges that could be found, so that 'tis said, that not well pleased with some Doctors that were in Naples, he sent to find out others in the Provinces of the Kingdom; and we read in *Summonte*² a Letter, directed to one of his Confidants in Abruzzo, wherein he tells him, that he should be very well pleased to have two Doctors from that Province, that were Men of Probity, in order to make them Judges of the Vicariate, and bids him take some Pains to get Messer Jacopo de Peccatoribus to come from Aquila, and likewise to see if there was another such in Civita di Chieti, because he should be better pleased to have one from that City than from any other Part.

IN his Reign Learning began to flourish, whence appear'd so many Men famous for their Skill in the Law and the other Sciences, of whom more hereafter; and as he was a great Encourager of Learning, he invited from all Parts the ablest Professors to come and teach in the University of Naples. In 1465, he invited Constantino Lasfari from Milan, where he had read the Greek Language in that University for the space of six Years, and settled him in the same Profession in Naples, with a handsome Salary³. We likewise read, that in 1474, he invited Angelo Catone of Supino, a famous Philosopher, and his own Physician, and made him read Philosophy in the University of this City. He got Antonio d'Alessandro, so famous for his Skill in the Laws, that he was call'd Monarcha Legum, and who was imploy'd by this Prince in the most weighty Affairs of State, to read them in this University: Antonio deli' Amatrice, a renown'd Canonist of those times, in 1478, was made a Professor in this University, where, with great Applause, he taught the Canon Law. And in 1488. he invited Bartolommeo di Sorrento, Girolamo Galeota, Giuliano di Majo, Francesco Puzzo, Antonio Feo, and other famous Professors, who not only render'd this University illustrious, but put it upon a level with the other Universities of Italy *.

ON account of so many useful Arts introduced by this Prince, the Grandeur of the Tribunals, the Fame of this University, and the many other Ornaments wherewith he adorned Naples, a great Number of Persons flocking hither from all the Cities and Towns of the Kingdom, and from more remote Parts; the number of Inhabitants increased to that degree, that Ferdinand was obliged to enlarge the City, and extend the Circumference of the Walls. Charles I. of Anjou, after the old Enlargements, of which Tatini ² treats at large, had begun to extend the Walls, reducing the Market-place (that sad Theatre, where the horrible Tragedy of the unfortunate Corradin was represented) within the City, building the Walls with Towers before the Church of the Carmelites, drawing them in a straight Line along the Sea-shore to the old Gate of the City, call'd Piazzo dell' Oimo, and inclusing within them the Streets, which are now call'd della Conciana, La Ruga de' Franzesi, La Loggia de' Genovesi, La Piazza delle Calcare, and the Ruga de' Catalani. Charles II. his Son, in 1300, enlarged them from the side of Forcella, and Queen Joan II. in 1425. raised the new Walls from the Salt Magazine, to the Strada delle Corrogge. But Ferdinand extended the Circuit of the Walls much farther, laying the first Stone, with great Solemnity and Pomp, on the fifteenth of June 1484, behind the Monastery of the Carmelites, where he built a Tower, which is standing to this Day, and is call'd Torre Spinella, from Francesco Spinello, a Neapolitan Gentleman, whom the King had appointed to be Inspector of the Building of these new Walls. Thus was the Monastery of the Carmelites inclosed within the Walls of Naples, and the Wooden Bridges before each of the Gates of the City were removed, the old Walls having been surrounded with Ditches; and at the side of the Church of the said Monastery, that Gate was made, which still remains, beautify'd with cut Stone. These Walls are extended from this Gate, and inclose the Streets del Lavorino, della Duchesca (so call'd because the Garden of the Duke and Dutchess of Calabria was there) and that call'd Orto del Conte; and the Gate of Forcella was remov'd from the place, where it stood formerly, to the place it is in now, and is call'd Porta Nolana, because it leads to the City of Nola. So likewise was the Porta Capuana, which stood near Castello Capuana, remov'd to the side of the Church of S. Catarina a Formello, where Ferdinand order'd it to be magnificently built, and caused his Coronation to be cut upon Marble, in order to be placed upon it; though for what Reason we know not, it was not put there till afterwards, when the Emperor Charles V. surrounding the City with new Walls, beautify'd, and adorn'd this Gate with most fine Marble, and exquisite Sculpture, in that magnificent Manner we now see it. Those Walls were carry'd on by Ferdinand to the Monastery of S. John a Carbonara, by which, both this Monastery and that of Formello, were inclosed within the City. But that Work was interrupted by the Troubles that follow'd, and by the new War, which he had to maintain on account of the new Conspiracy hatch'd against him by the Barons, so well described by Camillo Porzio. The Masonry is well design'd, and all of Piperno Stone, and many Towers, at small distances from one another, are built of the same Stone, the Architect whereof was Messer Giuliano Majano of Florence. Upon each of the Gates was placed the King's Statue in Marble on Horseback with this Inscription: Ferdinandus Rex nobilissime Patrie. Charles V. finish'd the Design afterwards, for in 1537, when he came to Naples, he rebuilt, and embellish'd the Capuan Gate in that magnificent Form we now see it; but he did not build it of Piperno Stone, but of a soft Stone taken from the Mountains of the Country, after a new manner of Fortification, not with Towers, but Bulwarks; and this was the last Enlargement with respect to the Circumference of the Walls; for there has been so much built about them since, that in the Space of an hundred and fifty Years, the Suburbs are become so many large and vast Cities.

KING Ferdinand, in his peaccable Years, not only thus embellish'd Naples, the Metropolis of so flourishing a Kingdom; but he took a particular Care of the large Provinces, of which it is composed. He had no mind, for the Sake of one City of the Kingdom, to rob the rest of their Prerogatives; but he made the principal Cities of the Provinces the Seats of the Viceroy's. Whereas formerly the Presidents, that were sent to govern them, were call'd Justices, in his Time they began to obtain the Title of Viceroy's. Wherefore, in the Times of these Aragonian Kings, we read of the Viceroy's of Abruzzo and Calabria. Whence we read of great Prerogatives granted to the Cities where they resided, such as Aquila, Bari, Cosenza, and many othe s.

BUT above all the rest of the Provinces he rais'd that of Otranto, and particularly the City of Lece, the Tribunal of which he re-establish'd with most ample Privileges and Prerogatives. When that County, of which Lece is the chief City, was under the Princes of Taranto, of the illustrious Family of Baizo, and afterwards Orsini, those Princes kept their Tribunal, which was call'd Consiglio del Principe, there; wherefore we still see some Sentences pronounced in Lece, In Consiglio Principis, where the Causes of that County were heard; and it had its own Fiscal, who was call'd the Prince's, to distinguish him from the King's Fiscal. This Tribunal consisted of four Judges, who were Doctors, one Advocate, one Procurator Fiscal, one Chamberlain, one Clerk, and one Masfredatti. It was instituted in the Year 1402. by Romanello Orsini and Maria d'Eugenio, the Father and Mother of Prince *Giovanni Antonio*¹: And it took Cognizance of the civil, as well as criminal Causes of the whole County, and of all those Cities and Towns, which the Princes of Taranto had usurped from Queen Joan I.

UPON the Death of the last Prince, which happen'd in Altamura, the Principality of Taranto came into the Hands of King Ferdinand, and though Duke John of Anjou tamper'd with the Lece'se to bring them over to his Party, yet they kept steady in their Allegiance to the King, to whom they surrender'd themselves, as soon as they heard of the Death of the Prince in *Altamura*². And besides that, upon the King's coming to Lece in 1462 after the Death of the Prince, they presented him with all the Prince's Treasure, which he had laid up in the Castle of that City, consisting of Gold and Silver Plate, and most costly Furniture, which was a very acceptable Present to King Ferdinand, whose Coffers by the Expenses of the War, which he had maintain'd against Duke John, were very much drain'd. As a Recompence for so great Fidelity, and so seasonable a Relief, he granted the Lece'se most ample Privileges: He confirm'd to them all the Concessions and Contracts of Patrimonial and Burgage Lands, which had pass'd between them and the Prince: He confirm'd the Consistory, with the Judges, of which it is compos'd, and the Salaries, payable out of the Revenues of some Villages belonging to the City: He granted them the Privilege, that that Tribunal should always remain in Lece: He adorn'd the said Tribunal with other more eminent Prerogatives, appointing it to be the Tribunal of Appeals from all the other Cities and Towns of that Province, as well belonging to the King's Demaines, as to the Barons: That it could take Cognizance of all manner of Feodal Causes: That it could appoint Guardians and Tutors to feodary Pupils: That it could revive dormant Suits at Law, which we call Insufflacion di Spirito: That Sentences might be pronounced in the King's Name, notwithstanding any Appeal intervening. He appointed D. Frederick, his second Son, to be Head of this Tribunal, who continued in that Post till, by the Death of Ferdinand II. his Nephew, he was call'd to the Succession of the Kingdom. Therefore, as well as the Sacred Council of S. Clara, he would have this Tribunal call'd, the Sacred Provincial Council; and that next to that of Naples, it should be the most eminent of all the other Tribunals of the Kingdom. Whence it came, that Puglia being divided into two Provinces, to wit, Terra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto, each of them having its own separate Tribunal, both assumed the Title of a Sacred Court; but at present many of the abovemention'd Prerogatives are vanish'd, and, excepting that specious Title, and some other Privileges of small Moment, they are upon a Level with the Courts of all the other Provinces of the Kingdom.

PERHAPS, if King Ferdinand had enjoy'd more Years of Peace and Tranquillity during his Reign, he would have render'd Naples a more flourishing Kingdom, and brought it under a more exact Polity; but instead of that, most cruel and terrible Enemies appear against him, and the Barons, more obstinate than ever, again disturb the Kingdom. 'Tis true, that if Ferdinand had been guided by the same virtuous Disposition in his Prosperity, as he had been in the beginning of his Reign, and in the midst of Adversities, he certainly would have been one of the wisest Princes that ever reign'd upon Earth; but now, after having triumph'd over his Enemies, seeing himself Master of a vast and most flourishing Kingdom; whether it was that he was not able to resist his violent Inclination for Power, or that hitherto he had stifled his natural Bent, he was afterwards observed to be deceitful, and of a fierce and cruel Temper. Francesco Guicciardino, a most grave Historian, says¹, that Ferdinand was a most prudent and valuable Prince, who by his surprizing Industry and Wisdom, accompanied with the Favours of Fortune, maintain'd the Kingdom, lately acquired by the Father, in spite of a Multitude of Difficulties, which, in the Beginning of his Reign, he had to struggle with; and rais'd it to a higher pitch of Grandeur, than, perhaps, any other King who, for many Years before, had possess'd it: And that he would have proved an excellent King, if he had continued to reign with the same Address, with which he began: But afterward, as *Angelo di Costanzo*², a most judicious Writer, observes, seeing himself in so great Prosperity, he changed his Manners; for, unmindful of the Benefits which God had bestow'd upon him, he began to reign with all manner of Cruelty and Avarice, not only oppressing those, who in the late War had sided with his Enemies, but those also who had serv'd himself well; for he revoked all the Privileges he had granted them in his necessity. But what, above all, drew upon him the universal Hatred of his Subjects, was Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, his eldest Son, who, treading in his Footsteps, out-did him in Cruelty, but much more in Lust, dishonouring many noble Families, publicly ravishing the Daughters from their Fathers and the Husbands, to whom they had been promised in Marriage, and marrying them to some of the Nobility, and often against their Inclinations. By which means the Son added so much Hatred to what had been already conceiv'd against the Father, that not only his own Subjects, but all the Potentates of Italy wish'd for his Ruin.

Ferdinand, as well as Alphonfus, sensible of the universal Disaffection, resolv'd to be always upon their Guard, and to keep up such a number of Troops, as might be able to curb the Subjects, and to keep them from rebelling. And Ferdinand, in order to have his Army maintain'd in the Dominions of other Princes, having enter'd into a League with Pope Sixtus, and made War against the Florentines, sent the Duke of Calabria upon an Expedition to Tuscany. The Republick of Florence was then govern'd by Lorenzo de' Medici, a Man so eminently above the private Condition of a Citizen in the City of Florence, that not only all the Affairs of that Republick were directed by his Advice, but his Name was held in great Esteem through all Italy; for he made it his principal Study to keep the Affairs of Italy in such a Balance, as it should not incline either to the one side or the other; and often the Assistance of one was sought for counter-balancing the other. The Florentines, therefore, lest King Ferdinand should attempt to extend his Dominions, and come to conquer Tuscany, propos'd to the Venetians to enter into a League against Ferdinand. The Venetians, on the other hand, afraid, that if Ferdinand were once Master of Tuscany, he might afterwards conquer Lombardy, immediately join'd with the Florentines, who, not able to persuade any of the other Christian Powers to attack Ferdinand, had recourse to the Turk, who was Master of Albania, and that Part of Sclavonia, opposite to the Kingdom of *Naples*³; so that the Florentines, in order to divert Ferdinand's Arms, and the Venetians those of the Turk from their own Dominions, invited Mahomet II. to the Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples. The Success of which Undertaking, as also that of the confederated Barons, must be referr'd to the following Book of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXVIII.

HOUGH so many other Nations had already invaded these our Provinces, the Turks had not hitherto attempted to conquer them; but, lest none might lose their turn, we see even that People, more powerful and terrible than the others, put in their Claim among the rest. 'Tis a vulgar Mistake, that the Ottoman Emperors support the Pretension, which they make to our Kingdom, upon their Haughtiness and Arrogance, and their immoderate Thirst after Dominion only. They pretend, that after the taking of Constantinople, and their having vanquish'd and kill'd the Emperor Constantinus Paleologus, the last Grecian Emperor, the Empire of the East being thence devolv'd to them, they have a Right to re-unite to that Empire all that they now find possess'd by foreign Princes. They pretend too that Italy, and much more our Provinces, particularly Puglia and Calabria, belong to them, as the true and lawful Successors of Constantine the Great, and the Emperors of the East. They even boast, and their Actions indeed demonstrate, that they imitate the Romans: And, perhaps, if their vast Conquests be consider'd, and the Progress they have made since the Year 870, to this time, their Acquisitions have not been inferior to those of the Romans; nor have they fail'd to shew, that they still keep up the Pretension of making themselves Masters of Italy and the World.

*SCIPIO Ammiratus*¹ plainly evinces, that the Progress made by the Turks since the Year 870. (when, being invited by the Persians from Mount Caucasus, where they first liv'd, they began to get footing in Asia, to his own time, to wit, in 1585. being less than 715 Years) was much greater than that of the Romans, in the like Space of time. And though they had not conquer'd Italy and France, as the Romans had done; yet they had made themselves Masters of Egypt, Armenia, and other Provinces of Asia, which were not brought under the Roman Yoke; and without doubt, they possess a much greater Part of Illyricum and Germany, than ever the Romans did. They made prodigious quick advances towards obtaining the Monarchy of the World; for having made themselves Masters of so many, and such vast Countries, they wanted only to subject Constantinople, the Head of the Empire, to their Dominion, and by that Means entirely to extinguish the Grecians, who had kept their Court there till the time of King Alphonfus. They were therefore wholly intent upon that Undertaking, which was at last reserv'd to Mahomet IV. King of the Turks, and of the Ottoman Family the second of that Name, who, in 1450, having succeeded to his paternal Kingdoms, made it his whole Study to accomplish that Undertaking. At last, in 1453, with formidable Armies and prodigious Fleets, he block'd up the City of Constantinople both by Sea and Land: Constantinus Palæologus, the Emperor, not able to resist such an infinite Number of Troops, for the safety of his own Person, had shut himself up in the City: Succours were, in vain, sought from the Christian Princes, who being at War among themselves, little regarded the Ruin of the Empire of the East: notwithstanding, the Roman Pontiff incited and conjured them to undertake the Defence of it. Nevertheless our King Alphonfus, that that City, the Seat of the Empire, might not fall into the Hands of the Infidels, was the only Prince that promised Assistance; but while with great Earnestness he was hastening it, on the twenty ninth of May 1453. Mahomet took the City, and put the Emperor and all the Nobility to the Sword, and quickly made himself Master, not of the City only, but of the Empire of Constantinople. Thus ended the Greek Empire, which had lasted one thousand one hundred and twenty nine Years. And as the Roman Empire began under Augustus, and ended in Augustulus; so the Greek began under Constantine the Great, the Son of Helena, and ended in Constantine Palæologus, the Son also of an Helena.

THE Empire being thus remov'd from the Greeks to the Turks, Mahomet was proclaim'd the first Emperor of the Turks. The Progress he made afterwards was both surprizing and ominous; laying aside his other Actions of less Moment, in 1460, he possess'd himself of the Empire of Trebisond, and caused King David's Head to be cut off. In 1462, he made himself Master of the Island of Mitylene. In 1470, he took the Island of Negropont from the Venetians. In 1474, he overcame in Battle Husan Cassan, King of Persia, by whom he had formerly been defeated. In 1476, he took Caffa from the Genoese. In 1478, he forced the Venetians to deliver up to him Chalcis and Scutari, and to pay him a yearly Tribute for Liberty to Traffick in those Seas. And, by so many Victories, having his Head full of so vast and boundless Projects, and above all, inflam'd with an ardent Desire of getting footing in Italy, pretending that, by virtue of the Empire of Constantinople, acquir'd by him, he was the true and lawful Sovereign thereof: The Venetians, in order to divert him from their Dominions, and to shun greater Inconveniencies, insinuated to him, that he ought to give over the Undertaking against the Island of Rhodes, which he was then endeavouring to take from the Knights of Jerusalem, and send his Fleet towards Puglia in the Kingdom of Naples; for instead of an Island he might be able to conquer a most flourishing and large Kingdom². Angelo di Costanzo writes, that Lorenzo de' Medici, by means of some Merchants trading among the Turks, invited Mahomet to invade our Kingdom. 'Tis very probable, that both the Venetians and Florentines, who were then Enemies to Ferdinand, did encourage him.

THEY demonstrated to Mahomet, that the Pride and Ambition of Alphonfus was such, that though not at present, yet in time he might come to hurt him, as well as them; yea, much more him, the Undertaking being more just, with respect to Religion, more easy, because of the short Passage over the Ionian Sea, which divides their Dominions, and more favour'd by the Christian Princes. Besides, for several Reasons, Mahomet exceedingly enrag'd against King Ferdinand, and above all for his having sent that very Summer Relief to Rhodes, which he had in vain besieged; so that it was an easy matter to persuade him to undertake the Expedition¹.

MAHOMET, therefore, having raised the Siege of Rhodes, in 1480, sail'd to Velona, from whence he sent Acubat, his Bashaw, upon this Expedition, who, about the end of June the same Year, arriv'd upon the Coast of Puglia with a most formidable Fleet, and besides Infantry, having landed five thousand Horse, he laid close Siege to the City of Otranto. The Garrison of this City consisted only of a thousand fighting Men, with four hundred which Francesco Zarlo had brought with him from Naples. The Citizens made a more vigorous Defence than the Soldiers, but their Constancy against so powerful and numerous an Army avail'd nothing. In less than two Months the City was taken by Assault, into which these Barbarians having entered with great Fury, there was no manner of Cruelty but what they committed, Burnings, Robberies, Slaughter, ravishing of Virgins, and whatever Barbarities were committed at the taking of Constantinople, the same were practis'd in Otranto. Many Citizens were put to the Sword, as was done in Constantinople, but with this Difference; for the Bones of those were still left upon the Ground, exposed to the Wind and Rain, and not minded; but as for the Bones of those of Otranto, the Turks being driven out, not only the Country People, but Pope Sixtus, and Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, strove who should do them most Honour.

AFTER the taking of this City, Mahomet, having recall'd Acubat, he, in Obedience to his Lord, departed, and left in his room Ariaden, Governor of Negropont, with seven thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and he himself, with twelve Galleys, and the Pillage of Otranto, set sail for Constantinople. Ariaden having a Mind to pursue the Conquest, resolv'd to besiege Brindisi and other Cities, so that the Kingdom was in great Danger of being lost.

FERDINAND, seeing himself in this Distress, wrote to almost all the Princes of Europe for Relief, and sent immediately to Alphonfus, ordering him to leave the Expedition of Tuscany, and come to the Relief of the Kingdom. The Duke of Calabria abandon'd the War of Tuscany, and left the Florentines in Peace; and on the tenth of September this Year he arrived in Naples, and having assembled a Fleet of eighty Galleys with some Ships, he gave the Command of it to Galeazzo Caracciolo, who arriving with the Fleet on the Coast of Otranto, put the Turkish Army into a great Consternation, and soon after, the Duke of Calabria came thither, accompanied with a great Number of Neapolitan Barons. The King of Hungary, the Duke's Brother-in-Law, sent thither one thousand seven hundred Hungarian Foot, and three hundred Horse; and the Pope sent a Cardinal, with twenty two Genoese Galleys; so that the Duke's Army was in a Condition to face that of the Turks, who, after many Skirmishes, were forced to retire into Otranto, where, for a long time, they made an obstinate Defence. But the seasonable Death of the Emperor Mahomet, which happen'd on the third of May this Year 1481. freed the Kingdom from these Miseries; for Ariaden judging, that by the Death of Mahomet the Reinforcement he expected would arrive too late, resolv'd to surrender the Place to Alphonfus: And on the tenth of August honourable Terms being agreed upon, he deliver'd it up, after it had been a Year in the Hands of the Turks, and having embark'd with his Troops, he set sail for Constantinople.

THIS opportune Death, not only terrify'd the Turks that were in Otranto, but also an Army of twenty five thousand Men who had come as far as Velona, and were design'd against Italy, so that they all return'd. Alphonfus, overjoy'd at this happy Event, dismiss'd the Hungarian Soldiers, and return'd victoriously to Naples, where he found the Succours that had come to him from Portugal and Spain, the one consisting of nineteen Caravels and one Ship, and the other of twenty two Ships; and having regaled their Commanders, he dismissed them all. In this War died the Flower of the Veteran Officers, and the famous Knights of the Kingdom; to wit, Matteo di Capua, Count of Paleno, famous over all Italy: Giulio Acquaciva, Count of Conversano, who had been raised by Ferdinand to the highest military Honours: D. Diego Cavaniglia, Marino Caracciolo, and a great Number of other worthy Knights². In the Sacking of Otranto by the Turks, eight hundred Citizens were put to the Sword, whose Bones Alphonfus caused to be buried with great Honour and Devotion, and many of them were carried to Naples, and, as Galateus writes¹, were deposited in the Church of S. Maria Maddalena, from whence they were afterwards removed to the Church of S. Catarina a Formello, where they are now adored, as the Relicks of Martyrs.

NOT to interrupt the Thread of this History, by discoursing hereafter of the Designs, which the Turks have always had, even to our own Times, upon the Conquest of this Kingdom, and of the Invitations, which have been made to them by the Christian Princes, who being at War among themselves, in order to divert the Arms of the Enemy, have often had Recourse to the Turk: Now, seeing the Occasion offers, I must observe, that though the Turks, during the Reigns of Ferdinand and of the Aragonian Kings, his Successors, did not return to disturb these our Provinces, yet for all that, by the great Conquests they made in the neighbouring Parts, from time to time they struck us with Terror.

MAHOMET II. being dead, who, for his having conquer'd two Empires and twelve Kingdoms, and taken above two hundred Christian Cities, was proclaim'd the first Emperor of the Turks. Bajazet II. his Son, who succeeded him in the Empire, by an uninterrupted course of Fortune, made other Conquests; for in 1484, he took Valachia, and in 1492, he possess'd himself of the Ceraunian Mountains and all Albania; and reduced all those who before enjoyed Liberty into a State of Slavery. Wherefore many noble Families fled from those Places, and took Shelter in the neighbouring Parts, and some of them in our Kingdom. The Castriotti and the Tocchi, who possess'd great Lordships in those Provinces, came hither. Many Albanians likewise came, to whom our King assign'd sundry Towns for their Habitation, and they still continue among us. In 1499, Bajazet subjected to his Empire Modon and Corone, Cities of the Morea, and the Year following he took the City Mero from the Venetians. In 1514. Selim I. Bajazet's Son, overcame in Battle Ismael King of Persia, and pursued him in the Fields of Calderan. The next Year he defeated, and made Prisoner the Captain General of Aladola, King of Cappadocia, cut off his Head, and sent it to the Venetians, as a Token of the Victory. In 1516, he routed Campson, the Sultan of Egypt, and having put him to flight, he forced him to lay violent Hands upon himself; in the course of which full and glorious Victory, having overcome and hang'd the other Sultan, he took Cairo, subjected Alexandria, and having made himself Master of Egypt, he likewise conquer'd Damascus, the Metropolis and Seat of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

SOLIMAN II. the Son of Selim, in 1521, took Belgrade from the Hungarians. In 1522, he drove the Order of S. John of Jerusalem out of the Island of Rhodes, and added that most noble Island to his Empire. In 1526, he gave the Hungarians another terrible Defeat, in which their unfortunate King Lewis was kill'd. In 1529, he possess'd himself of Buda, and in 1534, he took the Kingdom of Tunis. In 1537, besides the great Damage he did the Venetians in pillaging Zante and Citera, he demolish'd Ægina, took Paros, and made Nasso tributary. In 1539, he took Castel Nuovo, where the best Troops, that ever the Spaniards had, were put to the Edge of the Sword. Selim II. the Son of Soliman, after having, with a most powerful Fleet, endeavour'd to conquer Malta, the new Residence of the Knights of Jerusalem, he took the most delightful Kingdom of Cyprus from the Venetians. Upon which Occasion the Family of the Palæologi came to our Kingdom, whose Tomb is to be seen in the Church of S. John the Greater, in Naples, of which Eugenio makes mention². Amurat III. the Son of Selim, though by Reason of the continual Wars, which he had to maintain against the Persians, did not disturb the Christian Nations, yet he kept them in great Terror. But his Successors, Mahomet III. and Achmet took from the Venetians the Island of Candia, a great Part of Dalmatia, Bohemia, and Slavonia; and in short, almost all the Coast of the upper Sea, which we now call the Adriatick, opposite to the Coasts of Otranto and Puglia, was brought under their Dominion. By these unbounded Conquests many Kingdoms and Duchies were extinguish'd. Thus fell the Dukes of Athens and Durazzo, the Lords of Arta, the Princes of the Morea, the Duke of Albania, the Princes of Achaia, and so many other Lords and Barons, that it would be too tedious to recount them. These were succeeded in their Dominions by so potent and terrible an Enemy, by much too near us, being separated only by the Gulfs of Venice and Otranto: It created continual Fears, and some Cities and Towns of Puglia and Calabria were frequently pillag'd.

WHENCE desperate Princes and malecontent Barons often took Occasion to have Recourse to the Turks, by promising them an easy Conquest of the Kingdom. When, as we shall be told hereafter, King Ferdinand made Peace with Pope Innocent VIII. some Barons, doubting of the King's Veracity, for their own Safety, resolv'd to send Ambassadors to Bajazet to invite him to come and conquer the Kingdom. Therefore our Seas were frequently infested, and the City of Gaeta terribly pillaged. And in the following Years Paula and S. Lucido in Calabria underwent the same Misfortune: Sorrento and Nassz, over against Naples, were cruelly plunder'd, and the Inhabitants hurry'd away into Slavery¹.

IN the Reign of Charles V. the Prince of Salerno, having fled the Kingdom, and not meeting with Encouragement in France, had recourse to the Turks, to whom he represented the Conquest of the Kingdom as an easy Matter, and persuaded them to fit out a powerful Fleet for invading it.

IN the Reign of Philip II. his Son, there were frequent and famous Expeditions made against the Turks; in which D. John of Austria, who gave them a terrible Defeat at Sea, gain'd immortal Glory; and there being a cruel and obstinate War kindled between the King and Paul IV. that Pope, not content with having enter'd into a League with the King of France and some other Potentates, likewise invited the Turks to assist him with their Fleet in attacking the Kingdom. And the Conspiracy of Tommaso Campanella is yet fresh in our Memories, who, with other Dominican Monks of Calabria, in 1599, had plotted to put the two Calabria's into the Hands of the Turks; who, in 1621, came with a strong Fleet to invade Capitanata, and made themselves Masters of Manfredonia, and after having kept it for some Time, they pillaged it, and dropp'd the Undertaking. They did an infinite Number of other Mischiefs in our Seas, and carried off many of our People into Slavery. And in the Years 1716, and 1717. if they had not been twice notably defeated in Hungary by the victorious Imperial Arms, with the Loss of Temeswaer and Belgrade, they were threatening Italy and our Kingdom. But now a Truce for twenty Years being made with the Turk, we see what our Forefathers never did, to wit, Traffick and Commerce open'd betwixt us and the Turks. As long as this Truce lasts, at least, the Adriatick Sea will be free from Corfairs, and the Coast not expos'd to so great Losses and Ransoms; for by having so powerful an Enemy so near, the Towns situate upon the Coasts of the Adriatick and Calabria were constantly infested by the Barbarian Pyrates, and many Families ruin'd by paying vast Ransoms for recovering their Relations out of their Hands. In order to guard against those Pyrates, Charles V. caus'd many Towers to be built along the Seashore of the Kingdom, and laid heavy Taxes upon it for the Maintenance of the Tower-keepers. Afterwards, in order to be assisting on those Occasions, the Orders for the Redeeming of Captives were brought from Spain, and settled amongst us, and many pious Funds were establish'd, the Revenues of which are appointed for the Ransom of Slaves.

IT can't be deny'd, but it is a very pious Work, and in Spain, which is liable to the same Misfortunes from the Pyrates of Algiers, Tunis, and those of the Moors, it hath exceedingly encreased, where there are large Convents of those Orders, for the redeeming of Captives, endow'd with most ample Revenues; but it also can't be deny'd, but the Turks are thereby encouraged in their Piracy, it proving so beneficial, that almost all of them drive the pyratrical Trade, because they know, that Christians are no sooner made Slaves, than vast Sums are sent to redeem them. On the contrary, they never ransom any of their own People that happen to fall into the Hands of Christians; wherefore the Christians don't drive the Trade of Pyrating in their Seas, as they do in ours. If we did not take Care to redeem our People, they would certainly leave off the pyratrical Trade, and, perhaps, we should live at more ease, without Suspicion or Fear. But enough of this, our Purpose now requiring, that we should discourse of King Ferdinand, and of a new, and more dangerous Conspiracy, hatch'd by his Barons against him.

C H A P. II.

The Barons conspire a-new against the King. Pope Innocent VIII. joins with them, and makes War against him : Peace concluded with the Pope, and the Ruin and Extirpation of the Conspirators.

AFTER the Expedition of Otranto, Alphonfus, Duke of Calabria, puffed up with Vain-glory and Triumph, and full of high elevated Thoughts, out of his cruel and avaricious Temper, resolv'd to humble the Barons, whom he both hated and suspected. All his Thoughts were so much bent upon this, and he spoke so openly of it, that they began to smell out his Design; for he was wont frequently to say to his Confidants, that seeing the Barons, during the so many Wars and Troubles, in which the King had been involv'd, had not thought fit to assist him with Money, he would teach them how Subjects ought to carry themselves to their Lord. He could not contain himself from bidding his Favourites take Courage, that in a short time he would make them great Barons, for he was resolved so to humble the Grandees, that they (the Favourites) should be the first; and besides, he could not forbear putting a Besom upon his Helmet for the Devise, and at his Saddle certain Signs, to shew that he had a Mind to root them all out.

ALTHOUGH King Ferdinand was a most prudent Prince, yet what through the Affection he bore Duke Alphonfus, what through old Age, and the Fondness of his new Spouse, between paternal and conjugal Love, he was in a drooping Condition; and putting great Confidence in the Valour of the Duke, he had, in a manner, yielded the Reins of the Government to him, and only upon extraordinary Occasions gave his Advice. The Barons, who had conceiv'd a cruel Hatred against Alphonfus, terrify'd by these Menaces, began to think of Means, whereby to prevent them.

ON the thirteenth of this Year 1484, Pope Sixtus died, and on the twenty ninth of the same Month Cardinal Giovan-Battista Cibo, a Genoese, was elected in his Room, who call'd himself Innocent VIII. This Pope had a different way of Thinking from his Predecessors Pius and Sixtus, and longing for an occasion to raise Franceschetto, his Bastard Son, and finding the Barons ready to make Disturbance, he was resolv'd to have a Hand in it, and shewing himself displeased with King Ferdinand, who had desir'd of him, that, on account of the great Charges the War of Otranto had cost him, and of those, which he was at in maintaining so many Troops for opposing the Turk, and in defending the Kingdom, which was the Bulwark of Italy against the Infidels, He would be pleased to remit him the ordinary Tribute payable to the Church, as his Predecessors had done, who contented themselves with the Genet only: He not only would not remit it, but on the twenty ninth of June 1485. the Day appointed for the Payment, the King, according to Custom, having sent Antonio d'Alessandro his Ambassador to Rome to offer the Genet, the Pope refused to accept of him; so that the Ambassador was forced to make a publick Protestation, which is to be found in Chioccarello's MS. Volumes of the Royal Jurisdiction.

ON the other hand, the Barons, observing the Pope's Dissatisfaction, resolv'd to have Recourse to him for Protection. The Heads and Authors of this Conspiracy, which has been so well described by Camillo Porzio, were Francesco Coppola, Count of Sarno, and Antonello Petrucci, the King's Secretary. The Count of Sarno, though of an antient and noble Family of the Seggio of Portanova, treading in the Footsteps of his Father, was so much given to Merchandizing, that the King himself, allur'd by the Profit, put a good Sum of Money in his Hands, and became his Partner in Trade¹, so that he grew exceeding rich: Ferdinand created him Count of Sarno, and his Name was in such repute both in the East and West, that the Merchants, in almost all Parts of Europe, trusted him with Sums and Merchandizes of a vast Value. Antonello Petrucci, born in Teano, a City near Capua, of mean Parents, and brought up in Aversa by a Notary, who finding that he was a Youth of an excellent Genius and great Application to Learning, brought him to Naples, where he put him in the Service of Giovanni Olzina, Secretary to King Alphonfus. Olzina, perceiving the natural Endowments of the Lad, desired the famous Laurentius Valla, who then liv'd in his House, to instruct him; and Antonello having in a short Time, under so excellent a Master, made a wonderful Progress, Olzina gave him an Employment in the Royal Chancery; and whenever he had so much Business upon his Hands that he could not wait upon the King himself, he was wont to send Antonio to him. King Ferdinand was likewise taken with the Integrity and modest Behaviour of Antonello, and by this Familiarity he came to be in great Favour with him; insomuch, that upon Olzina's Death he made him his Secretary, and by the great Confidence the King had in him, all the most weighty Affairs passed through his Hands. By these Means he acquired vast Riches and noble Alliances; for he marry'd the Sister of Agnello Arcamone, Count of Borrello, of the Seggio of Montagua, by whom he had five Sons, and all of them, by the King's Favour, were rais'd to great Honours. The eldest was made Count of Carniola; the second, Count of Policastro; the third, Archbishop of Taranto; the fourth, Prior of Capua; and the fifth, Bishop of Muro.

THE great Riches, and the many extraordinary Favours, which the King bestow'd upon these two great Men, drew upon them the Hatred and Envy of many, and especially of the Duke of Calabria, who could not forbear saying often in publick, that, in order to enrich them, his Father had impoverish'd himself; but that he was resolv'd not to delay much longer what his Father had so long dissembled. All these Things being told to the Count of Sarno and the Secretary, they resolv'd to join the discontented Barons, with whom having consulted, they agreed among themselves to have Recourse to the Pope for Assistance. The Barons who enter'd into the Conspiracy, were Antonello Sanseverino, Prince of Salerno, Lord High Admiral of the Kingdom, Pietro del Balzo, Prince of Altamura, Lord High Constable, Girolamo Sanseverino, Prince of Bisignano, Pietro di Guevara, Marquis of Vasto, Lord High Steward, Andreo Matteo Acquaviva, Duke of Atri, the Duke of Melfi, the Duke of Nardo, the Counts of Lauria, Melito, and Nola, and many Knights. These, taking the Opportunity of the Marriage of Trojano Caracciolo, the Son of the Duke of Melfi, met in the City of Melfi, and sent to Pope Innocent to beg the Favour of his Assistance; with which the Pope readily comply'd. He consider'd, that there could not happen a more favourable Opportunity than this for raising his Son; and to bring this to bear he had Recourse to the usual Practice of the Popes, to wit, of inviting some Prince to conquer the Kingdom, by promising to give him the Investiture of it. John, Duke of Anjou, had been dead ever since the Year 1470, and Renatus, his Father, being likewise dead, there was none remaining but another Renatus, the Son of Violante, Renatus's Daughter, who was Duke of Lorrain; therefore he sent to Provence to solicit him to come with all Expedition to conquer the Kingdom, with which he would invest him, provided, in return for so great a Favour, he would confer upon Franceschetto, his Son, Honours and Lordships.

NEVERTHELESS, Alphonfus, Duke of Calabria, having discover'd the secret Practices of the Barons, immediately resolv'd to break their Measures; and thereupon, without delay, invaded the County of Nola, took the City of that Name, and made two of the Count's Children, with their Mother, Prisoners, whom he order'd to be carry'd to Castelnuovo in Naples. When the other Conspirators heard what had happen'd, lest their Estates also should be seiz'd, laying aside all Respect, they began openly to arm themselves, and to raise Commotions every where. In an Instant the Kingdom was put into the greatest Confusion, the Roads were impassable, Commerce was interrupted, the Tribunals were shut up, and hence nothing but universal Disorder. King Ferdinand being much affected with these Tumults, endeavour'd to quiet them; and the Prince of Bisignano, to give the other Barons time to arm themselves, began to treat of a Peace with the King: Ferdinand, in appearance, seem'd very much inclin'd to it, but was resolv'd, as soon as the Troubles were once over, not to observe it. The one endeavouring to trick and over-reach the other, most impertinent Conditions of Peace were propos'd to the King, all which he agreed to: But when they came afterwards to ratify them, the Prince of Salerno started Difficulties, and mean while the greatest Part of the Barons having retir'd to Salerno, he gave the King to understand, that for their better Security, he must send D. Frederick, his second Son, to Salerno, there, in his Name, to conclude the Conditions, and be Surety for the Observance of them. The King sent Frederick, and he was receiv'd by the Prince and the other Barons with great Marks of Respect, and entertain'd as if he had been a King. Frederick was a Prince, endow'd with rare and incomparable Virtues, Handiome, and of a most sweet Temper, Temperate and Modest, insomuch that he had gain'd the Love of every Body. His Behaviour was quite different from that of his Brother, the Duke of Calabria, and if he had had the good Fortune to have been the eldest, the Kingdom would certainly have continued in the Posterity of our native Aragonian Kings; and would thereby have been prevented from undergoing the many Revolutions and Troubles, which we shall relate in the following Book.

FREDERICK, however, went to Salerno with great Hopes of concluding the Peace; but one Day the Prince of Salerno having conven'd the Barons in his own Palace, and placed Frederick in an eminent and stately Seat in the middle of the Assembly, began with great Eloquence and Energy to persuade him to accept the Kingdom from their Hands, which they then offer'd him; alledging, that Alphonfus, a most cruel Tyrant, being driven out, it might remain in Peace under his Clemency; that they would support him with their Arms and Fortunes to the last drop of their Blood; that the Pope being on their side, the Undertaking would not only be render'd just, but he would immediately grant him the Investiture of it: If former Popes then, said he, for the sake of Peace, could allow Alphonfus to deprive King John, his Brother, of the Kingdom, to whom it of right belong'd, how much more Just and Glorious will it be for the present Pope Innocent to suffer a Tyrant to be deprived of the Kingdom, and to put the Crown upon your Head, a Prince differing as much from him, as a Wolf from a Lamb, or a cruel and avaricious Man, from a benign, just and virtuous Prince: Nor surely will your old Father Ferdinand be offended at it, who is sensible, that it will be approved of both by God and Man, yea, he will look upon himself to be a happy Father, that among his Sons he has begot one, who, in the Judgment of every body, is thought worthy of the Scepter and the Royal Crown. It ought to be consider'd, that you was born among us in this Climate, and in this renown'd Part of Italy for our Deliverance: The Piety of your Heart ought to be affected by our Miseries, to have Compassion upon our Children, to comfort the frighted Mothers, and, in fine, not to suffer us to be driven by Necessity, to have Recourse to foreign Nations for our own Safety, as it certainly will happen, if you don't accept of our Offer¹.

HE spoke to the Prince with so much Fervency and Force, that the whole Assembly believ'd, that Frederick would not have refus'd the Offer; but that Prince, who was neither mov'd by Ambition, nor an immoderate Thirst after a Crown, but only by Virtue, after having return'd them Thanks for the Offer, with much Calmness answer'd, That if it were in their Power to confer the Kingdom upon him, he would most willingly accept of it, but as he could not acquire it without the Breach of all Laws, his Father's Purpose, and the Right of his Brother, he was unwilling, in order to maintain it afterwards by Force, to be obliged to commit greater Deceit and Wickedness. That the Kingdom was provided with so many strong Forts and Garrisons, that the Lives of two gallant and still victorious Kings would scarce be sufficient for reducing them, especially, seeing a great Part of the Barons, inur'd to Arms, were following the Duke's Standard, who, though he was not liked by the People, yet he was much belov'd, yea, adored by the Soldiers. That they were mistaken in the Comparison betwixt his Deportment and that of the Duke: That there was no Proportion betwixt a private Man, such as he was, and a Prince. Neither ought it to seem strange to them, if he, by having cultivated his Mind by Learning, was of a more mild Disposition, and on the contrary, the Duke, by having been brought up in Arms, was terrible and fierce: That if he should come to be King, he would be forced to give over his former Conduct, and assume that of his Brother, in order to confirm him in the Kingly Dignity, managing the Wars, imposing new Burdens, seizing the Malecontents, and in short doing the same Things, for which the Duke was hated. So that seeing he assur'd them that the Conditions agreed to should be religiously perform'd, they ought to give over these Thoughts, and lay hold of the Peace, which he offer'd them.

WHEN the Conspirators understood Frederick's Resolution, their Countenances alter'd, grew pale, and foreseeing what the Result of their Conspiracy was like to be, overcome with Despair, they gave way to Fury and a thousand Extravagancies. Instead of making him King they made him Prisoner; and having openly shaken off the Yoke, in order to encourage the Pope, both to their own and his Shame, they set up the Papal Standard, and declared themselves no less the King's open, than obstinate Enemies.

FERDINAND seeing himself thus affronted, not only to crush the Rebellion, but the Pope's Ambition, resolv'd to declare War against him, and, without Ceremony, to attack the State of the Church, and force him to give over that scandalous Undertaking; therefore, wholly intent upon making the necessary Provisions for the War, he sent the Duke of Calabria with a powerful Army to the Borders of the Kingdom. Before he sent him, because many weak People were astonish'd to hear that a War was to be carried on against the Pope, and therefore were against undertaking it, in order to undeceive them, on the twelfth of November 1485. he order'd the Nobility and Commons, with a great Number of Officers and Barons to meet at the Cathedral Church of Naples, and he caused publickly to be read in their Presence a Protestation, whereby he declared, that his Intention was not to make War against the Holy See: That all the Preparation he was making for War, was not for encroaching upon other People, but only for defending himself, preserving his Kingdom, and freeing it from the Insults of others: That as for the rest, he had been, and always shall be a most obedient Son to the Apostolical See.

HE likewise issued out a Proclamation, whereby he order'd all the Prelates and Ecclesiastical Persons of the Kingdom, who were possess'd of Bishopricks, Archbishopricks, and Benefices in it, and who were then residing at the Court of Rome, within fifteen Days after the Publication of the Proclamation, to come and present themselves before him, and then to go and reside in their Livings, otherwise he deprived them of their Revenues, which should be sequestered; and the Archbishop of Salerno, the Bishops of Melito and Teano, who were residing at the Court of Rome, not obeying the Proclamation, he sequestered the Rents of their Churches, and appointed Collectors for receiving them.

HE assembled another Army, and gave the Command of it to D. Ferdinand, Prince of Capua, his own Grandchild, the Duke of Calabria's eldest Son, whom, on account of his Youth, he put under the Direction of the Counts of Fondi, Maddaloni and Marigliano; and he sent the Duke of S. Angelo, his fourth Son, to Paglia with another Army for guarding that Country.

POPE Innocent, terrify'd at so great Preparations for War, and having no News from Renatus Duke of Lorraine, whom he had invited to conquer the Kingdom, had recourse for Assistance to the Venetians, then very powerful in Italy, and did his utmost to get them to enter into a League with him for the Conquest of the Kingdom, offering them a good Share of it; but the Venetians, foreseeing the Issue of the Conspiracy of the Barons, would neither enter into a League against the King, nor desert the Pope, but assisted him secretly.

IN the mean time the Duke of Calabria having invaded the Ecclesiastical State, and often fought the Pope's Troops, was advanced to the Gates of Rome, and had laid close Siege to that City. And Prince Frederick, by the means of a Corfican Captain, whom the Prince of Salerno had engaged in his Service, made his Escape out of Prison, and came to Naples, where he was receiv'd by his Father, and all Ranks of People with extreme Joy, and highly commended for his Virtue.

KING Ferdinand, by Art and Management, did not neglect to gain over to his Interest some of the confederated Barons; wherefore the Pope, who was better carv'd out for Peace than War, not seeing Renatus appear, nor great Assistance from the Venetians, teaz'd also by the College of the Cardinals, and by the many Complaints, that for the Want of Pay, the Army of the Barons was ruining the State of the Church, besides, having been for three Months besieg'd in Rome, he at last came to make Overtures of Peace, and to persuade the Barons to come to an Agreement with the King, and that he would endeavour to obtain good Conditions for them. The Barons, reduced to the last Extremity, and forced by cruel Necessity, hearken'd to an Accommodation, and came into it with the greatest Caution imaginable; for they insisted upon this, that John King of Aragon, and King Ferdinand, afterwards call'd the Catholick, his Son, who was then King of Sicily, and was marry'd to the Princess of Castile, who afterwards became Queen thereof, should send Ambassadors, who, in their Names, should be Guarantees of the Treaty¹. At last it was concluded on the twelfth of August 1486, in the Presence of the Archbishop of Milan, and the Count of Tendilla, Ambassadors from the Kings of Spain and Sicily: And in the Name of King Ferdinand it was accepted by Joannes Pontanus, famous for his Learning in these Times. By this Peace it was stipulated, that the King should acknowledge the Church of Rome as his Superior, by paying the usual Tribute; and should not molest the Barons.

POPE Innocent having concluded this Peace, continued ever after a Friend to the King, and granted him whatever he desired. On the fourth of June 1492. at his Request he dispatch'd a Bull, agreeable to those of Pope Eugene IV. and Pius II. whereby he declared, that after Ferdinand's Death, Alphonfus, Duke of Calabria, his eldest Son, should be his Successor in the Kingdom: And that if the Duke should happen to die in the King's Life-time, then Ferdinaud, Prince of Capua, the Duke of Calabria's Son, should succeed. For this Purpose the Prince of Capua was sent to Rome, with Powers from Alphonfus, his Father, and in his Name to take the Oath of Fidelity, and do Homage to Pope Innocent, which accordingly he did, not only in his Father's, but in his own Name also, conformable to the Investiture which this Pope had given them.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Pope and the Kings of Spain and Sicily were Guarantees of this Treaty, yet the Barons, knowing the Cruelty of Alphonfus, and Ferdinand's Treachery, were terribly perplex'd. Pietro di Guevara, the High Steward, foreseeing the Destruction that was like to ensue, died of Grief and extreme Melancholy. The rest, with unanimous Consent, fortify'd themselves in their Castles, and did not neglect, by secret Means, to send to Rome, Venice, and Florence, to beg Assistance; nor were there wanting some, who were for applying to the Turk for Relief: But King Ferdinand and the Duke of Calabria, having got them in their Power, behaved with great Art and Dissimulation, offer'd them Security, and made shew of much Mildness: Many being deceived, thought themselves secure; but the Prince of Salerno never trusted them, and suspecting what was to happen, he went privately out of the Kingdom, and arrived in Rome; and finding that the Pope was altogether averse from renewing the War, he went to France; a Step which, though it produced nothing extraordinary at that Time, yet many Years had not pass'd before it became the Source of surprising Consequences; for, as we shall hereafter relate, by the Countenance of the King of France, it not only crush'd the King and the Duke, but even extinguish'd their whole Posterity.

NEVERTHELESS the King and the Duke dissembling their Designs, went on encouraging the rest; and being resolv'd to ruin the Count of Sarno, and the Secretary Petrucchi, with their Sons, (for the other Barons excusing themselves, laid the whole whole Blame of the War upon their Shoulders) they contriv'd a Method for seizing them all, which was to get them to meet all in one Place, and hastening the Marriage: which had been appointed betwixt Marco Coppola, the Count of Sarno's Son, and the Daughter of the Duke of Amalfi, the King's Grandchild, they got the Duke to Consent, that the Marriage should be celebrated in the great Hall of Castel Nuovo. While they were all met, Dancing and Feasting, their Mirth was converted into Grief and bitter Lamentations; for, without either Regard to the Place, the Solemnity, or to the Authority of the Pope, and the two Kings of Spain and Sicily, who had been Guarantees of the Peace, Ferdinand imprison'd the Count of Sarno, Marco, the Bridegroom, and Filippo, his Sons; the Secretary Petrucci, the Counts of Carniola and PolICASTRO, his Sons; Angelo Arcamone, the Secretary's Brother-in-Law, and Giovanni Impou, a Catalan. He likewise caused the Houses of the Prisoners to be plunder'd, both in Naples and in Sarno; and because the Fact was detested by every body, who spoke of it with Horror, he would not order them to be put to Death of himself, but appointed a Junctō of four Judges, who were to try them, and, according to the Rigour of the Laws, found them guilty of Felony and High-Treason. The Judges having try'd the Barons, and our Laws requiring, that at pronouncing the Sentence some of their Peers must be present, four Barons were pitch'd upon, to wit, Giacomo Caracciola Count of Burgenza, Lord High Chancellor, Guglielmo Sanseverino Count of Capaccio, Restaino Cantelmo Count of Popoli, and Scipione Pandone Count of Venafro. The Sentence was pronounced by the Delegates, who, with the Peers, having again met in the great Hall of Castel Nuovo, sitting on the Bench with the Regent of the High Court of the Vicariate, caused the Sentence to be read and publish'd in Presence of the four Criminals, to wit, the Secretary and his Sons, and the Count of Sarno, who were condemn'd to lose all their Honours, Titles, Dignities, Offices, Knight-hoods, Counties, Nobility, and their Heads; and their Estates were forfeited to the King. The King had no mind to have them all die in one Day: He first caused the Secretary's Sons to be beheaded on a Scaffold in the Market-place; some Months after, on the eleventh of May 1487. in order to have them seen from the City, causing a prodigious high Scaffold to be erected within the Gate of Castel Nuovo, the Secretary and the Count were beheaded.

THE Sentence having been thus put in execution, on the tenth of October following the King caused to be imprison'd the Princes of Altamura and Bisignano, the Dukes of Melfi and Nardo, the Counts of Morcone, Lauria, Melito, and Noja, and many Knights; and being spurr'd on by the Duke of Calabria, at different Times, and in different Manners, he caused them all to be put privately to Death; besides, in order to complete the Tragedy, Marino Marzano, who had been twenty five Years in Prison, was also dispatch'd; and, that the People might think they were still alive, the King continued for a long time to send their Provisions to the Prisons, but shortly after, a Gold-chain, which the Prince of Bisignano used to wear about his Neck, being found in the Custody of the Hangman, it was believ'd that they had been strangled, put in Sacks, and thrown into the Sea. Their Wives and Children were soon after seiz'd, and all their Estates confiscated, under Pretence, that they intended to make their Escape, in order to stir up a new War. Only Bandella Gaetana Princess of Bisignano, a Lady not only by Origin, but by her Virtue, a Roman, having embark'd privately in a small Vessel, fled with her Children, and arriving at Terracina, she carried them to the Lands belonging to the Colonna, near Relations of the Sanseverini; whence it came, that Ferdinand's Progeny being extinct, in the Time of Ferdinand the Catholick, they recover'd their paternal Estates.

SO cruel and terrible a Tragedy struck the whole World with Horror, whence Ferdinand, and especially his Son Alphonfus, got the Character of Cruel Tyrants. The Writers of these times, particularly the French, abhorr'd them, and Philip de Comines, Lord of Argenton, a cotemporary Writer², gives them the Character of Impious and Inhuman. But Ferdinand took Care to defend his Reputation in the Opinion of the World, and to purge himself of the Cruelty laid to his Charge. He caused the Trials of the Secretary and the Count of Sarno to be printed, some Copies of which are still extant; and he not only caused the Trials of the other Barons to be printed, but sent them over all Italy, and even into England, thereby to quiet the Minds of Princes. He likewise justify'd himself by Letters directed to all the Christian Powers, telling them, that he had imprison'd the Barons, not with a Design to put them to Death, but only to secure himself against them, because they were attempting Innovations. But all these Vindications avail'd him nothing, especially with the King of Spain, with whom he took more Pains to excuse himself, than to all the rest.

AT this Time John King of Aragon, Ferdinand's Uncle, was dead, and Ferdinand, his Son, had succeeded him in that Kingdom, who married Elizabeth Princess of Castile, Sister to Henry King of Castile, to whom she afterwards succeeded. King Ferdinand, who was call'd the Catholick, and who, by Right of his Wife, had united the Kingdom of Castile to his own Crown, having understood that the Treaty, of which he was Guarantee, had been infring'd, began to complain of Ferdinand, and under that Pretence to think of conquering the Kingdom of Naples. King Ferdinand, whom this very much concern'd, hearing that the Catholick King was highly offended, sent Giovanni Nauclerio immediately to Spain to excuse himself to that King, that he could not do otherwise, because those restless Barons had begun to hatch a new Conspiracy against him, and that the Prince of Salerno, in concert with the Barons that had remain'd in the Kingdom, having fled to Rome, was contriving a new Enterprize. And finding that the Catholick King was not satisfy'd with these Excuses, in order the better to secure himself, by the Means of the Queen his Wife, who was his Catholick Majesty's Sister, he propos'd a Marriage between the Prince of Capua, the Duke of Calabria's eldest Son, and one of the Daughters of the said Catholick King; but it was the Opinion of many, that Queen Elizabeth, the Wife of the Catholick King, would not consent to the said Marriage, because she was then wholly bent upon the Conquest of this Kingdom: But for all that, the destin'd Time for the Ruin of King Ferdinand's House being not as yet come, the Island of Sardinia having revolted at this very Juncture of Affairs, and the Moors of Granada having begun to disturb the Kingdoms of Castile, the Matter was dropp'd for this Time.

C H A P. II.

The Death of Ferdinand I. of Aragon: The Laws he left us; and the Reviving of Learning and Discipline, which flourish'd among us in his Reign, and in those of his Aragonian Successors.

IN G Ferdinand having destroy'd his Enemies, and enrich'd himself by the Ruin of so many great Families, whereby he had got a vast Treasure, during the other six Years that he liv'd, continued to reign in the greatest Peace and Tranquillity imaginable; and the Affairs of the City and Kingdom were brought to a peaceable and settled State. In order to fix himself in a more secure and lasting Quiet, he began to entertain in his Service the best Military Officers of that Time, the chief of which were Virginio, Gio. Giacomo Trivulzio, Prospero and Fabrizio Colonna, the Count of Pergliano, and others; and he set about fortifying a-new the Fortresses of the City and Kingdom, and to provide them with sufficient Garrisons, and by his own Presence.

Prudence, and the Valour of the Duke of Calabria, he hoped to have no Reason to fear either the King of Spain, or the King of France. For which end, in concert with Lorenzo de' Medici, he was likewise careful in preserving the Peace of all Italy; and though at this Time he was strongly solicited by the Duke of Calabria, who bore it very impatiently, that John Galeazzo Sforza, Duke of Milan, now twenty Years of Age, having only the bare Title of Duke, should be kept under and oppress'd by Lewis Sforza, his Uncle, who, above ten Years ago, having taken upon him to be his Guardian, and under that Colour, by degrees, reduced under his own Power the Fortresses, the Troops, the Treasure, and all the Revenues of the State, continued to govern, not as a Tutor or Guardian, but by the Title of Duke of Milan, with all the Ensigns and Actions of a Prince; yet Ferdinand having the present Advantage more at Heart, than his Son's Indignation, though just, was unwilling to raise any Disturbance in Italy; or, as *Francesco Guicciardini*¹ wisely observes, having a few Years ago, to his great Danger, experienced the Hatred his Barons and People bore him, and sensible of the Affection, which many of his Subjects, mindful of what had past, had for the Name of the House of France: He was afraid, that Disturbance in Italy might afford an Occasion of attacking his Kingdom; or, that he knew his Union with the other States, and especially Milan and Florence was necessary, in order to counter-balance the Power of the Venetians, then formidable to all Italy; and in this Tranquillity he liv'd for some Years.

BUT the Death of Lorenzo de' Medici, which happen'd in the Month of April 1492, and a few Months after was follow'd by that of Pope Innocent VIII. chang'd the Face of Affairs, and afforded many Occasions for the future Calamity of Italy and our Kingdom; for Innocent being succeeded by Roderigo Borgia, who took the Name of Alexander VI. and Lorenzo by Pietro de' Medici: And a bitter and irreconcilable Quarrel happening betwixt Pietro, who continued the same Alliance with King Ferdinand, and Lewis Sforza, thence proceeded the Invitation made by Lewis to Charles VIII. King of France to undertake the Conquest of the Kingdom, and the other Calamities and Disorders, which shall be the Subject of the following Book.

KING Ferdinand, who to the Year 1493. by his Prudence and Advice had endeavour'd to maintain the Quiet, not only of the Kingdom, but of Italy, hearing of the Motions and great Preparations for War, which were making in France, did not neglect to use his utmost Efforts, both with Lewis and King Charles himself to divert them from the Undertaking; but the King of France shewing a great Aversion to an Accommodation with Ferdinand, and having order'd his Ambassadors immediately to depart the Kingdom of France: In an Instant every Body was struck with the Terror of a new and cruel War. And in the mean Time Ferdinand, by being obliged to prepare for resisting so powerful an Enemy, fatiguing himself more than ordinary in reviewing the Army, which he was getting ready, was taken ill with a Rheum, which being follow'd by a Fever, on the twenty fifth of January 1504. the fourteenth Day of his Illness, he died in Naples, more oppress'd with the Distemper of the Mind, than with Age. A Death both very fatal and lamentable, and which drew on, not only the Ruin of his own Progeny, and of the Kingdom, but fill'd all Italy with numberless Miseries and Calamities; for his Prudence and known Ability were such, that it was firmly believed, had he liv'd longer, he would have found Means for preventing the French from entering Italy, and to satisfy Lewis Sforza would have suffer'd any Inconveniency or Indignity whatsoever, to draw him off from the Interest of the French, whom he invited to conquer the Kingdom.

BY his Prudence he had brought the Kingdom to a greater Pitch of Grandeur than, perhaps, any of the Kings, his Predecessors, had been possess'd of. Besides the good Military Discipline, he provided it with provident and prudent Laws, which are still in force, and the most improv'd of all the other Laws, left us by the Anglo-Naplesian Kings, his Predecessors, and by which our Tribunals are still guided. He restored the University of Naples, whence it produced so many bright Men in all Sciences, so that among the Privileges and Favours, of which the Neapolitans sought the Confirmation from the Great Captain, one was, that, after the Example of Ferdinand, his Catholick Majesty would be pleased to countenance this University¹. He also had it much at Heart, that in his Reign Learning and good Discipline might be restor'd and recover their former Value and Reputation, and that the Kingdom might flourish, and not only be provided with famous Lawyers, but Men renown'd for all sorts of Learning; that the Jurisprudence, which for almost a whole Century had been profess'd but by few, and declining, might be restored, and appear with greater Splendor by so many celebrated Writers, as shined in his Reign: That the Laws of the Pandects and Code might be more made use of, and the Roman Jurisprudence with the utmost Care imbraced and recommended, whence the Longobard Laws came to be forgotten with us: That the Kingdom might be more improv'd, and Ignorance not prevail so much, either in our Schools or Authors.

Learning restored in Naples.

THE restoring of Learning ought not solely to be attributed to this Prince, but chiefly to the Ruin of Constantinople. That City having fallen under the Dominion of Mahomet II. the first Emperor of the Turks, and the Empire of the East having been invaded by these Barbarians, Enemies to Learning; many learned Men, who liv'd in Greece and Constantinople, in order to shun Slavery, retired with their Books to Italy, and many of them to our Kingdom, as nearest them. Besides many, whose Names are now obscure, there came hither Emanuel Crisolora, Bessarion, Constantine Lascari, a Constantinopolitan, who was invited by Ferdinand to be Professor in the Greek Language in the University of *Naples*¹, Trapezuntius, Gaza, Argiropolus, Fletontes, Philelphus, and many others, whose Encomiums are accurately written by Jovius.

BEFORE this time, as may be seen in the preceding Books of this History, the liberal Arts were taught in the Universities of Italy, but with little Purity and Exactness, nor was the Study of Human Learning much minded; and though Petrarca and Boccaccio, in the preceding Century, had reviv'd that Study, yet it had not been as yet much improv'd.

ALTHOUGH the Jurisprudence was taught in the Universities of Italy and in ours from the Books of Justinian, and many Professors were at great Pains about them, some in Writing Comments upon the Laws therein contain'd, some in glossing upon them, and others explaining them after a different Manner; yet seeing the Ignorance of Latin and the Roman History, hinder'd them from rightly understanding the Texts, they all had recourse to the Abridgments and Glosses of such, as they thought had understood them best; and those, who had not the Help of other Books, did nothing but explain one Place of the Digests, by the Help of another, comparing them together in the best Manner they were able, in which Accursius succeeded wonderfully upon the Pandects. The Defects of such Masters easily led the Scholars into Errors; and some abusing their Credulity, interspersed in their Glosses ridiculous Etymologies and extravagant Follies, as, among the rest, Accursius and the Glossators of the Digests did in many Places².

EITHER because they did not comprehend, that the Laws cannot be put in Practice, if they are not understood, or because they despair'd of conceiving them better, their greatest Study was to reduce them into Practice in deciding Controversies by the Consequences, which they deduced from the Texts. When afterwards they had a Mind to apply the Roman Law, so ill understood, and so widely different from our Customs and Institutes, to our Affairs, and at the same time to preserve our own Usages, which it was impossible to alter, the Rules of Justice became much more uncertain than before, and they involv'd themselves into Disputes about the Consequences, which they deduced from the Texts. By which Means the whole Jurisprudence was reduced to School Disputes, and the Opinions of the Doctors, who, not having sufficiently dived into the Principles of the Morality, and natural Equity of the Roman Laws, which, they imagined, could easily be apprehended, often minded their own particular Interests, or were wedded to their ill-conceived and obstinate Opinions. Those, who had Justice at Heart, knew no other Means, whereby to procure it, but the particular Remedies against Injustice: which made them contrive so many Clauses for Contracts, and so many Formalities for the Judges.

IN the same very Centuries it did not happen so in Greece and Constantinople, either with respect to human Learning, and the liberal Arts, or the Jurisprudence; and as for human Learning, the Schools were very well preserved in Greece, and the Commentary alone of Eustathius upon Homer demonstrates, that even to the latter Ages there were an infinite Number of Books, and Men of great Learning remaining there. As to the Jurisprudence, the Body of the Laws and Canons, collected by Leunclavius and Marquardus Freerus, shew, that it was preserved entire in Constantinople till the Ruin of that City. The Works of the Greek Lawyers, who flourish'd in the latter Ages also demonstrate the same: The Works of Michael Attaliota, who flourish'd in 1077; of Michael Psellus, who liv'd about the same Time; of Constantinus Armenopolus, who flourish'd in 1143; of Antiochus Balfamon, of Josephus Tenedos, of Eustathius Antecessor, and other Greek Glossators, recorded by *Joannes Doviatus*¹, Leunclavius and Marquardus Freerus, who wrote a Chronology of them, from the Death of Justinian to the Loss of *Constantinople*², likewise prove it.

CONSTANTINOPLE, therefore, having fallen, and Greece being subdued by those Infidels, in the Middle of this fifteenth Century a Multitude of learned Men appear'd all of a sudden in these Western Parts. But they came first to Italy: She has the Glory of having been the first Encourager of Learning: France had it from Italy, then from Hand to Hand it was convey'd to the other Countries of Europe.

THESE learned Men, who, with their Books, took shelter in Italy, induced others to study the Belles Lettres: These, with incredible Anxiety, apply'd themselves to the Reading of all the Books of the Antients they could find, and to write in Latin with greater Purity; and their being no want of Masters for teaching them the Greek, they set about to learn it, and, in order to make the greater Proficiency, as well in the one as the other Language, they began to translate the Greek Authors, of which they had great Plenty, into Latin. The Art of Printing, as we have said, having been found out at this very Time, was of great Advantage to them, in having Books both at an easy Rate, and very correct. Many likewise with great Care employ'd themselves in making excellent Editions of all the good Authors from the best Manuscripts, searching out the most ancient, and collecting many of them together. Others compiled most correct Dictionaries and Grammars, and wrote Commentaries upon difficult Authors, and such Treatises as serv'd for understanding them, such as their Fables, Religion, Government and Art of War. And in the following Times, for Things were not brought to Perfection all at once, these Studies were so much improv'd, that the most minute Particulars of their Customs, Apparel, Diet, and Diversions, were pry'd into, in so much that they had the desired Effect, after so long an Interval of Time, in making all the antient Greek and Latin Books, that are remaining, to be understood. But seeing it is a difficult Matter for Men to confine themselves to a just Medium, some were found afterwards to dwell too much upon these Studies; which are only Implements for the more serious Studies; for there were many curious Men, who spent their Lives in studying the Latin and Greek, and in reading all the Authors only for the Sake of the Languages, or for understanding the Authors themselves, and explaining the most difficult Passages of them, without going further, or making any other good Use of them. Among these there were some, who confin'd themselves to the Mythology and Antiquities only: Others made it their Business to search into Inscriptions, Medals, and whatever served to illustrate Authors, confining themselves intirely to the Pleasure they had in these Curiosities.

SOME others going further, studied the Rules of the liberal Sciences, such as of Eloquence, and Poetry, without ever practising them, whence it comes, that we have so many modern Treatises of Poetry and Rhetorick, though there have been very few good Poets and Orators; and so many political Treatises, written by private Men, who never were employ'd in the Affairs of State.

IN fine, the poring upon the antient Books produced such an implicit Faith in many, that they chose rather to follow the Mistakes contain'd in them, than to presume to dive into the bottom of them. Thus it was believed, that Nature was such, as she is described by Pliny, and that she could not act, but according to the Principles of Aristotle. But what was worst of all, some admir'd the Morality of them too much, without minding how far it comes short of the Religion which they had been taught from their Childhood: Others, though few in Number, run into the contrary Excess, affecting to contradict the Antients, and to be of quite different Sentiments from them.

BUT among those, who admired the Antients, the most common Failing was the wretched Imitation. They believ'd, that in Order to write as the Antients had done, they must do it in their Language, without considering that the Romans wrote in Latin, not in Greek; and that the Greeks wrote in Greek, not in the Egyptian or Syrian Languages. Whence it came, that the Tuscan Language, which by Petrarca, Boccaccio, and some others, was brought into so great Repute in the fourteenth Century, sunk in this fifteenth Century, because all the learned Men of Italy despised it as the Language of the Vulgar; insomuch, that if Pietro Bembo, and the other Men of Learning who follow'd his Example, had not put a stop to it, and both by Example and Reason demonstrated, that all Subjects whatsoever could be written upon, as well in the one Language as the other, it had been quite ruin'd; but in these Times the learned Men despised it, and were attached to the Latin, and some likewise to the Greek, writing their Compositions in Verse or Prose in Latin, at the Hazard of not being understood by any.

THEREFORE in this Century Learning began to be restor'd among us, which being countenanced by King Ferdinand, likewise a learned Prince, it made no small Progress in his Reign. Alphonfus, his Father, as we have said, having entertain'd some learned Men at his Court, Laurentius Valla, Antonius Panormitanus, and some others, who persuaded this Prince to protect them: Discover'd to him the Beauty, the Gravity, and the Excellency of the Roman History: They put him so much in conceit with the Books of Livy, that they were his constant Study; and they got him to educate his Son Ferdinand, whom he had appointed to be his Successor in the Kingdom of Naples, not only in the Exercise of Arms, but of Letters. For which end Alphonfus provided him with good Masters, for besides Cardinal Borgia, Bishop of Valencia, who was afterwards Pope, named Callistus III. Valla and Panormitan, famous all-over the World, he had likewise Paris de Puteo, and Gabriel Altilio, a famous Poet of these Times, and a great Master of the Latin Tongue, who was afterwards made Bishop of Policastro, of whom hereafter.

THIS Prince having been brought up amongst learn'd Men, he became not only a Lover of them, but most learned himself. We have still some most elegant Letters and Orations written by Ferdinand, which discover the good Taste he had of the Belles Lettres: Of whom, as well as of King Robert, it may be said, that the Muses were cherish'd, and exercised at the same Time. These Letters and Orations were printed in 1586. and the Book is intitled. *Regis Ferdinandi, & aliorum Epistolæ, & Orationes utriusque Militiæ, &c.*².

HE did by his own Sons, as his Father had done by him: Excepting Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, who, being born and brought up among Arms, of a fierce and warlike Disposition, had not the least Inclination to Learning: Frederick and all his other Sons apply'd their Minds to the Belles Lettres: Frederick, the second, and D. John, the fourth Son, were most learn'd, insomuch that the Father design'd D. John for the Church, and he was made a Cardinal by Pope Sixtus IV. by the Name of Cardinal of Arago.

HIS Secretaries, and the Officers of his Chancery, were all Men of Learning: Antonello Petrucci, his first Secretary, was a Scholar of Laurentius Valla, who taught him the Purity of the Latin Tongue, and the Belles Lettres, and he became a learned Man, and skill'd in many Sciences. Joannes Pontanus, his second Secretary, who, after the Death of Panormitan, possess'd his Place, was celebrated all over the World for his Knowledge both of the Sciences and the Latin Tongue.

Whence we observe, that the Statutes and Edicts of Ferdinand I. particularly those of the Year 1477, of which more hereafter, being penn'd by these two most polite Writers, are couch'd in pure and elegant Latin, which cannot be said of the Statutes of our other Kings. Whence likewise we find, that the Chancery of our Aragonian Kings not making use of any other Language, but of the Latin and Italian, the Charters and other Writs, that came from that Office in Latin, are exceeding polite, and, on the contrary, those in Italian (because it was a despised Language) are unpolish'd and rustick.

BESIDES those learned Men of his Chancery, we have already taken Notice, that he invited the ablest Professors of those Times to the University of Naples; and, as an evident Proof of this, we read in a Letter of his, printed by *Toppi*¹, directed in 1465, to Constantine Lascari of Constantinople, wherein, moved by the Fame of so learned a Man, he invites him to be Professor of Greek in the University of Naples, and promises him a handsome Salary: Decrevimus vos ad Lecturam Græcorum Auctorum, Poetarum scilicet, & Oratorum in hac Urbe Neapolis ad publicè legendum præficere, freti moribus vestris, & literis etiam confisi, per vos Græcarum Literarum Doctrina, ad frugem aliquam nostrorum dilectissimorum Studentium ingenia perventura.

Of the learned Men, who flourish'd in the Time of Ferdinand I. and of the other Aragonian Kings, his Successors.

FOR the Reasons abovementioned, Men, famous for Learning and Knowledge, flourish'd among us in the Reign of Ferdinand till that of Frederick, the last King of his Progeny. As in those times Rome, and the other Cities of Italy, boasted of a Pico Mirandola, Marsilio Ficino, Bartolommeo Platina, Raffaël Volterranno, Ermolao Barbaro, the Politiani, Ursini, and many others²: So Naples valued herself upon her own learned Men, who for Number and Erudition were not inferior to those.

BESIDES *Panormitan*², and the others above mentioned, she had Gabriele Altizio, a very famous Poet, and a great Master of the Latin Tongue. He was born in Basilicata, and, on account of his Fame, was, as we have said, made by Alphonſus one of Ferdinand, his Son's, Preceptors: As well as Pontanus, he was employ'd in the Affairs of State, which were transacted with Pope Innocent VIII. in Rome, and elsewhere. Pontanus, his Cotemporary, had a vast Regard for him, dedicating to him his Book, De Magnificentia, wherein he extols him to the Sky: And when he died, he compos'd a most elegant Epitaph upon him, which we find in the first Book of his monumental Inscriptions. Sannazaro, no less than Pontanus, was a great Admirer of his Poetry, and in the first Book of his Epigrams, we read one: De Natali Altilij Vatis, and in his Elegies he does not fail to commend him for his learned Poems. Many other renown'd Writers make honourable mention of this famous Poet, as may be seen in Toppi and *Nicodemo*³. We still have his Latin Poems, the Epithalamium, some Elegies and Epigrams, which were collected by Ruscelli, Giovanni Matteo Toscano, and others.

AT the same time flourish'd Antonio Campano, born in Cavelli, a Village near Capua, of mean Parents. His bright Parts gain'd him great Esteem with Pope Pius II. by whom he was made Bishop of Teramo in Abruzzo. He was a famous Orator, Historian, and Poet, and though he had not studied the Greek Learning, he was a perfect Master of the Latin. He left us many Works: The History of Urbino. The Life of Braccio. Latin Epistles, &c. of which *Nicodemo*¹ has made a long Catalogue. He dedicated some of these Works to Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, with whom he was in great Favour. He was very much esteem'd by his Contemporaries, and other Writers of the following Times, for which see Nicodemo. He died, according to *Volterano*² in Teramo, about the Year 1477. before he was full forty Years of Age, Possevin and Toppi have recorded his Epitaph, which may be seen in their Works.

ANGELO Catone, his Contemporary, a famous Philosopher, and Physician to King Ferdinand I. was no less celebrated. He was born in Supino in the County of Molise: On account of his Learning the Neapolitans receiv'd him into their City with great Respect, and had a vast value for him; and King Ferdinand, besides his having made him his Physician, invited him to teach Philosophy and Astrology in the University of Naples, where he profess'd these Sciences many Years. He corrected the Book of the System of Physick, which Matteo Salvatico of Salerno had composed, and dedicated to King Robert: He enlarged it, and in 1473. caused it to be printed by that German, who a little before had brought the Art of Printing to Naples, and it was one of the first Books that were printed in this City³. He dedicated it to King Ferdinand, wherein he directs an Oration to him, crying up the Mildness of the Air, and the Beauty of the Kingdom, and whatever is found rare in it. There were other two of the same Name, one of Benevento, who was a great Favourite of King Charles VIII. of France, who, for his Learning, made him Archbishop of Vienna: The other was of Taranto, a Physician, and Almoner to Lewis XI. King of France, at whose desire he wrote Commentaries upon Philip de Comines's History of the Affairs of France.

THERE was also Pontanus, a famous Poet, Historian, Orator, and Philosopher, as his Works, no less known, than celebrated, demonstrate. He was born in Cerreto in Umbria, or, according to some Writers, in Spelle, from whence, his Father having been kill'd, he came to Naples when a Youth: And Panormitan finding him to be a young Man of a fine Genius, encouraged him, and procured him an Employment in King Ferdinand's Court: He gave such evident Proofs of his rare Endowments, that Panormitan got the King to appoint him to be Preceptor and Secretary to the Duke of Calabria, his Son. He grew into so great Favour with Ferdinand, that when Panormitan died, he succeeded as second Secretary to his Majesty. He was afterwards made a Citizen of Naples, and by Ferdinand created President of the Royal Chamber, and the Lieutenant to the Lord High Chamberlain⁴. He was employ'd in the most serious and weighty Affairs of State, and by his Means, as we have said, the Peace was concluded with Pope Innocent. Camillo Porzio says⁵, that Pontanus, by Industry and Diligence, having brought about that Peace, was in hopes, upon the Fall of Antonello Petrucci, to have succeeded in his Place and Authority, trusting to the good Offices of the Duke of Calabria, which he expected he would have done him with his Father; but the Duke, who was no Friend to Learning, nor grateful for Favours receiv'd, did him no Service with his Father, as he ought, and could have done; at which the ambitious old Man being provoked, composed the Dialogue of Ingratitude, wherein introducing an Ass delicately fed by his Master, in return kicks at him. Nevertheless, after King Ferdinand's Death, Alphonfus shew'd him great Respect, and did him great Honour; for in the magnificent Palace, which he built near Castello Capuano, among the other costly and noble Furniture, and a famous Library, he caused Pontanus's Statue in Brass to be erected⁶, which Alphonfus, not without Encomiums, shew'd to those, who came to see the Riches of that Edifice.

BY reason of his having been so highly exalted by these two Kings, he was very much found fault with, when Charles VIII. of France, having made his publick Entry into Naples, being resolv'd, before he return'd, to receive solemnly in the Cathedral Church, according to the Custom of the Kings of Naples, the Royal Ensigns and Honours, and the Oath usually taken to new Kings: Upon this Solemnity Pontanus making a Speech in Name of the People, it seems, that either to perform the Part of a true Orator, or to curry Favour with the French, he enlarged too much upon defaming these Kings, to whom he had been so much beholden. So that *Guicciardini*¹ took occasion to say of him, that sometimes 'tis hard to find himself observing that Moderation, and those Precepts, which, with so much Erudition, writing of the moral Virtues, and discovering his universal Knowledge in all sorts of Learning, he had taught all Men.

HOW remarkable and famous the Works were, which this Writer left us, both in Prose and Verse, is well known to all the World; and how many Commenders they had, both of our own Countrymen and Foreigners, may be seen in *Vossius*², and *Nicodemo*³, who treat at large of this Author and his Works.

IT was unjustly laid to his Charge, that having found in the Library of Monte Cassino, which, as we have told in the preceding Books of this History, was enrich'd with many antient Volumes by the Abbot Desiderius, some Works of Cicero, he publish'd them for his own; but for that see Vossius and Scootkius.

According to the Custom of the Members of the Academy of Rome of changing their Names (whereby Poggio and Bartolommeo Platina suffer'd so much) these likewise changed their Names; so that Pontanus took the Name of Jovianus, Sannazaro that of Actius Sincerus, and so of the rest.

PONTANUS, well advanced in Years, died in the City of Naples in 1503, and was buried in S. John's Chapel, which he had caused to be built near the Church of S. Maria Maggiore, where the Inscription is to be seen, which he himself had made.

IN the Reigns of Ferdinand, Alphonso, and Frederick, there likewise flourish'd many other famous learned Men, such as the renown'd Michele Riccio, both an able Lawyer and a profound Historian⁴. He, though originally come from Castel a Mare di Stabia, was a Neapolitan Gentleman of the Seggio of Nido, and shined not only at the Bar, but in the Chair, having been a most grave Lawyer and eminent Advocate in our Supreme Tribunals. King Ferdinand made him chief Professor of Law in the University of Naples, and his own Counsellor. Afterwards when Charles VIII. came to Naples, and made himself Master of the Kingdom, he sided with him, who in 1495, made him Advocate Fiscal of the Royal Patrimony. But the French being driven out, and Ferdinand II. restor'd, Riccio was much kept under, till the Kingdom being again subjected to the French, under Lewis XII. King of France, he was rais'd to the first Honours by that King¹. In 1501. he was by Lewis created Vice-Protonotary of the Kingdom, and President of the sacred Council of S. Clara, and, with his Posterity, incorporated into the Seggio of Nido. He afterwards made him Counsellor of the High Council and Parliament of Burgundy, a Senator of Milan, and President of Provence. He grew into so great Favour with that Prince, that he was imploy'd in the most weighty Affairs of State, for there having a Dispute arisen between the Catholick King and King Lewis upon the Division of the Kingdom, about the Province of Capitanata, he alledged many Things in Favour of *Lewis*², defending his Right with such Vigour and Vehemence, that *Zurita*³ gave him the Character of a very arrogant Man. But the French being at last driven out of the Kingdom by Ferdinand the Catholick, Michele resolv'd to stick to Lewis, and abandoning all his Goods and Family, he went to live in France, where he was kindly received by the King, and honour'd with the highest Employments. From whence, in 1503, he sent him Ambassador to Rome to congratulate Julius II. who had been then rais'd to the Papacy, where he remained for some Years, in which he treated with Julius about recovering the Kingdom of Naples for Lewis; but tho' the Circumstances of those Times render'd all those Negotiations fruitless, yet the King order'd him to continue in Rome, where, having abundance of spare Time from Business, he wrote his History. He afterwards return'd to France, from whence, in 1506, the King sent him Ambassador to Genoa, and in 1508. to *Florence*⁴. At last, after having been imploy'd by that King in the most important Affairs of his Crown, he died in Paris in 1515. not without Suspicion of Poison. To his Knowledge of the Belles Lettres was added a profound Skill in other Learning, and especially in the Jurisprudence, in which he was so eminent, that Janus Parrasius did not stick to put him upon a Level with the Sulpitii, the Pomponii, the Pauli, and the Scævoli. He was eloquent, and wrote his History with no less Gravity than Judgment: His Style, according to the Opinion of Parrasius was clear, pure and elaborate, nor did his Brevity occasion Obscurity. He wrote De Regibus Francorum, Libri III. De Regibus Hispaniæ, Libri III. De Regibus Hierusalem, Liber I. De Regibus Neap & Siciliæ, Libri IV. Of these Books we see many Editions, done at different times, mention'd by *Toppi*⁵. He was celebrated by the most famous Writers of those Times; Janus Parrasius dedicated a Book to him, which he caus'd to be printed in Milan in 1501. which contain'd the Paschal Poem of Sedulius, a Christian Poet, found by him amongst ancient Manuscripts, and the Poems of Aurelius Prudens, in the Epistle Dedicatory of which, with great Encomiums, he extols Riccio's Virtues and Learning. In the Time of our Grandfathers he wrote the Life of the learned Carolus de Lellis, which he prefix'd to his abovemention'd History, printed in Naples in 1645.

IN those Times the renown'd Poet Giacomo Sannazaro was no less famous, who, as well as Riccio, follow'd his Master's Fortune into France. There is no Occasion to make many Words about him, as being a Man so well known and eminent, of whom, and of his Works, there have been plenty of Writers and Admirers. As he himself says in his Arcadia, he was born in Naples, in the last Years of King Alphonfus I. about the Year 1458. and was a Gentleman of the Seggio of Pertanova, of so genteel and polite Manners, that Frederick, King Ferdinand's second Son, had a vast Respect for him, so that Sannazaro never would forsake him, either in his Prosperity or Adversity: He follow'd him into France, where he remain'd a long Time: He afterwards return'd to Italy, and after having stay'd some Years in Rome, he came back to Naples, where, some write, he died in 1532. But there is a great Dispute among Writers about the Place and the Year of his Death.

GIOVAN Battista Crispo, who wrote his Life with great Exactness, by the Testimonies which he relates of Banerio Gualana and Costanza, makes him to die in Naples, and Eugenio writes the same ¹. But their Authorities must yield to that of Gregorio Rosso, a cotemporary Writer, who, in two Places of his Journals ², making mention of the Death of this famous Poet, says, that he died in Rome in the Month of August, without seeing Naples any more, a little after the Death of the Prince of Orange, with which he was so well pleased, that, a little before he died, he did not fail to say, that Mars had revenged the Muses, alluding to the Tower of Mergoglino, demolish'd by order of that Prince; and that his Body was brought to Naples, and bury'd in his own Church of Mergoglino, in the following Month of September of that Year, which was 1530.

THE Year is also made clear by this Writer, with whom the Inscription upon his Tomb agrees, in which there is no Error, as Crispo and Eugenio believ'd; for having been born in 1458, and all agreeing with Jovius, that he died at seventy two Years of Age, his Death falls out exactly in the Year 1530. The Death of the Prince of Orange, which happen'd on the third of August the said Year, confirms the same, it having been a little before that of Sannazaro ³.

FRANCESCO Poderico, his Cotemporary and faithful Friend, was likewise famous for Learning in those Times. He was a Gentleman of the same Seggio, and also of the Academy of Pontanus; though he was blind, not being born so, he was a Man of exquisite Judgment, insomuch, that while Sannazaro was wholly intent upon making his Poem De Partu Virginis, he did not fail to go and wait upon him every Day, and confer with him about those Verses, in which Poderico was so great a Critick, that Sannazaro, in order to pick out one Verse to the liking of such delicate Ears, very often recited ten, all of the same Meaning, and thus, for the Space of twenty Years, following the same Method, he at last accomplish'd that Work ⁴. Pontanus had so great a value for him, that he dedicated to him his fourth Book De Rebus Cœlestibus; he always made honourable mention of him in his Works, and in the first Book of his monumental Inscriptions, we read also that of Poderico. Pietro Summonte had also a very great Regard for him, and in one of his Epistles he extols him to the Sky, dedicating to him the Dialogue of Pontanus, intitled, Actius.

TO these two famous Men is owing the celebrated Costanzo's History of Naples, who confesses, that he was encouraged to write it by Sannazaro and Poderico, who, though he had lost his bodily Sight, was very sharp sighted in judging of ingenious Works, and of the Affairs of the World. These two good old Men, says he ⁵, who, in the Year of our Lord 1527. had come to Somma, where I was, shunning the Plague, which was then raging in Naples; having seen so many Errors in the Abridgment of Collenuccio, which had been just publish'd, exhorted me to take Truth under my Protection, and to Persuasions added Assistance, for they not only gave me many antient Manuscripts, but likewise great Light, whereby I might be able to find out others: And certainly, says he, if they had not both died about three Years after, my History would have been more copious and elegant, because I should have had more time to polish it by the Conversation of so judicious and learned Men.

AT the same Time flourish'd also the so often mention'd Pietro Summonte, a most learned Man, as may be seen by his Epistles; and to whom we owe the Editions of the Works of Pontanus, and of the Arcadia of Sannazaro, by whom in their Poems, and by Ambrosio Leone, surnamed the Learned ⁶, he is highly commended. The famous Tristano Caracciolo, of whom Sannazaro sung thus:

*But like the Sun when darting purest Light
Amongst them all appears Carocciol bright,
And when his Flute or Cittern glads the Plains,
Arcadia pleased, applauds th' unequal'd Strains.*

Pontanus and Sannazaro: Ambrogio di Leone of Nola: Vir, as Vossius writes of him¹, Latine, Græceque doctissimus, Philosophus idem, ac Medicus insignis. Erasmus had a great Friendship for him, as may be seen by their mutual Letters; and he had such a value for him, that he even begg'd to be mention'd in his Works, of which Nicodemo made a long and exact Catalogue². The famous Alexander ab Alexandro, upon whose Work De Diebus Genialibus three renown'd French Writers imploy'd their Talents, to wit, Tiraquellus, Colerus, and that able Lawyer Dionysius Gothofredus. He was brought up in Naples and Rome amongst the learned Men of those Times, and in Pontanus's Academy: He was conversant with Franciscus Philephus, Georgius Trapezantius, Bartholomæus Platina, Joannes Pontanus, Theodorus Gaza, Nicholas Perotti, Dominicus Calderinus, Hermolaus Barbarus, Paulus Corteses, and Raphael Volteranus. He gave attention to the Lectures of some of them in Rome, and liv'd most familiarly with others, so that he became learned himself: While a Youth he was instructed by Philephus; when old he explain'd in that University Cicero's Tuscan Questions: He likewise attended there to the Lectures of Perotti and Calderinus, who explain'd Martial. He was by Protection an Advocate, and in our Tribunals, and in those of Rome, exercised that Employment. Then leaving the Bar he applied himself to less severe Studies, and was wholly intent upon the Belles Lettres. There are some who tax him with Ingratitude, that having compos'd his Dies Geniales, in Imitation of the Noctes Atticæ of Au. Gellius, and the Saturnalia of Macrobius, and having purloin'd all that he wrote there from several Authors, he did not think fit to own the Plagiarism but pass'd the Work upon the World as the Production of his own Brain.

THERE flourish'd likewise about those very Times Pietro Gravina, a very famous Poet, Girolamo Carbone, Girolamo Massiano, and Giuniano Majo, a celebrated Grammarian, and Master to Sannazaro, and a great many other learned Men: So that the Academy of Pontanus was by Writers compared to the Trojan Horse, out of which came so many brave Warriors.

BUT why do I forget the famous Andrea Matteo Acquaviva, Duke of Atri and Teramo, renown'd not only for his Skill in military Affairs, but also for his great Learning? After his Example all his Posterity, and the long Series of the Dukes of Atri, have constantly delighted in the like Virtues, and been Encouragers of learned Men and Learning, whereby this Family has made itself not only eminent above all the other Families of the Kingdom, but is highly commended by all our Writers. From the very beginning of this restoring of Learning in Italy and Naples, this Duke was, as Pontanus writes of him³, Principem virum, & in mediis philosophantem belli ardoribus, & Philosophorum inter libros, naturæque rationationes tractantem Ducum artes, muneraque Imperatoria, utrumque cum dignitate, neutram sine suo, & decore, & laude. And how great a value this Writer had for him may be seen by the many Encomiums he gives him, which are interspersed in his Works, and by his dedicating to him the two Books De Magnanimitate, and the first, De Rebus Cælestibus. All the learned Men of Pontanus's Academy in those times did him extreme Honour: Pietro Summonte treated him in the same manner as Pontanus had done, extolling him, and dedicating his Works to him: The Books of *Sannazaro's Epigrams*⁴ are full of his Praises. Alexander ab Alexandro dedicated to him his Book De Diebus Genialibus. Minturnus in his Book of Epigrams, *Jovius*⁵ in that of his Panegyrics, and many others related by *Nicodemo*⁶, never cease praising him. We have still remaining of this Hero his Commentaries and the four Books of Moral Disputations, which being first printed in Naples in 1526. were afterwards reprinted in Germany in 1609. Toppi likewise testifies, that this Book was also found in a Vellum MS. in the Library of the Augustine Monks of S. John a Carbonara, but we know not if after the Pillage, which that Convent underwent, it be now left amongst those poor Remains.

THE Knowledge of the best Languages, and of all the liberal Sciences, has been continued by an uninterrupted Succession in his Posterity. Gio. Antonio Acquaviva, his Son, according to Atanagio, was a very learned and good Man. Giovanni Girolamo, his Grandchild, in the Opinion of the same Writer, was a great Master of Poetry, and all the liberal Arts; to whom he therefore dedicated the Poems of Bernardino Rota. And lastly, Giosia Acquaviva XIV. Duke of Atri, emulating the paternal Virtues, was most famous both for the Art of War and Learning, and was so great a Favourer of learned Men, that he chose for the Director of his Studies the incomparable Professor Domenico Auliso, the Ornament of our University, and its greatest Glory, who had such an Esteem for him, that he dedicated to him his Book, intitlèd; La Sfinge, or L'Interprete dell' Affrica occidentale con le sue Isole, which is preserv'd with us in MS.

C H A P. IV.

The State of our Jurisprudence in these last Years of the Reign of the Aragonion Kings; and the Laws established by Ferdinand.

SO much was human Learning raised in the End of this Century, and such was the Number of learned Men who then flourished; but though our Jurisprudence, by the Favours and Laws of Ferdinand, had, in those times, begun to be on the Mending-hand, yet it did not make that Progress, as, in the following Books of this History, we shall find it did in the subsequent Century: Hitherto the Professors of Law, the Canonists, and Divines kept pace with one another. The other Sciences, as we have seen, were all reformed, and brought to Perfection: to wit, the Languages, Grammar, Poetry, Oratory, History, Politicks, and in a great measure, Philosophy and Physick. But the Disputes that arose between the Professors of these Sciences and the Doctors of Law and Divinity, made these last obstinately follow the Tradition and Style of their Schools and Tribunals, preferring the profitable to the pleasant. The Doctors of Law and Divines look'd upon these new learned Men, whom they call Humanists, such as Grammarians, Rhetoricians, and Poets, to be trifling Fellows, who busied themselves about childish Things and vain Curiosities. On the other hand, the Humanists, charm'd with the Beauty of the antient Authors, and admiring their Inventions, despised the generality of the Doctors, who follow'd the Tradition of the Schools, neglecting a polite Style, in order to mind Things, and to speak in the proper Language of the Schools¹. They gain'd a great Reputation, both because they wrote in a pure Style, and because, from the reading of the antient Authors, they had learnt how to gain the Applause of every Body. Although these Endeavours of the Humanists made but small Impression upon the Lawyers and Divines in this Century, yet in the following they had prodigious Effects; for in the beginning thereof they began to study the Pandects, and the other Books of Justinian, after a different Method, from what had been formerly practis'd, to wit, with the help of the Languages, and the Roman History. They began to explain the Laws after a different Manner, and to write Commentaries upon them in better Language, and to find out the true Sense of them; and the first that broke the Ice in Italy was Andrea Alciato, Professor of the Law in the University of Milan. From Italy this new Method pass'd into France, where Gulielmus Budæus and Carolus Molinæus were the first that imploy'd their Parts about it; but it cannot be deny'd, that, in process of Time, the French out-did the Professors of Italy in it, for so many notable Lawyers shin'd there, amongst the rest the incomparable Cujacius, that they obscured the Fame of all others.

THE Lutheran Heresy, which shortly after gain'd Ground, occasion'd the like Change in Divinity. He pretended to reform both the Method and Study of Religion. Melancthon, his faithful Disciple, imploy'd all his Learning and Parts in that Reformation; hence the pretended Reformers apply'd themselves with great Ardor to study the Belles Lettres, finding that Eloquence, and the Reputation of great Erudition gain'd many over to their Opinions: They consider'd these Studies, as necessary Means for reforming the Church; and making themselves to be admired by the Ignorant, they easily made them believe, that the Catholick Divines knew no more of Religion, than of the Belles Lettres: Therefore they obliged the Catholicks to apply themselves to these Studies, in order to fight them with their own Weapons: For which end they applied themselves to the Study of the original Languages, and the best Editions of the antient Authors: Therefore the Greek and Latin Fathers, very little understood in the preceding Centuries, began again to be studied; as also the Ecclesiastical History, the Councils, and the antient Canons, tracing Tradition to its very Fountain, and deducing Doctrine from its own proper Source; and the literal Sense of the Scriptures was narrowly search'd into by the Help of the Languages and Criticism.

BUT in the following sixteenth Century all these Advantages were made use of, not only in the Study of the Laws and Canons, but in that of Divinity. In the Reigns of Ferdinand and his Sons, by the help of the Belles Lettres the Jurisprudence was restored to some Lustre; but in these Beginnings it was not brought to great Perfection, though the Professors of our University, who were the best of those times, were at a great deal of Pains about it. But though the Jurisprudence was not restored to its ancient Splendor, the Wisdom of this Prince, the Skill of his Secretaries in the Languages, and the Learning of our Professors, who began to imploy their Talents in these Studies, more than they had done in the preceding Centuries, produced Laws both prudent, and written in a polite Style. The Roman Law had got footing not only in the Academies, but in the Courts of Justice, whence it came that the Longobard Law was quite forgot.

OF our own Country Laws, those of Ferdinand, who was a most judicious and learned Prince, and who adorn'd his Chancery with Men of exquisite Learning, were the most prudent and polite. They were drawn up by the Advice of the ablest Lawyers, to wit, Luca Tozzolo, Antonio d'Alessandro, Paris de Puteo, and Angelo Arcamone, and, for the most Part, penn'd in Latin by Antonello Petrucci and Johannes Pontanus, who, as we have said, were Men of great Learning in those Times.

THE Laws of our Norman and Suevian Kings were call'd Constitutions: Those of the Anjourian Princes, after the Custom of France, Statutes: Those of the Aragonian and Austrian Kings were call'd Pragmaticks, of these many Collections were made, as from time to time shall be taken Notice of.

WE have seen how few King Alphonfus establish'd; we shall likewise see how few Ferdinand II. and Frederick made in their short and troublesome Reigns: But of all the Aragonian Kings Ferdinand I. left us the most, the wisest, and politest Laws.

IN the first Years of his Reign were establish'd those, which we read inserted in the Pragmaticks, under the Title De Offic. S. R. C. excepting the second, which, as we have observ'd in the preceding Books, is falsely attributed to Ferdinand, because Alphonfus was the Founder of that High Tribunal: the 4, 5, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 37, Pragmaticks were establish'd by this Prince, and bear his Name in their Frontispieces; wherein many Regulations are set down concerning the Administration and Government of the Sacred Council, the Number and Quality both of the greater and lesser Officers, of which it is composed, the Method of appointing the Judges, and all other Things relating to the reforming and prudent Management of that Tribunal.

ON the ninth of October 1462. he put forth one, whereby the Officials were allow'd to proceed ex Officio in Crimes, though there were no Complaint made by the Party offended, revoking the Privilege given to some Corporations of the Kingdom, which for that end was placed in the third Tome of the Pragmaticks, under the Title De Privilegiis Universitatibus concessis.

IN 1466. he publish'd two, one dated the twenty third of July, which we read under the Title *De Baronibus*¹, whereby the Barons were prohibited to demand Subsidies from their Vassals, excepting in such Cases as are allow'd by the Laws and Constitutions, and to hinder them to sell their Goods, as they thought fit; the other, dated the fifteenth of August, under the same Title, whereby the former is confirm'd under severe Penalties.

ON the nineteenth of November 1467. another was put forth, directed to Renzo d'Afflito, Commissary of the further Principato and Capitanata, wherein is prescribed the Method of valuing or appraising every Man's Goods, in order thereby to regulate the Exchequer Payments: We find it under the Title, De Appretio, seu bonorum æstimatione.

ON the second of November 1468. he publish'd another, whereby he ordained, that Criminals should be sent to their competent Judges, and that none should dare to give them Shelter or Maintenance².

IN 1469. other six were publish'd, the first on the twenty seventh of March, the second on the twenty fifth of May, whereby the Officers are forbid to receive Gifts or Entertainments; and the Dues of the Clerks, and other inferior Officers are prescribed, and a Book of Rates is made³; three other in the same Month of May, and the sixth in June following.

IN the Months of March, April, and October 1470. three others were publish'd; and another in June 1471.

ON the thirteenth of September 1472. another was establish'd, whereby Bernardo Striverio, the Attorney General, was appointed to be Inquisitor General of the Kingdom against Usurers and others guilty of heinous Offences, which, in the modern Editions, we read under the Title, De Usurariis, but very incorrect as to the Date, which is made to be the ninth of October 1462. whereas, according to the ancient Editions, it was publish'd in the fifteenth Year of his Reign, thus: Dat. 13 Septembris 1472. Regnor. Nostro. A. 15.

IN March and April 1473. two others, and in March 1474. another.

AFTERWARDS in the Year 1477. were establish'd the great Number of Laws concerning the Manner of judicial Proceedings, of which we have made mention elsewhere; and in the following Years 1479, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 88, 90, to 1492, many others were publish'd by this Prince, which may be readily found, according to the order of Time, in the Chronology of these Laws, prefixt to the first Tome of our Pragmaticks, according to the last Edition of 1715.

IN the following Century, these Pragmaticks of Ferdinand were collected into one Volume, with some others of Ferdinand the Catholick and Charles V. and printed in 1558. Afterwards being join'd to the Constitutions, Usages, and Statutes of the Kingdom, they were Re-printed at Venice in 1590. In that Century many of our Professors employ'd their Parts upon them, some in making Notes, some in writing large Commentaries, and others in particular Treatises. Annibale Troisio of Cava wrote Commentaries upon all those that were publish'd in 1477. Giovannangelo Pisanello, Marcantonio Polverino, and Giacomo de Bottis, made large Notes upon them. Orazio Barbato wrote a Treatise upon the Pragmatick Affis-tentiam. Gio. Barnardino Moscatello of Lucera wrote his Treatise of the Practice of our Tribunals, which is now Re-printed, with the Additions of the Counsellor Prato, upon these Laws of Ferdinand, publish'd in the same Year 1477. Others wrote Treatises upon the Pragmatick, Odia inter conjunctos, and the sundry Disputes about Compromises. So that the Laws of this Prince were look'd upon to have been penn'd with great Judgment and Learning not only in those Times, but in the following Centuries.

Of the Lawyers who flourish'd in those Times.

AFTER Luca di Penna and Sebastiano Napodano, our Professors had in a Manner left off Writing, and our Jurisprudence was upon the declining Hand; but in the Reign of Ferdinand and his Sons, there were found some excellent Lawyers, of whom we must here make mention.

THERE appear'd Paris de Puteo, who being born in Pimonte, in the Dutchy of Amalfi, two Miles distant from Castel a Mare, came young to Naples, where he studied the Law in our University. Not content with our Professors, he made a Tour through all the Universities of Italy, where he attended the Lectures of the most famous Doctors of those Times. He was in Rome, Pavia, Milan, Florence, Bologna, Perugia, and the other most renown'd Cities; and he had for Masters, as he himself declares¹, Andrea Barbatia, Angelo Aretino, Alessandro de Tartagnis of Immola, and Antonio de Pratoveteri of Bologna. Being returned to Naples, on Account of his great Learning, King Alphonfus, a great Favourer of learned Men, caress'd him much, and made him his Counsellor. Afterwards, Ferdinand, his Son, Duke of Calabria, being grown up to Man's Estate, he appointed him to be his Preceptor, and to teach him not only the Belles Lettres, but the Law and the other Sciences². Ferdinand was his Scholar for many Years, from whom he learned the Civil Law, and the other Sciences³. Paris was not only an excellent Lawyer, but versed (according to the Times) in the sacred Writings and those of the Fathers, and in the Works of Aristotle; and, according to the Custom of those Times, he was skill'd in Astrology. He was a pretty good Historian, and had apply'd himself much to the Study of the Books of Titus Livius. He was therefore in great Favour with the Duke of Calabria, and when Alphonfus went from Naples upon the Expedition against Tuscany, Ferdinand, his Son, being appointed Lieutenant of the Kingdom, made Paris his Auditor General of all the Kingdom, which Office he exercised for two Years, that the King was absent, with universal Applause.

ALPHONSUS dying in 1458. Ferdinand, who succeeded him, raised Paris to the greatest Honours and Dignities; he made him Inquisitor General of all the Kingdom against all heinous Offenders: In 1459. he created him a Counsellor, and during all his Reign he took his Advice, as well in enacting Laws, as in all the other weighty Affairs of his Crown. In those Times the pleading of Causes not being reputed derogatory to the Honour of the King's Ministers, no more than it was for them to be Professors of Sciences, Paris likewise exercised the Office of an Advocate, in which he succeeded to Admiration; and as being a great Lawyer, and greatly skill'd in the Feudal Law, all the Causes of the chief Nobility of the Kingdom were defended by him, so that he acquir'd great Riches. But what above all made him the Umpire of the most powerful Lords, not only of Naples, but of many Cities of Italy, was, that in those Times the Custom of Duelling, introduced by the Longobards, being much in Vogue in Italy, there was not a Point of Chivalry, which was to be decided that way, but Paris was consulted in it, as the best acquainted with those Matters. Not only our own, but the most distant Princes came to him, whence he took Occasion to compose a Treatise De Duello, which he wrote first in Latin, and afterwards translated into Italian. Being loaded with so many Honours and Dignities, and above eighty Years of Age, in 1493. he died in Naples, a little before King Ferdinand, and was buried in S. Augustine's Church.

HE was the first that renew'd the Custom, left off for many Years, of favouring the Publick with Writing, so that others, moved by his Example, left so many famous Volumes of their Works upon the Laws. He wrote a Book De Syndicatu Officialium, a Work which gain'd great Authority in the Courts of Justice, insomuch, that the Counsellor *Matteo d'Afflitto*¹ does not neglect to commend it in his Writings. It was the first Book that was printed in King Ferdinand's Time; but it being not altogether complete, the Author finish'd and corrected it, and sent it a-new to the Press. It was afterwards reprinted in Venice and Lyons, and is now to be found among the Volumes of the Law-Treatises.

HE also wrote a Book De Reintegratione Feudorum, de finibus, & modo decidendi quæstiones confinium, territoriorum, &c. which was first printed in Naples, and afterwards in Frankfort. A Work also much commended by our Writers, though Carolus Molinæus wish'd it had been digested into better Order, it appearing to him to be very confused.

HE wrote another Book, De Reassumptione Instrumentorum; and some have believed, that that Treatise De Liquidatione, & Præsentatione Instrumentorum, which was printed in Venice in the Year 1590. was likewise a Work of his, but others doubt of its being Authentick.

HE also composed sundry Allegations about the Collections before Luca di Penna's Time, of which Antonio Capce makes mention, but these have not reach'd our Age; nor some others of his Works upon some Titles of the Pandects, De in integrum restit. De eo, quod met. causa. De dolo malo, & de receptis arbitris.

THE Book De Re Militari, or De singuli certamine, was dedicated by him to the Emperor Frederick III. Matteo d'Afflitto says², that what occasion'd his writing it, was a small Treatise De Duello, written long before by Goffredus, an ancient Doctor of the Law. This Book was first printed in Milan in the Year 1515. and we now find it among his other Treatises. He himself, as we have said, translated it into Italian, which was afterwards printed in Naples in 1518.

LASTLY, He wrote another Book De Ludo, of which Afflitto takes notice, and commends it, and we have it printed among the rest of his Works.

AS it was disputed of what Country Pietro delle Vigne and Luca di Penna were, so the native Country of Paris was call'd in question. Giulio Clara of Alessandro, in the Dutchy of Milan, will have him to be of Alessandria. But as Toppi did us Justice in that point, with respect to Luca di Penna, so he demonstrated that Paris was ours likewise, as has been constantly affirm'd, not only by our own, but by foreign Writers, such as Molinæus, who calls him Doctor Neapolitanus, as he also calls Luca di Penna Parthenopæus.

ABOUT the same time flourish'd likewise Antonio d'Alessandro, a Neapolitan Knight, and a renown'd Lawyer. From his Youth he apply'd himself to the Study of the Laws in the Universities of Naples: Not well pleased with our Professors, he went in search of better in the other Universities of Italy. He went to Ferrara and Sienna, where he attended the Lectures of Francesco Aretino, a famous Lawyer of those Times, under whom he made wonderful Progress, and he was also, according to Matteo d'Afflitto, Scholar to Alessandro d'Immola. He took his Degree of Doctor in Bologna, and then return'd to Naples. He was no sooner arriv'd, than Ferdinand invited him to read Law in our University, where he taught for many Years with so great Applause, that Scholars flock'd to him from the most remote Parts. He was of a sharp and great Wit, a plain, easy, and copious Expounder of the Laws; so that a vast Number of Lawyers were educated in his School, as well as in the Academy of Pontanus.

AT the same Time that he taught in the Chair, he likewise pleaded at the Bar, where he became a famous Advocate, and he was no less learned than eloquent: He defended the Causes of the principal Barons, and acquired a great Reputation, not only by pleading, but writing. He wrote a learned Answer in the Feodal Cause of Antonia Tommacella, which we now read amongst the Consultations of *Alessandro d'Immola*¹, after those of *Sigismondo Loffredo*²; and by his Prudence, Learning, Knowledge of History, and grave Deportment he acquir'd King Ferdinand's utmost Favour and Esteem: he was therefore employ'd by him in his most important Affairs. In 1458. he sent him to Rome, as his Ambassador, to Pope Pius II. in order to get the Investiture of the Kingdom from that Pope: He surmounted the Obstacles which the Duke of Anjou had thrown in his way, and at last grew into so great Favour with the Pope, and the College of Cardinals, that he dictated the Bull of Investiture. He managed the Affairs of State with great Dexterity, Ease, and Prudence, insomuch that Ferdinand sent him Ambassador twice to Spain, to John King of Aragon, his Uncle, with whom he negotiated the Marriage between the King and Joan, his Daughter. He likewise sent him twice his Ambassador to the King of France, and as oft to Innocent VIII. and Alexander VI. Pope Pius's Successors, in which Embassies he behaved himself with so much Prudence and Address, that they had all happy Issues. Therefore he was by Ferdinand raised to the greatest Honours: Besides having dubb'd him a Knight, he made him President of the Royal Chamber; afterwards, in 1465. a Counsellor, and in 1480. Vice-protonotary and President of the Sacred Council, in which Tribunal he presided not only during Ferdinand's Life, but was continued in that Post by Alphonfus II. his Successor, by Ferdinand II. yea, by Charles VIII. and by Frederick the last King, in whose Reign, being now very old, he died in Naples on the twentieth sixth of October 1499. Pompous Obsequies were perform'd to him in the Church of Monte Oliveto, where Francesco Puccio, a Florentine, pronounced his Funeral Oration, in Presence of Ferdinand of Aragon, Duke of Calabria, and where he now lies buried.

THIS renown'd Doctor left us many Monuments of his Learning. The learn'd Commentaries, made upon those Laws, which he explain'd in the University, of which but few were printed. Those, that were printed, are the Commentaries upon the second Book of the Code, which bear this Title: Reportata Clarissimi U. J. Interpretis Domini Antonii de Alexandro super II. Codicis in florenti; studio Parthenopæo sub aureo sæculo, & augusta pace Ferdinandi, Siciliae, Hierusalem, & Ungariae Regis invictissimi. The Book was printed in Naples in 1474. in the Printing-house of Sixtus Reisinger, the German, who was the first, as has been said, that introduc'd the Art of Printing into this City.

*NICCOLO Toppi*³ declares, that he had seen the other Commentaries upon the other Laws, in Manuscript, in some Libraries, and that he had observed several Volumes of them in that of the Counsellor Felice di Genaro. Some others upon the Infertiatum, and the Jus Novum in that of the President of the Royal Chamber Lincenzo Cercione. Others upon the Jus Vetus in that of the Counsellor Ortenzio Pepe. Some Lectures upon the second of the Jus Vetus, on Parchment, in the Custody of Doctor Gio. Battista Sabatino. Gio. Luca Lombardo had likewise a Book intitled: Recollectæ D. Antonii de Alexandro in tit. soluto Matrimonio. De liberis, & posthumis; & de vulgari, & pupillari, &c. collectæ per Franciscum Miroballum ejus scholarem, dum idem Antonius in Neapolitano Gymnasio, anno 1460. publico Regio stipendio conductus, legeret, concurrens Domini Andree Mariconæ in lectione extraordinaria. Toppi himself affirms, that he had also in his Custody some Notes in Manuscript, made by this Lawyer upon the Works of Bartolus.

WE have at present some Notes made by him upon the Gloss of *Napodanus: Grammaticus*⁴ quotes the Additions, which he made to Bartolus and Baldus: And both he and *Ant. Capece*⁵ quote the other Additions, which this Lawyer made to Andree d'Isernia upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom; and we still see these Additions to the Constitutions, printed with the Glosses and Commentaries of Napodanus, for which see the Epistle of Camillus Salernitanus upon the Usages of Naples.

THERE flourish'd at the same time another famous Lawyer, to wit, Giovanni Antonio Caraffa, celebrated for his Knowledge both of the Civil and Canon Laws. He was in great Favour with King Alphonfus, and yet in greater with Ferdinand, his Son, who made him a Counsellor. He was Professor in our University both of the Civil and Canon Laws; and at last in 1463. he was raised to the Post of President of the Sacred Council. We have many Works of this celebrated Doctor remaining. A Treatise De Simonia, printed in Rome; another De Ambitu, quoted by *M. d' Afflitto*¹, upon the Constitutions and Decisions; and one De Jubileo. He likewise wrote some Prelections upon the Code, quoted by Afflitto. *Laurentius Valla*² made this Panegyrick upon him: Johannes Antonius Caraffa, Jurconsultus pari Nobilitate, & Scientia proximus, Princeps Jurconsultorum. He died suddenly in Naples on the twenty fifth of December 1486. and, according to Giuliano Passaro in his Journals, was buried in the Cathedral.

LUCA Tozzolo, a Roman, being banish'd his native Country, came to Naples, and ended his Days here. On account of his great Erudition and Knowledge of the Laws he was honourably received by Ferdinand. He had been a Scholar under Giovani Petrucci of Monte Sperello, a famous Lawyer in his Time: In 1466. he was made a Counsellor, and at the same Time taught the Laws in the University of Naples: In 1468. he was raised to the Honour of Vice-protonotary, and for some Time presided in the Sacred Council.

ANDREA Mariconda, of the Seggio of Capuana, also flourish'd at the same Time, and acquired the Character of a famous Lawyer. From his Youth he apply'd himself to the Study of the Laws, and on the fifteenth of October 1460. took the Degree of Doctor in Naples. He became a renown'd Advocate in the Courts of Justice, and in 1461. he was made a Counsellor by Queen Isabel, then Regent in the Absence of the King her Husband. He was afterwards made President of the Royal Chamber, and Auditor of the High Court of the Mint by Ferdinand, and in 1477. a Counsellor: He was also famous in our University, where in 1466. he taught the Laws together with Antonio d' Alessandrio. We find some of his Lectures, in MS. upon the Infortiatum & Jus Novum. He was for a long time a Counsellor, and, in the Absence of Antonio d' Alessandrio, he often exercised the Office of Vice-protonotary in his Room. Afterwards, by reason of his great Age, he was discharged, and allow'd the half of his Salary as long as he liv'd. He died in Naples about the Year 1508. and left Diomede and Niccolo, his Sons, both learned and grave Lawyers.

THERE likewise flourish'd Antonio dell' Amatrice, a famous Canonist, and Professor of the Canon Law in 1478. in our University. Antonio di Battimo, a Neapolitan, also an eminent Doctor both of the Civil and Canon Laws. In 1475. he wrote a Volume, which *Toppi*³ had seen in MS. with this Title: Reportata, & tradita per D. Antonium de Battimo Parthenopæum U. J. D. A. D. 1475. Lallo di Tuscia, a Neapolitan, of whom we have some Notes upon our Constitutions of the Kingdom. Stefano di Gaeta, likewise a Neapolitan, a famous Canonist, flourish'd in the Reign of Ferdinand, and in 1470. wrote a Treatise, which was very much esteem'd, De Sacramentis, and dedicated it to Giovan Battista Bentivoglio, Counsellor to King Ferdinand, and it is highly commended by the Abbot *Tritemius*⁴.

ABOUT the end of this Century, to pass over others of obscure Fame, flourish'd Antonio di Gennara, of the Seggio of Porto, a celebrated Lawyer: He was the Son of Masetto and Giovannella d' Alessandrio, the Sister of the famous Antonio: He made wonderful Progress in the Study of the Law, insomuch that in the University of Naples he was reputed the ablest Professor of his Time. In 1481, King Ferdinand made him a Judge of the High Court, and shortly after his Counsellor. He was also employ'd by the King in the most weighty Affairs of State: In 1491. Ferdinand sent him Ambassador to the Duke of Milan, and the same Year, with the same Character, to King Ferdinand the Catholick and Queen Isabella his Wife, and in 1493, he was again sent to Milan and Rome. King Ferdinand being dead, Alphonfus II. his Successor, sent him the third time to the Duke of Milan. In 1495. King Frederick sent him a-new his Ambassador into Spain to the Catholick King, and afterwards to the Duke of Milan. Ferdinand's Progeny being extinct, in the Reign of Ferdinand the Catholick he was very much in Favour with the Great-Captain, who, in 1503, made him Vice-protonotary and President of the Sacred Council, in which Offices he continued for a long time: Afterwards being full of Years, he laid down his Posts, and was content, that Francesco Loffredo, then a Counsellor, should exercise them, but upon Condition, that while he himself lived, he should not assume the Title of Vice-protonotary or President, but be satisfied with the exercise alone. At last, in 1522. he died in Naples, and was buried in the Church of S. Peter, the Martyr, where we may see his Statue, and read the Inscription on his Tomb.

LASTLY, the so much celebrated and renoun'd Matteo degli Affitti, that perpetual Ornament of our Sacred Court, brings up the Year; he, according to the Character, which the incomparable Francesco d'Andrea gives him, was Omnium nostrorum quotquot ante, & post ipsum scripserunt, procul dubio doctissimus. He was born in Naples about the Year 1443. but his Forefathers were of the City of Scala, as he himself testifies¹. He had the Vanity to derive his Pedigree from the Roman Patricians and S. Eustathius the Martyr (as was said of Sebastiano Napolitano and Sannazaro: The first deriving his Origin from S. Sebastian, and the second from S. Nazareus) therefore in the Invocation of the Saints, which he makes at the Beginning of his Works, amongst the rest he invokes S. Eustathius, his Kinsman. Therefore he could not forbear writing in the Commentaries upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom, that his Forefathers were Romans, who, in the decay of the Empire, came to live in the City of Scala, from whence they afterwards removed to Naples, where they were aggregated into the Seggio of Nido. However that may be, he apply'd himself in his Youth to the study of the Laws, in which he made great Proficiency, and in the Year 1468. took his Degree of Doctor in Naples. Then he pleaded at the Bar, and became a famous Advocate in the Courts of Justice: From the Tribunals he passed to the Chair, and in our University explain'd not only the Civil and Canon Laws, but also the Feodal and our Constitutions, in which he succeeded to admiration, and eclipsed all that had gone before him. He spent twenty Years in that Exercise with universal Applause. In the first Years he explain'd the Feodal Books and the Commentaries of Andrea d'Isernia, according to the order of the Titles: A Work truly great and new, which, neither before nor after him, none have ventured upon, and he brought it to a happy Conclusion. He began to write his Feodal Commentaries in 1475, in the thirty second Year of his Age, and finish'd them in 1480, as he himself witnesseth²: Which confutes the Error of those, who being misled by *Bartolommeo Camerario*³, who believed that Affitto made these Commentaries when he was old, and therefore had not well understood Andrea d'Isernia's Meaning; have inconsiderately written the same, thereby shewing that they had not carefully read his Commentaries, which would have undeceived them of that Mistake, and made them see, that the Work was written in his greatest Vigour, and that it was the most sublime and learned of all that ever had been written upon that Subject.

HE also interpreted the Laws of the Code, and the Books of the Institutes, and last of all, with unwearied Application, he explained the Constitutions of our Kingdom.

THE Fame of his Learning, his profound Skill in the Laws, and, according to the Times, his great Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, of the Works of S. Thomas, and of Nicholas de Lira, made him exceeding famous. The Nobility of Nido admitted him into their Seggio: King Ferdinand I. and the Duke of Calabria, his Son, began to advance him to publick Employments; first, they pitch'd upon him to be Advocate for the Poor, but he would not accept of it, as he himself owns⁴: Afterwards, in 1489. King Ferdinand made him Judge of the High Court of the Vicariate: Then, in 1491, by the same King, he was made President of the Royal Chamber. As the Death of King Ferdinand put all the Kingdom into Disorder, so it not only lessen'd his Authority, but during the various Revolutions that follow'd, he was sadly oppress'd. His Merit was not rewarded by the succeeding Princes, as it deserved: Sometimes he was removed to one Tribunal, sometimes to another, and under the Catholick King Fortune frown'd exceedingly upon him. In 1496. King Ferdinand II. made him a Counsellor, and he continued such till 1502, when he was again removed to the Royal Chamber. Charles VIII. turned him out, but afterwards restored him. In 1503. he was again admitted into the Council, where he sat till 1507. But afterwards, Ferdinand the Catholick was so much influenced by the Envy of his Rivals, who insinuating to his Majesty, that Afflitto, by Reason of his decrepit Age, was apt frequently to dote, that the King turned him out of the Council, and reduced him to lead a private Life; of which he makes a heavy Complaint in his Works. But in this Retirement from Business he did not leave off his Studies, and, though old, in a few Years completed his Commentaries upon the Constitutions, which having begun in 1510. he finish'd them in 1513. in the seventieth Year of his Age¹.

HE was afterwards in 1512. again made Judge of the Vacariate, but for one Year only, so that that being ended, he return'd to his Studies, and to end his Days in Peace and Quiet. Whence it is, that in his Will, which he made on the twenty seventh of September 1523, a little before he died, he takes no other Title upon him but that of simple Doctor. And whence it likewise came, that having died this Year 1523, leaving in his Will, that his Body should be buried in the Church of Monte Vergine: Diana Carmignana, his second Wife, a most prudent Woman, in order to clear her Husband from the Stain, which his Enemies had thrown upon him, of his being delirious, in the Inscription which she caused to be engraved upon his Tomb, she order'd these Words to be inserted: Ad extremam senectutem integra, & animi, & corporis valetudine pervenit.

BY his first Wife Ursina Caraffa he left Marino, his Son, who being ordain'd a Priest, was made a Canon of the Cathedral Church of Naples; and by Diana Carmignana several Children, who he appointed to be his Heirs, three of which, as has been said, he begat after he was past sixty Years of Age. He intailed the House, which he possess'd in the Quarter of Nido, and a Farm in the Village of Centore near Aversa, and upon Failure of all his Male Descendants, he appointed the College of Doctors Utriusque Juris of Naples (of which he was) to succeed, upon Condition that the Prior of it should convert the House into a College, where ten Students should be maintain'd and educated by the Rents of that Farm, the Election of whom he left to the Prior; and in Case the College of Doctors should happen to be abolish'd, he substituted that of the five Nobles of the Seggio of Nido, of whom the youngest was to have the same Charge as had been imposed upon the Prior, of maintaining the College, and the ten Students, that nothing might be wanting for encouraging them to follow their Studies: The Observance of which he strenuously recommended: Quia scit, as the Words of the Will are, quantum viri scientifici sint utiles Reipublicæ, & toti sæculo.

SUCH were the Dispositions of the judicious and learned Men of these Times, upon failure of their Offspring, not to appoint Monasteries and Churches to enjoy their Estates; but to relieve the Poor, and promote the Arts and Sciences. His Posterity are still in being, who owe to this famous Doctor not only the Honour they enjoy as Nobles of the Seggio of Nido, but that they can value themselves upon being descended of so glorious an Ancestor, the Founder of their Family.

THE yet more illustrious Works, which he left us, are still remaining. As for his Commentaries upon Fiefs (though his Rivals Sigismondo Loffredo and Camerario had a different Opinion of them) the incomparable *Francesco d'Andrea*² gives them this Character: Inter omnes qui post Afflictum integra Commentaria in secula edidere, parvi sunt, qui cum illo possint comparari; qui præferri certè nullus. He had not the Pleasure in his Life-time to see his Works printed; excepting the Decisions and the Commentaries upon the Constitutions, all the rest were printed after his Death. Before he died, he had enter'd into an Agreement with Niccolo Agnello Imperato, a Printer in Naples, about the printing of them, and in his Will had allotted the Money arising from the Books for Portions to his Daughters; but Death broke his Measures. The Commentaries upon Fiefs were afterwards printed in Venice in 1543, and 1547. and then at different Times, and in different Places reprinted.

HE was the first that thought of collecting the Decisions, which in the Course of many Years had been made in our Sacred Court, and that put them in that Order we now read them, in which he gives an account not only of the Decisions of that Tribunal, and of the Royal Chamber pronounced in the Time he sat there, but also of those which he thought worth recording, and had been made from the Institution of the Sacred Council, by King Alphonfus. A Work not only most celebrated with us but likewise with Foreigners, in Imitation of which other Nations have collected the Decisions of their Tribunals, whence arose the new Tribe of the Decisionanti.

THESE were printed in Naples in the Author's Life-time in 1509, and were dedicated to the City of Naples, the Place of his Nativity. He himself tells us so in his Will, wherein he orders twenty five Ducats to be deducted from that Share of his Estate, which he had left to D. Marino, his Son, as the Price of twenty seven Copies of the Decisions, which he had taken. How much these were cry'd up by our Professors, may be seen by the Labours of Tommaso Grammatico, Giovannangelo Pisanello, Marcantonio Polverino, Prospero Caravita, Cesare Ursillo, and Girolamo de Martino, who illustrated them with their Notes and Additions, which are now printed with the Body of the Decisions, in which Ursillo exceeded them all. Nevertheless, his Rivals Loffredo and Camerario did not fail to discredit and despise them, writing in their Works, that they did not deserve so much Credit, Ex quo, as Loffredo says¹, aliter judicatum fuit, quam Afflictus dicit: And *Camerario*², Nemo à sacri Consilii auctoritate commoveatur ex iis Afflicti decisionibus, cum sint Afflicti verba, qui cum homo fuerit potuit errare. But the Malice of these did not obscure their Fame, for in the following Century they were spread all over Europe, and extoll'd not only by our own, but by all the ablest Lawyers of foreign Nations, and *Thefaurus*³ prefers them to all the Decisions that ever were pronounced in any Tribunal of the World.

HE likewise left us his Commentaries upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom: A Work, considering the Times, very learned and copious, which was highly esteem'd not only with us, but with Foreigners: Jacobus Spiegellius extols it⁴, and says, that Cassaneus, in his Commentaries upon the Usages of France, stole many Things from those of Afflitto, for which he is blam'd by many for Ingratitude, in not vouchsafing so much as to mention him. These were likewise printed in the Author's Life-time, in 1517, and afterwards reprinted in Milan in 1523. and elsewhere.

WHILE he was explaining in our University the Constitutions of the Kingdom made by the Emperor Frederick II. believing, that the Constitution Sancimus, de Jure Prothomisos was also that Emperor's; in 1479, he explain'd it as such. It was truly Frederick's I. and did not belong in the least to our Constitutions, as we have observ'd elsewhere; but this Writer, according to the times, not being well versed in History, was therefore led into that Mistake. But for all that the Commentary he made upon it was highly commended, insomuch, that the incomparable *Cujacius*⁵ quotes it in his Book of Fiefs. It has been often printed, and is to be found amongst his Works. Francesco Rummo, a Neapolitan Lawyer, made large Additions to it afterwards, which he having caused to be printed in Naples in 1654. with the rest of his Works, we have seen it reprinted in these latter Times.

DEVOURING Time has robb'd us of many others of his Works; and, as may be gather'd from his Will, he design'd to have caused many Books to be printed by Imperato, his Printer; but his Death, and the Pestilence that happen'd in Naples in 1527, to shun which Diana Carmignola, his Wife, was forced to fly to Aversa, occasion'd not only the Loss of his Manuscripts, but of the Books which he had left to his Children. In the Collection, which Gabriele Saraina made of the Manuscripts of several Doctors, which he caused to be printed in 1560. we read some Lectures of this Author upon the seventh Book of the Code.

HE likewise wrote many Commentaries upon some Laws of the Code, and upon the Institutes, of which, save the mention he makes, when he quotes them in his Works, we have no other Knowledge.

IN the Inscription upon his Tomb we still see: Multa scitissima consilia reliquit: but they are not to be found now: But he frequently quotes these Consilia in his printed Works, and amongst the rest one, which he wrote in the Kingdom of *Sardinia*¹.

HE likewise wrote a Treatise De Consiliariis Principum, & de Officialibus eligendis ad Juslitiam regendam, ac eorum qualitatibus, & requisitis, which he dedicated to Ferdinand I. At the Desire of Cardinal Oliviero Caraffa he also wrote L'Ufficio della Traslazione del Corpo di S. Gennaro, upon the removing of the Body of that Saint in 1497. from the Monastery of Monte Vergine, to Naples; of which Works we have nothing left, but the bare mention he makes in quoting them in his other Works. He also wrote a Book De Privilegiis Fisci, of which Giovan Battista Zilletto makes mention.

IN the Reigns of Ferdinand I. and his Sons, by the Favour of that Prince, and by the so many and illustrious Professors, our Jurisprudence was raised and grown into much greater Esteem than it had been in the preceding Centuries. And as in the other Universities of Italy, the whole Study and Attention of the Chairs were on the Books of Justinian, so in ours that Study was promoted by the many Professors who employ'd themselves in it; and seeing, as we have observed elsewhere, for the most part, the Professors were, besides, either Magistrates or Advocates; thence it happened, that as these Books had, many Years before, been in Force and Authority in the Chairs, so by degrees it was seen, that they acquired the same Vigour in our Tribunals. Whence it came to pass, that in this Century the Longobard Law was quite laid aside, not only by the Courts of Justice, but by the Chairs, and that at last it yielded to the Roman. The Professors, the Advocates, and the Magistrates apply'd themselves to the Study of the Roman Law, and of the Authors that commented upon it, quoting it not only in the Schools, but in the Tribunals. And the same Matteo d'Afflitto writes², that though he had heard from the old Advocates, that in the Courts of Justice the Longobard Law had prevailed over the Roman; yet, that in his time, both when he was Judge of the Vicariate, and when afterwards President of the Royal Chamber, and Counsellor of the Sacred Council, he had never seen that, nay, quite contrary, the Roman prevail'd over the Longobard Law.

IN these times, therefore, it was, and upon this rise not only of the Belles Lettres, but of the other Sciences, that with us the Longobard Laws yielded to the Roman; whence it afterwards came to pass, that their Name was scarce known by our Lawyers. Behold the Period and End of the Longobard Laws, and from this time forward you shall not hear them any more mentioned.

BUT though these Laws were abolish'd, yet there are some Vestiges of their Usages still remaining among us. In Abruzzo many Customs are kept up relating to Fiefs, which are regulated according to the Longobard Laws, and that Province still retains the Bona Gentilitia. The Usages of Bari being for the most Part founded upon these Laws, not only their Terms, but their Customs are still preserv'd there. In the Contracts, which are drawn up in many of the other Provinces, if Women be concern'd, the Notaries, even in our Time, insert the Mundaldum in their Favour. The Style of inserting in Instruments the Clause Jure Romano, &c. still continues, to denote that the contracting Parties liv'd under that Law, and not under the Longobard. The Terms of Virgines in capillis, and many others continue to this Day, of which we made a long Catalogue in the fifth Book of this History. And that the Memory of them might not be quite lost, Giovan Battista Nenna, a considerable Lawyer of these Times, Author of the Treatise of The True Nobility, which he intitled Nennio, and dedicated to Bona, Queen of Poland and Dutchess of Bari, having found amongst the Books of his Ancestors a voluminous Commentary of Carlo di Tocco upon the Longobard Laws: At the Request of many of his Friends, he abridged it, and having written some short Notes upon it, with an alphabetical Explanation of the obscure Longobard Words, he caused it to be printed in Venice 1537. which proved very useful to Lawyers, and, as Beatillo says, no less beneficial to the City of Bari, and many other Places of the Kingdom, where the Longobard Laws are observed even to this Day.

BESIDES our own¹, foreign Writers also make mention of this Work, such as *Pignorius*², and what is more strange, even Germans, such as *Lindenbrogius*³ and *Burcardus Struvius*⁴. With the same intent Prospero Rondella of Monopoli, wrote his Treatise: In Reliquias Juris Longobardi, printed in Naples in the Year 1609. because many Places of the Kingdom still observe some of their Usages; but because the Kingdom is now generally regulated by other Laws, and the Longobard out of date, whoever of himself cites these particular Usages, he's under an Obligation to prove them⁵.

THE Laws then, whereby our Kingdom was generally governed, were those contained in the Pandects of Justinian, according to the ancient Division of Pileus and Bulgarus, of which Accursio and all the other Glossators made use: The Code De repetita prælectione: The Institutes, and the Novella, according as they are number'd by Agilzaus. Then follow the Constitutions of the Kingdom, wherein are contained the Laws of our Norman and Suevian Kings. The Statutes of the Kingdom, which comprehend the Laws of the Anjouvian Kings. The Customs of the Royal Chamber, and of the High Court. The particular Usages, as well of Naples, as of the other Cities of the Kingdom; and lastly, the new Pragmaticks, which were begun by Alphonfus I. and were afterwards increased by the other Aragonian and Austrian Kings, to the Number we now see. With respect to the Fecdal Law: The Books of Fiefs, with the Constitutions, Statutes, and the late Pragmaticks, establish'd afterwards, relating to them.

THOUGH in these times the Books of the Doctors of Law were not increased to that vast Number we now see; and though there were not so many Volumes of Treatises, Consultations, Allegations, Debates, Solutions, and Decisions; yet, since that by the means of the Press they began to appear more than usually, therefore it became a settled Rule among the Judges, whenever the Laws were wanting, to follow, either the Authority of decided Cases, or the most general Opinion of the Doctors, and more frequently their Commentaries, than their Consultations; so that when the Laws, the Customs, Usages, and the Method of judging fail'd, it was not left to their Discretion and Prudence to decide, but they were to follow the most approved Sentiments of the Doctors. And in that there were many Rules and Precautions prescribed. 1. If the Interpreters shall be found to clash and disagree among themselves, the judge shall follow the greatest Number, and their Precepts must be reputed the most approved Opinion. 2. The Judges shall rather follow the Opinion of those, who on purpose, and narrowly shall be found to have discuss'd, and examined the Matter, than of those, who cursorily, without having in the least examined it, follow the rest. 3. That they shall rather follow their Commentaries and Treatises, than their Consultations, or Answers and Allegations. 4. When the Matter in question concerns the ecclesiastical Court, they shall be obliged to follow the Canonists, in the same manner as they are bound to follow the Civilians in Cases belonging to the secular Court. 5. Seeing that Opinions, as well as all other human Things grow old; and that the Course of Time, long Use, and the new Experience of Things teach Men so, that they often make them forsake the old Dictates; wherefore it is fit, that the Judges should rather follow the new, than the old Opinions of the Interpreters. Our Authors give us a vast many other Rules prescribed concerning that Matter; of which, to pass over others, *Dionysius Gothofredus*⁶, and the most judicious *Arthur Duck*⁷, have written at large.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXIX.

THE History of the War, which, at the Instigation of Lewis Sforza, Charles VIII. King of France waged with Alphonfus II. who, upon his Father's Death, with great Solemnity was immediately crown'd King in the City of Naples by the Hands of Cardinal Borgia, has been so well written by Philip de Comines, a Contemporary Writer, who was employ'd by Charles in the deepest Intrigues of that Expedition, by Francesco Guicciardino and Seignior Jovius, that we might justly refer the Reader to their Histories; but seeing that no wise Prince ever made War, but at the same time he endeavour'd to make it appear just; and our Writers not having discover'd the Reasons, wherewith the French represented it as such to their King, I hope, seeing occasion offers, I shall not be thought tedious in discovering them now. Before the Expedition was fully resolv'd upon, the King's Pretensions were examin'd by a solemn Scrutiny, and, in the Opinion of his Advisers, they being found sufficient, the King was by them persuaded, that he had good Grounds for uniting the Kingdom of Naples to the Crown of France. They built the Pretension upon these Foundations: Renatus of Anjou, as we have seen in the preceding Books, having lost the Kingdom, had left his Son John the Hopes of recovering it out of the the Hands of Ferdinand I. of Aragon, but while John lived, he never could see a good Issue of that War; for though Ferdinand, after the Death of his Father Alphonfus, was attack'd both by John, and the chief of the Barons of the Kingdom; yet, by his good Fortune and Valour, he not only defended himself, but so harass'd his Enemies, that neither in the Life-time of John, nor of his Father Renatus, who lived many Years after his Son, had he ever more occasion to contend with, or be afraid of the Anjouviens. At last Renatus died, and not leaving Male Issue, but only a Daughter, Mother to the Duke of Lorrain, he made Charles, the Son of the Count of Maine, his Brother¹, Heir to all his Rights. Thus Charles was not John's Son, as by a Mistake some modern Authors have written², he was indeed Renatus's Nephew, by a Brother, not a Sister. Charles likewise shortly after died without leaving Issue, and by his Will left his Heritage to Lewis XI. King of France, who was the Son of a Sister of Renatus's. Many Clauses of this Will, which Charles made in Marseilles on the tenth of December 1481, are to be found in the first Tome of the Collection of Treatises of Peace between the Kings of France and other Princes, written by Frederick Lionard, and printed in Paris in the Year 1693, wherein he appoints Lewis his universal Heir, whom he calls his Cousin-German, and after him Charles, the Dauphin of France, Lewis's Son, to whom, as supreme Lord, fell not only the Dutchy of Anjou, in which, being a Member of the Crown, Women do not succeed, but he enter'd in Possession of Provence, and by Virtue of this Will he could pretend, that the Rights which the Anjouviens had to the Kingdom of Naples, were convey'd to him. But Lewis, always averse to concern himself with the Affairs of Italy, and content with Provence, did not disturb the Kingdom. Upon Lewis's Death these Rights continuing in the Person of Charles VIII. his Son, a Youth covetous of Glory, by the Persuasion of some, who said to him, that this was a fair Opportunity to raise the Glory of his Predecessors, he conceiv'd Hopes of conquering the Kingdom of Naples by force of Arms.

BUT in these Beginnings the Duke of Lorrain started up as his Competitor, for the King being to be crown'd at the Age of fourteen or fifteen Years, the Duke came to him to demand the Dutchy of Bar, and the County of Provence. He supported his Pretension by being born of a Daughter of Renatus, and consequently Renatus had not Power to prefer Charles, who was descended of his Brother, to him who was born of his own Sister. But it being reply'd on the contrary, that in Provence Women were excluded from the Succession, the Dutchy of Bar was surrender'd to him, and as for his Pretension to Provence, it was agreed, that within four Years both their Rights to that County were to be decided by Law. Philip de Comines, who was one of the Council appointed to examine these Rights, which was done before the four Years expired, in Presence of some Advocates of Provence, writes, that searching into certain Wills of King Charles I. the Brother of S. Lewis, and other Kings of Sicily of the House of France, by virtue of which those Advocates said, that not only the County of Provence belonged to Charles, but likewise the Kingdom of Sicily, and all that had been possess'd by the Family of Anjou; and that the Duke of Lorrain had not the least Pretension to Provence, not only because Charles, the late Count of Provence, the Son of Charles of Anjou, Count of Maine, and Nephew of Renatus, had by his Will appointed Lewis XI. his Heir, but also because Renatus had preferr'd him to the Duke of Lorrain, though born of his Daughter, in order to fulfil the Intents of the said Wills made by Charles I. of Anjou, and the Countess of Provence, his Wife. They likewise added, that the Kingdom of Sicily and County of Provence could not be separated; nor could Women succeed in them, when there were Males of the Descent. And lastly, that besides King Charles I. those who succeeded him in the said Kingdom, made the like Wills, as, among the rest, Charles II. of Anjou, his Son.

THE Provençals having thus made their Court to King Charles, and he having insinuated to those of the Council, to order Matters so, as he might not lose Provence, the four Years being expir'd, the Council, to tire the Duke's Patience, spun out their Examination, and not able to keep him longer in Suspence, at last the Duke, having discover'd the Intention of the King and his Council, left the Court in great Disgust, and very angry with the Council.

DURING these Transactions, four or five Months before the Duke left the Court, as has been mention'd in the preceding Book, he had an Invitation from the Pope and the rebellious Barons to come and conquer the Kingdom, of which, if he had made a right Use, he might have been able to make himself Master of the Kingdom of Naples; but such was his Negligence and Slowness, that the Pope and the Barons being quite tired, and out of all Hopes, came to an Agreement with Ferdinand; so that the Duke with great Shame return'd to his own Country, nor had he ever after any Interest with the King.

IN the mean Time the more King Charles grew in Years, the greater was his Desire to go into Italy upon the Expedition against our Kingdom; nor did his Advisers fail to spur him on, saying, that the Kingdom of Naples belonged to him. In this Interim the Prince of Salerno arrived at Paris, who, not trusting to Ferdinand's Word, as we have said, left the Kingdom, and, with three of his Nephews, the Sons of the Prince of Bisignano, went first to Venice, where he had many Friends. There he advis'd with that Republick, what Course he had best take, whether to take shelter from the Duke of Lorrain, the King of France, or from the King of Spain. Philip de Comines, who shews in his Memoirs, that he was in great Friendship with the Prince of Salerno, writes, that having talked of this with the Prince, he told him, that the Venicians advis'd him to have recourse to the King of France, for there was nothing to be expected from the Duke of Lorrain no more than if he were dead. As for the King of Spain there was no occasion to invite him to that Undertaking, but rather to guard against him, because if he had the Kingdom of Naples, with that of Sicily, and the other Places of the Gulf of Venice, being already very powerful at Sea, in a short time he would be able to enslave all Italy; so that he had best apply to the King of France, from whom, and the Friendship they were in with him, a peaceable and mild Government might be expected. He did so, and being arriv'd in France, he was kindly receiv'd, but poorly treated. They labour'd hard for two whole Years, constantly insisting upon the Expedition to Naples; but seeing the Party, that dissuaded the King, was the most prudent, and on the other hand, only a few Favourites, who, perceiving his Inclination, in order to flatter him, push'd him on, this therefore was the Reason of its being delay'd from Day to Day.

BUT what induced the King to undertake the Expedition afterwards was, as has been said, the Invitation of Lewis Sforza, who seeing, that by no other Means he would be able to wrest the Duchy of Milan from his Nephew, but by ruining Alphonfus, who oppos'd his Designs, of which he was continually put in Mind by the Dutchess of Milan, the Duke's Wife, who was his own Daughter, therefore he sent Ambassadors to France to hasten the Expedition, so that at last, without further Delay, King Charles prepared himself for going to Italy.

THE King set out from Vienne in Dauphiny on the twenty third of August 1494, marching strait to Asti, from thence to Turin, and then to Pisa and Florence on his way to Rome. In the mean time Alphonfus, upon the News of this March, had sent one Army into Romagnia near Ferrara, commanded by Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, his Son, and another by Sea to Leghorn and Pisa, of which he made D. Frederick, his Brother, General; but when he understood that King Charles by long Marches was approaching towards Rome, he sent Ferdinand thither to treat with the Pope about the Safety of the Kingdom. But the Approach of the French Army to the Walls of Rome gave Pope Alexander no less Disturbance; for finding that Charles was accompanied by the Cardinal of S. Peter in vinculis, and by many other Cardinals, his Enemies, he was afraid that the King, by their Persuasions, might turn his Thoughts upon reforming the Affairs of the Church, as was already reported; a Thought exceeding terrible to him, who remember'd by what Means he had been rais'd to the Papacy, and by what Tricks and Cunning he had continued to govern¹. But the King, who had nothing so much at Heart as his March to the Kingdom of Naples, eas'd him of that Jealousy, sending Ambassadors to assure him, that he had no Intention to concern himself with what belonged to the Papal Authority, nor require any thing of him but what should be necessary for the Security of his March; therefore the Ambassadors desired that the King, with his Army, might be allow'd to enter Rome, because it would be a Means to turn the Misunderstandings that had been between them into a most sincere Friendship. The Pope judging, that of all Dangers that was the least, granted their Desire; therefore he order'd the Duke of Calabria, with his Army, to leave Rome, and accordingly, on the last Day of December this Year 1494, he march'd out by the Gate of S. Sebastian, at the same Time that the King in Armour, at the Head of his Army, entered by the Gate of S. Maria del Popolo.

KING Charles staid near a Month in Rome, during which Time he was constantly sending Troops to the Borders of the Kingdom, where there was nothing but Uproars and Confusions, insomuch that, before the King left Rome, Aquila, and almost all Abruzzo, had set up his Standard; nor was the rest of the Kingdom much quieter; for Ferdinand had no sooner gone to Rome, than the Effects of the Hatred which the People bore against Alphonfus, began to appear, by exclaiming against his Cruelty and Pride, and openly shewing the great Desire they had to see the French amongst them.

ALPHONSUS, upon hearing that his Son had left Rome, was seiz'd with such Terror, that forgetting the great Reputation and Glory, which, by long Experience, he had acquir'd in the many Wars of Italy, and despairing of being able to withstand so formidable an Enemy, he resolv'd to renounce the Kingdom, and the Instrument of Renunciation being drawn up by Joannes Pontanus, in Presence of Frederick, his Brother, and the chief Nobility of the Kingdom, he renounced all the Royal Title and Authority, in Favour of his Son Ferdinand, in Hopes that the excessive Hatred conceiv'd against him being removed, and so promising a Youth being made King, who had never offended any Person, and was in Favour with every Body, might, perhaps, lessen the Desire of the Subjects to receive the French into the Kingdom. Guicciardine was of Opinion, that if this Renunciation had been sooner made, perhaps it might have had some Effect, but being delay'd till the Mischief was become irretrievable, it was to no Purpose.

ALPHONSUS having thus yielded the Possession of the Kingdom to his Son Ferdinand (who was not above twenty four Years of Age) and caused him to be crown'd in Naples; disturbed in his Mind both Day and Night, he was seized with such a Fear, that he imagined every Body was crying out France, France; therefore he resolv'd immediately to quit Naples and retire to Sicily, which Design he imparted to the Queen, his Mother-in-Law only, but she could not persuade him to communicate it either to his Brother or Son, nor delay it so much as two or three Days to complete the Year of his Reign, but set sail with four light Gallies loaded with rich Furniture; and, at his Departure, he was in so terrible a Fright, that he imagined the French had already surrounded him. However, accompanied by the Queen, his Mother-in-Law, he made his Escape to Mazara, a Town in Sicily belonging to the said Queen, which had been formerly given her by Ferdinand King of Spain, her Brother.

PHILIP de Comines, who was the King of France's Ambassador in Venice, writes, that the News of this Flight surpris'd every Body, especially the Venetians. Some, with a Design to favour the Affairs of the Son, who was not so much hated in the Kingdom as the Father, gave out, that he was gone to the Turk. But the Person who wrote the History of the Aragonian Kings, full of Detraction and Bitterness, and, perhaps, more than they deserved, does not stick to say, that he was always of Opinion, that Alphonfus fled out of downright Cowardice. Being arriv'd in Sicily, after some short stay at Mazara, he went to Messina, where he retir'd to lead a religious Life, attending, with the Monks of the Order of S. John of God, at all the Offices both of the Day and Night, and performing the Fasts, Abstinences, and Alms; and Comines likewise says, if he had not been prevented by Death, he had resolv'd to spend the rest of his Life in a Monastery of Valencia, and to wear the religious Habit. But before ten Months were at an end, after his Retirement in Sicily, he was seized with the tormenting Distemper of the Gravel and Excoriation, which tortured him incessantly, yet he bore it with wonderful Constancy and Patience; at last sinking under the Disease, with great Remorse for his Sins, he ended his Days on the nineteenth of November 1495, at the Age of forty seven Years and fourteen Days, after having reign'd one Year wanting two Days. He was buried with Royal Funeral Pomp in the great Church of Messina, where his Tomb is still to be seen.

THIS Prince, by reason of his short Reign, and of his being wholly addicted to Arms, left us no Laws: Although he did not hinder the Progress of Learning, yet being brought up in the midst of Arms, he was not so great a Lover of learned Men as his Father; and Joannes Pontanus, as has been seen in the preceding Book, had no great Reason to be satisfied with him, on the contrary, he revenged himself upon him for his Ingratitude by that Fable of the Ass that kick'd his Benefactor. Nevertheless he was both Magnificent and Pious. He built two famous Palaces of Pleasure in Naples, one in the Ward Nolana, and another in Poggio Reale: He had a great Opinion of the White Friars of S. Benedict of the Order of Monte Oliveto, to whose Monastery, as has been told elsewhere, he gave great Revenues. He likewise founded the new Church of the Cassinian Monks of S. Severinus, it not seeming decent that the Bodies of two such famous Saints as Sossius and Severinus should lie in two small Churches; and if the foresaid Misfortunes had not prevented him, he would have finish'd it in that magnificent Manner we now see it.

C H A P. I.

Ferdinand II. is driven out of the Kingdom by Charles King of France. That King's Entry into Naples, to whom the Kingdom submits.

FERDINAND, who, after his Departure from Rome, had retir'd within the Borders of the Kingdom, was upon the Flight of his Father recall'd to Naples; and having assumed the Royal Authority and Title, he assembled his Army to stop the Enemy from advancing farther, and incamp'd at S. Germano. But before the King of France arriv'd at S. Germano, Ferdinand abandon'd the Town and the Pass in great disorder, and King Charles having enter'd S. Germano, Ferdinand retir'd to Capua, into which he enter'd with a few Followers, the Citizens refusing to admit any Body of his Troops into the City. Having stopt a few Hours there, and begg'd of the Citizens to continue in their Allegiance to him, promising to return the next Day, he went to Naples, afraid of the Rebellion which accordingly happen'd. The Army had orders to wait for him at Capua; but when he return'd the Day following they were all gone. In the mean Time King Charles had march'd from S. Germano to Tiano, and taken up his Quarters at Calvi, within two Miles of Capua. The Capuans immediately suffer'd him to enter the City with all his Army, from thence having march'd to Aversa, the Neapolitans following the Example of Capua, consult'd about sending Ambassadors to meet him, and offer'd to submit to him, upon Condition, that their antient Privileges should be preserved.

FERDINAND seeing these Proceedings, and that both the Commonalty and Nobility were in open Rebellion and under Arms; and finding that he was not able to withstand such a sudden turn of Fortune, resolv'd to quit the City, and having conven'd on the Esplanade of Castel Nuovo, many Gentlemen and Citizens, he absolv'd them from their Oaths of Allegiance, which, a few Days before, they had taken to him, and gave them Liberty to make their Terms with the King of France, which he did in a Speech full of such moving and tender Expressions, is well described by *Guicciardine*¹, that it drew Tears and Compassion from many of the Hearers. But all the People, and almost the whole Nobility had conceiv'd so great a Hatred against the King, his Father, and such a Liking for the French, that the Tumults continued notwithstanding, and even before his Face the Mob began to plunder his Stables; whereupon having gone out of the Castle by the Postern Gate, he went on board the light Gallies that were waiting for him in the Harbour, and with him imbarc'd D. Frederick, his Uncle, and the old Queen, his Grandfather's Wife, with her Daughter Joan; and with a few Followers sail'd for the Island of Ischia, by the Ancients call'd Ænaria, often repeating with a loud Voice, while he was in sight of Naples, the Verse of the Psalms of David: Nisi Dominus custodierit Civitatem, frustra vigilat qui custodit eam.

UPON Ferdinand's quitting Naples, at the bare mention of the Conqueror's Name, every Body gave way as to an impetuous Torrent; and in the mean Time the Neapolitan Ambassadors having found Charles in Aversa, surrender'd the City to him, to which, with great Generosity, he granted many Privileges and Exemptions. Charles, according to Guicciardino, made his Entry into Naples on the twenty first Day of February this Year 1495, and he was received with such Acclamations and Rejoicing, that it would be in vain to attempt to express them, Men, Women and Children, all Ranks and Conditions of People, and all Parties concurring with incredible Alacrity, as if he had been the Father and Founder of that City. And what was the most surprising of all, those very Persons, who either themselves or their Ancestors, had been rais'd by, or received Favours from the House of Aragon, shew'd no less Gladness than the rest; and Joannes Pontanus himself, who, upon Alphonso's Departure, had been restored to the Office of Secretary by Ferdinand; in the Oration which he made when Charles was crown'd King in the Cathedral Church of Naples, could not forbear running out too much in reviling the Kings of the House of Aragon, by whom he had been so highly exalted.

CHARLES was conducted to lodge in Castel Capuano, for Castel Nuovo was held out by the Marquis of Pescara for Ferdinand; and in a short time all the Provinces of the Kingdom, by Degrees, submitted to the French. All Terra di Lavoro, except Ischia and Gaeta, was reduced. Calabria soon yielded, whither Monseigneur d'Aubigny and Peron de Basque were sent without an Army. Abruzzo revolted of itself, and the first that broke the Ice was the City of Aquila, which had always been in the French Interest. Puglia did the same, except the Castle of Brindisi and Gallipoli, which were overaw'd by the Garrisons, otherwise the People were ready to revolt. In Calabria only three Cities continued loyal to Ferdinand. The two first were Mantea and Tropea, old Anjouvians, who having set up Charles's Standard, but afterwards finding that they had been given to the Lord of Perse, it was immediately pull'd down, and that of Aragon set up again: The third was Reggio, which had always been loyal to its Prince. And Philip de Comines says, that it was through the Neglect of sending Troops to take Possession of the Towns that any continued loyal to Ferdinand, for there were not so many sent to Puglia and Calabria as were sufficient to guard one single Town. The City of Taranto, with the Fort surrender'd. Otranto, Monopoli, Trani, Manfredonia, Barietta, and all the rest did the same. The Inhabitants of these Cities went three Days Journey to meet the French in order to deliver themselves up to Charles, and then sent their Syndicks to Naples to surrender their Cities.

ALL the Grandees and Barons of the Kingdom flock'd to Naples to do him Homage, excepting the Marquis of Pescara, whom Ferdinand had intrusted with the keeping of Castel Nuovo, but his Brothers and his Nephews likewise went thither. The Count of Acri and the Marquis of Squillaci fled to Sicily, because King Charles had given their Estates to Monseigneur d'Aubigny. There was in Naples the Prince of Salerno, the Prince of Bisignano his Brother, with his Sons, the Duke of Melfi, the Duke of Gravina, and the old Duke of Sora, the Counts of Montorio, of Fondi, of Tripaldi, of Celano, of Troja the younger, born in Scotland, and brought up in France, and the Count of Pepolo, who was found Prisoner there: The Prince of Rossano, after having been a long time Prisoner, was set at Liberty, and either willingly, or by force, went with Ferdinand. The Marquis of Venafra, and all the Calabri, and even the Counts of Metalina and Marigliano, though both they and their Predecessors had always served the House of Aragon, were likewise there. In short, all the Barons of the Kingdom, except the three above mention'd, went to Naples to do Homage to King Charles.

GUICCIARDINO very prudently makes this Reflection, that by reason of the domestick Quarrels, whereby the so much renown'd Wisdom of our Italian Princes was clouded, and of the Inconstancy and foolish Love of Novelty of our Neapolitans, to their great Shame, to the Reproach of the Italian Soldiery, and to the imminent Danger and Ignominy of all, a very considerable and powerful Part of Italy was snatch'd from the Dominion of Italians, and subjected to that of Ultramontanes; for though Ferdinand, the elder, was born in Spain, yet because from his Childhood he had been constantly in Italy, either King, or the Son of a King, and because he had no other Dominions in any other Country, and his Children and Grandchildren being all born and educated in Naples, they were justly reputed Italians. And though the Dominion of the French disappear'd like Lightning, yet for all that, Ferdinand was not firmly reinstated in the Kingdom, nor Frederick, his Uncle, a just and prudent Prince, who would otherwise have been able to have blotted out all Memory of the Hatred which the People bore Alphonfus: Nevertheless thro' cruel Necessity, they were forced to have Recourse to Ferdinand the Catholick, King of Spain, for Assistance, though, I say, the Kingdom was freed from the Dominion of the French, yet afterwards, to their great Grief, they saw it fall under the Empire of the Spaniards, and hence no more acknowledge native Princes, but Foreigners, who governing it from remote Parts by means of their Ministers, it not only lost its Royal Dignity and Reputation, but was plunder'd and despised.

C H A P. II.

Charles leaves the Kingdom, and Ferdinand returns to it, who, with the Assistance of the Great-Captain, drives the French out of it; he is buzza'd by the People, and restor'd to the Kingdom. His Marriage and Death.

THE French, not knowing how to carry themselves in such a run of good Fortune, grew intolerant and ambitious, besides having alienated the Minds of the People from them, and giving the Princes of Italy cause of Jealousy, they became so much the Aversion, even of those who had invited them, that at last, combining together, they drove them intirely out of Italy. Being now Masters of the Kingdom, and by Intelligence and tampering with the Germans that were in Garrison in Castel Nuovo and Castello del Uovo, having also got Possession of these Fortresses, they had nothing of any Consequence to do, but to possess themselves of Ischia. So that Ferdinand having lost all Hopes, leaving that Island to be defended by Innico d'Avalos, the Marquis of Pescara's Brother, sail'd for Sicily, where, on the twentieth of March this Year 1495, he was kindly received by the Messinese, where he stay'd consulting with his Father, who was still alive, by what Means, and with what Assistance they might be able to recover the lost Kingdom.

MEAN while both King Charles and his Officers, ignorant how to behave themselves in a new acquired Kingdom, and through the excessive Pride of the French, the Nobility being disobliged, in a very short Time that Prince's Glory, and the Fortune which had so much favour'd him, changed. Philip de Comines, then his Ambassador in Venice, writes, that from the time the King made his Entry into Naples to his Departure, he minded nothing but his Pleasures; and his French Officers nothing but Rapine and to gather Wealth: The Nobility were neither used civilly nor in the least countenanced; on the contrary, they were with Difficulty admitted into the Court. The Caraffa's, though true Aragonians, had the least ill Treatment. They left none in Offices or Dignities, and treated the Anjouvians worse than the Aragonians. And Matteo d'Afflitto^{*} writes, that Charles spurr'd on by his Favourites, who solicited him to reduce the Barons of the Kingdom to the same State, with the Barons of France, consulted how he might deprive them of the merum & mixtum Imperium, which they had enjoy'd in their Fiefs ever since the time of King Alphonfus I. of Aragon. The King granted no Privileges or Warrants, but the Ministers, through whose Hands they pass'd, exacted Money for them. All Offices and Employments were bestow'd upon two or three Frenchmen. The Ministers were turn'd out of their Posts, and not restored to them without Money. Thus the Neapolitans (naturally the most inconstant People upon Earth) began to change the foolish Love they formerly had for the French into Hatred.

IN the mean time Ferdinand being still in Sicily consulting with his Father how to find some Remedy for their Misfortunes, they resolved to have recourse to Ferdinand the Catholick for Assistance, a Prince not only powerful, but their near Kinsman; and that as Sovereign of Sicily, he would take them under his Protection, not so much on Account of the Nearness of Blood, as that it very nearly concern'd his own Interest, that the Kingdom of Naples should not be in the Hands of the French, who being Masters of so rich and powerful a Kingdom, and so near Sicily too, it was much to be fear'd, that at last they might attempt to invade and unite it to that of Naples. Therefore they sent Bernardino Bernando, Ferdinand's Secretary, to the Catholick King, to beg of him to take them under his Protection, and assist them in recovering the Possession of their lost Kingdom. A Message, which prov'd very unhappy to the Aragonians of Naples; and if pressing Necessity had not excused them, it had been a very rash and imprudent Resolution, not only because they exposed themselves to the Ambition of the Spaniards, who from the Situation of Sicily, might be easily tempted to make themselves Masters of the Kingdom of Naples, as the Event proved; but likewise because Ferdinand the Catholick, the Son of John King of Aragon, Alphonfus I's Brother, judged that the Kingdom of Naples had been unjustly disjoin'd from the Crown of Aragon, to which it belong'd; and that it was not in Alphonfus's Power to leave it to Ferdinand his bastard Son, but that John ought to have succeeded in it, as he did in Sicily, in Aragon, and in the other Dominions possess'd by Alphonfus. And what happen'd afterwards demonstrated, that it would have been much more easy for the Aragonians of Naples to have recover'd the Kingdom, if it had remain'd in the Hands of the French, than falling into those of the Spaniards, whereby all Hopes were lost of ever recovering it.

FERDINAND the Catholick most willingly accepted the Invitation, and undertook the Expedition, so that he immediately sent a sufficient Army into Sicily, under the Command of Gonsalvo Fernandes, of the Family of Aguilar, a Man of great Courage and long Experience in the Wars of Granada; who upon his first coming to Italy, being by the vain-glorious Spaniards surnamed the Great-Captain, by that Title denoting his great Authority on account of the notable Victories he afterwards gain'd, with universal Consent that Surname was confirm'd and perpetuated to him, as a Mark of his great Courage, and of his Excellency in military Discipline. Gonsalvo being arrived at Messina with his Troops, was received with extreme Joy by Alphonfus and Ferdinand, and having exhorted them to raise their Spirits, he landed his Men in Calabria, where he obtain'd signal Advantages over the French.

ON the other hand, the Princes of Italy, and even the Duke of Milan, concluded in Venice a very powerful League against King Charles, into which, besides the Venetians, the King of the Romans, and Ferdinand King of Castile, likewise enter'd. Pope Alexander VI. was also desirous of being included in it, in order to free himself from the continual Fears and Violence which he dreaded from the French: He had conceived a Jealousy of Charles, and they began to distrust one another, and the Misunderstanding was like to have broke out into an open Enmity; for King Charles having often demanded of the Pope to give him the ^{*} Aëist. in Procem. Constit. Regn.

Investiture of the Kingdom, and to send a Legate to crown him, to which Alexander would not consent; therefore Charles being incens'd, threaten'd to call a Council in order to depose him; of which the Pope being afraid, lest the Threat should be put in Execution, having many Enemies among the Cardinals, and particularly the Cardinal of Rovere, who was afterwards Pope Julius II. out of mere Necessity he was forced to send him the Investiture, and a Legate to crown him, which was perform'd on the twentieth of May this Year 1495. with great Pomp and Solemnity in the Cathedral Church of Naples.

BUT the foresaid League being publish'd, and the contracting Princes having likewise declared the Motives, which had induced them to enter into it, to wit, the Defence of Christendom against the Turk: The Defence of the Liberty of Italy, and the Preservation of their own Dominions; the King conceiv'd such a Jealousy that it was impossible for his Officers to make him easy; a Report being spread abroad, that Francesco Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua, was elected General of the Army of the League, and that he threaten'd either to kill him or take him Prisoner; the King therefore resolved to leave Naples, and return to France by the same Road he came there, though the confederated Forces were prepared to stop him on his March. Wherefore he assembled the best of his Troops to march under his own Command, and left for guarding the Kingdom only fifty French Cuirassiers, two thousand five hundred Switzers, and some few French Infantry. Monseigneur de Montpensier, of the House of Bourbon, was left Captain General in Naples: In Calabria, Edward Stuart, Monseigneur d'Aubigny, by Nation a Scotsman, whom Charles had made Lord High Constable of the Kingdom, and to whom he had given the County of Acri, with the Marquisate of Squillace. He left Stephen de Vers, Seneschal of Beaujeu, Governor of Gaeta, whom he had made Duke of Nola and Lord High Chamberlain, through whose Hands all the Money of the Kingdom pass'd. Monseigneur D. Julian of Lorrain, created Duke of the City of S. Angelo, was left to guard his own Estate. Gabriel de Montfaucon was left in Manfredonia: George de Seville in Taranto: The Rector of Vietri in Aquila; and Gratian de Guerra commanded all Abruzzo. He left the Princes of Salerno and Bisignano very well satisfied, and in a rich and plentiful Condition.

THE King, after having made these Dispositions for the Defence of the Kingdom, in the same Month of May 1495. set out in such Haste, as if he had been pursued by a vast Army; and, upon his arrival at Rome, not finding the Pope there, who, either out of Fear, or to avoid seeing him, had retired to Orvieto, and then to Perugia, he pursued his March; till, being come to the River Taro, he was met by the Venetian Army, where, the Venetians endeavouring to hinder his Passage, and Charles to make his way Sword in Hand, a bloody Engagement ensued. Both Sides fought desperately, and it remains as yet a Question amongst Writers, whether the French, who at last, in spite of all Opposition, passed the River, came off Victors, or the Venetians, who pillag'd Charles's Camp and Baggage, of which, besides Philip de Comines, Guicciardino has written at large, as also Paulo Paruti in his Treatise.

CHARLES's leaving the Kingdom occasion'd such a Change in the Minds of the People, that the French, of whom but two Months before, they had been so fond, became their Aversion. While the Great Captain was making War with the French in Calabria, the Neapolitans in all haste sent to Sicily, and invited Ferdinand to return. Whereupon he immediately set sail with sixty large and twenty small Ships; and though the number of his Troops was but small, yet the Favour and Inclinations of the People for him were great; for he had no sooner arrived off Salerno, than that City, Amalfi, Cava, and all the Coast declared for him. Two Days after he arrived in the Bay of Naples, and stood in for the Shore in order to land at Maddelona; but Montpensier, with the greatest Part of the Garrison sallying out of the City to hinder his Landing, the Neapolitans, laid hold of the Opportunity, and rose immediately up in Arms, beginning openly to cry out, God save King Ferdinand; and having taken Possession of the Gates, on the seventh of July 1495. they brought him into Naples, with some of his Cavalry, and riding through the City to the unspeakable Joy of every Body, he was welcom'd with the universal Acclamations of the People; and the Ladies, not content, from the Windows, to cover him with Flowers, and sprinkle him with odoriferous Waters, many of the noblest run after him in the Streets to imbrace him, and to wipe off the Sweat from his Face. Capua, Aversa, and many other of the neighbouring Cities immediately immediately follow'd the Example of Naples, and Gaeta began to Mutiny. In Puglia, the City of Otranto from the Time of the publishing of the League, being unprovided with Troops, and in the Neighbourhood of Brindisi and Gallipoli, had set up the Aragonian Standard; therefore Frederick, who was in Brindisi, immediately provided it with all Things necessary.

AT the same time that Ferdinand enter'd Naples, the Venetian Fleet arrived before Monopoli, and having landed some Troops, the City was taken by Storm, and then Pugliano by Capitulation. Taranto was gallantly defended by George de Seville, and held it out for Charles, till by Famine he was forced to surrender it, where he afterwards died of the Plague. But Gabriel Montfaucon, who commanded in Manfredonia, immediately surrender'd it for want of Provisions, although he had found the Place well provided with Necessaries. Many other Places quickly surrender'd thro' Scarcity of Provisions; and Philip de Comines writes, that many, to whom the keeping of the Places were committed, sold whatever they found in them, and therefore were forced to surrender them. Besides, all the Towns and Fortresses of the Kingdom were so ill provided of Money, and the Pay of the Troops arising from the Revenues of the Provinces failing, of course the Pay fail'd; and Calabria had been, in a manner, quite laid waste by the Great Captain. It was reported, that Alphonfus, a little before his Death, which fell out at this Time, having heard that the Kingdom had been again brought under the Dominion of his Son, had signified to him his Inclination to return to Naples, where it was thought, that the former Hatred, which the People bore against him, was converted into Benevolence; and it was said, that Ferdinand's (as it usually happens) eager Desire of Reigning prevailing over his paternal Respect, not only answer'd him smartly, but tauntingly, that he must wait till he had so fix'd himself in the Kingdom, that he (the Father) might not have occasion to fly out of it a second Time¹.

IT being an easy Matter for Ferdinand intirely to drive out the small Remains of the French that were left in Aversa and Gaeta: In order to enter into a stricter Friendship with the King of Spain, with the Pope's Dispensation he married Joan his Aunt, the Daughter of his Grandfather, by Joan, the Sister of the said King. And with an uninterrupted Course of prosperous Fortune continuing to drive his Enemies out of the Kingdom, no Place standing out but Taranto and Gaeta; he arriv'd at the Height of Glory, and was in a fair Way to vie with the Grandeur of his Ancestors; but nevertheless, while he was diverting himself with his new Spouse at Sonima, a Town situate at the Foot of Mount Vesuvius, either by reason of the past Fatigues, or some new Disorder, he fell grievously ill, and his Life being despair'd of, he was carried to Naples, where he died in a few Days in the Month of October this Year 1496. within less than a Year of his Father's Death, and he was buried in the Church of S. Dominick, where his Tomb is to be seen.

ON Account of the Victory he had obtain'd, of the Greatness of his Soul, and the many Royal Virtues, wherewith he was adorn'd, he left not only in the Kingdom, but over all Italy, a vast Opinion of his Worth; and though he had reign'd but only one Year and eight Months, he left us some good and prudent Laws, which we find amongst the Pragmaticks of the Aragonian Kings. He died without Issue at the Age of twenty eight Years, and therefore D. Frederick, his Uncle, succeeded him, this Kingdom having seen, in the Space of three Years only, five Kings, Ferdinand the Elder, Alphonfus his Son, Charles VIII. of France, Ferdinand the younger, and Frederick his Uncle.

C H A P. III.

The short Reign of Frederick of Aragon : His Misfortunes, and how by giving way to the Spaniards and French he was forced to abandon the Kingdom, and retire to France.

FERDINAND was no sooner dead, than Frederick, a most prudent Prince, and a great Friend to the Muses, was, to the great Joy of every Body, proclaim'd King, and the old Queen, his Mother-in-Law, immediately deliver'd up to him Castel Nuovo, though it was thought by many, that she would have kept it for Ferdinand, King of Spain, her Brother : Upon this Event appear'd not only the singular Affection of the People of Naples for Frederick, but also of the Princes of Salerno and Bisignano, and of the Count of Capaccio, who were the first in Naples that congratulated him upon his Accession to the Throne, being much better pleased with him, than with the late King, because of his mild Temper; for it was much to be suspected, that Ferdinand was resolved, so soon as his Affairs were settled, with the utmost Rigour to prosecute all those, who had shewn the least Favour for the French : Frederick therefore, to make himself still the more acceptable, very prudently restored to them all their Fortresses ; and for a greater Testimony of his good Inclinations, he caused a Sort of Money to be coin'd, which, on the one side, had a Book with a Flame of Fire, with this Motto, Recedant vetera ; and on the other a Crown with this Motto, A Domino datum est istud.

ON the seventh of June the following Year 1497, Pope Alexander VI. sent him the Bull of Investiture ; and to shew how well he was pleased with him, he sent with it a most affectionate and cordial Letter. On the ninth of the same Month he sent him another Letter, whereby he acquainted him, that he had appointed Cardinal Cæsar Borgia, his Son, Apostolical Legate for crowning him¹ ; and because Naples was at this time afflicted with a deadly Pestilence, he resolved to have the Ceremony of his Coronation perform'd in the City of Capua, to which he wrote an affectionate Letter, which we read in Chioccarello, wherein he notified to the Magistrates the Investiture sent him by the Pope, and that he intended to be crown'd in that City by the Hands of Cardinal Borgia. *Camillo Pellegrino*² gives an account of a Writing extracted from the Records of the Royal Chancery, and of a Passage in the Journal of Silvestro Guarino, of Aversa, not yet printed, which he wrote at this Time, wherein he describes the Solemnity and Pomp of this Coronation. It was performed on the tenth of August in the Cathedral Church of Capua by Cardinal Borgia the Legate, the Archbishop of Cosenza, then the Pope's Secretary, with many other Archbishops, Bishops and Prelates; the Ambassadors of the King of the Romans, of the King of Spain, of Venice, and of the Duke of Milan were also present. Prospero Colonna Duke of Trajetto, Fabrizio Colonna Duke of Tagliacozzo, Alphonfus d'Aragon Duke of Amalfi, Ferdinando Francesco Guevara Marquis of Pescara, Traiano Caracciolo Count of Polino, Gio. Tommaso Caraffa Count of Maddaloni, Traiano Caccaniglia Count of Montella, Bellisario Acquaviva Count of Nardo, Marcantonio Caracciolo of Nicastro, Giovanni Caraffa Count of Policaſtro, Vito Piſanello the King's Secretary, Antorio Griſone Lord High Chamberlain, Roberto Bonifacio, Knight, &c. were all preſent, cum aliis Domicellis, Baronibus, & Militibus, &c. And Guarino, in his Journal, writes, though none of the Barons of the Family of Sanſeverino were at this Coronation, yet the Prince of Biſignano was at the Feaſt, which the King made the next Day for the Cardinal Legate, and all the Barons.

THE Reign of Frederick, ſo prudent a Prince, would have been longer, and more peaceable, if the Death of King Charles VIII. which happen'd in April the following Year 1498. had not put every thing in Confuſion, and given riſe to new Pretenſions; for Charles being return'd to France, though ſometimes he had Thoughts of recovering the loſt Kingdom, and was conſtantly ſollicitated to it by his Friends; yet his Youth hurried him on to his Pleaſures and Diversions; and Philip de Comines writes, that having ſtopt for ſome time in the City of Lyons, he gave himſelf wholly to the Running at Tilts and Tournaments; and from the beginning of the Year 1496. that he repaſs'd the Alps, to 1498. he little regarded the Affairs of Italy. He ſeem'd to be deſirous of nothing ſo much as a Peace with the King and Queen of Caſtile, who gave him great Trouble both at Sea and Land, and he ſent Ambaſſadors to treat of entering into a League with them.

AT this time began the Treaties with the King of Caſtile about dividing the Kingdom of Naples in prejudice of the Princes of Aragon; for the ſame Philip de Comines ¹ writes, that it was propoſed in the King of Caſtile's Name to make War againſt Italy at the common Charge, and that the Kings of Spain and France ſhould put themſelves at the Head of their Armies; and that the Spaniards, in lieu of all their Pretenſions, were content to have that Part of the Kingdom of Naples which lies next to Sicily, to wit, Puglia and Calabria, of which they were already in Poſſeſſion of four or five ſtrong Places, whereof Cotrone was one; and the French to have the City of Naples, and all the reſt. But it was ſuſpected that all thoſe Treaties were propoſed for no other End but to divert the League, and that they were nothing but Shifts of the King of Caſtile, who aim'd at greater Things; nor was it likely that he would act perſonally in the War, or bear an equal Share of the Expence of it with the King of France. Therefore nothing was concluded; and excepting a ſhort Truce, Things remain'd as they were before. But the ſudden Death of Charles rais'd new Commotions. On the ſeventh of April this Year 1498. being in Ambuſe looking upon ſome People playing at Tennis, he was ſeiz'd with a Fit of an Apoplexy, and falling backwards, he loſt his Speech, and in a few Hours his Life. Having left no Children, he was ſucceeded by the Duke of Orleans, who was call'd Lewis XII.

IT was the Opinion of every body that the Death of Charles would have freed Italy from all Fear of France, becauſe it was not believed, that Lewis, the new King, in the beginning of his Reign would have involved himſelf in a War on the other ſide of the Alps. But thinking Men were not without Suſpicion, that the Evil delay'd might in time become more dangerous and fatal; conſidering that a King of mature Age, experienced in many Wars, frugal in his Expences, and, without Compariſon, more Maſter of himſelf than his Predeceſſor had been, was rais'd to ſo great Dominion; and to whom not only belonged, as King of France, the ſame Rights to the Kingdom of Naples, but he likewiſe pretended, that by Right the Dutchy of Milan belonged to himſelf, as Succeſſor to the Princeſs Valentina, his Grandmother, of which Jovius and Guicciardine ² have treated at large.

LEWIS therefore, being now King of France, had nothing more at Heart than to acquire, as his own Inheritance, both the Dutchy of Milan and the Kingdom of Naples. For which end, a few Days after Charles's Death, with the Advice of his Council, he intitled himſelf not only King of France, but alſo, with reſpect to the Kingdom of Naples, King of Jeruſalem, and of both the Sicilies, and Duke of Milan. And to make the Intereſt he had in the Affairs of Italy more publick, he immediately intimated his Acceſſion to thoſe Dominions by Letters to the Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines: And he ſent proper Perſons to give Hopes of new Expeditions, declaring expreſſy, that he would firſt attack Milan, and then Naples.

² Guicc lib. 4. in Princ. Iſtoria d'Italia.

LEWIS found more favourable Opportunities than Charles had had; for besides some Princes that hated Sforza, and earnestly wish'd his ruin, Pope Alexander, spurr'd on by his own Covetousness, which he knew could not be satiated while Italy was in Peace, wanted to fish in troubled Waters. And resolved to remove his Son Cæsar from the Cardinalship to secular Grandeur; he was big with great Expectations, and therefore had a Mind to join in Alliance with the King of France, hoping by his Means to obtain nothing less than the Kingdom of Naples for Cæsar.

ALEXANDER had not neglected, when the Aragonian Kings were in a low Condition, before he had fully resolved to join with the King of France, to use his utmost Endeavours to clear the way for setting Cardinal Borgia, his Son, upon the Throne of Naples: he demanded of King Frederick his Daughter for Wife to the Cardinal, who was ready prepared upon the first Opportunity, to renounce the Cardinalship, as he did afterwards; and he asked the Principality of Taranto as her Portion, persuading himself, that if his Son, who was a Man of Parts and Courage, were once Master of so considerable a Member of that Kingdom, he might easily, having married the King's Daughter, find an Opportunity, with the Forces and Rights of the Church, to deprive the Father-in-Law of the Kingdom, who had but few Troops and empty Coffers.

IN the mean time Frederick, hearing of so great Preparations for a War, which threatned his Kingdom, found himself in a very dismal Situation; but for all that, though the breaking with the Pope was like to fall heavy upon him, he still continued obstinately to reject the proposed Marriage; and though the Duke of Milan, who was also much troubled at the Pope's Alliance with the King of France, had endeavoured, by strong Reasons, to persuade him to consent to it; yet Frederick still refused, confessing, that tho' by losing the Pope's Friendship he put his Kingdom in danger; yet he likewise knew, that to give his Daughter with the Principality of Taranto to the Cardinal of Valencia, put it no less in danger, and therefore, of the two, he would run the Hazard of that, which was least derogatory to his Honour, and proceeded not from his own Act.

MEAN while the King of France, having march'd into Italy, drove the Duke of Milan out of his chief City, and made him Prisoner; and in the Year of the Jubilee 1500. he made himself intirely Master of that Dutchy.

BUT Revolutions of much greater Consequence happen'd among us in the Beginning of this new Century; for Frederick, quite disheartned at the News of the Imprisonment and Ruin of the Duke of Milan, fearing that the same Misfortune might befall him, a Prince without Support, and who had but few Troops and an empty Exchequer, he did not know to whom to apply for Assistance. He had indeed resolved to have Recourse to the Turk, to whom he had made pressing Instances for Relief, representing to him, that he was in greater Danger from the Victory of the present King of France, than he had been from that of the late King; but his Application proved in vain, and the expected Assistance fail'd: He had conceiv'd great Jealousy of the King of Spain, whose Pretensions to the Kingdom he well knew, as well as his eager Desire to make them good, which he cover'd with Spanish Patience and Dissimulation. Notwithstanding, cruel Necessity forced him to have recourse to that King for Assistance, who, with incredible Dispatch and Satisfaction, sent back the Great Captain to Sicily, in order to put his Designs in execution. Though Frederick was afraid of him, 'tis said, that at the same Time he sent Bernardo to the King of France to offer to make the Kingdom tributary to him, and himself his Liege-man, provided he would permit him to reign.

BUT Lewis having bent all his Thoughts upon attacking the Kingdom, in which, lest the King of Spain should oppose him, he judg'd the best Thing he could do, was to renew the Treaty about dividing the Kingdom, which had been begun in the Time of King Charles.

FERDINAND King of Spain, as may be seen in the preceding Books, as well as his Father John, pretended that he had the same Right to the Kingdom of Naples, as he had to that of Sicily, of which he was in Possession; for though Alphonfus I. King of Aragon, had acquired it by Rights independent of the Crown of Aragon, and therefore as his own Property had disposed of it in favour of Ferdinand, his Bastard Son; yet John, his Brother, who succeeded him in the Kingdom of Aragon, and Ferdinand the Son of John, had still had a tacit Claim, that Alphonſus having conquer'd it with the Arms and Money of the Kingdom of Aragon, it belong'd lawfully to that Crown. Ferdinand had for a long Time, with Spaniſh Cunning and Patience conceal'd this Claim, not only not neglecting to do Ferdinand I. and the other Kings, his Succeſſors, the good Offices requiſite between Relations; but even increaſing them with new Ties of Alliance; for he gave his Siſter Joan in Marriage to Ferdinand I. and afterwards conſented to the Marriage of Joan her Daughter with Ferdinand II. yet for all that, theſe Princes were a long time before very ſenſible of his ambitious Deſign. Ferdinand and the King of France concurring then in the ſame Inclination, the one to remove Obſtacles and Difficulties, the other to obtain that Part of the Kingdom which for a long time he had been gaping after, ſince it was not a proper Time to pretend to the whole, they eaſily agreed about the Diviſion. *Jovius*¹ adds, that Ferdinand was likewise induced to agree to this Partition, becauſe he was heinouſly offended, that Frederick ſhould have offer'd to make the Kingdom tributary, and himſelf a Vaſſal to the French, his inveterate Enemies. Therefore it was concluded and ſtipulated between them,

THAT they ſhould both, at the ſame Time, attack the Kingdom of Naples, which ſhould be divided between them in this Manner.

THAT the Cities of Naples, Gaeta and all the other Cities and Lands of the Province of Terra di Lavoro, with all Abruzzo, and the half of the Revenues ariſing from the Duty upon the Cattle of Puglia ſhould belong to the King of France: That he ſhould have the Royal Titles, ſo that, beſides being call'd King of France and Duke of Milan, he ſhould alſo be call'd King of Naples and Jeruſalem.

THAT the Dutchy of Calabria and all Puglia, with the other half of the Revenues ariſing from the Cattle, and the Title of Duke of Calabria and Puglia ſhould belong to Ferdinand King of Spain.

THAT each ſhould conquer his own Share, the other not being obliged to aſſiſt, but only not to hinder him; and it was particularly ſtipulated, that this Agreement ſhould be kept ſecret till ſuch time as the Army, which the King of France was ſending upon the Expedition, ſhould be arrived at Rome, at which time both their Ambaſſadors, alledging that this Convention had been made for the Benefit of Chriſtendom, and with a Deſign to attack the Infidels, ſhould jointly ſolicit the Pope to give the Inveſtiture according to the Diviſion agreed upon between them, inveſting Ferdinand under the Title of, Duke of Puglia and Calabria, and the King of France under that of, King of Jeruſalem and Naples, but not of Sicily. The intire Treaty of this Peace and Confederacy between Lewis XII. of France, and Ferdinand and Iſabel King and Queen of Spain, dated in Granada the eleventh of November 1500. may be ſeen in the firſt Tome of Frederick Leonard's Collection of all the Treaties of Peace, Truces, &c. made by the Kings of France with other Princes, printed at Paris in the Year 1693; and ſome Articles of it are likewise to be ſeen in Camilio Tutini's Treatiſe² of the Admirals of the Kingdom; where 'tis well worth our Obſervation, that theſe two Kings, beſides their Pretenſions, which they ſay each of them had to the Kingdom, and which could belong to no other, but to one of them, they alſo alledge another Reaſon, whereby they were induced to make the Partition, and to drive Frederick out of the Kingdom, which was, becauſe it was manifeſt to all the World, Regem Fredericum ſæpe Turcarum Principem Chriſtiani nominis hoſtem acerrimum, literis, Nunciis, ac Legatis ad arma contra Populum Chriſtianum capeſſenda ſolicitaffe, ac in præſentiarum ſolicitare, qui ad ejus maximam infantiam cum ingenti claſſe, ac validiſſimo terreſtri exercitu ad Chriſtianorum Terras invadendas, vaſtandasque jam moviſſe intelligitur: igitur tam imminente periculo, ac damno Chriſtiane Reipublice obſtari volentes, &c.

his ambitious Designs with a pretended Zeal for Religion, whereby he acquired the surname of Catholick, and he would also have got from the Pope that of most Christian, if the French Cardinals had not opposed it, as an Indignity offer'd to their King¹. And Bacon of Verulam, in the History of Henry VII. King of England, writes, that when Ferdinand recover'd Granada, for many Ages possess'd by the Moors, he notify'd it to that King by Letters, wherein he affected so much Zeal for Religion, that he descended to the very Particulars of the Sacred Solemnities, which were celebrated on the Day of his taking Possession of that City.

THIS Agreement having been concluded between the two Kings, the King of France began openly to make ready his Army, and appointed Aubigny General, with a thousand Lancemen and ten thousand Foot, for the Expedition against Naples, who in great haste march'd towards that City. The unfortunate King Frederick, who, by reason that the Agreement had been carried on, and concluded with the utmost Secrecy, knew nothing of the Matter, hearing of these Motions of the French, solicited the Great Captain, who, under pretence of coming to his Assistance, had stopt with his Army in Sicily, to come immediately to Gaeta; and in the mean time, not knowing that the Spanish Arms, under the Cloak of Friendship, were design'd against himself, he put the Spaniards in Possession of some Towns of Calabria, which Gonsalvo, under colour of having them for the Security of his Men, had demanded of him; but his real Intent was, that he might the more easily secure his Master's Share. However, Frederick was in hopes, that being once join'd by Gonsalvo and his Army, and with the Assistance of the Colonna, though the Turk had fail'd him, to be able to face the French in the Field; and therefore, having first sent Ferdinand, his eldest Son, yet a Youth, to Taranto, more for the Security of his Person, in case of Misfortune, than for the Defence of that City, he halted with his Army at S. Germano, where, expecting the Assistance of the Spaniards, and the Men which the Colonna were bringing, he hoped, with better Success, to hinder the Enemy from entering the Kingdom, than Ferdinand, his Nephew had done, upon the coming of Charles VIII. Every Body judg'd, that this Expedition would be the beginning of terrible Calamities in Italy, because of the bitter Quarrel that unavoidably must ensue between such powerful Princes; but the French Army was no sooner arriv'd in the neighbourhood of Rome, than all Fear vanish'd; for the French and Spanish Ambassadors having enter'd the Consistory together, notify'd to the Pope and Cardinals the League, and the Division of the Kingdom between their Kings, in order to pursue, as they said, the Expedition against the Enemies of the Christian Religion, and therefore they demanded the Investiture according to the Tenor of the Convention that had been made.

POPE Alexander, not only on account of the Hatred he had conceived against Frederick, because he had reject'd the proposed Marriage, but in consideration of his own Engagements with the King of France, immediately granted the Investiture, and on the twenty fifth of June this Year 1501. he dispatch'd the Bull, which may be seen in *Chioccarelli*², whereby depriving King Frederick of the Kingdom of Naples, and dividing it into two Parts, according to the Agreement; he invested Lewis, King of France with the one, with the Title of, King of Naples and Jerusalem; and Ferdinand the Catholick and Elizabeth his Wife, King and Queen of Spain, with the other, with the Title of Duke and Dutches of Calabria and Puglia; and the Year following he granted to the said King and Queen of Spain, that neither they, nor their Heirs and Successors, should be obliged to come in Person to take the Oath to the Roman Pontiff for that Part of the Kingdom belonging to them, but that they might take it from the Hands of a Person, who should be appointed by the Pope³.

GUICCIARDINE writes⁴, that it being no longer doubtful what the issue of this War would be, Men of Judgment were greatly surpris'd to find that the King of France had chosen, that half of this Kingdom should fall into the Hands of the King of Spain, and to introduce into Italy (where, before, he was sole Umpire) a rival King, to whom his Enemies might have recourse, and besides he being in a strict Alliance with the King of the Romans in point of Interest, rather than to suffer King Frederick to continue Master of the whole, holding it of him, and paying him a Tribute for it, which by sundry Means he had sought to obtain.

ON the other hand, the World had no less Opinion of Ferdinand's Integrity and Faith, than of Lewis's Prudence, all Men being amazed, that out of Covetousness to obtain a Part of a Kingdom, he should have conspired against a King of his own Blood, and the more easily to surprize him, had always amused him with treacherous Promises of Assistance, suiting the bright Title of Catholick King, given him a few Years before by the Pope, and that Glory, whereby he had been extoll'd to the very Sky, for having, no less out of Zeal for Religion, than his own Interest, driven the *Moor*s out of the Kingdom of Granada.

TO which Accusations, alledged against both one and the other King, nothing was answer'd in Name of the King of France, but that the Power of France was sufficient, at any time, to remedy all Disorders. But for Ferdinand it was said, that though Frederick had given him just Grounds of Provocation, by having, to his Knowledge, carried on secret Practices with the King of France to his Prejudice; yet he had not been moved by that, but upon Consideration, that that King having been positively resolv'd to attack the Kingdom of Naples, he was reduced to that Necessity, either to defend or abandon it: Defending it, was to raise so terrible a Combustion, as would have been very pernicious to Christendom, and especially at a Time, when the Turks were acting so powerfully against the Venetians, both by Sea and Land: In abandoning it, it was known, that his Kingdom of Sicily would have been expos'd to great Danger; and besides that, it would have been a signal Prejudice to him, if the King of France had got Possession of the Kingdom of Naples, which belong'd to him by Right, and to the Succession of which he was intitled by new Rights, in case Frederick's Line had fail'd: Therefore in the midst of these Difficulties he had chosen to divide it, in hopes, that if the French did not behave themselves as they ought, he might in a short time be likewise Master of their Share; in which Case, according as he should be guided by the Regard he had for the Publick Good, to which he had always a greater Eye than to his own Interest; he would either keep it for himself, or restore it to Frederick, but rather to his Children, because he could not deny but that he hated the very Name of him, because he knew, that even before the King of France seized the Dutchy of Milan, he had been treating with the Turk ¹.

THE News of this Agreement so terrify'd Frederick, that though Gonsalvo, seeming to despise what had been declared in Rome, promised to come to his Assistance, he quitted his former Resolutions, and retired from S. Germano towards Capua; and Gonsalvo hearing that the French Army had pass'd Rome, discover'd his Orders, and sent six Gallies to Naples to bring from thence the two old Queens, the one the King's Sister, and the other his Niece. Then Frederick resolv'd to betake himself to the defence of the Cities, and hearing of the Revolt of S. Germano, and of the other neighbouring Places, he determin'd to stand the first brunt in Capua. He left Prospero Colonna to defend Naples, and he himself, with the rest of his Troops, halted in Aversa. But Aubigny not finding any Resistance in the Places he pass'd, possess'd himself of all the Towns on the way to Capua; whereupon Frederick retired to Naples, abandoning Aversa, which, together with Nola and many other Places, surrender'd to the French. Capua was taken by Storm, and on the twenty fifth of July this Year 1501. it was pillaged by the French, in which they gave the utmost Proofs of their Cruelty, Covetousness and Lust. With the loss of Capua all Hopes of being able to defend any Place was at an end. Gaieta surrender'd without the least delay, and Aubigny having come with his Army to Aversa, Frederick abandon'd the City of Naples, which quickly came to an Agreement, upon Condition of paying sixty thousand Ducats to the Conquerors, and retired to Castel Nuovo; and a few Days after he agreed with Aubigny, within six Days to deliver up to him all the Cities and Fortresses that held out for him, which, according to the Division, belong'd to the King of France, reserving to himself only the Island of Iscchia for six Months; in which time he was at Liberty to go to any Place he pleas'd, excepting the Kingdom of Naples, and to send a hundred Cuirassiers to Taranto; to take any thing whatsoever out of Castel Nuovo and Castel dell' Uovo, excepting the Artillery belonging to King Charles, which had been left there: A Pardon was granted to every Body for what had been done since Charles conquer'd Naples, and the Cardinals Colonna and of Aragon were allowed to enjoy the Ecclesiastical Revenues which they had in the Kingdom.

IT was truly a lamentable Sight to see all the miserable Remains of old Ferdinand's Progeny gather'd together in the Castle of Ischia; for besides Frederick, newly robb'd of so renown'd a Kingdom, and more grieved for the Misfortunes of so many young Children, and of his eldest Son, block'd up in Taranto, than for his own: There was likewise in that Castle Beatrice, his Sister, who, after the Death of Mathias King of Hungary, her Husband, having been betroth'd by Uladislaus King of Bohemia, with a Design to induce her to assist him in acquiring that Kingdom, had been by him, after he had obtain'd his End, ungratefully divorced, and, with Pope Alexander's Dispensation, he had married another: There was likewise Isabella, Dutchess Dowager of Milan, no less unfortunate than the rest, having been at the same Time deprived of her Husband, State, and her only Son.

BUT Frederick, out of the extreme Hatred he bore the King of Spain, being resolved to have recourse for Refuge rather to the King of France, sent to him for a safe Conduct, and having obtain'd it, leaving all his Family in the Castle of Ischia, under the Care of the Marquis del Vasto, he took Shipping, and with five light Gallies went to France. A Step, as *Guicciardine*¹ wisely observes, certainly most unlucky; because, if he had been Master of himself, perhaps, during the Wars that afterwards happen'd between the two Kings, he would have had many Opportunities of returning to his Kingdom; but chusing a more quiet Life, and, perhaps, thinking he did the best he could, by the King's Advice he was content to stay in France, where the King gave him the Duchy of Anjou, and such a Pension as amounted to thirty thousand Ducats a Year; therefore he order'd those, who had the Government of the Island of Ischia, to deliver it up the King of France.

ON the other hand, the Great Captain at the same time had come over to Calabria, where, though almost all the Country liked the Dominion of the French better; yet there being none to protect them, all the Cities willingly received him, excepting Manfredonia and Taranto; but having besieged Taranto, where there appear'd the greatest Difficulty, at last it surrender'd upon Capitulation; for D. Giovanni di Guevara, who had the Charge of the Duke of Calabria, and Fra. Leonardo, a Knight of Rhodes, Governor of Taranto, despairing of being able to defend it any longer, agreed to deliver up the City and Castle, if, within the Space of four Months, they were not reliev'd, taking Gonsalvo's solemn Oath upon the consecrated Host to leave the Duke of Calabria at Liberty to go wherever he pleased; because he had private Orders from his Father, that when he could resist no longer, he should come to France. But neither the Fear of God, nor Regard for Man were able to balance the Interest of the State; for Gonsalvo judging, that it might be of dangerous Consequence not to have the Person of the Duke in the Power of the King of Spain, not regarding the Oath, he would not suffer him to depart, but with the first Opportunity sent him well guarded to Spain, where he was very graciously receiv'd by the King, and in outward Appearance was treated, in a manner, with Royal Honours, but in reality, in a splendid and honourable Prison².

THUS, upon Frederick's being dethroned, was the Kingdom divided into two Parts, and, with a new Polity, govern'd by the Ministers of the two Kings. The King of France left Lewis d'Arminac, Duke of Nemours, Viceroy in Naples, who had under his Government Terra di Lavoro, Abruzzo, and all that Part belonging to him. The Great Captain, as Viceroy, and the King of Spain's Plenipotentiary, commanded in Calabria and Paglia, Provinces next to Sicily.

C H A P. IV.

The rise of the Discords between the Spaniards and the French ; and how at last the French being driven out, the whole Kingdom came under the Dominion of Ferdinand the Catholick.

O sooner, by Vertue of the Convention entred into, was the Kingdom divided between these two most potent Kings and rival Nations, than this very Year 1501. great Discords arose amongst them about settling the Limits of the Division agreed upon. The Rise of these Debates proceeded from their not having clearly express'd the Limits and Boundaries in the Division; wherein it was not declared, but in general, that Terra di Lavoro and Abruzzo were allotted to the King of France, and Puglia and Calabria to the King of Spain. There were some Provinces, such as Capitanata, Contado di Molise, and Val di Benevento, Principato, Basilicata, which the one pretended were to be comprehended in his half, and the other claim'd them as belonging to his Share.

THE Disputes increased this very Year 1501. upon account of collecting the Duty upon the Passage of Cattle from Puglia into the Province of Capitanata : The French Officers pretended, that this Province ought to belong to Abruzzo, founding their Pretensions on a Right, according to Guicciardine, altogether groundless, to wit, that they were not obliged to stand to the modern Division made by Alphonſus, of which enough has been said in the preceding Books, but in the present Division Regard ought to be had to the antient. They alledged that Capitanata being contiguous to Abruzzo, and divided from the rest of Puglia by the River Ofanto, now call'd Aufido, ought to be adjudged to them; or that it ought not to be comprehended under any of the four Provinces mention'd in the Division, or that it was rather a Part of Abruzzo, than of Puglia. They insisted most strenuously upon this, not that they valued the Country so much, as that not being possess'd of Capitanata, Abruzzo, and Terra di Lavoro being deprived of the Corn, which grows in Capitanata, in the time of Dearth, these Provinces might be easily reduced to great Straits, whenever the Spaniards should think fit to prohibit the Exportation of Corn from Puglia to Sicily. Guicciardine likewise assigns another Reason for their insisting upon having that Country, because not being Masters of it, no Share of the Duty upon Cattle belong'd to them, which was a considerable Article of the Revenue of the Kingdom. But if the Writ recorded by Frederick Leonard and Tutini of this Division be authentick, as it is most certainly so 'tis plain that this Reason could not move them, for in that writ, 'tis expressly agreed, that these Duties upon Cattle were to be equally divided between them; and Guicciardine himself confesseth, that this first Year, in order to remove all Disputes, both Parties were content to make an equal Division of the Revenues of the Custom-house, which Division, as he believes, was by vertue of this Agreement, not of the first Convention; so that the Year following, not content with the said Division, each of them took whatever Part of the Revenues they could lay their Hands on.

BUT on the other hand, perhaps upon better Grounds, it was alledged for the Spanish Officers, that Capitanata could not belong to the French; because Abruzzo terminating in high Mountains, it did not extend itself into the Plains; and because in the difference of Names and Confines of Provinces, the modern are not always to be regarded: To this was added, that though Capitanata was contiguous to Abruzzo, and divided from the rest of Puglia by the River Ofanto; yet Puglia had always been divided into three Parts, to wit, into Terra d'Otranto, Terra di Bari, and Capitanata, therefore this last ought to be reputed a Part of Puglia, one of the four Provinces mention'd in the Convention.

THERE arose new Disputes afterwards, hitherto more fomented by the Covetousness of the Officers, than by the Consent of the Kings; for the Spaniards pretended, that Principato and Basilicata were comprehended in Calabria; and that Val di Benevento, which was in the Possession of the French, was a Part of Puglia; and therefore they sent Judges to hold Courts in Tripalda, within two Miles of Avellino, where the French Judges lived.

THESE Diffensions being troublesome to the principal Barons of the Kingdom, Overtures were made by them for having Matters compounded by Gonsalvo and the Duke of Nemours, the King of France's Viceroy; and by their Means the Duke having come to Melfi, and Gonsalvo to Attela, a Town belonging to the Prince of Melfi, after a Negotiation which lasted some Months, in which the Duke and Gonsalvo were present with the Barons; not being able to come to any Agreement, it was resolved to wait the Decision of their Kings, and in the mean time that no Innovation should be attempted. But the French Viceroy carrying it high, because he was much superior in Force, having a few Days after made another Declaration, he denounced War against Gonsalvo, in case he did not quickly yield all Pretensions to Capitanata; and then he immediately sent his Troops to make themselves Masters of Tripalda, from which Incursion, which was made on the ninth Day of June this Year 1502. proceeded the War, which being still prosecuted by the French, they began with open force to seize, in Capitanata and elsewhere, the Towns belonging to the Spaniards: Which Proceedings their King not only did not disapprove; but having Notice, that the King of Spain was determined not to give up Capitanata, wholly bent upon War, he sent by Sea a Reinforcement of two thousand Switzers, and caused to be taken into his Pay the Princes of Salerno and Bisignano, and some others of the chief Barons of the Kingdom. Besides, the King came to Lyons, in order to be nearer at hand for making the necessary Provisions for conquering the whole Kingdom, to which, not content with the Places in dispute, he openly aspired, with Intention, if need were, to go to Italy in Person.

KING Lewis having actually gone to Milan, all his Thoughts were turn'd upon the Affairs of Naples, which hitherto seem'd to go on very prosperously, and greater Things were still expected, because the Duke of Nemours, who had before made himself Master of all Capitanata, except Manfredonia and S. Angelo, had, with the Reinforcement sent him by the King, possess'd himself of many Cities of Puglia and Calabria; and except Barletta, Andria, Gallipoli, Taranto, Cosenza, Gerace, Seminara, and a few other Cities near the Sea, all had submitted to the French Dominion; so that the Great Captain, finding himself much inferior in Troops, retired with his Army into Barletta, without Money, and with little Provisions.

THIS Success, while the King was in Italy, not only made him neglect to send the necessary Provisions, which if he had carefully continued to do, he would have easily driven the Enemy intirely out of the Kingdom; but, as if the War had been at an end, it made him resolve to return to France, therefore, after his leaving Italy, the Affairs of the French went not on so prosperously; for D. Hugo de Cardona, with eight hundred Spanish Foot, passed over from Messina, to Calabria; and a little after fresh Troops, under the Command of Emanuel Benavides, arriving at Messina from Spain, with which pass'd over to Italy, Antonio de Lerva, who, from a private Soldier having pass'd through all the military Stations, at last arrived to that of Captain General, gain'd many Victories in Italy: Upon this the Spaniards took fresh Courage, and coming to several Engagements, in which they got the better, they grew daily more bold, and on the contrary, the French became dishearten'd.

BUT they were much more discouraged and ashamed, when upon account of some reproachful Language that had pass'd between the French and Italians, they were so exasperated against one another, that in order to maintain the Honour of their respective Countries, it was agreed, that a decisive Battle should be fought in a Field rais'd in, between thirteen French, and the same number of Italian Cuirassiers. A Field between Barletta, Andria, and Quarato was pitch'd upon for the Place of Battle. Each of the Generals encouraged his own Men, but the Signal being given, and both Parties fighting with great Courage and Fury, at last the French were worsted, and all made Prisoners by the Italians: As this Defeat of the French, so well described by *Guicciardine*¹, and *Jovius*², animated the Italians, so 'tis incredible how much it dispirited the French Army, and elevated the Spaniards, every one presaging, from this Trial of a few, what would be the Issue of the War.

KING Lewis, by these Proceedings of the Spaniards, seeing, that there was no Hopes of ridding himself of this War, but by endeavouring to bring the King of Spain to make Peace, left no Stone unturn'd to bring it about; and while a Treaty was carrying on between the two Kings, a fit Opportunity offer'd for effecting it.

PHILIP, the Son of the Emperor Maximilian, Archduke of Austria, Prince of Flanders, and the next in the Succession of the Kingdoms of Spain, by Joan, his Wife (the only Daughter of Ferdinand and Elizabeth) having been a long time in Spain kindly entertain'd by his Father and Mother-in-Law, resolved to return to Flanders, and to travel by Land through France; and though the King and Queen advis'd him to the contrary, yet, being assured of King Lewis's Faith and Honour, he would undertake that Journey; and upon this Occasion being solicited by the King of France to use his good Offices with respect to the Peace, he got the King and Queen of Spain to give him full Power and Commission to conclude it with the King of France in his Passage through that Kingdom; and besides, that what he should conclude might be firm, he obtain'd, that he should be accompanied by two Ambassadors, without whose Concurrence he would neither treat, nor conclude any thing. Philip having left Spain and enter'd France, it was incredible with what Magnificence and Honour he was received in his Journey through the Kingdom of France by the King's Orders, not only with a Design to make him favourable in treating about the Peace, but for ever to gain the Friendship of that young Prince, who was next in the Succession of the Roman Empire, and of the Kingdoms of Spain, with all their Dependencies: The Persons of Quality that attended him were receiv'd with the same Generosity, and had many Presents made them: To which honourable Treatment he made a suitable return by a Greatness of Soul truly Royal; for the King, besides his plighted Faith, for his Security in passing through France, having sent some of the chief Nobility into Flanders to remain there till he should be past, Philip, to shew that he depended entirely upon the King's Faith, had no sooner enter'd France, than he order'd the Hostages to be set at Liberty. To these so great mutual Demonstrations of Friendship, so far as in them lay, the Effects that follow'd were answerable; for having met in Bliss, after canvassing the Business for some Days, they concluded the Peace with these Conditions:

THAT the Kingdom of Naples should be possess'd according to the first Division, but that the Provinces in dispute, which had occasion'd the War, should be consign'd in trust to Philip.

THAT from this Time forth Charles, the Son of Philip, and Claudia, the King's Daughter, whose Marriage, formerly treated of, was now settled, should be intitled, King and Queen of Naples, and Duke and Dutcheß of Puglia and Calabria.

THAT the Part, belonging to the King of Spain, for the future should be govern'd by the Archduke Philip: That of the King of France, by whomsoever he should appoint, but both Parts to be govern'd in Name of the two Children, to whom, upon Consummation of the Marriage, the King should give his Part as the Portion of his Daughter.

THIS Peace, according to Guicciardine, was publish'd in the great Church of Lis, and confirmed by the Oaths of the King, and of Philip as Proxy for the King and Queen of Spain: But the Treaty of this Peace, which is to be seen at large in the second Tome of Frederick Leonard's Collection, is dated at Lyons on the fifth of April 1502. A Peace, if it had taken Effect, would no doubt have been of the greatest Importance, because these two potent Kings would certainly have laid down their Arms. But the King and Philip having immediately made it publick in the Kingdom of Naples, and sent orders to the Generals to forbear committing Acts of Hostility, and to let all Things remain in the Condition they were, till such Time as the King of Spain's Ratification should come, the French General offer'd to obey his King; but the Spanish General, either because he was confident of Victory, or that Philip's single Authority was not sufficient for him, answer'd, that till he had the same Orders from the King, his Master, he could not forbear carrying on the War. So Gonsalvo, who now seeing his Advantage, thought fit not to slip the Opportunity, hoping, before his King's Orders should come, to have made such a Conquest, that the Peace would not be ratify'd, continued to harass the French more than ever, and coming to an Engagement with them, he broke and quite dispersed them, insomuch that abandoning every Thing, they retired between Gaeta and Trajetto. Gonsalvo having obtain'd so great a Victory, march'd strait with his Army for Naples, and, as he began to draw nigh, the French enter'd into Castel Nuovo. The Neapolitans being deserted, sent Ambassadors to meet Gonsalvo, and beg of him to take them under his Protection, which he very readily did, subscribed to the Privileges granted them by the former Kings, and on the fourteenth Day of May this Year 1503. made his Entry into Naples, where he was receiv'd with great Pomp and Rejoicing, and the Day following he made the City swear Allegiance to King Ferdinand; and at the same time Aversa and Capua did the same.

THE News of so great a Loss coming to the King of France at a Time when his Mind was more taken up with the hopes of Peace, than the thoughts of War, he was extremely concern'd about the loss of so noble a Kingdom, and the Danger, to which his other Dominions in Italy were expos'd, besides, he look'd upon it to be a great Dishonour to have been beat by the King of Spain, without doubt less powerful than himself; and being highly offended that he had been deceived under the hopes of Peace, he resolv'd to imploy all his Might in recovering his Honour and the lost Kingdom, and with his Arms to revenge so great an Injury. But before he proceeded any further, he made a grievous Complaint to the Archduke, who had not as yet left Blois, bidding him take such a Course about the Matter, as was consistent with his Faith and Honour; who being innocent, most earnestly solicited his Father and Mother-in-Law to find out a Remedy, lamenting exceedingly that such Things should have happen'd, which in the Opinion of the World, would turn so much to his Infamy.

FERDINAND, before the Victory, by several Excuses had delay'd to send the Ratification of the Peace, sometimes alledging, that he and the Queen were not in the same Place, as it behov'd them to be, for dispatching it together; sometimes that they were taken up with other Affairs. Besides, they were not pleas'd with the Peace, either because their Son-in-Law had exceeded their Commission, or, that after his Departure they had conceiv'd better Hopes of the Success of the War; or that they thought it very strange, that he should have appropriated their Share to himself, without any certainty that the Marriage would take Effect, by reason of the tender Ages of the betroth'd Couple; and though not denying, nay, on the contrary, giving Hopes that they would send the Ratification; yet spinning out the time, that they might take their Measures according to the Success of Affairs; and hearing of the Victory obtain'd by their Troops, they resolv'd to reject the Peace that had been made, yet they delay'd declaring their Intention to the Archduke; because the King of France, by how much the longer kept in suspense, so much the later he would be in making Provision for the Relief of Gaeta and the other Towns that were still in his Possession; but at last being eagerly press'd by their Son-in-Law, who otherwise was determin'd not to leave Blois, they sent new Ambassadors thither, who, after having treated for some Days, at last declared, that their Master and Mistress did not intend to ratify that Peace, which had been patch'd up in such a manner, as was neither honourable nor safe; and even discoursing with the Archduke, they told him, that the King and Queen were very much surprized, that in the Articles of Peace he had exceeded ceeded their Commission, because, though for his Honour the Commission was very ample, yet he ought to have acted according to his Instructions, which were limited. To which Philip answer'd, that his Instructions were as ample as his Commission; and that at his Departure both the King and Queen plainly told him, that they were no less desirous than fond of having the Peace made by his means; and that they had sworn upon the Books of the Evangelists, and upon the Image of our crucify'd Saviour, that they would perform whatever he should conclude; and that notwithstanding he was unwilling to make use of such ample Power, without the Concurrence and Approbation of the two Persons they sent with him.

THE Ambassadors, with the same Cunning, propos'd a new Treaty of Agreement, and shew'd an Inclination to restore King Frederick; but these Insinuations being found to be not only frivolous, but deceitful, because they tended to alienate the King of France from Philip, who was bent upon obtaining the Kingdom of Naples for his Son, the King himself, in a publick Audience, answer'd them, that he would by no means hearken to any new Proposals, till they had first ratify'd the Peace already made, and given Proofs, that they were sorry for the Mischiefs that had happen'd; adding, that it seem'd to him not only strange, but abominable, that the King and Queen of Spain, who glory'd so much of having acquired the Title of Catholicks, should make so light of their own Honour, of the Faith of Oaths, and of Religion; nor have the least Regard for the Archduke, a Prince of so generous a Soul, so great Virtue, and their Son and Heir: With which Answer, having the very same Day order'd them to depart the Court, he bent his whole Thoughts upon Preparations for War, which he intended to be greater, both by Sea and Land, than for a long time had been made by any King of that Kingdom.

THEREFORE he resolv'd to send a great Army and a powerful Fleet to the Kingdom of Naples; and that Gaeta and the Castles of Naples might not be lost in the mean Time, to send thither in all haste a Reinforcement of fresh Troops, and all Things necessary by Sea; and to put a stop to the sending of Relief from Spain (which had been the occasion of all the Misfortunes) to attack the Kingdom of Spain with two Armies, by sending one of them into the County of Roussillon, and the other towards Fontarabia, and the neighbouring Places; and at the same time to infest the Coasts of Catalonia and Valencia.

WHILE King Lewis, with great Eagerness, was preparing these Expeditions, the Great Captain did not neglect to besiege the Castles of Naples, and every Thing succeeding to his Wish, at last he was fully resolv'd to besiege Gaeta, and to drive the French out of all the other Places of the Kingdom.

BUT what made the French give over all Hopes of being re-instated, was the Death of Pope Alexander, which happen'd at this Time, and though he was succeeded by Pius III. yet he held that See but twenty six Days, when Julius II. was elected in his Room, who, contrary to all Mens Expectation, proved the bitterest Enemy that ever the French had; so that the promising Expeditions begun by the King of France were attended with great Difficulties, insomuch that Lewis was little inclined to a War on the other side of the Alps, and Overtures of Peace being made to him, he readily gave ear to them.

THE Person who interposed, was our banish'd King Frederick, who being then in France at Lewis's Court, allur'd by the sham Promises of the King of Spain, who insinuated to him, that he was ready to consent to his being restored to the Kingdom of Naples, and hoping, that the King of France would likewise give his Consent, with whom the Queen of France, moved with Compassion, labour'd hard to bring it about, had made Overtures of Peace between the two Kings; whereupon, while the War was raging in Italy, Ambassadors from the King of Spain came to France, who carry'd themselves so artfully, that Frederick was persuaded, that the King of France was the only Person that oppos'd his Restoration. But while, by these foul Practices, a Peace was transacting, the Great Captain did not fail to harass the French more than ever; and he happening to give them a notable Rout near Garigliano, so well described by Jovius and Guicciardine, besides delivering up Gaeta and its Citadel, on the first Day of the new Year. 1504. they at last march'd out of the Kingdom, which this Year came intirely under the Dominion of Ferdinand, and under the Government and Administration of the Great Captain, his Plenipotentiary.

AT

AT this very time the Negotiations of Peace were still carried on between the Kings of Spain and France, who hypocritically proposed, that the Kingdom should be restored to Frederick, or to his Son, the Duke of Calabria, to whom the King of France should yield his Right; and that the Duke should marry the Queen Dowager, that King's Niece, who had been the Wife of Ferdinand of Aragon, the younger. Nor was it to be doubted, but the King of France would be so willing to be disengaged from the Affairs of the Kingdom of Naples, that for his Part he would have accepted a Peace in any Shape; but in this Offer two Difficulties occur'd to him: The one, though of least weight, was, that he was ashamed to desert the Barons, who, for having sided with him, were deprived of their Estates, and on whom hard Conditions would be imposed: The other, which touched him more was, that though the King and Queen of Spain, who had quite other Thoughts, with their usual Artifice, had for some end only, proposed this Restauration: He was afraid that by his consenting to it, though it should have no effect, yet he would thereby lose the Archduke's Friendship, who, being passionately bent upon having the Kingdom of Naples for his Son, was making pressing Instances, for having the Articles of the Peace, formerly made by him, put in execution; therefore he answer'd in general, that he was desirous of Peace, but that it was dishonourable to give up the Rights, which he had to that Kingdom, to an Aragonian; and on the other hand, he continued the former Negotiations with the King of the Romans and the Archduke: And, as he was, in a manner, certain that they would take Effect, that they might not be interrupted by the uncertain Negotiations with the King and Queen of Spain, he dismiss'd the Spanish Ambassadors, and in the Month of September 1504, the Peace was concluded in Blois with Maximilian and the Archduke; and first of all it was agreed, that the Marriage formerly treated of between Claudia, his Daughter, and Charles Duke of Luxemburg, the Archduke's eldest Son, should take effect; and as for the Kingdom of Naples it was stipulated, that none of the contracting Parties could treat with the King and Queen of Spain, without the Consent and Knowledge of the rest, giving the said King and Queen three Months time to enter into the said Peace, and be comprehended in it if they thought fit, provided however, they deliver'd up their Share of the Kingdom to Charles Duke of Luxemburg; and what belong'd to the King of France to Claudia, his Daughter, but that the King of Castile should have the Administration of it till such Time as the Marriage between the said Duke and Claudia should be consummated.

IN this State of Affairs on the ninth of September this Year 1504. King Frederick died at Tours, after he had given over all Hopes of recovering the Kingdom of Naples by Treaty; though before (as 'tis natural for Men) flatter'd by deceitful Hopes, he was persuaded, that the King and Queen of Spain were more inclined to it than the King of France, not considering, as *Guicciardine*² very judiciously observes, that 'tis in vain, in our times, to expect so generous a Restitution of so great a Kingdom, such Instances being very rare even in the Times of old, when Men were much more disposed, than at present, to do virtuous and generous Actions; nor reflecting, that those, who had made use of so much Treachery to possess the half, when they had got the whole, would be very loth to part with it out of Generosity; but seeing how Affairs were managed, he at last found, that he had as little to expect from the one as the other; nay, that he had more reason to hope, that he who was not in Possession would consent, than that they who were should restore.

THIS was the last King of the Race of Alphonfus I. the last too of the Aragonians of Naples, with whom our Kingdom lost the Honour of having its own native Kings; the City of Naples was likewise deprived of being the Royal Seat, and of that Honour wherewith so many Kings, who pitch'd upon it to be the Place of their Residence, had adorn'd it; and of the many Advantages attending a Royal Court. He died at the Age of fifty two Years, of which he had not reign'd five complete. A Prince so prudent and learned, that the restoring of Learning in Naples is no less owing to him, than to Ferdinand, his Father. We have yet remaining some of his good and prudent Laws, which may be seen in the Volume of our Pragmatics.

HIS Offspring were no less unfortunate, though he left, by Isabella, his lawful Wife, five Children, three Sons and two Daughters, who were all very unhappy. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, his eldest Son, was sent Prisoner to Spain, where, while Ferdinand the Catholick liv'd, he was kept very strict, and well guarded. At Ferdinand's desire he married Mencia de Mendoza, who proved barren. Ferdinand having refused to be the Head of the Conspiracy which happen'd in Spain in 1522. the Emperor Charles V. upon his Accession to the Throne, for his Fidelity recal'd him to Court, where he was kindly entertain'd; and not long after, Mencia being dead, by Charles's means he married Germana de Foix, the Daughter of a Sister of Lewis King of France, the same, who in 1505. was married to the Catholick King. This Lady was very Rich, but barren, for which Cause it was thought fit to marry her to Ferdinand, that in him, the last of the Race of Alphonfus the elder, King of Aragon, that Family might be quite extinct, as accordingly it happen'd in 1550. the Year of Ferdinand's Death.

HE was the last, because his two younger Brothers died before him, the one in France and the other in Italy; for Isabella, Frederick's Widow, having been banish'd France for having refused to put these two Children into the Hands of the Catholick King, went to Ferrara, where she died in the Year 1533. after having seen these her two Sons die before her. The two Daughters likewise died without leaving Issue.

SOME Writers relate, that Frederick, by his first Wife, Anne of Savoy, had a Daughter named Charlotte of Aragon, Princess of Taranto; and the French write, that she was married in France in 1500. to Guido XVI. Count de Lavalle, and died in 1505. The Children of this Marriage were Katharin and Anne de Lavalle: The Posterity of Katharin became extinct in 1605, by the Death of Guido XX. Count de Lavalle without Issue. Anne de Lavalle was married in 1521. to Francis de Tremouille, and bore to him Lewis Duke de Tremouille, so that the Family of Lavalle being extinct in France, the Rights thereof devolved to the Family of the Dukes de Tremouille, the Offspring of Lewis, Charlotte's Grandchild: 'Tis still pretended to this Day, that Charlotte's Rights to the Kingdom of Naples were convey'd to the Dukes de Tremouille; and in the time of Philip IV. by reason of the remarkable Revolutions that happen'd in the Kingdom, King Lewis XIV. of France, not to let slip that Opportunity, having a mind likewise to enter his Claim to it, as descended of Lewis XII. publish'd his Pretensions in several Manifesto's; and in 1648. a Treatise was publish'd in French, and translated into Italian, in Name of the then Duke de Tremouille, with this Title: A Treatise of the hereditary Right of the Duke de Tremouille to the Kingdom of Naples. At the same time another was printed at Paris in Latin: De Regni Neapolitani jure pro Tremouillio Duce. The Duke pretended, that by Charlotte's Right the Kingdom of Naples belong'd to him, and he made such a stir about it then, that in the Congress for a general Peace in 1648. held in the City of Munster, the Duke caused the Latin Treatise to be presented to the Mediators in his Name by the Abbot Bertault, where he enter'd several Protests and publick Acts in favour of his Pretension. I had the opportunity of reading the Book translated into Italian, containing all these Deeds and Protests, in the Library belonging to the Family of Brancaccio, of the Seggio of Nido, where it is preserv'd.

BY the same Right the Prince of Condè boasts of having a Pretension to this Kingdom, by the Right of Charlotte Katharin de Tremouille, the Daughter of Lewis, who was married to Henry de Bourbon, Prince of Condè, of which Camillo Turini takes notice in his Treatise of the Admirals of the Kingdom.

IN this manner was the Kingdom of Naples convey'd to Ferdinand the Catholick, King of Spain, who pretended that it belong'd to him, as Successor to King John, his Father, who was Heir to Alphonfus I. his Brother, and therefore he would not be call'd Ferdinand III. or be obliged to confirm the Privileges and Promises given by the preceding Kings Ferdinand I. and II. Alphonfus II. and Frederick. He reputed them lawful Kings, and not unjust Usurpers or Intruders, because of the Investiture they had from the Roman Pontiffs, and of the Legitimation of Ferdinand, the bastard Son of Alphonfus I. which had never been objected to our Aragonian Kings; and the Author of the said Treatise by many Instances shews, that Bastards have succeeded not only in Naples, but in the Kingdoms of Spain; though that does not answer to what was imputed to Ferdinand, of his being a supposititious, and not a natural Son of Alphonfus.

WHEREFORE Ferdinand being at this very time in the City of Toro, on the eighteenth of February this Year 1505. put forth a Pragmatick¹, wherein calling them lawful Kings, and his Predecessors, he confirm'd all their Deeds, Concessions and Privileges, ordering, that the Possessors of Cities, Castles, Fiefs, and of any Rights, or Goods whatsoever, whether Burgage or Feodal, which they possess'd by vertue of the Concessions of the said Kings, should not be disturbed nor molested in them, neither judicially nor otherwise, but be maintain'd and preserv'd in them. He only allow'd, that the Deeds, Decrees, and Concessions made in the troublesome Years of the Reigns of Alphonfus II. Ferdinand II. and Frederick might be call'd in question; but with his Licence, prescribing the Method of applying to his Viceroy of the Kingdom, who having heard the Complaints, with the Approbation and Opinion of the Vice-protonotary and Deputy of the Royal Chamber, was to draw up an Information of the Case, and transmit it to him, that according as he should think just, he might give suitable Relief; but in the mean time none were to be molested in the Possessions which they, by vertue of the Concessions, obtain'd from these Kings.

MOREOVER, by another Pragmatick, dated in the same City of Toro, he made void, annul'd, and revok'd all the Concessions, Privileges, Contracts, Deeds, and all other Writs whatsoever, that had been made by Frederick after the twenty fifth of July 1501, when having lost Capua, the Affairs of the Kingdom being, with respect to him, in a desperate State, he sent Ambassadors to the French Generals to capitulate about the surrender of Naples and its Castles, with the other Towns and Castles of the Kingdom; which, as being extorted by the Importunity of sundry Persons in that desperate State and Revolution of Affairs, he thought he might revoke, making use of that Proverb, which he quotes in that Pragmatick: *Quid importunitate concessimus, consulto revocamus*².

WHENCE arose that Distinction among our Lawyers, that whoever alledges the Concessions of these Kings, and has been in Possession of it for a long time, he ought to be maintain'd in it, his Title being sufficient, as not faulty, but proceeding from lawful Kings, and acknowledged as such by Ferdinand the Catholick himself. But when the Matter in question is, either that the Privilege or Concession had never taken effect, so that the Claimer cannot shew that he had been in Possession of it; or that it had been expressly revoked by King Ferdinand, or by the Austrian Kings, his Successors: In these Cases, because they will not be bound to perform what these Kings promised or granted, because they succeeded in the Kingdom, not as their Heirs, but as Successors to Alphonfus I. in right of King John, to whom the Kingdom belong'd; therefore 'tis in their Power to do as they shall think fit, of which the Regents Loffredo and *Moles*³, and *Ageta*⁴ have treated at large in their Works.

ALTHOUGH Ferdinand the Catholick endeavour'd not to alter the Form and Polity of the Kingdom, but to leave it in the same manner as he had found it; yet it being to be govern'd, from this time forward, not by its own Kings, residing there in their Royal Seat as heretofore, but by their Ministers, a new Form of Government was of necessity to be introduced, as will be found in the following Books of this History; where we shall see not only the Civil but the Ecclesiastical Polity chang'd, new Magistrates, new Nobility of Spanish Blood, and new Regulations and Customs established.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXX.

THE Kingdom of Naples being transfer'd to Ferdinand King of Spain, and govern'd in his Name by the Great Captain, during his Reign was free from foreign Invasions; for Lewis King of France, unwilling to concern himself any more with the Affairs of this Kingdom, was wholly intent upon preserving the Dutchy of Milan alone; and though the Death of Queen Elizabeth, which happen'd on the twenty sixth of November this Year 1504. disturb'd not a little the Quier of Spain, and of all others afflicted the Great Captain most, to whom he ow'd all his Grandeur, yet that very Death occasion'd, that there happen'd no Alteration in this Kingdom.

TO this Queen (a Lady of an excellent Life and Conversation, and highly esteem'd in her Kingdoms for her Generosity and Prudence) belonged in Property the Kingdom of Castile, the greatest and most powerful Part of Spain, which became her Inheritance by the Death of her Brother Henry, but not without Blood and War; for though it was long believed that Henry was naturally incapable of Generation, and that therefore Beltramigia, brought forth by his Wife, and for many Years educated by him as his own Child, could not be his Daughter, and that therefore Elizabeth, in Henry's Life-time, had been acknowledged Princess of Castile, a Title given to the next in Succession; yet, upon Henry's Death, many Grandeess of Castile rising up in Arms, and espousing Beltramigia's Interest, and being back'd by the King of Portugal, her Kinsman, at last they came to an Engagement; and Elizabeth's Army being commanded by Ferdinand of Aragon, her Husband, likewise descended of the Kings of Castile, the Justice of Elizabeth's Cause was confirm'd by the Success of the Battle; and Ferdinand having afterwards succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of Aragon, they took the Title of King and Queen of Spain, because the Kingdom of Valencia and the County of Catalonia being united to the Kingdom of Aragon, the whole Country of Spain, which lies between the Pyrenean Mountains, the Ocean, and the Mediterranean Sea, was under their Dominion; and it having been formerly in the Possession of many Moorish Princes, each of which being intitled King of the Part he possess'd, many Kingdoms came to be comprehended under the Title of King of Spain; excepting however, the Kingdom of Granada, (then possess'd by the Moors, but afterwards gloriously reduced by Ferdinand and Elizabeth under the Dominion of Castile) and the small Kingdom of Portugal, and that much smaller of Navarre, which had their own particular Kings.

BUT the Kingdoms of Aragon, Sicily, Sardinia, and the Islands belonging to them being Ferdinand's own Property, were govern'd by him alone, without either the Name or Authority of the Queen. It was otherwise with Respect to Castile, because that Kingdom being Elizabeth's Inheritance, and Ferdinand's only by vertue of his Marriage, it was govern'd equally by them both: Ambassadors were dispatch'd, the Armies commanded, and the Wars carried on in both their Names, nor did the one assume more Authority in the Management of that Kingdom than the other.

BY the Death of Queen Elizabeth without Male Issue, the Succession of Castile, by the Laws of that Kingdom (which regarding the Proximity of Blood more than the Sex, Women are not excluded) belong'd now to Joan, her and Ferdinand's Daughter, the Archduke Philip's Wife, because the eldest Daughter, who had been married to Emanuel King of Portugal, and a Male Child born by her had been dead long before, so that Ferdinand, the Marriage being dissolv'd, had no more to do with the Government of Castile; but was to return to his own little Kingdom of Aragon: Little in Comparison to the Kingdom of Castile, both on account of the narrowness of the Country and the Revenue, because the Kings of Aragon not having absolute Authority in all Cases, in many they are tied up by the Constitutions and Customs of these Countries, and thereby much stinted in their Royal Authority. But Elizabeth on her Death-bed, left it in her Will, that while Ferdinand liv'd, he should be Governor of Castile; moved, either because she had always liv'd with him in a strict conjugal Love, she was desirous that he should preserve his former Grandeur, or, as she said, she knew, that the continuing under the prudent Government of Ferdinand would be of great Advantage not only to her People, but to her Son-in-Law and Daughter; to whom, seeing at last they were to succeed Ferdinand, it would be of infinite Benefit, that, till such time as Philip, born and brought up in Flanders (where the Government is quite different) should attain to a more mature Age, and to a greater Knowledge of the Laws, the Usages, and Customs of Spain, all the Kingdoms should be preserv'd under a peaceable and well regulated Government, and, in the mean Time, Castile and Aragon be govern'd as one State.

THE Death of this Queen remov'd at last all the Difficulties that had prevented the Peace between the King of France and Ferdinand; but it produced new Incidents between Ferdinand and Philip, his Son-in-Law. It removed the Respect which the King of France had for the Archduke, and the Fear he had of his being alienated from him; for the King of France, jealous of his too great Power, was desirous of interrupting his Designs; and the King of Spain having notice, that the Archduke, despising his Mother-in-Law's Will, had a Mind to remove him from the Kingdom of Castile, he was to secure himself by new Alliances; therefore he enter'd into a Contract of Marriage with Madam Germana de Foix, the Daughter of a Sister of the King of France, upon Condition, that the King should give him in Portion with her his Share of the Kingdom of Naples, the King of Spain obliging himself to pay in ten Years seven hundred thousand Ducats in requital for the Charges he had been at, and to settle a Dowry of three hundred thousand Ducats upon his future Spouse^a: This Marriage being follow'd by the Peace, it was concluded at Blois on the twelfth of October this Year 1505. thus:

THAT the Anjouvian Barons, and all those who had sided with the French, should be freely restor'd to their Liberty, their native Country, Estates, Dignities and Goods, in the same Condition they were in on the Day that the War began betwixt the French and Spaniards, which was declared to be the Day that the French attack'd Tripalda.

THAT all the Confiscations made by the King of Spain and King Frederick should be understood as annulled.

THAT the Prince of Rossano, the Marquis of Bitonto, Alphonso and Onorato Sanseverini, Fabrizio Gesualdo, and all the other Barons that had been made Prisoners by the Spaniards in the Kingdom of Naples should be set at Liberty.

THAT the King of France should quit the Title of the Kingdoms of Jerusalem and Naples.

THAT the Homages and Recognitions of the Barons should be made according to the abovemention'd Stipulations, and that the Investiture should be demanded of the Pope agreeable thereto.

THAT Queen Germana dying without Children, her Portion should accrue to Ferdinand, but surviving him, it should return to the Crown of France.

THAT King Ferdinand should be obliged to assist Gaston, Count of Foix, Germana's Brother, in conquering the Kingdom of Navarre, which he pretended was his by Right, possess'd with the Royal Title by Katherin de Foix, and John, the Son of Albert, her Husband.

THAT the King of France should oblige King Frederick's Widow, and her two Sons that were with her to go to Spain, where an honourable Maintenance should be assign'd them; and in Case she should refuse to go, he should dismiss them the Kingdom of France, not giving them any more Subsistence or Entertainment whatsoever.

THAT both Parties should forbear acting contrary to what should be determin'd by those who should be named by each of them, who both named the Pope; and the King of France named the Florentines besides.

LASTLY, That in Corroboration of the Peace, there should be a perpetual League between the two Kings for defending their States, whereby they should be bound mutually to assist one another, the King of France with a thousand Lance-men and six thousand Foot, and Ferdinand with three hundred Lance-men, two thousand Light-Horse, and six thousand Foot.

THIS Peace being thus concluded, of which the King of England was Guarantee, almost all the Anjouvian Barons, that were in France, having taken leave of the King, accompanied Queen Germana into Spain: And Isabella, Frederick's Widow, being dismiss'd the Kingdom by the King of France, because she refused to put her Sons into the Hands of the Catholick King, went to Ferrara.

THOUGH this Peace, which was ratify'd by King Ferdinand in Segovia on the sixteenth of October the same Year 1505. had given Hopes that the Wars, which had arisen upon Account of the Kingdom of Naples, were now at an end, and the Quiet of Italy would have continued; yet on the other hand, Seeds of a future Combustion began to appear, for Philip, who already took the Title of King of Castile, not content, that that Kingdom should be govern'd by his Father-in-Law, was preparing to go to Spain in spite of him. He was push'd on to this by the chief Grandees of Castile, who imagin'd that they could enjoy their Grandeur with greater Freedom under a young King in the Flower of his Age, than under an austere (as their Words were) stingy Catalan^a. Philip likewise pretended that it was not in the Power of the deceased Queen to prescribe Laws for the Government of the Kingdom after her Death; and the King of the Romans, encouraged by the noble Spirit of his Son, began to think of going to Italy.

^b Jovius lib. 3. Vita de Cons.

FERDINAND, finding that Philip was resolved to come to Spain, and it not being in his Power to hinder him, bethought himself (pretending that he was welcome to him) of proposing a Negotiation for settling the Method how they might jointly govern Castile; and on the other hand, Philip, left his Father-in-Law, with the Assistance of the King of France, should oppose him, guided by the same Spanish Cunning, accepted of the Proposal, and pretended that the greatest Part of Affairs should be left to Ferdinand's Management; therefore it was agreed between them, that the Title of King of Spain should be common to them both, as it had been between him and the deceased Queen, and that the Revenue should be divided in a certain Manner; therefore Ferdinand, though not very sure of the Performance of this Agreement, sent a strong Fleet to bring him from Flanders. And on the tenth of January this Year 1506 Philip set out from Flanders, and having imbark'd with his Wife and Ferdinand, his second Son, he steer'd with a prosperous Gale for the Coast of Spain, where he had no sooner landed, than almost all the Grandees of Castile came flocking to him; and Ferdinand, not able to oppose him, being in a manner deserted by every body, and with great Difficulty having seen his Son-in-Law, was forced to depart from the first Agreement, and accept such Conditions as were offer'd him.

THEREFORE it was agreed a-new, that Ferdinand yielding the Administration left him by his Wife's Will, and all that he could pretend thereby, should immediately leave Castile, promising never to return there any more.

THAT Ferdinand should have the Kingdom of Naples in Property, upon which there were great Debates; for though Ferdinand, without all doubt, could pretend to it, that Kingdom being his own, and fallen to him as King of Aragon, and afterwards conquer'd by the Troops of Aragon; yet it was strenuously insisted upon, that that Kingdom being last of all conquer'd by the Arms and Power of Castile, seeing the Expeditions had been made jointly by Ferdinand and Elizabeth, and as King and Queen of Spain, both the Title and Investiture were common to one as well as the other, and not in particular to Ferdinand, as King of Aragon. However, to facilitate Ferdinand's Departure, not only out of Castile, but of all Spain, it was granted him, that the Kingdom of Naples should be yielded to him as his own Property.

THAT the Product of the Islands of the Indies should belong to Ferdinand during his Life.

THAT the Masterhips of S. James, Alcantara, Calatrava should likewise be reserved to him.

THAT he should have twenty five thousand Ducats yearly out of the Revenues of the Kingdom of Castile.

THIS Agreement being concluded, Ferdinand, whom henceforward we shall call either the Catholic King, or King of Aragon, went immediately to Aragon, with Intention to go as soon as possible by Sea to Naples.

C H A P. I.

The coming of the Catholick King to Naples, and his returning to Spain, on account of the Death of King Philip. His leaving the Kingdom under the Government of Viceroy's, his Lieutenants : His Death, and the pompous Obsequies made for him in Naples.

THE Catholick King having retired from Castile to his own Kingdom of Aragon, resolv'd to go immediately to Naples, not only out of a Desire to see this Kingdom, as the Neapolitans had begg'd of him, and he had promised, but for much more weighty Reasons. However, he pretended, that he came on Purpose to see it, and to put it upon a right Footing, by better Laws and Regulations, and to restore it to its antient Splendor and Dignity. And on the other hand, the Desire and Expectation of the Neapolitans were much greater, every Body being perswaded, that a King, so renown'd for the many Victories he had obtain'd both over the Infidels and Christians, remarkable for his singular Prudence and Justice in the Government of his Dominions, would certainly Redress the many Grievances and Oppressions, which the Kingdom of Naples had undergone in the Space of ten Years since the Death of Ferdinand I. and by the continual Wars, and the Changing of seven Kings in so short a Time, which had turn'd it upside down; that now by the Prudence of so great a King it would be restor'd to a State of Tranquillity and Happiness; and especially that he would recover the Ports in the Adriatick, of which the Venetians, on account of Money lent by them to the Aragonian Kings of Naples during the late Wars, had made themselves Masters, and kept them under Colour of a Pledge, to the great Discontent of the whole Kingdom.

BUT Reasons of much greater weight induc'd the Catholick King to undertake this Voyage. He had conceived a strong Suspicion of the Great Captain, that, since Queen Elizabeth was dead, he had a Mind to keep the Kingdom of Naples for himself, or at least, that he was more inclined to give it to King Philip than to him; of which he was the more suspicious, since, upon concluding the last Agreement, King Philip had given him, the Great Captain, to understand, that he was intirely to obey the King of Aragon, who had recall'd him to Spain; nevertheless, by sundry Excuses and Impediments, he put off his departure; therefore Ferdinand, afraid, that if he did not go thither in Person, there would be Difficulty in removing him from the Government, resolv'd to come; and having imbark'd at Barcelona on the fourth of September this Year 1506. he sail'd for Italy with fifty Vessels.

THE Great Captain, apprised of the Catholick King's Resolution, immediately sent, before he left Barcelona, one of his Officers to receive his Commands. The King, concealing his Intentions, treated the Officer kindly, and confirm'd to the Great Captain not only the Dutchy of S. Angelo, which had been given him by King Frederick, but also Terranova, and all the other Estates which he possess'd, as well in Calabria as any other Part of the Kingdom, which amounted to above twenty thousand Ducats of yearly Revenue. He confirm'd firm'd to him the Office of High Constable of the Kingdom, and by a Writ under his Hand promised him the Mastership of S. James; then imbarcking with his Queen, by order of the King of France they were honourable receiv'd in the Ports of Provence; and the same respect was paid them in the Port of Genoa. The Great Captain went to meet him, which surprized every Body, because it was not only the Suspicion of the Vulgar, but of the Pope, that being conscious of his Disobedience, and of the Opinion which the King, perhaps not without just Grounds, had entertain'd of him, to shun seeing him, he would have gone to Spain.

FERDINAND having left Genoa, and steering close by the Shore with the light Gallies, was detain'd for several Days by contrary Winds in Portofino; where he received Advice, that King Philip, his Son-in-Law, a Youth of twenty five Years of Age, of a robust Body and sound Constitution, in the Flower of his Age, and the height of his Prosperity, had died of a Fever in Burgos on the twenty fifth of September, leaving, by Joan his Wife, two Sons, Charles and Ferdinand, who were afterwards Emperors, and four Daughters.

IT was the general Opinion, that, out of a Desire to resume the Government of Castile, Ferdinand would have immediately return'd to Barcelona; but continuing his Voyage, he arrived at Gasta on the Feast of S. Luke, and the Day following made his Entry into Naples, where he was receiv'd by the Neapolitans with vast Magnificence and Honour. Ambassadors from all Parts of Italy came quickly to Naples not only to congratulate, and pay the Honour due to so great a Prince, but for several Negotiations and Reasons, every Body being persuaded, that by his Authority and Greatness he would set to Rights, and keep many Things in a just Balance. But Ferdinand being resolved to return soon to Spain, could not answer the great Expectations that had been conceiv'd of him.

HE was induced by sundry Reasons to return quickly to Spain, being wholly intent upon resuming the Government of Castile, because Joan, his Daughter, being unfit to take such a Charge upon her, not so much on account of the Weakness of her Sex, as that by the Melancholy, contracted by the Death of her Husband, she had lost her Understanding: Philip's Children were incapable by reason of their tender Age, Charles, the eldest, being only seven Years old. Besides, his being desired and invited to that Government by many, who were mindful of his upright Administration, and of the flourishing and peaceable Estate the Kingdoms of Spain had long enjoy'd under him, mov'd him to return; and the Dissentions already begun amongst the Grandeess, and the manifest Appearance of future Troubles heighten'd this Desire; but Joan, his Daughter, who, though not Mistress of herself in other Things, insisted strongly upon her Father's return, refusing obstinately, contrary to the Suggestions and Importunities of many, to put her Hand to any Dispatches whatsoever, without which Subscription, according to the Practice of those Kingdoms, no Business could be transacted.

FOR these Reasons he could stay no longer than seven Months in Naples, in which time, tho' in some measure he had restored the Kingdom to better Order, by introducing a new Polity, which, after his Departure, was by the Viceroys he left, and by the other Kings, his Successors, brought to Perfection, and afterwards to the State in which it still continues; yet both by reason of the shortness of the Time, and that 'tis a hard Matter to answer the Expectations of Men, for the most Part not maturely consider'd, nor duly proportion'd to the Times and Circumstances, he did not answer the vast Opinion that had been entertain'd of him.

THOSE, who believed that by his coming to Naples all Italy would have reap'd great Advantage, were disappointed, because of his Desire of quickly returning to the Government of Castile, the chief Support of his Grandeur; for which he was obliged to use all means for cultivating the Friendship of the Kings of the Romans and of France, that the one, as Grandfather to the young Children of the deceased King, and the other, as a powerful Neighbour, might not disturb him in his Return.

WITH Respect to his gratifying the Kingdom, though, as Guicciardine writes¹, it reap'd no manner of Advantage, which was owing to his being obliged, by the Peace made with the King of France, to restore the Anjouvan Barons to their Estates, which, either by Agreement, or as a Reward, had been distributed amongst those who had sided with him; and, unwilling to alienate those of his own Party from him, he was necessitated to indemnify them, either with equivalent Estates, which were to be bought from others, or with Money, to which his Income being no ways answerable, he was forced not only to exhaust the Royal Revenues, and contrary to the Custom of new Kings, to deny giving any Favours or Exemptions, or doing any generous Action, but also, to the great Discontent of every Body, to over-burden the People, who had expected to be eased, and have all their Grievances redress'd. Nevertheless, on the twenty ninth of January this new Year 1507. at the Request of the Magistrates of the City of Naples, he granted a general Pardon not only to the Inhabitants of that City, but of all the other Cities and Towns belonging to the Royal Demefnes, for the Crimes committed during the whole Month of October, in which he made his Entry into Naples; and on the thirtieth of the same Month, a general Parliament being conven'd, wherein he confirm'd the Privileges of, and granted to the City of Naples forty seven Articles, not derogating from the other Privileges granted by the Kings; his Predecessors, he got a new Donative of two hundred thousand Ducats.

NOT only the Anjouvan Barons, but those of his own Party did not forbear complaining, because to those who were in Possession, besides their unwillingness to part with their Estates, through want of Money, slender and stinted Equivalents were given, and the others, when any Controversy happen'd, were, as much as was possible, retrench'd with respect to the Restitution; because when little was restored, so was the Equivalent always proportionable.

FERDINAND was most liberal to the Seggio del Popolo only, having at their Request granted them many Favours, according to the Writ of Exemption inserted at large by *Tutini*² in his Book of the Foundation of the Seggi, dated in Castel Nuovo the eighteenth of May this Year 1507. which afterwards in 1517. were confirm'd by Queen Joan, and by the Emperor Charles V. her Son.

AT last on the fourth of June this Year 1507. the Catholick King set out from Naples, and with him the Great Captain, steering his Course for Savona, where he had appointed to have an Interview with the King of France. He departed in disgust at the Pope, because having demanded the Investiture of the Kingdom, the Pope refused to grant it him, without the Tribute, always customarily to be paid by the antient Kings. Ferdinand insisted, that the same Abatement ought to be made to him, as had been made to King Ferdinand I. his Cousin, and to his Sons and Grandchildren: He demanded the Investiture of the whole Kingdom, as Successor to Alphonfus the elder, in the same manner as he had received the Homage and Oaths in Naples, though, in the Peace made with the King of France, it was agreed, that as for Terra di Lavoro and Abruzzo Queen Germana, his Wife, was jointly acknowledged. It was thought, that the Pope's denying to grant the Investiture, was the Reason which made the King refuse to have an Interview with him, though the Pope had waited several Days in the Castle of Osia, as was said, to speak with him as he pass'd. But afterwards in 1510. the Pope granted his Desire, and the usual Tribute was paid; and in 1513. Leo X. confirm'd all the Privileges, Concessions, Abatements, and Immunities given him by the Popes, his Predecessors.

FERDINAND having landed at Savona, and finding the King of France there, they conversed together for three Days with great Marks of mutual Respect and Confidence, during which Time they had very long and secret Conferences; and, to the great surprize of every Body, the Great Captain was exceedingly honour'd, caress'd, and commended by the King of France, who was pleased to desire Ferdinand to order that Gonsalvo should sup at the same Table with themselves and the Queen; then, on the fourth Day, the two Kings left Savona with the same Demonstrations of Friendship: Ferdinand, with the Great Captain, set out by Sea for Barcelona, and King Lewis return'd by Land to France. This was the last of the Great Captain's glorious Days, for Ferdinand was no sooner landed in Spain, than he gave him to understand, that he was not to appear at Court, but to retire to his own Estate, and not to depart from thence unless he should call him; for which Cause he never appear'd afterwards, nor ever went out of Spain, nor had occasion any more to make use of his Talents, either in War or Peace, whence 'tis reported, that he was wonted to say, he repented of three Things: The first, Of having broken his Faith to D. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, King Frederick's Son: The second, Of not having perform'd his Promise to Duke Valentin; and the third he kept to himself, but it was judged to be his not having consented to his being proclaimed King, when both the Nobility and Commonalty seem'd to be much in his Interest.

THE Catholick King being return'd to Spain, the Queen, his Daughter, immediately gave him the Government of the Kingdoms of Castile, and the Kingdom of Naples was govern'd by Viceroys, his Lieutenants, to whom were granted full Power and absolute Authority, with regard to its Government: Naples, formerly the Royal Seat, became the Seat of the Viceroys, and was at their beck; so that a new Polity was introduced, whereby the Authority of the chief Officers of the Kingdom was greatly diminish'd, and new Magistrates and Laws were introduced, as shall be related by and by.

FERDINAND, during his Life-time, which was nine Years more, govern'd the Kingdom by his Ministers, and having removed the Great Captain, who was his first Viceroy, yea, his Plenipotentiary, and who, for four Years, to the great Satisfaction of all the States, both in the Affairs of War, and in the most important Transactions of Peace, had govern'd the Kingdom; He left in his Place D. John of Aragon, Count of Ribagorza, who was the second Viceroy of the Kingdom, who, for the Space of two Years and four Months, govern'd it with great Wisdom and Discretion.

AFTER the Fall of the Great Captain Ferdinand also gave the Office of High Constable to the famous Fabrizio Colonna Duke of Tagliacozzo, a gallant General, to whom he committed the Expedition against the Venetians, for recovering the Ports and Cities of the Kingdom, situate on the Coast of the Adriatick Sea, of which they had made themselves Masters. The French, as has been told, had been intirely driven out of the Kingdom; it remain'd only to bring it to its former State, to have the Cities of Trani, Monopoli, Mola, Polignano, Brimdisi, and Otranto restored; for which end Ferdinand order'd War to be declared against the Venetians, and in 1509, gave the Command of his Troops to Fabrizio, who marched with the Army to besiege Trani; and he had no sooner encamp'd in the neighbourhood of that City, than the Citizens, conscious of Fabrizio's Valour, immediately surrender'd: All the aforesaid Cities follow'd the Example of Trani, so that they were reunited to the Crown of Naples.

THE Count of Ribagorza being recall'd to Court by the King, left D. Antonio de Guccara, the High Steward of the Kingdom, his Lieutenant, who govern'd only sixteen Days; for D. Raimondo de Cardona, appointed by the King to succeed Ribagorza, arriving on the twenty fourth of October the same Year 1509. the Kingdom was govern'd by him as long as Ferdinand lived.

IN the mean time Lewis XII. dying, Francis I. his Successor, gave some cause of Jealousy with respect to the Affairs of Naples. And on the other hand, Maximilian King of the Romans, taking it in ill Part, that Ferdinand had taken upon him the Government of the Kingdoms of Castile, in Prejudice of Charles, their common Grandchild, threatned new Enterprizes; therefore Ferdinand, that he might be the better able to put a stop to the growing Power of the King of France, whom he always suspected on account of his Pretensions to the Kingdom of Naples, resolv'd, the best way he could, to make up Differences with Maximilian; so that about the end of this very Year 1509. a Treaty was concluded between them, whereby it was covenanted, that the Catholick King should be Governor of the Kingdoms of Castile, till such time as Charles, their common Grandchild, should attain to the Age of twenty five Years, and that Charles should not take the Title of King during his Mother's Life-time, because in Castile the Females are not excluded by the Males.

FERDINAND, by this Agreement, being fix'd in the Government of the Kingdoms of Castile, was wholly intent upon frustrating the Designs of the King of France upon Italy and the Kingdom of Naples. But while this renown'd King was preparing to support the War with which the King of France was threatening him, he ended his Days in Madrid in the seventy fifth Year of his Age.

FERDINAND died in the Month of January 1516. as Guicciardine, and other cotemporary Historians have written ¹, to whom more Credit ought to be given, than to any other modern Historian whatever ², who being misled by the false Date of a Letter written by Charles, fix the Day of his Death in January 1515. He died at Madrid, then a very obscure Village of the County of Toledo, near S. Maria de Guadalupe, having order'd his Body to be buried in Granada, whither it was carried. A King, according to the Encomium which Guicciardine wrote upon him, of a most excellent Judgment and Endowments, in whom, if he had been more a Man of his Word, it would have been a hard Matter to find a Fault, for as to his Avarice, of which he was accused, his Death demonstrated the contrary; for having reign'd forty two Years, he had treasur'd up no Money: Nevertheless it almost always happens, through the deprav'd Judgment of Men, that Prodigality is more commended in Kings, though attended with Rapacity, than Parsimony accompanied with abstaining from touching the Goods of others. To the rare Virtue of this King, was added an unusual and constant Felicity (excepting the Death of his only Son) during his whole Life; for the Death of his Wife and Son-in-Law was the occasion, that he preserved his Grandeur as long as he liv'd; and his being obliged to leave Castile, upon the Death of Elizabeth, proved rather a Farce than a Misfortune; in every other Thing he was happy. From being the second Son of the King of Aragon, by the Death of his elder Brother, he obtain'd that Kingdom; by his Marriage with Elizabeth he came to be King of Castile, and gallantly disappointed the Designs of his Adversaries that stood in Competition with him for that Kingdom. He afterwards recover'd the Kingdom of Granada, possess'd by the Enemies of our Faith little less than eight hundred Years: To his own Dominions he added the Kingdom of Navarre, Oran, and many considerable Places on the Coast of Africa: He always got the better, and was in a manner a Subduer of all his Enemies, and wherein it manifestly appear'd that Fortune concurr'd with Industry. He cover'd almost all his Covetousness with the Cloak of a commendable Zeal for Religion, and of a sincere Intention for the Good of the Publick.

ABOUT a Month before his Death (on the second of December 1515.) the Great Captain died in Banishment from the Court, being very much dissatisfied ³; and notwithstanding the King, in Remembrance of his admirable Qualities, not only did himself, but order'd, that all the Kingdom should pay him such Honours, as were never known in Spain, except upon the Death of Kings, to the inexpressible Satisfaction of all the People, to whom the Name of the Great Captain was exceeding dear, as well on account of his Greatness of Soul, as also for the Opinion they had of his Prudence, and that he exceeded all the Generals of his Time in the Art of War.

UPON the News of the Death of so great a King, D. Bernardino Villamano, who, in the Absence of D. Raimondo de Cardona, the Viceroy, was his Lieutenant in Naples, caused most pompous Obsequies to be celebrated for him in the Church of S. Dominick, where all the Barons, with the Magistrates and Deputies of the City, and all the Royal Officers were present. And the Seggio del Popolo, mindful of the Privileges and Favours granted them, likewise caused most sumptuous funeral Solemnities to be perform'd in the Church of S. Augustine; and in Memory of their great Benefactor, they ordain'd, that every Year on the twenty third Day of January an Anniversary should be solemnized, which continues to be observed at this Day with great Solemnity and Pomp.

FERDINAND being dead, Prince Charles, Archduke of Austria, who was then in Brussels, though Joan, his Mother, was still alive, to whom the Succession of the Kingdom belong'd, did not fail immediately to write a most affectionate Letter to the City of Naples, in which, promising them his Friendship, he enjoin'd them, for the time to come, to obey D. Raimondo de Cardona, as they had done hitherto, and he confirm'd him Viceroy. Queen Joan govern'd the Monarchy alone for a few Months, but upon Charles's arrival in Spain, she associated him with herself in the Government, in which he behav'd himself with such Wisdom and Prudence, as shall be related in the following Books of this History.

THUS Spain and all the Dominions, of which that vast Monarchy is composed, were convey'd to the House of Austria, descended of the Counts of Hapsburg; and, to the surprize of all the World, it was seen, that Ferdinand, King of Aragon, in order to raise the Grandeur of his Successor, very unadvisedly and unjustly deprived his own noble and illustrious Family of the Kingdom of Aragon, and, contrary to the general Opinion of the World, even consented to the Extinction and Annihilation of his own House.

C H A P. II.

A new Polity, new Magistrates and Laws, agreeable to the Spanish Customs and Principles, are introduced into the Kingdom. Of the Viceroy and their Collateral Regents, whence proceeded the Collateral Council, and the Depression of the other Magistrates and Officers of the Kingdom.

AS may be seen in the preceding Books of this History, the Kingdom of Naples, as well at the beginning of its Establishment under the Normans, as in the long Reign of the illustrious Family of Anjou, was framed according to the Model of the Kingdom of France, from which it derived many Maxims and Customs. Alphonfus I. of Aragon left his hereditary Kingdoms, and transferr'd his Royal Seat to Naples, and conform'd himself to the Laws and Customs which he found there. The other Aragonian Kings of Naples did not alter its Polity, because having no Dominions in any other Countries, as their own and native Kingdom, they govern'd it with the same Laws and Customs; but Naples having now lost the Honour of being the Royal Seat, came to be govern'd by the Kings of Spain, who having their Residence elsewhere, and in Parts more remote, ruling the Kingdom by Means of their Lieutenants, whom they call Viceroy, a new Form of Government was introduced, and the Customs and Maxims of Spain came to prevail over those of France. Whence, therefore, proceeded no small Change, both in the Officers of the Kingdom, and in the Magistrates of the Cities.

'TIS not to be doubted, but the Spaniards, as to what belongs to the Art of Government, come little short of the Romans; and both *Bodinus*¹ and *Thuanus*², though Frenchmen, as also Arthur Duck, an *Englishman*³, are of Opinion, that of all the Nations, after the Fall of the Empire, which had lorded it over Europe, the Spanish in Constancy, Gravity, and Fortitude come nearest the Romans. In establishing Laws no other Nation imitates the Romans so much as the Spanish. They gave us wise and prudent Laws; and there is now nothing else wanting but the due Observance and Execution of them. But as none can dispute these Advantages with them, yet they come far short of the Romans in this, that when the Romans conquer'd foreign Nations, they treated them with so much Clemency and Justice, that the Vanquish'd themselves look'd upon it as their greatest Honour to be incorporated into their Empire, and their Laws were received with so much Eagerness, that they were not reputed as the Laws of a Conqueror, but as their own. The Spaniards did not behave so, but treated the Kingdoms and Countries, which they added to their Monarchy, with too much Pride and Insolence. From the Memoirs left us by the Bishop of Chiapa, their Behaviour in the new World is well known; what they did in Flanders and amongst us shall be told. But what made them differ the most from the Romans, was their want of one Virtue, without which all States must go to Ruin, to wit, Oeconomy; for as they were profuse, so to nourish that Vice, they were obliged to have Recourse to the other of Rapacity, oppressing the People with Taxes and Donatives; all which they squander'd away so immoderately, that their Armies were frequently seen to mutiny, and the Officers to be very much dissatisfied. The Gold of the new World was not sufficient; nor the many Cruelties and Barbarities they exercised upon those People in order to squeeze it out of them¹. The other Defect, was their not having endeavour'd to extend Trade, and encourage Navigation, by establishing Fairs and free Ports, in order to have their many famous Harbours more frequented by Ships, as the other Nations, whose Dominions are situate upon the Sea, do; particularly the English, Dutch, and Portuguese.

THE constant Residence, therefore, of our Kings in Spain, made it necessary, that Viceroys should be created for governing this Kingdom. Formerly our Kings, though, upon some occasions, they were forced to be at a Distance from the Kingdom, left their Vicars to govern it, who, for the most Part, were of their own Blood, and such, as after their Deaths, were to succeed them; but their Absence was but short, and they soon return'd to resume the Government. Sometimes, but very rarely, the Kings were wont to leave Lieutenants, or Viceroys; but now, that their Absence was perpetual, it behov'd them to commit the Administration of it to a Minister of known Probity and Prudence, and who should have all their Authority and unlimited Power with respect to the Government and right Administration of Justice: Therefore it was necessary to give them Power of making Laws, or Pragmaticks, or other Regulations conducing to that End. So that henceforth we shall see the Pragmaticks establish'd not only by the Kings, but by their Viceroys and Lieutenants. It was likewise necessary to appoint Lawyers for assisting and advising this Minister, that his Power might be regulated by the Laws, and not be converted into Tyranny. Some of our Lawyers have written at large of their Power, and the Regent de Ponte composed a very large Treatise upon it, which is in the Hands of every Body.

Of the Collateral Council and its Institution.

FERDINAND therefore, afraid of the unlimited Power of the Great Captain, which by his Valour and Generosity, and the Good-will of all Ranks of People he had acquired in the Kingdom, resolved to go in Person to Naples, in order to take him with himself into Spain, and to leave the Count of Ribagorça Viceroy in his Place: He brought with him three Lawyers, who were Regents of the supreme Council of Aragon, in order to establish such another in Naples; just as Alphonfus did, who, in Imitation of the Council of Valencia, introduced into the Kingdom that of S. Clara, which, when the Kings resided in Naples, was the Supreme, as that, in which the Prince himself sat as Judge, and was the Head of it. These were Antonio de Agostino, the Father of the famous Antonio, a noted Lawyer: Juan Lonc, and Tomaso Malferito, who in all the Treaties of Truce and Peace made in the preceding Years between Ferdinand and Lewis XII. King of France, recorded by Frederick Leonard, was, together with Juan de Silva, Count of Sifuentes, and Fr. Juan Enguera, Inquisitor of Catalonia, imploy'd by Ferdinand as his Ambassador and Plenipotentiary, and in the said Treaties is call'd, Doctor and Regent of the Chancery. To these was join'd Bernardo Terrer, who being created a Counsellor of S. Clara, remain'd in Naples. During the seven Months that the King staid in Naples, he imploy'd Juan Lonc and Tomaso Malferito as Regents of his Chancery, whence it is, that the Pragmaticks, which he publish'd in Naples are subscribed by Malferito, because it was the Custom of these Times, that one Regent only subscribed.

THEN the King, for the Reasons abovemention'd, being obliged to set out for Spain, with a Design never to return any more to Naples, left as we have said, the Count of Ribagorza, his Viceroy, who, by the Figure of Antonomasia, was call'd the Count, and intitled himself so in all Writs; and being to carry back with him into Spain the two Regents Lonc and Malferito, he created two other Lawyers Regents in their Place, who were to sit by the Viceroy's side and give him their Advice, whence arose the Name of Collateral Regents. They were likewise call'd the King's Auditors; and in the Privileges of Naples and the Articles granted to the City by the Count of Ribagorza, they are therefore indifferently call'd Auditors and Regents ¹.

AT the first Institution of this Council, it was compos'd of two Regents only, and one Secretary; and these were Lodovico Montalto, a Sicilian, who, while he was Attorney General in Sicily, was by King Ferdinand created a Regent, and Girolamo de Colle, a Catalan, who being a Counsellor of S. Clara, was likewise made a Regent, and these two succeeded Lonc and Malferito, who return'd to Spain with the King. And during the rest of Ferdinand's Reign, which ended in 1516. there were in this Council, of which the Viceroy was Head, only the said two Regents, with the Secretary Pietro Lazaro Zea.

IN the Year following 1517. the first of the Reign of King Charles, who was afterwards Emperor, a third Regent was added, and it was establish'd, that of the three, two should be in the King's Choice, and a third a Native of the Kingdom. This last was the famous Sigismondo Loffredo, who for his great Learning and Knowledge, that the King and his Court might be inform'd of the Affairs of the Kingdom, was by Charles call'd to his Court in Germany, where he remain'd for the Space of three Years. Whence it came, that on account of the long stay of the third Regent at Court, a fourth Regent was appointed, to the end that the one, who was to be a Native, might go and reside with the King, that, as best knowing in the Affairs of the Kingdom, he might inform the Court, and the other three might constantly reside in Naples. Thus in 1519. Marcello Gazzella, of Gacta, was created Regent, who was President of the Royal Chamber in Naples, and was sent to Court in Place of the Regent Loffredo, who had the King's Liberty to return to Naples.

GIROLAMO Zurita writes ², that this prudent Advice of appointing a Minister of the Kingdoms of Italy to reside at the King's Court, was given by the Catholick King in his Will, which he made in 1516. when the State of Milan not being as yet annex'd to the Crown of Spain, but only the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, he likewise so order'd it, that a Minister from each of these should come to Spain to assist with the rest in the Council, which he had named on account of the Indisposition of Queen Joan, his Daughter, who were to be two Doctors, one a Neapolitan, and the other a Sicilian; whence it came, that King Charles, following his Example, introduced this Custom; and he having afterwards added the Dutchy of Milan to the Crown of Spain, a Minister went not only from Naples and Sicily, but likewise from Milan to reside at his Court.

IN these Beginnings, though a Regent was appointed for the Court, yet as the Emperor Charles V. did not always reside in Spain, but according to the Exigencies of his Monarchy, being sometimes in Germany, sometimes in Spain, Flanders, and Italy, the Regents appointed to attend the Court were to follow him whithersoever he went. But when by the Renunciation, and afterwards by the Death of that Emperor, Philip II. his Son, succeeded in the Monarchy of Spain, he, not following his Father's Footsteps, having fix'd his Royal Residence in Spain, resolv'd to establish a Council there, wherein the Affairs of Italy were transacted; which Council was to be compos'd, besides the Spanish Regents, of Ministers to be sent from Naples, Sicily, and Milan. Thus in 1558. was establish'd in Spain the supreme Council, call'd the Italian; and its first President was D. Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, Prince of Melito, and Duke of Francavilla. And in these Beginnings Philip II. not content with one Minister, order'd two to come to Spain from Naples, who were Lorenzo Polo, and Marcello Pignone, who was President of the Royal Chamber.

THUS by Degrees was the supreme Council establish'd, to which two other Regents being added, it came to be compos'd of five, some of them Natives of this Kingdom, others were in the King's Choice, who were, for the most Part, Spaniards. The Kingdom of Aragon pretended, that one ought to be an Aragonian, because they look'd upon this Kingdom to be a Dependency of that Crown, as acquir'd by Alphonfus with the Forces of Aragon, and not without the Assistance of King John, his Brother. It has for its Head, as has been said, the Viceroy, who in the beginning of the Year swears them to Secrecy. And in case of his Death, until a Successor be appointed, during the Interreign, the Government is managed by them, together with the Regents of the Sword, call'd of the State, who are created by the King, because, upon Failure of the Viceroy, coming in his Room, they take the Reins of the Government with those of the long Robe, who assembling together in the Royal Palace, treat of Affairs concerning the State, and the right Administration of the Kingdom, till such time as the King appoints a Successor.

THIS supreme Council, therefore, being establish'd in Naples, and having for its Head the Viceroy, to whom the Charge of all Affairs was committed, it thereby came to raise itself above all the other Tribunals, which by that Means lost their antient Splendor. But by the Distance of the Royal Seat, the seven Officers of the Kingdom were much more depress'd, so that in Process of Time they were reduced to the State in which we now see them.

THE Lord High Constable, who had the Command of the Armies in the Field, lost much of his Power, because the Viceroy being appointed the King's Lieutenant and Captaint General of the Kingdom, all his Authority was lodged in the Viceroy's Person; he having not only the Command of the Armies in the Field, but of all the Garrisons, and over all the Governors of Provinces, and was obey'd by all the other Generals and Marshals. Only, as has been said in the eleventh Book of this History, when the Viceroy happens to be out of the Kingdom, and none other appointed, upon sudden Emergencies the High Constable can still resume the Command of the Armies, whence it is, that the Custom still continues, that in Case of the sudden Death of the Viceroy, the High Constable, when it has not been otherwise provided by the King, takes upon him the Government of the Kingdom.

BY the Erection of this new Council, all those noble Prerogatives, wherewith the Lord High Chancellor was adorn'd, were absorb'd by it. In after-times it was thought very wisely done of the Princes to strip the High Chancellor of his many and eminent Prerogatives, and to bestow them upon the Regents and the Chancery. In the eleventh Book of this History we brought an Instance, to the same Purpose, of the Chancellor of the Holy See of Rome, whom, because in a Manner, de pari cum Papa certabat, Boniface VIII. resolved to remove and assume the Chancery to himself, by appointing a Vice-Chancellor only. Thus it exactly happen'd with us in the Reigns of Ferdinand the Catholick, of Charles, and of the other Kings of Spain, their Successors. Upon the Erection of this new Council the King appropriated the Chancery to himself and this Council, and put it under the Administration of the Regents, for that Reason call'd also of the Chancery. Formerly the High Chancellors had the Presidency of the Council of State in the Civil Affairs of the Kingdom, the dispatching of Edicts, and of all other Orders of the King; they had the Inspection of Justice; they were the Judges of the Differences that happen'd between Officers and Offices; they regulated their Precedencies, and prescribed to each Magistrate what his Duty was, that one might not incroach upon another. At present the Regents of the Chancery subscribe the Memorials that are given in to the Viceroy, sign Privileges, interpret the Laws, and dispatch the King's Edicts and Orders. They are Judges of the Differences that happen between the other Officers, decide the Precedencies, appoint Judges, and prescribe to each Magistrate what belongs to him, as his Duty. The Chancery is lodged in them, and consequently all the Power which the High Chancellor had formerly.

THEREFORE they have a Secretary, who has under him, and under his Direction other lesser Officers who are all employ'd in the Dispatch of the Royal Letters, Letters, Grants, Privileges, and of the Patents of the Officers of the Kingdom. They have therefore six Writers, and four Clerks, besides one, who has the Charge of the Affairs relating to the Superintendency of Campania, and another for the Affairs of the Royal Jurisdiction, and six other ordinary Writers, who take care of the Registers and Seal, and other Things belonging to the Chancery: They have likewise two Clerks of the Rolls, one Taxer, one Collector, one Officer of the Seal, and four Porters. All these Offices are vendible, excepting that of the Clerk of the Jurisdiction, which being an Office of Trust, is given gratis to a deserving Person.

WHEREAS formerly the Fees of the Writs issued out of the Chancery were regulated by the Lord High Chancellor, Ferdinand the Catholick, by means of one of his Pragmaticks, which we read under this Title, Super solutione facienda in Regia Cancellaria pro scripturis ibidem expediendis, prescribed the Sums to be paid as well for the Letters of Justice, as of Favour, and for Grants of Baronies, Titles, Privileges, Captainships, Bailiwicks, Castle-wardships, Concessions of merum & mixtum imperium, of the Freedom of Citizens, of Emancipation, of Legitimation; and for the Patents of Notaries, chief Physicians, chief Surgeons, Officers of the Customs, and Port-reeves; in short, for all Offices, and for many other Dispatches, of which there is a long Catalogue inserted in that Pragmatick, prescribing and taxing the Sums, which by Right ought to be exacted by the Chancery¹. Formerly, according to *Tassone*², these Fees were not exacted; but for maintaining the inferior Officers of the Chancery, the Revenues of a Fief, situate between the confines of Lettere and Gragnano, were appointed, which Fief, therefore, got the Name of Chancery. But afterwards it being sold to the Carthusian Monastery of S. James in the Island of Capria, the Fees were to be exacted from the Parties, and be tax'd in the manner appointed by the said Pragmatick. The Stile of these Writs was alter'd, and whereas formerly they were penn'd in Latin, the Spanish Language came now in fashion, and even the Pragmaticks were written in that Language.

BY the Erection of this new Council, the Authority of the Great Protonotary, and his Lieutenant, was much diminish'd. Almost all the Pragmaticks, Privileges, and other Writs were formerly sign'd by the Great Protonotary, or his Lieutenant, at present their Subscriptions are no more required, but those of the Regents only. Indeed in the time of Ferdinand the Catholick, in these Beginnings the Custom was observed, that the Pragmaticks were sign'd by the Vice-protonotary, as well as by the Regents; and when the Matter in question concern'd the Royal Patrimony, and the Writs were drawn up pro Curia, they were sign'd by the Lord High Chamberlain's Lieutenant, as may be seen in those few Pragmaticks, which Ferdinand publish'd in Naples; yet in process of Time their Subscriptions were quite laid aside, and those of the Regents only continued. The Regents would likewise have a Hand in the creating of Judges and Notaries, and would likewise prescribe the Fees of their Patents, which are issued out of the Chancery, and are sign'd by the Regent, besides the Vice-protonotary.

THE Lord High Chamberlain, and his Tribunal of the Royal Chamber were made subordinate to this Council, in the most weighty Causes of the Royal Patrimony, and to which the Lieutenant and President of this Tribunal are obliged to go and report their Causes, to be decided there; and that upon account of the Superintendency it has over all the Tribunals of the City and Kingdom, without which a good and well regulated Government could not be expected.

FORMERLY the Petitions of the Subjects, that were put up to the King, whether for Justice or Favour, were carried to the Lord Chief Justice, who the next Day, with the Advice of a Judge of the High Court, dispatch'd such as were regular, and wanted not to be communicated to the King, and such as requir'd the King's Knowledge were seal'd up and sent to his Secretary. Now, by the Erection of this Council, all Petitions and Memorials are carried directly to the Secretary of the Collateral Council and his Clerks, who take care of them.

Off. Secret.

NO less was the Fall of the other Officers of the King's Household, and of all the lesser Officers subordinate to them, not so much by reason of the Erection of this new Council, as by the Removal of the Royal Seat from Naples to a remote Country.

BY the creating of a General of the Gallies, and of a Tribunal of the Arsenal, the Authority of the Lord High Admiral was much lessen'd. This new Captain General had the Command over all the Gallies of the City and Kingdom altogether independent of the High Admiral; and in the General Parliament assembled in Naples in 1536. while the Emperor Charles V. was there, though it was desired of him, that he would be pleased to pitch upon a Neapolitan Gentleman for that Office, the Emperor answer'd, that according as Business and the Circumstances of the Times would permit, he would endeavour to satisfy them; however it was always bestow'd upon Spaniards, who, according to the Instructions given by King Philip II. recorded by *Costanzo*¹, erected a separate Tribunal, independent of the High Admiral and elected an Auditor General, and other inferior Officers, from the Decrees of which, Appeals are not brought before the High Admiral, but before the Viceroy, who generally uses to refer them to the Regents of the Collateral Council, or to other Judges as he thinks fit.

THERE was likewise a new Tribunal of the Arsenal erected, which exerciseth both Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction over the Ship-builders, altogether independent of the High Admiral, and only subordinate to, and depending upon the Royal Chamber, and its Lieutenant, who appoints a President to govern it.

C H A P. III.

A new Disposition of the Officers of the King's Household.

THE Royal Seat being no more in Naples, the Office of Lord High Steward of the Household was in a manner extinct and abolished; and new Offices were appointed altogether independent of that Officer.

THE High Steward, as may be seen in the eleventh Book of this History, had the Superintendency of the King's Household; and though his Office related to the Government thereof; yet because his Authority was not confined to any Place or Province, it was extended over all the Kingdom, nor was it alterable upon the Change of Kings; he was said, therefore, to serve the State, and not the King's Person only, so that he was reputed one of the Officers of the Crown. He had many Officers in the King's Household under him, of which, in the twenty first Book of this History, we made a long List; some of which, while the Kings resided in Naples, were, as has been said, exempted from obeying the High Steward, and were immediately under the King.

BUT after the Kings quitted Naples, transferring their Royal Seat elsewhere, and governing the City and Kingdom by their Lieutenants, call'd Viceroys, both the greater and lesser Officers of the King's Household, subordinate, for the most Part, to the High Steward, were suppress'd; and other new ones were erected in the Royal Palace, not subordinate to the High Steward, but solely to the Viceroy.

THE Chamberlains, Clerks of the Kitchen, Masters of the Pantry, Querries, and many other Officers were dismiss'd; and others, after the Spanish Fashion, were introduced, who were to have the Charge of the Royal Palace, and to serve the Viceroy and his Secretaries, without any dependence upon the High Steward.

TWO Secretaries were appointed, one of State and War, the other of Justice. Neither the one nor the other have the least dependence upon the Secretary of the Kingdom, nor upon the Collateral Council; and all the Affairs that were committed to the Collateral Council, were imparted to it by these Secretaries. Each of these two Secretaries, according to their respective Charges, whether of War or Justice, in the Name of the Viceroy dispatch the Orders given by him. All Military and State Affairs, and all such as concern the Royal Patrimony, and the Corporations of the Kingdom, and all the Revenues and Customs pass through the Hands of the Secretary of War. All Affairs belonging to the right Administration of Justice, the Election of all Governors, Judges Lateral of the Cities and Towns within the King's Demesnes, Presidents, Auditors of Provinces, Judges of the Vicariate, and of all who possess such Offices as are in the Viceroy's Gift, pass through the Hands of the Secretary of Justice. No other Language but the Spanish is made use of in their Offices. They have under them many Officers for dispatching the Notes and Letters, which are directed to the Heads of Tribunals, and other Ministers, both of the Sword and long Robe within the City of Naples, and in the Provinces to the Presidents and their Officers. Formerly they acknowledged the Great Protonotary as their Head, but now the Viceroy, who keeps them in the Royal Palace for the quicker dispatch of Business.

IN the Royal Palace is also kept the Office of the Commissary of Accounts, which formerly, according to *Summonte, was kept in the Commissary of the Nation's own House, and which Office, in form of a Tribunal, has for its Head the Commissary General, who has many Officers under him. His Business is to keep Rolls of all the Soldiers of the Kingdom: Of all Pensioners, and of all the Officers, whether of the long Robe, or of the Sword, who are in the King's Pay. He keeps a Roll of all the Militia of the City and Kingdom. He keeps the Accounts of the Castles and Fortresses of the Kingdom, as well with respect to the Provisions for the Soldiers, as to the Ammunition, Works, Reparations, and all other Things done in them; nor can there be any Orders dispatch'd for paying the Soldiers, unless they are first set down in his Roll. Upon certain Occasions he has a Seat in the Collateral Council, where he sits next to the Lieutenant of the Royal Chamber, to which Tribunal he is accountable, and has the Precedency of the Treasurer, the Regent of the Vicariate, and the Secretary of the Kingdom, and is honour'd with the Title of Excellency†.

THE Treasury Office is likewise kept in the Royal Palace. Formerly, in the Time of the Emperor Frederick II. it was kept in Castel del Uovo, whither Frederick order'd the Treasure to be sent, and appointed three Treasurers for the keeping of it, to wit, Angelo della Marra, Marino della Valle, and Efrim della Porta. Ferdinand the Catholick, as Zurita writes‡, abolishing the Office of Treasurer, had introduced a new Officer, call'd Conservator General, and had conferr'd it upon Giovan Battista Spinelli; but it proving hurtful, when he came to Naples, upon the Complaints of many who hated that Office, he quite abolish'd it, and restored that of the Treasurer as formerly. The Treasurer, of old, was altogether subordinate to the High Chamberlain, as having the Care and Keeping of the King's Treasure: Now he is subordinate to the Viceroy and the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber. He has the Precedency next to the Commissary General, with whom he keeps a close Correspondence; and though he be preceded by him, yet he precedes the first President of the Royal Chamber, when he happens to sit either in that Tribunal, or in the Collateral Council.

IN this new Spanish Government was introduced a new Officer, call'd, Auditor General of the Army, whom we may likewise call Judge of the Royal Palace. As soon as the Spanish Troops were brought into the Kingdom of Naples, a new Commander in Chief, call'd Colonel General, was appointed. He had his Auditor General, who got the Power of taking Cognizance of the Causes of all the Spanish Soldiers, and of calling the Captains to an account for the Pay of their non-effective Men: His Jurisdiction likewise extended over the Italian Officers and Soldiers, and over the fifty Continui (Servants) of whom mention is made in the Privileges of Naples granted by Charles V.§. By a Pragmatick publish'd in 1614. by the Count de Lemos, and in 1622. confirm'd by Cardinal Zapata, the Cognizance of his Tribunal was extended over other Affairs.

HE had other inferior Tribunals, such as that of the Terzo (Spagnuolo a Regiment of three thousand Men furnish'd the King of Spain by the States of Italy;) and of all the other Auditors of the Castles of the City and Kingdom. The Terzo Spagnuolo has its own particular Auditor, who takes Cognizance of the Civil and Criminal Causes of the Spanish Soldiers in Garrison in Naples; however this Tribunal is subordinate to that of the Auditor General of the Army, because Appeals against its Decrees are lodged in the Auditor General's Tribunal.

THE three Castles of Naples, to wit, Castel Nuovo, Castel di S. Ermo, and Castel dell' Uovo, have each a particular Auditor, a Clerk and Coadjutor, who are chosen by the Governors. These have Jurisdiction over all those, who live in the Castles; the Auditor of Castel Nuovo exerciseth it likewise over those who live in S. Vincent's Tower. Formerly Appeals were made from their Decrees to the Viceroy, who committed them to be revised by several Ministers. Afterwards in 1416. the Count de Lemos by his Pragmatick, confirm'd by Cardinal Zapata 1622. ordain'd, that the Appeals should be revised by the Auditor General of the Army, to whom they are subordinate.

HE has likewise Jurisdiction over all those, who live in, and belong to the Viceroy's Palace, and takes Cognizance of the Crimes committed there, he being Judge of the King's Household. Formerly this Jurisdiction belong'd to the Lord High Steward, as chief Officer of the King's Household, but now it belongs to the Auditor General, without any Dependence upon the High Steward, but only upon the Viceroy, to whom Appeals are made from his Decrees, which he gives afterwards to be revised by any Minister he pleases. He likewise pretends to have Jurisdiction over the Soldiers of the German Guard, appointed to keep the Royal Palace; but their Captain disputed it with him, and has appropriated it to himself. The Singers also of the Royal Chapel, as belonging to the Family of the Royal Palace, ought to be under his Jurisdiction; but now the Chaplain Major is in Possession of it, and they are reputed to be immediately under his Command.

THE Chaplain Major, who is Head of the Chapel of the Royal Palace, on that account ought to be reckon'd among the Officers of the King's Household. He has Jurisdiction in the Royal Chapel, and over all the Royal Chaplains, and those of the Castles of the City and Kingdom. Of the Rise and Growth of the Chaplain Major, his Prerogatives, and Inspection of the Royal University, we have discoursed at large in the twenty first Book of this History.

C H A P. IV.

Of the other Officers, who serve without the King's Palace.

HOSE we have hitherto reckon'd up are the Officers of the Royal Palace according to the new Disposition of the Spaniards. Formerly the Master of the Royal Studs, and the Master of the Forests and Game were number'd among the Officers of the Royal Household. But under the Reign of the Spaniards they were alter'd and made a quite different Figure.

THE Master of the Royal Studs, still call'd the King's Master of Horse, erected his own particular Tribunal in his own House, and had his Clerk and Auditor, where he exercised Jurisdiction over all Persons imploy'd about the Royal Studs, which the King kept both in Naples and the Provinces: In Terra di Lavoro, at Mazzone near Capua, in Puglia and Calabria. Appeals from his Decrees were carried to the Royal Chamber, to which he was subordinate. In 1600. the Studs kept in Calabria, as too expensive, were laid aside. For the same Reason, in our Time, those in Naples, Mazzone, and Puglia were likewise dismiss'd; so that at present that Tribunal and the Office of the King's Master of the Horse are quite abolish'd.

THE Master of the Forests and Game had a quite different Fate. Formerly, as is clear from the Statutes of the Kingdom, his Jurisdiction and Office extended no further than the Forests within the King's Demesnes. Afterwards the Game being reckon'd among the Regalia of the Prince, they were extended over all Places, nor are they at present confined to any Bounds. He gives Licences to Huntmen, who by vertue thereof can carry Arms over all the Kingdom: he has his particular Tribunal, his Auditor and Clerk, and has raised himself so much now, that 'tis reckon'd both an honourable and profitable Office.

BUT of all these Offices, none at present is so much exalted as that of the Master of the Inns and Posts, now commonly call'd the Chief Courier, which Office, as being of modern Institution, it was necessary to trace down to these times, and of which we must now discourse at large.

THE Office of chief Courier or Master of the Inns and Posts, according to the modern Institution, is quite different from the Cursus publicus of the Romans; and his Functions are not the same, as they are described in the Theodosian Code under that Title¹. Among the Romans, at least towards the Close of the Empire of Constantine the Great and his Successors, it was not a particular Office, nor had one single Person the Inspection of it. The Cursus publicus was not only regulated by the Prince, but by the ordinary Officers of the Empire: The Præfecti Prætoris, the Magistri Equitum, the Proconsules, and the Rescriptores Provinciarum had the Charge of it. Their Office was not confined to the dispatching of Foot and Horse Couriers, Letter-bearers, quo celerius, ac sub manu (as Suetonius writes of *Augustus*² annunciari, cognoscique posset, quid in Provincia quaque gereretur, or as Aurelius Victor says of *Trajanus*³, *respondendis cunctis que ubique à Republica gererentur. adacta rudis publici cursus*⁴; but their chief Business was, in all Places to provide whatever was necessary for the Progresses of the Princes: For the Jour-

nies of the Reſtores, Conſulares, Correſtores, or Præſides Provinciæ, when they were by the Emperor ſent to their Governments, or when recall'd from them to Rome; for the Journies of other Magiſtrates, as well Civil as Military, when they had occaſion to viſit the Provinces: For the Ambaſſadors, who were ſent by the Senate and People of Rome to the Emperor; or for thoſe, who were ſent to Rome by foreign Nations: In ſhort, for the travelling of all ſuch, as either the Laws or the Prince allow'd to make uſe of the Cuſſus Publicus, which private Men could not, without Letters of Permiſſion from the Emperor, which they call'd Eveſtiones (Poſt Warrants.)

ALL the Charges, whether for the Men appointed for the Cuſſus Publicus, or for Horſes, Oxen, or other Beaſts; for Carts, Chariots, and all other Carriages, were furniſh'd out of the publick Treafury. Whence it came, that for the Maintenance of the Cuſſus Publicus, ſome Services call'd Angariæ, or Parangariæ, were impoſed upon the Provinces; and often a Tribute was either demanded of, or offer'd by the Provincials in lieu thereof. Whence it was, that the uſe of this Cuſſus was deſign'd for the publick Occaſions, not for private, ſo that private Perſons, as has been ſaid, were not allow'd to make uſe of it without Licence. And therefore many Laws were preſcribed for the right Management of it, as may be ſeen in the *Theodoſian Code*¹, and of which *Gutherus*² has written methodically, and Jacobus Gothofredus more exactly upon this Title³.

BUT after the Fall of the Empire, and it being afterwards divided into ſo many Kingdoms under different foreign Princes, quarrelling and at War with one another, this Cuſſus Publicus could not be kept up. Travelling was no more ſafe: Traffick and Commerce were interrupted, ſo that it was quite diſcontinued, nor is there the leaſt Veſtige of it remaining.

IN proceſs of Time new Dominions being ſettled in Europe, though the Cuſſus Publicus could not be altogether reſtor'd; yet, with reſpect to Traffick and Commerce, the Uſe of Bills of Exchange was brought to great Perfection: So the Princes, in Imitation of the Roman Emperors, began to re-eſtabliſh that Part of the Cuſſus Publicus, which concern'd the diſpatching of Foot and Horſe Couriers, and at leaſt ſo to regulate their Travelling on the Highways, and provide them with Neceſſaries (whence it is, that the chief Couriers got likewiſe Jurisdiction over the Inns, and therefore were alſo call'd Maeſtri of the Inns, as in the Grants of Charles V. and of Philip II. and III. made of this Office to the Family of Taxis, they are call'd Maeſtri mayores de las Oſtelarias, y Poſtas, y Correos de nueſtra Caſa, y Corte, &c.) as they might not ſuffer any Inconveniency upon the Roads, but make the quicker Diſpatch to adviſe them of what was paſſing in their Armies and Fleets, in their Kingdoms and Provinces, and in the Courts of other Princes, where they kept Ambaſſadors. And *Philip de Comines*⁴ writes, that King Lewis XI. appointed Poſts in France, which had never been there before; as alſo in England Poſts were ſettled by Royal Authority⁵.

THE Authors of the Hiſtoria Auguſta differ about the Emperor that firſt introduced this Cuſtom. *Suetonius*⁶ makes Auguſtus Author of it: *Aurelius Viſtor*⁷, Trajan: *Spartianus*⁸, Adrianus; and *Capitolinus*⁹, Antoninus Pius. Be that as it will, for which ſee *Lodovicus van Hornigk*¹⁰, and *Jacobus Gothofredus*¹¹, who endeavour to reconcile them: 'Tis certain, that, according to this new Inſtitution, a new particular Office, unknown to the Romans, was erected for it, the Charge of which was committed to one ſingle Perſon, and a more Difficult annex'd to it, than that of the Inſpection of the Couriers, whom Princes frequently ſent from their Courts to the Generals of their Armies and Fleets, to the Governors of their Dominions and Provinces, and to their other Miniſters and Ambaſſadors; upon whoſe Fidelity and Secrecy the good or bad Succeſs of a Negotiation, of a Battle, a Siege, or of Treaties of Truce or Peace with other Princes often depended. For which Cause this was look'd upon to be an Office of great Trust, Authority and Profit; for the chief Courier, besides his having the Inspection and appointing of all the other Couriers, the taking of their Oaths, that they should faithfully discharge their Duty, the fixing of the Rates to be paid by Travellers, of which a tenth Part, and other Emoluments came to their own Share, and of appointing the Stages: He likewise had Jurisdiction over all the Inns, as is plain from the Grants of Charles V. Philip II. and III. made to the Family of the Taxis, which, for a long Time, enjoy'd this Office; and though they did not make use of it over the Inns, yet, by vertue of these Grants they had Power to do it.

BESIDES the many Duties incumbent upon the chief Courier, which Lodovicus von Hornigk reckons up in his Treatise De Regali Postarum jure, he was obliged to attend the Person of the Prince, or of his Viceroy, or Lieutenant, to lodge as near the Royal Palace as possible, that there might be the less Interval between the arrival of the Messenger and the delivery of the Advice to the Prince or his Lieutenant. And if it happen'd that they went out of the City to meet at some Distance any Prince, or other great Personage, the chief Courier was obliged to attend, and prepare convenient Lodgings for them in every Place, where they were to lodge. Moreover, if they went to the War, he was obliged to follow, and provide them in Couriers, Postillions, and Horses: If the Army was to continue in the Field, he was to do the same, being always hard by the Prince, or his Lieutenant; and upon a March, to be near the Royal Standard.

IN these Beginnings, the Office of the chief Courier was only to inspect, name, and dispatch the ordinary Couriers of the Prince and State, so that like the Cursus Publicus of the Romans, private Persons could not make use of them, and the Cities and their Inhabitants had Liberty to transact and carry on their Traffick and Commerce by what Means or Persons they thought fit to chuse. The Cardinal Granvela, being recall'd by King Philip II. from the Government of Naples (where he had been four Years Viceroy) to exercise the Offices of Counsellor of State, and President of the Council of Italy, was the first, who in the Year 1580. instituted the common Posts in Italy, and afterwards in 1597. they were establish'd in Seville, and over all Spain. By which Institution, the Cities and their Inhabitants were deprived of the Liberty of Chusing the Persons and Means for carrying on their mutual Correspondence, because it was resolv'd by the Means of the establish'd common Posts, to bring the Direction of, and the Profit arising from the Intercourse of the Kingdoms into the Hands of one Person, which of course could belong to the Prince only, it concerning the the Publick, and what was got from private Persons being to be apply'd to its Service. Whence, to the Advantage which the chief Messenger reap'd from distributing the Stages, and from the tenths of the Hire paid for Horses, was added other Emoluments arising from this Establishment of common Posts.

AFTERWARDS was added the Profit arising from Carriers. Without doubt, the Custom of Carriers has its Rise from the Cursus Publicus of the Romans, and is a small Branch of it, with respect to the Carriage of Goods; but as for the rest, the present Carriers differ from it; for they have a fix'd Day for their Departure: They make use of their own Horses or Mules of Burden, and take up their Lodging in set Places, where they always find every Thing necessary for them: They were appointed not only for the Conveniency of the Prince and State, but for the good of Commerce, and for the more convenient Transportation of the Goods of private Persons, carrying Trunks, Bales, and other Merchandize.

HIS Jurisdiction being so extensive, and his Emoluments yet more; he has therefore now a Tribunal of his own, and many inferior Officers, distributed not only for the good Regulation of it, but for collecting his Emoluments; so that it is now reputed one of the great Offices, and its Riches and Utility are answerable to its Greatness.

THIS Change in the Offices happen'd in the new Spanish Government, with which was likewise introduced the Custom of making them, for the most Part, venal; and whereas formerly they were bestow'd but upon Persons, who, either upon Account of some warlike Exploit, or of Learning, had render'd themselves worthy of them, by reason of the continual Demand there was of Money, they were afterwards almost all made vendible; and the Grant was not confin'd to the single Life of the Grantee, but extended to two or three Lives, and Offices were sometimes perpetuated in one Family, and were often granted as Freeholds to them and their Posterity for ever.

IN this new Spanish Government another Change was seen with respect to Titles. Whereas formerly the Title of Prince was bestow'd upon none but the Princes of the Blood, or the chief Nobility: It was now lavishly thrown away upon many, with as little Ceremony as that of Duke, Marquis, or Count; so that Ferdinand the Catholick, in settling the Fees of the Chancery, ordain'd that no more should be paid for the Investiture of a Principality, than for that of a Dutchy, Marquisate, or County, and the Fees of a Prince's Patent, should be the same with those of a Duke's, Marquis's, or Count's. And seeing not only the Offices, but the Baronies and Titles were made venal; these began to multiply exceedingly among us; and in the latter End of their Government that Matter was carry'd to such a height, that it was said, the Spaniards had dignify'd the very Stews, and created more Princes and Dukes in Naples, than there were Counts in Milan.

NEW Spanish Families were likewise introduced into the Kingdom, to wit, the Sanchez's de Luna, the Cordova's, the Alarconi, the Mendoza's, the Leva's, the Henriquez's, and many others, adorn'd not only with Titles, but with Estates and Lordships. New Customs and Fashions were thereby introduced, of which, in the Course of this History, we shall have occasion to discourse.

HOWEVER the Disposition of the Provinces was not alter'd. They were govern'd, as formerly, by Presidents, who, in these times, were also call'd Vice-roys. The Number was the same, but the number of the Provinces did not answer to that of the Presidents. Frequently two Provinces were govern'd by one single President, as we see practis'd at this Day with respect to the Provinces of Capitanata and Contado di Molise; and in the Reign of Philip II. as Alessandro d'Andrea, who wrote the History of the War, which that Prince had with Pope Paul IV. there were only six Presidents in the Kingdom, to whom the Administration of Justice in all the twelve Provinces was committed; though with regard to the Administration of the Royal Revenues, the Number of Treasurers or Collectors was answerable to that of the Provinces. Therefore the number of Presidents was always various, sometimes more, sometimes less, according to the different Dispositions and Regulations of our Princes. In like manner their Residence was not always in the same Cities, but by turns they went sometimes to one, and sometimes to another, according as Business, or the Good of their Governments required.

C H A P. V.

Of the Laws left us by Ferdinand the Catholick and his Viceroy.

FERDINAND left us few Laws, but those of the Great Captain, of the Count of Ribagorça, and of D. Antonio de Guevara, his Lieutenant, of D. Raimondo de Cordena, and of D. Bernardino Villamarino, his Lieutenant, were more numerous.

AMONGST Ferdinand's Laws, that, which at the Request of the City, he made for the restoring the University of Naples, is the most remarkable: by reason of the preceding Disorders and Revolutions of Affairs, our University was, in a manner ruin'd; and the publick Professors, whose Salaries were issued out of the Royal Exchequer, because of the many preceding Wars, were not paid: The Neapolitans, therefore, begg'd of King Ferdinand, that seeing the Kingdom had fallen into his Hands, and that the University, for many Ages, had flourish'd in the City of Naples, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, and the Royal Seat, and there having been in it most learn'd Professors in all Faculties, whose Salaries were paid by his Predecessors, it was then by the Misfortunes of the late Wars in a manner ruin'd and undone; he would be pleas'd to restore it to its former State, preferring Neapolitan Professors to Foreigners, and to order their Salaries to be paid out of some particular Revenue belonging to his Majesty in the City of Naples, or in the Province of Terra di Lavoro. The King most graciously consented to their Request, and order'd his Treasurer to pay every Year to the Magistrates of the City two thousand Ducats out of the best of his Revenues for the Maintenance of the Professors, as appears by his Royal Writ, dated in the City of Segovia on the thirtieth of September 1505. which was afterwards confirm'd by the Emperor Charles V. in a general Parliament held in Naples in 1536. wherein he was present.

HIS other Laws may be seen in the Volume of our Pragmaticks. Before he came to Naples he publish'd some in the Cities of Toro, Segovia, and Seville. After he came to Naples he publish'd others, which are dated in Castel Nuovo. Being returned to Spain he establish'd some others, which, according to the order of Time, are insert'd in the Chronology prefix'd to the first Tome of our Pragmaticks, printed in 1715.

IN his Absence the Viceroy, his Lieutenants, establish'd many other Laws. The Great Captain publish'd two in February and June of the Year 1504. and another in December 1505. The Count of Ribagorça likewise establish'd some good and prudent Laws, whereby he banish'd all Debauchees out of the Kingdom: He severely prohibited Gaming and Usury, and restored good Discipline, which by the late Disorders had been much decay'd. To his Intercession the Kingdom is indebted for those Prerogatives, which Ferdinand the Catholick granted it, compris'd in thirty seven Articles: As also during his Government, the Articles of good Living were establish'd in Naples, whereby, with great Exactness and Prudence, the Plenty of the City was taken care of. And in the few Days that D. Antonio Guevara, as his Lieutenant, govern'd the Kingdom, a very prudent Law was establish'd, whereby the Regulations, made by Ferdinand I. concerning the Rural Deans, were renew'd¹.

D. RAIMONDO de Cordona, both in the Reign of Ferdinand, and in that of Charles V. who confirm'd him Viceroy, left us several Pragmaticks, as also D. Bernardino Villamarino, his Lieutenant, which, not to make a tedious Catalogue of them here, may be seen, according to the order of Time, in the afore-said Chronology, prefix'd to the first Tome of our Pragmaticks.

THESE were the first Laws the Spaniards gave us, all of them Provident and Prudent, in establishing of which the Spaniards were more judicious and more exact Imitators of the Romans than all other Nations.

C H A P. VI.

The Polity of our Churches during the Reigns of the Aragonian Kings to the End of the fifteenth Century, and the beginning of the Reign of the Austrian Kings.

 E have observ'd in the preceding Books of this History, that the Roman Pontiffs, after the Schism was quite extinct, were more Intent upon the Wars of Italy, and favouring or opposing one of the contending Princes, than upon Expeditions against the Turks, or any other noble Undertaking. They were likewise, from the Time of Callistus III. bent upon the Interest of their own Families, and aggrandizing their Relations and Nephews: A Custom, which being continued by their Successors, produced in their private Families two great Seignories in Italy, that of Florence in the House of the Medici, and the other of Parma in that of the Farnese; and those who had not opportunity to raise their Families so high, at least provided them with ample Estates and vast Riches. Alexander VI. brought a Reproach upon the Papacy; for all his Avarice, all his Ambition, and all his other Wickedness were directed to this end, to raise Cæsar Borgia, his Son, from a private Man to an absolute and independent Sovereign.

THE Greediness of heaping up Riches, and drawing Money to Rome from all Parts, and for all Things, made them eager to extend their Jurisdiction over Temporals, receiving Appeals in all sort of Causes, and drawing all Suits at Law to Rome. They appropriated to themselves the Collations of almost all Benefices, Favours, Annats, and Pensions; and the greatest Part of the fat Benefices were given in Commendam. All the Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbacies, Priories, and Provostships were conferr'd in Rome. The Indulgencies, which in those Times were more frequently granted by the Popes than formerly, the Dispensations, the Tithes that were imposed upon the Clergy, and a great many other Emoluments drew vast Riches to the Apostolical Chamber.

But above all from the Spoils, particularly in Italy, immense Sums were raised. Although the Council of Constance had endeavour'd to restrain this Power; yet for all that, upon the Death of an Incumbent, before a Successor was named, whatever he left was adjudged to the Apostolical Chamber. Collectors or Sub-Collectors were sent every where, who, by severe Extorsions, reckon'd among the Spoils even the Ornaments of the Churches, and put the Heirs to great Trouble, with respect to the Goods acquired by the Deceased's Industry, or left of his own Patrimony; and if it was doubtful of what quality the Goods were, it was decided in Favour of the Chamber; and those who opposed the Execution of the Sentence, were plagued with Excommunications and Censures.

IN France and Germany all these Encroachments met with Opposition, and in Spain the Law of Spoils was restricted to the Bishops only. But in our Kingdom, as may be seen in the twenty second Book of this History, during the Reign of the Anjouvians, Vassals to the Popes, these and worse Things were tolerated.

THE Kingdom being afterwards convey'd to the Aragonians, Alphonfus I. and the other Kings of the House of Aragon, his Successors, though following the example of Spain, did not think fit to apply those strong and effectual Remedies, which were begun to be made use of in France; however they went on curing the Wounds with Ointments and Plaisters, the best way they could, that, at least, the most grievous and intolerable Abuses might be remov'd. That what their Predecessors had borne with might not be objected to them, they deriv'd their Title to the Kingdom, not from the Anjouvians, but from the Suevi and from Conrad, the younger, the last of the Suevian Kings, by vertue of the Investiture he gave of it to Peter King of Aragon, the Husband of Constantia, Daughter of King Manfred.

ALPHONSUS I. in the Conclave, which was held in the Year 1431. for the Election of a new Pope, got the Cardinals to promise upon Oath never to pretend any more to the Spoils; so that Eugenius IV. being elected, it was expressly declared in the Investiture, which that Pope gave him of the Kingdom of Naples, that, with respect to the Spoils and Revenues of the vacant Churches, they should be regulated in every thing Juxta Canonicas Sanctiones. Wherefore during the whole Reign of the Aragonian Kings, and even of Ferdinand the Catholick, till the beginning of the Reign of the Emperor Charles V. it became an establish'd Custom with us, that immediately upon the Death of a Prelate, or other beneficed Person, not only of those Churches or Benefices that were in the Royal Gift or Presentation; but generally of all the Churches or Benefices within the Kingdom, the Chaplain Major gave notice of the Vacancy to our Kings, who by their Secretaries dispatch'd Commissions to such Persons, as were most to their liking, empowering them in name of the Royal Court to take Possession, and make an exact and faithful Inventory of the Spoils, as also of the standing Corn and other Fruits of the Earth, that they might be preserv'd for the Benefit of the Successor, without the Apostolical Chamber's intermeddling therewith. Then, the Church or Benefice being disposed of, the Bulls were presented by the Successor, and the Exequatur Regium being obtain'd, an order was dispatch'd to the Royal Commissary, who had the keeping of the Spoils, and of the said Fruits, to put the Successor in Possession of the Church, and at the same time of the Spoils and Fruits. The Instances of this Practice in the Reigns of Alphonfus I. Ferdinand I. and King Frederick are inserted in a Consultation, sent to King Philip II. in 1571. by the Duke d'Alcala, when he was Viceroy of the Kingdom; and such was the Custom till the Viceroyalty of D. Hugo de Moncada, in the Reign of Charles V. though in the time of Ferdinand the Catholick the Court of Rome did not fail, whenever an Opportunity offer'd, to make Incroachments, as it happen'd in 1528. when (Rome having been pillaged the Year before) Clement VII. in order to raise Money for his Ransom, appointed Commissaries every where, who right or wrong exacted Spoils, Annats, and whatever they could lay their Hands on for making Money, as we shall see in the following Books of this History.

FERDINAND I. as much as in him lay, did not fail to oppose other Incroachments, as has been seen; he regulated the Immunities and other Pretensions of the Rural Deans: He put a stop to the Incroachment of Innocent VIII. and much greater Things might have been expected from his Successors, if the many Troubles and Disorders that happen'd afterwards in the Kingdom, had not forced them to employ their Care and Pains about preserving it, and about their own Safety and Escape.

FERDINAND the Catholick, not swerving from the Spanish Customs, did not use much Rigour and Watchfulness. Wherefore he did not mind the Progress, which the Ecclesiasticks were daily making in extending their Jurisdiction, and enlarging their Tribunals, insomuch that they were obliged to establish diverse Rules for their better Regulation; and much less did he regard the excessive Acquisitions of temporal Estates, which were made not only by the Churches, but by the Monasteries.

S E C T. I.

Monks and Temporalities.

THE Aragonian Kings, and among the rest Alphonfus II. as we have seen in the twenty fifth Book of this History, enrich'd the Monks of Monte Oliveto not only with Lands and great and magnificent Habitations, but provided them with rich and costly Furniture; for which these Monks were most grateful: For in their low ebb of Fortune they did not fail to supply them; and there is still to be seen a most moving Letter, written by Alphonfus II. while he staid in Sicily, to these Monks, begging of them to remember him in their Prayers, by recommending him to God, who had been pleased to reduce him to that lamentable State, that he would likewise be pleased to take Pity and Compassion of him. And in the Calamities of Queen Isabel, the Wife of the banish'd King Frederick, these Fathers out of Gratitude supply'd her, for, as we have said, having resolv'd to retire to Ferrara, she and her Children were reduced to so great Poverty, that if the Olivetans had not supply'd her with three hundred Ducats a Year, they could not have liv'd; for which that prudent Queen by her Letter, written from Ferrara, render'd them many Thanks¹.

IN the beginning of the Reign of the Aragonian Kings, Alphonfus I. in Imitation of many Convents that had been founded in Spain, introduced among us the Order of S. Mary of Mercy, instituted for the Redeeming of Captives from the Hands of the Infidels: He was the first, who in the Year 1442. according to the Charter, recorded by *Summonte*², founded a Monastery of that Order in Naples, and granted it many Privileges. Which Order, in the time of the Austrian Kings, was encreased by many other Monasteries both in Naples and elsewhere.

BUT of all the Orders that were instituted in this Century, none were so famous, and increased so much as the Minimes, which had its rise in Calabria. It had for its Author Francesco di Paola, from the Name of the Village where he was born. They were at first call'd the Hermits of S. Francis, because, as Philip de Comines writes³, (who was then at the Court of Lewis XI. and had an Opportunity of discoursing with him, when he was invited to France by that King) that from the Age of twelve Years to forty, being his Age when he came to France, he had led the Life of an Hermit, living always in a Cave, under a prodigious high Rock. In all the Course of his Life he never eat either Flesh, Fish, Eggs, or Milk, abstaining in a manner from the common Food of Mankind. He was a simple and illiterate Man, and had never learn'd any Thing. Therefore, as Comines observes, it was very surprising to hear him give prudent and pertinent Answers. The Fame of so great and extraordinary Austerity and Retiredness, made him to be renown'd for Sanctity all over Europe, for which he was call'd, The Holy Man of Calabria.

LEWIS XI. of France at this Time was seiz'd with such an extraordinary fit of Sickneſs, that it had, in a manner, deprived him of his Senses, and made him commit extravagant and foolish Things. He had shut himself up in his Castle of Plessis les Tours, and being full of Suspicion, he caused the Palace to be well guarded, and would suffer none, even of the greatest Quality, to lodge in it. Desirous of recovering his Health, and mov'd by the Fame of the Holy Man of Calabria, he sent the Master of his Household to bring him to Court, but he being unwilling to come without Orders from the Pope and his own King, Frederick, then Prince of Taranto, King Ferdinand's Son, was oblig'd to accompany the French Messenger to take him out of his Cave, and they brought him to Naples, where he was receiv'd with great Honour and Respect by the King and his Children, who were very much surpris'd to find a simple illiterate Man reason with them with as much Judgment as if he had been bred up at Court. From Naples he went to Rome, where he was receiv'd with great Honour and Respect by the Cardinals, and with much more by Pope Sixtus IV. of whom he had three private and long Audiences, and who made him sit by him in a Chair richly deck'd. The Pope was so much taken with his judicious Answers, that he gave him Power to institute a new Order, which he call'd, Of the Hermits of S. Francis. Having left Rome, and being arriv'd in France, he was receiv'd with the utmost Honour by the King, who being very solicitous about recovering his Health, went to meet him, and threw himself at his Feet, earnestly begging of him, that he would be pleased to grant him Health and long Life; but he answer'd him very prudently, and as became a wise Man. And Philip de Comines says, that he had heard him often reason in Presence of Charles, afterwards King, and of all the Great Men of the Kingdom, upon many Things with so much Judgment, that it was impossible for a simple and illiterate Man to speak so without Divine Inspiration; but seeing, while Comines was writing, he was still alive, and that he might alter to the better or worse, therefore he makes no more mention of him. Some of the Courtiers laugh'd at the Hermit's coming, calling him, out of Derision, The Holy Man; but this Writer says, that they spoke so because they were not so well acquainted with the oddness of the King's Distemper as he was, nor had seen the Things that were the Cause of it, nor knew the vehement Desire he had to be rid of it.

ALTHOUGH the Intercession of this Holy Man had avail'd King Lewis nothing, for the Distemper grew upon him to that Degree, that he shortly after died of it; nevertheless Charles VIII. his Son, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, had a vast Respect and Veneration for him, and in honour of him caused a Church to be built in the Entry of the Park of the City of Tours, so that this new Order began to get footing, and Francis having taken up his abode there, in a short Time many Monasteries were built in that Neighbourhood.

THE first that was erected in Naples, was in a solitary Place, where there was a small Chapel, dedicated to S. Lewis, King of France; therefore that Monastery still retains the Name of that Saint. He likewise founded in Calabria a small Monastery of his Order near Paola, the Place of his Nativity. There were also some Monasteries of this Order founded in Rome, from whence they were afterwards spread over all the Provinces of Europe, the Order having been confirm'd by Alexander VI. and by Julius II. Pope Sixtus's Successors; and the Monasteries of this Order multiply'd afterwards exceedingly both in the City of Naples, and the Kingdom; and by means of their particular Devotions, they encreased in Riches, and their Habitations in magnificent Buildings, indow'd with ample Revenues; and by that Means the Order was brought into the State in which we now see it.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXI.

ALTHO' the Death of Ferdinand, King of Spain, derived the Succession of so many Kingdoms to such a powerful Prince, as the Arch-Duke Charles already was, and had a farther Prospect of being, after the Death of his Grandfather Maximilian, (which seem'd to secure his Dominions from new Commotions;) yet that very Thing prompted Francis I. King of France, to form a Design upon Naples, and to turn this our Kingdom once more topsy-turvy. He flatter'd himself, that the Conquest of it would be an easy Task, because upon the King's Death, this Kingdom was in no good Posture of Defence, and it was impracticable for the Arch-Duke to send timely Succours to it: He believ'd likewise, that Pope Leo X. would, for his own Interest, favour his Enterprize, as being jealous of the over-grown Power of the Arch-Duke, already posses'd of so many Kingdoms, and in Prospect of succeeding Maximilian in the Empire: Besides, he hoped that the Arch-Duke himself would be slack in opposing his Design upon Naples, from an Apprehension that his falling out with France at that Juncture, would be a considerable Disadvantage to his Establishment in the Dominions of Spain, and especially in the Kingdom of Arragon.

AND indeed, had Right been seconded by sufficient Power, some of the same Family might have justly pretended to Arragon; for, altho' during the Life of the late King, and Isabella his Consort, it had been declar'd in an Assembly of the States of that Kingdom, that the excluding Females from the Succession, by the ancient Constitution, did not prejudice the Sons of such Females, unless there hap-pen'd to be Brothers, Uncles, or Nephews of the Royal Family, or any other Relation in the Male-Line nearer, or at least as near as the Son in the Female; (which was the Reason why the Succession was adjudged to the Arch-Duke Charles after the Death of Ferdinand) alledging for a Precedent, that upon the Demise of Martin, King of Aragon, (who dy'd without Issue Male) Ferdinand, the Grandfather of the last Ferdinand, altho' descended by the Female Line, was (by Judges deputed by the States of the Kingdom to determine the Succession) preferred to Count Urgelli, and other Relations of King Martin's in the Male Line, but in a more remote Degree than Ferdinand was. Yet there was even then a secret Murmuring among the People, that this Interpretation of the Law, and settling the Succession upon them, was more owing to the Power of Ferdinand and Isabella than to Justice; for it seem'd to many Persons a straining the Law, to allow the Sons to succeed, whose Mothers had been excluded; and therefore that the Declaration in Favour of the elder Ferdinand, was obtain'd more by the Terror of his Arms than by Justice.

THE King of France being appriz'd of these Things, and knowing likewise, that the People of the Provinces of Aragon and Valentia, and the County of Catalonia (all these being reckon'd in the Kingdom of Aragon) were desirous of a King of their own, believed that the Arch-Duke would not be averse to give up the Kingdom of Naples to him, for a valuable Consideration, rather than run the Hazard of his Succession to so many States.

BUT whilst Francis determin'd to take Arms in Prosecution of this Design, new Occurrences put him under a Necessity of taking care of his own Safety. For the Emperor Maximilian was preparing (as he had formerly stipulated with King Ferdinand) to attack the Dutchy of Milan. The King of France was oblig'd, therefore, to try to make up Matters with King Charles, and by his Mediation, to bring the Emperor to Terms. Charles, (who laboured to remove all Obstacles which might stop his Passage into Spain, and his Settlement in those Dominions) by the Advice of Monseigneur de Cevres, a Native of Flanders, by whose Counsels he was entirely govern'd (being himself but sixteen Years of Age) stooping to the Necessity of the Time, and the present Posture of his Affairs, accepted the Offer of an Accommodation; and their Ministers by Appointment meeting at Noyon, the Peace was there concluded on the 13th of August 1516. The Deputies on the Part of France were the Bishop of Paris, the great Master of the King's Household, and the President of the Parliament of Paris; for his Catholick Majesty, Monseigneur de Cevres, and the Emperor's Great Chancellor. The Articles of this Peace, as far as it related to the Kingdom of Naples, were as follow.

THAT there should be perpetual Peace and Alliance between the Kings of France, and Spain, for the Defence of their Dominions against all Enemies of either Crown. That the King of France should give his Daughter Louisa (then but one Year old) in Marriage to his Catholick Majesty; giving for her Dowry all the Right which he pretended to have to any Part of the Kingdom of Naples, by the Partition formerly made by their Ancestors; but with this Condition, that till the young Princess should be fit for Marriage, the King of Spain should pay 100,000 Crowns yearly to the King of France, for her Maintenance. ¹ Grocius says that his Catholick Majesty paid that Sum by Way of Tribute, to shew that the King of France had some Right to the Kingdom of Naples; but the Articles of the Peace, which are to be seen at large in Federico Leonardo's Collection, ² prove the contrary, where that Sum is promis'd, not on the Account of Tribute, but of Expences, nor to continue for ever, but till the Princess Louisa should be marriageable.

IT was farther stipulated, that in Case the design'd Spouse should die before Marriage, another Daughter who should be born to his most Christian Majesty, should, under the same Conditions, be given in Place of her Sister to the King of Spain; but if he should not have a Daughter, then Renata (who had been promis'd to the Arch-Duke by the Treaty of Paris) should be given him to Wife. And any of those Ladies dying (after Marriage) without Issue, the Part of the Kingdom of Naples, now in Dispute, should return to France. In Consequence of this Agreement, they apply'd to Pope Leo, for a Dispensation from the Oaths taken at the Treaty of Paris, when Renata had been espous'd to the same Prince : And his Holiness gave his Bull to that Purpose, dated *September 3, 1516.*¹

THE Peace being thus concluded, King Charles, who then resided at Brussels, prepar'd for his Voyage to Spain, where he happily arriv'd about the End of the Year following, to take Possession of those Dominions ; having obtain'd of the King of France (between whom and him there pass'd all the Marks of Friendship, each of them dissembling his secret Animosity) a Respite for six Months, of the Payment of the first 100,000 Ducats.

CHARLES, at his first Arrival in Spain, was received with incredible Joy ; and Queen Joan, his Mother, resign'd the Administration to him, with this Condition, that her Name should be still inserted in all publick Acts along with the King's ; and that the Dominions of Spain should be govern'd in his Majesty's Name and Queen Joan's. He confirm'd Don Raimondo de Cordona, Vice Roy of Naples, and wrote a Letter to the Neapolitans full of paternal Affection. About this Time, his design'd Spouse the Princess Louisa dying, the Treaty was renewed between the two Kings upon the same Terms ; and the second Daughter promis'd in Marriage to his Catholic Majesty : Both the Kings solemnizing this Alliance with the greatest outward Demonstrations of Friendship imaginable. The King of Spain (who had already caus'd the 100,000 Crowns to be paid in Lyons) publickly wore upon the Feast of St. Michael, the Order so call'd ; and the King of France that of the Golden Fleece, upon St. Andrew's Day.

CHAP. I.

The Death of the Emperor Maximilian, and the Election of his Grandson Charles to the Empire. The Differences following upon it between Him and the King of France, which afterwards broke out into open and bloody Wars.

WHILST the Affairs of Italy, and especially of Naples, were thus in Peace, the Emperor Maximilian, having at Heart the establishing the Succession of the Empire after his Death, in the Person of one of his Grandsons, in this same Year 1517. treated with the Electors to induce them to chuse one of them King of the Romans. And altho' his first Design was, to raise his second Grandson Ferdinand to that Dignity ; because so many Dominions having fallen to the elder, with such Accession of Power, he thought it reasonable to support the younger with that Honour ; thinking that to keep up the Splendor of his Family, and to obviate any Misfortune which might happen to Charles, it was more eligible to make them both great, than to unite all the Power in one alone. But being press'd to the contrary by many about him, such as the Cardinal of Sion, and all such as hated, and were afraid of the Power of France ; laying aside his first Design, he endeavour'd to get the King of Spain elected King of the Romans. Those about him represented to him, that the centring the whole Power in one, was the readiest Way to aggrandize the House of Austria, whereas the dividing its Force, would make them less capable pable of pursuing the Measures they were to take : That Charles's Greatness was built upon such solid Foundations, that if the imperial Dignity were join'd to it, there was Ground to hope, that he might unite all Italy, and the greatest Part of Christendom under ONE Monarchy, which was not only requisite to the future Greatness of the House of Austria, but to the Quiet of his People, and (considering the Situation of the Infidels) to the common Advantage of Christianity. They shew'd him, that it was his Duty as Emperor, to consult the Dignity of the Empire, which had been so long in his Person and Family, and which could not hope to raise itself to its ancient Glory and Splendor, by any other Way, than by being united to Charles's Power : That it was evident by the Examples of the ancient Emperors, Augustus Cæsar, and others his Successors, that (not having Children of their own, or any of their own Family to succeed them) lest the Imperial Dignity vested in their Persons should fail or be diminish'd, they procur'd by Adoption, Successors either of distant Relations, or of Persons who did not at all belong to them. And the Instance was recent of the Catholick King, who altho' he lov'd Ferdinand as his own Son, having bred him up in his own Court ; and had almost never seen his Brother Charles, nay had found him towards the latter Part of his Life not very obedient to his Commands ; notwithstanding all this, without any Consideration of the low State of the first, he left him no Share of his great Dominions, not so much as Part of what were intirely in his Power to dispose of, as being his own Conquests, but left all to the other, whom he scarce knew but as a Stranger.

THE King of France oppos'd this Design of the Emperor with all the Art and Diligence possible, it being a great Trouble to him to think that the Imperial Dignity should be united to so many Kingdoms and States, belonging to the King of Spain ; because if it should be strengthen'd by such an Addition of Power, it would become formidable to every one : For this Reason he endeavour'd secretly to crush the Project, by tampering with the Electors and the Pope : He likewise sent an Ambassador to the Venetians, to persuade them to unite with him to oppose it, warning both the Pope and the State of Venice of the Danger which might ensue by such a Power. But the Electors were in a great measure brought over to the Emperor's Side, and had as good as receiv'd the Money which the King of Spain had promised on Account of the Election ; for he had sent into Germany for that Purpose, 200,000 Ducats. Nor was it to be thought that the Pope, altho' he dilik'd the Thing, would hinder the new-elected Emperor to receive the Imperial Crown in Germany, from the Hands of his Legates in his Name, because the going to Rome to be crown'd, tho' it seem'd to derive a greater Sanction from the Apostolick See, was judg'd rather a Ceremony than any Thing substantial.

WITH these Thoughts and Matters, the Year 1518 was spent ; the Electors not being as yet come to a Determination, which became still more uncertain and difficult, by the Death of Maximilian, which happen'd at Lintz, in the very Beginning of the Year 1519.

AFTER the Death of the Emperor, the Kings of France and Spain, began openly to aspire to the Imperial Crown ; which Contest for a Matter of such Importance, and between two such powerful Princes, was yet so dextrously manag'd by both, that there were neither reproachful Words heard, nor any Threats of Force ; but each employ'd his Interest and Authority to bring over the Electors to his Party : And the King of France spoke with great Applause, to the Ambassadors of Spain about the Election ; telling them, that it was a Thing worthy of Commendation for each of the contending Parties to endeavour, by all honest Ways, to adorn himself with the Splendor of the Imperial Purple, which had been so often worn by both their Ancestors ; but that it would not be right for one of them to wrest it from the other by Injustice, or for the Sake of it, to diminish that Affection and Affinity already establish'd between them.

THE King of Spain thought he had a just Right to the Empire, because it had continued so long in the House of Austria ; and that it was not usual for the Electors to cut off the Descendents of the deceased Emperor without their apparent Incapacity. There was no Prince in Germany of such Power and Interest, as to come in Competition with him in the Election ; nor did it seem just, nor indeed probable, that the Electors would transfer so great a Dignity, (which had for many Ages been possess'd by the German Nation) to a foreign Prince; and if any of them should be induc'd by the Force of Money, or from any other Consideration, to be of another Opinion, he did not doubt but he should be able to terrify them by Forces, which he should have in Readiness upon a proper Occasion, with the Help of such Electors as would oppose their Design, or at least, that the other independant Princes, and the Hans Towns in Germany, would never agree to a Thing so shameful to themselves, but especially to confer that Dignity upon a King of France, by which they might aggrandize a Prince, who was an Enemy to their Country, and they might assure themselves that it would never return again to a German: He believed he could easily procure the fulfilling of the Agreement made with his Grandfather, the Sums and Donatives to be paid to each Elector, having been already ascertained.

ON the other Hand, the Desire and Expectation of the King of France were no way inferior to his, being founded on his Opinion of being able to bribe the Votes of the Electors, with an immense Sum of Money, as some of them had advis'd him to attempt, by shewing him the Feasibleness of it. These Hopes he conceiv'd, rather upon Appearances, than upon solid Grounds; he knew that it was generally a Grievance to the German Princes, to see the Emperors very powerful, from a Jealousy they had, that they would not approve (either in Whole, or in Part) of the Immunities and Imperial Prerogatives claim'd by many of them; and upon this Account he imagined, that those Princes would not consent to the Election of the King of Spain: He knew likewise, that it was very grating to many illustrious Families in Germany, that the Empire should have continu'd so many Years in one House; and that the Election to that Dignity, which ought sometimes to be in one Family, and sometimes in another, should be continued, as it were, by Hereditary Succession, in one alone; for to be tied down to the nearest Relation of the deceased Emperor, differ'd little from a Lineal Succession: Thus the Empire had pass'd from Albert of Austria to his Brother Frederick, from Frederick to Maximilian his Son, and now the Design was to transfer it from Maximilian to his Grandson Charles. Besides these Considerations, the King of France had great Confidence in the Pope's Assistance, as well on account of the Friendship which he believed he had contracted with him, as from a Persuasion, that his Holiness could not approve that Charles, who was already so powerful, and who, by the Neighbourhood of Naples to the Ecclesiastical State, and the Adherence of the Ghibeline Nobility to him, had an open Passage even to the Gates of Rome, should likewise be rais'd to the Empire; but in this Francis did not reflect, that this Consideration, which was truly a Bar to Charles, was as strong against himself: However, not seeing the Beam in his own Eye, which he saw clearly in his Competitor's, he applied to the Pope, begging his Assistance, and assuring him that he might dispose of him, and his Kingdoms, as a Father.

THE Business of this Election was a Thing of great Consequence to the Pope; for, which ever of these two Kings should be chosen Emperor, it was disagreeable to him, with Regard to the Security of the Apostolical See. But his Authority and Credit with the Electors, not being such as could encourage him to hope to do great Matters, he thought it necessary to use Prudence and Art in a Thing of so great Moment: He was persuaded, that the King of France (easily deceived by some of the Electors) would have no Interest in the Election; nor could he believe, that Bribery could so far prevail, even in the most mercenary Men, as to oblige them so shamefully to transfer the Empire from the German Nation to the French. He imagined, that the King of Spain, by being their Countryman; by the Arts used by Maximilian, and for many other Reasons, would easily carry his Point, unless some very powerful Opposition should be made against him, which could not be done, but by the King of France's using the same Interest and Money, in Favour of some one of the Electors, which he had design'd for the promoting his own Election: But he judg'd it impracticable to persuade the King to this, whilst he was blown up with vain Hopes; however, he flatter'd himself, that the more earnestly the King labour'd that Matter (whilst his Hopes were in their Bloom) he would the more readily be prevailed upon to concur, with the same Ardour, in the Election of a third Person, after he perceiv'd that his own Expectations were blasted, and his Design frustrated and disappointed: From whence it might likewise happen, that by favouring the Cause of the King of France vigorously amongst the Princes, the other King, finding his Design meet with strong Opposition, and doubting lest his Competitor might gain the Victory, he might likewise concur in a third Person. With this View, the Pope not only assured the King of France, that he wish'd his Promotion to the Imperial Dignity, but alledged many Reasons to persuade him to prosecute his Design with Vigour, promising to assist him with the utmost Plenitude of the Papal Power.

WHILST these Things were carrying on with such Care and Jealousy, the two Kings did not interrupt their Friendship and Alliance; for, at the same time, the Grand Master of France, and Monseigneur Cœuvres (in which two, the Councils, and, as it were, the very Souls of their Masters resided) went, in their Names, to Montpellier, to consult about concluding the Marriage of the King of Spain with the Second Daughter of France, but especially to treat of the Business of the Kingdom of Navar: (the Restitution of which, to its antient King, promis'd at the Treaty of Neyon, altho' much press'd by the King of France, had been delayed by the King of Spain upon diverse Pretences) But the Death of the Grand-Master happening before they could have an Interview, put a Stop to any Hopes from that Congress.

IN the mean time, the Affair of the Empire was prosecuted by both Kings with great Eagerness. The King of France deceived himself every Day by the Promises of the Marquis of Brandenburgh, one of the Electors, who having receiv'd from him Offers of great Sums, and perhaps, some present Payments, oblig'd himself, by a secret Treaty, not only to give him his own Vote, but to secure for him that of his Brother the Archbishop of Mayence. He flatter'd himself also with the King of Bohemia's Vote, by which (in case of an Equality amongst the other Six, three of which are Prelates, and three Princes) the Controversy is decided. On the other Side, the Inclinations of the People of Germany appear'd very plain, not to let the Imperial Dignity go out of their Country, so that even the Swiss, moved by their Affection to their Mother Nation Germany, had petition'd the Pope, that he would not favour any one in the Election that was not a German.

THE Electors being assembled at Frankfort (according to antient Custom) whilst they were engaged in sundry Disputes about fixing the proper Time for the Election, according to their different Orders, an Army appeared near Frankfort, sent to the Field by the King of Spain (who was readier to raise Forces with his Money, than to bestow it upon the Electors) under Pretence of curbing any Person who should endeavour to force the Election; by this Means, having encouraged the Electors who were of his Party, he likewise gained to his Side, those who were doubtful, and frighten'd the Elector of Brandenburgh, who favour'd the King of France; so that coming to an Election upon the 28th of June 1519, Charles of Austria, King of Spain, was elected Emperor, by the Votes of four Electors, viz. the Archbishop of Mayence, the Archbishop of Cologne, the Count Palatine, and Duke of Saxony: But the Archbishop of Triers chose the Marquis of Brandenburgh, who himself also concurred in his own Election. Nor was there any Doubt of the King of Spain's being chosen, if, by an Equality among the other Six, there had been Occasion for the Suffrage of the Seventh, for Lewis King of Bohemia and Hungary, had promised him his Vote.

THIS Election grieved the King of France, and troubled the Pope, with all who depended upon him in Italy, seeing so great Power center'd in one young Prince, who, by all Appearances, was like to be blest with Increase of Dominion, and all imaginable Prosperity: And altho' he was not so rich as the King of France in Money, yet it was thought of vast Importance, that he could fill his Army with German and Spanish Infantry, who had the Reputation of good and gallant Soldiers.

POPE LEO conceal'd his Dissatisfaction, with great Art and Dissimulation; nor was he yet resolved which Side to adhere to: But to shun all Occasion of shewing his ill Will to Charles, of his own proper Motion, he gave him a Dispensation to accept of the Empire, notwithstanding its being contrary to the Tenor of the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, by which (according to the antient Form) he was expressly debarr'd from accepting it, and sent him a Bull, by which he was render'd capable of being Emperor, notwithstanding the Stipulations to the contrary; as may be seen in Croccarelli ¹.

IN the Year 1520. the Emperor went by Sea from Spain to Flanders, and from thence into Germany, where, in October he received the first Crown (the same, with which, 'tis said, Charles the Great was crown'd) after the antient Form, with the Authority of the Princes of Germany, in a great Assembly at Aix la Chapelle, a City illustrious for its Antiquity, and for the Sepulchre of Charles the Great.

BUT this Prosperity was disturb'd by new Accidents that happen'd in Spain; for King Charles's Promotion to the Empire, was a Grievance to the Subjects of those Dominions, knowing that he would be oblig'd, for several Reasons, to spend a great Part of his Time out of Spain, to the great Loss and Inconvenience of all his Subjects there: But what gave the greatest Handle to those Commotions, was the terrible Hatred they had conceived against their Governors on account of their Avarice, especially against De Cœvres, and the rest of the Flemings; so that all the People being irritated against the very Names of them, those of Valladolid had mutiny'd upon the Emperor's Departure, and he was scarce out of Spain, when they were all up in Arms (not against the King, but against the wicked Governors); and after having consulted together, without paying any Obedience to the King's Officers, they assembled the greatest Part of the Populace, who giving a new Form to the Government, they rul'd in the Name of the Holy Junta (for so they call'd the General Council of the People): The Officers and Ministers of the King taking Arms against them, Things came to open War, and the Disorders increased to that Degree, that the Emperor had but little Authority left there, which rais'd the Expectations of the Italians and others, who desir'd a Diminution of so great Power.

TOWARDS the End of the same Year, 3000 Spanish Foot, having been some Months in Sicily, refus'd to return to Spain, as the Emperor had order'd them, and disregarding the Authority of their Leaders, pass'd over to Reggio in Calabria, and marched (doing great Mischief every where) towards the Estate of the Church, putting his Holiness in great Fear; especially by their refusing the Offers made to them by the Viceroy of Naples, and the Pope, to list a Part of them, and give the rest Money: But this Commotion was quell'd sooner than People imagin'd, for as they pass'd the Tronto, to enter Marca d' Ancona, whither the Pope had sent a considerable Force, who were encamp'd on the Banks of the Tranfo, those Forces falling with Fury upon the Spaniards, kill'd a good Number of them, and forc'd the rest to retire; so that failing in Courage and Reputation, they were fain to accept, from the Emperor's Ministers, Conditions much worse than those they had before despis'd.

IN the mean Time, the Animosities between the Emperor and King of France much increas'd; and the Pope, altho' he seem'd to affect Neutrality, yet, in effect, jealous of Charles's too great Prosperity, secretly treated with the King of France, about the Means for driving the Emperor from Naples; and it was agreed between them, to invade the Kingdom with joint Forces, upon this Condition, that Gacta, with all the Territory which lies between the River Garigliano, and the Ecclesiastical State, should be given to the Church, and the rest of the Kingdom to the King of France's Second Son; but because he was under Age, during his Minority, both he and the Kingdom should be govern'd by the Pope's Legate, who should reside at Naples.

ABOUT the same time, the King of France being prompted by the Troubles in Spain, and encouraged (as he afterwards complain'd) by the Pope, sent an Army under Asparoth, the Brother of Oderic Lautrech, into Navarre, to recover that Kingdom for its antient King, which he happily effected. There wanted nothing now for the Naples Expedition, but the fulfilling the Articles agreed upon at Rome between the Pope and him. But when the King was desir'd to ratify them, he began to hesitate, many Persons having put Doubts in his Mind, that, considering the Pope's double Dealings, and the Hatred he had shew'd to him ever since his ascending the Chair, he had good Reason to suspect some Deceit; because they said it was not probable, that his Holiness should desire, that the Kingdom of Naples should be possess'd, either by his Majesty, or his Son; because, if they should have the Kingdom of Naples, together with the Dutchy of Milan (already subject to France) the Pope would be afraid of himself: They assured him, that so great Friendship, so suddenly profess'd to him, was not without some Mystery ; that he had need to take great Care of his Affairs, and that he should beware, lest, thinking to gain Naples, he should lose Milan ; for, by sending an Army to Naples, he put himself in the Pope's Power, who (having 6000 Swiss) by Intelligence with the Emperor's Officers, might destroy his Army, and then what could defend the State of Milan ? These Reasons made such Impression upon the King, that continuing uncertain whether he should conclude the Articles, and, perhaps, waiting an Answer to some other Negotiations, he sent no Advices to Rome, leaving both the Pope and his own Ambassadors without knowing what to do.

BUT the Pope, either governing himself with his usual Dissimulation, and being a secret Enemy to the King ; or else finding that all Expectation of an Answer from France was vanish'd, beginning to suspect the true Reason of it, and being afraid that the King might discover his Practices to the Emperor ; being likewise earnestly desirous to recover Parma and Placentia, and to do some memorable Exploit ; but above all, being enraged at the Insolence of Lautrech, and the Bishop of Yarles, the King's Minister, both which, had not only refused to receive any Ecclesiastical Orders or Mandates into the State of Milan, but had slighted them with the greatest Pride, and the most reproachful Words : From some of these Considerations, or all of them together, I say, the Pope design'd to join with the Emperor against the King of France.

THE Emperor, on the other Hand, disoblig'd at the invading Navarre, and push'd on by many Milanesè Exiles, whose Solicitations were also seconded by some of his own Council, that were desirous to lessen the Credit of De Cevres, who had always dissuaded a Rupture with France, resolv'd to unite with the Pope against the King ; and indeed, without De Cevres's Knowledge (who very opportunely died just at that time) there was a League made, for their common Defence, between the Pope and the Emperor, comprehending also the House of Medicis, and the Florentines designing, with that Addition, to break in upon the State of Milan, and when it should be conquer'd, Parma and Placentia was to be given to the Church, with the same Conditions upon which it was held by the Popes before ; and because Francis Sforza, who was banish'd to Trent, pretended to the State of Milan, by Right of his Father's Investiture, and his Brother's Renunciation, it was agreed, that upon the Conquest, he should be put in Possession of it, and the Confederates were obliged to maintain and defend him in it ; and further, that the Dutchy of Milan should not use any other Salt but that of Cervia ; that the Pope should not only have full Liberty to raise Processes against the Subjects and Vassals within the State of Milan, but the Emperor should oblige himself to assist him against them (after the Conquest) and particularly in the taking of Ferrara : The Tribute of the Kingdom of Naples was to be increased, and a Pension of 10,000 Ducats promised to Cardinal De Medicis, out of the Archbishoprick of Toledo, newly vacant ; and an Estate of the same Value in the Kingdom of Naples, to Alexander de Medicis, natural Son to Lorenzo Duke of Urbino.

THIS Treaty against France, being secretly concluded between the Pope and the Emperor, their whole Thoughts were turn'd upon the War in the Milanesè ; which being so well written by Guicciardin, Grevius, and other Writers of that Time, and not being to my Purpose, I willingly pass it over ; only in a few Words, I shall say, that the Imperialists, and Francis Sforza, having expell'd the French, who were commanded by the famous Lautrech, took Possession of the Dutchy ; of which Conquest Pope Leo was so fond, that *Montaigne*¹ says, upon the News of it, he was so surpriz'd with Joy, that he was seized with a Fever, and died. Guicciardin relates², that he died suddenly the 1st of December 1521 ; for, after receiving the News of the Conquest of Milan, with extreme Pleasure, he was seized the same Night with a slight Fever, and altho' his Physicians, at first, thought his Distemper of no Consequence, yet he died in a few Days, not without great Suspicion, that Barnaby Malaspina, his Valet de Chambre, had given him Poison instead of Drink : But altho' he was imprison'd upon Suspicion, there was no farther Search made into that Affair, for Cardinal De Medicis coming to Rome, set him at Liberty, to prevent any further Occasion of greater Enmity with the King of France, by whose Contrivance it was whisper'd, but without any Certainty, that Barnaby had administer'd the Poison.

ADRIAN, Cardinal of Tortosa, a Fleming by Birth, succeeded Leo on the 8th of January 1522. He had been the Emperor's Preceptor in his Youth, and, at his Desire, promoted to the Purple by Pope Leo: Upon the News of his being chosen Pope, without changing his Name, he began his Pontificate by the Name of Adrian VI. His Reign was but short, being little more than one Year and a half, for he died on the 14th of September 1523; and to him succeeded, about two Months after, Cardinal Julius de Medicis, who took the Name of Clement VII.

MANY Revolutions happen'd in his Pontificate. The King of France returning to Italy, to recover the Milanese, besieg'd Pavia, and coming to an Engagement near that Place, was unhappily made Prisoner; many Offers were made for his Release, but he was sent to Spain, where he was kept, till an Agreement was made between him and the Emperor, for his Freedom, upon hard Terms.

IN that Treaty made at Madrid the 14th of January 1526, among other Things it was stipulated, That his most Christian Majesty should give up and renounce to the Emperor, all his Pretensions to the Kingdom of Naples, even such as he had received by Investiture from the Church, together with all his Right to the Dutchy of *Milan*¹.

NEITHER the Lawyers nor Historians² have pretended, that the Right of the King of France to the Kingdom of Naples, whatever it was, ceased by Virtue of this Treaty, or that afterwards he had not a better Pretence for invading it; nor do they affirm, that any War which should afterwards be carried on upon that Account, would be unjust or unwarrantable; or, in short, that all Debates about Naples ought to have ceased.

NOR were the Predictions false, which Wise Men made at that Time, upon this feign'd and forc'd Treaty; for King Francis was no sooner set at Liberty, than judging all Obligations extorted from him whilst he was Prisoner, to be null and void, without any Regard had to his Children, whom he had given as Hostages to the Emperor, he not only did not observe the Conditions stipulated, but thinking himself ill used, by being constrain'd to make dishonourable and impossible Concessions, he was resolv'd to be reveng'd: With this Intention, the very Day that he had sign'd the Articles, he previously made a long Protestation (which is to be seen in Leonard's Collections³) in which he declared, that he was induced by mere Force, as being a Prisoner, and grievously indisposed, to sign that Treaty. He therefore bent all his Thoughts upon uniting his whole Power; and returning Home full of Rage, he resolv'd to renew the War, and carry his Arms afresh into Italy, with Intention not only to recover the Dutchy of Milan, lately lost, but likewise to invade the Kingdom of Naples, promising himself the Conquest of it, by Means of his famous General Lautrech, as shall be related hereafter.

C H A P. II.

How the Kingdom of Naples was govern'd in the mean Time by Don Raymond de Cardona, and after his Death by Don Carlos de Lanoja his Successor.

IN the mean time, the Kingdom of Naples, which had been committed to the Care of Don Raymond de Cardona by King Ferdinand, and after his Death by King Charles, who continued him Viceroy, although it had suffered nothing by foreign Invasions, was yet harraiss'd from time to time by insupportable Taxes; for, being under a Necessity of maintaining an expensive War, the Barons and the inferior People took Occasion to ask new Privileges. or a Confirmation of the old ones, or else (what they had most at Heart) the fulfilling of the Grants already made, which were not observ'd: These Things oblig'd them to give considerable Sums to the Government by way of Donatives. So many Articles, and such a Number of Grants made to them, were very slowly performed; for it having been always ask'd, and as often promis'd, that in all Offices both Civil and Military, and in Ecclesiastical Benefices, the Neapolitans should have the Preference of Strangers; yet the Kingdom being at that time govern'd by Spaniards, and many Families having come thither from all the Dominions of Spain, those Offices and Benefices were, for the most part, bestowed upon Spaniards, which made the Subjects of Naples often press the Observation of Articles: Upon every new Donative they had new Promises made them, but those were always broke.

WHEN these Grants, contained in the Articles before mentioned, were made to the Neapolitans by King Ferdinand, they gave a Donative of 300,000 Ducats. Not long after, in 1508, that same King being oblig'd, by Virtue of the Treaty of Peace with Lewis XII. King of France, to maintain, at his own Charge, besides Infantry, 500 Men at Arms, there was a Tax of three Carlines laid upon every House for the Space of three Years, to pay that Sum to King Lewis: On which Occasion those Articles were granted, or rather confirm'd by the Count De Ripagorzi, and were establish'd by a General Parliament held in the Church of St. Lawrence in Naples, in the forenamed Year of 1508¹.

WHEN King Charles succeeded to Spain, and was afterwards made Emperor, to defray the great Charge he was at in procuring the Votes of the Electors, and the Expences of his Coronation, there was a Demand made by the Viceroy Cardona in 1520, of a Donative to be made by the Cities, the Barons and Syndicks of the Royal Demains, on Account of the King's pressing Necessities, his Coffers being empty; in return of which it was promis'd, that his Majesty would confirm the old Articles, and also grant them new ones: For which end, another General Parliament was held this Year, and 300,000 Ducats were offer'd to the King in three Years, 100,000 at each Payment; in Recompence of which, all the former Articles and Privileges were confirmed; and it was declared, that for the future, no extraordinary Taxes could be laid upon the Kingdom. All this was confirm'd by the Viceroy Cardona, in the said Year 1520, and afterwards ratified by the Emperor, by a special Charter, dated at Wormes January 1. 1521². But notwithstanding these Concessions, whilst the same Reasons subsisted, and much more, when the Minds of those two powerful Princes were become irreconcilable, and when cruel and bloody Wars were kindled between them, the Necessities and the want of Money to support those Wars were greater, therefore new Subsidies and Donatives were demanded, and Favours offered.

UPON the 10th of March the following Year 1522, died Don Raymond de Cardona, and his Corps was deposited in the Chapel of Castel-novo, to be transported to Catalonia, to the Church of S. Maria of Monferate. He was a Governor, according to the Times, of competent Prudence and Dexterity in Civil Affairs, a Quality which pleased King Ferdinand, and much more the Emperor Charles V. who was much troubled at his Death. He having named no Deputy, nor any having been appointed by the Emperor to enter upon the Office of Viceroy, the Collateral Council govern'd the Kingdom till the 16th of July after, that the Emperor sent us for Viceroy, Don Carlos de Lanoja, a Fleming. King Charles, in the Beginning of his Reign, having come from Brussels into Spain, and brought with him many Flemings, gave himself up to them, and (as we have seen) govern'd himself intirely by the Counsels of Monseigneur De Cevres, also of that Nation; and the Occasion of all the Tumults in Spain was, that the King neglecting the natural Spaniards, employed none but Flemings, and particularly De Cevres, who being of insatiable Avarice, had by all Ways amass'd great Riches: The others did the same, selling the Offices usually given to the Spaniards, for Money to Strangers; and taking Bribes for all the Favours, Privileges and Grants which they wanted from the Court.

LANOJA, an Officer most expert in the Art of War, arrived in Naples, and shew'd himself very favourable to the Inhabitants; and a few Months after his Arrival, he granted them many Privileges, which he confirm'd to them in Castel-novo, October 12. 1522. and are recorded by Summonte ¹.

HE could not govern the Kingdom much above a Year, because the War of Lombardy growing Daily more bloody, and Prospero Colonna, now crazy thro' Age, both in Body and Mind, being unable to perform the Office of General, the Emperor thought fit to commit that Charge to the Experience and Valour of Lanoja; and to that End sent him Orders to leave a Deputy at Naples, and to go to Milan, to take upon him the supreme Command of the Army. In this Juncture, the Necessity of the War being urgent, there was a Donative of 50,000 Ducats given to the Emperor to defray the Expences of the Army ². And some Years after, upon the Birth of Prince Philip, a new Parliament granted a Donative of 200,000 Ducats ³; so that from time to time great Sums were raised, of which Tassoni, Mazzella, and Costa have drawn up long Lists.

LANOJA march'd from Naples in 1524. leaving Andrez Caraffa, Count of St. Severino, who, with great Applause, govern'd the Kingdom almost three Years. He died in June 1526. lamented by all ⁴. In the mean time, Lanoja being return'd from Spain (whither he had carried King Francis Prisoner, as it were in Triumph; after having fought the French Fleet in the Corfican Seas) came to Naples to defend the Kingdom from the Treachery of the Pope, who had invited Vaudemont to the Conquest of it.

Pope Clement VII. invites Monseigneur De Vaudemont to the Conquest of Naples. His Progress; without Success. The Pope taken Prisoner. His Release.

THE King of France was no sooner at Liberty in his own Dominions, than laying aside all Consideration of the solemn Treaty made at Madrid, of his Faith given, the Obligation of Oaths, the Ties of the new Alliance, and, which was the strongest of all, of his two Sons given as Hostages, he turn'd all his Thoughts upon making a new and more obstinate War against his Rival Charles. He gloss'd this Breach of Treaty, by pretending, that when he was first carried Prisoner to Castle Pizzichiten, and then to the Fortrefs of Madrid in Spain, he had often protested against the Emperor (seeing the Injustice of his Demands) that if he should be constrain'd to yield to Terms, which were either unreasonable in themselves, or not in his Power to make good, he would not only break them, but (as thinking himself injur'd by Charles, for putting dishonourable or impracticable Conditions upon him) he would revenge himself if ever it should be in his Power. Nor had he fail'd to tell them often, what they might have been sensible of themselves, as being, in his Opinion, common to all Kingdoms; viz. That it is not in the Power of a King of France, to alienate any Thing annex'd to the Crown, without the Consent of the General States of the Kingdom; that the Principles of Christianity did not allow, that a Prisoner of War should be kept in perpetual Prison, a Punishment due to Malefactors, but not to one who could be charged with nothing but ill Fortune; that all the World knows, that Obligations forc'd upon Prisoners, are null and void; and the Articles themselves being of no Force, the Faith given for the Performance of them must fall of Course; that he had bound himself by former Oaths at Rheims, where, with great Solemnity he was anointed with the Holy Oyl, according to the Custom of France, never to alienate the Patrimony of the Crown: For these Reasons he declared, that he was not only at Freedom in Conscience, but ready in his Inclination to humble the Insolence of the Emperor. The King's Mother and Sister, with all the Chief Nobility of his Court, declar'd themselves of the same Mind.

BUT those Consultations would have signified nothing, if, at the same time, the Frenchmen, but more especially Pope Clement, had not added Vigour to them; for these two, considering not only the Emperor's Power, but his Ambition, fed by the Spanish Council, who perswaded him to make himself Master of Italy, were apprehensive that at last he might gain his End, by bringing under his Yoke the Church, Italy, and all the other Princes. The Pope was farther disgusted at the Emperor's Ministers; for the Imperial Officers quarter'd in the Territories of Placentia and Parma, committed great Disorders, and when the Pope complain'd of them, they answer'd, that having no Pay, they had come thither of their own accord. He was likewise moved by Things, which, perhaps, of themselves were of less Consideration, but which, being interpreted by Jealousy and Peevishness, were of the first Magnitude; for not only in Spain, but in Naples, Orders were published to the Prebends of the Court of Rome: The Emperor had set forth some pragmatical Edicts in Spain against the Authority of the Apostolical See, by which the Subjects were forbidden to treat about any Benefices within the Spanish Dominions, at the Court of Rome; and a Spanish Notary had the Boldness, at his coming into the Rota in Rome, upon the Day appointed for hearing Causes, to declare to two Neapolitans, in the Emperor's Name, that they must not have any Suit in that Court ¹.

POPE Clement for these Reasons, and likewise prompted by all his Ministers, resolv'd not only to enter into Confederacy with the King of France, and the others, against the Emperor, but also to hasten the Execution of their Design. He therefore absolv'd the King from the Obligation of the Oath taken in Spain, and the Observation of the Treaty made at Madrid, and at last enter'd into a League with his Majesty and the Princes of Italy, which they called the Holy League. This was concluded the 17th of May 1526. at Cognac, by Deputies from the King of France's Council, on the one Part, and by the Agents of the Pope and the State of Venice, on the other. This League consisted of many Articles, which may be seen in Guicciardini's History ²: But what related to the Kingdom of Naples, was as follows;

THAT having weaken'd the Emperor's Army in Lombardy, they should attack Naples both by Sea and Land, in which, when conquered, a King should be placed at the Pope's Election: But in a separate Article, it was proved, that the Pope could not dispose of that Kingdom without the Consent of the Confederates; but the ancient Tribute, usually paid out of the Kingdom to the Pope, was to be secured to him, together with an Estate of 40,000 Ducats to be given to whomsoever he pleased.

THAT, to secure the King of France of the more easy Liberation of his Sons, by the Success of the Confederates in Italy, and the Conquest of Naples, it was agreed, That if the Emperor would enter into the League in four Months after he had lost that Kingdom, it should be restored to him; but upon his Refusal, the King of France should for ever claim a yearly Tribute out of the Kingdom of Naples.

IN the mean time, the Emperor had sent our Viceroy Lanuja into France, to get the Treaty of Madrid executed: But the King excusing himself, that it was not in his Power to give up Burgundy, promised to observe all the other Articles, if he would be satisfied to receive, in Lieu of that Dutchy, 2,000,000 of Crowns. This Answer enraged the Emperor, who resolving not to part from the Restitution of Burgundy, but rather to agree with the Pope, in putting Francis Sferza in full Possession of the Dutchy of Milan, appointed Don Hugo di Moncada, Ambassador to Clement, with Commission to give his Holiness intire Satisfaction. The Emperor having espoused Donna Isabella, the King of Portugal's Daughter, in the Beginning of March this Year 1526, appointed the Money which he had with her, to be appropriated for paying his Army in Lombardy, over which he had made the Duke of Bourbon, a French Rebel, General (upon the Death of the Marquis De Pescara) and press'd him to march quickly into Italy ³.

WHEN Don Hugo arrived at Rome, he proposed the Articles of the Confederacy to the Pope, but was answered, That it was not in his Holiness's Power to accept of them, having been obliged (because the Emperor had been so slow in his Resolution) to enter into Alliance with the King of France and the Venetians, for his own Security, and the Safety of Italy.

THE Affairs of Lombardy, by this, began to be in a terrible Confusion; and the Confederates, to divert the War from thence, had made great Preparations to attack the Kingdom of Naples both by Sea and Land, the Apprehension of which, brought our Viceroy Lanuja back to Naples, the Spaniards being in great Fear of losing the Kingdom. As soon as he arrived, he gave Orders for fortifying many Castles and Forts, and particularly advised Giovan Baptista Pignatelli, who then was Governor of Otranto and Bari, to fortify all the Places upon the Coast of Puglia on the Adriatick, and that he should watch the Venetians, who had confederated with the Pope and the French ⁴.

ON the other Hand, Don Hugo di Moncada stirr'd up the Family of Colonna, who were already in Arms, to join with the Imperial Officers (appointed to go to the Defence of Naples) that both Parties together might unawares attack the Palace of the Vatican, thereby to take the Pope off from the Confederacy against the Emperor; which they did, pillaging it with impious Sacrilege; but his Holiness finding himself reduced to such a hard Situation, fled from the Palace of St. Peter, by a private Gallery, to Castle St. Angelo, where he saved himself, but was so straiten'd, that he sent two Cardinals, his Relations, to Don Hugo, as Hostages for his Security in coming to the Castle to treat of an Accommodation as he propos'd; which was agreed upon the next Day, being the 21st of September, the Colonna's leaving Rome, and Don Hugo departing for Naples¹. But as soon as the Pope was at Freedom, resolving not to observe any Part of the Agreement which had been extorted from him by Fraud and Violence; he deprived Pompey Colonna of his Cardinal's Hat, and called Prince Vandemont from France, that he (pretending to be Heir of the House of Anjou) might raise the Anjou Faction in the Kingdom of Naples against the Emperor.

THE Viceroy Lanaja being advis'd of this Invitation given to Vandemont, and having a Mind to prevent him, immediately assembled a good Number of Forces, and resolv'd to attack the Ecclesiastical State: To that Intent, on the 20th of December 1526. he encamp'd at Frosinone, where he fought the Pope's Forces, who vigorously oppos'd him. After this he advanc'd to Cesano and Cepperano, infesting those and other Parts of the Ecclesiastical State. The Pope sent against him Renza di Corni into Abruzzo with 6000 Foot, who possess'd himself of Aquila, and other Places thereabouts.

NOW began the Year 1527, a Year of terrible Events, the like not heard of for many Ages; Revolutions of States, Changes in Religion, Imprisonment of Popes, horrible Sacking of Towns, great Scarcity of Provisions, and the Plague through all Italy, but especially in Naples.

IN the Beginning of the Year, Vandemont, who had been call'd by the Pope, arriv'd with a Fleet of 24 Gallies, and having got the Title of the Pope's Lieutenant, began to infest the Coast of the Kingdom, taking upon himself the Name of King of Naples. Upon the 1st Day of March he pillag'd Mola di Gaeta; and upon the 4th, having landed his Forces under Pozzuolo, he endeavour'd to surprize it, but fail'd in his Design. Afterwards coming within Sight of the City of Naples, he took Castell' a mare, and then Torre del Greco; and making his Soldiers march as far as Porta del Mercato, the City was in such Terror that they shut the Gates in great haste.

HE likewise took Sorrento and other Places in the Neighbourhood; and his Army had the Boldness to go so near the City of Naples itself, that from the Castle they fired upon them several Cannon Shot. He took Salerno also, plundering the Silver Vessels from the Tomb of St. Matthew the Apostle, and had made greater Progress, if the News of the Agreement made with the Pope had not stopp'd him.

THE Pope, although he had reject'd the Proposals of an Accommodation made by Cesare Ferramosca (who had brought submissive Letters to him from the Emperor²) and shew'd himself inexorable, especially after Vandemont's Arrival; yet upon Advice of the Duke of Bourbon's marching towards Rome with a great Army, and seeing that the great Promises of the French proved every Day less effectual, he began at last to yield, and gave Assurance to Ferramosca that he would complete the Treaty; which he giving an Account of to Lanaja, that General came to Rome the 25th of March, where the Treaty was concluded, upon Condition that there should be a Cessation of Arms for eight Months, and that 60,000 Ducats should be paid to the Emperor's Army; the Pope likewise yielding up all the Places which his Army had taken in the Kingdom of Naples: On the other Hand, it was stipulated, that Lanaja should go in Person to meet the Duke of Bourbon, and prevent his coming nearer Rome (which the Pope was most afraid of) having sent Ferramosca for the same Purpose to him before.

THE Viceroy departed from Rome with this Intention the 3d of April, but neither Ferramosca's Journey, nor his, could prevail to turn that General out of his Way; he excus'd himself, that it was not in his Power to make his Army stop, because there being great Arrears due to them, he had no Money to pay them but by the Pillage of Rome: Nor could there be more grievous News to his Soldiers, than to hinder their March; and indeed, it was believed, that if the Viceroy had endeavour'd to oppose their Intention by Force, he would have run the Hazard of his Life, the Soldiers were so inflam'd, having mostly come from Germany poison'd with the new Heresy spread there by Martin Luther, in Contempt and Hatred to the Court of Rome: So that being ravenously bent upon the Sacking of that City (which had been promised them) they look'd with an evil Eye upon any one that endeavour'd to disappoint them of their Prey.

THE Pope, in the meantime, trusting to the Authority of Lanaja, had disbanded all his Soldiers; so that when he least expected it, the Duke of Bourbon, following his former Courses, having wasted the Ecclesiastical State as he pass'd, appear'd before the Walls of Rome on the 5th of May. Lanaja refusing to be an Accomplice of so much Mischiefe as Bourbon design'd to do, would not follow him (who march'd directly to Rome) but retiring with the Marquis Di Vistò by another Rout, march'd towards Naples, but arriving at Aversa, he fell sick, and in a few Days died, in the Month of May. It was believed that he was poison'd, to revenge the Death of the Marquis De Pescara, and to make Way for Don Hugo di Moncada's succeeding him as Viceroy of *Naples*¹. We don't find any Edicts of his, because, being for the most Part absent from Naples, his chief Care was War. His Corps was carried to Naples, where he lies in the Church of Monte Oliveto; and the Collateral Council govern'd the Kingdom till towards the End of the Year, that Don Hugo di Moncada, being a Spaniard, was made Viceroy.

THE Duke of Bourbon having enter'd Rome with Intent to pillage it, all the Cruelty and Barbarity imaginable was committed: All was in Disorder and Confusion; and although he himself was shot dead at the first Assault, that only served to exasperate the Soldiers against the City. After some small Resistance they enter'd the Suburbs. The Pope retired to Castle St. Angelo, and was there besieged; and the Soldiers finding no more Resistance, enter'd the City by the Gate called Porta Sisto. There was no Cruelty, Irreverence, Avarice or Lust, that was not practis'd upon that Occasion: Every Place was pillaged; nor can it be imagin'd what Savageness they shew'd, what Contempt of Churches, what Disrespect to Cardinals and Prelates, and what base Usage against the Honour of the Ladies. The Army of the Confederacy finding no Way to assist the Pope, by reason of the Difficulties urg'd by the Duke of Urbino, concluded it was impossible to relieve the Castle; the Pope therefore, having no Hopes left, made the best Agreement he could with the Imperialists, which was, to pay 400,000 Ducats; to continue Prisoner in the Castle, with all the Cardinals that were there, to the Number of Thirteen, till the first 150,000 Ducats were paid, and then the Imperial Army was to march to Naples or Gaeta, and wait the Emperor's Commands; that Castle St. Angelo should remain in the Hands of the Imperialists, with the other Fortresses, as long as the Emperor should please to keep them. There were likewise other Articles, which may be seen in *Guicciardin*².

WHEN this Treaty was concluded, Captain Alarcon enter'd the Castle with three Companies of Spanish Foot, and as many German, the Guard of the Castle and the Pope being committed to him; he kept his Holiness with great Caution, giving him but a very small Apartment, and less Liberty.

THE News of this horrible Fact of imprisoning the Pope, being brought to France and England, those two Kings were more incensed than ever against the Emperor, not only out of Christian Piety, and the Respect they profess'd to the Holy Sec, but more for the private Hatred they implacably bore Charles; Francis I. for Reasons well known; and Henry VIII. King of England, because the Emperor, having borrowed large Sums of Money from him, gave him nothing but fair Promises when he asked it of him, and delay'd Payment. Those two therefore united together, with a firm Resolution to join their Forces, and send a powerful Army into Italy, not only to deliver the Pope from the Slavery of the Spaniards, in whose Hands he was, but to invade the Kingdom of Naples, with Force sufficient to wrest it from the Emperor. The Conjunction of the Venetians and Swiss seem'd to make the Undertaking the more easy; for they likewise, out of Compassion for the Pope, and the City of Rome, were bent upon taking up Arms, that, with joint Forces, they might free the Pope, and conquer Naples. The King of France was likewise in Expectation, that when the Emperor saw himself press'd in such wise, and his Treasury exhausted, by paying so many Forces, as would be necessary against such a Number of Enemies, he would be easily induced, upon his paying him a good Ransom, to restore his two Sons, who had been left Hostages in Spain.

TO execute this Design, it was concluded, that the Swiss should immediately march into Italy; that new Forces should be levied in France; that the King of England should furnish Money, and the other Confederates Men: So that with incredible Expedition, there was a very strong Army assembled, and the Command of it given to the famous General Odet de Foix Monseigneur Lautrec, one of the ablest Captains in all France at that Time. He began his March from France towards Italy, in order first to deliver the Pope, and then to proceed to the Conquest of Naples.

ON the other Hand, when the News of the Sacking of Rome, and the Pope's being made Prisoner, arrived in Spain, it was strange to see what Grief and Trouble both the Emperor and the Spaniards seem'd to affect. This Advice was brought thither, at a Time when all Spain was in the Height of Joy, and the Court taken up with Feasting and Tournaments, on Account of the Birth of Prince Philip, the Emperor's eldest Son: But as soon as the News came, his Imperial Majesty put a Stop to the Feasting, and to shew his Grief, went into Mourning, with all his Court: They made frequent and solemn Processions, putting up their Prayers for the Pope's Deliverance; the Priests and Fryars deserv'd Heaven with Publick Devotions in their Churches, imploring the Divine Assistance for the Releasement of the Chief Pontiff, as if he had been at Constantinople, in the Hands of the Grand Signor, and not the Christian Emperor's Prisoner at Rome: In the mean time, Clement suffer'd close Confinement from Alarcon, who guarded him in a little Apartment, with Spanish Pride and Severity; and the Emperor, with the usual Slowness of Spanish Gravity, stood consulting whether he should ratify the Treaty made at Castle St. Angelo, or impose harder Terms upon him for his Freedom. He gave fair Words to many Princes, who, by their Ambassadors, press'd the Pope's Releasement, but his Resolutions appear'd various and uncertain. He wish'd that the Pope should be brought to Spain, thinking it would be a great Addition to his Fame, if, in the Space of two Years, two such considerable Prisoners should be transported from Italy to Spain, as the King of France, and the Pope of Rome. But hearing of so great Preparations for War, not only in Switzerland, Venice and France, but likewise in England, whose King, above all others, most earnestly desir'd the Pope's Releasement; not to disoblige that Prince, and likewise, because all the several Kingdoms of Spain, and especially the Prelates and Grandees, detested the Thoughts of having the Person of him, who represents CHRIST upon Earth, kept Prisoner by a Roman Emperor, the Protector and Advocate of the Church, so much to the Scandal and Reproach of Christianity: Besides, having (after a Month's Delay of coming to any Resolution) received Intelligence of Lautrec's Expedition into Italy, and the King of England's Forwardness for the War, he at last determin'd to send a Commission to the Viceroy of Naples, to set the Pope at Liberty, and to give him up all the Territories and Forts belonging to him. To this Effect he dispatch'd the General of the Franciscans, and Veri di Miglian into Italy to Lautrec, but he being dead before the General arrived, it was necessary to negotiate the Matter with Don Hugo di Mendoza, to whom likewise the Commission extended: The General therefore, having consulted with Don Hugo, went to Rome with Miglian. This Commission consisted of two principal Articles; One was, That the Pope should satisfy the Army, by paying the great Sum of Money for which he was Debtor; the other, That the Emperor should have Security, that the Pope, having obtained his Freedom, should not join with his Majesty's Enemies; and in this Article they propos'd hard Conditions of Hostages, and Cautionary Cities.

THE Treaty was very tedious, by reason of these Difficulties, and the Pope to hasten it, often press'd Lautrec, by private Messages, to proceed on his March, assuring him, that whatever he should be forced to promise to the Imperialists, as soon as he was out of Prison, and in a Place of Safety, he would no longer think himself under any Obligation. At last there came a new Commission from the Emperor, who was solicitous now to set the Pope at Liberty upon the easiest Terms possible; adding, that all he wanted was, that when he was released, he should not take Part more with the Confederates than with him. It was believed, that the Fear of Lautrec's coming, induced the Emperor and his Party to set the Pope at Liberty, that they might, as soon as possible, march their Army to the Defence of Naples; but as it was impossible to be done, without securing the Soldiers of their Arrears due, for they absolutely refused to allow the Pillage of Rome, and the rich Booty that they had made there, as any part of their Pay; the Commissioners had only Regard to provide for their Payment, without minding the Pope's future Conduct. The Treaty was at last concluded at Rome, by the General and Serenon, in Name of Don Hugo, upon the last Day of October, seven Months after the Pope's Confinement: and Don Hugo afterwards ratified it: The Articles were these;

THAT the Pope should not oppose the Emperor in the Affairs of Milan or Naples; that he should grant him a Crusade in Spain, and the Tythes of all Ecclesiastical Revenues in all his Dominions; and for Security of performing these, Ofia and Civita Vecchia should remain in the Emperor's Hands, as also Civita Castellana, and the Castle of Forli; and for Hostages, Hyppolito and Alexander his two Nephews, and till they could come from Parma, where they were at that Time, the Cardinals Pisano, Trivulzio and Gaddi supplied their Places, and were carried by the Imperialists to Naples.

THE Pope was to pay immediately to the Germans 70,000 Ducats, and to the Spaniards 35,000, upon Condition that he were set at Liberty, with all the Cardinals, and might go out of the Castle, and likewise out of the City, not thinking himself free till he was safely arriv'd at Orvieto, Spoletto or Perugia; and within 15 Days after his Departure from Rome, he was to pay as much more to the Germans; and the rest (which, with the first Payment, amounted to 350,000 Ducats, and above) was to be paid in three Months to the Germans and Spaniards, according to their several Proportions.

OF all these Conditions, the hardest was the Disbursing so much ready Money, which created great Discord, and extraordinary Scandal. To raise the 150,000 Ducats promised upon his being made Prisoner, the Pope was oblig'd, with much Difficulty, to advance some of it in ready Money, and the rest by mortgaging to Genoese Merchants, the Tythes of the Kingdom of Naples, and the Sale of Benevento: But the Soldiers had scarce received that Sum, when they desired other Security, and other Assignments than what they had received, by several Taxes laid upon the Ecclesiastical State, for the Payment of the rest that was promised them, which was impossible for a Pope in Confinement to give them; and therefore having several times threaten'd the Hostages, and kept them in Chains with great Cruelty, they led them ignominiously to that Market-Place called Campo di Fiore, where they erected Gibbets, as if they designed to hang them up. But now being, by this last Treaty, obliged to raise great Sums in order to obtain his Freedom, there was a Necessity for Clement to have recourse to extraordinary Remedies, which he did not care to make use of before; he created some Cardinals for Money, by exposing that Dignity to Sale, which was purchased by Persons for the most part very unworthy of that Honour: Besides he disposed of the Tythes of all the Goods of the Churches and Church-Men in our Kingdom of Naples, and gave a Power to alienate the Church Revenues. Thus did the Vicar of Christ convert those Things which had been dedicated to the Service of God, to the Use, and for the Maintenance of Hereticks (so unsearchable are the Judgments of God!) the Incomes of vacant Churches were seized, and many other Ways were invented for raising Money.

HAVING by these Methods settled and secured the Payments at the prefix'd Times, and given as Hostages and Security to the Soldiers, the Cardinals Cesi and Ursini, whom the Cardinal Colonna carried to Grotta Ferrata; the Pope being apprehensive, that the ill Will which he knew Don Hugo, our Viceroy, bore him, might create some new Disturbance, hasten'd his Departure; and in the Night-time, on the 8th of December 1527, without waiting till the next Day, which was appointed for his leaving Rome, he went out of the Castle in the Habit of a Merchant, and made what Haste he could to Orvieto, where he arrived before Day, without the Company of so much as one Cardinal; which, as Guicciardin observes¹, was an Instance that never had happen'd since the Church became considerable, that a Pope should fall from so great Power and Respect; be kept in Prison; lose Rome, and all the Ecclesiastical Estate; and the same Pope should, in a few Months be set at Liberty; have the Estate of the Church restored to him; and, in a short time after, recover his former Grandeur: So great was the Pontifical Authority, and the Veneration which all Christian Princes had to that Character and Dignity.

C H A P. IV.

Lautrech's Expedition against the Kingdom of Naples. His Conquests, Death, and the Defeat of his Army, which disappointed the whole Design. The Rigour of the Prince of Orange against the Barons accus'd of having been in the French Service.

THE Year 1528. was most unlucky to the Kingdom of Naples, for it was visited with three Scourges from Heaven, War, Famine and Pestilence, and, indeed, was thereby very near reduced to utter Destruction; the Plague, which from September 1527. began there, now increasing, filled the whole Kingdom with Horror.

ON the other Hand, the Pope, upon his being set at Liberty, without any Regard to the Articles of the Peace, after the Ambassadors of France and England had declared War against the Emperor, hasten'd the March of Lautrech to the Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples; and the French Fleet under the Command of Andrea D'Oria, which had already join'd that of the Venetians to attack Sardinia, in order to facilitate the War of Naples, having by a Storm been driven upon the Coast of Naples, cruiz'd up and down there to give Life to Lautrech's Expedition, who, not waiting for the Spring, left Bologna the 9th of January, where he had past the Winter with his Army, and by Way of Romagna and La Marca, he arrived at Tronto (a River which divides the Ecclesiastical State from the Kingdom of Naples) upon the 10th of February, where he found no Preparations for opposing him, so that with much Ease he made himself Master of a great Part of Abbruzzo, and of the City of Aquila, where he reviewed his Army, and found it to consist of 30,000 Foot, and 5000 Horse¹.

HE might, with the same Ease, in a short Time, have made himself Master of the whole Kingdom, because, either from the People's Affection to the French, or their Hatred to the Spaniards, all the Cities of both the Abruzzi surrendered before the Army came within thirty Miles of them. But the March of the Imperial Army from Rome put a Stop to Lautrech's Career, and made him leave the direct Road to Naples, because he was afraid to venture to march over the Mountains with his Artillery, where the least Opposition of the Enemy would be able to stop him; therefore he was forced to go a great Way about along the Sea Coast of Puglia.

IN the mean time, the Imperial Army commanded by the Prince of Orange (whom the Emperor had made Captain-General in Place of the Duke of Bourbon) marched towards Naples, to oppose the Enemy. The Prince of Orange himself commanded the Germans, the Marquis Del Vasto, who was unwillingly under the Prince, had the Command of the Spanish Infantry, and Don Ferrante Gonzaga, was General of the Horse. The two Armies meeting in Puglia near Troia, although they did not engage in a set Battle, skirmished for several Days; but soon after, upon the 22d of March, Lautrech marching towards Melfi, took that City by Storm, and made Prisoner Prince Sergianni Caracciolo, who had bravely defended it, and the Spaniards retir'd to Tripalizia. Upon the taking of Melfi, Ascoli, Barletta, Venosa, and all the adjacent Cities surrendered to him; Trani and Monopoli at the same time surrendered to the Venetians: For, according to the last Treaty with the King of France, all those Sea-Port Towns were to be given to that Republick, which had been possessed of them before the Defeat of King Lewis in Gbiaradadda.

THE Imperial Generals, upon their Arrival at Tripalda, had a Conference with the Viceroy Don Hugo, the Prince of Salerno, and Fabritius Matramaldo, who had retired into that Place with 3000 Italian Foot, and ten Pieces of Cannon; where it was agreed, by common Consent, to retire to Naples and Gaeta, for the Defence of those Cities, which they did, abandoning all the neighbouring Country. Lautrech then marched his Army towards Naples; Capua, Nola, Acerra, Aversa, and all the Places thereabouts submitting to him. He staid four Days at Acerra, from whence he dispatched Simone Tebaldi, a Roman, with 150 Light Horse, and 500 Corficans (who, for want of Pay, had deserted out of the Imperial Camp) upon an Expedition to Calabria. By this Time Philip D'Oria, with eight Gallies of the General Andrea D'Oria's Fleet, and two Ships, was come into the Bay of Naples, and with his Guns, had obliged the Imperialists to dislodge from Maddalena: But his small Number of Gallies was not sufficient to keep the Port of Naples intirely block'd up, therefore Lautrech press'd to have the Venetian and Genoese Gallies join'd; and those of Venice, after having been very slowly refitted at Corfu, were come as far as the Port of Trani; but (altho' Trani and Monopoli had already been surrendered to them) preferring their own particular Advantage to the Interest of others, (notwithstanding that the whole Affair depended upon the taking of Naples) they staid first to take Polignano, Otranto and Brindisi; and on the 19th of April, Andrea Citrano, Purveyor of the Grecian Soldiers in the Venetian Service, routed the Governor of the Province of Otranto near Vetrana, who with great Difficulty saved himself, with the Duke of St. Pietro in Galatina, by escaping to Gallipoli; upon which Lecce, the Metropolis of that Province, and St. Pietro in Galatina, with all the neighbouring Cities, surrendered.

IN the mean time, Lautrech having, by the happy Success of the Arms of the League, got near the Walls of the City of Naples, the Imperialists debated about the Manner of the Defence they were to make: The Marquis Del Vasto was of Opinion, that they ought to draw their Army together, and encamp without the Walls, alledging, that it shew'd Meanness of Spirit to shut themselves up within a Town; but the Viceroy, the Prince of Orange, Don Ferrante Gonzaga, Alarçon, and the other General Officers, being of a contrary Opinion, prevailed, and it was resolved to keep within Naples. There were few Inhabitants left in the City, for all who had either Estates or Money, had retir'd, some to Ischia, others to Capri, and the adjacent Islands. The Barons that staid were suspected; for although, upon the Advice of Lautrech's coming, many of the Richest and most Powerful of them, had offered to the Viceroy to serve the Emperor with their Lives and Fortunes, yet Moncada having compounded with the greatest Part of them for ready Money, in place of Personal Service; and, in case of Necessity, allow'd them to declare for France, without being deem'd guilty of Treason or Rebellion: Besides, there being many of the Anjou Faction within the City, it was thought prudent Advice to keep the Army within the Walls, to prevent any Revolution that might happen. The People, some out of Fear, and others out of Hatred to the Spaniards, had need to be equally encouraged and kept in Order; and, indeed, such was their Fear when the French Army appeared in Sight, that nothing was to be seen but Processions, nor any Thing heard but Publick Prayers, and crying for Mercy; in so much, that the Marquis Del Vasto was forced to have recourse to the Viceroy to get these forbidden, which was done, and the People exhorted to take Courage, and to perform their Devotions privately in the Churches and Monasteries.

BUT those Insinuations signified nothing; for, upon the 1st Saturday in May, which happen'd, that Year, on the 2d Day of the Month, when they did not see the Blood of their Patron St. Genaro [or St. Januarius] liquify as usual upon producing his Scull¹; they gave for lost both themselves and the City, and were in the utmost Consternation. But those unlucky Prognosticks were false and vain, and quite contrary Effects followed, as shall be related in its proper Place.

THE famous Lautrech encamped his Army upon the 28th of April, between Poggio Reale and Monte St. Martino, extending it about half a Mile, and he himself advanc'd a little further than Poggio Reale, to a little Hill in the Duke De Montalto's Vineyard, which, from that time changed its Name, and is called Lautrecco, to this Day. The celebrated Peter Navarr, a Cantabrian, who, having been first in the Imperial Army, upon a Disgust came into the French Service, had his Quarters in the Hills over-against S. Genaro's Gate, and which extend themselves as far as S. Martin's Mount.

THE Prince of Orange, on the other Side, suddenly fortified that Mount, lest it should be possess'd by the French, who lay upon the little Hills adjoining: And then it was that he caused to be demolished the Tower of Sannazaro at Mergedina, a Place dedicated by him to the Muses; for which Cause that Poet went to Rome in great Disgust, where he died without ever seeing Naples more: Nor did he stick at lashing that Prince and the Spaniards, covertly, in his Poems; to the first of which he never forgave the Demolishing his Tower, and he hated the very Name of the last, for his Affection to the Kings of Arragon, his Benefactors, who had been Kings of Naples. 'Tis said of him, that being very sick at Rome, and past Hopes of Recovery, hearing of the Prince of Orange's Death, he shewed great Satisfaction, saying, that Mars had at last taken Revenge of him for the Outrage he had done to the Muses.

BESIDES, they did not fail to provide Naples with Corn, and all other Provision and Ammunition necessary in order to a vigorous Defence; and they began to list some of the Town's People, who were able to bear Arms, to serve in case of Necessity; but it fared with them, as with Rome in former Times, with respect to their Slaves; for the Roman Senate, to hinder any Confusion that might happen from the vast Number of Slaves, had determined to oblige them to wear a Mark of Distinction, that they might be known from the Denizens of Rome; but when they found that there was such a vast Multitude of them, and that by giving them a Badge, as Seneca says, they might come to know their own Strength, they desisted from the Proposal: Thus did the Spaniards in Naples upon this Occasion, for observing, that by inrolling so many, the People of the City might come to be sensible of their own Force, the Spanish Officers advised the Prince of Orange, and the Viceroy, to put a Stop to the farther listing of them, which was accordingly done¹.

WHILST the Time was spent in frequent Piqueerings between the People of the two Armies, Lautrech would not attempt Naples by Assault, as well upon account of the Number of Forces within, and their known Bravery, as from the Hopes he had, that in a short time the Enemy would be in want both of Money and Provisions; so that by prolonging the Siege, he believed firmly, and had given Assurance to the King, that Naples would be obliged to surrender in a short time, as he had already reduced the greatest Part of the Kingdom under his Power, and many Barons had espoused the French Interest. And this Expectation he was the more confirm'd in, by the Defeat, which some Days afterwards, Philip D'Oriz gave the Imperial Fleet in the Gulph of Salerno.

THE Prince of Orange and the Viceroy, hoping to destroy Philip's Fleet, hasten'd the Enterprize before there should come new Assistance to him; for Andrea D'Oriz did not move with the Gallies which were at Genoa, and they heard nothing from the Fleet at Marseilles; as to that of Venice, being more intent upon private Interest than that of the League; or rather, minding the lesser and accessories more than the principal Affair, they spent their Time in besieging Brindisi and Otranto, the latter of which Cities had agreed to surrender, if in sixteen Days it were not relieved; and Brindisi had agreed to receive the Venetians, but the Forts held out for the Emperor.

BUT before the Imperialists could go upon this Enterprize against the Fleet, there was a Necessity of making up a great Dispute arisen between the Viceroy and the Prince of Orange, about the Command: Those two Generals were in continual Feuds. The Prince of Orange, as having been appointed Captain-General by the Emperor, in the Room of the Duke of Bourbon, pretended a Right to command all the Forces, the Viceroy, as being Captain-General of the whole Kingdom where the Armies were, refused to obey him; and this Dispute occasioned the dividing of the Forces (to the Emperor's great Disadvantage) into two Factions, some siding with the Viceroy, and others with the Prince. Much greater Quarrels happen'd between them about the Command of the Fleet; Orange, as being Generalissimo, claimed it, and Monçada oppos'd him, because, besides being Viceroy, he was also Admiral of the Kingdom, and therefore all Maritime Affairs were under his Direction. The one not yielding to the other, that the Expedition might not be retarded, it was agreed, that the Execution of this Enterprize should be given to the Marquis Del Vasto, and crook-back'd Giustimano, an old Experienc'd Sea-Officer. Monçada, to shew his great Zeal and Courage, would needs go a Voluntier; and after his Example, Ascanio and Camillo Colonna's, Cesar Ferramosca, the Prince of Salerno, and many others likewise went. There were in the Port of Naples but six Gallies, and two other Vessels, but they had more Confidence in the Valour of the Combatants, than in the Number of Ships; for they had put on Board a thousand of the best Spanish Musquetiers, and to terrify the Enemy at a Distance, with the Prospect of a greater Number, they had with them a great many fishing Boats: They set sail from Posilipo the first of June, and took the Way of Capri, where being arrived at break of Day, the Seamen saw, coming out of a Cave, a Spanish Hermit, well known by the Name of Goncalvo Barretto, who having been a Soldier, had quitted the Service, and retir'd himself to that Place, to lead a solitary Life. Upon seeing the Imperial Gallies he cried out aloud, so that Don Hugo (to the great Prejudice of the Design) lost much time in listening to him. He giving them many Benedictions, assured them of Victory, exhorting them to fight valiantly, for according to the Visions which he had had the Night before, they should destroy the Enemy's Fleet, kill great Numbers of their Men, and by that Battle deliver Naples from the Oppression it was at present under¹. The credulous Soldiers, taking the Words of the Hermit as an Oracle, promising themselves certain Victory, with Sound of Trumpet, and all Demonstrations of Mirth and Joy, went to meet the Enemy in the Gulph of Salerno, near Capo D'Orso: But upon the two Fleets engaging, they soon found how unlucky and vain the unhappy Augury of that Fanatick proved. The Effects were just the Reverse, the Imperial Fleet was defeated and routed by that of D'Oria; the Soldiers almost all killed, or wounded and made Prisoners: Don Hugo di Monçada, fighting bravely, was first wounded in the Arm, and whilst he was encouraging his Companions, he was unfortunately kill'd by Stones and burning Matter thrown from the Enemies Gallies, and cruelly cast over-board, as was likewise Ferramosca. The Marquis Del Vasto, and Ascanio Colonna (being both wounded) were made Prisoners, together with the Prince of Salerno, Santa Croce, Camillo Colonna, Giustimano, Serenon, Hannibal di Genaro, and many other Officers and Gentlemen, and all sent, by Philip, to Andrea D'Oria in Genoa.

THIS was the unhappy Fate of that Expedition, and such was the untimely End of our Viceroy Monçada, who, for the Troubles of the Times, could not enjoy the Government of the Kingdom above six Months; and therefore left no Laws of his own, nor any other Memory of himself. The Neapolitans celebrated his Obsequies in a solemn Manner the 8th of June; and Guicciardin, who likewise says that his Corps was cast into the Sea, makes it improbable that his Body was carried to Amalfi, and from thence to Valentia, where a stately Monument was erected for him, with an Inscription and Elogium in his Praise, as some Writers affirm: However that may be, Philibert of Chalon, Prince of Orange, took upon him the Charge of Viceroy in his Stead.

TO this good Fortune of the French, was added the Arrival of the Venetian Fleet, consisting of two and twenty Gallies, who, having made themselves Masters of those Places on the Adriatick, passing the Pharo of Messina, came to the Gulph of Naples on the 10th of this Month; and cruizing continually before the City, endeavour'd to hinder Provisions from being brought to it; but such was the Avarice of the daring Seamen of the Places adjacent, that every Day they brought fresh Supplies from Sorrento, Capri, Procida, Ischia and other Parts, running a thousand Hazards for the Expectation of considerable Gain.

THE French conceived great Hopes, by these successful Events, of accomplishing their Design in a short time: Lautrech now began to batter the Walls from the Hills where Peter Navarre was quarter'd; he likewise turn'd the Water from the Conduit which carried it to the City, on the Side of Poggio Reale; but the Want of that Water was of no great Loss to the Besieged, because of the great Quantity of Spring-Water with which the City abounded; whereas the stopping of it became most pernicious, as well to his Army, as to Naples; for the Water stagnating in the Neighbourhood, infected the Air, and increased the Plague, which likewise seized the French Camp. The City in the mean time was miserably afflicted with the Pestilence, Cannonading, and a great Dearth of Flower, Meat and Wine, the Besieged being obliged to feed upon boiled Grain. To all these Misfortunes were added, the Miseries brought upon them by the Spanish and German Soldiers, who, with intolerable Insolence, pillag'd their Goods, ravish'd the Women, killed and abused the People; which Treatment, the Neapolitans having been freed from a Civil War for a considerable Time, bore very impatiently.

BUT when Things were at this pass, Fortune, which had hitherto been so propitious to the French, gave a sudden Turn to the Emperor's Side against them. Andrea D'Oria being dissatisfied with the King of France (at the Instigation of the Marquis Del Vasto his Prisoner) leaving that King's Service, declared for the Emperor; upon which Philip D'Oria left Naples, with all his Gallies, upon the 4th of July. That which hasten'd the Ruin of the French, was the Sickneſs occasioned by cutting the Aqueduct at Peggio Reale, to hinder the Neapolitans from grinding their Corn; for the Water standing in the Valley, having no Out-let, corrupted the Air, which brought Diseases among the Soldiers, who were intemperate, and unable to bear the Heats: Besides that, the Plague had enter'd their Camp, by means of some Persons, who being infected with it in Naples, were sent amongst them on Purpose. Thus did the French begin to dwindle away every Day; so that instead of Besieging, they were besieged, whereas in Naples all Conveniencies daily increas'd, and consequently our People conceived fresh Hopes. But to complete the Ruin of the French, Lautrech, upon whose Conduct and Bravery all their Hopes depended, falling sick, partly through the Infection of the Air, and partly through Grief to see his Army almost destroyed, died on the 15th of August. He was buried in the Vineyard of the Duke of Montalto, where his Head Quarters were, and his glorious Remains became afterwards exposed to the Contempt and Avarice of the Spaniards; of which Gonsalvo Duke of Sessa, Nephew to the Captain-General, having Notice, with great Generosity and Humanity, caused them to be transported to Naples, and buried them in his own Chapel, in the Church of St. Maria la Nuova, and erected for him a magnificent Marble Tomb, where his Elegy is yet to be seen. He did the same by the famous Peter Navarro, who, soon after, being made Prisoner in the Defeat given the French, died in the Prison of Castel-nuovo: His Tomb, with the Inscription, remains likewise to this Day^{*}.

BY the Death of so great a General as Lautrech, the Command of the Army falling to the Marquis De Saluce, a Person very unequal to such a Charge, the Disorder increased in the French Army; and Andrea D'Oria arriving at the same time at Gaeta, with twelve Gallies for the Emperor's Service, the French being almost without Men, and without Government, were no longer able to maintain the Siege, and therefore decamp'd in order to retire to Aversa: But the Imperialists having Intelligence of their Motion, defeated them in their March, where Peter de Navarro, and many Officers of Distinction, were made Prisoners; the Marquis De Saluce saved himself, with Part of his Army, in Aversa; but not being able to defend it, he sent Count Guido Rangone to the Prince of Orange to capitulate; who in the Beginning of September agreed with him upon the following Terms:

THAT the Marquis should evacuate Aversa and the Fort, leaving in them all the Artillery and Ammunition; that he himself, with all the General Officers (except the Count, who was to have Liberty as a Reward for making the Capitulation) should yield themselves Prisoners of War; that the Marquis should use all his Endeavours to oblige the French and Venetians to restore all the Towns and Forts which they had taken in the Kingdom; that the Soldiers, and all who were by Agreement to have their Liberty, should leave behind them their Ensigns, Arms, Horses and Baggage, allowing, however, to those of the better Sort, Horses and Mules for the Month; and that the Italian Soldiers should not serve against the Emperor for the Space of six Months.

^{*} See Eugeni Napo. Sacr. p. 494, & 496.

THUS the whole French Army was routed, all the Principal Officers being either dead, taken in their Flight, or Prisoners by Agreement. In a few Days, Capua, Nola, and all the other Towns of Terra di Lavoro, surrender'd. The Venetian Fleet separated from that of the French; the former sailing towards the East, and the latter Westward: Only in Abruzzo and Puglia there was still some Appearance of War; (for they made no Reckoning of some few Places in Calabria that held out for the French) but the Prince of Orange afterwards drove them intirely out of those Provinces; and the Towns and Ports which the Venetians possessed on the Adriatick, were restored upon the general Peace which was concluded afterwards.

BUT, although the Affairs of Naples seem'd to be in a peaceable and quiet State, the Plague having likewise ceased, yet the Rigour which the Prince of Orange us'd towards the Barons, much disturb'd the Peace of the Kingdom, and occasioned the Ruin and Reduction of some Families, and the Aggrandizing of others. His Predecessor Moncada having, as has been observed before, compounded with many of the Nobility, and given them Leave, in Cases of Necessity, to set up the French Standard, and to open their Gates to the Enemy, had by that Licence encouraged many of them to do it; but the Prince of Orange (now that the Kingdom was free, and intirely reduced to the Emperor's Obedience) would not admit that Agreement made with the former Viceroy, as an Excuse for the Barons; alledging, that it was not in Moncada's Power to remit the Allegiance due from Subjects to their Sovereign, and therefore began to punish them as Rebels, some with Death, others with Forfeitures; nay, he made some, upon bare Suspicion of their being Favourers of the French Interest, compound, by paying large Sums; and this with the Emperor's Connivance, who had always Occasion for Money for the Wars which he maintain'd, sometimes at the Pope's Charge, and sometimes at other Peoples; or by Contributions, Taxes and Donatives which he rais'd for that End. The Prince made use of the secret Service of Girolamo Marone, a Genoese, for this Purpose, who was appointed Commissary for the Execution of these Orders, and performed his Office effectually and punctually. He first caus'd the Heads of Errico Pandona, Duke of Ischia, and of the Count Di Morone, to be cut off; and would have done the same by the Prince of Melfi, the Duke of Somma, Vincenzo Caraffa, Marquis of Montesarchio, Errico Ursino Count of Nola, the Counts of Castro and Conversano, Retro Stendardo, and Bernardino Filinighiero, if he had gotten them in his Power: But the Marquis of Montesarchio, the Count De Nola, and Bernardin Filinighiero, died before the French left Naples, and the others retired to France; but they were all forfeited.

THE Marquis Di Quarata, and other Barons, by pleading the Licence given them by Moncada, saved their Lives, but the Plea was not sufficient to secure their Estates, which, as was believed, had likewise been safe had Don Hugo lived. In the Number of the Barons of this Kind, were the Duke D'Ariano, the Count De Montucro, the Baron of Solefra, of the Zurlo Family, the Baron Di Lettiere, Gragnum, of the House of Miroballo, the Duke Di Gravina, and Roberto Bonifacio, lately made Marquis D'Orra; the two last of which recovered afterwards the greatest Part of their Estates by compounding; the Duke D'Atri also got his: These appeal'd to the Emperor, who did not re-instate them without a considerable Fine, which they could in no wise shun. Upon this Occasion the most celebrated Lawyers in Italy wrote in Favour of the Nobility; and Decio compil'd many Pleadings upon that Subject, proving, that it was not in their Power to make such Agreements so inconsistent with their own Innocence: But all their Labour was in vain, the Emperor wanted Money to pay his Troops, and to maintain the War. Aquila likewise having mutinied, was reduced by the Prince of Orange, who condemn'd that City to pay 100,000 Ducats, to raise which Sum, they were obliged to sell even the Church Plate, and to mortgage the Rents of Zaffarano to two German Merchants, who advanced the Money; besides having deprived the City of its Jurisdiction over several Lands, which the Prince of Orange bestowed upon some Officers of his Army.

AFTER the Prince had taken these Cities from their former Masters, he divided them among the Imperial Officers; he kept Ascoli for himself, which was afterwards possess'd by Antonio di Leva; Melfi, with the greater Part of the Prince of Melfi's Estate, was given to Andrea D'Oria; the Marquis Del Vasto had Mutesarchio, Aircia, Lettere, Gragnano, and Angri; to Ferrante Gonzaga was given Ariano; to Alessandro Colonna, the Duke D'Atri's Estate, which was forfeited by the Rebellion of the Count Di Conversano; but the People of Abruzzo, the Duke's Vassals, refusing to obey Alessandro, made the Cause of the old Duke to be better inquired into; and finding that there was not the least Reason to suspect him guilty of Treason, his Estate was restored to him, and an Equivalent given to Alessandro upon other Cities.

THE Lands of Valle Siciliana, which had been possess'd by Camillo Perini Orpino, were given to Don Ferrante D'Aercone, and afterwards the County also of Rende, belonging to the Duke of Scutari; to Admiral Cardona was allotted Scutari; to Don Philip de Lancia, Prince of Sulmona, and Son to the Viceroy Don Carlos, was given Venafro belonging to the Duke Di Bajano Pandone; Ottaviano to Federico Marimallio; Quarata, which had been the Estate of the Marquis Lanzialo d'Aliphan, to Monsieur Beuri, a Flaman; Castro, to Secretary Gattinara; Montesperi, to Giralamo Colle; the City of Brasano was given, as a Reward for his good Services, to Giralamo Marone, the indefatigable Executor of the Viceroy's Rigour: Other Lands were distributed to others, which cannot be remember'd. Some of those pretended Rebels obtained a Hearing of their Causes at Law, such as Michael C..., Baron of Procida, but all that was got by that Process was, that upon the 1th of May 1529, the same Sentence was pronounced against them as against the Marquis of Quarata, viz. that they should lose their Estates, but not their Lives: So that Procida was forfeited, and given to the Marquis *Del Vasto*¹.

C H A P. V.

A Peace between the Pope and the Emperor concluded at Barcelona, which was succeeded by another between the Emperor and King of France at Cambray; and afterwards a third with the Venetians, exclusive of the Florentines: The Emperor crown'd at Bologna.

THE ill Success of the French Arms in Italy, made the Pope, the King of France, and the other Confederates think of Peace, and of the Means to procure it. The Pope was the first who applied himself towards it, and, by the Mediation of the General of the Franciscans, whom he made a Cardinal, with the Title of St. Grace, and who pass'd several times between Rome and the Court of Spain; he brought the Affair to great a Length, that in the Beginning of the Year 1529. there was Advice in Rome of the Prospect of an Accommodation: At last, having been negotiated by the Cardinal for some Months, it was concluded by Giovan-Antonio Muscattola, Ambassador for the Emperor, at Rome, and very favourably for the Pope; either because the Emperor was willing to remove any Impediment towards his coming into Italy (as he was minded to do) and thought that he might have Occasion for the Pope's good Offices in that case; or, that he would have his Holiness forget the ill Usages he had received from his Ministers and his Army, by granting him large Concessions at this

Juncture

Juncture. In Effect, he granted what the Pope most earnestly desir'd, the Re-establishment of his Family in Florence, promising, upon the new Marriage of his natural Daughter Margaret, with Alexander de Medicis, the Pope's Nephew, Son to Lawrence, to establish Alexander in Florence, in the same Grandeur which the Family had there before they were banish'd.

THE Articles of this Treaty are to be seen in *Giovius*¹, *Guicciardin*² and other Writers³; the precise Words of it are set down by *Summonte*⁴ and *Chiocarelli*⁵. As to what relates to Naples, it was agreed as follows;

THAT the Pope should allow free Passage through the Ecclesiastical State to the Imperial Army, if they had Occasion to leave Naples; and that upon the Emperor's coming into Italy, they should converse together, and treat of the general Peace of Christendom, receiving one another with the usual Honours and Ceremony.

THAT the Emperor should take care, as soon as possible, by Arms or otherwise, as should be most proper, to put the Pope in peaceable Possession of Cervia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggio, and Rubiera, without Prejudice to the Rights of the Empire and the Apostolical See.

ON the other Hand, the Pope agreed (upon the Delivery of the Lands mentioned) to grant to the Emperor, as a Recompence of his Favours, a new Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, with a free Discharge of all past Tribute, and reducing the Tribute of the former Investiture to a White Horse, in Acknowledgment of the Fief, to be presented to the Pope upon the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul. The Tribute which the Popes had claim'd for the Investiture of Naples, was uncertain, sometimes less, and at other times rising to considerable Sums, which not being paid, the Popes, not to lose their Title, used, by new Bulls, to remit the Arrears, ordaining the King for the Time being, to pay it from that Time; and if afterwards it happened not to be paid, they remitted it afresh.

BY this Treaty, all pecuniary Tribute was taken off, and the White Horse substituted in Lieu of it, which has continued to this Time. Thomas Campanella composed, for this Purpose, a Consultum de Censu Regni Neapolitani, never printed⁶. Paul IV. notwithstanding this Treaty, claimed the Tribute-Money of Philip II. and went so far as to declare, that he had forfeited the Kingdom for failing to pay it: But of this we shall speak in its proper Place.

IT was further granted to the Emperor by this Treaty, to have the Nomination to four and twenty Cathedrals in the Kingdom (about which there had formerly been a Dispute) the Pope retaining the Disposing of the other Churches, where no Patronage was pretended, and also of all other Benefices: Of which we shall have Occasion to speak at large, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of the Kingdom during this Century.

THE last Article (not to mention those which have no relation to Naples) was, That neither of the Parties should have Power to enter into any Alliance (as to Italy) with any other State, nor observe any League already made in Prejudice of this Treaty: But it was allowed to the Venetians to accede to this Confederacy, upon leaving to the Emperor what they now possess'd in Naples.

THIS Peace was concluded and signed at Barcelona, June 29. 1529. and solemnly sworn to in the Name of the two contracting Powers, before the great Altar of the Cathedral Church of Barcelona, by Mercury Gattinara and Lodovico de Flandes, the Emperor's Ambassadors, and by Bishop Girolamo Seletto, the Pope's Master of the Household.

THE Emperor being willing to re-instate Alexander de Medicis in Florence, according to the Treaty, resolved to make use of our Viceroy the Prince of Orange in that Expedition, to whom he sent Orders to march with his Army from Abruzzo, where he then was, towards Florence, and to pass by Way of Rome, to receive the Pope's Orders.

AT the same time, Negotiations for bringing about a Peace between the Emperor and King of France went on with no less Vigour; and Cambray, a City destined for ending great Controversies, was pitch'd upon for the Place of Congress

THE Management of this Peace was committed to two great Ladies, Margaret of Austria, the Emperor's Aunt, and Madame the Regent, the King of France's Mother, to which the King of England consented, who, for that Purpose, had sent an Ambassador to Cambrey. King Francis used all his Art with the Ambassadors of the League of Italy, to persuade them that he would not make Peace without their Concurrence and Satisfaction: He laboured to induce them not to depend upon Peace, but rather to turn their Thoughts to warlike Preparations; this he did, lest the Confederates, suspecting his Design, might prevent him, by making up the Matter with the Emperor: For this Reason, he seemed to be wholly intent upon military Preparations, and sent the Bishop of Tarbes into Italy, with Orders to go to Turin, Milan, Ferrara and Florence, to treat about Matters relating to the War, promising them, that upon the Emperor's marching into Italy, he would likewise be there with a powerful Army. These were his Pretences, but, in reality, his earnest Desire to have his Children restored, who had been given as Hostages by the Treaty of Madrid, made him continually press for an Agreement; to which End, the two Princesses enter'd Cambrey at different Gates, with great Magnificence, upon the 24th of July; and being lodged in two Houses contiguous to one another, and having a Communication one with the other, the two Ladies had an Interview that very Day, and by their Agents began to treat of the Articles of Peace: The King of France (to whom the Venetians, frighten'd at this Familiarity, made large Offers) had retir'd to Compeigne, to be near at Hand to remove any Difficulty that might arise.

TO this Place, came not only the two Princesses, but likewise, on the Behalf of the King of England, the Bishop of London, and the Duke of Sussex; for the Negotiation was carried on with that King's Advice and Consent: The Pope sent thither the Archbishop of Cyprus, and the Ambassadors of all the other Confederates were also there; but to these last the French Ministers gave account of Things quite different from what was really transacting; and the King always promised them, that no Peace should be made without their Consent and Approbation. Mean while, upon the 23d of July, Advice was brought of an Accommodation between the Pope and the Emperor, upon which, the Treaty (being in great Forwardness) had like to have been disturbed, by certain Difficulties about some Territories in the Italian Counties; but by the Mediation of the Pope's Legate, and the Archbishop of Cyprus, it was at last concluded.

THIS Peace was proclaimed, with great Solemnity, in the great Church of Cambrey on the 5th of August: A Copy of the Instrument is to be seen in Leonard's Collection *. The Principle Articles, and such as relate to Naples, were as follow;

THAT the King's Sons should be set at Liberty, upon his paying the Emperor, for their Ransom, 1,200,000 Ducats, and 200,000 more (upon his Account) to the King of England †.

THAT the King should give up to the Emperor, six Weeks after the Ratification of the Treaty, all that he possess'd in the Dutchy of Milan, as also Agno, with all his Pretensions to it.

THAT, as soon as he could, he should evacuate Barietta, and all that he held in the Kingdom of Naples. That his most Christian Majesty should declare to the Venetians, that according to the Articles of Cognac, they must restore the Places they had taken in Puglia, and upon their Refusal, he shou'd denounce War against them, and assist the Emperor in the Recovery of them, with 30,000 Crowns a Month, 12 Gallies, 4 Ships, and as many Brigantines, and six Months Pay.

AND, to name no more, it was agreed, that the King should disannul the Process against the Duke of Bourbon, and restore the Deceased to his Honour, and his Heirs to the Estate, and likewise give back all Confiscations made upon Account of the War, either to the Persons forfeited, or to their Heirs: Which Article the King made no Account of after he had got his Sons set at Liberty, for he took the Title from the House of Bourbon, and did not restore to the Prince of Orange what had been taken from him, of which the Emperor complained much.

IN this Peace, the Pope was comprehended as a Principal, and the Duke of Suzo was included: There was also an Article, that the Venetians and Electors should be comprehended, upon Condition that they made up all Differences with the Emperor in four Months; which was, in effect, a tacit Exclusion: The like was done with respect to the Duke of Ferrara, but no mention was made of the Nobility and Exiles of the Kingdom of Naples.

WHEN this Peace was made publick, it is inexpressible how the Venetians, and much more the Florentines, cried out against it, seeing themselves, by their not being included, at the Mercy of the Emperor and the Pope; which last, received the Prince of Orange (who was arrived at Rome, on his March to reduce the Florentines) with great Joy, and gave him a good Reinforcement to facilitate the Undertaking, which he wish'd might have a good Issue.

IN the mean time the Emperor, after the Peace made with the Pope, set out for Italy, where he was desirous to go, not for the bare Ceremony of receiving the Imperial Crown from the Pope's own Hands, but for Reasons of greater Consequence; having a Mind, in his Conferences with his Holiness, to settle many Things in Italy, which yet remain'd doubtful: So that leaving Barcelona upon the 28th of July, on Board Andrea D'Oria's Gallies, he arrived at Genoa the 12th of August, where the Articles of Peace, concluded at Cambray, were presented to him, which he very readily ratified. In Execution of which, the King of France recall'd his Forces from Naples, giving Orders to his Officers, to put Barletta and all other Places possess'd by them in the Kingdom of Naples, in his Name, into the Emperor's Hands, which was accordingly done¹.

FROM the Time that this Peace of Cambray was made, the Kings of France never made an Attempt upon the Kingdom of Naples in their own Names, nor pretended to the Conquest of that Kingdom for themselves: It is true, they join'd upon Occasion with the Enemies of the Kings of Spain, in order to annoy them, but for other Reasons, as shall be shew'd in the Progress of this History.

THERE were still some Remains of War in Puglia; for the Venetians, not being included in the Peace, obstinately resolved to keep that Country, and the Ports of the Adriatick, of which they were possess'd: And although the Marquis Del Vasto had Orders to beat them out, he being call'd by the Prince of Orange to Florence, the reducing of which was more tedious and difficult than was believed at first, the Charge of the Puglian Expedition was given to Alarçon, newly made Marquis *Della Valle Siciliana*².

WHEN the Emperor was arrived at Bologna, upon the 5th of November, where, according to Agreement, the Pope also was; the first Thing that was treated of in their Conferences together, was the Restitution of the Dutchy of Milan, and the Peace with the Venetians and other Christian Princes. To facilitate which, Alonzo Sauches, the Emperor's Ambassador at Venice did good Service: It was also of great Use to Francis Sforza, his presenting himself to the Emperor as soon as he arriv'd at Bologna, where the Difficulties of the Accommodation with him and the Venetians, having taken up a Month, at last (the Pope being much fatigued) the Agreement with both was concluded upon the 23d of December this Year. It was stipulated, that the Dutchy of Milan should be restored to Sforza upon his paying to the Emperor 400,000 Ducats in one Year, and 500,000 in ten Years more; and till the first Payment should be made, Como, and the Citadel of Milan were to remain in the Emperor's Hands: So Sforza got the Investiture, or rather had that confirm'd to him which he had received before³.

THAT the Venetians should restore to the Pope Ravenna and Cervia, with all its Territories, but without giving up their Pretensions to them.

THAT they should deliver up to the Emperor, before the End of January next, all that they possess'd in the Kingdom of Naples.

THAT in case any Christian Prince, of whatever Rank, should attack the Kingdom of Naples, they obliged themselves to assist the Emperor with fifteen light Gallies well arm'd.

AND, to name no more Articles, it was stipulated, that if the Duke of Ferrara should make an Accommodation with the Pope and the Emperor, he should be understood to be included in this Peace.

THIS Peace was solemnly publish'd in the Cathedral Church of Bologna, on the first Day of January 1530. from which the Florentines alone were excluded.

IN Execution of the Treaty, the Emperor restored to Francis Sforza the Dutchy of Milan, and withdrew his Forces out of it, except such as were necessary for garisoning the Castle and Como, both which he evacuated at the Time agreed upon: But because the Emperor's Generals were dissatisfied with the Peace, and particularly the Marquis Del Vasto, and Antonio di Leva, the Emperor, to please them, persuaded the Duke of Milan to condescend to give them some Lands in his Dutchy.

THE Venetians gave up to the Pope the Territory of Romagna, and to the Emperor they restored, in the same Month, Trent, Melfetta, Pulignano, Monopoli, Brindisi, and all other Places which they had taken on the Coast of Puglia.

THUS the Kingdom being freed from the Invasion of Foreigners, and Peace restored to it, had need of Ease and quiet Repose to make up the past Losses.

C H A P. VI.

The Government of Cardinal Pompeo Colonna, who was made Viceroy in the Room of the Prince of Orange, becomes grievous to the Subjects, not so much by his own Rigour, as by Taxes and Donatives exacted from them upon account of the Emperor's Coronation, his Journey into Germany, the Birth of a new Prince, and the War against the Turks.

THE Prince of Orange being appointed for the Florentine Expedition, Cardinal Pompeo Colonna, in the Beginning of July 1529. was made Viceroy of Naples in his Stead. This was the first Cardinal, who being likewise Archbishop of Monreale, that, as Viceroy, and Captain-General, had govern'd the Kingdom. Formerly (when those who had dedicated themselves to the Church, could not meddle in Secular Affairs) this Promotion would have been esteemed a horrible Thing; but in the Pontificates of Alexander VI. Julius II. (of whom *John Owen*¹ says, that having laid aside the Keys, and taken up the Sword, he was more intent upon the Arts of War than the Sacerdotal Function) Leo X. (who, as Guicciardin observes², having no Regard to Religion, had his Mind intirely bent upon Splendor and Magnificence, as if he had been descended from a long Race of Kings, encouraging, not only learned Men, but Musicians and Buffoons, with a Royal Profuseness); and in this Pontificate of Clement VII. (in whose Reign, the Abuses of the Court of Rome were come to such a Height, that a General Council was much wanted for putting an End to them) I say, in such Times, this Promotion of Cardinal Colonna did not seem strange: It was no Blemish then, for a Cardinal and an Archbishop, to leave his Diocese, and govern Kingdoms as Viceroy and Captain-General; and, indeed, less wondered at in Cardinal Colonna, who, not minding Religion, gave himself intirely to Arms and Love Intrigues, according to the Genius of those Times.

IN his Youth he had been brought up to Arms by his Uncle Pedro Colonna, and fighting under that Great Captain, he gave good Proof of his Courage. Afterwards, chusing to leave the Army, and retire to Rome, he gave himself to the Study of Human Learning, and made such wonderful Progress in Poetry, that he was much esteemed by *Minturno*¹, and other Virtuosi of his Time. And as it was the Custom of Poets to chuse a Heroine, by whose Influence their Poetical Vein being inspired, they versified with more Life and Vigour; Colonna follow'd the same Practice, and being taken with the Beauty and Gracefulness of Donna Isabella Villamarino, Princess of Salerno, he loudly sung her Praise, and made many Copies of Verses upon that Subject, which are yet extant: He was likewise very much in the good Graces of the celebrated Donna Vittoria Colonna, his Cousin, whom he also extolled to the Skies. And to shew how fond he was of the Ladies, he composed a whole Volume of the Vertues of Women, giving them excessive Praises, and defending them from all the Faults commonly laid to their Charge².

AS a Recompence for all this Labour, upon the Death of his Uncle Cardinal John Colonna, Julius II. made him Bishop of Rieti; Leo X. who was better pleased with his Behaviour and Learning, rais'd him to greater Honour; for besides his translating him to greater and better Bishopricks, he made him Vice-Chancellor of the Apostolick See, and at last Cardinal. But Clement VII. hated him for being attach'd (as indeed all the Colonna Family was) to the Imperial Interest, and for that Reason opposed him in all his Designs: And the Cardinal being supported by the Emperor's Favour, did not stick to talk publickly against the Pope, as having obtained the Papacy by base Means, and magnifying what the House of Colonna had done against other Popes, added, that the Hatred of intruding Popes had been fatal to their House, but that such had often been restrained and kept under by the Power of the Colonna's. The Pope, enraged at these Discourses, published a severe Monitory against him, citing him to Rome under great Penalties, in which he pointed directly at the Viceroy of Naples, and obliquely at the Emperor himself. Cardinal Pompeo did not fail to revenge himself when the Colonna's entered Rome, and pillaged the Pope's Palace, and St. Peter's Church; for which, as soon as the Pope was in Safety, by the Truce made with Don Hugo di Moncada, he excommunicated the whole Colonna Family, as Hereticks and Schismatics, and deprived the Cardinal of his Hat. The Cardinal was then at Naples, and hearing of his Degradation, slighting the Pope's Censure, he publish'd an Appeal to a future Council, and cited Clement to it, giving, as his Reason, the Injustice and Nullity of his Monitories, Censures and Sentences against himself and the Colonna Family; and the Partisans of the Colonna Family, caus'd many Copies of this Appeal to be affixed in the Night-time, upon the Doors of the chief Churches in Rome, and upon many other Publick Places, and dispersed them thro' Italy. These sharp Disputes continued between them till the Treaty of Barcelona, by Virtue of which, all those who had offended the Pope, in Rome or elsewhere, being absolved, the Cardinal was restored to his former Dignity, but never to the Pope's Favour: But these Things having render'd him much more acceptable to the Emperor Charles V. he made him Archbishop of Monreale, a rich See in Sicily, and then upon the Departure of the Prince of Orange to Florence, the Cardinal being in Gaeta, he made him Viceroy.

UPON the Cardinal's Arrival at Naples, he found the Kingdom no less drain'd of Money, than full of Lewdness and Debauchery, occasioned by the late Calamities and Disorders; his Predecessors having been obliged, by reason of the Wars and Revolutions, to mind rather the military Affairs, than the Distribution of Justice; and the Prince of Orange had, more by his own Example, than the Negligence of his Government, introduced an intolerable Licentiousness and Debauchery among the young Nobility, to the great Contempt of Law and Justice: Not only the Chief Men of the Kingdom, but even private Gentlemen, openly rescued Offenders from the Hand of Justice; oppress'd and abus'd the Common People; kept the poor Tradesmen out of the Money which they had earn'd by their Labour, and even beat them as often as they came to demand it. The Great Men kept in their Houses, Miscreants [called Bravo's] to execute their unjust Orders; nor could the Ministers of Justice find any Remedy against that abominable Practice: The Palaces of the Nobility were become so many Places of Refuge, and those who fled to them, although they had been guilty of a thousand Villanies, were secure there; and if they were at any time drawn from thence by the Officers (whom they call Sbirri) those Officers were beaten, and the Delinquents rescued, or else they were prosecuted for Breach of Privilege, and obliged to restore the Prisoners.

THE Cardinal in the Beginning of his Government, following the Example of his Predecessors, let the Disorders go on as usual ; but at last seeing Things grow to such a Pitch of Wickedness, he rous'd himself : He made his Valer de Chambre Gio. Battista d'Alsis di Caserta, lose a Hand, for having given another of his Servants a Blow in the Face, in his Antichamber ; and although Donna Victoria Colonna came from Licbia to intercede for his Pardon, she lost her Labour ; and all that the Princess of Salerno (so much celebrated by the Cardinal in his Poetry) could obtain, was, that instead of the Right-Hand, he allow'd the Left to be cut off¹. He caused to be hang'd in the Market-Place, Cela Giovanni di Monte, who, in ¹ A Sort of Magistrate. 1525. had been *Eletto del Popolo, and was actually then

Maefirodatti of the Court of the Vicariate, together with his Brother Julio, who was Partner in his Office, and likewise his Accomplice in innumerable Frauds, Falshoods, and other enormous Crimes, of which they were convicted. A Malefactor having made his Escape from the Captain of the Sbirri, and taken Shelter in the Prince of Salerno's Palace, he threaten'd to confiscate the Prince's Estate, unless he was given up, which was instantly done : And towards the End of his Government, his Rigour towards Paul Poderico, slightly suspected to have had a hand in Assassinating the Count De Policastro, would have turned to Cruelty and manifest Injustice, if it had not been stopp'd by Tommaso Gramatico, our Civilian, who was at that Time Judge of the Vicariate. These Severities kept many in Order, but did not altogether restore Justice to its due Vigour ; that Honour was reserved for Don Pietro de Toledo his Successor, who (as we shall have Occasion to shew afterwards) almost at his first entring upon the Government, raised it to so high a Pitch, that in a Medal struck in his Time at Naples, representing Justice a falling, and supported by him, he justly deserved the Motto put upon it, Erectori Justitix.

BUT Cardinal Colonna's Government became grievous to the Neapolitans, by reason of the Occasions which the Emperor had, during his Viceroyship, for repeated Taxes and Donatives. Whilst the Emperor was at Bologna, there came Advice from Spain, that the Empress was brought to bed of a Prince ; so that about the End of January 1530. at the same time that they were making Feasts and Tournaments in Naples, they were obliged to think of a new Donative to his Imperial Majesty for the Birth of his Son : Besides, the Day was appointed for his Coronation, which was the Feast of St. Matthias, a Day very lucky to him, as being both his Birth-Day, and that on which he made the King of France Prisoner, he therefore chose it for his Coronation. He had been crown'd before at Aix la Chapelle, with Charles the Great's Crown, and now he sent to Monza, from Bologna, for the Crown of Iron, which he also received from the Pope's Hand with great Solemnity ; and afterwards, on St. Matthias's Day, February the 24th, he was crown'd with another Crown of Gold, and proclaimed Augustus, with Sound of Trumpets, and firing of Cannon. Guicciardin says², This Coronation was perform'd with a vast Concourse of People from Naples, and other Parts of Italy, but with little Expence or Pomp ; but although it cost little, yet the Prince of Salerno carried from Naples, 300,000 Ducats for defraying the Charge of it.

THIS Solemnity was the sooner over, because the Emperor had resolved to go immediately to Germany, as well for quelling the Disturbances occasioned there by Luther's Heresy, as for electing a King of the Romans, to which Dignity he endeavour'd to raise his Brother Ferdinand. He had received pressing Letters from thence to hasten his going thither : The Electors, and other Princes of the Empire press'd his coming, upon Account of the Dyet ; his Brother wanted his Presence, that he might be elected King of the Romans ; and others were earnest for his coming, because they thought, that so many Revolutions that had happen'd in Germany, on the Account of Religion, could not be quieted but by a Council.

THE Emperor therefore left Bologna in the End of March, to go to Germany (at the same time that the Pope took his Journey to Rome :) At his Arrival at Ausburg, he found the Princes of Germany, who waited his coming to hold the Dyet against the Lutheran Heresy. The Prince of Orange being kill'd in Battle on the 3d of August this Year, Cardinal Colonna was no longer Lieutenant-Governor, but absolute Viceroy of Naples.

IN the mean time, the Emperor during his Stay in Germany, was intent upon settling the Commotions begun in these Provinces, and to get his Brother chosen King of the Romans, which last he happily effected, Ferdinand being elected in the Beginning of the Year 1531, and crowned at Aix la Chapelle.

BUT it must be allowed, that the Kingdom of Naples has always been very unhappy, and much to be pitied; for whilst it was governed by little Kings, such as the Arragon Family were, those having no other Dominions from whence they could draw Money, the Subjects of Naples were obliged to defray the Charges of their Wars; yet that was reasonable and supportable: But who would have believed, that when this Kingdom came under the Dominion of so powerful a Prince as Charles V. Master of two Worlds, to whom not only the Gold of Spain, but that of the New Indies was brought, he should be always in want of Money, so that his Troops often mutiny'd for want of Pay, and nothing was heard but continual Demands of new Taxes and Donatives?

ANOTHER Misfortune for this Kingdom was, that as soon as the War with France was over, the Turks began another; so that we were always harass'd and forced to be at intolerable Charges, by the War with the first, and by Fear of the latter, which was worse than War. Solyman Emperor of the Turks, prepared to invade Austria this Year with a great Army, and to lay close Siege to Vienna; and the Year following he march'd with a powerful Force into Hungary, which obliged the Emperor to prepare himself for a vigorous Defence: But he wanted Money and Men to resist so formidable an Enemy; and therefore he intimated to the Cardinal Viceroy, that he should endeavour to procure larger Donatives from the Kingdom, to supply the Necessities of the War. The Cardinal summon'd a Parliament according to Custom, to meet in St. Lawrence's Church on the 11th of July, where declaring the Emperor's Mind, and exaggerating the Necessity of his Demand, he labour'd to persuade the Nobility and Commons to give a Donative of at least 600,000 Ducats. The Representatives on the other Hand, although they declared themselves willing to comply with his Majesty's Desire, yet they represented to the Viceroy their Inability, the Kingdom having been quite drain'd by the late Scourges of War, Famine, and Pestilence; they put him in Mind of the 300,000 Ducats which they had sent to his Imperial Majesty by the Prince of Salerno, for the Expence of his Coronation, by which they were in such a miserable State that they were to be pitied; notwithstanding which, to shew their Readiness to serve their Prince, they offered to give him 300,000: But the Cardinal being inflexible, and obstinately adhering to his first Demand, they were under a Necessity to offer at last the 600,000 Ducats, but to be paid in four Years, and levied by a Tax laid upon every House. They appointed the Prince of Salerno to carry the Donative; and upon this Occasion they asked a new Confirmation of the Old Privileges, and likewise new Grants, which they obtained the Year following, the Emperor being at Ratisbon, where he sign'd them on the 28th of July 1532, as they are to be seen among the Privileges and Grants of the City and Kingdom of *Naples*¹: But this Money was employed to pay the Army in Tuscany, and to levy more Forces in Naples and elsewhere, to recruit the Armies.

ABOUT this Time the Cardinal receiv'd five Edicts made by the Emperor in Germany, some of which related to this very End of raising Money. The Cardinal only proclaimed them, so that we may truly say, that he made no Laws in Naples.

BY the first Edict, sign'd at Innspruck July the 5th, 1530. and publish'd in Naples January the 2d, 1531², it was declared, That any Alienations made, either by private Persons, or by the Court, from the first of March 1528, to the End of February 1530, should be no Hindrance to the Seller, but that they might recover their Lands by paying the Money stipulated: The Period therein mentioned, having been a Time full of Revolutions, War, and other Calamities.

BY the second, dated at Ghent, June the 4th, 1531. published at Naples the 27th of July following, it was allow'd to all the Neapolitans to arm Ships against the Infidels, and to scour the Seas in Defence of the Coasts of the Kingdom³.

THE third, dated at Brussels, the 13th of March 1531, published by the Cardinal the last Day of September in the same Year, recalled all Grants, Rewards, Provisions, Immunities and Exemptions made by former Viceroys; confirming only such as had been made by the Prince of Orange; and charged the Treasurer, the Great Chamberlain, and his Lieutenant, with the exacting of the Revenues of the Exchequer, prescribing, in strong Terms, such Laws by which the Treasury might be augmented and frugally administer'd¹.

BY the fourth, bearing Date likewise at Brussels, the 20th of December 1531, published at Naples February the 17th 1532, severe Laws were prescribed to the Collectors, and all other Officers who receive or give out the King's Money, ordering them to keep an exact Account of the Quality, Weight and Value of it, and to make a just Account of it to the Ministers of the Court of the Royal Chamber².

THE last, dated at Cologne, January the 28th 1532, published at Naples the 17th of February following, declares, That the Viceroy had not Power to bestow any Office in the Kingdom worth above One hundred Ducats a Year, because it belong'd to the King to dispose of such; and in those of a hundred Ducats, are comprehended not only Officers Salaries, but Perquisites and all other Dues³.

A FEW Months after the publishing this Edict, the Cardinal finished his Government and Life together. It was his Custom this Summer 1532, to go often to his Garden at Cbiana for his Diversion, and going thither in the Morning in the Beginning of July, with his great Friend the Count De PolICASTRO, and having eaten Figs, a little after Dinner he was taken with a slow Fever, which took him off in a few Days, in the 53d Year of his Age: It was reported, that the Figs were poison'd by one Philipetto his Butler, who knowing that it was his Master's Custom often to eat Figs in that Garden, had poison'd them. Gregorio ROSSO a contemporary Writer, relates⁴, That it was thought strange that the Cardinal should die, and not the Count De PolICASTRO, who had likewise eaten Figs that Morning with him. There were various Reports about the Author of the Villany; some said that Philipetto was hired to do it by a great Person at Rome, who was the Cardinal's mortal Enemy; others pretended that it was done by some Relations of that Lady so much extoll'd in the Cardinal's Poems, being affronted that he should have made choice of their Relation to be the Subject of his Muse, and have treated her as Petrarch did his Laura. But Agostino NISO, a famous Physician of that Time, who was called to prescribe a Remedy to him, and was present at opening the Body, declared that there was no Sign of Poison in his Bowels. Paul GIOVIO, who wrote the Cardinal's Life, is of the same Opinion, attributing his Death to the immoderate Use of Ice-Water, which he used (after the Roman Custom) to drink mix'd with Wine, two Hours after Dinner, to refresh himself. His Body was buried in the Church of Monte Oliveto, where, not many Years ago, his Sepulchre was; but afterwards his Bones were transported to the Chapel of the Princes of Sulmona, of the Lancio Family. After his Death the Collateral Council undertook the Government till another Viceroy came; the Chief of which Council was Don Ferdinand of Arragon, Duke of Montalto. As soon as the Pope, to his great Joy, heard of the Cardinal's Death, he gave his Office of Vice-Chancellor, with the greatest Part of his Benefices, to his own Nephew, Cardinal Hyppolito de Medicis, who was gone to *Germany*⁵.

AS soon as the Emperor had an Account of the Cardinal's Death, he made Don Pedro di Toledo, Marquis of Villa-Franca (who was then with him in Germany) Viceroy of Naples; who leaving Ratisbon, where the Emperor was, upon the first Day of August, arrived at Naples the 4th of September, and took Possession of his Charge the next Day.

BUT because his Government was of the longest Continuance of all the Viceroys we ever had, having kept it for the Space of 21 Years and a half, in which Time there happened many notable Occurrences; and that from him Naples began to take that Form and Polity, of which it retains a great Resemblance at present, it will be more proper to refer the relating of those memorable Events to the following Book of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXII.

ON Pedro di Toledo, was born at Alva di Tormes, in the Kingdom of Castile, in the Year 1484. of Don Frederick di Toledo II. Duke D'Alva, and Donna Isabella Zuniga, Daughter to the Duke of Bedmar, a Lady no less accomplished in Mind than in Body: She was tall and well-shap'd; so that she used pleasantly to say, That she came to mend the Breed of the House of Alva, who were low of Stature. Don Pedro was, in his Infancy, put into the Hands of good Masters, to be instructed in Literature; but the Duke his Father, finding that he made no great Progress that Way, and that he was more inclined to Exercises of the Body, than the Speculations of the Schools, sent him to Court, and made him Page to the King of Spain; and Don Pedro, although but a Boy, taking diligent Notice of the Actions and Words of that wise King, learned both Judgment and Prudence; and applying himself to Horsemanship, he piqued himself in out-stripping all the Courtiers of his own Age in that Exercise, as well in the Service of the King, as in making a handsome Appearance in Tilts and Tournaments, and all other Diversions of the Court; so that he became a greater Favourite of the King's than any other, and most expert in the Feats of Chivalry, so that he was call'd in Spain the great Bull-fighter: And after he came to be Viceroy of Naples, he introduced Bull-Feasts, and many other Tiltings and Tournaments, which he often made the Neapolitans practise during his Government.

HAVING, by these Accomplishments, ingratiated himself with the King, his Majesty was pleased to make a Match for him, with Donna Maria Osoria, Marchioness of Villa-Franca, the Count of Benevento's Grand-Daughter, a Lady of thirteen Years of Age, handsome, and sole Heiress to her Grandfather's Estate: and although Don Pedro was only a Cadet of his own Family, and not the eldest Son, yet both the King and the Count, with whom Donna Maria had been brought up, made Choice of him, before many others of great Estates and Titles, that courted her. By this Marriage he took the Title of Marquis of Villa-Franca, together with Possession of the Estate, to the great Joy of the Vassals, who soon found the Sweets of his prudent and just Management: So early did Don Pedro give Proof of his knowing well how to Rule. Not long after, the King gave him a Benefice, in Commendam, of the Order of St. James, of 6000 Ducats a Year; to which Order he was attach'd all his Life. The Duke his Father, being afterwards sent Captain-General of the King's Army, in the Expedition against the King of Navarre, the Marquis, entering himself in the King his Master's Service, accompanied his Father in that War, where he served till John Alibert was driven out, and the Kingdom conquer'd by the Duke: In that Expedition he gave Proof, that he was as well skill'd in the Art of War, as in that of Government.

UPON the Death of the Catholick King, as hath been related in the preceding Book, there arose some Troubles in Spain; some Grandeos refusing to accept Charles Archduke of Austria, his Grandchild, for their King, whilst Queen Jean his Mother was alive, although they were willing to receive him as Prince, and Successor to her: But that Matter being made up upon certain Conditions; and Charles being afterwards made Emperor upon his Grandfather's Death, there happen'd other Stirs (as has been said) amongst the Spaniards, by reason of the illegal Exactions of the Flemish Ministers, whom the Emperor had brought with him from Flanders: The People mutinied and took Arms; but being routed, and the Chief Leaders of them punished, the Tumults ceased. In these Confusions, the Marquis, following the Example of the Duke D'Alva his Father, did the Emperor good Service, which made him a great Favourite, and highly honour'd and esteem'd by that Prince above all his other Courtiers; insomuch that he would never part with him, but carried him to Flanders, Italy, and Germany with him. He was in Ratisbone this Year 1532. with the Emperor, when Solyman, with 300,000 Men, had enter'd Servia, in order to subdue Hungary, and threatening likewise the other Imperial Dominions; and the Emperor, intent upon driving him back, had written to Andrea D'Orsi, lately made Prince of Melfi, to get together as great a Fleet as he could, and to sail to the Levant, to the Grecian Coasts, in order to attack the Maritime Towns of the Turks, thereby to divert them from their Enterprize upon Hungary.

BUT, as the Turks began to disturb Naples after the French were gone, as we observed before, the Emperor having Intelligence of the Sailing of the Turkish Fleet, was apprehensive of their Design upon Naples, and having Advice, at the same time, of the Death of Cardinal Columa, he immediately dispatch'd the Marquis of Villa-Franca, with the Character of Viceroy and Captain-General of the Kingdom, not only to do him Honour, but for the better Defence of the Kingdom against the Attempts of the Turks, being perfectly satisfied of his Prudence and Courage. He set out immediately, and made long Journies, accompanied by Nicolo-Antonio Caracciolo, Marquis of Vico (then likewise at Ratisbone) who said, that by the Conversation which they had together upon the Road, about the Affairs of Naples, he had found out, that the Marquis of Villa-Franca's Government would be a severe one*. He pass'd thro' Rome, where he was received by Clement with great Honour. He was, at his Arrival in Naples, welcomed with great Acclamations, the People being persuaded, by his Reputation, that he would govern them with Prudence and Justice, and reform the many Abuses and Corruptions which had crept in, as also that they should now be freed from the Insolence of the Nobility.

HE found the Kingdom, as we said, in a miserable State, by reason of the preceding Calamities; the City emptied, both of Men and Money, by the Plague; the Houses ruined; the Fields a Desert; but above all, Justice depress'd; and therefore he thought fit to begin by re-establishing the last.

C H A P. I.

Don Pedro di Toledo reforms the Courts of Judicature in Naples, from which Justice began to flourish.

HIS wise Minister, knowing that the chief Fountain from whence the People's Repose is derived, is the equal Distribution of Justice to all ; and this (being impossible to be done directly by Kings in Person) must be trusted with their Ministers ; the first Step he took was, to call before him all the King's Council, and all the Magistrates and Officers of Justice, charging them to have the right Administration of it always before their Eyes ; to make it their principal Study to distribute Justice to all, without Respect of Persons ; and to have no other View in their several Charges, but the Honour of GOD, and the Service of their Prince.

TO gain his End in these Admonitions, and to be sure of the Fruit he expected from them, he trusted no-body, but gave Audience to all, without Exception, every Day, with the greatest Patience, being intent upon hearing and knowing every Thing, one after another. By which Method he came quickly to be acquainted with the Faults of the Officers, who, soon finding that there was nothing that could be hid from the Viceroy, some of them reform'd themselves of their own accord, others neglecting to do it, were admonished, some sharply reprov'd, and some others turn'd out of their Offices.

HE found, that in punishing Delinquents, the Favour of the Nobility was a great Obstruction to Justice ; for they, either with too great Importunity run immediately to beg them off, or made use of their Power to threaten the Judges to acquit them : But the Viceroy forbid such Practices, assuring them, that neither Intercessions nor Threats should have any Weight with him. And to shew them that he was in Earnest in his Resolution, he gave them a great and signal Instance of it, in the Execution of Commendator Giovan-Francesco Pignatelli, who, though he had been guilty of many Crimes, yet being of a great Family, and protected by many of the Nobility, had staved off the Execution of Justice ; the poor People who were wrong'd, and complain'd, being crush'd by his Interest : The Viceroy being informed of the Matter, gave Encouragement to the Plaintiffs and Judges to proceed with all Freedom against him ; and the Sentence of Death passing upon him, his Head was cut off in the Piazza of Castel-novo, the usual Place of Execution of Noblemen, in extraordinary Cases. The same Fate had the second Count of Policastro, and also a rich Citizen, well allied, called Mazzeo Pellegrino, who, by Force of Money, had long smother'd the Complaints against him, and still persisted in his wicked Courses ; but though he had offer'd vast Sums to compound the Matter, his Offers were reject'd, and he condemn'd to die, which was executed with the utmost Rigour.

TO take away the very Occasion of their Offences, he publish'd an Edict, forbidding every one, of what Quality soever, to keep (as it was become common) in their Halls and Porches, Spears, Javelins, Halbards, Guns or Musquets, or to carry in the Streets either Pistols, Daggers, or any other Arms, but a Sword only. He ordain'd, that from the second

* Hour of the Night, till the next Morning, none should go Abroad with any Arms whatsoever ; and that he might prevent any Dispute that might arise about the Hours, or any Excuse of not hearing the Clock strike, he ordered the great Bell of St. Lawrence's Church, which could be heard all over the City, to be tolled every Night when

when the Clock struck Two. He likewise ordained, that Night Robberies in the City should be punish'd with Death. And because there were in Naples many Porches, where, as in dark Vaults, the Villains surprized unwary People, he caused them all to be demolish'd; of which Number were those of St. Martin at the Capuan Gate, and St. Agatha, Old Buildings, which were frightful even in the Day-time: For the same Reason he made the Bulk-Heads, and Benches of the Artificers, upon which they expos'd their Wares in the Street, to be taken away, as being a Shelter for the Rogues by Night, from whence they bolted out to assault those that pass'd. And there being a Rock in the Sea, near Castel del Uovo, called Fiattamone, where were many Caves or Grotto's, in which dissolute young Fellows committed horrid Wickedness, he caused them all to be destroyed to the very Foundation: And he order'd the lewd Women, who were dispers'd through the City, without being distinguish'd from the Modest ones, to leave their Habitations, and confined them to the publick Stews. And he never gave over prosecuting a Sort of Men call'd Compagnoni (forbidding, by Proclamation, any to associate in Troops) till he had effectually banish'd them out of the City.

HE took away the Sanctuaries from Delinquents, which they had in the Palaces of the Chief Nobility: And being informed that there were many Houses in Naples, where Outlaws were received and supplied with Food and Money, that their Protectors might make Use of them to serve their bad Purposes, he caused the Houses to be pull'd down, so that none afterwards had the Boldness to encourage them. The Tradesmen were punctually paid, and no longer insulted; and the Ministers of Justice were duly respected: And that the City might be the better guarded, he made new Captains of the Watch, and distributed them through all the Quarters of the City, for the greater Safety of it. He also made new Bargells for the Country, that so the Rogues might be less secure there than in the City.

AND finding that many other Abuses had crept in, he abolished them all. There was a Custom in Naples at that Time, that when Widows married again, the Mob used to assemble and getting under the Windows of the married Couple at Night, sung injurious Songs, and obscene Ballads, which they called Ciamtel-larie, from which Custom proceeded much Strife, and frequent Murders; and often the Bridegroom, not to be plagued with such Impertinence, compounded for Money, or some Consideration, to be free of the Mob. There was a Custom still in Use in his Time, taken from the old Heathen Practice, which was, that during the Vintage, all Licentiousness and Immodesty were indulged. The Grape-Gatherers, when they met with any Woman, though never so Virtuous and Noble, or Fryars, and grave Men, did not stick to accost them with the most obscene Ribaldry, and vile Country Jest, with as great Freedom as Luegi Transillo represents them in his Vendemmia. There remained among us likewise, the superstitious Custom of doleful Lamentations, and other indecent Demonstrations of Sorrow at Funerals; the Women accompanying the Herfes through the Streets, and even in the Churches, as if they had been seized with a Frenzy, tore their mourning Habits, howled and cried, scratching their Faces, and filling the City with Horror and Grief. All these Abuses Toledo abolished, reducing Funeral Mourning to decent and suitable Bounds; and as he publish'd an Edict for the better preserving Womens Portions, so he suppress'd their Extravagance in Apparel.

HE published a severe Edict against Duelling, from which many Disorders, and frequent Mischiefs in the City had proceeded: He ordained, that the Challenger should be punished with Death, and took care, that such as refused to accept a Challenge, should not be charged with Cowardice.

HE afterwards remedied a most pernicious Custom which had crept into the City, to the Ruin of many young Women, and from which the Chastest, and the most sacred Places were not secure. This Abuse increased under the Prince of Orange's Government; for in his Time the young Nobility were guilty of a thousand Insolences, the Ravishing of Ladies of Quality and Vertue was not punished, because that Prince went Shares with them in their Wickedness: And that they might proceed with the greater Security, and have Access to the most close and retir'd Places, they made use of Ladders of Ropes, even to scale the Walls of Convents. Cardinal Colonna being too remiss with regard to such kind of Abuses, had not sufficiently guarded against this Practice: But Toledo, abhorring such corrupt and scandalous Doings, published a most severe Edict, condemning to Death, without

Mercy,

Mercy, every one who should be found at Night, with a Ladder of Wood, Ropes, or of any other Matter whatsoever. Of this Edict (although there be no Mention made of it in our Laws) the President De Franchis gives an Account. Afterwards, in the Year 1560. Don Parafan de Rivera, Viceroy under King Philip II. published a Law, which is yet to be seen, with this Title, De scalarum Prohibitione noctis tempore; where, that Minister, for Decency's Sake, concealing the principal Design of the Edict, declares, that those who were found with Ladders by Night, should be punished with Death, or other Pains and Penalties, at his Pleasure, to prevent Thieves and others from scaling Walls by Night, and committing Robberies, which was judg'd to be levell'd against the abovementioned wicked Practice.

BUT Don Pedro's Edict was more severe than this, and was put in Execution with more Rigour, of which there was an unhappy Instance in 1549. of a Nobleman, who being catch'd scaling a Lady's Window by Night, was beheaded, although the Princesses of Salerno and Salmon, and almost all the Nobility of Naples interceded in his Behalf. The like would have happen'd to Paul Poderico, a Gentleman much esteem'd in the City, who being taken as he had just fix'd his Ladder under his Mistress's Window, was condemn'd to die; and the Viceroy, although he was his intimate Friend, would not obstruct the Course of Justice; but yet he allow'd his Relations to sue for a Pardon for him from the Spiritual Court (he being in Holy Orders) to which they made Application, and by that Means saved his Life.

S E C T. I.

The Reform of the Tribunal of the Vicariate.

BESIDES what is already mentioned, Toledo made many more Regulations with Regard to the exact Administration of Justice; and to that End he reform'd the Court of the Vicariate. He ordained, That the Deputy, and all the Judges and other Officers should meet together in their Court at certain fix'd Hours, to administer Justice: And because the Judges were but four, it was impossible for them, according to his Regulations, to hear such a Multitude of Causes, he join'd to them two others, and established the Number to six, four Criminal, and two Civil Judges. He appointed, that such as brought in Complaints, or enter'd false or calumnious Suits, should be punished as Forgers; that Contumacy in Delinquents, should be no Bar to the Rights of the Exchequer; that the Opinions of the Judges should not be made publick till they were heard by the Exchequer; that the poor Prisoners should every Day be supplied with Bread; and he made Hospitals for sick Prisoners near the Gaols, where they were cured at the King's Charge, for which he obtained the Emperor's Allowance: And that those poor Wretches might be more carefully protected, he augmented the Salaries of the Advocate and Proctor of the Poor.

HE ordained, That the Compositions should be moderate; that such as were set at Liberty should pay no Fees; that in the Summer Vacations, all Prisoners for civil Debts should be released, giving Security, either to agree with their Creditors, or to return to Prison.

HE ascertained the Fees of the Mastrodatti, Clerks, and other Under-Officers of that Court; giving Orders, at the same time, that they should give Tables of their Fees, which they did: He extirpated the Shoals of false Witnesses, and made Perjury a Capital Crime. He likewise made many other wise Regulations, which, with those mentioned, are set down in the Annales prefix'd to the first Tome of our Laws

S E C T. II.

The Reform of the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber.

HAVING reform'd the Vicariate, he proceeded, with the same Success, to that of the Royal Chamber. He saw the Straits, which the War between the Emperor and the Turks daily occasioned; the bad Oeconomy in the Charges of it; the frequent Contributions and Donatives, which impoverished the Kingdom; and that the Government was always obliged to demand Money to prevent a Mutiny in the Armies: To contribute in some measure to so great Demands, he resolved to reform this Tribunal as well as he could, because to it belong'd the Care of the King's Patrimony; to raise the Reputation of it; to prevent Disorders in it, and all purloining usually committed by the Under-Officers; and to take care that the Revenues and Taxes should not be imbezzled.

TO this End, he procured from the Emperor, many Ordinances concerning the good Administration of this Court; all which he published in Naples, commanding an exact Obedience to them: He afterwards himself made many other Regulations, and laid down Rules to this Court, about their Vigilance and Care in the Collection of the Revenues.

HE ordained, That the Causes belonging to the Exchequer, or where it had any Concern, should be tried in the Royal Chamber, and that all the other Tribunals should, as Occasion served, give Assistance to that Court; that there should be no Time limited to the Exchequer for recovering what belonged to it; that no Gold or Silver should be carried out of the Kingdom; that the Money should be of a just Weight, and a new Coinage to be made, in order to make up what had been consumed; and besides his many other Regulations, which are printed with our Statutes, he took care that the Judges of this Tribunal were Men of the greatest Learning and Integrity, and the most indefatigable of his Time: For in his Administration, Bartolomeo Camerario was made Lieutenant of this Court, and Antonio Baratucci Treasurer, the most eminent Lawyers of that Time, and Men of singular Learning and Diligence, as we shall have Occasion to take notice of hereafter. And so great was the Viceroy's Zeal and Care to have this Court well regulated, and the Ministers of it diligent, that one of the Reasons why Camerario lost his Favour, was, That whilst he was Lieutenant of this Court, he used too often to take his Pleasure in the Country at Somma; and Toledo representing to him, that it was not proper that a Minister, who was trusted with such a laborious Charge, should be so often absent from the Court to which he belonged; he answered, That it was yet more improper for a Viceroy to leave the City, and divert himself at Pozzuolo, as Don Pedro often used to do: By this indiscreet Repartee, he so disobliged the Viceroy, that he brought him in Disgrace with the Emperor, which, as shall be related, was the first Step to his Ruin. In fine, to give the greater Lustre to this Tribunal, in the Year 1537. he removed it from the Marquis Del Vasto's House, who kept it there, as being Great Chamberlain, and settled it, and all other Courts, in Castel Capuano.

S E C T. III.

The Reform of the S. C. of Santa Clara.

THIS great Minister took care, not only to have Justice administer'd with Equity and Expedition, in Criminal and Exchequer Causes, but also in Civil and Private, and to the Honour of the Ministers, as well as the Dignity of the Courts. This Tribunal had been hitherto kept in the Cloister of Santa Chiara, and being confin'd to one Chamber, made but one Bench; and therefore, we often read in the Decisions of Matteo degli Afflitti, that when any Cause was decided by unanimous Votes, it was said to be determined per totum S. C. not that they were all obliged to concur in their Votes, as they do now, and have the Suffrages of the Counsellors of all the other Benches, but because they all sat on one Bench. But Toledo, for the greater Ease and Expedition in hearing and determining Causes, ordained, That there should be two different Benches made out of the whole Counsellors, who before made up this Tribunal, that each Bench, after this Division, might have Cognizance of Causes, and the President might sit sometimes in one, and sometimes in the other, according to the Importance of what they had in Hand.

THIS Tribunal made a bright Figure in Toledo's Time, by having for President of it the famous Cicco Laffredo, and for being composed of so many eminent Counsellors, amongst whom the Chief Men were, Giovanni Marziale, Antonio Capesce, Antonio Baratuccio, Giovan-Tomaso Minacci, Scipione Capesce, Matteo Freccia, and some others, of whom Teppi makes a long Catalogue¹. In short, it became more glorious and splendid, by being removed from the narrow Bounds of the Cloister of Santa Chiara, and kept with the other Courts, in a more decent and stately Place in Castel Capuano.

S E C T. IV.

The Uniting of all the Courts in Castel Capuano.

ALTHOUGH many of the Ordinances and Regulations already mentioned, as also the removing all the Courts to one Place, were not effected by Toledo in the Beginning of his Government, but in the Progress of it; as this Translation of the Courts was made in 1537. after he had beautified and enlarged the City, and done many other great Works, as shall be related hereafter: Yet, not to be obliged to turn back, to give an Account of all that he did towards the Reforming the Courts of Justice, I thought it more proper to speak of them in this Place, that, at one View, the Reader may see the Value of this Great Man, and how much he exceeded the other Viceroys his Predecessors.

AFTER his Return from Puglia, where he had provided against the frequent Incursions of the Turks upon that Coast, of which by-and-by, he began to build a Palace, which he dedicated to Justice, in the same Place where Castel Capuano once stood, but was then reduced to be a private House of Pleasure, from having been a Royal Palace. He ordered the Rooms to be made in the Form of Great Halls, with many and spacious Chambers, for the Conveniency of the Courts which he designed to remove to that Place.

IN this Palace he assembled all the Courts of Justice; the S. C. of the Royal Chamber of Accompts; the H. C. of the Vicariate; those of the Bailiwick, and of the Mint: He was at great Pains to finish this great Design, to which some thought he was the more prompted by the small Friendship which he had for the Marquis Del Vasto; for by this new Enterprize, he removed the Court of the Chamber of Accompts from his House, where it was kept before, on the Account of his Post as Great Chamberlain.

HE ordered, in the Vaults under that Palace, Prisons to be made, and the Prisoners who were shut up in the old Vicariate, and all other Prisons in the City, to be brought thither by a Hundred, or Two hundred at a time.

HE ordained, That the President of the Sacred Council, the Lieutenant of the Chamber of Accompts, the Deputy of the Vicariate, and one Judge Criminal, should lodge in that new Palace.

IT is incredible what Ease this Translation of the Courts brought to People of Business; for being, before, obliged to drudge up and down the different Parts of the City where the Tribunals were kept, now that they were all held in one Place, they could attend there without Loss of Time. Another Advantage was, That that Part of the City which was unpeopled and desolate, was become well inhabited and frequented.

BESIDES, that by this uniting of the Courts in one Place, he could appoint two ordinary Counsellors of the S. C. to preside as Criminal Judges in the Vicariate, to hear Causes, that Justice might not be delayed, when Men of such Experience had the Management of it. He likewise ordained, That the Tribunal of the Vicariate should be visited every Saturday by one of the Deputies who lived next to it; and for the more ready and quick Determination of Causes, and doing Justice, he limited the Festivals and Days of Vacation, restricting them within as narrow a Compass as he possibly could.

S E C T. V.

Of the restoring Justice in all the Provinces of the Kingdom, and of the Courts there.

THIS wise Minister, not content with having restored Justice in the Metropolis of the Kingdom, set about to do the same in all the Provinces of it, and to reform their Courts.

THIS

THIS Design he began by regulating the Officers who had the Charge of the Provinces, and therefore he ordered, that not only the Judges, but the Presidents of the Provinces, should every forty Days send him an Account of their Proceedings. He prohibited all Provincial Officers, under the highest Penalties, to live at Free-Cost as they travelled through the Provinces upon their Duty.

THAT no Order should be put in Execution in the Provinces, till they had first notified it to the Governors. That what was ordained by the Provincial Courts, had no need of the Exequatur of the Regal Courts.

THAT those who had the Privilege of Citizens of Naples, whilst they lived in the Provinces, should not be exempted from the Taxes paid in those Places.

THAT no Writs drawn up out of the Kingdom, could be put in Execution within it, without the Viceroy's Consent. And he made many other Regulations, which are contained in the forementioned Chronology, among the Laws which were made during Toledo's Government.

C H A P. II.

The Emperor Charles V's Expedition to Tunis. His Arrival in Naples: What happen'd during his Stay there: His Return; and how much he was importun'd by some of the Nobility, to remove Toledo from the Government of the Kingdom.

IN the mean time, the Emperor Charles V. having settled all Things in Germany, if not to his Wish, at least as well as he could, with regard to the new Lutheran Heresy; and finding that Solyman's Army, having left Hungary, was retir'd to Constantinople, and that there was nothing to be afraid of in that Kingdom, resolv'd to quit Vienna, where he had resided for some time, and to go through Italy into Spain, purposing to have an Interview with the Pope as he pass'd, of which he sent him Notice. He began his March therefore on the 4th of October 1532. with his Spanish Infantry, and all his Horse, leaving his Italian Foot under the Command of Fabrizio Maramaldo, for any Occasion that his Brother, the King of the Romans, might have for them¹. Upon the 8th of November he arriv'd at Mantua, and had a Conference with the Pope in Belogna (where he discovered that his Holiness had enter'd into strict Alliance with the King of France); from thence, having call'd back Andrea D'Orta's Fleet from the Levant, he embark'd for Spain, and landed in Barcelona in the Month of April 1533. where he staid.

BUT here he had little Rest, for the Emperor Solyman, having made the famous Pirate Barbarossa Admiral of his Fleet, had given him the Command of a Fleet of eighty Gallies, in order to restore Arendino Barosso, by some called Misresetto, to the Kingdom of Tunis, and to chase Muleasser his Brother from thence, and in his Passage to attack Sicily and Calabria. And at last, Barbarossa getting ready his Fleet, in the Spring of the Year 1534. set sail, and passing the Fare of Messina about the End of July, burnt some Ships, landed in Calabria, and pillaged St. Lucia, not leaving so much as one Person in it. He burnt Cetraro, belonging to the Monks of Cassina, together with six Gallies which Toledo had ordered to be built there; and passing in the Sight of Naples (which was more afraid than hurt)

he landed some of his Men in the Island of Procida, and pillaged it. And not content with that, he attack'd Sperlonga unawares, making many of the Inhabitants Slaves; and sent some Men as far as Fondi, in order to seize Donna Ginlia Gonzaga, with a Design to make a Present of her to Solyman, who had a great Desire to have her, the Fame of her Beauty having reach'd his Ears: Fondi was pillaged, and the Lady had just time to save herself by getting a Horseback in her Smock¹. The Neapolitans, in order to put a Stop to Barbarossa's Insolence, and free the Coast of Naples from the Invasion of the Turks, met in Parliament on the 20th of August, in the Convent of Monte Oliveto, and gave the Emperor a Donative of 150,000 Ducats, of which the Nobility paid 50,000, and the rest of the Kingdom the 100,000².

THE same Misfortune happened to Terracina, which so frightened the Court and City of Rome, that it was believed, if the Turks had proceeded farther, that City had been deserted. Pope Clement, who was at that time grievously afflicted with a Pain in his Stomach, being no longer able to support his Infirmities, finish'd his Days on the 25th of September 1534.

UPON his Death, the Cardinals, the very first Night that they enter'd the Conclave, with one Consent, elected Alexander Farnese, by Birth a Roman, in his Room. He was then 67 Years of Age, the oldest Cardinal of the College, and the most respected, both for Learning and a seeming good Life. Great Rejoycings were made in Rome, the People being overjoy'd to see a Pope of Roman Extraction, after 103 Years that the See had been fill'd with foreign Popes, to the Number of Thirteen. He was elected the 11th of October, and crown'd the 1st of November, by the Name of Paul III.

IN the mean time, Barbarossa tacking about, steer'd his Course for Tunis, and having surprized that City by Stratagem, chased Muleasser out of it, settled Barosso on the Throne, and strengthening his Party there, he fortified Goletta, and left in it a good Garrison of Moors.

THE Emperor considering, That if Solyman were Master of the Kingdom of Tunis, its being subject to so formidable a Prince might occasion the Destruction of Sicily, Naples, and all the Sea-Ports of the Mediterranean, even to Hercules's Pillars, resolved to break his Measures, and therefore determined to go in Person upon that Expedition. He dispatch'd Orders throughout all his Dominions for levying Soldiers, and the whole Winter was spent in making Preparations for the African War. Toledo, to encourage others, built a Galley at his own Charge, and many followed his Example. The Princes of Salerno and Bisignano, the Dukes of Castrovillaro and Nocera, the Marquis of Castelvetero, and Alarcone Marquis Della Valle, did the same. Many Noblemen and Gentlemen, hearing that the Emperor was to go in Person, prepared for the Expedition³.

IN the Beginning of the Year 1535, the Marquis Del Vasto, who, by the Emperor's Order, had gone to Genoa to treat with Prince D'Oria, return'd to Naples with many Gallies, a good Number of large Ships, and a great many Soldiers. The Pope likewise gave his Assistance, and made Virginio Orsini, General of the Ecclesiastical State, and sent him to Naples, where he arrived in May with two and twenty Gallies.

MANY Neapolitans embark'd in this Fleet. Toledo sent his two Sons, Don Federico and Don Garcia, whom he had by his Wife the Marchioness of Villa-Franca. The Marquis Del Vasto likewise went aboard, with the Prince of Salerno, Don Antonio d'Arragona, Son to the Duke of Montalto; the Marquises De Laino, Vico, and Quarata; the Counts of Popoli, Novellara, Sarno, and Auverfa; Scipione Caraffa, Brother to the Prince of Stigliano, Don Diego de Cardines, Brother to the Marquis De Laino, Cesare Berlingero, Baldassar Caracciolo, Biafe di Somma, Cola Toraldo, Costanzo di Costanzo, and others⁴. They set out from Naples the 17th of May, and steer'd for Palermo, and being there join'd with more Men and Ships, they set sail for Sardinia, and anchored at Cagliari. Upon the 11th of June the Emperor arrived at that City with the Gallies commanded by Andrea D'Oria, and those of Don Alvaro Bazan, Admiral of the Spanish Squadron, in which were almost all the Spanish Nobility: This combin'd Fleet, consisting of 300, sailed from Cagliari for the Coast of Africk on the 13th of June, and with a prosperous Wind reach'd it in three Days.

THE Emperor having landed at Porto Farina, made the Marquis Del Vasto his General, and order'd all to obey him. Goletta was first attacked, and, after much Toil and Slaughter, was taken the 4th of July. The Neapolitans behaved with great Courage, and particularly the Prince of Salerno, General of the Italian Foot, signalized himself much to his Honour. The Count De Sarro, Cesare Berlingiero, the Count D'Auverga, Baldassar Caracciolo, Coslanzo di Coslanzo, Ottavio Monaco, and other Neapolitans were kill'd at this Siege. Tunis was likewise taken, Arunano Barosso turn'd out, Barbarossa put to Flight, and Muleassar restor'd to his Throne by the Emperor, who made him his Tributary, and took his Promise, that he should send him as a yearly Tribute, 20,000 Crowns of Gold, and six Barbary Horses.

THERE were many who thought that this Expedition, for which such vast Preparation had been made, and so much Money expended, had turned to very small Account by the Emperor's Imprudence, in leaving in Muleassar's Hands, for a small Tribute, a Place of such Importance, capable of hindering the Incursions of the Turks upon Sicily and Naples, and all the Coast of the Mediterranean Sea, when he might have made himself absolute Master of the whole Kingdom. And Thomas Campanella, in his whimsical Discourses on the Monarchy of Spain, blames the Emperor's Conduct: And indeed, the Event shew'd, that this Expedition prov'd altogether fruitless; for in Process of Time, the People of Tunis, dissatisfied with the Government of Muleassar, sided with his Son Amido, who aspiring to the Crown, lost no Opportunity of laying Snares for his Father, which the King suspecting, very imprudently resolv'd to leave Tunis, and go to Naples, to ask Assistance of the Viceroy. He was scarce gone, when Amido, with the Help of the Arabians and some of the principal Moors, took Possession of the Kingdom; of which Muleassar being advised, he made the greater Haste for Naples, where he arrived in 1544, and was received by Toledo with the Honours due to a King, and he immediately began to levy Men; but not being able to raise a sufficient Number, Toledo did not fail to tell him, that his Design would prove very dangerous; for, said he, since the Emperor, in order to recover that Kingdom, was lately obliged to go in Person with a great Army, what Hopes could he have to recover it with a small Force of 2000? But that King, being deceived by his relying on the Fidelity which he expected in some of his Governors, would needs try his Fortune; and therefore departing from Naples, he arrived at Goletta, and trusting to some Moors, who falsely told him that Amido had fled from Tunis, he made great haste thither, where he no sooner appeared, than he was attacked and routed by his Son, who made him Prisoner, and barbarously caused his Eyes to be put out. Thus all was lost, to the great Grief of our Viceroy, who wisely foresaw the Detriment which the Kingdom of Naples would suffer by this Loss, as indeed it happen'd, for it was perpetually expos'd to the Incursions and Depredations of those barbarous Pirates.

S E C T. I.

The Emperor arrives in Naples.

THE Emperor having put an End to the Tunis Expedition, left a Spanish Garrison in Goletta, and fix'd Muleassar, his Tributary, upon the Throne on the 1st of August, with his whole Fleet, set sail for Sicily. The Marquis Del Vasto, and the Princes of Salerno and Bisignano, were very pressing with his Imperial Majesty to go to Naples, to see the Beauty of that City, and to honour it with his Presence. What prompted them to desire to see the Emperor there, among other Things, was, That being disgusted at Toledo's severe Government, by which he kept the Nobility under, they were in Hopes of persuading his Majesty to remove him. The Emperor consented to go, and arriving at Trapani the 20th of August, a Month after he came to Palermo, and then to Messina; and having pass'd the Pace, he came to Reggio: And in his Progress through Calabria and Basilicata, he was treated with great Magnificence by the Princes of Bisignano and Salerno, and by the

the other Nobility through whose Estates he pass'd, and on the 22d of November he arrived at Pietra Bianca, a Place three Miles distant from Naples.

UPON St. Catherine's Day, November the 25th, he made a solemn and triumphal Entry into Naples, being met by a Procession of the Citizens, Clergy, and Nobility in great Numbers, and a vast Concourse of the common People. The Solemnity of this Entry, with the Order in which it was performed, has been described by many Authors, with an Exactness and Particularity more than was sufficient. Gregorio Rosso, who being the Peoples Delegate upon that Occasion, had a great Share in the Ceremony, gives a particular Account of it in his Journals. Summonte and many others, have filled Volumes with it, to whose Accounts we refer the Reader.

BUT we must not pass over in Silence one Thing, which Rosso takes notice of upon this Occasion, viz. the Privilege pretended to by the chief Nobility of the Kingdom, of being cover'd before his Imperial Majesty.

THIS Privilege is reckon'd the greatest that is allowed in Spain; the Nobles, who keep on their Hats in the King's Presence, are Grandeess, and all those to whom it is granted, become Grandeess of Spain by that Concession, which is the greatest Honour that can be conferred upon any Subject. The Grandeur of the Barons of our Kingdom of Naples, did not consist in being cover'd before our Kings, but in the Titles of Princes and Dukes, and in the Offices of the Crown; and those who got such Titles and Offices, had the Privilege to be cover'd in the Presence of our Kings.

WHEN the Emperor, some Years before this, was crown'd at Bologna, where many of our chief Nobility were, his Majesty allowed some of them to be cover'd, but not all of them; that Honour was granted to the Prince of Salerno, the Marquis Del Vasto, and the Marquis *Di Laino*¹. But this being in a foreign Country, he might grant or refuse that Privilege at Pleasure.

BUT his Imperial Majesty being now in Naples, where he was received as King of this Kingdom, all who had Titles pretended to this Honour, and to all other Privileges granted by the other Kings of Naples, Charles's Predecessors, alledging the Example of the Catholick King, who had allowed all such to be cover'd in his Presence when he was in Naples.

BUT the Emperor would not grant it, because it being a Thing introduced in his own Time, that the Spaniards had rais'd this Privilege so high, that in it alone consisted the making a Grandeess of Spain, which was the greatest Dignity of all others, and was never conferr'd on any but the first Quality, and the most famous Generals; for this Reason he would not allow all who had Titles in Naples to be cover'd, that he might not debase the Dignity of Grandeess.

ROSSO says, that the first who submitted to stand uncover'd before the Emperor, was the Marquis Di Tripalda, whose Example was follow'd by many others, as not thinking it proper to insist on a Privilege which their Patron had given up.

BUT what disgusted the Nobility was, the Emperor's Partiality in allowing some to be cover'd, and others not, both in Naples and other Parts of the Kingdom. They who had this Privilege granted them, were the Princes of Squillace and Sulmona, the Dukes of Castrovillari and Nocera, the Marquises of Castelvetero and Vico, and the Count Di Conza: Perhaps others had the same Honour allow'd them, but Rosso, who was an Eye-witness, says, he did not know any other, except the Duke De Montalto, who was of Royal Extraction, the Prince of Bisignano, to whom the Emperor likewise gave the Order of the Golden Fleece, and those who had been allow'd to cover in Bologna, and other Places out of the Kingdom.

IT was the Custom of Spain, that whoever once put on his Hat in the King's Presence, did so always; but Rosso says, That he does not know whether the Nobility of Spain had that Privilege out of the Kingdom.

AFTER the Solemnity of the Entry, and of the Emperor's taking the Oath in the Great Church, to observe the Privileges and Grants formerly given by his Predecessors to the City and Kingdom, his Majesty retir'd to Castel-nuovo, the Palace appointed for his Residence, where, with great Humanity, he began to give Audience to all, hearing every one's Complaints and Grievances against the Barons, and especially those of the Provinces. And a Dispute arising, on Sunday, November the 28th (as the Emperor was going to the Royal-Chapel of the Castle) about

Precedency, the Grandeos of Spain, and those who were cover'd out of the Kingdom, pretending a Right to take Place of the rest; whereas, on the other Hand, the Nobility of Naples insisted on the Custom of their own Kingdom, where they were to have the Precedence of all others: The Emperor, in order to prevent all Dispute, order'd, that there should be no Seats in the Chapel, but that all who came there should stand¹.

HIS Majesty was entertained in Naples, by the Viceroy, with continual Feasting, Plays, Tiltings and Tournaments. The City, at this Time, was full of most noble Personages; for (besides the Spanish Nobility, the Duke D'Alba, the Count of Benevento, and other Nobles of the Kingdom of Naples) the most famous Captains, and other Strangers of great Rank, came thither to pay their Court to the Emperor; the Dukes of Urbino and Florence, Pietro Luigi Farnese, Pope Paul III's Son; four Venetian Ambassadors, and D. Ferrante Gonzaga, Prince of Melfetta; the Pope's two Legates, Cardinals Siena and Cesarino; as also the Cardinals Caracciolo, Salviati, and Ridolfi, were all in Naples, together with D. Francesco d'Estè, Marquis of Padula; and Cardinal Hyppolito de Medicis designed to have been there, but died by the Way at Itri: But that which made our Court most famous and splendid, was an Assembly of the finest and most celebrated Ladies, both for admirable Beauty, and rare Accomplishments; such as Donna Maria d'Arragona, Marchioness of Vasto, a Lady of incomparable Beauty, fine Presence, and singular Judgment and Wit; and, little inferior to her, was her Sister Donna Giovanna d'Arragona, Spouse to Ascanio Colonna, Donna Isabella Villamarino, Princess of Salerno, D. Isabella di Capua, Princess of Melfetta, and Wife to Don Ferrante Gonzaga, the Princess of Bisignano, D. Isabella Colonna, Princess of Sulmona, D. Maria Cardona, Princess of Padula, and Spouse to D. Ferrante d'Estè, D. Clarice Urbina, Princess of Stigliano, the Princess of Squillace, D. Roberta Caraffa, Dutchess of Middaleni, Sister to the Prince of Stigliano, D. Dorothea Gonzaga, Marchioness of Bitonto, D. Eleonora de Toledo, the Viceroy's Daughter, and many great Ladies of Quality of the Kingdom; and there was likewise the fam'd Lucretia Scaglione, who (although she had no Title) was esteem'd and commended above all the rest, for her extraordinary Beauty, Vivacity and Vertue.

BUT while the Emperor was diverting himself, in constant Games and Feasting in Naples, he had an Account of the Death of Francesco Sforza, Duke of Milan, who having left no Issue, the Dutchy devolved to the Emperor, who immediately dispatch'd Antonio de Leva to take Possession of the Dutchy, and the Government of the State. This gave Occasion of fresh Disgust, and renew'd the War with Francis I. King of France; who, having also Intelligence of the Duke's Death, sent immediately Orders to his Ambassador, who was then with his Imperial Majesty, to demand the Investiture of the Dutchy of Milan, for the Duke of Orleans; at which the Emperor being troubled, and not giving an agreeable Answer to the Demand, he soon after got Intelligence, that the most Christian King was preparing to make War against him; and that, besides his Pretensions to the Dutchy of Milan, that King had declared War against his Brother-in-Law the Duke of Savoy, with a Design to invade Piement. And although the Emperor seem'd not to give over his Feasting and Jollity, yet he prepared in good Earnest for War, which he saw he should very soon be obliged to enter into against the King of France, and made ready to leave Naples, and march into Lombardy, or elsewhere, as Occasion should require.

S E C T. II.

The Marquis Del Vasto, and the Prince of Salerno, endeavour the Removal of Toledo from the Government of Naples.

ABOUT the End of this Year, the Practices and Intrigues of the Marquis Del Vasto, the Prince of Salerno, and others of the Nobility, for having the Viceroy removed from the Government, which had hitherto been kept very close, began to appear above Board. This Concert was begun to be carried on, from the Time that that the Emperor was in Sicily, and all the Way as he came to Naples; the Marquis and the Prince labouring all they could to make their Party good against Toledo, by representing his Government as too rigid and severe, and not agreeable to the Genius and State of the Kingdom; insinuating, that his Majesty would do well to remove him. But these bad Offices had no Weight with the Emperor, he being well apprized of the Reason of the Hatred which the Lords bore the Viceroy; nor was Toledo himself a Stranger to their Designs. It is said, that upon the Emperor's Arrival in Naples, when the Viceroy came to wait upon him, his Imperial Majesty received him with this Compliment; I am glad to see you, Marquis, and I find you are not so fat as I was told you were: To which the Viceroy pleasantly answer'd with a Smile, Sir, I don't doubt but I have been represented to your Majesty as a Monster, but I am not such. They did not fail to move the Populace also, to beg of the Emperor to remove him, on the Account of two new Taxes, and his other Severities; and they had also drawn Gregorio Rosso (the Peoples Deputy) to their Party, and therefore we find him, in his Journals, not very favourable to Toledo. This Rosso knew how to manage his Part well; for he says himself, that being call'd to the Emperor, on the 16th of November 1535, and ask'd his Opinion of the Inclinations of the Citizens of Naples, and what he (the Emperor) could do that would oblige them; his Answer was, That they were faithful, and devoted to his Person and Government, and that there was nothing wanting to keep them contented and easy, but to maintain them in Plenty, without being over-taxed, that everyone may be able to live under his own Vine with Safety: And he added, That they had lately been much disgusted on account of the new Taxes imposed upon them by the Viceroy. This Answer was the Occasion, as himself says, of his being removed, the very next Day, from being Deputy, and Andrea Stinca, Accomptant of the Chamber of Accompts, and a Creature of the Viceroy's, put in his Place.

BUT the Viceroy's Enemies did not stop there; for the Emperor, that he might reap some Advantage by his coming to Naples, summoned a Parliament to meet in the Church of St. Lorenzo, on the 8th of January 1536, where, the Barons being assembled, with the Officers of the Kingdom, he made a Speech to them, representing the Necessities of the Crown, and that for the Security of the Kingdom, and the new Wars with which he was threaten'd by the Turk and the King of France, a Subsidy was absolutely necessary. The next Day the Parliament met again, and resolv'd, That in Honour of the Emperor, they would Compliment him with a Million and a half of Ducats: This they did out of Pride and Vanity, without considering their Ability. And indeed, this Donative was so extravagant, that neither in Naples, nor any where else, was there ever such a Thing heard of; and the Emperor seeing the Impossibility of raising it, was obliged to remit the 500,000, and content himself with the Million¹.

THE Deputies met often in St. Lorenzo, to find out Ways and Means for levying this Sum; and they agreed, that the Barons should pay Three-fourths, and the People the Remainder. They likewise met to consult what new Grants and Privileges they should demand in Recompence of so profuse a Donative. They debated about many Demands, but as those Meetings were managed by the Nobility, they resolv'd to take this Opportunity to desire the Removal of Toledo; but to ask it above Board, was against all Decorum due to such a Minister, and not likely to be obtained; they therefore propos'd, amongst the chief Articles, to beg the Removal of the whole Ministry, high and low, that the Viceroy might be included, without naming him. Although the greatest Part of the Nobility concurred in this foolish and indiscreet Proposal, yet the Duke of Gravina, the Marquis of Tripalda, Caspar Pignatelli, and Scipio di Somma oppos'd it; but it was most vigorously contradicted by Andrea Stinca, the People's Elect, and by Dominico Terracina, who having been Elect some Years before, was now made Deputy: So that nothing was concluded, and there were great Debates between Del Vasto and Scipione di Somma, which came to high Words, and even to Reproaches and Injuries².

WHILST these Things were in Agitation in Parliament, the Emperor diverted himself during the Carnival, with Feasting, Plays, and Masquerades; and one Night, as the Marquis Del Vasto attended him in his retiring to the Castle, coming up close to him, he urged many Reasons to his Majesty, to shew how much it was for his Service to remove Toledo from the Government of Naples: But finding, by the Emperor's Answers, that he was not at all inclined to listen to that Proposal, he took a Resolution to absent himself from the Parliament, and only to attend his Majesty at his Diversions. This Behaviour of the Marquis was of great Service to Toledo, because Del Vasto coming no more to the Parliament, his Party flagged; and Stinca the Elect, and Terracina the Deputy, being informed of the ill Offices the Marquis did Toledo with the Emperor, desired an Audience of his Majesty; and being introduced, Stinca began to represent to him, that the Reason why the Nobility were eager to have the Viceroy removed, was, because it had been always their Custom to oppress and despise the People; and that their Pride had increased to such a Pitch, that they not only maltreated the People of Naples, but even the Officers of the Guard, and the Ministers of Justice; that they used to keep Villains in the Porches of their Houses, to insult and abuse People, and sometimes to commit Murder; that it had been a Custom among them to rescue the greatest Delinquents from the Hands of Justice, and to protect Rogues in their Houses; that they never used to pay the Tradesmen they employed, but to abuse and beat them for demanding their Money: And because Toledo had put a Stop to such wicked Practices, and given Justice its due Force, the Nobility were earnest to have him remov'd, which, if his Imperial Majesty should consent to, the old Abuses and Oppressions would soon be renewed, and put in Practice again.

THIS Representation meeting with a favourable Reception from the Emperor, confirm'd him in his Resolution to continue Toledo; and being assured of the Truth of what the Deputies had told him, to take off the least Blot from Toledo's Reputation, he did every Thing in Naples by him, and made his most weighty Affairs pass through his Hands, and heap'd new Favours upon him every Day: And not long afterwards (being intent upon leaving Naples, to return to his other Dominions) at his Departure for Rome, he left Toledo greater Authority than he had been vested with before. The Parliament breaking up, there was no more of that Affair; but having concluded and drawn up One and thirty Heads of Grants and Privileges to be laid before the Emperor, in Favour of the City of Naples, and Four and twenty more for some of the Provinces, and particular Persons; those Grants were confirmed by his Majesty, in a new Parliament held in his Presence in St. Lorenzo, February the 3d, as may be seen at this Day, annexed to the Articles and Grants given from time to time to the City and Kingdom of Naples, by the Kings, the Predecessors of *Charles V.*¹

C H A P. III.

Toledo beautifies the City, and makes many more Regulations. His Care to make it stronger, more healthy and rich. He pursues the same Design with regard to other Parts of the Kingdom, and especially the Sea-Coasts, causing many Towers and Castles to be built to prevent the Inroads of the Turks.

THE Emperor left Naples on the 22d of March 1536, intending to go, by the Way of Rome, to Lombardy, and from thence to Spain, and having left Toledo with full Authority, and greater Power than formerly, the Viceroy undertook the Government, with a Greatness of Mind and Confidence, equal to his Trust.

HE prosecuted with more Vigour the great Designs he had proposed for aggrandizing and beautifying the City of Naples, that it might deserve the Title of the Metropolis of so great a Kingdom; and which he perform'd in a magnificent and splendid Manner. Those Works of his were indeed at different Times; but not to interrupt the Thread of this History, I shall here give them at one View. He had at first proposed to make strait, and pave the crooked and dirty Streets, and to repair the Walls; but the Income of the City not being sufficient to defray that Expence, there was a Necessity to raise a new Tax to carry on the Work; so that having held several Councils in the City for that End, and it being concluded in 1533, to lay a Livre on every Rotolo * of Fish, Salt Flesh, and Cheese¹, a Mutiny ensued, by the Instigation of Fucillo Micone, a Wine Merchant, on account of this new Tax; and though Toledo, with great Intrepidity and Vigour, quelled the Mutiny by the Death of Fucillo and the other Mutincers, yet he did not think it convenient to prosecute his Design at that Time. But having new Occasion in 1535. for Money to defray the Expence of the Preparations which were necessary against Barbarossa, who infested the Coast the 20th of March the same Year, he laid a Tax of a Penny on the Rotolo; and being obliged to have that Money immediately raised, to supply the present Necessity, he took care to levy both this new Tax, and the other of 1533, for paving the Streets (which had not been exacted when it was imposed) and that without any new Tumult. From that Day, as Rosso says², they began to take up the Flint Stones which were in the Streets, and to put Bricks in their Place.

THE Emperor's coming interrupted the Work, but after his Departure it was prosecuted with the greater Diligence. The Viceroy, in order to make the City more healthy, as well as beautiful, caused many under Porches or Sheds to be taken away, because they made the City dark, as also the Pent-houses before the Dwelling-Houses and Shops; he repaired the Common Sewers, giving them a more declining Course towards the Sea; he order'd the Streets to be made straiter and plainer, and so encouraged the Citizens, that every one strove who should signalize himself most in beautifying his House and Palace. He made the City larger and stronger, by carrying the Walls further out, as well towards the Sea, as on the Land Side, and with such wonderful Expedition, that in less than in two Years, he surrounded the whole City with a very thick Wall, with a Terras on the Inside; and towards the Sea, he caused the Wall to be built a good Way into the Water, insomuch, that by this new Work, there was no Vestige of the old Walls and Gates built by King Charles II. and the other Kings of the House of Anjou. The Names of Porta d'ſſi Orſo, the old Porta Reale, Porta Petruccia, Porta del Caſtello, and of that of St. Giovanni a Carbonara were forgotten. He incloſed many Houſes, and Part of Monte S. Eramo and Ecchia, call'd at preſent Pizzifalcone, within theſe new Walls; ſo that the City was beautified and enlarged, twice as much as it had been formerly¹.

HE rebuilt Caſtle S. Eramo, making it (according to the Fortifications of thoſe Days) impregnable; for, beſides a good Garrifon, and Store of Ammunition, the greater Part of it was cut out of the ſolid Rock; the Palace only, and the Citadel, were built of ſquare Stone; and he likewiſe cauſed a Ciftern of a vaſt Diameter to be cut out of the Rock, not inferior to the famous Piſcina Mirabilis of Baja, a magnificent Monument ſtill remaining of the Greatneſs of the antient Romans. The Ditches were cut likewiſe out of the Rock, with ſuch Art and Sumptuouſneſs, that they might deſervedly be compared to the Buildings of Old Rome.

BESIDES the famous Edifice of the Palace of Juſtice, where, as we have ſaid, he aſſembled all the Courts; he built alſo a Royal Palace near Caſtel-nuovo, with pleaſant Gardens for the Dwelling Place of the Viceroy: This at preſent is called the Old Palace (becauſe the Viceroy, the Count De Lemos, ſince that Time, built a new one, greater and more magnificent, not far from the other) at the Side of which, to make it more ſtately, he made a wide Street, which ſtretcheth to the new Porta Reale, at preſent called the Gate of Spirito Santo: This Street to this Day retains his Name, being called Strada di Toledo, or Toledo's Street.

HE enlarged the Arſenal to above twice the Bigneſs it was before, making it ſo large, that ſixteen Gallies may be built in it all at once; and he found out a Contrivance for bringing the Wood to it, with more Eaſe, and leſs Charge.

HE adorn'd the City with many Fountains of Marble, and particularly he erected one in the Piazza di Sellaia, which he called Atlante, from the Statue of Atlas carrying the Globe of the World upon his Shoulders, carv'd by Giovanni de Nola, the moſt famous Sculptor of that Age².

HE likewiſe adorn'd the City, by building new and magnificent Churches and Hoſpitals, to which he was prompted, not only by his natural Greatneſs of Mind, but likewiſe by his great Devotion and Piety towards Things ſacred. He founded the Hoſpital and magnificent Church dedicated to St. James the Apoſtle, the Patron of Spain, for the Conveniency of that Nation; in the Quire of which, in his own Life-time, he erected a ſtately Tomb of Marble, cut with Figures, in Baſſo Relievo, by the above-named Nola. He rebuilt and beautified the Church of St. Nicholas, near the Cuſtom-Houſe. He erected, from the Foundation, the Hoſpital of Santa Maria di Loreto, for Orphan Boys; and another, called St. Catarina, within St. Eligio, for Girls: But that which gave the greateſt Luſtre and Decorum to the City, as well as to Religion, was his Care in ſeeing that the Churches ſhould be well look'd after, and the old Churches repaired; that their Incomes ſhould not be imbezzi'd; that the Priests ſhould attend Divine Service, and all Holy Offices; and as far as was in his Power, he reform'd the exterior Eccleſiaſtical Polity. He order'd, that the Churches, where the Jus Patronatus obtained, ſhould be kept clean and decent, and well ſerved, and all their Revenues, which had been uſurp'd by thoſe who had no Right to them, to be reſtor'd. He made the Priests go decently, in their proper Garbs and Tonſure, under the Penalty of being puniſhed for any Fault, as Laicks. He introduced the Cuſtom (in Uſe to this Day) that when the Sacrament was carried thro' the City to ſick Perſons, it ſhould be carried under a Canopy, with lighted Torches, and with Solemnity; and, by his own Example, to make it the more venerable, if he happen'd to meet it, he, with all his Retinue, accompanied it to the very Place whither it was to be carried.

IN a Word, after the Viceroy had beautified and imbelliſhed the City, he made many other Proviſions for making it more healthful and opulent. Naples, in his Time, was ſubject to many Diſeaſes in the Summer; the chief Occaſion of which was the Corruption of the Air by the standing Waters, which took their Rise from the Territories of Nola, and run towards the Sea through Marigliano, Aversa, Acerra, and Fragola: The Corruption was sometimes so great, that it infected all Terra di Lavoro, or the greatest Part of it. Toledo, to give a seasonable Remedy to this Mischief, ordered a large and deep Canal to be made in the Middle of these Plains, with high Banks, and contriv'd the Canal in such a manner, that all the Water of the Lakes run into it; and, as if it had been one great River, was by it carried into the Sea: And thus the Lakes being drained, Naples became the most healthful City in the World; and for that End, he made all the Country round about to be ploughed and kept cultivated; and he established a Fund, the yearly Income of which was sufficient to keep the Canal constantly clear. Our Forefathers called this Canal Lagno, and at present it is named the Lagni, and the Court of the Royal Chamber takes care of it, and appoints an Overseer to keep it clean and in Order.

HE made likewise many Regulations concerning the Necessaries of Life, and for keeping the City well stored with all Sorts of Grain, and prohibited the Exportation of it, and that none should keep Magazines or Granaries, either of Wheat or Barley, within thirty Miles of Naples; and he introduced the Custom of making Contracts with the Merchants for supplying the City with Corn.

AND, indeed, the Splendor and Magnificence at which the City of Naples has arrived since, must be attributed to him; for it was owing to his good Example, that the other Spanish Viceroys, his Successors, laid it down as a Rule to themselves, not to quit the Government without leaving behind them a Memorial of their Viceroyalty, by some great and magnificent Structures; in which the Dukes D'Alva, the Counts of Lemos, the Medina's, and many others, signalized themselves, as shall be related in the Course of this History: So that by the glorious and splendid Monuments left by those Governors, and by the stately Buildings erected by the new Religious Orders brought since into the City, such as the Theatins, the Jesuits, the Hieronymites, and many others, which having grown excessively Rich, raised magnificent Churches, and vast Palaces rather than Monasteries, and sumptuous Castles instead of Convents, Naples may at present vie with the greatest Cities in Europe, and does not yield to Rome, Constantinople, London, or Paris.

THIS Greatness of Naples, and its being so well inhabited, is owing to Toledo, who by his Magnificence, and his Regulating the Courts of Justice, raised it to the Height it is in at present; although, in some measure, its being so populous, is owing to the ordinary Residence of the Nobility, occasioned by the frequent landing of the Turkish Pirates in those Times upon the Coasts of the Kingdom, which made them abandon their Estates, and come to Naples, to shun the Barbarities and Slavery, which must have been their Fate, if they had fallen into the Hands of those Barbarians. Thus many from the Coast of Amalfi, Citara (a Castle on the Sea-Coast near Salerno) Cilento, Cava, the Island of Capri, and from Calabria, retired to Naples ¹.

C H A P. IV.

Toledo takes the same Care of the Provinces, and the Towns of the Kingdom, occasioned by Solymán's designing to invade it with a formidable Fleet.

ALTHO' the Kingdom, during Don Pedro de Toledo's Government, had not suffered those Miseries in its Provinces, which are the constant Concomitants of open War; yet the Apprehension of the Danger they were in, being threaten'd by two such powerful Enemies, as Solymán and Francis I. King of France, who were confederated together to depress the over-grown Power of Charles V. was worse than War. Solymán, enraged at the Emperor for having defeated his Designs at Tunis, and to revenge his having put his Army to flight, and chased them out of Hungary, fitted out a formidable Fleet in 1537. to conquer the Kingdom of Naples. He was likewise spurr'd on to this Attempt by the French Ambassador, and by Troilo Pignatelli ¹, who being disgusted at the ignominious Death to which Toledo had put his Brother the Commandator, had left the Kingdom full of Revenge, together with many others, who taking Refuge in Constantinople, solicited that Emperor, with much Earnestness, to hasten the Undertaking, representing it as an easy Matter, because Charles being obliged to turn his Arms against the King of France in Lombardy, for the Defence of the State of Milan, it was impossible for him, at the same time, to resist Solymán. The Sultan therefore determined to move with all Expedition, and getting 20,000 Men in Order, he marched from Constantinople, and on the 13th of July the same Year, arrived at Velona; at the same time he had given Orders for fitting out a Fleet of 200 Sail, what Transports, what well-mann'd Ships of War, under the Command of Barbareffa, who was almost as soon at Velona with his Fleet, as Solymán was by Land.

THE Viceroy, who watched the Steps of the Neapolitan Fugitives that had taken Shelter at Constantinople, had received Advice, some Months before, from Scipione di Somma, Lieutenant of the Province of Otranto, of the Intrigues of Pignatelli, and what was doing at the Ottoman Court, and Solymán's Designs; therefore he began speedily to fortify the Sea-Coast of the Kingdom, as well as he could: He wrote immediately to the Emperor an Account of the Turk's Design, desiring him to send him, as soon as possible, some Spanish Infantry for re-inforcing the Garrisons, in order to make Resistance; and in the mean time, he himself had taken care to store them with Ammunition and Provisions. He gave Orders to the Soldiers to repair to their Colours, and being assembled, they incamp'd in the Low Puglia, from whence they could easily send Assistance to all the Coast. He divided the Militia through the different Parts of the City of Naples, to guard the Place; and because it was only to defend themselves against the common Enemy, he made no Difficulty to trust the Citizens with Arms, that they might use them if there should be Occasion: And they, on the other Hand, with much Courage, offered to encounter any Danger, in opposing the implacable Enemy of Christianity. Then he summon'd all the Barons of the Kingdom to assemble, in a Parliament to be held in Castel-nuovo, where he told them the Occasion of their Meeting, the great Danger they were in, and that Solymán having already march'd from Constantinople, with a Design to invade the Kingdom, they were under a Necessity of arming themselves for a vigorous Defence. All the Nobility offered their Concurrence with equal Chearfulness; and the Parliament breaking up, every one prepar'd for War, with the utmost Expedition and Diligence.

IN the mean time 24 Ships arrived at the Port of Naples, full of Spanish Troops; and, not long after, Prince D'Oria, with 25 Gallies, and two Galleons; and these were followed by five other Gallies sent by Pope Paul III. who was very intent upon frustrating Solyman's Designs. This Fleet, being provided with all Things necessary, sail'd towards Messina (having on Board D. Garcia de Toledo, the Viceroy's Son) and steering towards the Levant, D'Oria put the Enemy's Fleet in Disorder. Upon D'Oria's leaving Naples, the Viceroy sent the Spanish Infantry, with some Pieces of Cannon, to Puglia; and having Intelligence of Solyman's Arrival at Velona, he march'd in Person from Naples the 28th of July, accompanied by the Nobility, and a good Body of Horse, and made a General Review of the whole Army at Melfi. Here he received Advice, that the Bassa Luffibeo, landing unawares at Castro, had pillaged that City, and made the Women and young Men Slaves, and killed the rest: And then having attack'd Urgento, had burnt it, with many Villages thereabouts. At the same time Barbarossa, with 70 Gallies, having come to the Coast of Otranto, had landed both Foot and Horse for invading that Province; but Scipione the Lieutenant, being well provided both with Horse and Foot, tho' he would not have been long able to resist so great a Force, yet he made many Skirmishes, and defended himself gallantly. Upon these Advices Toledo march'd his Forces from Melfi to Tarento, to the Assistance of Scipione, where he was no sooner arrived, than he had an Account, that the Enemy had retir'd and re-imbark'd; and some Turkish Prisoners assured him likewise of Solyman's having left Velona to attack the Island of Corfu, and take it from the Venetians.

THE Reason of Solyman's unexpected Retreat, was his having had Intelligence, that all the Coast of the Kingdom was well provided and garrison'd with gallant Soldiers, and that the Viceroy was in the Field with 30,000 Men, and that the Pope was raising Men for re-inforcing him. He had also heard, that D'Oria had destroy'd many of his Gallies; and he was afraid that the Venetian Fleet (although there was a Truce betwixt him and that Republick, yet, by his having detained twenty of their Gallies that Year in the Levant, they might look upon it to be broken) might have Orders to keep a Correspondence with D'Oria, and to unite against him: So that being oblig'd to retire, that he might not shew Cowardice, and hazard his Reputation, he resolv'd to attack Corfu.

THE Enemy being thus retired, the Viceroy, after having given Thanks to the Nobility, and those who had accompanied him in this Expedition, gave them all Leave to return to their own Homes, which they did. But wisely considering that Solyman had not given over his Design upon the Kingdom, and knowing what an Advantage had accrued to it, by being well provided with Men, he resolv'd to fortify all the Places upon the Coast; and, to that End, he visit'd them himself, taking with him good Architects and Ingincers: He gave Orders for building the Castle of Reggio: He inclos'd the City of Cotrone, with Walls and Bulwarks; he caus'd the Castles of Otranto, Lecce, Gallipoli, Trani, Barletta, Brindisi, Monopoli, and Manfredonia to be built; and Vesti, a City situated on the furthest Point of Monte Gorgano, to be fortified: And having in this Progress discovered, That the greatest Part of the Kingdom, and especially the Cities of Puglia, were grievously oppress'd with Debts, so that many of them, by being dispeopled, were render'd incapable of paying the Taxes; he took such effectual Care to remedy that Evil, that in a few Years those Cities were out of Debt, and in full Possession of all the Revenues belonging to them, and were better Peopled than ever, and many more Houses built in them than before: So that by this means Barletta, Trani, Bisceglia, Monopoli, Manfredonia, S. Severo, Rutigliano, Minervino, and many others, discharged their Debts, and redeemed and augmented their Revenues. Then the Viceroy, after the happy Success of this Expedition, having sent the Army to their respective Garrisons and Quarters, return'd himself to Naples; where, at his Arrival, the City, in Gratitude for the signal Service he had done, presented him with a Chain of Gold of curious Workmanship, done at the Publick Charge, and gave him Thanks with great Ceremony, as their Deliverer from so dreadful and potent an Enemy.

BUT

BUT the Viceroy, not thinking he had done enough for the Defence of the Kingdom, did not fail afterwards to fortify the other Cities and Places, till he had made the whole Coast capable of repelling the Incursions of the Turks.

IT was Toledo who prevailed with the Emperor to cause to be built upon the Coasts of the Kingdom, high Towers at small Distances from one another, with a constant Salary for those that had the Charge of them, to the End, that the News of the Landing of any Pirates being quickly communicated from one Tower to another, the Country People being advertised by them, might save themselves. He likewise caused a great Tower to be built upon the Confines of the Kingdom, towards the Estate of the Church, called Porta di Martino severo, for the Security of honest People, and the Punishment of Rogues. And in Abruzzo he rebuilt a Castle, and another in Terra di Lavoro at Capua, as also the old Castle of Baja.

TO him the City of Pozzuolo owes its Preservation; for, without his Care, it had not been remaining upon the Earth, but had been a desolate Field of Sand or Grass, as Cuma, Baja, and Miseno are at this Day: For the Stones, Fire, and Clouds of Smoak and Dust, which, in a most terrible manner, burst out of those Gulphs that open'd in the Plain between Monte Barbaro, and the Lake Averno, during the frequent Earthquakes in 1538, so frightened the Inhabitants of Pozzuolo, that they all fled from the City, with their Families, some by Sea, and some by Land, leaving it quite desolate. Whereupon the Viceroy went directly thither, and halting upon the Hill of St. Genaro, saw the miserable City quite cover'd with Ashes, so that there was scarce a Vestige of a House to be seen; the Inhabitants being determined to abandon the Place, the Viceroy refused to give them Leave to desert so antient a City, and so famous of Old, and therefore he issued a Proclamation, ordering them immediately to return, and exempted them from all Taxes for many Years; and, to encourage them the more, he caused a magnificent Palace, with a strong Tower, and publick Fountains, to be built there. And to make their Commerce the easier with Naples, he repaired the Road between the two Cities, making it larger and smother: He also enlarged the stupendous Grotta (that wonderful Monument of the Roman Greatness) and made it so light, that People could go through it without Torches. He repaired the Baths as well as possible at that Time, and rebuilt the City Walls; and to make it more populous, instead of staying there (as he used to do) only in the Spring Season, he made it his Residence for one half of the Year: And in 1544, when Barbarossa return'd to make new Incursions upon that Coast, and had sacked the Islands of Ischia and Procida, designing to serve Pozzuolo in the same manner, having already begun to cannonade it from his Ships; Toledo's keeping a good Garrison in the City, and marching expeditionly in Person, with all his Cavalry, and a great Multitude of People from Naples, and the adjacent Cities, forced Barbarossa to give over his Design, and immediately set sail towards the Levant, and the Viceroy having thus delivered Pozzuolo, return'd to Naples. Such was his Care in defending all the Cities of the Kingdom against so powerful and troublesome Enemies.

S E C T. I.

The Jews banish'd the Kingdom.

THE provident Care of this Minister, in banishing the Jews in the Year 1540, was thought a Matter of great Importance both to the City and Kingdom: They came first among us in 1200, and increased so much, especially in Calabria, that they peopled large Streets in many Cities, so that they got the Name of the Jewish Cities; and they multiplied to that Degree, and became so rich, that when the Jews of Asia persuaded the Grand Signor to take Possession of King David's Tomb, under the false Pretence of Treasure hid in it, as had been done before, to the great Loss, and intolerable Charge of the Christians, Martin V. was so exasperated against the Jews of the Kingdom, that he prevailed with Queen Jean II. to punish them for it; therefore, on the 18th of October 1429, she gave Orders to Lewis of Anjou, Duke of Calabria, to exact from every Jew in the Kingdom, Men and Women, the third Part of a Crown, which amounted to such a Sum as was sufficient to defray the Charge of recovering the Holy Sepulchre ¹. The second Coming of the Jews was in 1492, upon their being banished from Spain by the Catholick King Ferdinand; and here mixing with the Jews who inhabited those Jewish Cities, they multiplied exceedingly, and became immensely Rich, for they gave themselves to their usual Trade of buying and selling old Cloaths, and other second-hand Goods, and of lending Money upon extravagant Usury ². The Convenience of that kind of Commerce was very great, but the Advantage which the Traders made of it, was insupportable. Gregorio Rosso says ³, That during the Time that Charles V. staid at Naples, many Citizens, and even the Nobility, and Men of Estates, were ruined; for, to support their Grandeur upon that Occasion, they had pledged almost all their Plate and Goods to the Jews, who taking excessive Usury for the Money they advanced, became vastly Rich, and had the Emperor staid longer in Naples, their Gain would have been much greater. Although they had been banish'd out of Spain by King Ferdinand, yet Charles V. suffer'd them in Naples; but to distinguish them from his other Subjects, he ordained that they should all live in one Street, and wear a particular Mark of Distinction upon their Heads, both Men and Women ⁴: But their Usury increasing in Toledo's Time, and the City being full of Complaints against their Extortions, the Viceroy thought proper to represent the Matter to the Emperor, who gave him an Order for their Banishment, so that in 1450, he issued out a Proclamation, ordering them all to leave the Kingdom ⁵. In fine, they left Naples, and a great Part went to Rome, and the rest to other Places; the Streets where they lived at Naples, are called to this Day the Jewish Streets, and those who follow their Trade, are called still by the Name of Jews.

BUT the Remedy used by Toledo, to prevent this Mischief, would have proved worse than the Disease, if his Care, and the Charity of some well-disposed People had not prevented it; for the Convenience of raising Money upon Pledges given to the Jews failing, People that were in Streights had recourse to the Christians, who being allured by so great Gain, began to grow greater Usurers than the Jews had been: And therefore, that the Needy might not want the Convenience of borrowing Money, and that the Citizens might not have an Opportunity of imitating, and, perhaps, exceeding the Rigour of the Jews, the Bank call'd Monte della Pietà was appointed, to recover Pledges from the Jews, and to relieve the Wants of the Poor. In this Bank, to this Day, Money is lent upon Pledges, at moderate Interest, and, as far as ten Crowns, without any Interest at all ⁶.

HITHERTO Toledo had govern'd the Kingdom with such Prudence, to the general Satisfaction of the People, excepting some discontented Nobility, who hated him for his Severity, that he was belov'd, obey'd, and had in great Esteem by all.

BUT a new unhappy Accident troubled all our good Order, and disturbed the Peace of the Kingdom; and if the Love of the Neapolitans towards their Princes, and their Fidelity towards the Emperor, had not put a Stop to the Mischief, worse Calamities, and inevitable Ruin had ensued. This was occasioned by the Viceroy's designing to settle an Inquisition in Naples, during his Government, according to the Custom of Spain. The History of which, as containing one of the most remarkable Events, and as being a signal Instance of the Constancy and Resolution of the Neapolitans, we shall give distinctly, as in its proper Place, and not delay it till we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity, because the Design and Management of that Affair, had more of Policy and Temporal, than of Spiritual and Ecclesiastical Views.

The Inquisition constantly opposed by the Neapolitans, and their Reasons for so doing.

SOME People wonder very justly, how it comes to pass, that the Neapolitans, who are naturally so Religious, as to fall rather into Superstition, and too great Credulity, than to keep a just Medium in Matters of Faith, should all along have shew'd such Horror and Aversion to the Inquisition: How they could, from time to time, suffer such Abuses and Inroachments introduced into the Kingdom by the Court of Rome, and yet never be brought to endure this, which was proposed under such plausible and specious Colours; such as the preserving intire and inviolable their antient Religion, and not suffering it to be corrupted by new Errors and Heresies, which would be attended with irreparable and eternal Perdition. Under the Reigns of Alexander VI. Julius II. Leo X. and Clement VII. they had suffered Abuses from that Court of the grossest Nature. Rome, by her Authority in granting Indulgences, her Prodigality in granting Dispensations, by the Spoils, Reservations, gratiae expectantiae, and exacting the Annats of Benefices, which she bestowed, and by the Charges People were at in getting the Bulls dispatched, through the Multitude of Offices belonging to that Court, had no other View but to drain the Kingdom of Money, as she did other Parts of Christendom by such Arts. The People of Naples had suffer'd grievous Taxes and Decimations to be laid upon the Clergy, the Monasteries, and all Ecclesiasticks within the Kingdom; all which center'd in Rome. The Election of Bishops, the Collation of the greatest Part of Dignities and Benefices, great and small, even to the meanest Arch-Priestships and Canonships, were usurp'd from the Clergy, the People, and the Ordinaries of the Dioceses, and transferr'd to Rome. Nor would these Grievances have been so insupportable, had they been designed for the Salvation of Souls, and the good Government of the Church; but it was quite otherwise, for one Person enjoyed Benefices which were incompatible; and, without any Consideration of the Merits of the Person, Livings were given by Favour, either to Persons incapable by their Age, or utterly void of Learning, and, which was yet worse, of most scandalous Lives¹. The Benefices within the Kingdom of Naples, which by the Canons could not be bestowed but upon Natives, were given to Strangers and Foreigners. There was no care taken, even of the Inroachments surreptitiously made upon the Regal Jurisdiction by the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the Abuses and Corruptions of exorbitant Fees and Taxes, which they exacted from the poor People who had any Suits there. There was no Opposition made to the immense Acquisitions of Real Estates, for the Use of Churches and Monasteries, tho' they saw that all tended to their Ruin; nor to the Violence offer'd them, in being forc'd to sell their Houses to make those Monasteries more magnificent, and very often to make way for a stately Portico or Gallery. They did not mind their being obliged to bear the whole Weight of the Publick Taxes, by the Ecclesiasticks being exempted from them. How the Neapolitans could suffer these and many other Hardships (which I don't mention) and yet boggle so at the Inquisition, that the very Name of it struck them with Horror, is a Thing very strange; and, which is more surprizing, the Abhorrence is so rooted in their Minds, by having been deriv'd from Father to Son, by a Succession of many Years; that neither the Course of many Ages, nor the Endeavours of some of their Kings, who had different Inclinations from them, nor the Intrigues and Arts of the Court of Rome, could ever remove it: Infomuch, that at present, under the benign Influence of a more mild Government, their Resolution being stronger, and better fortified, they don't fear that the strongest Efforts will ever be able to make them stoop.

BUT who would believe that so great a Privilege should be owing, first to the Spaniards, and then to the very Court of Rome? But in order to evince the Truth of this Position, it will be necessary to recapitulate what was said in the XIXth Book of this History, concerning the Origin of the Inquisition, that thereby we may see how it was managed under the Kings of the Family of Anjou, to the Time of Ferdinand the Catholick, in whose Reign they began to abhor it, for the Reasons which shall be assigned; which Abhorrence came to its Height under Charles V. and Philip II. his Son, and continues so to this Day.

AFTER the Emperor Frederick II. by his terrible Constitution Inconsutilem, published against the Patareni and Arnaldisti, and many other Hereticks, which, at that Time, had set up against the Church, because of the Depravity and wicked Lives of the Clergy, had given the greatest Proof of his Rigour to extirpate them; some of them being pertinacious in their Errors, rather than to renounce them, chose to fly to foreign Princes for Protection; and others, affecting a pure Apostolical Life, strict Vertue, and unshaken Constancy, not regarding Prison or Death, resolved to suffer the greatest Punishment and Torments, and even the most cruel Death: And for this Reason they chose to be called Patareni, looking upon themselves to be equal to the Martyrs of the Primitive Church. Their Number much increased, and there was not a City in Italy that was not infected with their Errors. The others, among whom the most considerable were the Albigenses, spread themselves further; for being favoured by the Count of Toulouse, and other Persons of Distinction, they had broach'd their Heresies in many Parts of France.

ABOUT the same time, those two Great Men, Dominick and Francis, very opportunely appeared in Favour of the Church; these, by their Sanctity, made themselves famous every where, and founded the two Orders, of Preaching Fryars, and Fryars Minors; and indeed, they came in a very lucky time to lay the Storm that was like to overset St. Peter's Ship: But they took different Methods. Francis, in Opposition to the Patareni, was resolved, by his own Example, to shew what was the true Apostolical Life, and the right Imitation of Christ, by founding his Order on a rigid Poverty, Humility, and a holy Life and Conversation, that thereby he might bring back into the right Way, those that had gone astray.

DOMINIC, by Birth a Spaniard, of the noble Family of the Gusmans, undertook, with his Fraternity, to run down the rest, especially the Albigenses, against whom he disputed, preached and declaimed with great Zeal, and, by his Sermons, endeavoured to convince them of their Errors, and to warn the People not to let themselves be impos'd upon by them. But finding that his Disputes and Preaching, had little Effect upon those obstinate People, he thought the best way to extirpate them, was to have recourse (as they had done) to the Assistance of Princes; and being made Inquisitor General by Pope Innocent III. for that Purpose, he made Application to the Count of Montfort, and to many of the Spanish, German, and French Nobility; who, being join'd by a great Number of Prelates, and some Troops, enter'd into a Crusade against them, and scowr'd the Country in order to destroy them; and in passing through Narbonne, and other Places, they defeated many of them, and put them to Death. And Dominic, not content with that, came to Rome, and in many Sessions of the Lateran Council, declaimed against the Albigenses, and got their Doctrine to be condemn'd as Heretical.

FROM this Beginning came the Custom of sending Inquisitors from the Pope, into Places suspected of Heresy; at least in peaceable Provinces, where the Hereticks did not assemble in Troops, and where there was no Occasion for Cruisades: And because Dominic's way of Management was more agreeable to the Court of Rome, than that of Francis, the Office of the Inquisitors was given to the Dominicans, who, being join'd with the Secular Magistrate, inquired into all Errors, and those who were convicted of them, were by their Sentence pronounced Hereticks, and then delivered over to the Secular Power, to be burnt, or otherwise punished.

IN the Reign of the Swedish Race, Frederick II. and Manfred would not allow the Pope to send Inquisitors; but (as we have related in the XIXth Book) they made use of the Prelates of the Kingdom to take Cognizance of the Matter of Right, and as to the Fact and the Punishment, they were tried by the ordinary Magistrates.

THE Kings of the House of Anjou, as Vassals to the Roman Pontiffs, admitted Inquisitors from Rome into this Kingdom, who, though they did not keep any fix'd Court, yet they went through the Provinces by Leave from those Kings, who also bore their Charges.

THE Kings of the Family of Aragon, began to limit their Concession, and but very rarely allowed them to come into the Kingdom, and when they did, they obliged them to give an Account of their whole Proceedings; nor were they suffer'd, without a Special Licence from the King, and the Approbation of the Civil Magistrate, to execute any Sentence.

AND although they endeavoured, in the Beginning of the Reign of Ferdinand the Catholick, to establish their Authority better, and to shake off the Dependance they had been under before; yet the Neapolitans, to obviate every Insinuation of that Kind, obliged the Great Captain to consent to their Demands, insomuch, that when he took Possession of the Kingdom in the Name of Ferdinand, who had given him most ample Authority, he promised that there never should be either Inquisition or Inquisitor in the Kingdom: So that the Great Captain was very watchful in guarding against the Incroachments of the Court of Rome, which was very ready to lay hold of all Opportunities. And therefore, in 1505. he wrote to M. Foces, giving him an Account, that the Bishop of Bermejo, the Pope's Commissary and Inquisitor, had applied to him, in his Holiness's Name, to have some Women put in Prison, who were accused of Heresy, and had fled from Benevento to Munfredda, in order to make their Escape to Turkey; the Captain therefore gave such Orders to secure them, and when they were in Custody, to let him know, that he might give him farther Instructions about them. In like manner, the Count of Belagera, in 1507. wrote to Francis Viceroy, of Ferranania, quarrelling him for going to Barletta, to hold an Inquisition upon some Persons without his Knowledge, or shewing his Commission; charging him, at the same time, to stop all Proceedings, and to come to him forthwith, and shew his Authority, otherwise, he assured him, that he would take such a Course with him, as should not be to his Honour.

THIS was the Method of Proceeding in the Beginning of Ferdinand's Reign, with relation to such as were accused or suspected of Heresy; and such an Inquisition was not frightful, because the Inquisitors had no fix'd Tribunal; their Commissions were laid before the King's Council, and they could not put them in Execution without the Royal Assent; they went but seldom through the Provinces, and did nothing without the King's Permission, and the Assistance, Advice, and Favour of the Secular Magistrate; nor did they occasion any Noise or Tumult: Besides, there were no Remains of the old Patarens in Italy, much less in our Kingdom; and there was not the least Suspicion of any new Doctrine contrary to that of the Church of Rome: So that the Inquisition of Rome, not to be thought idle, began to take Cognizance of some Crimes which did not require an extraordinary Tribunal, but might have been tried, as formerly, by the ordinary Tribunals. For the most Part the Inquisitors made themselves Judges of Blasphemy, which they brought into their Court under the Notion of Heresy, although it had been uttered through bad Habit, Rage, or Drunkenness, or even through Ignorance and Folly. Thus one, who to commend his Wine, had said, That even Christ might drink of it, did not escape their Clutches; whoever cursed the Bells, for the Noise they made, was sure to incur their Censure: If any Person presum'd to declaim against the Immoralities of Priests or Monks, or mock'd, ridicul'd, or cursed them, he did not escape unpunish'd. And that they might not want Work, they took under their Cognizance, Fornice-telling, Conjuring, and many other foolish Arts, practis'd by silly old Women, rather to trick People of their Money, than out of Disrespect to Religion. They brought likewise into their Court, Crimes proceeding from the Frailty of Human Nature; as also Bigamy, Night Assemblies, in which a thousand Lewdnesses were committed, under Colour of Religion: These, and many other Crimes, committed rather through Frailty, than Contempt of Religion, were by them deemed to be Heretical. In short, they did not trouble themselves about correcting Opinions and false Doctrine, but all their Business was to correct Manners and Discipline; so useless was the Inquisition become, that there was no Reason to be afraid of it, nor was there any Occasion for it, either in Naples or elsewhere.

BUT although Italy was very easy with respect to this Tribunal, it made a terrible Noise in Spain. King Ferdinand, after having banish'd the Moors, and conquer'd the Kingdom of Granada, had erected there a frightful Inquisition, in order to purge Spain of all Remains of Moors and Jews, and to extirpate them intirely. This Court was managed by the Dominicans, who, under pretence of Zeal for Religion, exercised the greatest Cruelties imaginable; banishing, imprisoning, putting to Death, and confiscating, without Mercy: And what raised the greatest Horror, were the tragical Methods, the lugubrious Apparatus, the so many Crosses, the terrible Invectives, Imprecations, Conjurations, Exorcisms, and the lighted Piles of Wood for burning the Guilty: So that Death itself was not so terrible as the hideous Apparatus. When any Person was accused, even upon the smallest Suspicion, he was clapt into a dark Dungeon, seen by no-body, and fed with Bread and Water, and very often without knowing what he was accused of. They were not told who had been Evidences against them; for after they were once accused, they were not allowed to exculpate themselves: Their Goods were immediately confiscated, and if they were convicted (according to the severe Laws of that Court) or confess'd the Facts laid to their Charge, as some did, to avoid the grievous Torments they were put to, although they had never been guilty of the Crimes, then they were condemn'd to be burnt alive. Others were sentenced to perpetual Exile; but all of them forfeited their Estates, and both the Guilty, and also their Heirs, were branded with perpetual Infamy, and doom'd to Beggary¹.

THESE terrible Proceedings in Spain against the Jews and Moors, coming to the Ears of the Italians, and especially the Neapolitans, gave them an incredible Abhorrence for the Inquisition. It happen'd, that King Ferdinand suspecting that many Moors and Jews, who had escaped his Hands, had taken Shelter in the City of Naples, and in other Parts of that Kingdom, resolved to erect an Inquisition there, dependant on that in Spain, in order to exterminate those Infidels: And if any Credit is to be given to some Letters of that King's, taken notice of by *Ludovico Paramo*², and said to be written in 1504, it appears, that he recalled the Grants and Privileges given in his Name by the Great Captain, when he took Possession of the Kingdom for Ferdinand, with a Design to settle the Inquisition amongst us; but that the Neapolitans, frighten'd at the very Proposal, from an Apprehension of the Misery and Ruin which such a Tribunal must introduce, were it once received, determin'd firmly to oppose it, even at the Hazard of forfeiting their Lives and Fortunes at the King's Pleasure; to whom they got it represented, that there was no great Occasion for such a Court in Naples, where the People were so devout and religious; and as to the few Moors and Jews who had taken Shelter there, other Methods might be taken to get rid of them: In short, they protested, that they would not, upon any Account, accept of that new Court; and when King Ferdinand, not rightly apprized of their Obstinacy, sent some Inquisitors from Spain to Naples, they were at first very ill received by the Neapolitans, and afterwards expell'd the Kingdom with Ignominy³.

AT last, Ferdinand, seeing them so head-strong, that he might not engage himself in greater Quarrels, and run the Risque of losing the Kingdom, gave over his Design, and contented himself with publishing an Edict against the *Jews*¹: On the contrary, he promised the Neapolitans, that for the Future, he never would suffer an Inquisition to be introduced amongst them, as two very grave Authors, *Zurita*² and *Mariana*³ testify. This Declaration of his was approved by the Pope, so during the rest of Ferdinand's Reign, the Name of the Inquisition was not so much as mentioned. The Neapolitans were now as much satisfied, as they had been before terrified at this Tribunal; and their Abhorrence to it was such, that they transmitted it down to their Posterity, like an Heritage, by their last Wills, which still keeps up the Aversion and Abhorrence to the very Name of it.

S E C T. I.

The Inquisition attempted anew under the Emperor Charles V. but constantly rejected.

THE new Heresy of Martin Luther being broach'd during the Reign of Charles V. occasion'd new Jealousies, and fresh Attempts. In the Year 1520. new Doctrines were spread abroad in Germany, especially in Saxony, first against the Pope's Authority, and then against the Church of Rome itself. What had given Occasion for these Novelties in Germany, was the licentious Use of the Papal Authority practis'd by Leo X. who, by the Advice of Cardinal Santiquatro, had dispersed through all Parts of Christendom, without Distinction of Time and Place, Plenary Indulgences, not only for the Benefit of the Living, but also for delivering the Souls of the Departed out of Purgatory: Which Indulgences were known to be granted for no other Reason but to raise Money¹; and being distributed with much Imprudence by the Commissaries employed for that Purpose (the greatest Part of which purchased from the Court of Rome the Power of selling them to the People) gave such Scandal, especially in Germany, where they were sold at low Rates, and the Power of freeing Souls out of Purgatory, stak'd at Game in the publick Inns, that in many Places these Practices raised the Indignation of the People. But the Reason why these new Doctrines began in Germany, and no where else, was, that Leo having bestowed the Profits of the Indulgences granted in Saxony, and that Part of Germany which extends itself to the Sea, upon his Sister Magdalena, she, in order to reap the more Advantage by the Pope's Gift, gave the Charge of preaching up Indulgences, and exacting the Money for them, to Bishop Aremboldus, a fit Minister for such a Commission, who exercised it with great Avarice and Extortion, giving Power to publish the Indulgences, to such as undertook to raise the most Money. And though it had been the Custom, that the Augustin Friars had the Dispensing of the Pope's Indulgences in Saxony, Aremboldus's Delegates would not employ them, because they were too well used to that Trade to answer the Bishop's Expectations, or pay more than ordinary for them; they therefore chose the Dominican Order for their Tools: These preach'd up many Novelties in publishing the Indulgences, and gave great Scandal by extolling the Value of them to the People, above what had ever been said of them before, on purpose to raise their Desire of purchasing them.

THESE Practices stirr'd up Martin Luther, a Friar of the Order of S. Augustin, to inveigh, first against the Collectors, reproving their new Excesses; and afterwards, being provok'd by them, and engaging in Dispute upon the Subject of Indulgences (a Matter but little examined into in the preceding Ages) he found, that his Adversaries did not use any other Argument in Defence of them, but the Pope's Authority, therefore he began to despise those Concessions, and to call in question the Pope's Power of granting them; and, in the Heat of Dispute, the Papal Authority was as much debas'd by him, as it was rais'd too high by the others: And his Audience still increasing, by the Inclination the People had to his Side of the Question, by Degrees he proceeded openly to deny the Pope's Supremacy.

IN a short Time his Doctrine spread, and was favourably received, so that being encouraged by the Applause of the People, and the Favour of the Duke of Saxony, he not only rail'd immoderately against the Pope's Power, and the Authority of the Church of Rome, but falling into the Errors of the Bohemians, in process of Time he began to remove the Images out of the Churches, and plunder sacred Places of what had been dedicated to them; he allow'd profess'd Monks and Nuns to marry, supporting the Practice, not only by the Strength of his Authority and Arguments, but likewise by his Example. He denied Purgatory, and consequently Prayers for the Dead; he asserted that the Pope's Authority did not extend beyond the Limits of the Bishoprick of Rome, and that every other Bishop had the same Authority in his own Diocese, as the Pope had in his; he despised the Decisions of Councils, the Writings of the Doctors of the Church, all the Canon Laws, and Decrees of the Popes, appointing all Things to be decided by the Old Testament, the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and what is comprehended under the Name of the New Testament, and the Epistles of St. Paul; but even to these he gave new and suspicious Glosses, and unheard-of Interpretations.

NOR did his Folly, and that of his Followers, end here; for, almost all Germany adhering to him, they fell every Day into more abominable and dangerous Errors. He proceeded to strike at the Sacraments, to despise Fasting, Penances, and Confession; and his Followers (in some respect disagreeing with him) began to invent Diabolical Opinions concerning the Eucharist, which being founded upon rejecting the Authority of Councils, and the Doctors of the Church, made way for every new Invention, and perverse Interpretation.

THIS new Doctrine increased in many Places, even out of Germany; for by it People being freed from the Obligation of many Austerities, were allowed a more easy and libertine Life. Ulric Zuinglius, a Canon of Zurick in Switzerland, having embraced this Doctrine, had, by his Preaching, spread it over all that Country, and being in great Credit there, he was heard by great Numbers, and made wonderful Progress.

THUS whilst the Princes of Europe were engaged in War, the Affairs of Religion suffer'd many Changes in several other Places: In some, by the publick Decrees of the Civil Power, and in others by the Mob. In Bern they called a publick Assembly of their own and foreign Divines; and after a Debate of several Days, they accepted the Doctrine set up at Zurick: And in Basil, all the Images were burnt and destroyed, and the new Religion was established by popular Sedition. The Example of Bern was followed by Geneva, Constance, and other neighbouring Places; and in Strasburgh, after a publick Dispute, Mass was forbidden by a publick Decree.

THIS Poison began to spread, though secretly, in Italy, as it did openly in France; for the Italians seeing such Corruptions in the Ecclesiasticks, and the Court of Rome, believed that these Innovations were so many Judgments from Heaven, to punish such gross Abuses as they saw every Day committed, and therefore many embrac'd the Reformation; and in private Houses in many Cities, especially in Raenæ, a City belonging to the Pope, the Papal Authority was preach'd down, and the Number of Lutherans increased daily, who took the Name of Evangelists.

WHAT contributed much to the Spreading of this new Doctrine, was the Learning of Philip Melancthon, a faithful Disciple of Luther, who, finding that his Eloquence, and his Reputation for polite Knowledge, got him many Followers, he employed all his Talents and Learning in exposing and ridiculing the Scholastick Divinity; and being admired by the Ignorant, he made them easily believe, that the Doctors of the Church of Rome understood neither Religion nor polite Learning: By these Arts many were taken, particularly some Preachers of these Times in Italy, who set up for Masters of Eloquence, and had got a Smattering of Learning.

THE Emperor Charles V. seeing that the Doctrine of Luther had not only got footing in Germany, but had also infected Italy, being then at Naples, on the 4th of February 1536, published a severe Edict, and ordered it to be proclaimed in all his other Dominions, forbidding all his Subjects, upon Pain of Death and Forfeiture, feiture, to have any Dealing, or Communication, with any Person infected, or suspected to be tainted with the Lutberan Heresy¹. And before his Departure, he recommended to Toledo, above all Things, to take Care that it might not be suffer'd to enter the Kingdom committed to his Charge.

BUT the very Remedy that was applied to this Mischief, occasioned the Growth of it. One Barnardino Occhino, a Capuchin Friar of Sienna, had at this Time the greatest Reputation, both for Learning, Eloquence, and Austerity of Life, and was the most celebrated Preacher in Italy; this Friar had a new Method of Preaching, for he did not use the Scholastick Divinity, and other Extravagances (as was the general Practice) but his Discourses were full of Spirit and Life, and delivered with Earnestness and Zeal, which procured him not only great Applause from the People, but made him very acceptable to the Italian Princes: But he was in his Heart a Lutberan, and secretly spread that Doctrine, but so cunningly veiled, that no-body suspected him. The Neapolitans hearing of the Fame of this Fra' Bernardino, sent to invite him to come and preach in Naples during the Lent 1536. He came thither to the great Satisfaction of the City, where the Emperor residing at that Time, his Admirers had a great Desire that so great a Prince should hear him. He preached at St. Giovanni Maggiore, with such Applause and Admiration, that he drew all the Audience from the other Preachers, the whole City flocking to hear him. And *Gregorio Rosso*², who was an Eye-witness, says, That in those Days of Lent, whilst the Emperor staid (for he left Naples before the End of it) his Majesty went often to hear him preach at S. Giovanni, with great Satisfaction; for, as he said, he preached with such Spirit, and so much Devotion, that he made the very Stones weep.

AFTER the Emperor's Departure, Fra' Bernardino continued to preach, and to sow some Seeds of Lutberanism, with so much Dexterity, that it could not be discover'd but by the Learned, and those of good Judgment. The Viceroy, who as a Spaniard, was a great Admirer of the Scholastick Divines, who did not much relish this new way of preaching the Gospel, being advised by them, that Fra' Bernardino was secretly instilling the Lutberan Heresy; ordered the Vicar of Naples to inform himself dextrously of the Truth of this Accusation, and to guard against the Consequences of it. The Vicar afraid, in order to secure himself, sent the Friar an Order not to preach any more, without declaring publicly in the Pulpit his Opinion concerning those Errors which were laid to his Charge, but the Friar being a Man of Learning and Eloquence, defended himself so well, that he was allowed to preach during that Lent, and he not only removed all Suspicion of his Doctrine, but gained great Reputation, and many Followers, who having imbibed his Doctrine, taught it privately to others after his Departure.

BUT the Neapolitans had been so much taken with him, that about three Years after he had been gone, they very earnestly solicited him to return and preach in the Cathedral of Naples; and being come, it was observed by the Judicious, that in his Discourses he was more cautious, and made use of ambiguous Words, that he might be able to defend himself in case he was attack'd. The new way of preaching upon the Holy Scriptures, gave a Handle to many to dispute about them, to study the Gospels, and to argue about Justification, Faith, and Works; about the Pope's Power, Purgatory, and such like Difficulties, as before had only been handled by great Divines, and in the Schools; but by his Sermons, being become familiar to the People, they came to be the common Discourse of Laicks, and talk'd of by Men of little Understanding, and less Learning: Every Cobler in his Stall took the Liberty to discourse of St. Paul's Epistles, and of the most difficult Passages in them; and, which was worse, at his Departure, he left some faithful Disciples behind in Naples, and many infected with his pernicious Doctrine, as he had done through all Italy where he had preached.

THERE were at the same Time in Naples, some Divines and famous Preachers of other Orders, who were Favourites of the Viceroy, and no way tainted with this new Doctrine; on the contrary, they opposed it, and used all their Industry to let others see the Poison of it, that they might abhor it. Amongst others, Fra' Angelo di Napoli, of the Reform'd Franciscan Order, a Man well read in Divinity, and the Platonick Philosophy, but above all, an eminent Preacher. This Man was in great Credit with Toledo, who chose him for his Confessor, and would have raised him to greater Dignities, had not Death prevented his Design; but he order'd a handfom Monument to be erected for him in the Monastery Della Croce (where he staid) with an Inscription, which is yet to be seen. There was likewise in great Reputation, Fra' Girolamo Seripando, a Nobleman of the Seggio Capuana, of the Order of St. Augustin, a learned and good Man, a great Preacher, and of consummate Wisdom and Prudence, infomuch, that at a general Chapter held in Naples in 1539, he was made General of his Order, and being much esteem'd by Toledo, was by his Interest made Archbishop of Salerno, and afterwards had the Dignity of Cardinal conferr'd on him by Pope Pius IV. This was he, who, out of Love to his native Country, at his Death, left his great Library, furnished with famous, rare, and foreign Manuscripts, to the Convent of St. *Giovanni à Carbonara*¹; which was one of the greatest Ornaments of this City, long since pillaged by the very Monks who had the Care of it; and lately (to the Grief of all good Men) by others from whom it was little expected. There likewise flourished at this Time, Frate Ambrogio di Bagnoli, of the Order of Preaching Friars, a notable Orator, and afterwards Bishop of Nardo, whose Statue in Marble, with an Inscription, is yet to be seen in the Church of the Holy Ghost: Fra' Teofilo di Napoli, a great Disputant, and eminent Preacher, who pronounced the Funeral Oration for the Death of the Empress, which happen'd this Year; Fra' Agostino di Trivigi, and many others, who by Disputing, Preaching and Teaching, being favoured by the Viceroy, were at great Pains to hinder the new Doctrines, which were secretly planted, from taking Root.

ON the other Hand, there were not wanting many, who, with great Dexterity, and in Sheep's Cloathing, endeavoured, both by Disputing and Teaching, to establish them in Naples. Some, according to the new Scheme, had begun to read publicly St. Paul's Epistles, in the Exposition of which, they foisted in the new Doctrine; of which Number the most famous were, Giovanni Montalcino, a Friar Minor, Lorenzo Romano, a Sicilian, an Apostate Augustin Monk, and Pietro Martyre Vermiglio, a Priest and Canon Regular, a Native of Florence, on whom Thuanus in his History, does not forget to make an Elogium.

FRA' GIOVANNI had already caused himself to be suspected of Heresy, not only by his expounding the Epistles, but by his disputing whole Days together with Father Teofilo di Napoli, his Antagonist and Rival, whom he used ill, with sharp and biting Repartees; and the Event shew'd his being guilty, for some Years afterward, being seized at Rome, he was convicted and put to Death. Peter Martyr, much more famous, expounded the Epistles of St. Paul in the Church of St. Peter ad Ara, in Naples, with great Learning and Eloquence; where he had such Reputation, and so great an Audience, that whoever did not attend his Lectures was reckon'd no good Christian. He had drawn many into his Opinions, among the rest a certain Catalan called D. John Valdes, who was also an intimate of Fra' Bernardino da Siena; but by the Vigilance of the Viceroy, and of others, who were jealous of Peter, his Discourses were strictly and nicely examined, which put a Stop to his Progress; for one Day, explaining that Passage in St. *Paul*², Si quis autem superædificat, &c. although he did it with much Art, and many Protestations and Reserves, he gave great Jealousy that his Doctrine was not sound with respect to Purgatory; which coming to the Viceroy's Ears, he was prohibited to preach any more: So that finding he was disappointed of Success in Italy, and at last being informed that they were lying in wait for him in Rome, he made his Escape out of Italy, and took Sanctuary among the Lutherans in Strasburgh, where he became a famous Promoter of that Doctrine, as is well known to the World. Lorenzo Romano staid in the Kingdom, first in Caserta, where, and in the neighbouring Cities, he secretly instill'd the Errors of Zuinglius; afterwards he went to Germany, where having been better instructed, in 1549 he return'd to Naples, and began privately to teach Melancthon's Logick: He expounded the Psalms, and St. Paul's Epistles, and a Book published in those Days, called The Benefits of Christ. But soon after he was discovered, and being cited by the Inquisitors, he fled, but in the Year 1552, he went of his own accord to Rome, and presented himself to Cardinal Teatino, to whom he confess'd his Errors, and likewise discovered, that he had many Disciples in the City and Kingdom of Naples, amongst whom were many Persons of great Rank, Ladies of Quality and Condition, who studied Human Learning; and being sentenced to make a publick Recantation in the Cathedrals of Naples and Caserta, he was order'd (after his performing that) to return to Rome to do further Penance.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, Toledo's Watchfulness, and the Care that was taken, there was still Fear that Naples might be corrupted by their Followers, who propagated their Doctrine with much Art and Secrecy; and many other Preachers came thither, who endeavoured to spread the same Errors which were imbib'd by great Numbers, some out of Ignorance, others out of Malice: So that they began to form Congregations and Conventicles; the Head of which was Valdes the Spaniard, who pretended to understand and explain the Scriptures, giving out that he was enlighten'd by the Holy Ghost for that Purpose. By this Pretence he drew many after him, so that he had not only instill'd his Poison into the Hearts of some of the Nobility, but had infected some of the greatest Ladies in Naples; and it was thought that the famous Vittoria Colonna, Widow of the Marquis Di Pescara, and Julia Gonzaga, were poison'd with Valdes's Doctrine, by the strict Intimacy they had with him.

WHILST the Affairs of Religion were come to this Pass in Naples, about the Year 1541 and 42, News was brought that Father Occhino had declared himself a Lutheran, and fled from Italy, and taking Shelter in Geneva, had join'd that Party. This Apostacy of Occhino created much Uneasiness, not only in Naples, but over all Italy; for he being look'd upon to be a Man of Probity and sound Doctrine, now that they saw the contrary, they began to be afraid that his Preaching had done more Harm than Good, and the Disciples he had left in Naples, and over all Italy, were the more suspected; to whom, that they might continue stedfast in his Doctrine, he wrote some Homilies in the Vulgar Tongue, which, by a particular Letter, he dedicated to his native Country Italy, in which he declared, That in Italy, Liberty he had preach'd Christ mask'd, but now, since he could not preach him by Word of Mouth naked, as the Father had sent him to us, and as he was crucif'd, he did it by his Pen, in these his Writings; many Copies of which were dispers'd through Italy and Naples, and were in the Hands of many.

AT the same Time came out some printed Books, without any Author's Name, one of which was called, The Seminary of the Scriptures, and the other, The Benefits of Christ; and there appeared likewise some Works of Melancthon and Erasmus. At first no notice was taken of those Books, and for some Months they were dispers'd every where: But the Viceroy, being inform'd of the Mischief they did, prohibited them all, and order'd them to be burnt publicly; and being all put into a Heap by Father Ambregio di Bagnoli, they were burnt before the great Gate of the Archbishop's Palace, in the Sight of the People; and he published a severe Edict against all such as should keep them, or other heretical Books, or read or procure them. This Rigour quieted Matters so, that there was no more Noise about such Books; and although many spoke of the Scriptures, it was with more Modesty and Reserve than before.

FOR this End the Viceroy Toledo, on the 11th of October 1544. published an Edict, whereby he ordained, That the Books of Divinity, and of the Holy Scriptures, which had been printed Twenty-five Years before that Time, should not be reprinted; and those that were printed, should not be kept nor sold, before they had been revised by the Chaplain Major, whose Business it was to see if they were fit to be published. He likewise prohibited all the Books of Divinity, and of the Holy Scriptures, that should be printed without the Author's Name, and all those whose Authors were not approved of.

THIS Apprehension of introducing the German Heresy into Naples, and the Viceroy's Care to prevent it, made all Sort of Learning suspected, and was the Reason that Literature did not make such Progress with us, as in France and other Places, either with respect to the Law or other Sciences. There were only some Remains of the Academy of Pontano, which was supported by a few: But this did not proceed from want of Inclination in the Neapolitans; for if they had not been hinder'd by Toledo's Jealousy, many noble Genius's would have encouraged Learning, by founding new Academies, as they had begun to do; for in the Year 1546. the Nobility of the Seggio di Nido, in imitation of what was doing in Sienna, and other Cities of Italy, erected an Academy in Naples, of Latin, and Italian Poetry, of Rhetorick, Philosophy, and Astronomy; for which, under the Name of the Sireni, they prepared a handsome Apartment on a Level with the Court-yard of St. Angelo a Nido, and made Placido di Sangro the Principal of it, and the Members were the Marquis Della Terza, Trojano Caraniglia, Count of Montella, the famous Antonio Epicuro, Antonio Grifone, Mario Galeota, Giovan-Francesco Brancalone, a celebrated Physician, a good Philosopher, and an eloquent Orator, and other Lovers of Learning. In imitation of Nido, the Seggio Capuana founded another, under the Name of the Ardenti; and another was erected in the Court-yard of the Annunciata, by the Name of the Incogniti. But these were scarce begun when they were suppressed; for Toledo, unwilling at that Time, under Colour of advancing Learning, to suffer so frequent Meetings and Assemblies of Learned Men, ordered the Collateral Council to forbid them. The Reason why these Academies were so suddenly suppressed, was a Rule laid down, That every Member should read a Lecture, in Disputing, upon which afterwards (although the Subject were Philosophy or Rhetorick) they often dropt the Subject, and fell into Questions of Scripture and Divinity, and therefore all those Schools were forbidden and abolished.

WHENCE it came, that the Middle and End of this Century, did not produce such Learned Men as the Beginning of it, and the End of the preceding: Of Philosophers and Physicians, only Agostino Nifo, and Antonio and Bernardino Telesio, two Calabrians, were famous, who therefore yet were not able to make a Stand against the Scholasticks, or discredit their Master Aristotle. There were some few Poets, but those not to be compared to the Poets of the preceding Age.

HENCE likewise it came, that all Literature being suspected, our Civilians could not imitate the French (who taught the Laws in their Schools, with Purity and Politeness) but went on in the old Form and Manner. Besides the Courts of Justice were raised so high, that the Number of Lawyers increased, who gave no manner of Jealousy, being more intent upon gaining Money, than upon improving in Learning, or the Study of Letters.

THIS was the State of Affairs in 1546, and it seem'd by the Viceroy's Care, and the Precautions taken, that there was no Occasion for any other Thing to remove all Apprehensions of introducing new Doctrines, contrary to the old Religion. But Toledo, thinking what had already happen'd was a Business of the last Importance, had given the Emperor a distinct Account of the whole, advising him to provide effectual Remedies for such dangerous Evils. The Emperor, who was an Eye-witness of the Disorders and Revolutions occasioned in Germany by the new Doctrine, thought it necessary (lest the same Disturbances should happen in his other Dominions depending on the Monarchy of Spain) to apply an effectual Remedy; and the best he could think upon for putting an End to the Mischief, was to erect a Tribunal of Inquisition in his other Dominions, like that in Spain, that thereby, the People being terrified, might think of living as formerly; therefore he wrote to the Viceroy, to use his utmost Endeavour to introduce the Inquisition into Naples, but he injoin'd him to manage it with all the Art and Dexterity imaginable, so as not to provoke the People, and to cover his Design with fair Pretences, and mild Methods. The Emperor had already experienc'd how dangerous it was to force it upon the People; for having endeavoured to settle the Inquisition in Flanders, in a short time he saw that Country turn'd topsy-turvy, and almost dispeopled; for many had such Abhorrence to that Tribunal, that they left their native Country, and chose rather to be Fugitives elsewhere, than submit to it: So that he was forc'd to give over his Design, and there was no more mention of the Inquisition in Flanders. The Viceroy had bethought himself of this Remedy before he received these Instructions; but knowing that the Name of the Inquisition had always been odious to the Neapolitans, and that neither the former Viceroy, nor King Ferdinand himself, had been able to effect it, although it had often been attempted; his Answer to the Emperor was, That the Enterprize was very difficult, but that he would employ all his Art, and greatest Cunning to bring it about; and in such a manner as it should not be thought to proceed, either from his Imperial Majesty, or from himself.

ABOUT

ABOUT this Time, Pope Paul III. finding that the Infection was still spreading in Italy, added fresh Vigour to the Inquisition of Rome, and, by the Emperor's Connivance, sent Deputies from that Tribunal through all the Provinces of Italy, but they were received, upon Condition, that they should proceed by the ordinary Course of Justice, in producing Witnesses; and above all, that they should not proceed to the Confiscation of Goods.

TOLEDO thinking, that by making it appear as if the Attempt had been contrived in Rome, and not by him, and that under that Colour he might cover his own Design, by means of Cardinal Borgia, his Relation, one of the Inquisitors of Rome, procured, that, as had been done in other Provinces of Italy, a Deputy should be sent to Naples, with the Pope's Brief, empowering him to proceed by way of Inquisition, against the Clergy both Regular and Secular: The Brief was sent, and communicated to Toledo, who was very much puzzled how to put it in Execution.

IT is said, that the Pope willingly granted the Brief at the Request of the Cardinal, not that he much minded the settling an Inquisition in Naples, since he found that the Emperor and the Viceroy designed to have it after the Model of that of Spain, and not of Rome (which Competition was of great Use to the Neapolitans); but that knowing how odious the Inquisition was to that People, and bearing the Emperor a secret Grudge, he believed that the Attempt to introduce it into that Kingdom would occasion Revolutions, Tumults, and Seditious in that City.

*UBERTO FOGLIETTA*¹, a Genese Writer, followed by the President *Thuanus*², says, That when the Deputies of the Inquisition of Rome desir'd, according to Custom, that the Viceroy would give the Royal Exequatur to the Brief, Toledo made Answer, that they ought not to be too hasty in that Affair, but might keep the Brief by them; for although he could not then give the Exequatur, without giving Umbrage to the People, who hated the Inquisition mortally, yet they needed not despair, but keep the whole Matter a Secret, for he would find Means to get it put in Execution.

BUT our Neapolitan Writers, Co-temporaries, as well as Foglietta, with these Occurrences, and although they yield to him in Majesty and Elegancy of Style, yet in the Truth of Facts, and minute historical Relation, they must be prefer'd to a Stranger, as having been present, and concern'd in the Management of these Affairs, at the Hazard of their Lives and Fortunes: Our Writers, I say, affirm, That the Viceroy, after some Days, gave the Exequatur to the Brief in the Collateral Council, but would not suffer it to be published through the City by Sound of Trumpet, nor from the Pulpit, for fear of an Insurrection, but caused it to be affixed upon the Door of the Cathedral; and at the same time, retiring himself to Pozzuolo, where he used to pass the Winter, he gave Orders to Dominico Terracina, who was as odious to the People, as he was obsequious to him (besides his making him his Companion about four Months before, he got him to be chosen anew the Elect of the People) and to the other Officers of the City, whom he confided in, that they should insinuate, after the mildest Manner, to the People of their several Districts, that they ought not to make so great a Noise about this Edict of Inquisition, nor be so much alarm'd, since it was not after the Spanish Model, but came provisionally from the Pope, who was a competent Judge of that Matter; and therefore the City had no reason to complain of the Viceroy, since neither he, nor the Emperor had any Intention to force the Inquisition upon them; but that the Pope had done it of his own Motion, that if the City should be found to be in the least infected with Heresy, it might be purged of it, and if not, it might be preserv'd from Infection by this Fright.

ON the other Hand, the Neapolitans, to whom the Viceroy's Artifices were well known, became extremely Jealous, and therefore had elected Deputies, who had often had recourse to the Viceroy, on Account of the Rumours they had heard of the Inquisition, and were as often assured by him, that he would not suffer any Novelty; nevertheless the Report still continuing, that the Inquisition would soon be established, their Fear and Jealousy was as great as ever; and when afterwards, one Day in Lent 1547, they saw the Edict affixed upon the Door of the Cathedral Church, which being read by many, and represented to be worse than it really was, they began to mutiny, make a great Noise, and run to the Archbishop's Vicar (who hearing the Tumult, had hid himself for Fear) and made the Edict be torn to pieces. The Report of this Riot coming to Toledo, he sent for Terracina, and other Officers of the City, upon Palm Sunday, and saying nothing of the Inquisition, but only exaggerating the tumultuous Proceeding of the People, he urged them to punish the Mutineers with the utmost Severity. Whatever Inclination these Officers had to obey the Viceroy's Orders, yet their Fear of the Populace (already suspicious and enraged) hinder'd them from giving a resolute Answer, only they made fair Promises, and cautiously said, that they would represent the Matter to their Seggi. Therefore having assembled the Deputies, as well of the Nobility as Commons, and finding the Matter very ticklish, it was concluded to send a Deputation to Pozzuolo to the Viceroy; and having chosen some of their Number for that Purpose, who were thought most capable to manage the Affair, they sent them in a Body to the Viceroy, to whom Antonio Grifone, a Gentleman of the Seggio di Nido, spoke with great Resolution and Energy, representing the constant Abhorrence which the Neapolitans had always shewed to the very Name of an Inquisition, and especially, because there were always to be found Villains, who for Hire, or out of spite, were ready upon all Occasions to bear false Witness, as he (the Viceroy) well knew, having been obliged to make an Edict against such Evidence, and to punish it with Death: So that if the Business of the Inquisition were not laid aside, he told him, that he would very soon see the whole City and Kingdom in Confusion, and brought to Ruin; he therefore begg'd, in the Name of all the rest, that during his Government, under which they had received so many Benefits, he would not suffer their City to be subjected to such a grievous Yoke, and stain'd with Shame and Reproach.

THE Viceroy, with much Civility answer'd, That they needed not to have taken the Trouble to come to Pozzuolo; that he loved their City better than they imagined, for he looked upon it as his native Country, not only for his having lived so many Years in it, but for having married his Daughter to one of their Nobles; that it was never the Emperor's Intention to impose an Inquisition upon them; and for his Part, he would sooner lay down the Government, than suffer such an Innovation to take Place in his Time; and that they might rest secure, that they should not so much as hear an Inquisition mention'd hereafter: But he added, That since they knew very well, that many ignorant obscure Persons took intolerable Liberty in speaking, by which they had given just Cause to suspect that they were corrupted, it did not appear improper, nor ought the City to take it amiss, that if any such were found, they should be prosecuted in the ordinary Way, and according to the Canons, lest those who were tainted with Heresy should infect others; and for this End only he believed the Edicts had been affixed. The Deputies gave him infinite Thanks for this gracious Answer, and with great Joy returning to Naples, they reported the same to their Seggi. But although it was received with general Applause, yet many took Exception at the last Words, viz. prosecuting Offenders according to the Canons; by which they conjectur'd, that the Viceroy was not averse to the Inquisition, but that he had a Mind to introduce it by specious Pretences, till by Degrees it might grow and gather Strength, and at length be settled in good Earnest, after the Model of that in Spain.

BUT what increased their Jealousy afterwards was, that Terracina and his Partisans were seen constantly going about among the Populace, insinuating to them, that they ought not to trouble themselves, and make such a Noise about the Matter: But they were convinc'd of the Truth of what they only suspected before, when, on the 11th of May 1547. they saw affixed upon the Door of the Cathedral another Edict, by much more plain and frightful than the first, mentioning the Inquisition openly. Then the City was all in an Uproar, and nothing was heard in the Streets but a great Cry To Arms, To Arms; the Edict was torn to pieces, and the People tumultuously ran to Terracina, bidding him immediately to assemble the Ward, in order to dismiss the old Deputies, whom they suspected to be of Intelligence with the Viceroy, and elect new ones. Terracina's Unwillingness to comply with their Request, increased their Jealousy, whereupon in great haste they went to St. Augustin's Church, assembled the Ward, and having expos'd the Difficulty of the Matter, and the Danger they were in, and how inconsistent the Viceroy's Actions were with his Promises; it was agreed upon, with common Consent, to deprive Terracina of his Office of Eleſt, and his Associates of that of Counſellors (for at that Time thoſe Officers were made by the People.) In Terracina's Place, they made Giovanni Paſcale Eleſt, a bold and popular Man, and for Counſellors, they choſe Perſons zealous for the Publick, and Enemies to Terracina.

UPON theſe vigorous Proceedings of the Commons, the Nobility likewise beſtirr'd themſelves, and greedily embrac'd this favourable Opportunity to be reveng'd upon the Viceroy, whom they ſecretly hated; and being no leſs averſe to the Inquiſition than the People, they joined with them, calling them Brethren, and adviſing them to be watchful, becauſe the Viceroy certainly intended to introduce the Inquiſition, and not to truſt him in the leaſt, but to reſiſt him openly, to avoid all Tricks and Ambiguities, and to tell him in plain Terms, that they would have no Inquiſition, either after the Spaniſh or Roman Model, but with all due Reſpect to their Prince, would oppoſe it to their laſt Breath. Terracina and his Associates became extremely odious to the People and the Mob, even to the very Children, who called them in the Streets, Traytors to their Country. They hated likewise the Marquis Di Vico Vecchio, the Count Di S. Valentino Vecchio, Scipione di Scanna, Federico Caraffa, the Father of Ferrante, Paolo Poderico, Ceſare di Genaro, and many others of all the Seggi, who were the Viceroy's Creatures.

THE Viceroy hearing of this Inſurrection and Tumult, and that, without his Leave, Terracina and his Associates, in an imperious Manner, had been turn'd out of their Offices, and that the People gave no Credit to his Words or Promiſes, was in a terrible Rage, and came immediately to Naples, threatening to chaſtiſe ſeverely the Authors of the Tumults; and although Deputies were ſent to him to ſoften his Indignation, he gave ſevere Orders to the Vicarial Court to proceed againſt the Ringleaders, not only of the Inſurrection, but of the new Election of the Eleſt and Counſellors: Among others who were brought before this Court, as Heads of the Tumult, there was one Tommaſo Anello, a Sorrentine, of the Street Del Mercato, one of the moſt conſiderable Men in Naples, and of great Intereſt. This Man had diſtinguiſh'd himſelf above all the reſt, as well in the Elections as in the Tumults, and it was he that took the Ediſt from the Door of the Cathedral, and tore it. He having been ſummoned to appear before the Tribunal of the Vicariate, after long Deliberation whether he ſhould go or not, at laſt he went, accompanied by an infinite Number of People, who placing themſelves round the Vicarial Palace, waited impatiently for Anello's ſafe Return. Girolamo Fonſeca, Deputy of the Vicariate, ſeeing ſuch a Multitude, thought it more fit, for the preſent, to diſmiſs him after a ſhort Examination, than to keep him Priſoner; and having delivered him to Ferrante Caraffa, Marquis of St. Lucido, a Perſon much in Favour with the People, the Marquis took him up behind on Horſeback, and carried him through many Streets of the City, to quiet the Mind of the People, who were afraid of the Life of their Fellow Citizen. The Viceroy being thus fruſtrated of his Deſign, full of Indignation return'd to Pozzuolo; and ſoon after Ceſare Mormile, a Nobleman of Portici, and a Favourite of the People, being ſummoned to the Court likewise for the Tumult, went thither with much Caution, and ſo well attended, that the Deputy thought fit alſo to diſmiſs him as he had done the other. This Proceeding very much vexed the Viceroy, but he diſſembled it, and reſolved to be revenged at another more proper Time.

BUT a new Accident increaſed the Tumults and Diſorders. The Viceroy had, during theſe Troubles, brought into the City from the Out-Gariſſons, ſome Companies of Spaniards, to the Number of 3000, and lodged them within Catelano's: One Day, whatever the Occaſion might be, they were ſeen, all of a ſudden, coming out of the Caſtle; whereupon the People immediately roſe in Arms, ſhut up their Houſes and Shops, and ran towards the Caſtle. The Spaniards fir'd upon them, and purſued them as far as the Catalan Street, pillaging Houſes, and killing Men, Women, and Children. The Napolitans ran to the Steeple of St. Lorenzo, and rung the Alarm-Bell, at the Sound of which, as the Citizens aſſembled, the Royal Forts began to fire Cannon againſt the City, but with little Execution. Wherever any Spaniards were found within the City, they were kill'd and torn to pieces: The Courts of Juſtices were ſhut up, and there was nothing but Diſorder and Confuſion, till Night came, when the Fury was ſomething abated.

THE Viceroy in great Rage alledged, that the City was guilty of open Rebellion, by taking up Arms; on the other Hand, the Deputies complaining of him, said, That in order to be reveng'd of the City for what had pass'd, he had brought Spanish Soldiers to pillage it, and that he had caused it to be cannonaded from the Forts and Castles, as if it had belong'd to the French or the Turks, and not to the Emperor ; and they declared they would give an Account of the Whole to his Imperial Majesty : And in the mean time, having assembled the most celebrated Advocates and Doctors of the Law, the Chief of which was Giovan-Angelo Pisanello, who was of Opinion, and was seconded by all the rest, that the City could not be accused of Rebellion, for they might arm themselves against an incensed Minister, to preserve to their lawful King, the City and Kingdom. Then they resolved to raise Soldiers for the Guard of the City ; and that Charge was given to Giovan-Francesco Caracciolo, Prior of Bari, a Gentleman of the Seggio Capuana, to whom was joined his Brother Pascale, Cesare Mormile, the Viceroy's Enemy, and Giovanni di Sessa the Elect ; but the Prior and Mormile had the chief Direction of all.

A NEW Incident exasperated the People much more. Some young Noblemen of the Seggio of Portanova being together in that Seggio, some Under-Officers of the Vicariate pass'd by with a Prisoner for Debt, and, as the City was in Arms, People having little Regard for the Ministers of Justice, the young Noblemen stop't the Officers, and ask'd for what Reason they carried that Man Prisoner ; the Rogue with a loud Voice said, Gentlemen, they are carrying me to Prison on account of the Inquisition : Upon which Words the young Men, without more ado, did what they could to rescue him. The Deputy of the Vicariate being inform'd of the Fact, five of them were seized, three of which being found Guilty, he immediately advertis'd the Viceroy of it, who presently came to Naples, and on the 23d of May gave Orders that they should be brought to the Castle, and calling a Collateral Council, contrary to the Advice of the famous Cicco di Loffredo the President, at that Time Deputy, would by all Means have them condemn'd to die by the Sentence of a Court Martial, thinking thereby to humble the Nobility, as the People had been in the Case of Focillo. This Sentence being therefore pass'd upon them, they were brought from the Castle the next Day, being the 24th of May, about Ten a Clock, and carried to the usual Place of Execution ; and because the Affair required Expedition, they were made to kneel down, and had their Heads cut off after the military Manner.

AS soon as the Execution was over, the Viceroy, flattering himself, that by shewing Intrepidity, would abate the Pride of the Seditious, made a Cavalcade through the City, accompanied by many Spanish and Neapolitan Gentlemen, and some Companies of Foot Soldiers. In the mean time the Populace having shut up their Houses and Shops, were all in Arms, and run through the Streets, bawling, blaspheming and threatening, as if they had been all drunk ; therefore the Deputies, hearing of the Cavalcade, sent to the Viceroy, begging of him to defer it for the present, lest some desperate Fellow should be so bold as to offer him Violence, the People being all in Arms : But the Viceroy would not stop, thinking, that if he did, the Mutineers would grow more insolent upon it ; therefore the prudent Deputies sent Cesare Mormile, and some other Gentlemen, before the Cavalcade, to restrain the People, who stood arm'd in great Multitudes in the Streets, from attempting any Thing against the Viceroy. But it was surprizing to see, that although they offered no Violence to him, yet through all the Streets as he pass'd, there was not one single Person that shew'd him the least Sign of Respect, either with Hat or Knee ; whereas formerly, when he rode through the City, every one run to salute him with the most cordial Affection. So much were they chang'd by their Abhorrence to the Inquisition.

THIS severe Execution, and the Cavalcade made by the Viceroy with an Air of Contempt, produced greater Insurrections and Tumults ; for the People being afraid that the Viceroy would revenge himself upon all who had oppos'd him in establishing the Inquisition, as he had done upon the afore said three young Noblemen, were in the utmost Despair ; and in order to convince them that such was the Viceroy's Design, Mormile and the Prior of Bari industriously gave out, that the Viceroy was to send a Detachment of his Spaniards to seize Mormile, and all who had oppos'd him in establishing the Inquisition. Upon this Report the Bell in the Steeple of the Church of St. Lorenzo was rung to Arms, where Multitudes came arm'd ready to die for the Liberty of their Country : Then the Heads of the Faction taking hold of the Opportunity, and seeing the People in a manner distracted, called called a General Meeting, wherein many Things were resolved upon. First, it was determined, That the Viceroy should be no longer obey'd. 2dly, That for that End the Nobility and Commons should enter into an Association, with a firm Resolution, either to live or die together. 3dly, That they should dispatch Ambassadors to the Emperor.

THE Association was drawn up and sign'd with great Solemnity, and a Trumpet sent to intimate it to all the Gentlemen who were shut up in the Castle with the Viceroy, with a Protestation, that unless they appeared to sign the Association with them, they would burn their Houses, and destroy their Estates, whereupon the Viceroy gave them all Leave to go, to preserve their Houses and Estates. The Association being solemniz'd, the Nobility and Commons, great and small, rich and poor, went promiscuously in Procession through the City, with a Crucifix before them, crying out, The Association, the Association, for the Cause of GOD, of the Emperor, and of the City. And that every one might be brought to join with them, it was resolved, that whoever did not enter into the Association should be deem'd a Traitor to his Country, which had such Effect, that all Men, great and small, enter'd into it, as an honourable Society; so that the Viceroy uled to say with a Smile, That he was sorry he could not enter into that Holy Association.

FERDINANDO SANSEVERINO, Prince of Salerno, an Enemy to the Viceroy, was pitch'd upon to be the City's Ambassador to the Emperor, and he being a vain Man, and full of Levity, instead of excusing himself, accepted the Employment with great Joy, and to him was join'd Placido di Sangro. The Prince went immediately to take Leave of the Viceroy, who told him, that if his Business with the Emperor was about the Inquisition, he might save himself the Fatigue of his Journey, for he would give his Word to procure the Emperor's Edict for laying it aside for ever; but he answered, That he must of Necessity go, because he had given his Promise to the City, and so made haste to Salerno, to get Things in order for his Departure. The Viceroy stood that whole Day at the Gate of the Castle, to learn what passed in the City, and hearing that they had thrown off their Obedience to him, calling him no more Viceroy, but Don Pedro, he turn'd to those about him, and said smiling, Come, Gentlemen, let us go and divert ourselves, for now I have nothing to do, since I am no longer Viceroy of Naples.

PIETRO SOAVE¹, in his History of the Council of Trent (though the Neapolitan Writers mention no such Thing) says, That the City likewise sent Ambassadors to Pope Paul III. and that the Neapolitans offered to give the Kingdom up to him if he would accept of it; but that his Holiness contented himself with fomenting Sedition, which he did with great Dexterity, and refused the Offer of the Kingdom, as not thinking himself able to defend it, although Cardinal Teatino Archbishop of Naples promised to stand by him with all his Relations, who were many and powerful, offering to go in Person to the City, and use all his Interest for him, and therefore press'd the Pope not to let slip so fair an Opportunity to serve the Church, by the Conquest of so great a Kingdom.

BUT of this Fact, which would have been downright Rebellion, there is not one Neapolitan Writer that makes the least Mention. And although the Duke D'Alba, and the Spaniards took it for granted, yet Pope Julius III. in a Letter of his to Charles V. recorded by Cbioccarelli, praying him not to defer giving Cardinal Teatino Possession of his Archbishoprick of Naples, denies the Fact positively, as shall be told hereafter. Every Body would have expected, that Cardinal *Palavicino*², Soave's great Antagonist, would have taken him to Task for this Assertion: But although this Author seems to be intirely contrary to Soave, and contradicts him as to the Intent of the Actions, yet they agree in the Truth of the Facts, and there seems to be very little Difference between them, except in some Circumstances of small Importance, particularly in the Fact abovementioned; Palavicino confesses, that the Neapolitans made large Offers to the Pope for his Protection³, but that he, out of his great Piety and Wisdom, gave no Ear to them, knowing, that the Acquisition of that Temporal Kingdom, in such ticklish Times, would indanger his whole Spiritual Dominion, of which the Temporal was only an Accessory, and could not be supported without the other.

IN the mean time the Viceroy, lest this Association should breed a Rebellion, especially when he found that they pursued the Spaniards to Death, doubled the Garrison of Castel-nuovo. The next Day, which was the 26th of May, the Heads of the Sedition spread a Report, that the Viceroy design'd to attack them, and punish them as Rebels, for having rung the great Bell to Arms; therefore in all haste they barricadoed the Street Dell'Olimo, and all the other Streets fronting the Castle, they put Soldiers in Santa Maria della Nuova, and ran with great Fury to attack the Spaniards in their Quarters: Whereupon the Viceroy ordered the Cannon of the Castles to be fired upon all Places where any Number of Men were seen in Arms, and he sent Spanish Soldiers to attack the Barricadoes. Thus, without Intermision, did they skirmish for three Days and three Nights, in which many of both Sides were killed and wounded.

WHILE Matters were in this Situation, the Deputies, being extremely careful not to run into any rebellious Action, held continual Consultations; and to shew their Loyalty towards the Emperor, they set up a Standard, with the Arms of the Empire, upon the Steeple of St. Lorenzo; and as the Spaniards cried out, The Empire and Spain, they made the People likewise to cry out, The Empire and Spain: Besides, they solicited the Prince of Bisignano, and other Persons in Favour with the Viceroy, to treat with him about a Cessation of Arms, and that he should not attempt to punish any Person for what had pass'd, till he had first acquainted the Emperor. To which the Viceroy agreed, and it was resolv'd, that the City should send one Deputy, and the Viceroy another, to inform the Emperor of the Matter of Fact. The Viceroy sent the Marquis Della Valle, Governor of Castel-nuovo, by whom he wrote to his Imperial Majesty, telling him, amongst other Things, that the Inquisition would never go down with the Subjects of Naples, as it was settled in Spain, for many Reasons; so that in order to extinguish the Name of the Association now enter'd into, it was absolutely necessary never to mention the Inquisition again. The City sent on their Part, the Prince of Salerno, and Placido di Sangro, who took Post from Naples the 28th of May; but the Prince staying at Rome, and spending his Time in visiting the Cardinals, the Marquis Della Valle got the Start of him, and was first at Nuremberg, where the Emperor resided at that Time.

DURING the Truce, both Parties stood upon their Guard, and kept Centries in their Forts, but the Soldiers and Citizens conversed with one another, although the People, being still in Arms and Commotion, had no Regard to the Ministers of Justice, nay they often affronted and abused them. The Deputies seeing this, and fearing lest some Rebellion should ensue, went to the Viceroy on the 15th of June, accompanied with one of the Judges, and a Notary, to desire that he would take Care to see Justice administred as formerly, for they were as ready to obey as ever, and protested that they would never depart from their Duty, and they offer'd him Hostages for the Security of his Officers. But the Viceroy, who saw that all this was only done out of Cunning (for in Effect, no Officer durst appear in the Streets for the Insolence of an arm'd Mob) refused to do it, telling them, that their Obedience was only in Words, but not in Facts; whereupon, by a publick Decree of the City, it was resolv'd, that a Guard should be appointed to patrol Day and Night through the Streets, to seize all Delinquents, and imprison them in the Vicariate, to be tried and punish'd by the Deputy and the Judges, who were shut up in that Palace, and a Company of Soldiers was placed about the said Palace, that none might dare to break Prison, or offer Violence to the Officers: But this Care signified nothing, for the Insolence of the Mob was such, that they did not regard even the Officers of the City.

IN the mean time, the Viceroy found Means to divide those of the Association, and discover whether there was a Rebellion hatching in the City, by sending a written Order to all the Barons, under the Pain of Rebellion, to come and lodge in the Spanish Quarters, because his Majesty's Service required it; upon which there was a Council held in the City, where it was concluded, that they might go if they thought fit: Whereupon they all went to the Viceroy, and had Apartments and Necessaries assign'd them. The next Day the City, to make up that Breach, confirm'd anew the Association, and dispatch'd a Message to the Viceroy, desiring, that there might be Lodgings for them all, because not only the Nobility, but they were all ready, for his Majesty's Service, to come and lodge in those Quarters; to which the Viceroy jestingly answered, That although it was Summer-time, the Message sent him from the City was too cold.

AFFAIRS being in this Posture, all good Men, not able to live under such a vile Government, left the City with their Families, and none would have staid if the Deputies had not posted Guards at the Gates. It was lamentable to see the City void of Nobility and honest Citizens, and only filled with an arrogant Mob, and Shoals of Banditti, who running from Place to Place, committed a thousand Insolences, and whoever reproved them were insulted, call'd Traytors to their Country, and forced to take Arms and join them; but whoever appear'd swaggering in the Streets in their Doublets, or Arms in their Hands, boasting of their Willingness to die for their Country, and threatening the Giant of the Castle (for so they called the Viceroy) were honoured, stiled Patriots, and deemed worthy to be made Deputies of the City: And now the Government of the Deputies began to dwindle away, and the whole Authority devolved to a few of the most powerful, till it became a Triumvirate, compos'd of Mormile, the Prior of Bari, and Giovanni di Sessa, leaving the Deputies only the Name, for the Reputation of the City.

WHILST Things were at this Pass, there came Ambassadors to the Viceroy from his Son-in-Law the Duke of Florence, from the Republick of Sienna, and from other Powers of Italy, offering to assist him both with Men and Money, for which he gave them Thanks, but only accepted the Duke of Florence's Offer, to whom he sent Word to have 5000 Foot in Readiness, and to send them by Sea to Naples, in case there should be Occasion. This being known in the City, the Deputies fearing to be attack'd unawares, resolv'd to levy 10,000 Men, which, out of the great Number of Peasants and Exiles that had come into the City, were quickly rais'd. They also muster'd all the People, and there were found 14,000 fit to bear Arms, the greatest Part Musquetiers. This Army, rais'd in this Manner, was without a Head, because the Deputies would not trust a Captain-General with it, lest he should make himself Master of the City, and overturn their Government, but commanded it themselves the best Way they could, and only made use of it to guard their Barriers in case they should be attack'd: But this Army, being under no Restraint, attack'd the Spaniards in their Quarters, and on the 21st of July a bloody Scuffle ensued, and the great Bell was rung to Arms; whereupon the whole People attack'd the Spaniards, and drove them to the Catalan Street, where they kill'd a great Number of them, and particularly sixteen poor Soldiers who were eating in a Publick House. Upon Notice of this, the Viceroy likewise order'd his Men to take their Arms, and having drawn up the Spanish Infantry in order of Battle, he sent them under the Command of Balt. Urries to beat them back, which was quickly done, for they were so pelted with small Shot, that they retired from the Quarter S. Giuseppe and the Catalan Street, to the Head of the Street Dell'Olimo; but the Spaniards being gall'd from the Houses, forc'd the Doors and Walls, and entering them, pillag'd and set them on Fire: When Night came on, the Spaniards were posted in the Custom-House and other strong Houses. They took also by Force the Convent of S. Maria la Nuova, in which were many Italian Soldiers, and Captain Orizuela, with a Company under his Command, got the Charge of it. The City on the other Hand, fortified Santa Chiara, the Palaces of the Prince of Sienna, the Duke of Gravina, Mente Oliveto, and of Secretary Martirano, and posted many Musqueteers, and some Pieces of small Cannon within them. This being done, the Viceroy gave Orders that the Soldiers should not stir out of their Forts, but keep upon the Defensive: But the People, on the other Hand, being without a Head, and void of Fear, never rested Day nor Night, but were always under Arms, attacking the Spaniards, and killing them with great Cruelty, as also the Italians of the Viceroy's Party, whose Houses they pillag'd, and destroyed their Vineyards; sometimes they run out as far as Pozzuolo to plunder the Viceroy's Goods, and at Chigi they attack'd those Gentlemen who were quarter'd there by the Viceroy's Orders. This cruel War lasted fifteen Days, during which time it was carried on both Day and Night, the Artillery of the Castle and the Gallies fired into the City where-ever they perceived arm'd Men; and now the People began to cry out, that the Cannon ought to be put in Order, and planted against Chigi, San Pietro, and the other Forts, but the Deputies would by no Means consent to this, as thinking it open Rebellion. This War ought to be call'd a Civil War, and it that Reason the Number of the Slain ought to have been conceal'd, after the Example of Julius Cæsar, who would never mention the Number of those kill'd by him in the Civil Wars; but there are Authors, who, without that Caution, have given Lists of their Names.

BUT in the Heat of this War, the Marquis Della Valle, and Placido di Sangro, return'd from their Embassy. There was immediately a Cessation of Arms, that the Emperor's Pleasure might be known, which Placido di Sangro, in a publick Council declared to the City, which was, That his Imperial Majesty commanded them to deliver their Arms to the Viceroy, to whom he would afterwards send full Instructions concerning what had pass'd. Although this Order appear'd very hard to the City, being oblig'd, without Security, to lay down their Arms, and put themselves in the Power of their Enemy, who continued arm'd; yet, to shew that what had pass'd was done without any Design of disobeying the Emperor, they resolv'd to obey, and they all willingly, without Delay, went and delivered their Arms to the Deputies in S. Lorenzo, who afterwards, in the Name of the City, deliver'd them to the Viceroy in the Castle; and although many Arms were wanting, yet the Viceroy, satisfied with this Obedience, resolv'd not to be too severe in obliging them to bring all their Arms, only he insisted upon the Delivery of the Cannon; and being desirous to have Tranquility restor'd, he wisely dissembled many Things in which he might have shew'd Rigour. This being over, the Viceroy applied himself diligently to restore the Exercise of Justice, and to reform the Government of the City. The Tribunals were open'd, and every one began to follow his own Business as formerly; and the Viceroy, to secure the Citizens, and quiet their Minds, forgave them all, telling them, That he knew they had been impos'd upon by some People, who, to carry on their own bad Designs, and gratify their Passions, had endeavour'd to make an Insurrection, and to bring about a Revolution under Colour of the Inquisition, and that he was heartily glad that GOD Almighty had deliver'd them out of the Hands of such People; and therefore the Emperor forgave them all, as he himself did, and was ready to do all that was in his Power for their Ease and Relief.

BUT the City being still in Suspence, and desirous to know the Emperor's full Pleasure, begg'd of the Viceroy to signify it to them, because they were ready to obey his Commands; therefore the Viceroy, on the 12th of August, sent for the Deputies to come to the Castle, and as soon they had enter'd, the Bridge was drawn up, which struck Terror into those without; but the Viceroy received them very graciously, and declared the Emperor's Pleasure to them, which was, That there should be no Inquisition; that he pardon'd their rising in Arms, because he knew that it was not done out of Rebellion; and that if Cesare Mormile, the Prior of Bari, and Giovanni di Sessa, in the Name of the City, had gone to the Emperor, he would have done them Justice to the utmost of his Power. The Deputies overjoy'd at this Declaration, return'd to give an Account of what had pass'd to the City; but soon after Thirty-six were publicly excepted out of the Emperor's Indemnity, and condemn'd to die: The Prior of Bari, Mormile, and the rest, upon the News of this fled, only Placido di Sangro was taken and brought Prisoner to the Castle; but after some time many of them were pardon'd, except Mormile and such as had enter'd into the French Service, who were all forfeited, and their Effects sold; and the unhappy Giovan-Vincenzo Brancaccio, one of the Excepted, was taken and beheaded.

AFTER this the Emperor sent a Letter to the City of Naples, in which he called it his most faithful City, pardoning all the past Excesses and Disorders; but to indemnify himself of the Charges he had been obliged to be at on that Account, he fined them in 100,000 Crowns. He farther added, That whatever the Viceroy had said or done, had been by his Consent and Approbation, ordering them, for the future, to respect him as they would his own Person.

THE City had now in some measure recovered itself, and was at Ease, but still kept a Correspondence with the Prince of Salerno, who continued by their Order at the Emperor's Court, but was not well look'd upon, nor in much Credit there: On the contrary, he was blam'd for having undertaken the Office of Ambassador from the City whilst it was in Arms, and likewise because it was said, that he was not a lawful Ambassador, as not having been chosen by all the Wards; and therefore he advised the City by Letters to be upon their Guard, and not to think themselves secure, and that they ought to send new Ambassadors to represent to the Emperor what he had insinuated to them; whereupon Julio Cesare Caracciolo was sent from the Nobility, and Giovan-Battista del Pino from the People, who left Naples the 2d of December, and were graciously received by his Imperial Majesty. Not long after the Prince of Salerno returned from Court, and secretly persuaded such as were so weak as to believe him, that the Emperor had promised to remove the Viceroy from the Government; but the Viceroy, who was better inform'd of the Truth, stood his Ground, and kept the Government, with the same Authority as before, during his Life.

AFTER this Manner did the Neapolitans constantly oppose the Inquisition, a Tribunal so much hated and abhorred by them. From the Time that they receiv'd the aforesaid Letter from Charles V. there never was more mention made of the Inquisition: And, as the Animosity and Hatred increased afterwards between the Emperor and the Pope, it was the more hush'd; for Pier Louigi Farnese, the Pope's Son, having been killed in his own Palace on the 10th of September this Year, by a Conspiracy hatch'd against him, the Pope was exceedingly afflicted, not so much for the violent and ignominious Death of his Son, as for the Loss of Placentia, and because he plainly saw that it had been done with the Emperor's Approbation. And Pope Paul III. dying, his Successor Julius III. at the Solicitation of D. Juan Manriquez, the Emperor's Ambassador at Rome, and at the Request of the City of Naples, dispatched a Bull, dated April 7. 1544, directed to Cardinal Pacecco, at that Time Lieutenant of the Kingdom, by which, in order to gratify the Emperor, the said Cardinal, and the City of Naples, he ordained that there should be no more Confiscation of the Goods of Hereticks in the Kingdom, annulling all such as had been done before that Time¹.

IN the mean time the Viceroy, to root out the Poison which had remained in some Persons, gave the Assistance of the Secular Power, without any Difficulty, to the Vicar of Naples, who proceeded therein after the ordinary Way prescribed by the Canons. But 'tis true, there was an Abuse which was not then eradicated, but, as we shall see, continued for many Years after, viz. the sending Persons that had been tried, Prisoners to Rome, to the Officers of that Inquisition, or else requiring Bail of them, that they should go and present themselves there before those Officers; for that was practised as well in D. Pedro's Time, as under the Government of his Successors, viz. That those, who were tried for Heresy in the Kingdom of Naples, went to Rome, made their Recantation, did the Penances enjoined by the Inquisition there, and then returned.

The Inquisition again attempted under Philip II. but still rejected.

TO follow the due Order of Time, we should here make an End of speaking of the Inquisition, and proceed to the other Occurrences of the Reign of Charles V. and Toledo's Government; but I judge it more Methodical to prosecute that Subject even to our own Times, that, without interrupting the Thread of the History, or being obliged to treat of it anew, the whole may be laid open to the Eyes of every Body, to the End, that at one View, my Countrymen may distinctly see the Horribleness of the Inquisition, and may judge, with how much Reason our Ancestors always detested it, and may thereby know, what Thanks we owe our present most August Prince, who has freed us intirely from it.

THE Abhorrence of our Ancestors to the Inquisition, has been found to have proceeded from the horrible Method of proceeding of the Inquisition of Spain, in the Time of Ferdinand the Catholick, against the Moors and Jews; now we shall see, that the Aversion increased by the new and more terrible Methods made use of by

by the Roman Inquisition under Pope Paul IV. our Countryman: The other Popes, his Predecessors, endeavour'd, or at least pretended to extinguish the German Heresy by calling a General Council; but Paul was no sooner advanced to the Chair, than he thought the Inquisition the strongest Bulwark against Heresy, and the best Fence of the Apostolick See, inſomuch, that he was wholly intent upon making that Tribunal more terrible by rigorous Constitutions¹. Thus by a new Constitution published on the 15th of February 1558. which he made all the Cardinals ſubſcribe, he renewed all the Cenſures and Penalties againſt Hereticks made by his Predecessors, all the Decrees of Councils, all Canons or Sentences of Fathers pronounced at any Time againſt Heresy, and revived ſuch as were in Deſuetude, and declared, That all Prelates, Princes, and even Kings and Emperors, tainted with Heresy, ſhould be reputed as deprived of their Benefices, States, Kingdoms and Empires, without any other Proceſs or Declaration, and incapable of being reſtored to them, even by the Apoſtolick See: and that their Effects, States and Dominions, ſhould be underſtood to be taken from them, and might lawfully be poſſeſſed by ſuch Catholicks as could ſeize them. And the Preſident *Thuanus*² relates, That when the Pope, ſome Years before his Death, ſaw himſelf free from the Trouble of War, his whole Care was to aggrandize the Power of the Inquisition, to which he gave the Name of The moſt Holy Office, ordering the greateſt Rigour to be exerciſed, and which was put in Execution (to name no more) upon Pompeo Algeri of Nela, who was burnt alive as a Heretick³. To this End, he ſet over it as Preſident, Michael Gaſſeri a Dominican, whom he had made a Cardinal, for the Aſterity and Ruggedneſs of his Temper, that he might exerciſe the greater Rigour, as he did, not only whiſt he was Inquiſitor-General, but alſo when he afterwards came to be Pope by the Name of Pius V. who, during his Pontificate, uſed ſuch Severities againſt thoſe that were ſuſpected of Heresy, that Thuanus does not ſtick to ſay, that he could not relate them without Horror⁴. Paul IV. not only made Caſes of Heresy to be brought before this Tribunal, but alſo other Crimes, which before were always tried by the ordinary Judges⁵.

ABOUT this Time the Order of the Theatines ſtarted up among us, who, following the Foot-Steps of their Founder, employed themſelves as Spies upon the Napolitans, and thought they could not do a more acceptable Service to the Pope, than to inform the Inquisition of all ſuch as they ſuſpected of Heresy, however ſlight the Grounds were upon which they were accuſed, which occaſioned terrible Diſorders and Tumults in the City, and in private Families; and if their Rivals and Competitors the Jeſuits, who ſtarted up at the ſame Time, had not oppoſed them, they would have occaſioned greater Troubles: Hence it came, That the Aversion to the Inquisition, not only in Naples, but in Rome, increaſed to that Degree, that on the 8th of Auguſt 1559, Pope Paul dying, and while he was ſcarce cold, the common People of Rome, out of Hatred to him, demolish'd his Statue in the Capitol, broke open the Priſons, and ſet the Priſoners at Liberty, ſet fire to the Place of Inquisition, and burnt the Proceſſes, and all the Records and other Writings kept there; and they were very near burning the Convent of Minerva, where the Friars, who had the Direction of this Tribunal, lived⁶.

BUT at this Time the Dread increaſed, not only by the Terror of the Roman Inquisition, but much more by that, which by the Means of Philip II. in the Year 1559, was done by the Inquisition of Spain, as we ſhall now relate.

KING Philip, after the Death of his ſecond Wife Mary Queen of England, reſolving to leave Flanders, and retire to Spain by Sea, was overtaken by ſuch a Storm, that he loſt almoſt his whole Fleet, with much rich Furniture which he had on Board, and with great Difficulty eſcap'd himſelf. When he arrived at Cadiz, he ſaid he had been ſaved by the particular Providence of GOD, that he might extirpate the Lutheran Heresy, which he immediately ſet about; for as Thuanus ſays⁷, he was ſcarce landed in Spain, when he gave Orders, That a ſtrict Inquiry ſhould be made after all Sectaries, and all ſuch as were ſuſpected of Heresy, and that they ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed: And whereas formerly, when one or more Perſons were condemn'd for bad Principles of Religion, it was the Custom to deliver them to the Executioner to be put to Death; after this Order of the King's, all condemn'd Persons were from all Parts of Spain conducted to Seville and Valladolid, where they were kept Prisoners till his Arrival in those Cities, where they were to be executed with theatrical Pomp. The first Act of this dreadful Tragedy was performed in Seville on the 2th of September 1559, where, to give a signal Instance of Punishment in his auspicious Reign, and to leave no room for any to expect Mercy or Pardon, he made John Pentio, Count of Baslen, be brought first of all from a Tower where he had been imprison'd for a Lutheran, and carried in great Pomp to the Theatre, where he was burnt by the devouring Flames; and with him was likewise burnt John Gonzalez a Preacher: These were follow'd by four noble Ladies, Isabella Tena, Maria Viquez, Cornelia and Isabella; and what made the dismal Spectacle the more lamentable, was the tender Age and Intrepidity of Isabella, who was not 21 Years complete, when, with the greatest Constancy, she suffer'd so cruel a Death. Isabella Tena's Houses, where the Sectaries met for Worship, were razed to the Foundation.

AFTER these were likewise burnt Fernando de Eno, John and Julian Ferdinand, who, from his little Stature, was commonly called El Pequeno, and John de Lina, who having in his Youth been a Taylor in Mexico in New Spain, and returning to his native Country, enter'd into the College of S. Idier, where he privately profess'd the new Religion. The Number of the Sufferers was increased by Francisco Chavez, a Nun of the Convent of S. Elizabeth, who had been instructed by Gregorio Egido, preaching Friar of Seville; and Cristobal Lopez, a Physician, had the same Fate. Out of the same College of S. Idier were brought to the Stake, Cristobal Arriaga and Garcia Arriaga, who having been the Introducer of this new Doctrine into the College, there was a larger Pile made for him, and he was burnt alive. The College was likewise set on Fire, and intirely burnt, and with it a good Part of the City.

TO complete the Tragedy, there remained Egido the preaching Friar of Seville, and Cristobal Pentio. Egido was in such Favour with Charles V. for his Learning and Piety, that he design'd to have made him a Bishop; but being afterwards accused of Heresy, either out of Cunning, or at the Instigation of Domingo Soto, having publicly renounced his Error, he was released, and only suspended from Preaching, and other sacred Offices, for some Time by the Inquisitors, and he died a little before this Tragedy was finished: But the Inquisitors, being now sorry for their former Mildness, re-examined his Process, called his Corpse to account, and although Dead, pronounced Sentence of Death; but not being able to burn him alive, they made his Effigy, which was burnt on that frightful Theatre. The other, Cristobal Pentio, had been Confessor to Charles V. in his Retirement, in which Office he serv'd him to his Death, and that Prince breathed his Last in Pavia's Arms; but upon the Emperor's Demise he was put in Prison on Suspicion of Heresy, where he died a short while before this lugubrious Scene. The Inquisitors likewise re-examined his Case, and, though dead, was condemn'd to the Flames; for which End his Statue was immediately made in a preaching Posture, a Spectacle which at first drew Tears from some, and Laughter from others, but at last Indignation from all the Spectators, who seeing an inanimate Statue used in such a manner, concluded, that there was little Hopes of Mercy or Indulgence from him, who did not think fit to show some Respect towards a Person whose Infamy reflected Dishonour upon the Memory of the deceased Emperor his Father.

IN October the King went to Valladolid, where using the same Rigour, in his own Presence, with the like lugubrious Apparatus, he caused Light and twenty of the chief Nobility of the Country to be burnt, and kept in Prison Dr. Bartolomeo Carranza, so famous in the first Reduction of the Council to Trent, afterwards made Archbishop of Trent, and Primate of Spain, from whom were likewise taken all his Revenues.

THESE cruel and horrid Executions coming to the Ears of the Nepoleon, it is easy to imagine what Detestation and Fear they created in them. But a few Years afterwards two Accidents happened which gave a greater Alarm, and fill'd their Minds with greater Apprehensions, continual Jealousies and Distrusts.

THE new Doctrine having pass'd the Alps by the Way of Savoy from France, began to creep into the Dutchy of Milan, and there infect People with new Opinions with respect to Religion. The Duke of Savoy, being obliged by the Necessity of the Times, had suffered in his Dominions some hidden Protestants¹; but the Spaniards finding the Poison had reached the Milanesè, thought the best Way to crush it in the Bud was, to use their wonted Severity. King Philip II. earnestly desired Pope Pius IV. by his Authority, to erect an Inquisition in Milan after the Spanish Model; but the Pope having consulted the Affair in the Consistory, found many Cardinals against it, and he himself was very unwilling to disoblige the City of Milan, the Place of his Birth: but being overcome with the strong Solicitations of Philip, he granted his Request, and this Year 1563. dispatched a Bull for that Purpose: The Milanesè, who detested this Tribunal as much as the Nepolitans did, upon the News of this were exasperated to that Degree, that if the Prudence of the Duke of Sessa, their Governor, had not prevented it, there would have happened the same Tumults and Disturbances in Milan, as had been in Naples under the Government of Felice. Felice was Guglielmo de Cordova, Duke of Sessa, who had then succeeded the Marquis Di Febo, lest the State should be disturbed with Seditions in the Beginning of his Government, sent some Citizens to the King, and others to the Pope, to divert them from the Undertaking; and he himself insinuated to the King by Letters, that to establish the Inquisition in Milan, after the Manner of Spain, was the Way to turn the whole State into Disorder and Confusion. Upon this Representation, both the King and the Pope were satisfied, and the Inquisition was dropt.

NAPLES was soon after struck with the same Fear, upon an Occasion which we shall trace from its original Cause. In the Reign of Frederick II. they endeavoured to extirpate the Hereticks of those Times, especially the Waldenses and Albigenses, with an armed Force, after the same Manner that had been used against the Saracens with Crusades. Those People being routed and banished, their Effects confiscated, and Honours forfeited, dispersed themselves in different Parts; and continuing obstinate in their Opinions, when they could no longer defend themselves by Force, they retired to private and obscure Places, where, not being minded, they kept up their Opinions. Some took Shelter in Provence, in that Ridge of Hills which join the Alps to the Pyrenees, where there were Remains of them in the Pontificate of Julius II. and afterwards. Others retir'd to Germany, and took up their Residence in some Corners of Bohemia, Poland, and Livonia, who, by the Bohemians were called Piccolari. And some others, as very grave Authors relate, especially *Thomas*², fled for Refuge (who would have thought it?) to our Calabria, and lived in that Province till the Pontificate of Pius IV. and the Reign of Philip II. when under the Viceroyalty of the Duke D'Alcala, they were intirely exterminated³.

THESE People lived in the Ilther Calabria, in some Towns near Cosenza, called Guarda, Baccarizza, and S. Silve, of their own Founding, and for that Reason called Guardia Lombarda, as being inhabited by People that came from beyond the Mountains, and from *Lombardy*⁴: Here they lived a long Time not observed or minded. At first they were so stupid and ignorant, that there was no Danger of their communicating their Opinions to others; their Number was so inconsiderable, and being altogether illiterate, they neither cared to spread their Doctrine, nor that others should have the Curiosity to learn it. But after the Lutheran Heresy sprang up in Germany, and spread itself, as has been said, among the Switzers, Piemontese, and some Lombards living upon the Po, from whence they had their Rise, and with whom they had a Correspondence, they were the first amongst us who had an Account of the pretended Reformation, and in order to be better informed, they sent to Genoa to invite some of that People to their Towns to instruct them in that Faith; for that Purpose there came into Calabria two Ministers from Genoa, Followers of Luther, who publicly preaching up the pretended Reformation, and teaching it by particular Instructions and Catechisms, not only spread it through Calabria, but in the neighbouring Cities, and from thence infected the adjacent Province; for Faito, Castelluccio, and Celle, Towns in Basilicata, were corrupted. Father Fiore, a Capuchin, says¹, That the first Discoverer of this Infection, was one Giovanni-Antonio Anania, of Taverna, a Priest, Brother of Gio. Lorenzo, the famous Author of the Book *De Natura Daemonum*². This Priest was Chaplain to the Marquis Fuscalio Spinelli, to whom Guardia belonged; so that by his being in the Neighbourhood of that Place, and perhaps, by Conversation with that People, he found, that unless a speedy Remedy was applied, the Evil would quickly spread, therefore in 1561. he wrote about it to Cardinal Alessandrino, Inquisitor-General in Rome, who was afterwards Pope Pius V.: The Cardinal knowing Anania's Zeal, committed the Conversion of that People from their Errors to him. Anania, laying aside other Business, and calling to his Assistance some Jesuits lately come into Calabria, with great Earnestness set about to exhort them, and preach the true Faith to them: But whatever Pains he and his Companions took, they had small Success in their Labours; for those People being obstinate in their Errors, and not fearing either Menaces, or the severest Punishment, grew more insolent and numerous, therefore it was found necessary to have recourse to a stronger and more effectual Remedy, which was, to apply to the Duke D'Alcala, then Viceroy of Naples; he, thinking it sufficient at first to proceed against them with a little more Earnestness and Care, wrote to the Vicar of Cosenza (as may be seen in his Letter published by *Chioccarelli*³) that with respect to those of Guardia Lombarda, imprisoned for Heresy, he should proceed by the Advice of Doctor Bernardino Santa Croce, who was then in those Parts, and at the same time he wrote to the Doctor, recommending the Matter to him: But finding that ordinary Remedies were not sufficient for so inveterate a Disease, and it being represented to him that the Hereticks in Calabria daily increased, and being regardless of Punishment or Threats, were likely to occasion great Disorders; the Viceroy, in order to suppress their Insolence, sent thither Annibale Moles, a Judge of the Vicariate, with a good Number of Soldiers, some from Naples, and some from the adjacent Places; but the Judge met with a bad Reception, for those People, refusing Obedience to any Magistrate, took the Field, and assembling in such Numbers as look'd like a formid Army, made a vigorous Defence, being resolved to die rather than quit their Errors: On the contrary, as it usually happens in religious Wars, fearing nothing, they ran with Joy to encounter Death, fully persuaded, that by dying in that Quarrel they went directly to Heaven, there, in Company with the Angels, to enjoy God. Upon this Occasion, the Duke D'Alcala made use of Scipio Spinelli, Lord of Guardia, for re-inforcing his Troops; because, in order to disperse these Hereticks, there was a Necessity to engage them in the Field: The Battle was vigorously fought, and although many of them were killed upon the Spot, yet those that were left alive would not yield, but, full of Courage, finding that their Number was so small that they were not able to stand their Ground in the open Field, they retired within the Walls of Guardia, which (besides the natural Strength of its Situation, which render'd it able to resist any Attack) they fortified after such a manner, that they made it a secure Sanctuary. Spinelli despairing of Success by open Force, had recourse to Deceit, and under pretence of bringing in Prisoners, sent some bold Men, well arm'd, into the Castle; these discovering themselves, and fighting bravely, routed the Head Men, and made a great Slaughter among the rest; some fled, and many were made Prisoners: All their Effects were confiscated, and the most obstinate were condemned to the Flames, at the same Time that their Head, Lewis Pascale, a Piedmontese, was burnt by Order of the Inquisition in *Rome*⁴. Thus were they at last extirpated; and Anania wrote an accurate Piece upon the Subject in Latin Verse, but (as P. Fiore says) the Author not suffering it to be printed, we are now depriv'd of that Poem. The greater Part of those People being destroyed, as we have said, they endeavoured by all Means to convert the few that remained, and to extinguish their Errors by severe Catechisings, and constant Preaching, whilst the Duke D'Alcala, on the other Hand, did not stick to punish them with Rigour, giving Orders to the Royal Chamber, to proceed to the Sale of the confiscated Goods of those of Guardia and S. Sisto, that had been put to Death⁵; he forbid all Communication with them, and prohibited Marriage with them, till such Time as the true Faith should flourish amongst them, and their false Doctrines were intirely rooted out; and at present the Inhabitants of those Places, who are very numerous, live just like the other Subjects, and profess the true Faith in its Purity.

THE Duke D'Alcalà was obliged to use the same Severity in the City of Naples, as in Calabria. There were in that City many Seeds of false Doctrine remaining; the Conversations kept up in Toledo's Time at the Houses of Vittoria Colonna, and Julia Gonzaga (both suspected of Heresy) had infected many; therefore the Duke keeping a more strict Watch over them than formerly, many were discovered, and summoned, under the Penalty of having their Goods confiscated, to appear before the Archbishop's Vicar: But two of them underwent a more severe Punishment, viz. Giovan-Francesco d'Alois, of Caserta, and Giovan-Bernardino Gargano, of Aversa, who having been imprisoned, and condemned as Hereticks, were, upon the 24th of March 1564. publickly beheaded in the Market-Place, and afterwards their Bodies were burnt in the Sight of the whole City¹. Then they proceeded to the Confiscation of their Goods, but not without Opposition, because the Neapolitans insisted upon Julius III's Bull, agreed to by the Emperor, by which, as has been said, no Goods of Hereticks could be confiscated in the Kingdom of Naples. This Debate is yet to be seen in the Accounts given of D'Alois's Trial by the Deputies Saleritano and *Revertera*².

THESE severe Punishments, and the Harmony that was seen between the Ecclesiastical and Secular Courts, not only struck Terror into the Neapolitans, but they were likewise afraid, that under that Cloke, it had been concerted to establish in Naples the Tribunal of Inquisition, so much abhorr'd by them: So that it being rumour'd about the City, that the Duke had a Mind to introduce it after the Spanish Manner, and the Citizens being frighten'd at so many Citations from the Vicarial Court, upon pain of Confiscation of Goods, many Families left the City, with all their Effects: And the Inhabitants beginning to murmur on account of the Execution of D'Alois and Gargano, lest an Insurrection should follow, the whole Catalan Street and Ward was deserted³. The City continued many Days in this unsettled Condition, during which Time, there were frequent Meetings of the Wards; at last, it was determin'd to send some Persons to the Viceroy, plainly to tell him, that they would never suffer any Tribunal of Inquisition, any more than their Ancestors had done. The Duke being a Man of great Probity and Wisdom, and knowing how odious such a Novelty was to the Neapolitans, the great Difficulties that must attend the introducing of it, and the dismal Consequences which the like Attempt had produced under Toledo's Government, prudently laid aside all Thoughts of it.

BUT the City, not content with this, resolv'd to dispatch an Ambassador to the King in Spain, to beg of his Majesty that he would never impose an Inquisition upon the City and Kingdom of Naples; and that according to the Agreement made in the Pontificate of Julius III. there might be no more Confiscation of the Goods of Hereticks: For this Embassy they made Choice of the celebrated Paolo d'Arezzo, once the Ornament of the Council of Santa Chiara, afterwards of the Order of Theatines, and at last Archbishop of Naples and Cardinal. Although he had thrown off the long Robe, and put on the Monks Habit, he refused the Office; but being encouraged by Cardinal Charles Borromeo, and by the Pope himself, he at last accepted of the Embassy⁴. The City gave him (besides the Letters address'd to the King) sufficient Instructions, together with the Bull of Julius III. containing the Agreement abovementioned⁵. With these he departed in 1564. and arriving at the Court of Madrid, he was graciously received by the King, and having represented to his Majesty the Request of the People, and delivered their Letters, the King freely granted all that they desired, ordering that Naples should never be troubled with the Inquisition, and that in Cases of Religion, no other manner of Proceeding should be practis'd but the ordinary Way; for which End, he wrote three Letters, two to the City of Naples, dated the 10th of March 1565. and another to the Viceroy of the same Date; and all three containing the same Declaration. These Letters are recorded by Chioccarelli ¹, in which, amongst other Things, are these Words; By the Tenor of this Letter we say and declare, that it was not, nor is our Intention to establish the Inquisition, after the Manner of Spain, in the said City and Kingdom; but that the ordinary Way of Proceeding be continued as it was, and shall be observed and practised as formerly, without the least Alteration: And elsewhere; so that the Ordinaries may do their Duties as they ought.

P. ARLZZO, returning from his Embassy, stopt at Rome, from whence he sent to Naples an Account of the good Success of his Negotiation at Madrid, which gave intire Satisfaction to the Napolitans, and removed all Jealousy of the Inquisition, the People being overjoyed at the great Bounty and Clemency of the King.

BUT this was not sufficient to put a Stop to the Abuses of the Roman Inquisition. By Virtue of these Royal Letters, the Ordinaries could only proceed against Delinquents in Matters of Religion in the ordinary Way; but Rome went on prosecuting them as formerly, taking Information against the Subjects of this Kingdom, and often arresting them, and carrying both them and their Processes to Rome. It is true, nothing was done without the Viceroy's Approbation, nor had the Commissions from Rome any Force till the Royal Exequatur was first obtained, in which the Duke of Alcalá was very exact. But as the Viceroy was very severe where Commissions were put in Execution without the Exequatur Regium, by disannulling all their Acts, and setting at Liberty all their Prisoners, of which Chioccarelli gives some Instances ², so he was ready to favour and assist the Roman Inquisitors, when the Royal Exequatur was obtained, allowing their Commissaries to form Processes, to imprison the Accused, to sell their Goods for defraying their own Charges, and even to carry to Rome Prisoners of all Ranks and Conditions.

THE Proceedings of the Inquisition of Rome against the Marquis Di Vico are very famous. Ever since the Year 1560. that Tribunal had appointed an Apostolick Commissary to take Information against him in the City of Benevento, where Witnesses were summoned, per Edictum, from the neighbouring Places, and examined against him. And the Process being sent to Rome, and in a Meeting of the Inquisition, held in the Presence of the Pope, it being determined to imprison the Marquis, on the first Day of November 1564. Cardinal Alessandrino wrote a Letter to the Duke of Alcalá, begging of him, that he would either send the Marquis, with a strong Guard, Prisoner to the Holy Office, or take sufficient Bail of him to present himself before it, because it had been so ordained by the Cardinals his Collegues in the Pope's Presence. The Viceroy was obliged to give Orders to the Court of the Vicariate to take Bail for 10,000 Crowns that he should present himself before the Inquisition in Rome ³. And afterwards, the Cardinal Granvela, in the very Beginning of his Viceroyalty, suffer'd two old Catalans, who had refused to abjure Judaism, to be carried to Rome, and, continuing obstinate, they were there put to Death.

LIKEWISE in the Duke D'Ossuna's Government, that Viceroy, on the 14th of November 1583, wrote to the Governor of Calabria, telling him, that he had received a Letter from Cardinal Satell, in the Pope's Name, signifying, that he must secure the Person of Giovanni-Battista Spinelli, and send him to Rome, to answer to what was laid to his Charge by the Inquisition; and therefore, being willing to give all Satisfaction and Assistance in what concerns the Holy Office, he ordained, and commanded the said Governor, to send the Prince Prisoner to the Royal Chamber, or take Bail for him in 25,000 Crowns, to present himself within a Month before the Inquisition of Rome, and not to depart from thence without the Leave of that Tribunal: And in case he gave that Bail, he might set him at Liberty, if not, keep him Prisoner, and send him (the Viceroy) an Account.

THE same Viceroy, having received Letters from the said Cardinal Satell, telling him, that the Holy Office, for Matters concerning Religion, wanted to have the Person of Francesco Conte, Captain of the Island of Capri, to be secured; wrote to the Deputy of the Vicariate ordering him to seize the said Captain, and to take Bail of him for 10,000 Crowns, to present himself before that Tribunal in Rome, otherwise to keep him Prisoner till further Orders. On the 8th of March 1586. he dispatch'd such another Order to Carlo Spinelli, Deputy of the Vicariate, to send Francesco Amoroso, late Captain of Pietra Molara, under a safe Guard to the Inquisition in Rome.

THE Count of Miranda followed the said Duke's Example; for provided that Licence, or the Exequatur Regium was demanded, which was easily obtained, he did not fail to shew all the Favour, and give all the Assistance he could to the Roman Inquisition, to the great Detriment of the Kingdom, and of the Subjects thereof: Whence proceeded greater Disorders afterwards; for the Court of Rome pretending, that their Commissions did not want any Placitum Regium, endeavoured to execute them without asking Leave: So that the Commissaries of the Roman Inquisition, being for the most part Bishops, imprisoned Laicks without consulting the Viceroy, and sent them to Rome.

S E C T. III.

The Court of Rome endeavoured by Stealth to introduce the Inquisition into Naples during the Reigns of Philip III. and IV. and of Charles II. but was always rejected, and at last, by an Edict of the Emperor Charles VI. altogether abolished.

IN those Times the Inquisition of Rome was arrived at such a Pitch of Arrogance, that they pretended, that even the greatest Monarchs of the Earth were not exempted from their Jurisdiction; therefore they introduced two Ways of proceeding, one open, known to every body, which they made use of against the meaner Sort of People, whom they condemned to Death; the other secret and hidden, by which Kings, and others of the highest Rank were privately condemned; and Means were found out for putting their Sentences against them in Execution, by declaring them to have forfeited their Kingdoms and Dignities, and allowing the Seditious and Malcontents, nay encouraging them by Indulgences, and easing their Consciences, to chase them from their Thrones, or to lay Snares against their Lives: Which hidden Way of proceeding, Francesco Suarez, a Spanish Jesuit, has revealed to us ¹ in his Book called Defensio Fidei. And Richerius says ², that this hidden Way of proceeding has often been put into Practice by Means of the Jesuites; and 'tis probable that this was the Method practised in France against Henry III. There was published in Rome in 1585. a Book intitled Directorium Inquisitorum, which contained so many Impertinencies as made it detested by all the World: Such as these; That the Inquisition had Power to pronounce Sentence, Capitaliter in Hæreticos, & Fautores Hæreticorum: that the Pope had both the Spiritual and Temporal Sword, to punish all, even Kings: that the Holy Office ought to proceed, per Delationem, aut Denunciationem & Inquisitionem, laying aside all Proceedings per Accusationem, because that Method was multum periculosus, & multum litigiosus; that all Persons should be allowed to bear Witness, even Enemies, People of infamous Characters, perjured Persons, Ruffians, Whores, and all Persons whatsoever; that no Account ought to be given either who the Witnesses were, or what they said; and that there should be no Appeal from that Tribunal: In short, that the Inquisition ought to proceed without any Regard to the Laws of Defence, or the Rules of Justice; that it should not be tied up to any Order, or be in the least dependant. Whence proceeded in Rome, towards the End of this Century, most terrible Executions of People suspected of Heresy; and amongst others in 1600. Giordano Bruno, a Dominican of Nola, was burnt in Rome, being accused of having taught the Plurality of Worlds; that the Jews were the only Descendants of Adam, and that Moses was a great Magician ³.

WHENCE in our Kingdom, the Placitum Regium was no more sought to their Commissions, but they proceeded with the same Independance as the Bishop of Molfetta did, when, during the Government of the Duke D'Alba in 1628. he was Commiffary of the Roman Inquifition, and the Popes Legate in Naples; and they obftinately infifting, that they had Power to proceed in that manner, there was a Neceffity for our greateft Lawyers to exert themfelves in demonftrating the Abufe, and at laft the King himfelf was obliged to interpoze his Authority, and forbid it. Upon this Occafion, Fabio Capese Galeotta, the King's Counfeller at that Time, and Advocate of his Royal Patrimony, published a Discourfe infcribed to the Duke D'Alba, and alfo fome Allegations. Vincenzo Corcione, Prefident of the Royal Chamber, likewife published fome other Instances, fhewing that it was not only contrary to Law, but alfo to the antient Custom of the Kingdom, to imprifon any Subject on account of Herefy, without firft acquainting the Viceroy for the Time being, and having his Licence.

THIS occafioned a Letter from King Philip III. forbidding the Orders of the Inquifition to be put in Execution in the Kingdom without the Viceroy's Knowledge; declaring at the fame Time, that this Prohibition did not comprehend the Tribunals of the Holy Office of the Courts of the Archbifhops and Bifhops of the Kingdom, which had no Occafion for the Exequatur Regium, whilft they proceeded in their ordinary Courfe in Matters of Religion; but that they were not to execute any Commiffion fent them from the Holy Office of Rome, or from the Pope, without acquainting the Viceroy¹.

BUT this Letter of Philip III.'s did not fufficiently remedy the Grievance, becaufe the Bifhops of the Kingdom were not thereby prohibited to receive Commiffions from the Roman Inquifition, and to proceed as Delegates thereof; but they, thinking it fufficient if they got the Exequatur, favour'd the faid Inquifition in every Thing, drew up the Proceffes, put People in Prifon, and fent them to Rome; whereas by Philip II.'s Letters, the Bifhops had only Power to proceed in religious Matters, as Ordinaries, but not as Delegates of the Roman Inquifition.

AN Instance of this Abufe happened in 1614. in the famous Cafes of Julia di Marco da Sepino, a Nun of the third Order of S. Francis, of P. Agnello Arciere Crocifero, and of Doctor Giufeppe de Vicariis; which Three, making an ill Ufe of myftick Divinity in Naples, had fallen into a thoufand ridiculous and vile Practices, and had given Rife to a moft abominable Society, into which they had received many Difciples of both Sexes: Fr. Diodati Gentile, Bifhop of Caserta, who, living in Naples, charged with the Affairs of the Inquifition, by Commiffion from the Holy Office of Rome, had Orders from the faid Tribunal to fhut up Julia in the Convent; and afterwards, by another Order from the fame Roman Inquifition, ſhe was transported to another Convent in Cerreto. P. Agnello was called before the Holy Office of Rome, where he appear'd, and was fentenced to hear no more Confefſions, and never to return to Naples. The Bifhop of Caserta being made Nuncio of Naples by Paul V. Fr. Stefano de Vicariis, Bifhop of Nocera, was made Inquifitor, and got Leave from Rome to transport Julia to Nocera. This Nun had very powerful Advocates, of which Fabio di Coſtanzo, Marquis of Corleto, and Deputy Dean of the Collateral Council, was one, who obtained Leave of the Inquifition of Rome, the Chief of which was then the Cardinal of Arragon, for Julia to return to Naples, and D. Alphouſus Suarez, Deputy of the Royal Chamber, gave her a convenient Apartment in his Palace, whither the Fame of her feign'd Sanctity drew a great Concourse, not only of the chief Nobility, eſpecially Spaniards, who are naturally addicted to the like Enthuſiaſms, but likewiſe of Ladies and Gentlewomen. But the Theatin Fathers, by Means of the Confefſions which ſome of Julia's unwary Difciples made to them, diſcovered the abominable Practices committed by that Society, and prevailed upon them to give Information againſt their Accomplices to the Bifhop of Nocera, and they undertook to let him ſee the ſhameful Copulations of Men and Women in Julia's Apartment; but theſe Fathers ſuſpecting that the Bifhop of Nocera inclined to favour Julia, wrote to the Cardinals of the Holy Office of Rome, giving them an Account of what had paſſ'd, whereupon the Cardinals ſent a Commiffion to M. Maranta, Bifhop of Calvi, to proceed in that Affair as their Delegate.

THE Theatines were thwarted in this Cauſe by their old Antagoniſts the Jesuits, who favoured Julia, and had admitted Giufeppe de Vicariis into their Society, and they undertook the Defence the more vigorously, that they ſaw the Count of Le...

then Viceroy, by the Persuasions of Julia's Friends, had taken her under his Protection; for when the Bishop Maranta was about to examine the Witnesses, the Viceroy sent immediately for him, and asked him, if he proceeded by Virtue of a Commission from the Holy Office of Rome. Maranta not only shew'd him the Commission from Rome, but discover'd to him all the Wickedness committed by this new Society, not sticking to tell him, that he ought not to suffer the Vicequeen his Wife, to have any Communication with Julia's Disciples. The Viceroy, surpriz'd at this Account, believed what the Bishop said, and gave him leave to put Julia and Giuseppe de Vicariis in Prison, who were accordingly sent to that belonging to the Archbishoprick.

THIS sudden Imprisonment put the City in great Consternation; for Julia's Friends, who were for the most part Noblemen, Officers, and Religious of the most conspicuous Orders, made a terrible Bustle, and murmuring loudly at such a manner of Proceeding, went to the Viceroy, and told him, that what was alledged against them, was pure Calumny, and proceeded from the Rancour and Malice which the Theatines bore the Jesuites, because Julia's Disciples frequented their Churches. This Remonstrance, so warmly urged, stagger'd the Viceroy, who then began to believe that it was all a Trick of the Theatines in order to discredit the Jesuites; so that he sent again for Bishop Maranta, and check'd him severely, who, in his own Vindication, and to shew the Viceroy that it was no Calumny, delivered him the Process which he had drawn up against the Offenders, to the End he might no longer protect them. The Viceroy gave the Process to be consider'd by his Ministers, by which means Julia's Favourers came to know the Accusation and the Witnesses, and therefore they made ready for a vigorous Defence, and chose for their Advocate the famous Scipio Rovito.

ON the other Hand the Theatines, who had been unjustly reproached, sent an Account immediately to the Inquisition of Rome, of the Disorders occasioned by Maranta's exposing the Process, which gave such Disgust there, that they sent Orders to that Bishop to meddle no more in that Affair, and even called him to Rome to give an Account of his Proceedings; and at the same time they charged the Nuncio with the whole Affair, and order'd him to proceed with all Rigour, according to the Rules of that Tribunal.

THE Nuncio proceeded in the Cause as Delegate, without the least Opposition, according to the Orders sent him by the Inquisition. He took new and more exact Information; he removed Julia and Giuseppe from the Archbishop's Prison, to his own Palace; and upon his advising the Inquisitors of Rome of what he had done, they commanded him to send them both with a strong Guard to Rome, where P. Agnello, Julia's Confessor, was likewise in close Prison. The Nuncio perform'd their Orders with much Secrecy in the Night-time, and they were arrived at Rome before it was known in Naples that they had been sent thither. Julia's Friends were no sooner appriz'd of this, than they sent Girolamo Martino, and D. Giovanni Salamanca, to plead their Cause; but these, upon their Arrival in Rome, were likewise put in Prison by the Inquisition, though some Months after, on the 14th of March 1615. Salamanca was set at Liberty upon giving Bail of 3000 Crowns for his Appearance, when call'd for by the Inquisition, and Martino was likewise dismissed on the 11th of April, but by giving a greater Bail, and upon the same Terms.

PAUL V. with particular Attention, made the Inquisitors examine into this Cause with much Exactness and Diligence; and P. Agnello, Julia, and Giuseppe de Vicariis, being found Guilty of Heresy, they were condemn'd, first to make publick Recantation, and then to perpetual Imprisonment; and accordingly, upon the 12th of July 1615. a Scaffold and Seats being made in a most solemn Manner in the Church of Minerva, before the College of Cardinals, many of the principal Nobility, and a vast Crowd of People, they all three abjur'd their Errors, confessing their vile Practices, and mystical Phrenzies: And that Julia's Friends in Naples might be undeceiv'd in their Opinion of her pretended Sanctity, the Pope order'd an Abstract of their Process to be read in the Cathedral of Naples on the 9th of August, to the Amazement and Wonder of all People.

THE great Dexterity and Vigilance of the Court of Rome on the one Hand, and the Negligence, or rather Connivance of the King's Ministers in Naples on the other, were the Occasion, that, notwithstanding the Edicts of our Kings, Inquisitors sent from Rome were suffered in the City and Kingdom of Naples, and often proceeded as Delegates against such as were accused of Heresy or Judaism, and even imprison'd them, and sent them to Rome, where they were condemn'd to abjure in the Minerva; of which many Examples might be given, if it were not out of Respect to many Families yet extant.

BUT in the Reign of Philip IV. the indiscreet Behaviour of M. Piazza, Deputy from the Roman Inquisition, occasioned a new Uproar in the City; so that the Neapolitans, being now grown wiser, applied themselves in good Earnest to root out all Remains of the Inquisition. Piazza having come to Naples in 1661. whilst the Count De Penaranda was Viceroy, took up his Residence in the Convent of the Hieronymites of St. Peter of Pisa, where he received Informations, and proceeded by Commission from Rome against such as were suspected of Heresy. It happen'd that Year, that a Friar had given a certain Book to a Bolognese residing in Naples, who, fancying that he found in it some Things not Orthodox, without any more ado went to Piazza to accuse the Friar of Heresy, and deliver'd him the Book. After some Days, the Friar ask'd his Book of the Bolognese, but, under several Pretences, he put him off, so that the Friar seeing himself thus made a Mock of, and being in great Friendship with the Duke of Noci's Barber, he desired his Assistance. The Barber went immediately, accompanied by some of his Friends, to the Bolognese, and threatening him severely, obliged him to promise to return the Book the next Day. The Bolognese went directly to M. Piazza, and desired that he would be pleased to return him the Book, telling him the Perplexity he was in, and that he was insulted for not returning the Book to the Owner. But M. Piazza, instead of returning him the Book, sent some of his Tip-Staffs, with Orders, to apprehend not only the Barber, but all those that had insulted the Accuser, and they were accordingly put in Prison.

THIS imprudent and scandalous Imprisonment being told the Duke of Noci, put him in such a Passion, that having made a grievous Complaint of it to many of the Nobility, he immediately assembled the Seggi, and in great Fury went to the Viceroy, and, not able to bridle his Passion, spoke to him with too much Freedom, and little Respect; the Viceroy, surpriz'd at his Boldness, but foreseeing the Mischiefs that might ensue, wisely dissembled his Resentment, and to pacify him, sent immediately a Message to M. Piazza to set the Prisoners at Liberty, which was accordingly done.

BUT that was not sufficient to quiet the City now in Commotion, and jealous, that by these Overt-Acts, and conceal'd Processes, it had been resolv'd to introduce a real Inquisition, contrary to the gracious Concessions of Ferdinand the Catholic, of the Emperor Charles V. and of King Philip II. and that therefore it was necessary to remove all Remains of that Tribunal, since by Right the Cognizance of all Religious Matters belong'd to the Bishops, who, without any Delegation from Rome, ought to proceed by their own Authority in the ordinary Way, without hidden Judgments and Processes, but as they used to do in other Spiritual Causes: For this Purpose, the Wards being assembled, Deputies were chosen to represent to the Viceroy the Sentiments of the City, and to manage this important Affair with the utmost Care and Diligence. The Deputies declared to the Viceroy, That the City was determin'd to suffer no more Inquisitors, and they also put him in Mind of the past Inconveniencies, and the Aversion of the Neapolitans to the Name of the Inquisition. The Count, seeing them so resolute, very prudently thought fit to give them Satisfaction; and having at large represented the Matter to the King, he in the mean time gave M. Piazza to understand, that he must instantly depart the City and Kingdom, which he did: And at the same time, being offended with the Duke of Noci, and some of the Deputies, who, too boldly, and with too much Warmth, had push'd on this Affair; he order'd the Duke to be put in Casfel-nuovo, and afterwards sent him Prisoner to Spain, where having clear'd himself from the Crimes laid to his Charge, he was set at Liberty, and, in November 1663. return'd to the Kingdom. Some of the Deputies were made Prisoners, others of them were confined to their Houses, and D. Tiberio Caraffa, Prince of Chiusano, D. Rinaldo Mirabella, and D. Andrea di Genaro, in order to avoid the first Sally of the Viceroy's Passion, took Sanctuary in a Church; but a most gracious Answer to the Representations made to the King being arrived, in which his Majesty declared, That they had no Reason to be under any new Apprehensions, for that all the Ordinances made in Favour of the City and Kingdom of Naples by the Kings his Ancestors, cestors, and especially by his Grandfather Philip II. should be inviolably observed: The Viceroy, by a particular Letter ¹, signified this Answer to the Magistrates and Deputies of the City, who, being restor'd to his Favour upon account of the Birth of Charles II. went to return him Thanks. By this, it was thought, that the Court of Rome would never send to this Kingdom any more Inquisitors, Delegations, or Commissions to its Bishops concerning Matters of Religion.

M. PIAZZA's being chased out of Naples, put a Stop for some time to the coming of Inquisitors from Rome, but they did not give over their Pretensions, nor did they fail to make new Attempts when a proper Occasion offer'd, and which appeared plainly in the Reign of Charles II. by reason of a new Philosophy introduced into Naples, which, running down the Scholastick Philosophy professed by the Monks, was very unacceptable at Rome.

THE Academy set up at Naples, under the Name of Investiganti, of which the Marquis D'Arena declared himself Protector, quite removed the Slavery commonly borne with hitherto, of swearing in verba Magistri; and having laid aside the Scholastick Philosophy, left its Members at more Freedom to philosophize according to the Dictates of Reason. These Academists were all Learned Men, and the brightest Genius's of the City, which gained them great Reputation amongst Men of Knowledge, and especially among the Youth, to whom it was an easy Matter to demonstrate the Errors and Dreams of the Monkish Philosophy. The Works of Petrus Gassendus had acquired great Fame in France, as well upon the Account of his great Learning and Eloquence, as for his having restored the Epicurean Philosophy, which, compar'd to that of Aristotle, and especially as taught in the Schools, had the Reputation of being more solid and true. These Books were brought to Naples, and when they were read there, the Youth was infinitely pleased with them, not only upon the Account of the Principles which they taught, but for the Variety of good Learning they contained: So that in a short Time they all became Gassendists; and this Philosophy was profess'd by the new Philosophers. And although Gassendus had adapted his Epicurean System to the Catholick Religion, which he himself professed, yet Titus Lucretius being the greatest Supporter of it, many were induced to read that Poet, hitherto known but to very few; however, the Investiganti, as well as Gassendus, having discovered the Errors of Lucretius, made the Youth abhor them; and demonstrated, that his Philosophy was inconsistent with our Religion, and therefore ought not to be studied. What made them likewise afraid of it, was the Fate of Galileo de Galilei, who, notwithstanding his reverend gray Hairs, was obliged in Rome to abjure his Opinion concerning the Motion of the Earth.

BUT a few Years after, the Works of Renatus des Cartes were likewise brought to Naples; and 'tis said, that Tommaso Cornelio ², a famous Physician and Philosopher at that Time, was the first Introducer of them. The Youth therefore, and especially the Physicians, were very intent upon studying them, and very soon abandon'd the Epicurean Philosophy, and applied themselves to that of Renatus; and those who formerly were Gassendists, at last became most zealous Cartesians.

THE Monks seeing, that by these new Studies, their Schools were not only forsaken, but themselves ridiculed for the many Fooleries which they taught, contracted such an implacable Hatred against the new Philosophers, that they ascribed many Errors in Religion to them, cavilling at all their Propositions, and treating themselves as Hereticks.

THIS was sufficient to give a Handle to the Inquisitors of Rome to arm themselves anew, and again endeavour to introduce their Commissaries into Naples, in order to watch the Proceedings of the new Philosophers. And they not only attempted, but actually establish'd an Inquisitor, who received Informations, put People in Prison, and, which was more, had his own Prison in the Convent of S. Dominico Maggiore. This Inquisitor was M. Gilberto, Bishop of Cava, who exercised this Office by secret Processes, and with such Rigour and Insolence, that he often forced many ignominiously to abjure, for no other Crime, but their holding Opinions in Matters purely Philosophical, contrary to those of the Schools, although there was nothing of Religion in them ; which occasioned many Complaints and Disorders in Naples.

THE Deputies of the City, moved by these Proceedings, had recourse to the Count of S. Stefano, then Viceroy, and having represented to him, that the City was determined to have no Inquisitor, even with a limited Power, but that all Religious Matters within the Kingdom, ought to be decided by the Bishops in the ordinary Way ; they intreated him to order the Bishop of Cava immediately to depart the City and Kingdom, to suppress the Prison he had erected in S. Dominico, and to remove the Prisoners to the Archbishop's Gaol, in order to be punished by him in the ordinary Way, and as the Canons directed.

THE Viceroy having proposed the Matter in the Collateral Council, with Advice thereof, ordered the Inquisitor to depart the City and Kingdom, the Prison of S. Dominico to be suppressed, and the Prisoners to be removed to that of the Archbishop, which was accordingly performed ; and the Count, in order to make the City easy, by a Letter, dated the 27th of September 1691. acquainted the Deputies that he had complied with their Request.

THE Count at the same Time laid the Matter before King Charles II. who, by his Royal Letters, dated in Madrid the 25th of March 1692, not only approved of all that the Viceroy had done, but likewise ordained, that for the future, all the Privileges granted to the City and Kingdom, with respect to the Inquisition, should be inviolably observed, and that the Cardinal Archbishop of Naples should proceed to take Cognizance of the Crimes of those Prisoners, and that the Pope's Nuncio should not meddle in any thing relating to the Inquisition, and that the said Nuncio might acquaint the Pope (as he had also done by the Duke of Medina Celi, his Ambassador at Rome) that the Aversion of the Neapolitans to the Inquisition, was not the particular Humour of some few, as the Clergy had made his Holiness believe¹, but the general Bent of the whole City.

TWO Neapolitans, Doctor Basilio Gianelli, and Giovan-Battista Menuzio, having also been imprisoned in Madrid, at the Instance of the Roman Inquisitors ; and Francesco Sernicella, Envoy from the City to the King, running the same Risque, the Deputies had recourse to the King, representing the great Discontent of the City at this Way of proceeding of the Roman Inquisitors, praying him to order the said Gentlemen to be set at Liberty ; the King most graciously dispatched his Royal Letters, dated the 27th of the same Month of March, to the Viceroy ; in which, having confirm'd his former Orders, he quieted the City, by letting them know, that Menuzio was already at Liberty ; and as to Gianelli, he had sent pressing Instances to the Inquisitor-General for releasing him also, which was accordingly done soon after².

BUT neither the frequent bold Repulses, nor the pressing and vigorous Orders of our Kings, nor the Care and Vigilance of the Deputies, were sufficient to quiet the Inquisitors of Rome. They, not being able to proceed openly as before, went another Way to work, by making use of secret, under-hand, and subtle Dealings. In the Year 1695. they published an Edict in Rome, whereby, according to the Method of that Tribunal, they prescribed sundry Rules to the Bishops and Inquisitors how to perform their Offices ; and seeing they take it for granted, that their Edicts stand in need of no Exequatur Regium in any Part of Christendom, but that their being published in Rome is binding every where, therefore they secretly attempted to have this Edict published in any one Diocese of the Kingdom, without the Royal Exequatur.

THEY likewise found an Expedient for sending their Commissions to the Bishops themselves, ordering them to proceed, not as Ordinaries, but as their Delegates ; and besides, they created Officers (for the most part Monks and Friars) who depended upon them, and had their Commissions from the Holy Office, to act in the very Courts of the Bishops.

IN order therefore to root out all Vestige and Remains of an Inquisition, there was a Necessity of having recourse anew to the King. This Work was begun in the Reign of Charles II. but was not perfected till the Time of our most august Emperor Charles VI. ; for no sooner had his Victorious Arms entered our Kingdom, than the City solicited him to extirpate the Inquisition Root and Branch, as the most important Service that could be done them.

TO put a Stop to the first Incroachment, he dispatched Letters from Barcelona, dated the 28th of August 1709. directed to Cardinal Grimani, Viceroy, whereby he positively and expressly ordered, that no Bull, Brief, or other Writ from Rome, relating to the Inquisition, or that had the least Tendency to introduce it, should be executed in the Kingdom ¹.

THE Viceroy took care to remove the second Incroachment, viz. the appointing Officers in the Courts of the Bishops, depending upon the Inquisition of Rome; for the Neapolitans having discovered, that a certain bare-footed Teresian Friar, named F. Maurizio, frequented the Archbishop's Court in Naples, with a secret Delegation from the Inquisition of Rome, and boasted that he was Commissary of that Tribunal, sent their Deputy immediately to the Viceroy, to beg of him to order the said Friar to depart the Kingdom, and to intimate to the Archbishop's Court, that they should proceed in the ordinary Way in Causes relating to the Inquisition, without having any thing to do with extraordinary Officers; whereupon the Viceroy having called an extraordinary Collateral Council, with their Consent, agreed to the City's Request, and ordered F. Maurizio to leave the City in two Days, and the Kingdom in eight, which he readily complied with; and the Cardinal, for the Satisfaction of the People, by a Letter under his own Hand, dated the 2d of August the same Year ², acquainted the Eletto with it.

NEVERTHELESS, the Deputies in Barcelona did not fail to petition the King, that, in order to deprive the Clergy of all Pretence of imposing upon, or oppressing them by their subtle Inventions, he would be pleased, by his Royal Letters, to ordain, that for the Future, All Causes concerning Faith should be tried by the Bishops in the ordinary Way, as they used to do other Crimes, and according to the Canons.

THE King consented to the Request, and confirmed all the Privileges granted to the City relating to that Matter by the Kings his Predecessors, and especially those of Philip II.; and sent an express Order to the Viceroy Cardinal Grimani, By no means to suffer any Person to proceed, within the Kingdom of Naples, in Causes relating to our Holy Faith, except the Archbishops and Bishops, as Ordinaries, in the usual Manner, as is practised in other Crimes and Causes purely Ecclesiastical, as may be seen in his Letters, dated in Barcelona the 15th of September the said Year 1709 ³. The last Words of this Order, which were not in that of Philip II. left the Ecclesiasticks no room for cavilling at the ancient Privileges, and inventing new Quirks.

THUS were all Remains of the Inquisition altogether suppressed amongst us; but still the Deputies continue upon their Guard, and have a watchful Eye upon the Clergy for fear of new Surprizes: And indeed they have Reason, because the Ecclesiasticks are so artful and diligent, that they slip no fit Opportunity for compassing their Ends, and at unawares making fresh and unexpected Attempts.

C H A P. VI.

Solyman, in Conjunction with the King of France, at the Instigation of the Prince of Salerno, who had rebell'd, makes a new Attempt upon the Kingdom of Naples. New Donatives made for supporting the War, which at last is dropt.

AFTER the African Expedition, and after the War which the Emperor had carried on in 1551. against Maurice Duke of Saxony (for supporting of which 30,000 Ducats had been sent from Naples) and the Comotions occasioned by the Inquisition being likewise at an End, when it was thought that the Kingdom would have enjoyed Peace and Tranquillity, News was brought of Preparations for a new War, much more frightful than any that had ever been heretofore; for the Princes, who jointly had undertaken it, were the most powerful and formidable of all Europe. Francis I. King of France, being dead, Henry II. his Successor, inherited not only his Kingdom, but his Hatred and Enmity to the Emperor: And, in order to facilitate his Design upon the Milanese, had entered into a League with Solyman against him; in which it was agreed to attack Naples by Sea with their joint Fleets, that of France being to set Sail from the West, at the same Time that Solyman's was to put to Sea from the East. These Princes were yet more incensed, and prompted to undertake the Expedition, by the Prince of Salerno, who, by reason of a private Enmity between him and the Viceroy, believing, that a Musquet Shot, fired at him as he passed from Naples to Salerno, by which he was slightly wounded, had been done by Order of Toledo, and the Accusation meeting with little Credit at the Emperor's Court, the Viceroy having been before-hand with him, by representing the Matter, he became much disgusted; and therefore, as soon as he was recovered of the Wound, he left the Kingdom under Colour of going to Padua to be cur'd of a pretended Disorder in the Nerves, proceeding from his Wound; and when he was called to Court by the Emperor, if he had obeyed, he might have been able to clear himself from the Crimes and Suspicions with which Toledo had charged him; but instead of complying, he sent Tommaso Pagano, who very impertinently desired the Emperor to give him his Parole for the Prince's Security when he should come to Court, at which the Emperor being much offended, gave him a suitable Answer, which so disgusted the Prince, that he very imprudently and rashly determined not to go; and therefore, revolting from the Emperor, he resolved to go and serve Henry King of France: So that having had an Interview with the Cardinal De Tournon, in all haste he went to France, where he was honourably received by the King; to whom having represented the Conquest of Naples as an easy Matter, the King was so eager upon it, that he immediately ordered some Gallies to be fitted out, and gave the Prince the Command of them, in order to join the Turkish Fleet. To excuse this Step, the Prince published a Manifesto, wherein he endeavoured to shew, that he had done great Service to the Emperor, both in his Wars and otherwise, for which he had been very ill rewarded by him and his Ministers. The Viceroy, who was overjoyed at the foolish Proceedings of the Prince, hearing of this Manifesto, said, That he had forgot to mention in it the greatest Piece of Service he had ever done the Emperor, which was this last, in leaving to him so fine a Principality

Principality as that of Salerno. However, this Rebellion did not surprize either the Emperor or Toledo, for they had always suspected him of being in the Interest of the King of France, whose Valour and Generosity he used constantly to extol: In the mean time he was declared a Rebel, condemned to die, and the Principality of Salerno, with the rest of his Estate, were confiscated.

THE Viceroy hearing of the Preparations, not only of the King of France, but of the Turk, and considering, that the League between two such powerful Enemies, would occasion great Trouble and Disorders in the Kingdom, lost no Time in preparing for a vigorous Defence; and knowing that the most effectual Means, was to have a good Store of Money, therefore having assembled the Barons, and represented to them, that it was not to be expected that the League between those two powerful Enemies, would be soon dissolved, because they wanted neither Will nor Power to prosecute their Design of conquering the Kingdom; therefore it was necessary to provide for the Remedy before it should be too late, which was, to lay up 300,000 Ducats for maintaining 30,000 Men for the Defence of this Kingdom only, in case it should be attack'd by the Enemies at unawares; and that this Money should be kept in a publick Chest by Men appointed by the City: Adding, that the very Noise of such a Preparation, would make their Enemies think well before they attack'd them, and, perhaps, frighten them from the Design. The Viceroy's Proposal was applauded by the whole Assembly; so that in all haste the Money was laid up in a publick Chest: And although the same was not made use of at this Time, yet it was afterwards a Means of saving the Kingdom against the League between the King of France, Pope Paul IV. and the Princes of Italy; of which hereafter.

WHILST these Preparations were making in Naples, News was brought, that the Turkish Fleet, at the earnest Sollicitations of the King of France, and the Prince of Salerno, had set Sail from Constantinople; and some Days after, on the 15th of July 1552. a Fleet of a hundred and fifty large Gallies, under the Command of Snam Bassa, and of which Draut Rais was Pilot, appeared in Sight of Naples, and anchor'd near the Island of Procida, which struck a terrible Consternation in the City; and almost every Day, while they continued there, some Gallies came as far as the Cape of Posilipo, to skirmish with some Genoese Gallies that lay there. The Turkish Fleet rode at Anchor near Procida, from the 15th of July to the 10th of August, when, all of a sudden, they weighed and sailed towards the Levant. It was reported, that this Departure was owing to the Management of Cesare Mormile, who coming in Competition with the Prince of Salerno, and being dissatisfied with the King of France, for preferring the Prince to him, had left France, and taken Shelter in Rome, where he treated with the Imperial Ambassador, and Cardinal Mendoza, about his being restored to the Emperor's Favour; and having got full Assurance, not only of the Emperor's Pardon, but likewise of having his Estate restor'd him, with the Viceroy's Passport he came Incognito to Naples, in order to treat with the Bassa about his Departure; and in the Viceroy's Name, having offered him 200,000 Ducats, provided he would leave the Coast, the Bassa was satisfied, and the Money was no sooner paid down, than he set sail with his Fleet towards the Levant, which freed the whole Kingdom from great Troubles. Mormile was very much caressed by the Viceroy; but the former Enmity between them not being quite effaced, many Objections were started in passing the Pardon, so that he not only could not recover his Estate, which had been already sold, but he had great Difficulty in getting a bare Equivalent.

IN the mean time the Prince of Salerno, who had been sent by the King of France to join the Turkish Fleet with his Gallies, though upon his Arrival at Genoa, he heard that they were sailed for the Levant, yet he was resolved to follow them, and eight Days after the Turkish Fleet had left the Gulph of Naples, he arrived at Iscbia with 26 Gallies, and getting certain Information from Rome of the Agreement made with Mormile, full of Rage he pursued the Turkish Fleet, and having passed the Phare of Messina, and not finding them, he went on his Course till he joined them; but the Bassa would by no means return without a new Order from his Master, but persuaded the Prince to go to Constantinople, and that Solyman would give him more powerful Assistance the next Year. The Prince went to Constantinople, where he remained all the Winter expecting that Solyman would perform his Promise; but his staying in that City, discovered both his Vanity and Levity; for having given himself up to Amours and Lewdness, he lost all Credit and Reputation tation with that Prince, and being become the Town-Talk, he was despised by every Body : So that he was disappointed of the promised Assistance for the Conquest of the Kingdom, for the Fleet was given to Peter Corsius, in order to subdue the Island of Corfica ; whereupon he returned to France, where, as long as Henry lived, he was handsomely treated, but after his Death, the Civil Wars breaking out in that Kingdom, and he siding with the Hugonots, was reduced to great Misery, and in 1568. in the 71st Year of his Age, he died in Avignon, not only a Rebel to his King, but to the Catholick Religion which he formerly professed.

THUS did this terrible Storm, which threatned Naples, blow over, but the following Years the famous Corfair Dragut did not fail to make Incurfions ; for he being sent by the Grand Seigneur in Favour of the King of France to harrafs the Kingdom in order to vex the Emperor, continually infested our Seas and the Maritime Towns : From which Mischiefs they were never free, because there being an eternal and irreconcilable War between the Kings of Spain and the Emperors of the Turks, there never was any Truce, but an implacable Hatred, and we were the greatest Sufferers, because many Millions yearly were not sufficient for ransoming our Captives, and nothing was to be expected from the Turks, who never redeem theirs ; nevertheless, out of Zeal for Religion, the vast Losses which our Kingdom suffered were not minded. But Naples being now dismember'd from the Monarchy of Spain, and govern'd by the Emperors of Germany, it has the good Fortune to be comprehended in the Treaties made with the Empire, so that Hostilities are ceased, and Commerce open'd with the Turks, to the great Advantage of the Kingdom.

C H A P. VII.

D. Peter de Toledo's Expedition against Sienna, in which he died. Philip the Prince of Spain's second Marriage with Mary Queen of England ; and a Resignation of the Kingdom of Naples in his Favour by the Emperor, who retires from the World into Estremadura, where he ended his Days in the Convent of S. Justus.

PETER DE TOLEDO, having put an End to the Troubles of Naples, governed the Kingdom with full Authority, but as he was obeyed by all, so he had many secret Enemies ; for the Prince of Salerno's Rebellion being discovered, and suspecting that there were others who intended likewise to revolt, he proceeded against the Suspected with great Rigour ; and the putting Antonio Grifone to Death, and the Information taken against others on the same Account, had rendered his Government both terrible and odious. Amongst the many Revolutions that happened in Italy this Year 1552. Sienna likewise revolted.

THIS Republick was under the Emperor's Protection, who had sent D. Diego Urtado Mendoza to be Governor of it : Mendoza having built a Citadel in Sienna of such Strength, as to be able, with a small Number of Spaniards, to defend itself against the City, made the Siennese suspect that he had a Mind to deprive them of their Liberty ; therefore they were resolved to have recourse to the King of France, who, taking them under his Protection, ordered his Ministers in Italy to consult with them about what was necessary to be done. It was concluded amongst them, that that the Count of Pitigliano, and the two Counts of Santa Fiore, should privately raise Six thousand Foot, and a good Number of Horse, which was immediately done: The Count of Pitigliano entered the City, and crying out Liberty, Liberty, and, with Three thousand Foot, joining the Inhabitants, he forced Otto di Monteguto, who had been sent by Cosimo de Medici, Duke of Florence, to assist the Imperialists, to retire under the Citadel, with some Slaughter on both Sides. Duke Cosimo was preparing to send a strong Reinforcement to Otto, but the Republick dispatched Ambassadors to give him to understand, that they had no Mind to renounce their Allegiance to the Emperor, but only to recover their Liberty, of which, by Degrees, they had been deprived by Mendoza: The Duke giving Credit to what the Ambassadors said, concluded a Treaty with the Republick, that the Spaniards should march out of Sienna, and that Otto should return in Safety to Florence; but the Spaniards had no sooner left Sienna, than the Siennese levelled the Citadel to the Ground, received a French Garrison, and took care to fortify themselves against the Spaniards. The Emperor, who was then at the Siege of Metz, being informed of what had pass'd, wrote to Toledo, ordering him to raise an Army, and make War upon Sienna; and at the same Time D. Francisco de Toledo, the Emperor's Minister residing at Florence, came to hasten the Preparation for War. Although it was a very severe Winter, yet the Viceroy, with the utmost Application, began privately to put the Army in Order; and while he was thus employed, he was seized with a Rheum and Fever, with which he was wont to be troubled every Winter, and for which his Physicians had always advised him to reside at Pozzuolo during that Season; but notwithstanding the Viceroy's Illness, the Preparation was not slackened, and it began to be rumour'd abroad that a War was designed upon Sienna, and that the Viceroy was to command the Army in Person, who therefore was to go and have an Interview with Duke Cosimo his Son-in-Law. The March of the Army being made Publick, many Barons offered to accompany the Viceroy, who accepted of a few, and thanked the rest; and having made D. Garcia his Son Lieutenant-General of the Army, he sent him by Land with Twelve thousand gallant Spanish, Italian, and German Soldiers. In the Beginning of this Year 1553. D. Garcia marched peaceably through the Ecclesiastical State, and by the Way went to Rome to kiss the Pope's Foot, and at last arriving in the Territories of Sienna, without Loss of Time, he took many Castles. In the mean while the Viceroy caused the rest of the Spanish Soldiers, with his own Court, to be imbark'd in the Prince of Doria's Gallies; and leaving D. Lewis, his second Son, Lieutenant of the Kingdom, he took shipping, and set sail towards Gaeta, where he staid three Days, and then steer'd for Civita Vecchia; in which Voyage, by the Roughness of the Sea, his Distemper increased, and having afterwards landed at Leghorn, he immediately sent the Spaniards to join D. Garcia's Army, and he himself being so ill of the Rheum and Fever, was forced to stop there. But the Disease increasing, and his Physicians finding that the Air of Leghorn, situate in the Midst of Water, was quite different from that of Pozzuolo, and prejudicial to his Distemper, he went to Pisa, and from thence, in order to be farther from the Sea, he went to Florence, where he was very affectionately and magnificently received by Duke Cosimo his Son-in-Law. At this Time Ascanio della Cornia, and other Colonels of the Army, came to wait upon him, and receive his Orders how they were to carry on the War; and the Disposition being already made, and his Illness something abated, he sent forward his Court, and was preparing to follow the next Morning himself; but he was again so violently seized with the Rheum, that he got no Rest the whole Night, and the Fever likewise returning, all Remedies proved ineffectual.

UPON the News of his Danger D. Garcia his Son came to visit him, and give him an Account of what he had done; but the Viceroy ordered him, without waiting for the Issue of his Distemper, to return to his Command of the Army, and blessed him; and not long after, his Illness still increasing, on the 12th of February 1553. he breathed his last in the Arms of his Daughter and Son-in-Law. It was reported, that his Death was hastened by Poison given him by Duke Cosimo, out of Suspicion that he had laid Snares for his Life: Moreover, that the Emperor, in order to remove him from the Government of Naples (which he had determined ever since the Commotions of that City) had taken the Opportunity of the War of Sienna. Some believe neither the one nor the other, and refer to a Letter of the Emperor's arrived at Florence before he died, in which, without knowing that he had as yet left Naples, he wrote, that by no means he should go upon that Expedition, because he had heard he was Valetudinary, but that he should send his Son D. Garcia: However that may be, he govern'd the Kingdom twenty Years, five Months, and eight Days, with so much Prudence, that he excelled all the preceding Governors, and deservedly got the Title of the Great Viceroy.

BY his first Wife D. Maria Ossorio Pimentel, he left several Children, but being old when he married his Second, he had none by her. D. Frederick his eldest Son; D. Garcia, whom, at his Death, he left Lieutenant-General in the War of Sienna, and D. Lewis, who was Lieutenant of the Kingdom when he left Naples. He had likewise four Daughters; he married D. Isabella, the Eldest, to D. Giovan-Battista Spinelli, Duke of Castrevillari, and Count of Cariati; D. Eleonora the Second, in 1539. was married to Cosimo de Medici, Duke of Tuscany; D. Giovanna the Third, was the Wife of D. Ferrante Ximes d'Urrea, the eldest Son of the Count of Aranda; and D. Anna the Youngest, was married to D. Lopes Mesoso, Count of Altamira.

D. LEWIS being left Lieutenant in Naples, had not Opportunity to display his noble Talents in the Government of the Kingdom, because he held it only for a few Months; for the Emperor, upon the News of D. Peter de Toledo's Death, sent the Cardinal Pacecco to succeed him, and the Cardinal being then at Rome, in the Month of June this same Year, went immediately to Naples.

CARDINAL Pacecco, no less famous for his illustrious Family in Spain, possessed of the Marquisate of Villena, and Duchy of Escalona, than for his great Learning, and the signal Service he did in the Council of Trent, while he was Bishop of Jæn, at the Desire of the Emperor was promoted to the Purple, and likewise declared Bishop of Saguntum by Pope Paul III. and that Council being removed to Belagna, he had the Charge of the Emperor's Affairs in Rome, and upon Toledo's Death, as we have said, was sent to be Viceroy of the Kingdom.

NAPLES, out of a Notion that he was a severe Man, was at first alarm'd, but the Event proved the contrary; for being of a calm and sweet Disposition, he not only treated the Neapolitans with the greatest Humanity, but did them most signal Service with the Emperor, from whom he obtained a Confirmation of their Privileges, which, at the Request of the famous Girclamo Seripando, Charles V. by his Patent, dated at Brussels the last Day of the Year 1554. had granted them. Sudden Imprisonments, Tortures, and criminal Punishments inflicted upon Delinquents on bare Information, were no more heard of. Provident Orders were given, and Rules laid down to be observed in the Collation of the Chaplain Majorship, Royal Prelatures, the chief Doctorship of Physick, and in appointing the Officers of Justice, and the Castellains of the Kingdom; and during his Government, many new Favours and Privileges were granted by the Emperor both to the City and Kingdom¹.

IN the mean time Mary of Portugal, Philip Prince of Spain's first Wife, dying, a Door was opened for uniting the Kingdom of England to the Monarchy of Spain; and if Queen Mary of England's Death, without leaving Children of this Marriage, and the many Revolutions that happened in that Kingdom, had not frustrated so noble a Design, that Union would have been compleated; for on the 20th of July 1553. Mary, the eldest Daughter of Henry VIII. being proclaim'd Queen of England, and on the first of October, in the Thirty-seventh Year of her Age, being crown'd, in order to secure the Succession, the Barons of the Kingdom requested her to marry: She therefore pitched upon Philip Prince of Spain to be her Husband; and in Jan. 1554. she sent Ambassadors to notify her Intention to the Emperor, who with incredible Joy accepted the Proposal, and, without Loss of Time, the Marriage was immediately concluded, and the Prince called from Spain in order to go to England to consummate the Marriage: The English Barons, both out of Hatred to the Spaniards, and that they did not like to have that Kingdom fall to the Emperor's Off-spring, were not satisfied with the Queen's Choice.

HOWEVER, on the 16th of July 1554. Philip set sail from the Groyne with a great Fleet, and a most splendid Court, and having arrived at Southampton, where the Queen expected him, the Marriage was celebrated there with great Pomp and Magnificence.

BUT the Emperor, thinking it was not suitable to so great a Queen to marry Philip, who was not as yet a King, sent Figurino, Deputy of Naples, to England, to deliver him a Resignation of the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and of the Duchy of Milan: Thus Philip, being render'd more Majestick by these Royal Titles, added Mirth and Jollity to the Marriage Feast. The new-married Couple having passed many Days in Feasts and Tournaments in Winchester, on the 19th of August set out, and, with a double Court, and almost all the Nobility of Spain and England, in great Pomp and Magnificence made their Entry into the City of London; and the Mal-content Barons, finding that Philip was a Prince of a sweet and courteous Disposition, were satisfied.

PHILIP having received his Father's Resignation of the Kingdom of Naples, immediately sent the Marquis of Pescara, in his Name, to take Possession of it, which, with publick Solemnity and great Rejoycing, on the 25th of November the same Year, was given him by Cardinal Pacecco the Viceroy: At the same time, that the Emperor Charles V. his Father, either wearied of worldly Anxieties, or that he imagined Fortune began to frown upon him, resolved to retire into a Cloister.

THE Emperor was then in Flanders continually afflicted with the Gout, and unable any longer to bear the Burden of the Empire, he resolved to retire from worldly Cares; therefore he sent to England for his Son Philip, and upon his Arrival in Brussels, first of all he made him Head of the Knights of the Order of the Golden Fleece, then, on the 25th of October 1555. in a great Hall, in Presence of all the Counsellors of State, of all the Knights of the Orders, and of the Nobility, he made a general Resignation to the King his Son of all the Low Countries, with the States, Titles, and Rights of Flanders and Burgundy: He resign'd the Kingdoms of Spain, Sardinia, Majorca, and Minorca, and the new-discovered Countries in the Indies, with all the other Islands and States belonging to, and depending upon the Crown of Spain.

WITH the same Solemnity he resigned the Government of the Empire to Ferdinand his Brother, already elected King of the Romans, and three Years after, a few Months before he died, he sent the Resignation of the Empire to the Electoral College, which, on the 14th of March 1558. elected in his Room the same Ferdinand.

CHARLES having afterwards retired to the City of Ghent, the Place of his Nativity, dismissed all the Ambassadors of Princes who were then residing at his Court, and all the Officers of the Army; and on the 14th of September 1556. having taken shipping, he set sail for Spain, and retired into Estremadura, where he remain'd all his Days in a Convent of Monks of the Order of S. Hierom, called S. Justus. He led there a solitary Life, and died on the 21st of September 1558. in the 59th Year of his Age.

C H A P. VIII.

The State of our Jurisprudence during the Empire of Charles V. and of the most famous Lawyers who flourish'd in his Time.

THE Emperor Charles V. or rather his Viceroys, who during his Reign governed this Kingdom, left us many Laws, of which there being an exact Chronology, according to the Times in which they were established, inserted in the last Edition of our Statutes, there is no Occasion to swell this Work by repeating them here.

OUR Tribunals having been so much favoured, and brought into a more ample and magnificent Form by the Viceroy Toledo, if in this Reign the Jurisprudence was not improved, at least it was in more Splendour by the great Number of learned Professors.

FOR the Reasons formerly alledged, it could not be brought to that Neatness and Purity of Style in this Century, with us, to which it had attained in France. The Spaniards were jealous of all Learning, and were very much upon their Guard against introducing Novelties in the Sciences, or in the Method of teaching and professing them; therefore the antient Style was continued: But notwithstanding the want of Learning, and the Knowledge of the Roman History, whereby the Sciences were improved in France, we had excellent Lawyers, not inferior to those of other Nations.

IT seems very strange, that the Jurisprudence having been first illustrated in Italy by Andrea Alciati, a Milanese, who was the first that taught the Law with Erudition and Elegancy, this Study should be forsaken in Italy, and that Andrea should have so many in France that imitated, and even excelled him, and none in Italy. France at this Time boasted of the famous Gulielmus Budeus, a Parisian; Franciscus Duarenus his Disciple, and Professor of Law in Bourges, who died in the Year 1559. at the Age of Fifty; the celebrated Carolus Molineus, who died in 1566; the never-enough-to-be commended Jacobus Cujacius, a Native of Toulouse, who was Professor in Bourges, Toulouse, Cabors, Valencia, and Turin, and who was a Prodigy in this Science, for which Tibullus very justly calls him the First and Last amongst the best Interpreters of the Law; Antonius Contius, a Native of Neyen, Cotemporary with Duarenus and Cujacius, and likewise Professor of Law in Bourges, who died in 1566; Franciscus Hottomannus, Petrus Puteus, and many others, of whom the President Tibullus makes honourable mention in his History.

ON the contrary, as to Professors, for the abovementioned Reason, and others that shall be given in the following Books of this History, I confess we could not pretend to have Lawyers equal to those of France; but as to those that were employed in the Courts of Justice, and the Magistracy, we might compare with theirs, both as to their Skill in the Law, and Number.

THERE flourished at this Time in our Tribunals, many notable and renowned Lawyers. Antonio Capace became first famous in the Courts of Justice as an Advocate, and afterwards, in 1509, was made a Counsellor by King Ferdinand the Catholic, and at the same time read Law in our University, where he possessed the first Evening Chair of the Civil Law; and in 1519, he likewise taught the Feodal Law there, and Bartolomeo Camerario, Sigismondo Goffredo, and many other famous Lawyers were his Scholars. On account of the Commotions in Sicily, raised during the Government of Ettore Piguntelli, Count of Montelione, by the King's Command he he went to that Island, and the Count made use of him for curbing the Authors of those Tumults, where he collected some of his Decisions. He returned afterwards to Naples, and notwithstanding that his Office of Counsellor allowed him very little Leisure, yet he wrote an Explanation upon the Cap. Imperialem, de probib. feud. alien. per Feder.; and he had begun another famous Work, intitled, Investitura feudalis, which he could not bring to Perfection. He collected sundry Decisions, which in his Time had been made in the S. C. of St. Clara, which being added to those he had collected in Sicily, are now made use of by our Professors. At last he died in Naples in 1545. and was buried in the Chapel of his Family, within the Church of S. Dominico Maggiore of that City ¹.

BARTOLOMEO CAMERARIO, of Benevento, distinguished himself above the rest in the Study of the Laws, and in 1521. he published in Naples an Explanation upon the §. Equè de Actionibus; but he became eminent above all others by his great Application to Feodal Matters. He undertook to amend the Feodal Commentaries of Andrea d'Ijernia, which, through the Fault of the Transcribers, having been sent to the Press very incorrect, he restored to the true Reading; and he laboured so hard for the Space of three Years, in bestowing sixteen Hours every Day upon that Work, that, as he himself ² says, he lost an Eye. He read Lectures upon the Feodal Books in our University Twenty-four Years; from the Professor's Chair, in 1529. he was advanced to be President of the Royal Chamber, in the Room of Gianangelo Pisanello. Afterwards, in 1541. the Emperor Charles V. made him Lieutenant of that Tribunal: But falling under the Displeasure of D. Peter de Toledo, for the Reasons elsewhere related, and because of the Inclination he always shewed for the French, he was much suspected, whence Toledo took the Opportunity to put him in Disgrace with the Emperor; of which being sensible, he went to France, and accepted the Honour offer'd him by that King, who made him his Counsellor, and took him under his Protection. The Viceroy Toledo having immediately put Francesco Revertero in his Place, ordered him to be impeached; he was declared a Rebel, and in 1552. all his Goods were confiscated. While he was in France, the Affairs of Religion being in great Confusion, and the Works of Luther and Calvin doing much Mischief in that Kingdom, he, as one well skilled in Divinity, undertook to confute them: So that in 1556. he printed a Treatise in Paris, De Jejunio, Oratione, & Eleemosina; and that same Year he likewise published another Work, written by way of Dialogue between himself and Calvin, which he intitled, De Prædestinatione, ac de Gratia, & libero Arbitrio, cum Johanne Calvino disputatio; and in 1557. having gone to Rome, he published there another Treatise, De Purgatorio igne.

BUT finding that his Merit was not rewarded in France according to his Expectation, he retired to Rome, where Pope Paul IV. a bitter Enemy both to the Emperor and King Philip his Son, received him very graciously, and admitted him into his Councils; and 'tis said, that Paul's not publishing the Sentence pronounced against King Philip, depriving him of his Kingdom, of which hereafter, was owing to Camerario: And in the War which was then vigorously carried on between the Pope and King Philip, the Duke D'Alba having besieged Rome, the Pope made him Commissary-General of his Army, and Overseer of the Markets of Rome; so that in order to shew his Gratitude to the Pope, in the Year 1558. he published his Commentary Ad L. Imperialem de probib. feud. alien. per Feder. and dedicated it to him, promising in the Epistle Dedicatory, that if he should have Leisure, he would likewise dedicate to him seven other Feodal Books which he had composed. He spent the rest of his Days in Rome, where he died in 1564. and was buried in the Church of the Holy Apostles of the Fathers Conventuals of S. Francis, where his Tomb, with an Inscription, is to be seen. Besides the abovementioned Works, there are some Dialogues of his concerning Feodal Matters, which, for want of that Grace and Comeliness peculiar to that way of Writing, are looked upon to be dull and insipid.

SIGISMONDO GOFFREDO, Disciple of Antonio Capece, of the Seggio Capuana, after he had made wonderful Progress in the Belles Lettres, applied himself to the Study of the Laws, and in 1512. on account of his Learning was made President of the Royal Chamber by Ferdinand the Catholick; and in less than five Years he was advanced to be Head of the Chancery, and was afterwards sent for to Spain to assist in the Supreme Council of Arragon, as Deputy of Naples. He died in 1539. leaving a shining Monument of himself in his learned Discourses and Commentaries upon L. Jurisconsultus de gradibus, which were printed in Venice in 1572.

AT the same time with him flourished the famous Cicco Loffredo, a renowned Advocate, who in the Year 1512. was made one of the King's Counsellors. On account of his great Abilities, he was sent Ambassador to Flanders by the City of Naples, to do Homage to King Charles in Name of the said City, and to ask a Confirmation of its Privileges. He was afterwards, in 1522. raised to the high Honour of President of the S. C. which he officiated till 1539. in which Year he was removed to the Collateral Council, of which he was made Head. He died in Naples in 1547. and was first buried in the Cathedral Church of that City, in the Chapel of his Family; but Ferdinando Loffredo, Marquis of Trivico, his Son, removed his Bones to the Church of the Holy Ghost, which he had founded, where his Tomb, with an Inscription, is to be seen; and from this famous Lawyer the present Marquis of Trivico is descended¹.

ABOUT the same time flourished likewise Girolamo Severino, Tommaso Salernitano, Giannandrea de Curte, Scipion Capete, and Marino Freccia, all of them most famous Lawyers.

GIROLAMO SEVERINO, of the Seggio of Porto, while a Youth, in 1516. was appointed to be Advocate for the Poor; then in 1517. he was made Judge of the Vicariate. On account of his Learning and Eloquence, when Charles V. came to Naples, the City made him their Spokesman to welcome that Prince; and in 1536. they created him Syndick: In a general Parliament begun the 8th of January the same Year, there being a large Donative granted to the Emperor by his good Management, as a Reward of his signal Services, the Emperor put him at the Head of the Chancery, and of the Supreme Council of Italy, which obliged him to go to Spain with the Emperor; but afterwards, in 1541. he was raised to the high Honour of President of the S. C. and in 1549. he was made Viceprotonotary of the Kingdom; and having exercised the Office of President for fifteen Years, being unable, by reason of his great Age, any longer to undergo so great a Charge, in 1555. he returned to the Collateral Council, which his Decrepitness forced him likewise to leave, reserving only the Office of Viceprotonotary, which he exercised as long as he lived. At last, in 1559. he died in Naples, and was buried in S. Maria della Nuova, in the Chapel of his Family, where his Tomb, with an Inscription, is to be seen².

TOMMASO SALERNITANO, at the Age of Eighteen, gave such evident Proofs of his surprizing Knowledge in the Laws, that he was admitted to explain them in the University of Naples; he afterwards pleaded at the Bar, and succeeded so well, that in a short time he was made President of the Royal Chamber. In the Reign of King Philip II. he was employed in the most weighty Affairs of State, and was sent to Germany about the famous Cause of the Dutchy of Bari; so that in 1567. he was made President of the S. C. and afterwards in 1570. Director of the Chancery. He left us a shining Monument of his Learning by the Decisions collected by him, which, being now printed, are highly esteemed by our Professors. He died in Naples in 1584. and was buried in the Church of S. Maria delle Grazie, in the Chapel of his Ancestors, where his Tomb and Inscription remain. Paolo Regio, Bishop of Vico Equense, and a famous Preacher in these Times, composed his Funeral Oration, wherein he very much extols his Virtues and notable Actions³; and our celebrated Poet Bernardino Rota did not fail to commend him highly⁴.

GIOVAN-ANDREA DE CURTE, on whom *Uberto Eghetta*⁵ bestows great Encomiums, according to that Writer, was originally of Patia, but ours⁶ will have him to be of Cava. He was the Son of Molesto, Judge of the Vicariate, who, applying himself to the Study of the Laws, became a most famous Lawyer; and after having been some Years in the Vicariate, the Emperor Charles V. made him a Counsellor of S. Clara. In the Tumults that in 1547. happened in Naples on account of the Inquisition, both he and his Sons narrowly escaped being torn in pieces by the Mob; for seeing the City all up in Arms, he resolved (like all other peaceable and worthy Men) with his Family to leave the City, which being whispered to the Populace, who always looked upon him to be one of Toledo the Viceroy's Creatures, they pursued him furiously, and though he had taken Shelter in a Convent of Monks, they broke open the Gates, and used the Monks very roughly, in order to make them discover where he was; but they constantly denying that he was in their Convent, and affirming that he had fled by another Way, after having searched all the hidden Places of the Monastery, in great Rage they ran as far as Torre del Greco, whither they heard his Sons had fled, and those innocent Youths had certainly been murdered, if the Peasants of the Place had not taken Arms and curbed their Fury. One of those Sons was Marino so much commended by Foglietta, with whom, while Foglietta was in Naples, he had contracted an intimate Friendship, who afterwards proved a great Divine, and one of the most famous Preachers about the Court of King Philip II. who, as a Reward of his Learning and signal Services, raised Giovan-Andrea to be President of the Council. He died in 1576. and was buried in the Church of S. Severino, in the Chapel of his Family, where his Tomb, with an Inscription, is extant. Bernardino Rota in his Poems highly commends him¹, and the President *De Franchis*² did not fail to make honourable mention of him.

BUT Scipion Capece, the Son of Antonio, excelled all these, both in the Knowledge of the Law, and in being an universal Scholar. In his Youth he applied himself to the Study of the Belles Lettres and Philosophy, and succeeded so well in Poetry and Oratory, that he was reputed one of the greatest Poets of the Age. He wrote two Books De principiis Rerum, which he dedicated to Pope Paul III. so much commended by Cardinal Bembo and Paulus Manutius, that they did not stick to compare them to the Books of Titus Lucretius Carns. He likewise wrote the Life of CHRIST in heroick Verse, and the Praises of his Fore-runner John the Baptist, in Three Books, which he intitled, De Vate Maximo, which were dedicated to Pope Clement VII. by Giovan-Francesco di Capua, Count of Palena. And some of his Elegies and Epigrams were cried up by the most famous learned Men of these Times, of which *Nicodemo*³ has made a long Catalogue.

HE was no less successful in the severe and rigid Study of our Laws, than in those of Poetry and Oratory; he bore away the Bell, not only in the Courts of Justice, but in the Chair: He was looked upon to be the first Advocate in our Supreme Tribunals, and in the Year 1534. he possessed the first Evening Chair of the Civil Law in the University, which he held till 1537. When the Emperor Charles V. came to Naples, he was pitched upon to congratulate him upon his Arrival; whereupon the Emperor, as a Reward of his Learning and bright Parts, made him a Counsellor of S. Clara. He wrote many Commentaries upon sundry Titles of the Pandects, which he explained in the University, of which that only is printed which he wrote upon the Title De acquirenda possessione, which he dedicated to D. Lewis de Toledo, the Son of D. Peter the Viceroy, in which he promised in a short Time to publish another upon the Title Solutio Matrimonio. He likewise wrote a short Treatise, intitled, Magistratum Regni Neapolis qualiter cum antiquis Romanorum conveniant, Compendiolum, which was first printed in Salerno in 1544. and afterwards in Naples in 1594. This celebrated Writer died in 1545. and was buried in the Church of S. Dominico Maggiore, in the Chapel of his Family, where his Tomb is to be seen⁴.

TO Capece we must add Marino Freccia, who, besides his Skill in the Law, had a good Taste of History, and was the first among us that found Fault with our Writers, who, having neglected History, have fallen into a thousand Errors; he was a great Admirer of our antient Records, and to him we owe some Fragments of Erchempertus, which were afterwards printed by Camillo Pellegrino in his History of the Longobard Princes. The Book which he wrote De Subfeudis, and which he dedicated to Cardinal Pacecco while he governed the Kingdom, demonstrates how much he had the Illustration of the Affairs of our Kingdom at Heart, and what Pains he had bestowed upon our Antiquities. He derived his Origine from Ravello, and for his singular Skill in the Laws, and especially the Feodal, which he formerly expounded in our University, the Emperor Charles V. in 1540. made him a Counsellor of the S. C. of which he was afterwards Vice-President. He also wrote another Treatise De formulis Investiturarum, but being prevented by Death, he could not finish it; and while he was yet a Youth of twenty Years of Age, he wrote a Treatise De præsentatione Instrumentorum, which is at present made use of by our Professors. He died in 1562. and was buried in the Chapel of his Family in the Church of S. Dominico Maggiore, where his Tomb and Inscription remain¹.

ABOUT the same time flourished Jacobuzio de Franchis, Antonio Baratuccio, Giovan-Tommaso Minadoi, Tommaso Grammatico, and many others, who may be found in Toppi's Bibliotheca Neapolitana, and his Books Dell'Origine de nostri Tribunali, wherein he has given a long Catalogue of them.

CHAP. IX.

The Polity of our Churches during the Reign of the Emperor Charles V.

IN this sixteenth Century the Authority of the Roman Pontiffs received one of the greatest and most fatal Blows that ever it had got since its first Rise. By the Heresy of Luther it suffered lamentable and irreparable Losses in Europe. Many Provinces of Germany withdrew their Obedience; Flanders; England, which was once most obsequious and profitable to the See of Rome; Scotland, and the Kingdoms of the North were intirely lost; France was likewise in great Danger, and Italy gave much Ground of Suspicion: Losses which were but ill made up by the Acquisitions made in the Indies and America; Acquisitions which were both barren and useless to Rome. The Roman Pontiffs were likewise alarmed at the Thought of calling a new Council, looked upon then to be absolutely necessary for settling the distracted State of Religion, whereby all Europe was in a great Fermentation; but for all that they did not stoop in the least, nor were they a whit more indulgent to the Princes that were the greatest Sticklers for them (whose Business it likewise was to prevent the Alteration of Religion in their Dominions) in remitting the least Title of the Pretensions which they imagined they had upon the Churches, or any other Thing within their States. After that the Emperor Charles V. had received those exorbitant Sums from Clement VII. for his Ransom, he was very easy about the Court of Rome's beginning again to exact the Incomes of the vacant Churches with greater Severity than ever: Tithes were frequently imposed upon the Clergy and Monasteries, of which he only remitted his Part; and because of the Profit which he (as all the Kings his Successors have done ever since) by Permission from the Popes, reaped in the Kingdoms of Spain, he little minded his own Rights, and much less our Advantage, or that of our Churches.

IN the Treaty of Peace, which, as we have said, in the Year 1532. was concluded between the Emperor and Clement, there were long Disputes about the Presentation to the Cathedral Churches of our Kingdom, to which our Kings claim a Right of Patronage, because the most remarkable Cathedrals were founded, and with rich Revenues endowed by their Predecessors. The Normans, as may be seen in the preceding Books of this History, erected many of them from the very Foundation; and their having withdrawn many of them from the See of Constantinople to that of Rome, was no small Advantage. The Kings of the Family of Anjou likewise founded others of them: So that as the Cathedrals of Spain, for the same Reason, are in the King's Gift, so ours likewise ought to be so too; and consequently all the Archbishopricks and Bishopricks, when they are vacant, ought to be in the King's Nomination. And although in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, the Assent which formerly was sought in the Election of Prelates, was taken away, yet as the Exequatur Regium was still reserved (as we have shewed elsewhere) so much less could that Agreement, foisted into the Investiture, comprehend the Churches of Royal Patronage, from which they were expressly excepted: Whence it is, that very many Churches and Benefices, in all the Provinces of the Kingdom, are still of Royal Collation and Presentation; of which Chioccarelli and Tassone have made long Catalogues.

DEPUTY Muscettola, at that Time Charles V's Ambassador at Rome for that Affair, maintained the Pretension of our Kings; but (as 'tis the Custom of that Court, that whenever they can but once bring an Affair to be referred to a Treaty, then, under Pretence of preventing Quarrels and tedious Debates, they offer to come to a Composition) it was agreed with Clement VII. that Twenty-four Cathedral Churches, viz. seven Archbishopricks and seventeen Bishopricks should continue to be in the King's Gift, and the rest to be at the Pope's Disposal. In the Province of Terra di Lavoro, the Bishopricks of Gaeta, Pozzuolo, and Cerra, were declared to be in the Royal Gift. In the County of Molise, the Bishoprick of Trivento. In the Hither Principato, the Archbishoprick of Salerno, and the Bishoprick of Castellumare. In the Further Principato, the Bishoprick of Ariano. In the Hither Calabria, the Bishoprick of Cassano. In the Further Calabria, the Archbishoprick of Reggio, and the Bishopricks of Cotrone and Tropea. In Basilicata (according to the present Disposition of the Provinces) the Archbishoprick of Matera, to which the Church of Cerenza is now annexed, and the Bishoprick of Potenza. In Terra d'Otranto, the Archbishopricks of Otranto, Taranto, and Brindisi, to which the Church of Oira is now annexed, the Bishopricks of Gallipoli, Mottula, and Ugento. In Terra di Bari, the Archbishoprick of Trani, the Bishopricks of Giovenazzo and Monopoli. In the Hither and Further Apruzzo, the Bishopricks of Aquila and Lanciano, which last Church is now Archiepiscopal, but not Metropolitan, because it has not one Suffragan. In Capitanata there is not one Bishoprick in the King's Gift, although in the Church of Lucera, all the Dignities, and the half of the Canonships are of Royal Collation, as we have said elsewhere.

THIS was the Division that was then made of the Cathedral Churches, which continues to this Day, and was inserted in the Articles of that Peace, in which the other Benefices, and Churches not Cathedral of Royal Patronage, of which there are many, are expressly excepted, of which our Kings are in Possession, and provide them when vacant, and during the Vacancies appoint Stewards for collecting the Revenues, part of which is applied towards Repairing and Supporting the Fabricks, and the rest is reserved for the future Successors.

THE Emperor Charles V. for the abovementioned Reasons, was likewise very easy about the Court of Rome's laying new Burdens upon our Kingdom, the greatest of which in his Time was, that finding it impracticable to introduce the Tribunal of the Inquisition here, they established another new one, called the Tribunal of the Fabrick of S. Peter, of which, as in its Place, we must here give an Account of the Origin and Introduction.

S E C T. I.

The Origin of the Tribunal of the Fabrick of S. Peter, and how, and upon what Conditions it was introduced amongst us; and afterwards in our Time suspended.

POPE Julius II. having a mind to imitate the Magnificence of King Solomon, resolved to build a Temple in Rome in Honour of St. Peter the Head of the Apostles, that should be the most magnificent and surprizing of any that ever had been in the World; judging, that as Rome was become the Head of the Spiritual Church, and was exalted above all the other Churches of the Earth, so it was fit that her Material Church should overtop all others, in the same manner as S. Peter, to whom it was dedicated, was more eminent than the other Apostles, and all the Faithful that believed in Christ; but not having Solomon's Riches, he employed his whole Thoughts about finding out Mines, out of which to dig Gold and Silver for this Work. He began first with Plenary Indulgences, granting them with a liberal Hand to all those who left or gave any Thing towards the Building of that Temple: But seeing that these did not answer his Design, he contrived a new Method, and by his Constitution published in the Year 1509. besides granting them Privileges, he ordained, that all pious Legacies that should be found left to Places incapable of receiving them, or that were not fulfilled by the Heirs, should be applied to this Building; therefore he instituted a Tribunal in Rome, whose Ministers were not only to have the Inspection of the Building of the Temple, but likewise to receive the Money arising that way over the whole Catholick World by Means of their Commissaries.

THIS Bull was afterwards confirmed and much enlarged by Leo X. Clement VII. and the other Popes their Successors. But in order to its producing a plentiful Crop, it behoving it to have Force in the Dominions of others, many Princes opposed its being put in Execution, some altogether refusing to receive it, others moderating and reforming it. Leo X. endeavoured to introduce the Commissaries of this Tribunal of Rome into our Kingdom; and in the Year 1519. dispatched a Brief directed to them, giving them Power, for the Space of three Years, to receive all the pious Legacies, and for that Effect to force the Debtors to pay them, and also the Notaries to exhibit the Protocols, Instruments and Wills. The Brief being produced to D. Raimondo de Cardona, then Viceroy of the Kingdom, for his giving it the Exequatur, he granted it, but with this Clause, Præter quam contra laicos personas; so that the said Commissaries, resolving to force the Laicks, had recourse anew to Cardona, who ordered the King's Officers to do them Justice, by obliging the Laicks to pay the pious Legacies, and the Notaries to exhibit the Protocols and Instruments¹.

CLEMENT VII. prolonged these Commissions, and in 1532. dispatched another Brief, to which D. Peter de Toledo, then Viceroy, gave the Exequatur, with some Restrictions, which however did not prevent the great Losses which the Kingdom suffered by the Extortions and Disorders committed by the Commissaries appointed in the Provinces; so that in the Parliament held in Naples in 1540. Toledo was requested, in Behalf of the City and Kingdom, to treat with the Pope about suppressing this Tribunal altogether, because of the many Grievances and Extortions occasioned by it²: And the Viceroy having afterwards in 1547. treated of this Affair with Pope Paul III. many Abuses were redressed, the Tribunal was in a great measure reformed, and new Regulations were made, so that for some Years after it was in a manner suspended. But in 1557. the Duke D'Alba then Viceroy, ordered this Tribunal to be put upon its former Footing, according to the Agreement made in 1547. between Pope Paul III. and Toledo; for which End it was ordained, that the Commissary of the Fabrick residing in Naples, which was usually the Nuncio, could not take Cognizance of the Causes of this Tribunal, nor decide them without the Votes of the Laick Assistants, who should be appointed by the King, or his Viceroy, to be present at all the three Hearings; whence proceeded the Custom, that for the first and second Hearings, the King's Counsellors, or the Presidents of the Royal Chamber were generally appointed, and for Assistant or Judge of the Third, a Deputy of the Collateral Council; and likewise, that the Commissaries appointed for the Provinces, could not by themselves take Cognizance, or decide, but were to have Laick Assistants, to be named by the Corporations of the Places¹: So that Cardinal Granvela in 1574. according to this Appointment, ordained, That the Officers of the Kingdom should not hinder the Orders of this Tribunal to be put in Execution, whenever they came from the King's Counsellors appointed by him and his Collateral Council, and that they should give all Assistance in seeing them obeyed.

BUT notwithstanding all this, the Disorders and Extortions of the Commissaries were not redressed, nor was there a Stop put to the vast Damages which the Kingdom suffered by this Tribunal; for, although by Virtue of this Appointment, the Tribunal of the Fabrick of S. Peter of Rome could not meddle in Causes depending before the Tribunal of Naples, but only appoint the Commissary, the Manager, and other inferior Officers of it; nevertheless, as Cardinal De Luca himself testifies², the Tribunal of Rome, by way of Reference, and extrajudicial Information, took upon them to revise the very same Causes, which in all the three Hearings had been debated, and already decided in Naples. The Tribunal of Rome had likewise appropriated to themselves all the Causes that were not in Dispute, that is to say, all Compositions, to which the Parties desired to be admitted without going to Law; and likewise, with respect to that Matter, restricted the Nuncio, or Commissary-General residing in the Kingdom, and stript the Manager of the Power of transacting in Causes of Consequence, whereby great Compositions were expected: And in order, as well to draw more Money to Rome, as to reduce the Causes in the Tribunal of Naples to a small Number, Compositions were made easy to every Body that paid Money, little minding whether the Will of the Testator was fulfilled or not, or the pious Legacies rightly applied; for they said, that the pious Work made amends by the inexhaustible Treasure they have in Rome, which they call Mare Magnum, one Drop of which was sufficient to counterballance all the pious Legacies in the World; and by this means Compositions in Rome being made easy by ready Money, the Wills of the pious Testators were not in the least executed.

BUT what most of all rendered this Tribunal odious, were the Extortions and Disorders which the Commissaries committed both in the City and Provinces, of which Extortions Cardinal *De Luca*³ bears witness. The Commissaries, according to an Account given in the Year 1587. which we read in the *M. S. Giurisdizionali*⁴, immediately upon their entering any Town or Village of the Kingdom, though never so little, they posted up their Bills, and rung the Bells, and with a dreadful and awful Voice, threaten'd with Excommunication, the Notaries, and all Persons that had the keeping of last Wills, wherein pious Legacies were left, and did not bring the Wills to them. As soon as they were brought, the Commissaries summoned all the Heirs of the Testators, altho' they had been dead a hundred Years before, to shew how they had applied the pious Legacies; and upon their not appearing, they were declared Contumacious, and then publicly excommunicated; and when any did appear in order to clear themselves, they were not heard till first they had paid for their Contumacy, and then they were not absolved till they produced their Vouchers, and paid anew; and those who could not appear, or came too late, when the Commissaries were gone from the Place, were obliged to go to Naples to be absolved; and many, who on account of their extreme Poverty, had not wherewithal to bear their Charges in going to Naples, continued excommunicated, and when they died were denied a Christian Burial. Greater Extortions were practised in Naples, for even though an Executor immediately answered the Summons, and made it appear that he had performed the Will of the Person deceased, yet that did not clear him, but he must pay down the Fees of the Decree (though neither sought nor wanted) in order to get free of Trouble; and a few Years being over, they began afresh with new Demands and new Decrees; and if, by Misfortune, written Vouchers could not be produced, but only Witnesses, a voluminous Process must be drawn up, and thereby the Party put to vast Charges before he could be cleared: Whence People, being frightened, forbore to leave pious Legacies, or they expressly ordered that this Tribunal should not in the least meddle with their Wills.

IN order to shun these and many other Disorders which we pass over here, this Tribunal having become odious and burthensome to our Forefathers, the City and Kingdom had still recourse from time to time to our Kings to have it quite abolish'd, till at last our present most august Prince, moved by the Complaints of his Subjects, by his Royal Writ dated in Vienna in the Year 1717. ordained, That both the Nuncio and Commissary should depart the Kingdom, and their Tribunals be shut up; and upon the Arrival of this Order in the Month of October the same Year, it was immediately put in Execution, and not only the Nunciature, but the Tribunal of the Fabrick was suppressed: And by another Imperial Writ, dated in Vienna the 8th of October 1718. Count Dunn then Viceroy, was ordered to take a particular Account of the Extortions and Abuses committed by the said Tribunals, and how they might be remedied, as was accordingly done; and altho' the Nuncio returned in the Month of June 1719. and the Tribunal of the Nunciature was restored, yet the Restitution was attended with many Restrictions and Declarations, as shall be told hereafter; and the Tribunal of the Fabrick was not restored, but continues to this Day suspended and abolished.

S E C T. II.

Of Monks and Temporalities.

IF ever at any time new Religious Orders implied new Riches, or that Monks and Temporalities ought to be joined together, in this Century there started up two, which made it evident, that Monachism and worldly Riches are synonymous Terms; for notwithstanding that the fundamental Laws of their Institution forbid it them, yet the Devotion of the People being captivated by that very Prohibition, and Men thereby the more readily induced to give, it was afterwards easy for the Monks to obtain from Rome (where their Wealth generally centers) Dispensations and Explanations for rendering them capable of receiving.

IN this Century there started up many Societies of Regular Clergy; but one of the Principal was that of the Theatins. They were so call'd from Gian-Pietro Caraffa, Bishop of Chieti, by the Latins called Theate, who before he was translated to other Churches, and to the Papacy, together with Marcello Gaetano Tiene, a Gentleman of Vicenza, and Apostolical Protonotary, instituted this Order. Clement VII. in the Year 1524. approved of it; and it was afterwards confirmed by its Founder when Pope, by the Name of Paul III. and in 1567. by Pope Pius V. and by other succeeding Popes. From Venice (according to *Giorgio Rosso*¹, a cotemporary Writer) they came to us in the Month of May 1533. when they were greedily received by the Neapolitans, and especially by Antonio Carracciolo, Count of Oppido, who entertained them in a Place belonging to him, without the Gate of S. Januarius, but shortly after being received into the City, they were lodged by Maria Francesca Lenza (famous for her having founded the Hospital of Incurables) in some Houses belonging to her. But on account of the Narrowness of their Habitation, they were upon the Point of returning to Venice; but D. Peter de Toledo, the Viceroy, gave them the antient Parish-Church of S. Paul for a Habitation, whither they removed in 1538².

ALTHO' they professed a strict Poverty, and that by their Institution they could not so much as seek Alms, but were wholly to rely upon Divine Providence, which, as it takes care of the Lillies of the Field, and the Birds of the Air, so it was to provide for them; yet, in spite of their Teeth, the Neapolitans bestowed so much Riches and large Revenues upon them, that they have since erected such magnificent and stately Monasteries, that they vie with the most sumptuous Edifices in the World. They distinguished themselves above the rest, by their Vigilance in preventing the Errors that at this Time had been broached in Germany, from creeping into Naples; so that, as we have said, they were the most faithful Ministers of the Roman Inquisitors: And in process of Time, the Veneration of the Neapolitans for B. Gaetano Tiene, one of their Founders, came to that Height, that they erected a Statue of Brass to him in the Piazza di S. Lorenzo, and likewise placed one upon each Gate of the City, as a Token of the particular Devotion they had for him above all their other Patrons.

BUT about the same time there started up an Order, that in Time became much more famous, and spread more than all the rest; viz. that of the Jesuits, which has made so great a Noise in the World. It had its Rise in France from the famous Ignatius Loyola, a Spaniard; and the Introduction of this new Order into that Kingdom met with great Opposition, of which the History written by President Thuanus is full. The Jesuits were at last admitted there; and although in the Reign of Henry IV. in the Year 1594. they were obliged to leave that Kingdom, yet in 1603. they returned. They made wonderful Progress and Acquisitions in the other Dominions of Europe, and especially in Rome and the other Parts of Italy; and although in the Pontificate of Paul V. the Venetians forced them to depart their Territories, yet in the Pontificate of Alexander VII. they were again received.

BUT in our Kingdom they met not with the least Opposition; on the contrary, in 1551. having come under the Guidance of P. Alfonso Salmerone, the Neapolitans received them with no less Pleasure than they had the Theatins. In a short time they gained the Friendship of the Nobility, and particularly of Ettore Pignatelli, Duke of Monteleone, who lodged them in a House in the Vicolo (Lane) del Gigante, where there was a little Chapel; there they began to instruct the Youth in the Christian Doctrine, which put the Secular Priests upon doing the same. The Neapolitans, delighted with these their pious and charitable Labours, gave them a more commodious Habitation, and bought the House of the Count of Maddaloni, near the Church of Monte Virgine, where they built a Church, and call'd it the Name of Jesus, where the Fathers began to teach Children without any Reward, and to preach and perform other Spiritual Exercises; so that their Auditory growing so numerous, that that Church was not able to contain them, Cardinal Alfonso Caraffa, the Archbishop, gave them the Church of S. Peter and S. Paul, which in the Year 1564. the Jesuits pulled down, and re-built much larger: But afterwards they began to build a magnificent Structure for their famous College, which now takes up many Streets of the City; for the Sumptuousness of which, they induced the Prince of Rocca alone, to lay out Twenty thousand Ducats¹. The other immense and surprizing Acquisitions, which, in less than a Century, they made in the City and Kingdom, are too well known; the other stately and stupendous Edifices of their other Colleges and professed Houses, in the choice Places of the City and Kingdom, have exceeded all those of the most numerous and rich Orders that have hitherto appeared.

IT may, perhaps, seem very strange how they came by so great Riches, since they did not regard the ordinary Method of acquiring them; but they considered, that the Mendicants had no sooner obtained from Rome a Power of acquiring, than they lost their Credit, and the Devotion of the People, so that they made but small Progress afterwards: That those Orders that persisted in a downright and constant Poverty, kept up both their Credit, and the good Opinion the People had conceived of them, but did not acquire Riches; so that it behoved them to think of a Medium between Poverty and Plenty; by Poverty to gain the Credit and Devotion of the People, and by other Hands to receive what was offered and given to the Society: For which end they instituted the profess'd Houses and Colleges. The profess'd Houses by no means can acquire or possess Immoveables; in these they profess Poverty, and 'tis the chief Aim of all their Labours; but the Colleges, where they receive and instruct the Youth, by bringing them up to Vertue, that they may afterwards be fit to live in Evangelical Poverty, they can acquire and possess Immoveables. By this means Poverty comes to be their Scope and essential Design, but accidentally they receive Possessions and Riches. Nevertheless, from what has since happened, and from the great Number of Colleges, and from the few profess'd Houses, every Body may conclude what their Essential is, and what their Accidental. From the Beginning of the last Century, it has been reckoned, that the Jesuits had no more than Twenty-one profess'd Houses, but the Number of Colleges amounted to 293. Add to that, the other Colleges and vast Acquisitions which they have made since, during the Course of another Century to this Time, and it will be seen, that there has been no other Order, that in a Century and a half, ever acquired so much Immoveables, and heaped up so great Riches and Treasure as this.

IN these Times the antient Orders underwent many Reforms, such as the Cisterciens and Recollects, or Zecolanti, both of the Order of Friars Minores, and the Penitents; the Reform of the Carmelites introduced by S. Theresa, who began with the Women, and afterwards extended it likewise to the Men, whence arose the Unshod Theresians; and the Reform of the Hermits of S. Austin, for the Monks of that Order. There were likewise new Orders founded, such as that of the Brothers of Charity, instituted by S. John of God, and that of the Regular Clerks, called Sacramentals, instituted by Girolamo Miano, or Emiliano, a noble Venetian, for the Education of Orphans; and in 1540. confirmed by Pope Paul III. who afterwards, in 1568. were by Pope Pius V. admitted to make monastick Vows; and some others: But all these Reforms and new Orders were not introduced into our Kingdom upon their being first instituted, they came among us much later. so that as Occasion offers, we shall give an Account of them in the following Books of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXIII.

ING Philip II. in the Government of his Kingdoms, did not follow the Foot-steps of the Emperor Charles V. his Father, who travelling over all his vast Dominions, adapted himself to the Humours of the different Nations, and was not only acceptable to the Spaniards, but to the Flemings, Germans, and Italians : On the contrary, Philip, upon the Death of Mary Queen of England his second Wife, left Flanders, and resolving to fix in Spain for good and all, he shut himself up in Madrid, and giving himself over intirely to the Spaniards, he began to govern the Monarchy according to their Maxims ; and being flattered by them as the most prudent and wise King of the Earth, full of himself, he took upon him to govern the World from his Cabinet. Some have attributed the Decline of the Monarchy of Spain to him, at least, that such Seeds were sown by him, as in Time produced nothing but Disorder, Losses, and Confusion ; for the Spaniards governed so imperiously, that they gained the Hatred of the foreign Nations ; whence they lost Flanders, and afterwards, in the Reign of Philip IV. his Grandchild, Catalonia, Naples, and Sicily were in Danger : Portugal revolted, and the Monarchy was at last reduced to that deplorable State in which it was seen in the Reign of Charles II. the last of his Male Posterity.

THERE has been so much written of Philip II. that it would be mispending of Time to repeat the same Things here ; in this History therefore, we shall only recount some signal Events relating to the Polity of our Kingdom, whereby the Reader may be acquainted, as well with the Civil and Temporal, as the Ecclesiastical State thereof, during the Forty-four Years that he reigned, from 1554, when his Father resigned to him the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, to the 13th of September 1598. when he died. In that Space of Time he sent hither eight Viceroy, besides six Lieutenants, who governed the Kingdom in their Turns. And 'tis surprizing to find what immense Sums were drawn out of it during that Time, by the Donatives which were made him upon various Occasions, of which our Writers have made long Catalogues¹; but there being so many, it was not possible to keep an exact Account of them: Therefore in the Volume of the Statutes there are a vast Number of Favours and Privileges granted by this Prince to the City and Kingdom of Naples, but always ill executed, and worse observed.

AS we have said, he took Possession of this Kingdom in his Father's Life-time, by the Marquis of Pescara, in the Viceroyalty of Cardinal Pacecco, and Pope Julius III. gave him the Investiture of it, in which his Holiness declared, That he did not in the least derogate from the Right of Queen Jean his Grandmother, Charles V's Mother, who was still alive. The Bull is dated the 3d of October 1554. and recorded by Cbioccarello in the first Tome of his MS. Giurisdizionali.

WHILE Pope Julius lived, and during the few Days that Marcellus II. his Successor sat in the Chair, our Kingdom enjoyed Peace and Tranquility. Cardinal Pacecco being confirmed in the Government of the Kingdom by the new King, pursued his prudent Conduct, in taking care to see Justice rightly administred, of which we have flagrant Instances in his eight Edicts inserted in the Volumes of our Laws². His Prudence is likewise conspicuous in the History of the Council of Trent, written by Cardinal Pallavicino, in which Assembly he was at great Pains till 1560. the Year of his Death. But Pope Marcellus being scarcely seated in S. Peter's Chair, died on the 30th of April 1555, and the Election of a new Pope, deprived us of Cardinal Pacecco, who was obliged to go to Rome, leaving Bernardino de Mendoza his Lieutenant, who governed the Kingdom only six Months.

BUT the Election of Cardinal Giovan-Pietro Caraffa, who took the Name of Paul IV. disturbed the Peace of the Kingdom. This Pope being an Enemy to the Spaniards, and ill-pleased with the Emperor Charles, who had thwarted his Election in the Conclave, brought that War upon the Kingdom which we are now going to give an Account of.

War made by Pope Paul IV. upon King Philip, in order to deprive him of the Kingdom: The Occasion, Pretence, and bad Success of it.

ALTHOUGH there be many Writers who have given us the History of the War made upon the Kingdom of Naples by Pope Paul IV. yet it having been so accurately written by Alessandro d'Amore, a Napolitan, who was present, and served in it under Colonel Marques, we shall follow him preferable to all the rest; so much the rather, that the President Thuanus, in describing it in his History, has likewise followed the same Writer: In the mean time, it will be necessary here to give an Account of the Grounds of this War, and the Pretences for entering into it.

GIOVAN PIETRO CARAFFA, Son to the Count of Montorio, in his Youth having applied himself to the Study of Literature, and especially Divinity and the Languages, owed his Rise to the famous Cardinal Oliviero Caraffa, who entertained him in his own House in Rome, when he was only a simple Canon of the Cathedral Church of *Naples*¹. Cardinal Oliviero having resigned the Bishoprick of Chieti in 1505, Pope Julius II. made him Bishop of that See; and on account of his Knowledge in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew Languages, he became a great Favourite of Pope Leo X. who sent him Nuncio to England, to receive, as was customary then, S. Peter's Pence. King Ferdinand the Catholick, out of Regard to Leo, did him great Honour at his Court, by making him one of his Privy Counsellors, and Vicar to his Chaplain Major, in which Dignities he was confirmed by Charles V. who likewise offered him the Archbishoprick of *Brindisi*², of a much greater Revenue than the Bishoprick of *Chieti*³; but being then seized with heavenly Raptures, and professing Piety, he not only refused it, but likewise resigned the Bishoprick of Chieti into the Hands of Clement VII. then Pope, and shunning the Conversation of Men, he retired to Monte Prucio, where he led an austere and solitary Life: But that City being afterwards pillaged, he was forced to quit it and go to Verona, and from thence to Venice, where, being joined by Gietano Tienne, Bonifacio del Celle, and others, he instituted the Order of Regular Clerks, who, from the Name of the Church he formerly had, as we have said, called themselves Theatins, which Institution being afterwards approved of by Clement VII. rendered him very famous, not only for Learning, but for the Sanctity of his Life and Manners, insomuch, that Paul III. in that remarkable Promotion of new Cardinals, which he made on the 22d of December 1536. advanced him to the Purple, and then obliged him to accept of the Church of Chieti, which about that Time was made an Archbishoprick.

POPE Paul III. had a vast Esteem for him, not only on account of the Sanctity and Austerity of his Life, but because he was a great Stickler for the Apostolick See, and a terrible Persecutor of the Hereticks, which in his Time swarmed in many Countries of Europe. It was he that put Paul III. upon raising the Tribunal of the Inquisition in Rome, and rendering it terrible by so many rigorous Laws and new Methods; which afterwards in his Pontificate grew to that Height⁴, that, as may be seen in the preceding Book, that Tribunal was abhorred, not only by foreign Nations, but by Italy, and even Rome itself; insomuch, that he was no sooner dead, than the Romans burnt the Tribunal and the Prisons, and set the Prisoners at Liberty: Whence it came, that with us the Theatins rendered themselves famous by preaching up the Inquisition; and it was they that often informed against those that were suspected of Heresy, and got them to be put in Prison.

WHILE this Cardinal staid with Paul III. in Rome, it was discovered, that both he and the Pope were Enemies to the Emperor and the Spanish Nation, and great Favourers of the King of France, then Charles's Enemy. The Hatred which the Cardinal bore the Spaniards, proceeded from an old Cause, which was, that many of the Family of Caraffa, during Lautrech's Invasion, having sided with the French, as soon as the Invasion was over, some of them were severely punished; on the other Hand, the Spaniards were firmly persuaded, that during the Commotions in the Year 1547. occasioned by the Inquisition, he had used his utmost Endeavours (promising not only his own Assistance, by going in Person to Naples, but likewise that of his Relations) to persuade the Pope not to slip so fair an Opportunity of making himself Master of the Kingdom, and that God would call him to a strict Account if he should neglect to make so great an Acquisition to his Church; with which the Duke D'Alba did not fail to upbraid him after he was Pope, in a Letter he wrote him before the War broke out, which is recorded by *Summonte*⁵: Wherefore the Spaniards having acquainted the Emperor with the Cardinal's being in the French Interest, and of his Aversion to the Spanish, the Emperor scored him out of the List of his Counsellors. And besides that, the same Pope Paul III. at the Request of the Cardinal, having given the Priory of S. Hieron in Naples to Card. Caraffa, his Nephew, Toledo, who was then Viceroy, hindered him from taking Possession of it.

BUT in 1549. by the Resignation of Ranuccio Farnese, the Church of Naples being vacant, Paul III. immediately gave it to the Cardinal, who, having got the Bulls to be dispatched, without any more ado thought to have been put in Possession of it, but the Viceroy Toledo refused to give the Exequatur Regium to the Bulls; and a few Days after Pope Paul dying, and on the 10th of February 1550. Julius III. being elected in his Room, wrote a very pressing Letter to the Emperor Charles V. begging of him not to delay any longer the giving Cardinal Caraffa Possession of the Church of Naples; among other Things in this Letter, which we read in *Chiccarelli*¹, he insists much upon the Cardinal's Innocence, and that what had been reported of him was nothing but Calumny; for it had never entered into his Mind, in proximo Neapolitano tumultu, illud tantum Regnum legiro præce. sed tradere: Nec vero nos quid tale de hoc viro audivimus, &c. Nec is tantum non meliori, tantis meritis cedere, periculum ipse facultatibus, ausus esset. Therefore he intreated him to give the Cardinal Possession, and for that End sent a Nuncio to negotiate the Affair.

THE Emperor, having no Grudge against Julius, as he had had against his Predecessor, hearkened to his Request; and the Affair being taken into Deliberation, not only in Rome, but in Spain and Naples, after a long Consideration, according to the usual Slowness of the Spaniards, at last the Cardinal obtained the Exequatur Regium to his Bulls, and an Order came from the Emperor to put him in Possession.

BUT the Cardinal knowing, that if he should go to Naples, he would be but coldly received by the Spaniards, sent Bishop Amico, who, as his Proctor, on the 2d of July 1551. took Possession for him, and was made his Vicar. In this manner did he govern the Church of Naples four Years by this Vicar, and never came to reside himself; wherefore the Spaniards frequently thwarted his Vicar, and started Difficulties about his Jurisdiction.

JULIUS III. was succeeded by Marcus II. who living but a short time after his Election, on the 23d of May 1555. Cardinal Caraffa was elected in his Room, who took the Name of Paul IV. It was very surprizing to find this Man, who had led a holy and austere Life, no sooner advanced to the Papacy, than he became proud and insolent; for being asked after what manner he would be pleased to live, he answered, As it becomes a great Prince. The Spaniards were very ill-pleased with the Election; so that King Philip thought fit to order Cardinal Paleario not to return to his Government of Naples, but to remain in Rome, that by his Prudence and Management he might find Means, either to soften the new Pope, or to look narrowly into all his Proceedings, and give him an Account of his Designs, that he might be upon his Guard to prevent any Insult.

IT was not long before it was found out that the Pope was resolved to be revenged of the Spaniards, and to enter into a new League with Henry King of France for attacking the Kingdom; of which Philip being advised, very opportunely sent to be Viceroy of Naples D. Ferdinando Alvarez de Toledo, Duke D'Alba, who, being then Governor of Milan, had the chief Command of the Spanish Troops in Italy: This was that famous General, who, by his many renowned Actions, rendered himself glorious, not only in Germany and Italy, but likewise in Flanders and Portugal.

THE Duke D'Alba arriving in Naples about the End of the Year 1555. began narrowly to observe all the Proceedings of the Pope; who, as well in order to raise his Nephews, as to strengthen himself for the Expedition he designed against the Kingdom of Naples, under Pretence, that Montemonte Colonna kept a secret Correspondence with the Spaniards, had divested him of the Lordship of Pallano in Campania at Rome, and given the Investiture of it to Giovanni Caraffa, Count of Montorio his Nephew, with the Title of Duke of Pallano; and at the same time had invested Antonio Caraffa, another Nephew, with the County of Bisignano, and given him the Title of Marquis of Montebello; and had made Carlo Caraffa, another Nephew, Knight of S. John of Jerusalem, a Cardinal. He depressed all those that were in the Interest of Spain, and raised those of the contrary Faction; yea, he caressed all the Exiles and Malcontents of our Kingdom, and protected them in Rome; and among the rest he received Bartolomeo Camerario our famous Lawyer. And he went so far, that there being some Letters intercepted, he caused Giovanni Antonio de Tassis, the Post-Master, to be put in Prison, and cruelly tormented, depriving him of that Office which the Kings of Spain were always wont to keep in Rome; and besides that, he caused Garcilasso della Vega, Philip's Ambassador as King of England, to be imprisoned, and ordered all the Friends and Servants of the King, and his Ministers, that were in Rome, to be narrowly looked after.

SUCH was his Imprudence, that, not able to conceal the Malice and Hatred he bore the King and the Spaniards, he publicly threatened to deprive him of the Kingdom, as being devolved to the Holy See. Paul IV. according to Bacon of *Jerusalem*¹, was proud and imperious, and naturally rough and severe, which led him frequently to speak very reproachfully of the King and the Emperor, in Presence of all Sorts of Persons; and once a Spanish Cardinal being present, he spoke the more freely, and even commanded him to write what he had said of them. And one Day, in a publick Consistory, he ordered his Attorney-General, and Silvestro Aldobrandino, the Consistorial Advocate, to plead, and insist upon it, that the Kingdom ought to be declared devolved to the Holy See; to which he answered, That he would take care of that in due time². With which the Duke D'Alba did not fail to upbraid him, as an indiscreet Attempt, in that Letter he wrote him³, in these Words; Your Holiness has suffered the Attorney-General, and Solicitor of the Holy See, in a Consistory wherein you was present, to make so unjust, unreasonable, and inconsiderate a Demand, that the King my Master should be deprived of the Kingdom, to which your Holiness consented, by saying, That you would take care of that in due time. But this Affair was carried beyond a simple Demand, for an Action was commenced, and Sentence pronounced.

THE President *Thuanus*⁴, and Soave write, that the Reason that moved the Pope to declare the Kingdom devolved, was because Philip, according to him (the Pope) had committed High Treason, by having countenanced and received under his Protection the Colonn his Rebels. But the Pretence which was made publick, and upon which the Sentence was founded, was the Non-payment of the Arrears of the Quit-Rent. King Philip, before he had received News of Cardinal Caraffa's being elected Pope, had written a Letter, dated the 25th of June 1555. to his Ambassador in Rome, in which he gave him in Charge to treat with the Pope that should be elected, about remitting the yearly Quit-Rent of Seven thousand Ducats claimed by the Apostolick See; because in the Agreement made between Clement VII. and the Emperor Charles V. his Father, among other Things it was stipulated, that upon the Emperor's getting the Venetians, and the Duke of Ferrara, to restore to the Holy See some Cities and Lands which had been taken from it, of which they were in Possession, neither he nor his Successors should be bound to pay the said yearly Quit-Rent of Seven thousand Ducats, but only to send to the Apostolick Chamber a white Nag in lieu thereof; and seeing the Emperor had fulfilled the said Promise, and got the Venetians and the Duke of Ferrara to deliver up those Cities and Lands belonging to the Apostolick See, the Quit-Rent ought to be remitted: Moreover, ordering him, that if the new Pope was not as yet elected, and while the See was vacant, he should deposite the Quit-Rent of that Year, since the Term of Payment was drawing near, with a Protest, that it ought to be returned, as not due⁵.

IF any other of the Cardinals had been elected, he would have thought the Demand reasonable, but Paul IV. laid hold of it as a fit Pretence for carrying on his Designs; for rejecting it as unjust, he not only claimed the Arrears, notwithstanding the Agreement of Clement VII. but these Arrears not being paid at the Time appointed, he ordered his Attorney-General, as we have said, to insist upon Philip's having forfeited the Kingdom, and its being devolved to the Holy Roman Church for Non-payment of the said Quit-Rents, and a Bull was accordingly drawn up¹: However the Sentence was never published, because, as we shall see, the Duke D'Alva hemmed the Pope in so close, that he was fain to humble himself, and by the Mediation of the Venetians, to accept of Peace. *Alessandro d'Andrea*² writes, that his not publishing the Sentence was owing to the Advice of Bartolomeo Camerario, who, as we have said, being an Exile, staid at Rome under the Protection of the Pope.

BUT, by some intercepted Letters, it was discovered, whence the Pope's great Vanity and Arrogance proceeded, not only in speaking, but acting so publicly and openly both against the King and Kingdom: In fine, the Treaty and League, which, by the Means of the Cardinals Tournon and Lorrain, he had made with the King of France in order to invade the Kingdom, was discovered; and what is more, it was then found out, that the Prince of Salerno, who had gone from France to Constantinople, having had a Hand in that Alliance, the Pope, by means of King Henry and the Prince, had likewise made a League with the Turk, that he by attacking, or at least infesting the Kingdom by Sea, the Conquest of it by Land might be the more easy. It was also reported, that the Pope, in order to aggrandize his Nephews, had concerted with the King of France to marry his Niece Maria, the Cardinal and the Duke's Sister, to one of his Sons, who was to be invested with the Kingdom, according to the Articles, which shall be related, and that the Investiture should be her Portion; and it was then thought, that the Marriage would have taken Effect, if the Design upon Naples had succeeded, and if Maria, who was only nine Years of Age, had not been snatched away by an untimely Death.

THE Articles of the League concluded in Rome on the 15th of December 1555. recorded by *Sammonete*³, were these:

THAT the most Christian King, with all his Forces, should be obliged to defend his Holiness Pope Paul IV. against all Persons whatsoever that should offer to offend him; and if he should be attacked, to come himself, or send Armies into Italy for his Defence.

THAT he should take under his Protection the Cardinal Caraffa, the Count of Montorio, and D. Antonio Caraffa, his Holiness's Nephews, and their Off-spring, and make up what Losses they might happen to suffer, either in their Titles or Estates upon account of this League, by giving them other Titles and Estates in Italy or in France, suitable to their Nobility, and his Royal Generosity.

THAT the King should send into Italy Ten or Twelve thousand foreign Foot, more or less, according as should be judged necessary, and 500 French Lance-Men, with 500 light Horse.

ON the other Hand, That the Pope should furnish out of the State of the Church, or otherwise, 10,000 Foot, more or less, as Occasion required, with their Generals and other Officers, and 1000 Horse.

THAT he should give Passage, Victuals, Artillery, Ammunition, and other Necessaries, which the Army of the League should stand in need of in the State of the Church, they paying for the same.

THAT the War may be begun either in the Kingdom of Naples, or in Tuscany, as shall be found most expedient for the common Cause.

THAT upon conquering the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the Pope shall give the Investitures of them to one of the most Serene Sons of his most Christian Majesty, provided it be not the Dauphin, when, and as often as it shall be required by King Henry, reserving the City of Benevento, and its Territories and Jurisdiction: and with this Condition likewise, that the Limits of the State of the Church be enlarged and extended on this Side of the Apennines, as far as S. Germano inclusive, and to Garigliano; and on the other Side of the Apennines, as far as the River Pescara: So that all that Tract of Land lying within the said Limits of the Province of Abruzzo, as far as Pescara, and of the Province of Terra di Lavoro, as far as S. Germano inclusive, and to the River Garigliano, may be understood to be within, and belong to the Jurisdiction of the Church; and the Borders of the Kingdom shall be confined within the said Rivers, and a straight Line cross the Apennines from S. Germano to the Head of the River of Pescara, within which Bounds are comprehended the City, Fort, and Harbour of Gaeta, which were to belong to the Church, as well as all the other Lands and Places contained within the aforesaid Bounds.

THAT the Quit-Rent shall be increased to 20,000 Ducats of Gold, besides the usual Nag.

THAT the Apostolick See shall have a free Estate in the Kingdom of the yearly Rent of 25,000 Crowns of Gold, in a convenient Place at the Pope's Choice.

THAT there shall be given to the most illustrious Lord, the Count of Montorio, an Estate likewise free, & pleno jure, at the Pope's Choice, and which shall yield a Revenue of 25,000 Crowns, and belong to him and his Heirs whatsoever, Male or Female, as he shall think fit to appoint, with Power, by his last Will, to give or sell it, as he shall judge most convenient; and if he should happen to die Intestate, the nearest Heirs shall succeed.

THAT such another Estate, or at least of 25,000 Crowns Revenue, shall be given to D. Antonio Caraffa.

THAT the King, as soon as possible, shall send his Son to be invested with the Kingdoms, and to reside and be brought up in one of them, and both to be governed in his Name. The Council, with respect to the Administration and Government of the State, shall be composed of faithful Men, devoted to the Pope and the Holy See, and be chosen with common Consent, till the said young King shall be of Age to govern by himself the said Kingdoms; that the most Christian King shall chuse Governors for taking care of his Person, and that the Captain-Generals of the Army shall be Men well affected to the Pope and the Holy See, and chosen by common Consent.

THAT the most Serene Prince, who is to be invested, his Heirs and Successors, shall not be elected or named King or Emperor of the Romans, or King of Germany or of France, or Lord of Lombardy or Tuscany.

THAT till he who is to be invested, shall arrive in these Kingdoms, they shall be governed and managed with common Consent, and according to the Liking of the Pope and the King, by one or more; and those who shall be pitched upon, whether Ecclesiasticks or Laicks, shall be obliged to take an Oath to his Holiness and the most Christian King, faithfully to administer and govern to the Satisfaction of both.

THAT if the most Serene Son, who is to be invested, be not of a proper Age for taking the Oath, and doing Homage to the Pope and the Holy See, the King, as his Father and Tutor, at the giving of the Investiture, shall be obliged to swear and do Homage for him: Which Oath shall be exactly of the same Form with the Oaths formerly in use to be taken to the preceding Popes and the Apostolical See, especially to Pope Julius III. to which Form shall be added and altered, all that which by the present Articles is added and altered.

THAT as an Acknowledgment of this first Investiture, he is hereby bound to build in the Church of St. Peter in Rome, one of the great Chapels; and when the said King shall be of lawful Age, he himself shall take Oath, and do Homage to the Pope and his Successor.

LASTLY, That by Virtue of the Investiture to be given, he shall be obliged to allow 10,000 Tonels of Grain to be exported from the Kingdom of Sicily ultra Pharrum, as often as the City of Rome shall have Occasion for it, without paying any Duty.

THESE Articles, so well contrived by the Pope, made him speak with so much Boldness and Dildain; and in the Interim he lost no Time in strengthening himself before-hand, which made the Duke D'Alba suspect him the more; for Cardinal Cicci, and his Brother the Duke, were openly, with all Diligence, fortifying Pallano, and had carried thither Pietro Strozzi, an Officer in the King of France's Service, who was then in Rome, in order to take his Advice about the Fortifications proper to be made there; and News was Daily brought to Naples of Commissions given by the Pope for levying Soldiers. He had likewise taken into his Service Camillo Orsini, an experienced Officer of those Times, and had sent Paolo his Son with a thousand Foot to Perugia, besides Twelve hundred Gaskoigne Foot, which the King of France sent him from Cervica to his Assistance: They were hard at Work building Bastions in Rome, and adding new Fortifications to many Places of the State of the Church.

THE Duke D'Alba, seriously considering all this, at last, like an experienc'd General, resolved to prevent the Pope, and in order more securely to defend the Kingdom, to attack the Ecclesiastical State, and make it the Seat of the War. In the mean time he did not neglect, by Messengers and Letters, to complain to the Duke of Palliano of these Innovations made by the Pope his Uncle, and to offer him Peace; but instead of an Answer, the Preparations for War were continued with greater Vigour, and News brought, that Cardinal Caraffa was gone to France to solicit that King's Assistance in the Expedition.

THEN this gallant and prudent General, unwilling to wait till the Storm should fall upon the Kingdom, after having sent a particular Account to King Philip in Spain of the impending War which the Pope was preparing to make for possessing himself of the Kingdom, assembled the best Way he could 12,000 Foot, 300 Men at Arms, and 1500 Light Horse, with twelve Pieces of Ordnance, and on the first Day of September 1556. marched towards the State of the Church, and upon his Arrival at S. Germano, took Possession of *Pontecorvo*¹. Before he advanced further, he was resolved to sound the Pope anew, and for that End sent Pirro Lefireus, with Letters directed² to him and the College of Cardinals, wherein he offered him Peace, and roundly protested, that all the bad Consequences of a War should be imputed to him.

BUT the Pope, altogether averse to Peace, trusting to the League with France, and more insolent than ever, slighted the Letters; whereupon the Duke pursuing his Conquests, made himself Master of Frisclene, Veruli, Banco, and other Places in that Neighbourhood. The Pope highly enraged, caused Pirro Lefireus to be imprisoned in Castle S. Angelo; and if the College of Cardinals had not hindered it, he would have made him be put to a cruel Death, and the Duke in the mean time pursuing his March, made himself Master of the important Cities of Anagni, Tivoli, Viterbo, Ponte-Lucano, and of almost all the Cities belonging to the Colonna, as far as Murino, and threatened to besiege Veletri, making Incursions to the very Gates of Rome.

THIS General left us an excellent Lesson, and a noble Example, that the best Way to carry on a War against the Pope for the Defence of the Kingdom, is to attack him in his own Dominions. The Duke, besides his former respectful Behaviour to the Pope, in taking Possession of the Cities belonging to the State of the Church, that it might not be said that he made these Conquests in order to rob the Church, caused the Arms of the Sacred College to be painted upon the Gates of the Cities, from time to time as they surrendered, with a Protestation, that he kept them in Name of the said College, and of the future Pope: Although, as *Alessandro d'Andrea*³ writes, there were some who took this to be an artful Contrivance of the Duke, to create Jealousy and Discord between the Pope and the College.

ON the other Hand King Philip, according to his usual Custom, and the Spanish Sagacity, caused this Affair to be taken into Deliberation, and as in the Conquest of Portugal he consulted the greatest Lawyers of those Times, and the most famous Universities of Spain and Europe to make it more plausible; so in this Affair with Paul IV. he consulted the Divines how he was to behave, and what was fit to be done against a Pope, who, on many Occasions, both when he was Cardinal, and now being Pope, had been a professed Enemy to the Emperor his Father and to himself, and who had entered into a League with the King of France for attacking the Kingdom of Naples. He seemed to be very much troubled at this new League, and with great Difficulty was drawn into this War; he considered that the Truce made with the King of France was now broken by means of the Pope, who ought rather to have made it his Business to keep Peace among Christian Princes: he looked upon it as a very scandalous Thing that the Pope, having caused Cardinal Caraffa, in his Name, to promise the King of France, that in the new Promotion, he should make such a Number of Cardinals, Favourers of France, and Enemies of Spain, that he should always have a Pope in his Interest, had absolved that King from his Oath in order to break the Truce, and make War upon the Kingdom of Naples, notwithstanding that the Princes of the Blood, and the Nobility of France, abhorred the Infamy of breaking the Truce, and receiving Absolution of the Oath. He considered, that in the very first Year of his Reign, it was his Misfortune to be obliged to take up Arms against the Vicar of Christ: Therefore he ordered the following Heads to be taken into Consideration.

³ A. d. Andr. loc. cit.

W H E T H E R the King could order, that none of the Subjects of his Kingdoms should go to, or remain in Rome, even although they were Cardinals; that all Prelates should come and reside in their Churches, and that the beneficed Clergy should come and serve in their own Churches, and upon their refusing, if they could be deprived of their Temporalities?

W H E T H E R, during a War with the Pope, he could hinder Money from being sent to Rome, either by Bills of Exchanges, or any other Way, directly or indirectly, for obtaining Bulls, Briefs, &c.?

W H E T H E R he could call a National Council in Spain, or in any other of his Majesty's Dominions, for reforming and redressing Ecclesiastical Matters, and what Method ought to be taken for calling it?

W H E T H E R, supposing the State in which the Council of Trent is at present, and what was determined in the last Session of it, a Continuation of the said Council, and a Reformation in its Head and Members might be demanded, and the End for which it was called prosecuted; and in case the Pope should forbid it, whether he might be resisted, and, notwithstanding his Dissent, the Prelates of his Majesty's Dominions might be sent to hold it, and what Method should be taken for carrying on the said Continuation, in case the Prelates of other Kingdoms should absent themselves?

PAUL IV. not having been Canonically elected, but having intruded himself into that See, whether his Election may be said to be void, and what is fit for his Majesty to do in that Case?

W H E T H E R, after so much Trouble, Charges, and Inconveniencies, which the Subjects and Natives of his Majesty's Dominions of Spain have suffered, in going to the Court of Rome on account of Suits at Law, and other Affairs, it may be demanded, that the Pope should appoint a Legate in the said Kingdoms for dispatching Affairs Gratis, and establish a Rota (Court) in Spain for deciding Suits at Law, that the Subjects may not be obliged to go to Rome; and if that should not be granted, what is proper to be done?

I T having been seen, that so many Abuses are practised at Rome in the Provision of Benefices, Prebends, and Dignities; and it being evident to every Body, that the King may require the Provision to be left to the Ordinaries, and suppress the other Abuses, what Remedy can be now applied for removing so many Disorders and Excesses resulting from such Provision of Benefices?

W H E T H E R it be just, that the Pope should have the Fruits and Revenues of the vacant Churches within his Majesty's Kingdoms; and whether it ought to be suffered, and what he is to do in that Matter, since 'tis known, that he forbears to take them in other Kingdoms, and that such a Custom has been but lately introduced into his Majesty's Dominions?

W H E T H E R it may be lawfully demanded and claimed, that the Apostolical Nuncio, residing in his Dominions, should dispatch Business Gratis, and no otherwise? and what can or ought to be done in that Matter?

T O each of the aforesaid Heads, an eloquent Spanish Divine gave King Philip suitable and affirmative Answers¹; so that the King being thereby encouraged, wrote to the Duke D'Alba to go on vigorously with the Expedition, and to make use of all proper Expedients for bringing the Pope to Reason, for that he himself on the other Hand would not fail (if he did not amend) in his Dominions of Spain, to make good his Pretensions deduced in the said Heads.

T H E Duke therefore, during the remaining Part of the Year 1556. having made great Progress in the Ecclesiastical State, which occasioned so great Terror and Confusion in Rome itself, that a vast Number of Families left the City, believed that he had sufficiently humbled the Pope; but he sticking close to his Purpose, and because of the Duke's Success, more passionately bent upon Revenge, ordered the Marquis of Montebello to attack the Kingdom on the Side of Trento, hoping thereby to foment a Sedition in Abruzzo, and to remove the Seat of the War from his own Dominions into the Kingdom. But D. Ferrante Loffredo, Marquis of Trevico, the Governor of that Province, to whom the Viceroy had sent a Re-inforcement, having marched against the Marquis of Montebello, not only forced him to shut himself up in Ascoli, but took him Prisoner, and pillaged Mantignano.

THE Pope pressed the King of France to send him the promised Succours, and exclaimed against the Duke D'Alba, cursing and excommunicating him: On the other Hand, the more the Pope exclaimed, so much the more did the Duke pinch him; for having marched towards Grottaferrata and Frescati, he took Count Baldassare Rangone, with a hundred and fifty of his Men lying in Ambush; then he halted under Albano, from whence he sent Ascanio della Cornea, to take Possession of Perigliano and *Ardea*¹. From thence he marched towards the Sea, and with small Opposition made himself Master of Nettuno; from thence he marched to Ofit, which having surrendered, he began to batter the Castle, which after some Resistance likewise surrendered, and was garrisoned by the Viceroy: And now his Cavalry scoured the Country, without Opposition, to the very Gates of Rome.

CARDINAL Caraffa, who was returned from France, by Means of the Cardinal of S. James, the Viceroy's Uncle, proposed an Interview, in order to set on Foot a Treaty of Peace: Accordingly the Duke and Cardinal Caraffa met in the Island of Furcinia, but nothing was concluded, excepting a Truce of forty Days, more for giving time to deceive one another, than for concluding Peace². Both Parties seemed to find their Advantage in this Truce: The Cardinal had a Mind to gain Time, because he had had an Account, that the King of France had already sent the Duke of Guise with 12,000 Foot, 400 Men at Arms, and 700 Light Horse, with a great many Knights, to his Uncle's Assistance, and was expecting his Arrival, being only detained in Piement by the Roughness of the Season. On the other Hand, the Viceroy having certain Intelligence of the coming of the French, was willing to have Hostilities cease, not only to get together Store of Provisions for maintaining the Army, since by contrary Winds the Gallies were stopt from bringing them, but likewise to have time to go to Naples, in order to make what Preparations were necessary for making Head against the Duke of Guise.

THE Duke therefore having left his Army at Tivoli, under the Command of the Count of Peperli, whom he made his Lieutenant, returned to Naples to make the necessary Preparations for so important an Expedition: The first Thing he did was to call a General Parliament of the Barons and Commons; and having laid before them the urgent Occasion the King had for Money, he got a Donative of a Million of Crowns for the King's Use, and 25,000 for himself. By this Means he formed a Scheme of an Army proportionable to the Occasion, and gave the necessary Orders for assembling it, which amounted to 30,000 Italian Foot, 12,000 *German*s, and 2000 Spaniards, besides the Cavalry of the Kingdom, which came to 1500³. Besides he made all necessary Provision, both for the Maintenance of so great an Army, and the Defence of the most important Places, particularly those in Abruzzo, which were recommended to the Fidelity and Care of the Marquis of Trivico.

BUT that in which he discovered his provident Care most, was his preventing the Pope's drawing Money out of the Kingdom; and on the contrary, his taking care that the King, in case of Necessity, might make use of the Ecclesiastical Revenues for the Defence of it against an unjust Invader: Therefore, on the 15th of January 1557. having assembled the Collateral Council, in his own Name, and that of the said Council, he dispatched a Royal Letter directed to the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber, representing, That his Majesty's Service required, that the Fruits and Revenues of some Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbeys, and other Benefices of the Kingdom, should be sequestrated and collected in the Name of the Royal Chamber; therefore he commanded them to dispatch Orders to the Treasurer-General, and all the Collectors of the Provinces of the Kingdom, to demand the said Revenues, and to keep them sequestrated in the Name of the Royal Chamber, and to send him a List of the said Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbeys, and Benefices that were to be sequestrated, and of the Prelates and Ecclesiastical Persons that were in Possession of them. And since the Pope, by a new Ecclesiastical Discipline, refused to name a Successor to the Archbishoprick of Naples, vacant by his Advancement to the Papacy, but said, that he would govern that Church himself, altho' he was Pope, and having sent a Vicar, took all the Revenues of the said Church, therefore the Revenues of the Archbishoprick of Naples were likewise sequestrated.

THE Viceroy also in his own Name, and that of the Collateral Council, on the 21st of January the same Year, sent another Royal Letter to all the Governors of Provinces in the Kingdom, telling them he had heard, that the Pope had imposed two Tenth upon the Kingdom, and that they were exacted without his Leave, and the Royal Exequatur; therefore he commanded them to order the Officers of their Provinces to give Injunctions to all the Churches, Monasteries, Archbishops, Bishops, and other beneficed Persons, under Pain of losing their Temporalities, not to pay the said Tenth to the Pope's Collectors, nor any other way to send, or cause to be paid in Rome any Sum of Money, under any Pretence whatsoever, without express Licence from the Viceroy.

HE likewise wrote in the same manner, on the 22d of February the same Year, to Christoforo Grimaldo, Commissary of Terra di Lavoro, that his Majesty's Service, and the Good and Preservation of the Kingdom, required, that it should be known what Gold and Silver was in the Kingdom belonging to the Churches of whatsoever Dignity, Abbeys and Monasteries; therefore he ordered him to take an Account and Inventory, by the Hands of a publick Notary, of all the Gold and Silver that was in the Churches, Monasteries and Abbeys, setting down in Writing each Piece, the Quantity and Value; and after they are inventoried, to leave them in the Possession of the same Prelates and Keepers, with a Caution not to send any of them out the Kingdom, but to have them ready at the Viceroy's Command, to be employed in the King's Service, and for the Defence and Preservation of the Kingdom; and that he was to use his utmost Diligence in finding out all the Gold and Silver, that it might not be imbezzed, and to give him a speedy Account of his having put this Order in Execution.

THE Necessities of the War still pressing, and the Preparations of the Enemies being daily found to be greater, the Turk being likewise invited to infest the Kingdom with his Fleet, on the first Day of March the same Year, the Viceroy was obliged, in his own Name, and that of the Collateral Council, to write to all the Governors of the Provinces of the Kingdom, telling them, That on account of the Steps the Pope had taken, and the great Preparations for War he had made, and was making in Conjunction with other Princes, by having invited the Turkish Fleet to come and attack the Kingdom, it was necessary for the Defence and Preservation thereof, to provide both Horse and Foot for reinforcing and supporting the Army, and to march and attack the Enemies without the Kingdom, and likewise to provide the Maritime Places with sufficient Force for defending them against the Turkish Fleet; all which being for his Majesty's Service, the Preservation and general Good of the Kingdom, a great Store of Money was requisite for defraying the Charges; and seeing the Barons and People of this Kingdom are oppressed with the great Payments they have made, and the last Donative of two Millions of Ducats, of which they advanced a Third of the Easter Payment, he had determined, that the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates and Abbots, shall lend the Royal Court out of their Revenues, the other Two Thirds of the Easter Payment, according to the Proportions marked and sent them, of which they may be reimbursed out of the Payment of the said Donative due at Christmas next to come: And in case the said Prelates, Monasteries and Abbots, shall refuse to advance the said Two Thirds, the Governors of Provinces are immediately to exact the same out of their Revenues, according to the said Proportions.

A FEW Days after, the Necessities of the War being more pressing, on the 4th Day of the same Month of March, he gave Orders to several Commissaries, in his own Name, and that of the Collateral Council, to go in all haste, and put in Execution that which before had been committed to the Governors of the Provinces, and to force those who had the keeping of the Gold and Silver belonging to the Churches and Monasteries of the Kingdom, to deliver it up by Inventory and Weight, to be sent to the City of Naples, and there kept in the Archbishop's Palace in the Name of the Owners, till the Viceroy shall have Occasion to call for it; and likewise to oblige the Debtors of the Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbeys, and beneficed Persons, to pay the Two Thirds of the Third Part of their Revenues, by way of Loan to the Royal Chamber.

AND seeing this Order was general, it also included the Chalice and Cups, therefore on the 9th of the said Month, the Viceroy dispatched Letters to the Governors of the Provinces, who were to execute his Order concerning the Gold and Silver, wherein he excepted the Chalice and Cups, and such as had been taken he ordered to be restored. Since this Carriage of Gold and Silver to Naples made a great Noise, on the 18th of March he ordered, that from that Time forth no more Gold and Silver should be taken from the Churches, but only sequestered, and what had been taken restored to the Ecclesiastical Persons, to be kept by them till his further Orders.

HE likewise ordered, that for the Occasions of the present War, all the Bells of the Churches and Monasteries of Benevento, and all the Brass Cannon in the said City, should be coined into Money, and valued, in order to be paid when the War is over.

AFTER having made all these Provisions for so great an Expedition, on the 11th of April 1557. the Duke set out from Naples for Abruzzo. in order to make Head against the *French*¹, leaving his Son D. Federico de Toledo Lieutenant-General, who, till his Return in the Month of September the same Year, after the Peace had been concluded with the Pope, governed the City of Naples and the Kingdom.

ON the other Hand, Cardinal Caraffa went from Rome to Lombardy, in order to have an Interview with the Dukes of Ferrara and Guise, and to consult about the Method of carrying on the War, and the Seat of it. They were of different Opinions, some were for attacking Milan, others for setting Sienna at Liberty, and others for attacking the Kingdom of Naples; but the Cardinal protesting, that if any other Resolution was taken, than that of attacking of the Kingdom of Naples, it would not be approved of by the Pope his Uncle; the Duke of Guise, who had Orders from the King to obey the Pope, being furnished with some Pieces of Cannon by the Duke of Ferrara his Father-in-Law, marched with his Army into Romagna, and passing through the State of Urline, advanced by La Marca to the Neighbourhood of Trente.

IN the mean time, the Truce between the Pope and the Viceroy being expired, Hostilities were renewed, and in a Trice the War was kindled both in Abruzzo and Campagna di Roma. The Duke of Palliano, with Pietro Strozzi, took the Field with Six thousand Italian and German Foot, 600 Light Horse, and seven Pieces of Cannon, marched to Ofiz, and retook the Castle and the Bastion raised by the Viceroy. He recovered Mazara, Frascati, and the other neighbouring Places. Nettuno was abandoned by the Spaniards, and if the Pope's Troops, in the Heat of their Victory, had advanced further, they might likewise have retaken Frosolone and Anagni. Giulio Orfin was also wholly bent upon driving the Spaniards out of the Dutchy of Palliano; but Marcantonio Colonna coming there, and being assisted by the Inhabitants, Friends to the Colonna, he was forced to give over the Undertaking.

BUT the Duke of Guise was resolved to besiege Civitella, and halted at Alessi waiting for the Artillery, which had a great Way to come, of which Delay he made a grievous Complaint to the Marquis of Montebello; and that he might not seem to be idle, he ordered 1500 Foot, and a Troop of Horse to enter the Kingdom under the Command of the said Marquis and Giovanni-Antonio Toraldo, who pillaged Campoli, took Possession of Teramo, and ravaged the Country as far as Giulia Nova. The Artillery at last arriving, he besieged Civitella, whither, upon the News of the Approach of the Enemy, Carlo Lefredo, the Son of the Marquis of Trivulzio, and the Count of Santa Fiore had gone: The City was battered without Intermision by the Duke of Guise, but with equal Valour defended by the Besieged; and the French wanting Necessaries for repeating the Assaults, the Duke complained to the Marquis of Montebello of his Brother the Cardinal, who had put his King upon such an Expedition, and then did not perform his Promises; the Marquis having answered him haughtily, there passed such high Words betwixt them, that the Marquis left the Camp without so much as taking Leave². In order to make up this Breach, the Duke of Palliano and Pietro Strozzi came with a Reinforcement, whereby it seemed, that the Pope in some measure had performed his Obligation; but the Reinforcement being but very small, and many Things still wanting, that were necessary for carrying on the Siege, the French, impatient, began to curie, not only those who had advised their King to join in a League with Priests, who knew nothing of the Art of War, but likewise to inveigh bitterly against Cardinal Craffa, who had imposed upon their King ¹.

IN the mean time the Duke D'Alba with 20,000 Foot, 2000 Horse, and a great Store of Ammunition and Artillery, marched to relieve Civitella, and having entered Giulia Nuova, he halted twelve Miles distant from the Place; upon the News of this General's coming with so powerful an Army, Pietro Strozzi advised the Duke of Guise to raise the Siege: So that after Twenty-two Days Labour, about the Middle of May it was raised, and the Duke retiring to Ascoli, was followed by the Viceroy, who having entered the Lands of the Church, took Possession of Angarano and Filignano.

DURING these Transactions in Abruzzo, Marcantonio Colonna had the like good Success in Campagna di Roma; for the provident Viceroy having sent him a Reinforcement of 3000 Germans, out of six that had come in Doria's Fleet, he took the Tower near Palliano, Valmontone, and Palestrina, and at last laid Siege to Palliano. The Pope's Troops endeavoured to relieve it, and for that End the Marquis of Montebello and Giulio Orsini marched out of Rome with 4000 Italian Foot, 2200 Swiss, that had been hired by the Bishop of Terracina, some Troops of Horse, and many Waggon's loaded with Provisions for the Place; but Colonna having got a new Reinforcement of Germans, Spaniards, and Cuirassiers, that after the Relief of Civitella the Viceroy had sent him, marched to find out the Enemy; from small Skirmishes at last they came to an Engagement, in which the Pope's Troops were worsted and put to the Flight, and Giulio Orsini being wounded, was made Prisoner ². Marcantonio knowing well how to make Advantage of the Victory, advanced further, and made himself Master of Rotca di Massimo and Segna, without quitting the Siege of Palliano ³.

THE Pope being terrified at this Success, and seeing the Enemy advance too near Rome, called the Duke of Guise to come and defend the City; but the Duke D'Alba having left the Frontiers of the Kingdom well provided, and some Troops with the Marquis of Trivico for covering them, marched likewise into Campagna di Roma. He incamped the whole Army under the Walls of Valmontone, from whence he marched to Colonna; and being resolved to put Rome in a Fright, on the Night between the 25th and 26th of August, he sent 300 choice Musqueteers, under the Command of Ascanio della Cornia, with a Guard of Horse, and good Store of Scaling Ladders, in order to attack the Walls of Rome near Porta Maggiore, and to make themselves Masters of that Gate, and he himself was to follow them with the whole Army to favour the Undertaking. But a drizzling Rain falling, hindered the Foot from getting to the Walls that Night, which disappointed the Design; so that the next Morning they were forced to make a hasty Retreat, that they might not be exposed, after the Fatigue of the Night March, to engage with the French that were quartered in the neighbouring Places.

WHEN the Romans saw the Danger so near, they began to exclaim against the Pope, and threaten him if a Treaty of Peace was not set on Foot, and the Mediation of the neighbouring Princes obtained; therefore the Duke of Florence and the Republick of Venice were employed, who used their Interest with King Philip II. to induce him to Peace. King Philip, who, on account of the Victory he had obtained over the French in the Battle of S. Quintin, was at this Time very well pleased and delighted with having been revenged of them, like a pious Prince, and who unwillingly had entered into this War, notified his Victory to the Republick of Venice, and at the same Time answered them, and declared, that it was not his Intention to continue the War against the Church, and that he very willingly accepted of their Mediation for making Peace between the Pope and the Viceroy, adding, that if any Dispute should happen in concluding it, they might freely take upon them to decide it, since he was resolved to stand to whatever they should determine: He likewise wrote to the Viceroy to the same Purpose, injoining him to satisfy the Pope in whatever he could desire, provided it were not prejudicial to his own Interest, and that of his Servants and Friends. On the other Hand, the Pope seeing the War had proved very unsuccessful, and that the great Defeat the King of France had received near S. Quintin, obliged him to recall the Duke of Guise with his Army from Italy ⁴, seeing the Design of invading the Kingdom frustrated, and the Ecclesiastical State again made the Seat of the War, d'd not seem so averse to consent to Peace as formerly he had been; however, he would have it concluded to the Reputation of the Apostolical See, and that by all Means the Duke D'Alba should come in Person to Rome to beg him Pardon, and receive Absolution, saying, that he would rather see all the World ruined, than quit a Jot of his Due; that it was not his own Honour that lay at Stake, but CHRIST'S, which he could neither derogate from, nor give up.

THE Cardinal of Santa Croce, finding the Pope's Inclination, immediately dispatched Cosanzo Tasson to the Duke of Florence, and Alessandro Placidi to the Viceroy, to the End that the Treaty might be begun, and he likewise sent to the Viceroy the Proposals made by the Pope, which, besides the Duke's coming to beg him Pardon, consisted in demanding Restitution of what Places had been taken from him; he promising on his Part to dismiss the French, and pardon the Injuries that had been done him.

THE Duke D'Alba, who had not as yet had Experience of the great Difference that is between making War with other Princes, and with the Popes, from whom, in the End, nothing is to be got, on the contrary all Charges are lost, hearing these Proposals, was very much offended, and said, that they were so extravagant, that a Conqueror could not have made greater to the Conquered. But the Republick of Venice, who in good Earnest had undertaken the Mediation, in order to persuade the Duke to hearken to Peace, sent one of their Secretaries to him for that End; on the other Hand, the Cardinals Santa Fiere and Vitellazzo Vitelli went from Rome to treat about it with the Viceroy. Cardinal Caraffa likewise went, and was with great Honour received by the Duke in the Town of Citta, where the Matter being debated for some Days, at last the Peace was concluded on the 14th of September, upon these Conditions.

THAT the Viceroy, in the Name of the Catholick King, shall go to Rome to kiss his Holiness's Foot, and perform all the necessary Submissions in Atonement for the past Offences; and that the Pope on his Part shall receive him with the Bowels of a most clement Father.

THAT the Pope shall dissolve the League made with the King of France, by dismissing the French, and for the Time to come to act the Part of a Father and common Pastor.

THAT Anagni, Froselone, and all other Cities and Lands taken from the Church, shall be restored, and that both Parties shall return to each other all the Artillery taken during the Course of this War.

THAT both Parties shall remit all the Punishments and Censures incurred by whatsoever Person or Community, excepting Marcantonio Colonna, Alessandro Cornia, and the Count of Bagna, who are to continue under Censure, and to be dealt with as the Pope shall think fit.

AND lastly, That Pallano shall be put into the Hands of Giamberardino Carbone, a Nobleman of Naples, as Trustee for both Parties, to be kept by him with 800 Foot, who are to be maintained at the common Charges; and the said Giamberardino shall swear to keep it in Trust till it shall be disposed of by the joint Consent of the Pope and the Catholick King.

THESE Articles were received in Rome with universal Joy; so that upon the Departure of the French, the Duke D'Alba with his Son went to Rome, and were graciously received by the Pope, and absolved from the Censures which he imagined they had incurred by their late Conduct, and at the Duke's Intercession he likewise pardoned all the King's Friends and Dependants, and sent the Golden Rose to the Dutchesse D'Alba in Naples, a Present, in these Times, usually made to great Princes, which, with great Pomp and Respect, was received in the Cathedral Church of Naples by that most religious Lady.

THE Duke, accompanied by Cardinal Caraffa and the Duke of Pallano, left Rome, and sent an Account of all that had passed to King Philip, who gladly accepted the Peace, and bountifully rewarded all those that had distinguished themselves in the War. He gave the Title of Duke to the Count of Peperin, with a Pension of 3000 Ducats, and Power to dispose of his Estate, which would have devolved to the Crown for want of Issue ¹. To Ascanio della Cornia, he gave a yearly Pension of 6000 Ducats, till he should recover his Estate possessed by the Pope, besides a thousand Crowns given to his Mother, and many Ecclesiastical Revenues to the Cardinal of Perugia his Brother. The Inhabitants of Civitella obtained many Privileges, as a Reward of their Loyalty. And the Lordship of Rossano, in Calabria, was offered to the Duke of Paliano, provided he would part with Marcantonio Colonna's Estate, to which the Pope refusing his Consent, the Duke lost both, for when the See became vacant Marcantonio recovered his Estate.

WHEN the Duke D'Alba returned to Naples, the Neapolitans, justly looking upon him as their Deliverer, received him with Acclamations and Rejoycing. But while he was making Preparation for driving the French out of Piemont, King Philip, for more weighty and pressing Affairs of the Monarchy, ordered him to go to Spain, whither he went in the Spring of the Year 1558. to the great Grief of the Neapolitans, who had enjoyed his Presence but a short Time, the Cares of War having obliged him to be elsewhere: During these few Years he made four Statutes, and at his going away left his Son D. Federico his Lieutenant, but his Government was very short; for when King Philip called the Duke to Spain, at the same time he ordered D. Juan Manriques de Lara, then his Ambassador in Rome, to go and take the Government of Naples upon him, till he should appoint a new Viceroy, and his Government lasted only five Months, being succeeded by the Cardinal De Cueva, whose Lieutenantcy was not much longer; for Paul IV. dying, he was called to Rome to the Election of a new Pope. At last King Philip, an excellent Judge of the Abilities and Merits of Men, sent D. Parafan de Ribera, Duke D'Alcala, to be Viceroy, as knowing a Minister as any that ever had been in that Office, of whose long and prudent Government we shall discourse by-and-by.

THUS ended the War so unjustly ² begun by Pope Paul IV. and which brought great Distraction upon the Kingdom, and cost vast Sums for maintaining it. Such is the Advantage of the Popes in making War, that besides the Restitution of what is taken from them, there is not the least Mention made of the great Damage and irreparable Losses suffered by the People, which they ought to be in some measure obliged to make good. The Kingdom of Naples not only laid out two Millions, but for supplying the Necessities of this War, and paying the Debts contracted during the Lieutenantcy of D. Federico de Toledo, the City of Naples made two other Donatives, one of 400,000 Ducats, and another of 200,000 Ducats. Besides the Price of the Bells taken from Benevento being now to be paid, the Royal Chamber was obliged to make up the Accounts and clear it, and the Artillery taken from that City was likewise restored ³.

BUT all this is nothing in Comparison of the terrible Mischief that happened afterwards, as a Consequence of this War; for though it was at an End by this Peace, yet the Türk having been invited by the King of France and the Pope to infest the Kingdom by Sea, and though his Fleet had not come at the Time they expected it, and notwithstanding the Peace, he did not fail to harraß it for some time; for the Duke D'Alba was but just set out for Spain, and that unlucky Minister entered upon the Government, when, on the 5th of June 1558, the Ottoman Fleet appeared in our Seas, consisting of 120 Gallies, under the Command of Mustafa Bassa, which, after having pillaged and depopulated the City of Reggio in Calabria, entered the Gulph of Naples, and landing in the Night-time, pillaged and destroyed the Cities of Massa and Sorrento; in which last Place it made a terrible Havock, carrying off almost all the Inhabitants into Slavery, for whose Ransom the miserable remaining Inhabitants were forced to sell their Fields and Possessions at a very low Price, and send the Money to Constantinople ⁴: A Disaster, of which to this Day Sorrento bears the Marks, being still poor, and thin of Inhabitants.

BUT it was not long before the revenging Hand of God lay heavy upon the Pope, his Nephews and Relations, Authors of so much Mischief; for the Pope, before he died, underwent great Affliction for the so many wicked Actions of his Nephews, and he had near died of Grief, when, after having been forced to banish them out of Rome, he heard of so much Villany as had been committed in the House of the Duke his Nephew, which occasioned cruel and violent Deaths, and deplorable Tragedies. And on the 18th of August 1559. when he was breathing out his last, out of the Hatred which the People and Commonalty of Rome had conceived against him and his Family, there arose so great Tumults in the City, that the Cardinals were more put to a puzzle with these Commotions, as near at Hand and pressing, than with those in which all Christendom was then involved. The City was all in an Uproar; the Head of the Pope's Statue was struck off, and dragged through the City; the publick Prisons were broke open; the Place where the Inquisition was held, set on Fire, and the Proccesses and Writs kept there were burnt; and the Convent of Minerva, where the Monks who had the Inspection of that Tribunal lived, was near being burnt by the People. Paul V. having afterwards mounted the Chair, the Cardinals were imprisoned, and Proccess being taken out against them, they were sentenced to die for their Wickedness. The Cardinal strangled, and the Duke beheaded, and as for their Relations and Adherents, they were as severely punished, and reduced to as lamentable a Condition as ever was read in History.

CHAP. II.

A Treaty with Cosmo Duke of Florence, whereby the Garisons of Tuscany were reserved to the King, and the Duke invested with the State of Sienna, yielded to him by King Philip. The Dutchy of Bari, and the Principality of Rossano, by the Death of Bona Queen of Poland, devolve to the King. The Death of Mary Queen of England, and King Philip's third Marriage, who fixes his Residence in Spain for good and all.

IN this very Time King Philip fixed his Dominion more firmly in those Islands contiguous to the State of Sienna, about which he was in perpetual War with the French, by providing them with strong and settled Garisons, whence they were called the Garisons of Tuscany, which Name they retain to this Day; so that it was afterwards found by Politicians^a, that the Spaniards, what with the State of Milan, what with these Garisons, and the Kingdom of Naples, like so many Links, had made a Chain to bind Italy, and keep it at their Devotion. Charles V. as we have seen, looked upon the State of Sienna to be his own, as being devolved to the Empire^b, and sent Spanish Governors to take the Command of it: And while the Viceroy Tello governed the Kingdom, the Siennese, displeased with Marino's severe Government, revolted; so that a War being kindled, Tello was forced to go in Person for extinguishing it: An unlucky Expedition to him, for, as we have seen in the preceding Book, he lost his Life in it. Charles V. afterwards yielded Sienna to his Son Philip, who ruled it by his Governors: Whence it came, that our Napoleans learned many Institutions and Customs from Sienna, a City at that Time very polite. The Academics for improving Arts and Sciences were introduced into Naples in Imitation of those of Sienna. We had not only Theatres and Comedies, at that Time unknown in our Kingdom, from Sienna, but the Comedians themselves.

BUT the Possession of the State of Sienna by the Spaniards, occasioned cruel and obstinate Wars betwixt them and the French, who were jealous of their too great Power in Italy: In the mean time Cosmo Duke of Florence, who sometimes sided with the Emperor, sometimes to make a Ballance of Power, took part with the French, flipt no Opportunity of raising his State; by his Industry and great Cunning he took Care to keep King Philip still jealous, insomuch, that by seeming to be in the French and the Pope's Interest, he at last induced him, upon the Conditions which we shall relate, to yield Sienna. The King owed the Duke prodigious Sums, partly lent to Charles V. his Father, partly laid out by the Duke in the Expences of the War, when he was Auxiliary of the Spaniards; for which, although he had Piombo in Pledge, yet, as Occasion offered, it was often taken from him: Therefore he exclaimed against the King for not paying back his Money, and the Charges of the War; but Philip still putting him off with fair Words, at last Cosmo seeing himself deluded, in order to induce the King to yield up Sienna to him¹, seemed as if he had a Mind to join with the Pope and the King of France. President Thuanus describes the Stratagems made use of by Cosmo, not only to impose upon King Philip, but likewise upon the Pope and the King of France, and how all succeeded to his Mind; for it being of great Importance to Philip, that Cosmo should not join with his Enemies at a Time when he stood most in need of him, lest he should leave him in the Lurch at this Pinch, contrary to the Advice of all his Friends, he yielded up Sienna to him.

IN the mean time King Philip pretended to make this Resignation purely out of Love to the Duke, but at the same Time (having reserved the adjacent Islands) he was determined, by new Garisons, to strengthen himself much more in Italy, that he might be able to resist any foreign Enemy whatsoever, and in that Manner him in Italy; therefore, with the Consent of the Emperor his Father, he resolved to yield up the State of Sienna to the Duke, and invest him with it; for which End he appointed D. Juan Figueroa, at that Time Governor of the Castle of Milan, his Proxy, who, on the 3d of July 1557. entered into an Agreement with the Duke, whereby the State was yielded to him upon many Conditions, amongst which it was stipulated, that Port' Ercole, Orbitello, Talamone, Mont' Argentario, and Porto di S. Stefano were not comprehended in the Surrender. From that Time these Islands were garisoned by Spanish Soldiers at the Charge of the Kingdom of Naples, and from thence an Intendant was sent to administer Justice to the Inhabitants, who nevertheless are governed according to the Laws and Customs of the Siennese their Neighbours, and therefore that Minister still retains the Name of the Intendant of the Garisons of Tuscany.

PIOMBINO was likewise comprehended in this Treaty, which was faithfully executed, as both *Chioccarelli*² and *Thuanus*³ testify.

AMONGST these Islands there is one called the Island of Fanuti, about which there was a long Dispute at that Time, whether it belonged to King Philip, or was comprehended in the Surrender of the State of Sienna to the Duke of Florence. For maintaining the King's Right there were two Decisions made by the Royal Chamber, the one dated the 1st Day of June 1573. and the other the 26th of August the same Year, which we read in the 18th Tome of the MS. Giurisdizionali of Chioccarelli.

SINCE that the Emperors of Germany pretended, that the State of Sienna belonged to them; the Emperor Reidolphus II. in order more firmly to establish what King Philip II. had done, on the first Day of January 1604. sent a Writ to King Philip III. whereby he not only confirmed to him the Vicariate of Sienna, Port' Ercole, Orbitello, Talamone, Mont' Argentario, and Porto di S. Stefano, with

S E C T. I.

By the Death of Bona Queen of Poland, the Dutchy of Bari, and the Principality of Rossano devolve to King Philip.

AT this very Time the Dutchy of Bari and the Principality of Rossano devolved to King Philip, which, excepting the Sovereignty, had for a long time belonged, either to the Dukes of Milan, or the Kings of Poland.

AFTER that Ferdinand I. of Aragon, had divided the Prince of Taranto of his Estate, of which the Dutchy of Bari was part; in Requital of the Succours which Francesco Sforza, Duke of Milan, had sent him, and in Regard of the Marriage of his Daughter Eleonora to Sforza Maria Visconte, the said Duke's third Son, in 1465. he invested the Duke with the City of Bari and its Dutchy: But the Duke dying in 1466. with Ferdinand's Permission and Consent, he left the Dutchy of Bari, not to Galeazzo his eldest Son, who succeeded him in the State of Milan, and was afterwards married to Isabella of Aragon, the Daughter of Alphonſus II. but to Sforza Maria Visconte, and his lawful Children. Duke Sforza immediately sent a Lieutenant to Bari, with the Title of Vice-Duke, to govern that City and Dutchy; but though, on account of Duke Sforza's many and great Infirmities, the Marriage betwixt him and Eleonora of Aragon being dissolved, inſomuch that ſhe was afterwards married to Ercole Duke of Ferrara, yet the Dutchy was left to Duke Sforza during his Life, but he dying in 1479. it devolved to the King; and on the 14th of Auguſt the ſame Year, together with the Principality of Rossano, it was given to Lodovico Moro, the deceased Duke's Brother, and to his lawful Issue: Lodovico poſſeſſed theſe States, but when it was afterwards known, that he had invited Charles VIII. King of France, to conquer the Kingdom of Naples, Alphonſus II. beſides having recalled his Ambaſſador reſiding in Milan, and diſmiſſed Lodovico's reſiding in Naples, cauſed all the Revenues of the Dutchy of Bari and the Principality of Rossano to be ſequeſtrated, that they might not come to the Hands of his declared Enemy. The Kingdom afterwards, upon the King of France's quitting it, returning to the King of Aragon, and Peace being made with Lodovico, he demanded a new Investiture of the Dutchy of Bari and Principality of Rossano from King Frederick, who generously granted it, and the Writ is dated the 6th Day of December 1496. The Year following Lodovico made a new Request to the King, deſiring him to inveſt with the ſaid Dutchy and Principality his ſecond Son, named Sforza, a Child of three Years of Age, to whom he yielded them up; and the King having granted his Request, on the 20th of June 1497. the Child was created Duke of Bari, and Prince of Rossano, upon Condition, that Lodovico the Father ſhould govern theſe States till the young Duke ſhould be of Age.

IN the mean time, D. Isabella the Daughter of King Alphonſus II. being left Giovanni Galeazzo's Widow, with 130,000 Crowns Dowry, and the new King of France, Lewis XII. having made a new War in Italy, with a Deſign to be revenged of Lodovico his mortal Enemy, and to ſtrip him of the Dutchy of Milan, Lodovico being frightened, fled to Germany, and, before he went, had aſſigned to the ſaid D. Isabella the Dutchy of Bari and the Principality of Rossano, in lieu of her 130,000 Crowns: D. Isabella took Poſſeſſion of theſe States, and kept it as long as ſhe lived; for when Frederick was forced to leave the Kingdom, and when it fell into the Hands of the French and Spaniards, and at laſt of Ferdinand the Catholic, ſhe enjoyed theſe States without the leaſt Diſturbance. In 1501. ſhe came and took up her Reſidence in Bari, where ſhe left many Marks of her Generoſity, by enlarging and beautifying that City with ſtately Edifices¹.

SHE had by Galeazzo her Husband one Son named Francesco, and a Daughter named Bona, but Francesco dying while a Child, Bona was left sole Heiress, who was brought up by her Mother in Bari with great Care and Tenderness; being grown up to Woman's Estate, she resolved to marry her; the Emperor Charles V. at Isabella's Request, took that upon him, and for that End set a Treaty of Marriage on Foot with Sigismund King of Poland, who was then a Widower, and had no Male Issue: The Marriage was concluded in the Year 1517. and Sigismund sent for his Bride, who, on the 3d of February 1518. having embarked at Mantua, with great Pomp and Magnificence was received in Poland. D. Isabella having afterwards retired from Bari to Naples, and soon after falling ill of a Dropsy, in 1524. died, and was buried in the Church of S. Dominica, where her Tomb is still to be seen.

BY her Death there arose a Dispute about the Succession of the Dutchy of Bari, and the Principality of Rossano, betwixt Bona her Daughter and Heiress, and Sforza the Son of Lodovico Moro. Sforza pleading the Investiture given him by King Frederick, claimed the said Dutchy and Principality, and said, that Lodovico his Father being only a simple Guardian, could not assign them to D. Isabella for her Dowry. The Emperor Charles V. likewise pretended, that Lodovico not only had not Power to dispose of them, as not being his own, but also, because when he assigned them to D. Isabella he did not ask the Assent of Frederick King of Naples, to whom, and his Successors, upon the Failure of Heirs, these States were to devolve. At last, after various Deliberations and Treaties, it was decided, that the Castle of Bari should be assigned to Charles V. as having the Dominum animum, and being lawful Heir of the Kingdom; and that the City of Bari with its Dutchy, and the other Estates in Calabria, should be assigned to Queen Bona during her Life, without Prejudice to, or derogating from Sforza's Rights. This being settled, the Emperor immediately sent Colanaria di Somma, a Napolitan Knight, to be Governor of the Castle of Bari; and the Queen, who accepted the Conditions, sent thither as Vice-Duke, Scipione di Somma to govern the City and Dutchy.

THIS Affair continued in this State till the Year 1530. when Sforza, who with the Assent of the Emperor Charles V. was become Duke of Milan, gave up to the same Emperor, all the reserved Rights and Pretensions which he ever had to the said Dutchy and Principality: So that the Emperor being intirely Master of them, gave a new Investiture of them to Queen Bona, for her Life only, and in 1536. he invested her likewise with the Castle of Bari; so that they were afterwards governed by her and her Husband King Sigismund.

QUEEN Bona, by the Death of King Sigismund, which happened in the Year 1548. being left a Widow, although she had had four Children by him, one Son, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, named Augustus, and three Daughters, yet a few Years after, the Queen and the King her Son came to an open Rupture. The King was not pleased with his Mother's licentious Manner of Life: On the other Hand she, in order to live as she thought fit, pretending to be disgusted at the King's having married one of his own Subjects, though of noble Birth and great Beauty, resolved to abandon the Kingdom and her Children, and retire to Bari. Augustus allowed her to go; so that in 1555. having set out with a great Retinue, she travelled by Land to Venice, where she was received by that Republick with Royal Pomp, and great Demonstrations of Respect; and amongst the Orations of Cicco d'Adria, there is one made by him in Venice on this Occasion². From Venice she took Passage in the Gallies of the Republick to Bari, where she was received with great Honour, and much Feasting.

SHE did not live quite two Years in Bari, and during that Time she bought from different Barons, Capri, Noja, and Trigiano, in the Neighbourhood of Bari, and fortified the Castle with some new Bastions. At her Death she made a Will, wherein she left the said Cities which she had purchased, to Giovanni-Lorenzo Pappacoda, her favourite Courtier, who for many Years had served her faithfully both in Poland and Bari, by whose Advice she declared in her Will, that the Dutchy of Bari and the Principality of Rossano, by her Death were devolved to King Philip II. to which she therefore appointed him Heir. She died in the Month of November 1557. and was buried in the Cathedral Church of Bari, where many Years after, Anne Queen of Poland, her Daughter, and Wife to Stephen Battori, caused a stately Monument, with an Inscription, to be erected to her, which is to be seen at this Day.

KING Augustus, upon Advice of the Death of the Queen his Mother, and of her Will, was highly vexed, and made his Complaint to the Emperor Ferdinand, his Father-in-Law, pretending that it was not in his Mother's Power to deprive him of the Dutchy of Bari and the Principality of Rossano, by disposing of them in Favour of King Philip, and that the Investiture comprehended him also. In the mean time Philip had already adjudged them as devolved to himself, and as a Reward for Properzio's good Office, he had given him the Title of Marquis of Ciparolo; and having had Advice from the Emperor's Uncle of the Pretensions of the King of Poland, he was willing, that as well those as his own might be discussed before the Emperor, and decided according as those skilled in the Law should think fit. The Proposal was agreed to; so that both Parties sent to Germany famous Lawyers to support their Rights. King Philip was pleased to send from Naples Federico Longo, an excellent Doctor of these Times, and who was then Attorney-General of the Royal Chamber; but he having set out for Vienno, upon his Arrival at Vienno was taken ill, and on the 24th of October 1561. died there: His Corpse was brought back to Naples, and honourably buried in the Church of S. Severino. To supply his Place, Tommaso Salernitano, a renowned Doctor, and President of the Royal Chamber, was pitched upon, who having gone to Germany, and been graciously received by the Emperor, defended his King's Rights so well, demonstrating, that Queen Eleanora's Investiture became void at her Death, and that her Children were not comprehended in it, that Sentence was pronounced in King Philip's Favour, which put an End to that Dispute for ever. King Philip was so well pleased with Salernitano, that in 1560. the Presidency of the Collateral Council being vacant by the Death of Francesco Antonio Villano, he made him President thereof, in which Post he continued to the 10th of June 1584. the Year of his Death¹.

IN this manner, by Degrees, became extinct those vast Principalities and Lordships in our Kingdom, which often made the Possessors to be suspected by, and in a manner equal to the Kings, particularly in the Reign of the little Kings of the House of Aragon, who had no other Dominion but that of Naples only, therefore they were frequently subject to the Conspiracies and Treachery of the powerful Barons, and continually afraid of the Malcontents inviting the French, their constant Rivals, and who, either by intestine Commotions, or external Wars, still disturbed the Kingdom. The Spaniards, whenever any Estate devolved to them, either by Death or Felony, suppressed the great Lordships; they did not erect others in their Places, but annexing the principal City to the King's Demains, divided the Remainder into small Shares, and invested different Persons with the other Cities of which the Estate was formerly composed: instead of one who had been a Prince, Duke, or Marquis, they made many, by granting separate Investitures; insomuch, that in their Reign, beginning from the Emperor Charles V. and Philip II. to this Time, we shall find the Nobility so much multiplied, that their Number has glutted the Kingdom. Thus became extinct the Principalities of Taranto and Salerno, the Dutchy of Bari, the Counties of Lecce and Noli, and many other Dutchies and Counties; and by the provident Care of the Spaniards, the principal Cities being annexed to the Royal Demains, and different Persons invested with the other Cities and Towns, the petty Barons were multiplied, and the great suppressed.

The Death of Mary Queen of England, and King Philip's third Marriage, who retires to Spain, where he continued all the rest of his Days.

WHILE these Things were transacting in our Kingdom, the Death of the Emperor Charles V. (which, as we have said, happened this Year 1558.) occasioned no small Grief to King Philip his Son ; so that not only in Brussels (where King Philip then was) Germany and Spain, but in all the Dominions of that vast Monarchy, pompous Funeral Obsèques were celebrated. But this Prince was much more afflicted, when, a little after the Emperor's Death, on the 17th of November the same Year, he saw the irreparable Loss of Mary Queen of England his Wife, by whom he had no Children ¹. A Death which broke all the Designs that he had contrived upon that Kingdom ; for though in her Life-time he had despaired of her having Children, yet in order to keep a Footing in England, he had treated about a Match between Elizabeth, Mary's Sister, who was to succeed in the Kingdom, and Charles his Son, by his first Wife Mary of Portugal ² ; or, as Thuanus says ³, had agreed with his Uncle Ferdinand, that Ferdinand one of his Sons, should be married to her ; and that afterwards, there being little Hopes of Mary's living, he had drop't some Words as if he intended to marry her himself : Nevertheless the new Queen, like a prudent Woman, having discovered these Designs, and the Inclination of the English, who being ill-pleas'd with the late Government, were for having no more to do with the House of Austria, had no sooner mounted the Throne, than by an Oath she assured the Kingdom that she would never marry a Foreigner ⁴. And from her Accession there having arisen such Misunderstandings between her and the Pope, as at last ended in a total Separation ; the King of France, left by the Pope's Dispensation, the Marriage between her and King Philip should take Place, fomented the Difference, insinuating to the Pope, that he ought not to trust Queen Elizabeth, but abhor her, as one that was brought up in the Doctrine of the Protestants, and profess'd it openly ; by which Means he gained his End, and put a Stop to all Commerce between the new Queen and the Court of Rome : So Philip, out of all Hopes, rested satisfied, and all his Thoughts were afterwards turned upon concluding the Peace with Henry II. King of France, for which a Treaty had been set on Foot in the City of Cambrai, the 14th of February 1559. ; and on the Part of King Philip it was managed by the Duke D'Alva, the Prince of Orange, the Bishop of Arras (afterwards Cardinal Granville) and the Count of Melito ; and on the Part of the King of France, the Cardinal of Lorraine, the Constable, the Marshal, and the Bishop of Orleans : At last, on the 13th of April the same Year, it was concluded and confirmed by two Marriages ; the one of King Philip to Isabella King Henry's eldest Daughter, and the other of the Duke of Savoy to the said King's Sister ⁵. A Peace which rejoiced all Europe, and the Cardinal De Cœter the Lieutenant, entertained the Neapolitans with noble Feasts and Tournaments. But in Paris their Mirth ended in a lamentable Tragedy ; for King Henry in Jousting in a Tournament, received a mortal Wound whereof he died, and was succeeded by Francis II. In the mean time King Philip left Flanders, and took shipping for Spain, where he fixed himself with his new Spouse, and resolv'd never to wander any more ⁶, and shutting himself up, he governed the Monarchy from his Cabinet.

Of the Government of D. Parafan de Rivera, Duke D'Alcala, and of the remarkable Events, and the Disputes which he had with the Ecclesiasticks during the twelve Years of his Viceroyalty; and in the first Place about the Acceptation of the Council of Trent.

KING Philip being fixed in Spain, with a Resolution never to wander any more, and having celebrated the Marriage of his new Q. Izalalla with sumptuous Feasts, soon after made the People of Castile, by a solemn Oath, acknowledge Don Charles his Son as Prince of Spain, and his Successor to the Crown; and then made the People of Naples, and of the other Kingdoms of his Monarchy, take the same Oath successively: In the mean time the Cardinal De Cueva Lieutenant of Naples, on the 12th of June this Year 1559. went to Rome in order to be nearer at hand to watch the Steps of Paul IV. but the Pope dying the 18th of August, he was obliged to remain there for the Election of a Successor, and he was very near being elected himself; but his being a Spaniard, and a great Stickler for that Crown, standing in the Way, Giovani-Angelo de Medici was chosen, who took the Name of Pius IV. In 1562. the Cardinal De Cueva died in Rome, where his Tomb is to be seen in the Church of S. James belonging to the Spanish Nation.

BUT King Philip, who always shewed himself a Man of great Judgment in the Choice of his Ministers, had long before designed D. Parafan de Rivera, Duke D'Alcala for the Government of Naples, who was then Viceroy in Castile, a Man of great Probity, Prudence, Courage and Piety. He arrived in Naples the very same Day that the Cardinal set out for Rome, and was received with demonstrations of Joy suitable to the great Opinion the Napoleans had conceived of his Prudence and Justice. In the Beginning of his Government he had many Difficulties to struggle with, which required no less than his Courage to surmount. The Kingdom was reduced to that Extremity for want of Grain, that the People went pale and famished begging Bread through the Streets; the frequent Earthquakes, which were felt not only in the City of Naples, but in the Provinces, especially in Puglia and Bruttium, struck Terror in the People, and destroyed the Cities and Country; the Plague, grievous Diseases, and in fine, all the Judgments of God were poured down upon the Kingdom: Nevertheless by his Wisdom and Piety he provided proper and reasonable Remedies.

HE had not only Fate to wrestle with, but the Forwardness of Man, for the Turks, who in his Government more frequently than ever, invaded the Kingdom on all Sides, and ventured to pillage the Cities, and carry off the very Napoleans into Slavery, and the Barbary creants, who being infected with Charles's new Religion, disturbed the State: And in 1563. many Christians assembling in great Numbers, chose one Martin for their King.

made War upon him, and infested Calabria. This Adventure made so great a Noise in Europe, that Thuanus thought it worth his while to relate it in his elaborate History ¹. He says, that the Boldness of this Man was such that having assumed the Title of King Marco, he usurped the Regal Ensigns, and Royal Authority over his own Men; and then having gathered together a competent Army, he pillaged the neighbouring Countries, and with the Booty maintained it. He likewise endeavoured to surprize Citrone, but in vain. The Duke D'Alcala seeing that the ordinary Remedies were not sufficient against so great a Number, ordered Filippo Pignatelli, Marquis of Carbiara, President of that Province, to go and attack them with 600 Horse, and if need were, to employ the Regular Troops for destroying them; but that not being sufficient for doing it all at once, the Marquis was forced to make use of Stratagems for ruining them by Degrees, which had the desired Effect: In which Pope Pius likewise concurred, by ordering that of them as should come within the Ecclesiastical State for Shelter, to be taken and delivered up to the King's Ministers.

BUT in these ticklish and hard Times, he had Enemies to deal with, who, as they were very pernicious to the King's Authority, were as cautious and cunning. These were the Ecclesiasticks, and the Ministers of the Court of Rome, who, by most extravagant Pretensions endeavoured to make dangerous Incroachments upon the King's Temporal Authority, and found out a thousand Ways for injuring him in his Royal Prerogatives, upon the Occasions which in several Chapters we are now going to relate.

Of the Disputes about receiving the Council of Trent in the Kingdom of Naples.

AFTER that in the Pontificate of Pius IV. the most famous Council of Trent, which for so many Years, sometimes had been adjourned, sometimes set agoing, according to the different Ends of the Court of Rome and of the Princes, had been brought to Perfection, at last, at the pressing Instance of that Court, in December 1563. it broke up. The Princes, contrary to their Expectations, found that it came far short of answering the Ends for which they had been at so much Pains to get it called; for when they expected that the Ecclesiastical Discipline should have been reformed, the overgrown Power of the Court of Rome moderated, and the Authority of the Ecclesiasticks, which had exceeded the Bounds of the Spiritual Power, restricted, they saw, that the Deformation (according to the Designs of Rome, and the Method concerted for putting the Decrees of Reformation in Execution) would prove much greater, as the Event demonstrated; and it began to appear in the very Pontificate of Pius IV. who, according to Thuanus ¹, the very next Year 1564. when the Council was just ended, contrary to the Decrees of it, in order to enrich Annibale Altemps, and Cardinal Marco Sittico, dispensing with the Decrees, turned all his Thoughts upon heaping up Money, and it appeared more plainly under the Popes his Successors. It was found, that their Power, in Opposition to that of Princes, had taken too deep Root; for which Cause, all Princes having a watchful Eye over them, to prevent their doing them Prejudice, when the Question was to receive into their Dominions the Decrees of the Council, new Difficulties and Debates arose in the Catholick Kingdoms, not only about Doctrine, but likewise Discipline.

THE Decrees of Reformation were not in the least regarded by the Catholick Princes of Germany; on the contrary, the Emperor, the Duke of Bavaria, and the other Catholick Princes demanded, that the Laicks should receive the Communion in both Kinds, and that the Priests should be allowed to marry ².

THE publishing of the Council was forbid in France, and the King alledged for his Excuse to the Pope, that according to the State in which France was at that

Time, the Publication of it was very dangerous¹. At last the Doctrine of the Council was received, as being the antient Doctrine of the Gallican Church, but such of the Decrees concerning Discipline, as were repugnant to the Common Law, were by the Authority of the King and Clergy rejected, although the Court of Rome made pressing Instances to have them received and published²; and the Decrees were no sooner printed, than the Parliament of Paris made it their Business to examine those relating to Discipline, of which they took Notice of very many, especially those established in the two last Sessions in great Hurry, as most prejudicial, no less to the Good of the Publick, than to the King's Power and Sovereign Authority³. They observed, that the Council had established the Ecclesiastical Immunity according to the Decretals of Pope Boniface VIII. in order to engage the Prelates of France to use all their Interest, as they did, to have the Council received; but the Parliament having always vigorously opposed it, it was to no purpose⁴. They observed, that the Ecclesiastical Power had been enlarged beyond its Bounds, to the lessening of the Temporal, by giving Power to the Bishops to proceed against Laicks in exacting pecuniary Mulcts, and seizing their Persons: That Emperors, Kings, and other Princes had been incroached upon, by subjecting them to Excommunication if they suffered Duels in their Dominions. They looked upon excommunicating Kings and Sovereign Princes as unsufferable, it being a constant Maxim in France, that neither the King, nor his Ministers, can be excommunicated for any Thing relating to the Execution of their Offices. That the depriving Princes of their Dominions, and confiscating the Fiefs and Estates of Noblemen and private Persons, was an Usurpation of the Temporal Authority, an Authority not given by Christ to his Church over Things of that Nature. That there was great Wrong done not only to Princes, but to private Persons in their Rights of Patronages. They by no means approved, that the Mendicants should be allowed to possess Immoveables; that the Parishioners, by Collections, First Fruits, or Tythes, should be obliged out of their own Goods to furnish the Bishops and Curates wherewithal to erect new Parishes. In short, all the new Discipline, excepting what was consonant to the Common Law, was not received, but openly rejected: So that the Publication of this Council, for which the Court of Rome was so earnest, was stiffly disputed in France; and although (it being still stayed off) at last, in the Year 1614. in the Reign of Lexis XIII. not only the Ecclesiastical State, but that of the Nobility requested it, yet being vigorously opposed by the third State and the Populace, their Sollicitations had no Effect⁵. In the said Year 1614. a great deal was written upon this Subject in France, among the rest one Piece with this Title, Sylloge complurium articulorum Concilii Tridentini, qui Juri Regum Galliarum, libertati Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ, privilegiis, & immunitatibus Caputulum, Monasteriorum & Collegiorum repugnant.

IN Spain King Philip II. was much displeased to hear that the Council had ended in such a Hurry, and that in the two last Sessions many Things had been established derogatory to the Temporal Power of Princes⁶, but with the wonted Spanish Cunning, accommodating himself to the Times, in outward Appearance he seemed to be pleased that the Council was at an End, and that he would immediately cause it to be published and received in Spain, and all the other Dominions of his Monarchy; and being told by his Ministers, that there were many Things in the Decrees of Reformation most prejudicial to his Authority, the Laws of his Kingdoms, and the general Good of his People, he resolved, with great Circumspection and Caution, to convene before himself the Bishops and Agents of the Clergy of Spain, in order to find out a Method how these ought to be put in Execution, and with what Modification: So that not only all that which was done this Year 1564. in Spain, with respect to the receiving and putting in Execution the Decrees of the Council of Trent, was by Order of, and Resolution taken in the King's Council, but the King sent his Presidents to be present in the Synods which the Bishops of Spain held in Toledo, Salamanca, Segovia, and Valencia (for the Council of Trent being over, almost all the Metropolitans of Europe began to hold Councils, and valued themselves upon it, for the most part adapting their Regulations and Decrees to those of that Council) lest in these Meetings his Royal Prerogatives, and Sovereign Power and Authority might be prejudiced, allowing only such Things to be proposed as suited with his own Interest.

IN Unicors, King Philip making use of the same Artifice, this Year 1564. wrote to Margaret of Parma, then Governess, to whom he only signified, that his Intention was, that the Council of Trent should be published and received in all his Dominions; but Margaret foreseeing, that by reason of the Tumults which were then begun to be stirred up in Flanders, the Publication and Receiving of it might occasion Disorders and Inconveniencies, consulted that Matter, not only with the Bishops, but with the King's Council and Magistrates, who, observing in the Decrees of Reformation many Things prejudicial both to the King's Prerogatives and his Subjects, and contrary to the antient Customs, Privileges, and Usages of these Provinces, so that by publishing them great Disturbance and popular Commotions were to be feared, advised her not to suffer them to be published without an express Restriction, and a Protestation to each of the Articles they had already taken Notice of, that the Publication of them should in no manner be derogatory to the said Customs, Privileges and Usages, but that they should remain safe and untouched. King Philip having been advised by the Governess of all that had past, ordered her to cause the Council to be published and received in the Provinces of Flanders, but at the same Time signified to her, that the Publication should be made with the Restrictions and Conditions mentioned by the Royal Council, which accordingly was done; for on the 12th of July 1565. she allowed the Bishops to publish it, with inserting this express Clause, that it was the King's Intention, that by the said Publication nothing should be altered, nor any Thing innovated concerning his Regalia, his own, or the Privileges of his Subjects, and especially concerning his Jurisdiction, Laick Patronages, Rights of Nomination, Administration of Hospitals, the Cognizance of Causes, Benefices, Titles, nor any Thing else contained in the Articles marked by his Council. The Governess likewise wrote Letters, dated the 24th of July the same Year, directed to the Supreme Councils and Magistrates, containing the same Clause¹; whence the Flemish Writers², having made a Catalogue (by observing the Order of the Sessions, and Chapters of the Council) of all those prejudicial Articles, such as that made by Antony Anselm in his *Tribonian. Belgic.*³, give us to understand, that the Council of Trent, with respect to the said Articles, had not been received in their Provinces.

THESE were the Artifices and Cautions made use of by King Philip and his wary Spanish Counsellors; they got the Pope seemingly to be satisfied, by soothing him up, and managing him with Dexterity, shewing at the same Time all Respect and Regard both to the Holy See and his Person, but they took Care to preserve the Regalia and their own Privileges untouched: On the contrary, the French openly rejected those Canons, and had immediately recourse to Fire and Sword for crushing those growing Mischiefs. Whence that famous Archbishop of Paris, Peter de Marca, took Occasion to say, that the Spaniards had cured these Wounds with Plaisters and Ointment, but the French with Fire and Sword; Medicines much more effectual and proper for intirely rooting out the Distemper, it having been found by Experience, not only in Spain, but in our Kingdom of Naples, that, according to these Spanish Maxims, by endeavouring to cure those continual Wounds and Blows which the Royal Jurisdiction received by such Plaisters and Ointments, tho' the Controversies lay dormant for a while, yet they were not quite extinguished: On the contrary, the Ecclesiasticks being always vigilant and cunning, revived them whenever they found a favourable Opportunity, when not only Fire and Sword, but even the Plaisters could not be applied; whereupon they seldom failed to break in upon the Temporal Authority of our Princes. Whence *John Bodin*⁴ calls the Kings of Spain, most obsequious Servants of the Roman Pontiffs.

SO it happened exactly to us with respect to this Affair of the Council of Trent, for by having made use of these Methods, what was out of the Question in France and other Countries, became controverted Points with us.

KING Philip therefore, in order seemingly, as we have said, to shew his Subordination to the Pope, by giving a Sanction to the said Decrees of this Council in all his Dominions, as soon as they were published in a printed Volume, sent to Naples a general Order, dated the 27th of July 1594. and directed to the Duke D'Alca the Viceroy, in which he signified to him, that he having accepted the Decrees of the Council which the Pope had sent him, his Will was, that they should be published, observed, and put in Execution in the Kingdom of Naples. But at the same Time he sent the Viceroy a particular Letter of the same Date, signifying to him, that tho' by his Order he had commanded that the Decrees of the Council of Trent should be obeyed and put in Execution in the Kingdom of Naples, as in all his other Kingdoms and Dominions; nevertheless he did not thereby intend, that his Prerogatives and Royal Authority should in the least be diminished, or his Jus Patronatus Regium, the Exequatur Regium to Bulls that come from Rome, or any of his other Rights and Regalia should suffer any Prejudice: That therefore he ordered him to guard against all Novelties, and to send him an Account of every Thing in these Decrees that shall be found to be prejudicial to his Prerogatives and Royal Authority. He likewise enjoined him not to let the Court of Rome know any Thing of this Order, but to pretend the contrary, by saying, that he had received an Order commanding the said Decrees to be observed¹.

THE Duke D'Alcala, in consequence of these Royal Orders, gave out publicly, that the King had ordered the Observance of the Council, but at the same Time gave it in Charge secretly to the President Francesco Antonio Villano, to set down in Writing all the Articles of the Council that were prejudicial to the Royal Jurisdiction, in order to be sent to the King. The President readily obeyed, and made a Report of them; but having afterwards discovered others, he made a second, in which he took notice of many Articles that were prejudicial to the Temporal Authority of his Majesty, and many others, which, relating to Laicks, incroached upon his Royal Jurisdiction²: However, President Villano was not so very exact but some escaped his Observation, so as to leave Room for others to glean after him. We in this History, so far as is consistent with our Purpose, shall take Notice of the most important Articles, which are not to be suffered without vast Prejudice and Injury to the Supreme Authority of our Princes.

THAT which we read in many Decrees, whereby the Spiritual Authority is extended beyond its Bounds, in giving the Bishops Power to impose pecuniary Mulcts upon Laicks, and seize their Persons, is intolerable. In the fourth Session³, besides Excommunication, a pecuniary Mulct is laid upon the Printers of the Scriptures, or other such holy Books, who shall print them without the Licence of the Ordinaries, or without the Name of the Authors, according to the Tenor of the Canon of the last Lateran Council, held in the Pontificate of Leo X. In the 25th Session⁴ Power is likewise given to the Bishops (that they might not proceed too hastily to Excommunication) to inflict the same Penalty and pecuniary Mulct, and to imprison the Guilty, whether Ecclesiasticks or Laicks, by their own or other Officers; that when they had a mind to imprison Laicks, and their own Officers not being able to put their Orders in Execution, they might have recourse to the Assistance of the Civil Magistrates. In the 24th Session⁵ Power is also given to the Bishops to banish out of their Cities or Dioceses a Concubine, who, after the Expiration of a Year under Excommunication, does not leave off Concubinage, and in case of Necessity only, they may call for the Assistance of the Secular Power.

WHEN the Fathers of the Council heard these Penalties at first proposed, some of them were scandalized, and among the rest the Bishop of Alborg, and the Archbishop of Palermo, both Spaniards, opposed them strenuously, saying, that our Saviour had given no other Authority to his Ministers but what was purely Spiritual, and that therefore they could not impose pecuniary Mulcts upon the Laicks, the Penalty then ought to be merely Spiritual, such as Excommunication; but Cardinal *Pallavicino*⁶ writes, that these Prelates were severely rebuked by the Bishop of Biserta, an Italian, who told them, that the Majority of the Council was of a contrary Opinion, being persuaded (as the Cardinal's Words are) that the Church had all the Power which was necessary for the Government of all Christendom; and that it was found by Experience, that Temporal Punishments were more effectual than Spiritual for preventing outward Crimes, because Punishment is designed for a Curb to the Wicked, whereas the Unlawfulness of the Action, though unpunished, is sufficient to make good Men repent, but the Wicked are such, because they prefer the Good of the Body to that of the Soul. At that rate, the Ecclesiasticks being persuaded that the Church has all the Power requisite for the good Government of Christendom; in order to obtain that good Government, she may make use of all Means that can conduce to it; and because it is found, that to obtain that End Temporal Punishments are more effectual than Spiritual, she can lay aside the last, and take hold of the first: Whence, if she shall judge Banishment and Confiscation of Goods more effectual than Imprisonment and pecuniary Mulcts, she will have Power to put them in Execution, as often as they tend to the good Government of Christendom. And even if these shall not be thought sufficient, she may likewise condemn to Banishment, the Gallies, Mutilation of Members, Death, and the Gallows, because whenever they conduce to that good Government, every Thing may be done, and every Thing is lawful. Who ever heard of such monstrous and stupendous Things! This same Writer, as we have observed upon another Occasion, elsewhere adds another Reason why the Ecclesiasticks may impose these pecuniary Mulcts; for otherwise, says he, it would be the same as to unbinge Discipline; because as Money is virtually every Thing, so a pecuniary Mulct, through human Weakness, is of greater Weight than all the other Punishments that a Court purely Ecclesiastical inflicts; which, like the Secular, not having Power to bridle Dissoluteness with Iron, 'tis fit they should do it with Silver. All prudent Princes therefore, being sensible of these pernicious Maxims, did not suffer them to take Root in their Dominions; so that with us a Stop was put to them, nor did the Duke D'Alcala ever suffer these Decrees to obtain in the Kingdom, as his Successors did, of which hereafter.

T H E R E are likewise Articles in the other Decrees of this Council no less prejudicial. In the 5th Session¹, with a great Flourish of Words, 'tis said, that the Teachers of Grammar, and Professors of Divinity, ought to be examined and approved of by the Bishops, comprehending likewise the publick Schools and Universities, the Professors whereof are sufficiently authorized, either by the Universities or the Prince, to teach whatsoever Faculty, either sacred or prophane, without the Examination or Approbation of any Bishop: Whence it came, that some of our Bishops, who in their Synods, for the most part convened and guided by the same Spirit with the Council of Trent, have had the Assurance to enact, That the Teachers of Grammar, and all other Professors of Sciences, under Pain of Excommunication, shall not presume, either in Private or Publick, to teach without their Licence or Approbation; so that it behoved the Tribunal of Jurisdiction to suppress that Abuse, which was done not without great Opposition and Wrangling.

I N the 21st and 24th Sessions² it is ordained, that if the Bishop thinks fit to erect new Parishes, and the Incomes and Fruits of the Mother Church not being sufficient, he may force the People, by laying on Tythes, Collections, and otherwise as he shall think fit, to furnish wherewithal to maintain the necessary Priests and Clergy. Moreover, if the Revenues of the Parish Churches shall not be sufficient for maintaining the Parish Priests and the other Clergy, when a Plurality of Benefices cannot be obtained, the Bishop may force the Parishioners by Collections, First-Fruits or Tythes, to supply what shall be wanting. These Decrees were neither received in France nor in our Kingdom, as being most prejudicial to the Power of Princes, and making it lawful for Bishops to lay Burdens and Collections upon the People at a Time when the Clergy had acquired so much, that there was little left to the Laity, and when the new and poor Parishes might have been well supported by the Rich, and when the Church abounded with such great Revenues, that they were not only sufficient for Things necessary, but for Pomp and Luxury.

I N the 22d Session³ there are many exceptionable Things. In the 8th Article all Hospitals and Laick Societies are subjected to the Visitations of the Bishops; all the *Monte Pii, and other pious Foundations erected and managed by Laicks, as being pious Works, excepting only those which are immediately under the Royal Protection: So that although these be mere Laick Societies, yet they were to give Account of their Administration to the Bishops; any Custom, Privilege, or Statute to the contrary notwithstanding. And in the 9th and 10th Articles of the 24th Session², all Secular Churches are subjected to the Visitation of the Bishops. In Article the 9th, all Laick Overseers appointed for the Building of whatsoever Church, Hospital, or Convent, are obliged to be accountable to the Ordinary. In Article the 10th, the Royal Notaries are obliged to be examined by the Bishops, and made liable to be suspended from the Exercise of their Offices, either for ever, or a certain Time, etiam si Imperiali, aut Regia auctoritate creati fuerint. In Article the 11th, the Laicks, and those who have the Right of Patronage are injured, by being made liable to be deprived of their Rights if they shall make a wrong Use of the Revenues, Fruits, Rights and Jurisdictions of their Churches.

* Charitable Corporations for lending Money to the Poor on small Interest.

IN the 23d Session³, Article the 6th, the Privilege of Immunity is granted to the Clergy of the first Tonsure, and to married Clerks at their Choice, and according to the Circumstances prescribed, as if it did not belong to Princes to exempt their Subjects from their Jurisdiction when they think fit; and in the 17th and 18th Articles, the Goods of the Secular Societies are ordered to be taken and employed in founding and erecting new Seminaries. Likewise in the 11th Article of the 24th Session⁴, the Privileges of the Royal Chaplains, and their Exemption from the Ordinaries are incroached upon; and in the last Session held in a Hurry, many remarkable Injuries were done, some of which we shall pass over.

IN the 3d Article of the 25th Session⁵, all Secular Magistrates whatsoever, are prohibited to stop the Ecclesiastical Judges from fulminating Excommunications, or to cause them to retract those already fulminated, contrary to the Custom, not only of our Kingdom, but of other Dominions, where, when the Censures are null or unjust, or emitted contrary to the Prescription of the Canons, the Ecclesiastical Judges are stopt from emitting them, or if emitted, are forced to revoke them. In the 8th Article, the Hospitals under the Direction of Laicks are incroached upon, by giving the Bishops Power to alter the Will of the Founders, apply the Revenues to other Uses, punish the Inspectors by depriving them of their Administration and Government, and to appoint others. In the 9th Article, the Patronages of Laicks are freely disposed of, by laying down a Rule concerning the Acquisitions, Prescriptions, and Suppressions. In the 19th Article, Emperors, Kings, Marquises, Counts, or any other Lords whatsoever, that shall suffer Duels in their Dominions, besides being excommunicated, are to be looked upon as deprived of their Dominions, and if they hold them in Fief, they are immediately to devolve to their Superiors; as for the Combatants, and their Seconds, besides Excommunications, the Penalty of confiscating all their Goods, and perpetual Infamy is imposed, and they are to be punished as Murderers. All Usurpations upon the Temporal Authority, that, as we have said, given by Christ to the Church, not extending to Things of this nature.

THESE and the like Articles, prejudicial to the Power of the Prince, and his Supreme Regalia, being found in the Decrees of Reformation; and two Reports of them being made by the President Illano, and delivered to the Viceroy, he sent them into Spain to King Philip, who, having caused them to be carefully examined, and being convinced of the Prejudices they contained, wrote a Letter dated the 3d of July 1566. wherein he told the Viceroy, that it was not the Intention of the Council in the least to do any Prejudice to his Majesty or his Royal Prerogatives (as he had been assured in Spain by some Prelates who were present in the Council) and charged him not to suffer any Novelty to be introduced in Prejudice of his Royal Authority.

THEREFORE, although the Duke D'Alcala suffered printed Copies of the Decrees of the Council to be dispersed over all the Kingdom, and did not openly oppose the Publication of them; yet being required to give the Exequatur Regium, both he and the Collateral Council refused to grant it: And that the Bishops of the Kingdom, who had accepted the Council, and together with the other Decrees were putting in Execution those we have mentioned, might not prejudice the King's Jurisdiction, the Viceroy gave Orders to the Presidents and other Officers of the Kingdom, not to suffer any Innovation to be made, but to send him an Account of the Proceedings of the Bishops.

AT last, the Bishop of Tricarico, under Cover of what is ordered in the 4th Article of Reformation of the 21st Session, and the 13th of Session the 24th above-mentioned, imposed some Tythes upon the Laicks of his Diocese, contrary both to Custom and Reason, and the Citizens of Salandra refusing to pay them, he excommunicated them. and interdicted their City; whereupon the Viceroy, on the 30th of November 1564. wrote a sharp Letter to the said Bishop, injoining him upon no Account whatsoever, to demand the Payment of any Thing from the said Citizens but what they had formerly used to pay; and if he had any Thing to object to the contrary, to apply himself to the Viceroy, who would do him Justice, it not being reasonable that he should act as he thought fit: And in the mean time the Viceroy ordered him to revoke the Excommunication, and take off the Interdiction, otherwise he might come to repent of what he had done.

SO likewise the Archbishop of Capaccio, pretending to exact some Tythes from the Laick Citizens of Polla besides the Ordinary, the Viceroy wrote him a very serious Letter, dated the 10th of August 1565. wherein he exhorted him, by no means to exact them, or cause them to be exacted, it not being reasonable that he should act in so arbitrary a manner; and if he had any Thing to object to the contrary, to apply to the Viceroy, who would do him Justice. The Count of Miranda, and the Viceroys his Successors, followed this Example¹.

MOREOVER the Bishops of the Kingdom pretending, not only as a Cajus mistus, but by Virtue of the said 8th Article De Reform. Matrim. Sess. 24. to proceed against Concubinage with Temporal Punishment, Banishment and Imprisonment, the Viceroy opposed them vigorously; and the Bishop of Gravina having a Mind to imprison one that kept a Concubine, on the 20th of June 1567. the Viceroy wrote a Letter to Doctor Troilo de Trojanis, Commissary of Gravina, to take care to have him remitted immediately to his competent Laick Judge. And the Archbishop of Cosenza, who likewise pretended to imprison Laicks on account of Concubinage, and that the Secular Magistrate ought to assist him in it, was vigorously opposed by the Viceroy, who on the 13th of November 1568. first wrote to the Auditor Starvano, and afterwards, on the 17th of April 1569. to the Count of Sarno Governor of Calabria, that if the Archbishop would not deliver up one imprisoned on that Account, to break open the Prison, and carry the Prisoner to the Prison of the Royal Audience, signifying to them that the Ordinaries could only proceed to Excommunication against such Persons. In like manner the Vicar of Bojano (the Boldness of the Ecclesiasticks still increasing) having had the Assurance to condemn a Laick to the Gallies for the Space of two Years on account of Concubinage, on the 10th of July 1569. the Viceroy wrote an angry Letter to the Governor of Capitanata, charging him immediately to take the said condemned Person, and put him in the Prison of the Audience.

BUT this prudent Minister perceiving, that the Abuses with respect to Concubinage daily increased in all the Provinces of the Kingdom, where the Bishops, without Controul, imprisoned and inflicted Temporal Punishments upon such as were guilty of this Crime; so that a strong Remedy was necessary to be applied to so stubborn an Evil, on the 15th of July the said Year, he wrote a Letter to the King in Spain, giving him an Account of the Excesses of the Prelates, and desiring to know what he should do for putting a Stop to them. The King answered him, that he ought to proceed with Vigour and Courage, as was done in Spain; that he should admonish the Bishops once, twice, or thrice, that they had no Power to proceed against Concubinage, but by Excommunication only; and if that did not serve them, he was to drive them out of the Kingdom, and take Possession of their Temporalities, by sequestrating the Revenues of their Churches. The Duke D'Alcala no sooner received this Order from the King, than he wrote a Royal Letter to all the Governors of the Provinces and Cities, to whom he intimated the King's Order, commanding them, that as oft as the Prelates of the Kingdom had a Mind to proceed to Ecclesiastical Censure against Laicks on account of their Sins, not to hinder them, but rather give them all Assistance; but whenever they offered to proceed against them with Temporal Punishment², to oppose them. This Order was still kept up by his Successors, so that whenever the Ecclesiasticks offered to exceed the Bounds of the Censures, they were constantly opposed.

THE same Remedy was always applied, whenever the Bishops, by Virtue of the abovementioned Articles of the Council, pretended to visit and examine the Accounts of Laick Societies, and other pious Places governed by Laicks. The Duke D'Alcala never suffered the Ordinaries to visit these Places during his Government; so that amongst the other Grievances which the Pope ordered Cardinal Giustiniano, his Holiness's Legate at King Philip's Court, to complain of, this was one, that the Viceroy hindered the Prelates from visiting the Churches governed by Laicks, and taking an Account of their Administration ¹.

THE Duke D'Alcala not only prevented the Council from taking Effect in the Kingdom, with respect to these, but to all the other Articles abovementioned. The Bishops were amazed how, notwithstanding the Council had been published through all the Kingdom, and that many Copies of it had been printed and dispersed every where, a Stop came to be put to the Execution of its Decrees; therefore they began to complain loudly, and to solicit Pope Pius V. who was wholly intent upon having the Decrees of the Council punctually observed, to apply a Remedy; whereupon, in Consideration of this and other Rubs which the Bishops met with upon other Accounts, that shall be taken notice of hereafter, the Pope sent two Legates to the King, to wit, Giustiniano and Alessandrino, of which Legation we shall discourse by-and-by.

Of the Disputes about accepting the Bull of Pius V. In Coena Domini.

POPE Pius IV. lived but a short time after the Conclusion of the Council of Trent, dying on the 9th of December 1565. On the 7th of January 1566. Cardinal Michele Ghislieri, surnamed Alessandrino, because in 1504. he was born in the Village of Bosco near Alessandria ¹, was elected in his Place. He was a Monk of the Order of S. Dominick, and, by the good Offices of Cardinal Caraffa, was made Commissary of the Inquisition, and because he exercised that Office with great Severity and Boldness, when Caraffa came to be Pope, in 1517. he made him a Cardinal. Ghislieri being raised to the Papacy, took the Name of Pius V. and having imbibed the Maxims of Paul IV. he was a terrible Enemy to the Sectarians; and in the Beginning of his Pontificate, he caused Giulio Zanneto, and Pietro Carnejecco to be burnt, only because it had been discovered that they kept a Correspondence with the Sectarians in Germany, and in Italy with Vittoria Colonna and Giulia Gonzaga, who were suspected of Heresy. The most learned Alonio Palearco had the same unhappy Fate, who, when he heard his Sentence, said, Inquisitionem esse sicam districtam in Literatos ². Pius had conceived too high an Opinion of the Papal Dignity, and, on the contrary, too low of the Imperial; and, like Paul IV. he was persuaded, that he could exert the Authority of the Holy See over Princes, more than was consistent with Spiritual Power. He looked upon himself to be superior to them in every Thing, and made it a Matter of Conscience to keep up that Authority ; therefore whatever he did was out of pure Zeal for Religion and Discipline : So that by this Severity of Manners, and his having furnished such great Sums for carrying on the War against the Turks, he acquired the Reputation of Sanctity, and in our Time we have seen him canonized by Pope Clement XI.

NOT content with having used his utmost Endeavours to have the Decrees of the Council observed, in order more firmly to establish the Papal Monarchy, a Work begun by the Decretals of Innocent III. and IV. Gregory IX. Boniface VIII. and of the other Popes his Predecessors, in the Beginning of the second Year of his Pontificate he issued out that so famous and remarkable Bull, In Cœna Domini, which every Year on Holy Thursday is published in Rome ; whence that Day takes its Name. He published it in the Year 1567. The Year following he published another, wherein he added many Things, and made it much more terrible ¹. He commanded that all the Christian World should obey it, without any other Publication but that made in Rome ; that every Year on Holy Thursday it should be read from the Pulpit in all Parishes to the People ; that Copies of it should be affixed on the Doors of all Churches and Confessionaries ; and that it should be the Rule of Discipline and Conscience, not only to the Bishops, but to the Penitentiaries and Confessors. It contains many Articles, for that which is handed about, and is seen upon the Confessionaries, is curtailed and very much abridged. Some Writers have given us a full Account of it in their Works, among the rest Francisco Toledo ² ; and Lionardo Duardo gives a Copy of it with large Commentaries, which in 1619. he caused to be printed in Milan, in the Metropolitan Church of which City he had been a long time Penitentiary ³.

THIS Bull, besides an infinite Number of Extravagancies, intirely overthrows the Power of Princes, deprives them of the Sovereignty of their Dominions, and subjects their Government to the Censure and Correction of Rome. Besides those from the 19th Article to the 29th, we read in Toledo's Summa de Instruct. Sacerdotum, eighteen Articles all tending to that End.

IN the 19th Article, all Favourers of Hereticks are excommunicated, thereby putting it in the Pope's Power to excommunicate Christian Princes, who, either for the Defence of their Dominions, or other Reasons of State, should make Leagues with Hereticks or Infidels ; giving the People to understand, that the Prince that does so, has not a sound Faith, and may be dethroned, as Henry III. of France, a Catholick Prince, was served, only because he took the People of Geneva under his Protection, which gave the Jesuits a Handle to teach, that the People might rebel against him ⁴.

IN the 20th Article, all those are excommunicated who appeal from the Decrees, Sentences, and other Orders of the Pope to a general Council. All Universities, Colleges, and Chapters, that hold or teach that the Pope is subject to a general Council, are excommunicated and interdicted ; so that, not only all the Articles established in this Bull, but all the Constitutions, Decrees and Sentences of the Court of Rome are to be obeyed and received under Pain of Excommunication and Interdiction.

IN the 21st Article, all Princes are excommunicated, who in their Dominions lay on new Tolls, Taxes and Customs, or augment the Old, excepting in Cases where they are allowed by Law, or by a special Licence obtained from the Apostolical See ; therefore, agreeable to this Article, Martin Becan ⁵ taught, That a Prince becomes a Tyrant, if he loads his Subjects with unjust Taxes, sells the Offices of Judges, makes Laws for his own Conveniency, &c. Thus by Virtue of this Excommunication, it shall be in the Pope's Power, whenever he thinks fit, to declare a Prince a Tyrant, and stir up his Subjects against him, in order to dethrone him, if he shall offer to lay on Taxes without having first obtained his Licence. And thus Christian Princes must lay the Secrets of their States and their Necessities before the Pope, in order to obtain Liberty to impose new Taxes, or augment the old. Boniface VIII.

made use of this Pretence against King Philip the Fair of France, reproaching him with having oppressed his Subjects with unjust Taxes, and diminished the Value of the Money in his Kingdom. And if the provident Care of the Duke D'Alcaiz had not intervened, it might have had bad Effects in our Kingdom, for the People had already begun to murmur on account of the Imposition of Taxes, which they looked upon as unjust, because they were laid on without a Licence from the Pope, and therefore they thought they were not bound to pay them, as we shall see by-and-by. And in 1552. in the Government of the Duke D'Offuna the pernicious Effects of this Doctrine too manifestly appeared; for it having been resolved by all the Seggi of the City of Naples, excepting those of Capuana and Papale, to lay on a new Duty of a Ducat upon each Hogshead of Wine that should be drunk, the People in a tumultuous Manner declared that they would not pay it, in which they were encouraged by many Spiritual Fathers, who openly declared, all those that had had a Hand in laying on that Duty, were guilty of a mortal Sin; and among the rest, there was a Spanish Capuchin, named Fra' Lupo, who, with great Ferency, declaiming in all the Corners of the City, and preaching and protesting to all, that the Judgments of God would light upon them if that Duty should be paid, the Viceroy was forced to turn him immediately out of the City. But notwithstanding the People could never be brought to consent to it, and the Duty was laid aside; and the Year following all Means possible were used, in order to dispose them to give a new Donative of 1,200,000 Ducats: Whence proceeded among us that pernicious Doctrine of the Casuists, with which they direct the Consciences of Men, and insinuate to them from their Confessionaries, that it is lawful for the People to cheat the Custom-House of the Duties, because they are imposed without the Papal Licence.

IN the 27th, 28th, and 29th Articles, the Ecclesiastical Immunity is established absolutely, and independently from any Prerogative of the Prince whatsoever, and consequently, all Presidents, Counsellors, Parliaments, Chancellors, in fine, all Magistrates and Judges appointed by Emperors, Kings, and Princes are excommunicated, who, in any manner, shall hinder the Ecclesiasticks to exercise their Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction contra quoscunque. By this Article all the Political Authority of the Prince is overthrown and transferred to the Episcopal Court, for the Ecclesiasticks are not only declared exempted from the Political Jurisdiction both in Civil and Criminal Causes, but whenever they have a Mind they can draw the Laicks to their Courts, nor can the Magistrates oppose them, because if they hinder the Exercise of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, contra personam, they incur Excommunication.

IN this Bull all those are excommunicated who shall hinder the Exportation of Provisions and other Necessaries out of their Dominions, in order to be carried to Rome and the Ecclesiastical Dominions, for the Subsistence and Necessities of that City and State.

IN the 13th Article, all those are likewise excommunicated who shall hinder the Execution of the Apostolical Letters, under pretence that they must first have their Assent, Good Will and Approbation: whence the Ecclesiastical Doctors were very ready to insert in their Works, as to pass over others, Reginaldus did², that Magistrates incur the Censures contained in the 13th Article of this Bull, when, without their Assent and Examination, they hinder the Execution of the said Letters, even though they should confine themselves to examine them only, without putting a Mark or Note to them, but returning them as intire and untouched as they were presented to them. And by this in our Kingdom the Exemptio Regum fell to the Ground, and very many important Prejudices followed, insomuch, that to receive the Bull was to ruin the Kingdom.

ALL the Catholic Princes on the other Side of the Alps by no means would receive it in their Dominions, nor at any Rate suffer it to be published; and Tellarius writes³, that the Princes of Italy themselves looked upon it as a too heavy and insupportable Yoke, and especially our King Philip and the Republick of France.

IN France, the Publication of the Bull was forbidden by many Arrêts of Parliament, under most severe Penalties, as, in many Articles, repugnant to the King's Rights, those of his Officers, and the Liberty of the Gallican Church ¹.

IN Germany, the Emperor Rodolphus II. vigorously opposed the Publication of it. Yea, the Archbishop of Mentz himself, one of the Electors of the Empire, forbad the Publication of it in his Territories and Dioceses ².

IN Spain, King Philip II. likewise opposed the Publication of it. And Zypæus ³ and Van-Espen ⁴ testify, that it was never received in Flanders; and though Bentivoglio the Nuncio did his utmost Endeavours to get it received and published, by sending Copies of it to the Bishops, yet it was not published there, nor would the Bishops obey him in that.

WHEN this Bull was published in Rome, the Duke D'Arca our Viceroy, with the Advice of those two famous Regents of the Collateral Council Villano and Revertera, having been informed of the great Prejudices it contained, and that all the other Catholick Princes had quite rejected it, and were using their utmost Diligence and Rigour to prevent its being published, punishing those that dispersed it, by practising the same Rigour in our Kingdom, prevented its being received.

THE Bishops had immediately recourse to Rome, by complaining to the Pope of the Viceroy's doing all he could to have the Bull rejected; the Pope perceiving that it would be in vain to endeavour to have the Viceroy removed, making use of the wonted Arts of Rome, with the Favour of Princes not well informed, to compass his End, ordered the Bishop of Ascoli, his Nuncio in Spain, to make pressing Instances with King Philip to induce him to write to the Duke to cause the Bull to be received in the Kingdom; and the Nuncio managed the Matter so dexterously, complaining that the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction was thwarted in Naples, that the same Year 1567. he persuaded the King, not well informed, to write a Letter to the Duke, in which he ordered in general, that a particular Regard should be had to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and that it ought not to be thwarted; but with his wonted Prudence added, that he might favour it in so far as it should not be prejudicial to his Royal Prerogatives; and therefore, that he might be able to satisfy the Pope upon good Grounds, he wanted to have particular Information of all that had been taken notice of in the Kingdom, therefore he charged him, that after he had consulted with Men of Learning, Skill, and undoubted Probity, to send him an Account of all, together with his own Opinion.

THE Viceroy returned an Answer to this Letter, with two particular Consultations, one of them dated the 31st of July, and the other the 22d of December the same Year, wherein he related all the Articles of the Bull, which chiefly struck at the Royal Jurisdiction, and told him, that this Affair being of the greatest Importance, it behoved him to be very circumspect, and that he was resolved to send to his Holiness in Rome, one of his Majesty's Council, a Man of Learning, and well skilled in the Pragmaticks, Statutes, Customs and Usages of the Kingdom, who, together with his Majesty's Ambassador in Rome, might treat with the Pope about an Affair of so great Consequence, in order to prevent so many Prejudices.

BUT while they were about examining the Duke's Report of the Articles in Spain, in order to come to a Resolution about what was fit to be done, the Archbishop of Naples, and the Bishops of the Kingdom, encouraged by the Pope, laid hold of the Opportunity, published the Bull, and dispersed it over all their Dioceses, whence, particularly with respect to the Collection of the Taxes, and the Exequatur Regium, great Inconveniencies followed. King Philip's Ambassador residing in Rome, complained to the Pope, That the Bull In Cœna Domini, had been published in his Majesty's Dominions, and particularly in the Kingdom of Naples, without the Exequatur Regium; but Pope Pius answered, according to Catena ⁵, "That tho' the very antient Bull In Cœna Domini, was only published by the Popes in Rome, yet, like all other General Constitutions, it had Force over all the World; and that in all Times past, such Princes and People as have been found to contravene any of the Prohibitions contained in that Bull, have asked Absolution attempted against his Royal Prerogatives. In the first Place he gave him to understand, that he was very much grieved to hear that Matters had been carried so far as he represented, and that he must needs tell him that he was heartily sorry for having dissembled so much, and suffered Things of such pernicious Consequence to pass so easily; that he (the Duke) had a very just and lawful Excuse to make to the Pope, for not suffering or giving way to such Innovations as were pretended to be introduced in his Time, by telling him, that as he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, and being intrusted to govern it with those Privileges and Prerogatives it had for so many Years enjoyed, he could not but preserve them in the same State he had found them; that therefore his Holiness ought not to take it in ill part, nor think it Disobedience in him, that he first consulted his Majesty, and performed his Duty and Office; that he ought to tell the Nuncio, that while he governed the Kingdom he would not suffer any Thing to be done in prejudice of its Prerogatives and Privileges, but would leave them as he had found them; and that if his Holiness pretended to introduce any Thing into it, he might apply to the King his Master, whose Business it was to command, as it was his to obey.

WHEREFORE he expressly commanded that the Duke, by the best Means he could devise, should restore the Kingdom to the same State in which he had found it, without suffering his Jurisdiction and Royal Prerogatives to be prejudiced in the least Jot, and as he confided intirely in him, he would admit of no Excuse.

THAT he should give the Nuncio Odescalchi to understand, that while he had the Charge of the Kingdom, he would not suffer Innovations in it so prejudicial to his Majesty.

THAT he should severely and exemplarily punish those who shall dare to make use of any Brief, Bull, or Apostolical Concessions, without having first obtained the Exequatur Regium, which for so long a Time, and for so necessary and just Reasons, has been practised in the Kingdom. And that (approving of his Resolution to send a well qualified Person to Rome) he should expostulate with the Pope about those Injuries and Prejudices occasioned by these Novelties: In the mean time, he ordered him to send him immediately Advice of his having punctually put his Orders in Execution; likewise adding (to shew his Earnestness) that having given him Liberty, on account of his bad State of Health, to come to Spain, if, peradventure, he may have left the Kingdom, he ordered him, upon Receipt of this Letter, immediately to return and settle the Kingdom, and reinstate it in its antient Privileges, so as to leave it in the same Condition, and with the same Jurisdiction and Prerogatives it had when he entered upon the Government.

HE likewise answered what the Duke had written concerning the Scruple which those of the City had with respect to the Tax, that he should be at Pains to undeceive them of their Mistake; for he having consulted his ablest Divines about that Matter, it was found to be an Error and a Trick, therefore he ordered him immediately to lay on the said Tax, that the Court of Rome might be undeceived, and find, that such indirect Means would be of no use to them in Things of that Nature.

THE King likewise, on the 31st of July the same Year, wrote very pressingly to the Great Commendatory, to whom he committed the Management of this Affair with the Pope, and sent his Instructions, and all the Writs and Consultations relating to it, charging him to manage it with such Vigour and Efficacy as the Nature of so serious and important a Matter required. Besides, the King with his own Hand added at the Bottom of this Letter, that he had this Affair so much at Heart, that he would not have intrusted any other with it but him, being assured of his Ability and Fidelity in managing it. And *Thuanus*¹ writes, that King Philip was so highly offended that the Bishops and Parish Priests had had the Assurance to publish this Bull in his Dominions of Spain and Italy, that he forbid it under a Penalty suitable to their Boldness, saying, as Thuanus has it, Nolle se committere, ut ignava sua patientia Majestatem Imperii a majoribus acceptam, atque adeo ærarium imminuisse videatur; videre se, nec invidere, quod Regi Francorum, qui Regnum Sæclaria peste infectum habeat, nova quotidie subsidia à sacro ordine emungere concedatur, id vero ferre non posse, sibi qui Regna ab eadem peste incontaminata servet, interdici, quominus jura ab omni ævo ad hunc diem ab eodem sacro ordine in suis ditionibus pendi solita, exigere liceat. The Venetians made the same Complaints, and by no means would suffer these Novelties in their Republick.

ALTHO' the Duke D'Alcala had got Liberty from the King to return to Spain, yet he had not left Naples when the King's Letter arrived, which obliged him to stay; and being now assured of the King's resolute Intentions, he began more boldly and vigorously to oppose the Bishops, and, in his own Vindication, was wholly intent upon repairing the past, and preventing new Injuries; he caused the Regents of the Collateral Council to make a Report, that the publishing of the Bull by the Archbishop of Naples, and the other Bishops in their Dioceses, had not prejudiced the King's Royal Jurisdiction and Prerogatives; that Matters were in their former State, and ready to be amended as Occasion offered: And in fine, notwithstanding that the Great Commendatory was negotiating this Affair in Rome, as the Bishops, whenever they had an Opportunity, never failed to attempt Innovations, so the Viceroy was as ready to oppose and prevent them.

THE Bishop of Venafro had taken upon him to forbid the paying of Taxes in his Diocese, but the Viceroy immediately wrote to the Commissary Barbato, ordering him to cause them to be collected notwithstanding the said Prohibition; and having heard that the Syndicks and Magistrates of S. Germano had sent to Rome to obtain a Bull, and the Assent of the Apostolical See, in order to enable them to go on in collecting the Taxes they had imposed upon the said City by Virtue of the King's Licence and Decree; and that when they began to collect the said Taxes they had been publicly prohibited in the Church by the Vicar, intimating, that these Taxes were declared unlawful by the Bull In Cæna Domini, and not to be collected under the Pain of Excommunication: He commanded the said Commissary Barbato to take Information against the Syndicks and Magistrates, and likewise against those who had advised them to send to Rome, and finding them guilty, to bring them to Naples, together with the Information, and in the mean time to continue the Collection.

THE Archbishop of Cbiati, and the Bishops of Bitonto, Lavello and Venosa, had likewise the Boldness, by Virtue of the said Bull, to prohibit the Taxes; but the Viceroy, besides having severely reprimanded the said Prelates for intermeddling in that Affair, and ordering the Collection to be continued; on the 3d of October 1568. gave the King a particular Account of the Outrages committed upon the Laws.

THE Bishop of Melfi had also proceeded against the Laicks, by prohibiting the Collection of the Taxes of that City; whereupon the Viceroy vigorously opposed him, and on the 11th of December the same Year wrote to the King, begging of him that he would be pleased to order proper Remedies against the Usurpation of his Royal Jurisdiction by the said Prelates.

THE Bishop of Cava had likewise put a Stop to the Collection of the Taxes of that City, and published Excommunication against those who collected them. But on the 6th of February 1569. the Viceroy sent the Bishop a severe Reprimand, ordering him to revoke the Excommunication, and not to hinder the Collection; he likewise sent a Royal Letter to the Capitano and City of Cava, ordering them to go on in the Collection of the Taxes imposed by Royal Decree, excepting from the Churches and Ecclesiastical Persons, notwithstanding any Prohibition whatsoever, made, or to be made by the Bishops; and he likewise gave the King an Account of what had passed.

THE Viceroy, as we have said, having sent a particular Account to the King of all the Incroachments of the Bishops, and of what he himself had done in Opposition to them, in order to obtain his Majesty's Commands how he should act in so weighty an Affair; the same Year 1569. the King answered him by another Royal Letter, by which he not only approved of his Vigilance, but charged him vigorously to oppose the Outrages of the Bishops, and not to suffer them to incroach a Hair's breadth upon his Royal Jurisdictions and Prerogatives: Wherefore the Duke, assured anew of the King's Pleasure, wrote a severe Mandate to all the Bishops and Archbishops of the Kingdom, intimating to them, that they were not to publish, or cause to be published, the Bull In Cæna Domini, nor any other Bull without the Royal Exequatur, otherwise he would proceed against them as Incroachers upon the Royal Jurisdiction. At the same time he likewise wrote to all the Governors of Provinces, ordering them to send Messengers on purpose to deliver the said Mandate to all the Prelates, and in their Absence to their Vicars, and to be careful in preventing the Publication of the Bull In Cæna Domini; and for that End to order all the Capitani, both of the King's Patrimonial and Baronage Cities, that whenever they understand it is to be published, immediately to snatch it out of the Hands of the Prelate, or of any other Person designing to publish it, or in case they should affix it upon the Doors of the Cathedrals, or upon any other Place, to pull it off, and directly to send it by an Express to the Viceroy; besides, immediately to sequestrate both the Patrimonial and Temporal Estates of such Bishop as shall presume to publish the said Bull.

THESE Orders had their designed Effect, for some Prelates, who, notwithstanding the Mandate, presumed to publish the Bull, had their Estates confiscated. The Archbishop of S. Severino having caused it to be published in that City, the Viceroy wrote to the Count of Sarno Governor of Calabria, to sequestrate both his Patrimonial and Temporal Estate. The Viceroy having likewise heard, that the Vicar of the City of Cedogna had published it, wrote to the Governor of the Further Principato to send an Auditor to take Information, and if it should be found that he had published it, to sequestrate his Estate, and if the Bull was affixed upon the Doors of the Church, or elsewhere, to pull it down. The like Orders were sent to the said Governor against the Arch-Priest of Eboli; to the Capitano of the Town of Cameli, against the Bishop of Bojano and his Vicar; to the Governor of the Hither Principato against the Arch-Priest of Casale dell' Acqua; to the Governor of Capitanata against the said Bishop of Bojano, and to many others; and some of these having come to Naples and waited upon the Viceroy, and making it appear that they had not published the Bull after they had received his Mandate, their Estates were restored to them. Of all which, and of the general Mandate sent to the Bishops and Archbishops, and of the Orders sent to the Governors of Provinces, and of the Sequestrations, the Viceroy sent a distinct Account to the King in Spain.

IN order to put a Stop to the Dispersing of this Bull, there was one Thing yet wanting to be done, which was, to order the Printers and Booksellers not to print or sell it, therefore the Viceroy having been informed that some Booksellers in Naples sold Copies of it; and although the Printers had been prohibited to print any Thing without Licence, yet some of them had printed it, ordered their Houses and Shops to be searched, all the Copies seized, and themselves put in Prison, which was accordingly done. And the Count of Sarno, Governor of the Province of Calabria, having acquainted him, that the Booksellers of Cosenza had many Copies of this Bull, and sold them, he ordered the said Count to search their Houses and Shops, seize all the Copies, and imprison the Booksellers; with which he likewise acquainted the King, by a Letter dated the 7th of May the same Year 1569.

BUT the more careful the Viceroy was in putting a Stop to the Publication of this Bull, that the Ecclesiasticks might not make use of it in the Kingdom, so much the more pressing was the Court of Rome with the Prelates to oppose him, and to leave no Stone unturned in order to have it take Effect. The Pope exclaimed against these Expedients taken by the Viceroy, calling them Violences; and if we may give Credit to Cardinal *Albitius, he threatened to excommunicate both him and the Collateral Council, and to put the City of Naples under Interdiction. But looking upon this Remedy then to be worse than the Disease, the Court of Rome fell upon a cunning, malicious, and scandalous Shift (not minding how they insnared Mens Consciences, particularly those of the Weak, who are most numerous) which was, to order the Confessors, both Regular and Secular, to deny Absolution to their Penitents; so that finding they had reaped but small Advantage by sending the Bull to the Prelates, they resolved to send it to the Generals of Orders, to be distributed amongst all the Confessors of their particular Orders, with an Injunction not to absolve any Person that had contravened it.

IT being known in Rome, that the Viceroy had for his Confessor a Monk of the Monastery of the Cross, they began with him. The Pope ordered the General of the Franciscans to send the Bull to all the Confessors of his Order; and besides to write a particular Letter to Fr. Michele, the Guardian of the Monastery of the Cross, who was the Viceroy's Confessor, to take care not to absolve the Viceroy when he found he had acted against the Bull. The Viceroy got a Copy of this Letter, and sent it to the King, together with another Consultation, dated the 15th of May the same Year, begging of him to take a vigorous Resolution in an Affair of so great Consequence.

* Card. Albitius, de inconstant. in Fide, cap. 30. num. 401, 405, & 413

THEN it came to the Regents of the Collateral Council's Turn, particularly Villano and Revertera, the Viceroy's Advisers. Regent Villano, some Days before Whitsunday having gone to confess to his ordinary Confessor, who, unluckily for him, was a Franciscan of the Monastery of the Cross, by no means could persuade his ghostly Father to absolve him, because he had contravened the Bull; telling him besides, that the Nuncio had secretly reprimanded the Guardian of the Convent, because he sent every Day one of the Monks to say Mass in the Chapel within his (the Regent's) House, when he knew that he had been excommunicated for opposing the Bull. Wherefore the Regent was forced to go to another Monk, who absolved him for that Time, and gave him the Sacrament on Whitsunday; but the Monk told him, that he would not adventure to absolve him any more till he had atoned for his Proceedings with the King.

THE Case of Regent Revertera, who had to do with the Jesuits, was more lamentable; on the Vigil of the Ascension the Regent went to confess to his ordinary Confessor; the Jesuit would not so much as hear him, but bawling out, said, that he could not absolve him, because he had been excommunicated for having forbidden the Publication of the Provisions and Briefs of Rome without the Exequatur Regium; that he had consented to the Imprisonment and Punishment of those who had published the Bull In Cœna Domini; and that he had ordered the Collection of the Taxes to be continued: Therefore he must not expect to be absolved by him, nor by any other Priest; and that Regent Villano had been absolved by that Monk, because the Order for not absolving the Regents was not then come to the General of his Order; so that poor Revertera, all in Confusion, and blushing, was forced to sneak away. By this Means it was found out that such an Order had been sent from Rome to the Confessors of all the Orders, and that Cardinal Savelli, the Pope's Vicar, in Name of his Holiness, had commanded the General of the Jesuits to give strict Injunctions to all the Confessors of his Order, not to absolve the Viceroy, nor the Regents, and that the same had been given to all the other Orders.

THE Example of the Court of Rome, by their Insinuations, was followed by the Bishops of the Kingdom; for the Bishop of Bojano had likewise taken upon him to give Orders to the Confessors of his Diocese, and particularly to those of the City of Ferrazzano, not to confess nor absolve the Citizens, and those who had the Government of the said City, who continued the Collecting of the Taxes; and although the Viceroy sent a Mandate to the Bishop to revoke the Orders, otherwise he would proceed against him as he thought proper, the Bishop would not obey; therefore the Duke, on the 29th of January 1570. wrote to the King, begging of him, that he would be pleased to allow him to turn the Bishop out of the Kingdom, and sequester his Revenues: In the mean time he wrote to the Governor of Capitanata, immediately to cause the Mandate to be presented to the Bishop, and returned to him; and he also wrote to the Capitano, and University of Ferrazzano, to take care to see that the Taxes were collected notwithstanding the Bishop's Orders.

THE Duke being well informed of all the Proceedings at Rome and in the Kingdom, on the 10th of June the same Year 1570. wrote a full Account of them to the King, earnestly begging of him to order a speedy Remedy, likewise laying before him, that he himself was already sixty Years of Age, Regent Villano above Seventy, and Regent Revertera little less, and that it was very likely some of them might come to die of the Fear and Scruples which the Ecclesiasticks exaggerate, and which in the End disturb the Peace of the Mind, especially in old Men, who have one Foot in the Grave¹.

IT was not long before the Regent Villano fell ill, and the Confessors would not absolve him, nor even when he came to be at the very Point of Death, had they any Compassion of him; at last the Nuncio, after having made very narrow Inquiry, being assured that he was breathing out his last, gave Liberty to confess and absolve him, but upon Condition, that if he should recover, not to side with the Viceroy when Matters of Jurisdiction should come to be treated of, nor meddle with them: So he was absolved, and thus died the so famous Regent Villana, a Minister no less learned, than a zealous Defender of the Jurisdiction and Prerogatives of his King, whose Tomb is to be seen at this Day in the Church of S. Lorenzo in Naples.

ALL the Confessors protested that they would not, upon any Consideration whatsoever, absolve the Regents, till they had first promised not to meddle with the Bull In Cœna Domini, but to observe and execute it. The Bishop of Nola had likewise ordered, that the Magistrates of that City should not be absolved by the Confessors, because they exacted the Taxes upon Bread, laid on by the Royal Decree and Assent, whereby the Clergy, Churches, and Ecclesiastical Persons were excepted; and the Viceroy having sent him a Mandate to revoke the Orders, he would not obey.

MORE OVER, the Pope having this Year 1570. published a Jubilee, in order to exclude from it the Regents and other Ministers and Officers belonging to the King, caused a Clause to be added, that those could not partake of it who had violated the Ecclesiastical Immunity; and the Confessors said, that by these Words the Regents and other Ministers were pointed at, and the Nuncio likewise declared the same.

THE Viceroy sent the King a full Account of all these Disorders in two different Letters, one of them dated the 29th of January, and the other the 10th of May this same Year 1570. begging of him, that he would be pleased to apply a Remedy to them, since he could not resist the pressing Instances of the Regents and other Ministers, who were in the greatest Perplexity on that Account¹.

IN the mean time King Philip, by the Means of Vincenzo Giustiniano, and Cardinal Alessandrino, at this Time sent to Madrid by Pope Pius as his Legates (of which Legation we shall discourse by-and-by) and by the good Offices of his own Ambassador, and the Great Commendatory in Rome, had in some measure softened the Pope; and *Thuanus*² writes, that Pius V. had cooled, and laid aside his former Passion for Religious Wars, which were then carried on with more Heat in Flanders and France than ever: So that the King, by a Letter dated the 17th of July 1569. assured the Duke, that, by what had been transacted in Rome, he foresaw that his Holiness would be pacified, and proceed no further; and that at present he had only to let him know, that his Nuncio in Spain had told in great Secrecy, that the Pope had given an Order not to publish the Bull In Cœna Domini till his further Orders; therefore he desired to be advised if that Order continued, or if another contrary had been sent³.

MATTERS continued in this State during the Government of the Duke D'Alcala, who died soon after in Naples; nor was there ever a decisive Resolution taken in this Affair, but Things went on afterwards according as the Times would allow, the Spaniards still applying their wonted Remedies. They on the one Hand never failed to oppose the Prelates whenever they had a Mind to put the Bull in Execution, though they did not much trouble themselves about their causing it to be read every Year. On the other Hand, the Bishops and Ecclesiasticks never failed to publish it from the Pulpits every Holy Thursday, and to affix it upon the Confessionaries, and the Doors of the Churches; nor did they much mind whether it were afterwards put in Execution or not. In the Viceroyalty of the Duke D'Alcala, by the pressing Instances of King Philip, they found great Opposition and Vigilance. His Successors, according to the Times and Opportunities, sometimes made weak, sometimes strong Opposition.

CARDINAL Granvela, the Duke's Successor, shewed no less Courage than his Predecessor; for King Philip being terribly vexed, that notwithstanding the Nuncio's Promises made in Spain in the Pope's Name, yet the Court of Rome never left off insinuating to the Bishops of the Kingdom to publish and affix the Bull, wrote a very serious Letter to Granvela, complaining, and shewing his Indignation at the Manner of proceeding of that Court, and among other Things said: " 'Tis a " hard Case, that because I alone, and my Kingdoms, have the greatest Respect " and Veneration for the Apostolical See, in place of a thankful Acknowledgment
" as they ought to make, they take Advantage of it, in order to usurp the " Authority so necessary, and adapted to the Service of God, and the good Govern“ment of the Kingdoms with which he has intrusted me, and 'tis very probable “that they may force me to take another Course; and I must confess to you, I am “very weary of them, and they do what they can to wear out my Patience, great

 “as it is, and if they carry Matters to that Extremity, they, perhaps, may all “come to repent of it”. For which Cause Granvela exerted himself with Vigour and Vigilance; infomuch, that the Archbishop of Rossano having published the Bull, and it appearing, that a Laick Servant belonging to the Archbishop was present, he caused him to be put in Prison, where, after having been many Months, he died.

THE Duke D'Ossuna, by the Memoirs that are left us, which we owe to the most careful Bartolomeo Chieccarello, endeavoured, as far as the Times would permit, to imitate him; for having heard, that the Bishop of Ugento, one Sunday in Time of Mass in the Year 1583. had published the Bull in the said City, on the 12th of October the same Year, he wrote a Royal Letter to Francesco Caraffa, Governor of Terra d'Otranto, ordering him to inform himself if it was true, that the said Bull, or any other had been published without the Exequatur Regium; and that if any Laicks had been present, to imprison them, and to send him a Copy of the Information, that he might consult what further was fit to be done: But there having been no Laicks present, and it appearing by the Information taken and sent to the Duke, that the Bull had not been affixed, but only published by Word of Mouth, and that the Bishop had no Patrimonial Estate in the Kingdom; on the 23d of January the same Year, the Duke wrote to the King, giving him an Account, that it was not in his Power to act in this Case as the Duke D'Alcala and Cardinal Granvela had done, because the Bull had not been affixed, nor had there been Laicks present, so that he was resolved to call the Bishop to Naples, and to sequester the Revenues of the Bishoprick; but before he had received his Majesty's Answer, he did not think it fit to proceed farther than to summon him, and order the Count D'Ugento to send an Account of the Revenues of the Bishoprick, and their Qualities, that he might be able, in the Name of the Exchequer, to send an Order Ad Ossen- dendum titulum, and by that Means to punish him for his Fault.

THESE Events, which are collected from the Accounts sent by the Duke D'Alcala to King Philip in Spain, and from the King's Letters which are registred in the Chancery of Naples, and from the Testimony of Thuanus, a grave, faithful, and cotemporary Writer, are convincing Proofs of the impudent Flattery of Cardinal *Albitius*², who did not stick to say, that this Bull had been received in all the Dominions of the Monarchy of Spain, and especially in the Kingdom of Naples, giving the Lye not only to Salgadus, who writes, that it was not received in the Kingdom of Spain, but to our Tappia, who, in his Treatise De Contrabandis Clericorum, very justly writes, that it was never received in our Kingdom: These are the Words of Albitius, Totum enim contrarium apparet ex consultationibus, & literis directis ad Regem Christianum Philippum II. à Duce de Alcala Prælege Neapolis de Anno 1567.
videlicet, Bullam hanc fuisse, non solum in Civitate Neapolis, sed per totum Regnum publicatam; for these Consultations. or Accounts and Letters, as we have seen, are so far from proving that it was received, that they prove that the Bishops, who had the Boldness to publish it, were punished. The Bishops, 'tis true, spurred on by the Court of Rome, had the Arrogance, in Spite of the King, to publish it, but their Designs always proved vain, and never took Effect; the Collection of the Taxes was continued, and new ones were imposed without a Licence from the Apostolical See; the Exequatur was maintained; the Magistrates were not disturbed in the Exercise of their Offices; the Exportation of Corn was forbidden as formerly; nor was there any carried to Rome without a Royal Licence.

WHAT this Author adds is yet more fabulous, that King Philip II. had yielded this Point, and that in the Instructions given to the Marquis De las Navas, who in the Year 1578. was sent to Rome, he had confessed, that the Bull had been published and received in all his Dominions; for Thuanus tells us the contrary, that the Pope had abated of his Ardour, and King Philip wrote to the Duke D'Alcala, that the Pope had ordered not to publish the Bull till his further Orders; and after the Marquis De las Navas was sent to Rome, Cardinal Granvela and D. Pedro de Giron, Duke D'Ossuna, who was Viceroy from the Year 1582. to 1586. opposed the Attempts of the Bishops, as their Successors likewise did, though not with the same Vigour and Courage as the Duke D'Alcala had done.

IF the Spaniards had applied the Remedies practised in France for curing these Wounds, instead of Plaisters and Ointments, the Flatterers of the Court of Rome would not have had Room for writing these and greater Extravagancies, to the great Reproach of the Power and Jurisdiction of our Kings; but having neglected to punish the Bishops and Parish Priests for publishing the Bull, and only withstanding particular Cases, such as preventing the Bishops from putting it in Execution: The Ecclesiastical Authors, by finding it published by the Bishops and Parish Priests, and seeing it affixed upon the Doors of the Churches and Confessionaries, have written that the Bull was published and received in the Kingdom, as, among the rest, Cardinal Albitius did, who therefore, as an Eye-witness, says, Et ego, qui per triennium exercui officium Auditoratus Nunciaturæ Neapolis, sub fel. rec. Urbani VIII. Pontificatu, testor acceptationem, & ejus usum in prædicta Civitate, & Regno. But he ought likewise to have known, that when the Bishops had a Mind to put it in Practice, they were immediately opposed and prevented by the Collateral Council, and the Judge Delegate of the Jurisdiction: That in his Time new Taxes were laid on without a Licence from the Apostolical See; that it was prohibited to send Corn to Rome and the Ecclesiastical State, without a Royal Licence, although by the Bull such a Prohibition could not be made, yea the Ecclesiasticks desired Liberty of Exportation every Year, and nothing was altered that had been in use to be done before the Bull.

WHENCE likewise proceeded, that the Bishops of the Kingdom, in establishing Decrees in their Diocesan Synods, made use of the Bull, and quoted it; but for all that, they were not received, but a Stop was put to the Execution of them. Our Provinces are full of such Synods, but none dares to put them in Practice.

WHENCE likewise proceeded, that the Ecclesiastical Writers, and particularly the Casuists (for through supine Negligence they are not much minded) have stuffed their Works with Maxims as false as they are prejudicial to the King's Jurisdiction, by maintaining, as, not to mention others, Marta, Diana, del Bene, and many others have done, that the Bull In Cæna Domini, like all other Bulls, has Force, and is binding upon the Consciences of Men, even in Kingdoms where it has not been received, Publication and Acceptation not being necessary to the Pope's Bulls, but that it is sufficient, if they be published In acie Campi Floræ, ad Valvas Basilicæ D. Petri, and other usual Places of Rome, to bind all Princes and all Nations of the Christian World: That the Pope having his Authority immediately from God, his Laws stand not in need of Publication or Acceptation; that the Bull In Cæna Domini itself decides the very same: And many other Extravagancies; as if, though the Pope should exceed the Limits of his Spiritual Power, by foisting into his Bull whatever he thinks fit, Princes were obliged blindly to obey, though by these Bulls they were to be deprived of their Authority and Jurisdiction, which they likewise have from God. And, as if the Prince, for the Safety of his Dominions, was not under an Obligation to have a watchful Eye over whatsoever may be introduced into them by Rome, and to guard against any Prejudice, that either his own Rights, or his Subjects might suffer thereby; for which see *Van-Espen*¹, a learned Priest, and famous Professor of the Canon Law in the University of Louvain, who upon this Subject has written a particular Treatise confuting the Errors of those Authors, printed in Brussels in the Year 1712. Yea, these Flatterers of the Court of Rome have not stuck to say, that whoever thinks otherwise may be suspected of Heresy, and accused before the Holy Office; and besides (which cannot be heard without raising Laughter and Indignation at the same time) they have had the Assurance to write, that to controvert the Fact, that is to say, whether in such a Province this Bull be received or not, is incurring the same Suspicion; and Cardinal Albitius says², that in his Time, by Order of Pope Alexander VII. this Proposition, Bulla, quæ promulgatur in Cæna Domini, non est in Belgio usu recepta, juxta probabilem multorum Opinionem, was by all the Members of the Holy Office, nemine excepto, called false, rash, erroneous, injurious to his Holiness's Authority, and that it opens a Door to Schism; and he quotes the Decree pronounced on the 20th of September 1657. And what better Document can they have of the Non-observance of this Bull, than the Bull itself, whereby Princes are prohibited to lay on new Taxes or Duties without a Licence from the Apostolical See; whereby their Officers, who shall hinder the Ecclesiastical Judges to exercise their Jurisdiction, contra quoscunque, are excommunicated; in fine, whereby Empire is subjected to the Priesthood, and the Pope makes himself Monarch over all the Kings and Princes of the Earth.

C H A P. V.

Of the Disputes about the Exequatur Regium to the Pope's Bulls and Rescripts, and other Provisions that come from Rome to the Kingdom.

IS truly worthy of Observation, how, in the Pontificate of Pius V. God, out of his infinite Providence, was pleased to set in Opposition to the excessive Zeal and Boldness of that Pope, the Vigilance and Courage of the Duke D'Alcala, that what he had from his own Mouth ordered, might be executed in our Kingdom, to give unto Caesar that which is Caesar's, and to God that which is God's. The Bull In Cana Domini, as we have seen, forbids Subjects to pay Tribute to Kings, if imposed without Licence from the Apostolical See; but the Duke did not mind the Bull, but collected the Taxes and Duties lawfully imposed by the Royal Decree and Assent. By this Bull Princes were deprived of the Supreme Rights of their Royal Authority; but so scandalous and prejudicial an Inroad was not suffered: In short, it was endeavoured to subject Empire to the Priesthood, but since God had said otherwise, his Divine Will was executed. But the Court of Rome not stopping there, and being always vigilant and upon the Catch, used their utmost Endeavour to bereave our Kings of a Prerogative so dear to them, that they value it as the Apple of their Eye, and the chief Foundation of their Royal Jurisdiction, viz. the Exequatur Regium given to the Pope's Bulls and Rescripts, and all other Provisions coming from Rome, without which they are not suffered to be put in Execution. Pope Pius V. above all his Predecessors, hated it so much, that he said it unhinged the Apostolical Dignity and Authority, and did his utmost to have it laid aside and abolished: His Successors following his Footsteps, as well as the Bishops of the Kingdom, have left no Stone unturned in order to have it suppressed. On the other Hand, our Kings have been commended for their Constancy, in always vigorously opposing their Inroadments, insomuch, that 'tis now more firmly established than ever. Therefore, pursuant to our Purpose, we shall relate its Origine, how it has been maintained in the Kingdom under all the Princes that have governed it; the Disputes had upon that Account with the Court of Rome, which sought to abolish it, and particularly in the Viceroyalty of the Duke D'Alcala, and for what Reasons, and how at last it always stood its Ground.

THE Ecclesiasticks, in order, the best Way they can, to support the Pretension of the Court of Rome, besides the general Reasons abovementioned, that the Pope's Bulls and Rescripts stand not in need of any other Acceptation or Publication than what is made at Rome, alledge a particular one for this Kingdom; and confounding the Royal Assent, which our Kings formerly gave to the Elections of all the Bishops of the Kingdom, with the Exequatur Regium, which is given to all the Pope's Bulls and Rescripts, and to whatever other Provision comes from Rome, they pretend, that as by the Investitures that were begun to be given to the Kings of the Family of Anjou, and since continued to this Time, the Assent was suppressed, so likewise ought the Exequatur to be abolished. Thus Cardinal Alessandro being sent Legate to Madrid by Pope Pius V. his Uncle, to King Philip II. among other Things which he set forth in the Memorial ' given him, said by way of Complaint, That in very many Articles the Council of Trent was not observed in the Kingdom, and that innumerable Ways were taken for hindering the Execution of the Apostolical Letters and Dispatches; which Abuses, and particularly that of the Exequatur Regium, your Majesty, by your own Oath, is obliged to remedy and remove, as may be seen in the Clauses of the Investiture given by Pope Julius II. to Ferdinand the Catholick, and of Julius III. to your Majesty, to which you swore.

FOR this End they gave a very fabulous Rise to the Royal Assent, saying, that it was introduced into the Kingdom, and began to be practised in the Collation of Prelates to Cathedral Churches, only to know, before the Collation took Place, whether the elect Prelates were Enemies and Disaffected to the King, that no Person might be received into the State, who could be suspected of contriving Plots, Com-motions, and Revolutions; and that it was introduced when the Kingdom was involved in Troubles on account of the Disputes betwixt contending Princes, and when every Day there was fighting, and one of them turned out the other. This very Rise did Pope Clement VIII. give it in a Letter dated the 5th of October 1596. written with his own Hand to Count Olivares our Viceroy, whereby he pretended to have it abolished in those peaceable Times, when there was no War, nor any suspected Persons.

BUT to confound two Things of quite different Natures, and of as different Origines; to give the same Rise to the Exequatur Regium, which has its Beginning in the Dominions of Christian Princes at the same Time with Principality and their Royal Power, favours either of too much Ignorance, or subtle Malice.

THE Royal Assent, which was formerly required in all the Elections of the Prelates of the Kingdom, did not chiefly arise on the Occasion abovementioned, but proceeded from another Cause, to wit, from the Princes having formerly had a Share in the Elections of the Prelates; or, as Duverno says³, because the Prince representing the People, to whom they transferred all their Power; and, as formerly the People, as well as the Clergy, had a great Share in Elections, so that was transferred to the Prince; or from their having erected Churches from the Foundation, or rebuilt or enriched them with ample Revenues, reserving to themselves, not only that Right, but likewise the Power of investing the Prelates with the Staff and Ring, not for the Spirituality of their Office, which does not belong to them, but for the Temporality, which they, or their Predecessors had given to the Churches. Thus in the Reign of the Normans, who were so liberal and profuse in endowing Churches, there was not an Election made without their Consent. Thus was it likewise practised in the Reign of the Suevi, till that Charles I. of Anjou, who, by the Invitation and Favour of the Pope, having conquered the Kingdom, made no Objection to the Investiture given him by the Pope, but was content that for the Future his Assent in the Election of Prelates should not be sought: However, that did not abolish the Exequatur Regium, nor the Check upon Provisions sent from Rome, in case the Elect was an Enemy to the King, or a suspected Person, because this Right proceeds from another Principle; yea, Pope Nicholas IV. declared in a Bull, dated the 28th of July 1288. in the Time of King Charles II. of Anjou, that no Person, who was suspected by the King, could be raised to the Dignity of Archbishop, Bishop, or other Prelature of the Kingdom⁴. Nor was the Right of presenting and naming Persons to the Churches founded and amply endowed by our Kings, or their Predecessors, taken away, but they continued to be of Royal Patronage; whence afterwards, in order to put an End to the continual Debates with the Court of Rome about Cathedral Churches, proceeded that Agreement made between Clement VII. and the Emperor Charles V. of which we have discussed at large elsewhere.

THE Exequatur Regium, which is given in the Kingdom, not only to Collations of Prelatures, and other Benefices of the Kingdom sent from Rome, but to all the Pope's Bulls and Rescripts, even to the Briefs of Jubilees and Indulgences, and to whatsoever other Provision comes from Rome, does not proceed from this Principle, nor did it begin in the troublesome Times of War, when the contending Princes were frequently driving one another out, and therefore had reason to be cautious in receiving Bishops. Its Origin is more antient, it had its Beginning not only in the Kingdom of Naples, but in all the Dominions of Christian Princes, with Principality itself, and belongs to them Titulo sui Principatus, or Jure Regium, as the abovementioned *Van-Espen*¹ fully proves. It was contrived for the Preservation of the State, and to prevent an Inlet to Commotions and Disorders from foreign Parts; therefore it has always been lawful for Princes, and commendable in them, that whenever foreign Writs came within their Dominions, whereby it was pretended to exercise Jurisdiction, either Spiritual or Temporal in them, to examine such Writs before they were put in Execution; so much the rather, that the Court of Rome, for a very long time, had assumed an Authority far exceeding the Bounds of a Spiritual Power, and often took upon them to decide Points belonging to the Temporal Power of Princes, and not within their Province: Whence the Custom was introduced, that if Writs from Rome are to be executed against Laicks, they cannot be put in Execution without applying to the Secular Magistrates for their Concurrence, who, not as bare Executors, but after having considered and examined the Affair, if they find it just, they give their Concurrence, otherwise they put a Stop to the Execution. If the Writ concerns Ecclesiastical Affairs only, or if it relates to Things merely Spiritual, and that its being put in Execution will not be prejudicial to the King's Prerogatives, the State, or his Subjects, or does not clash with the Usages and Customs of the Country, it gets the Exequatur Regium: So that it is not pretended thereby to add Force to, or undo what the Pope has done, as if in Ecclesiastical and Spiritual Matters he stood in need of the Authority of Secular Princes²; but it is required only, that the Prince, who ought to be careful and vigilant that the Government of his Dominions be not disturbed, may know what is contained in Writs that come from Abroad into his Territories, that under that Colour or Pretence, nothing be introduced that may disturb the Peace and Tranquillity of his State; and this is all that is intended by the Exequatur Regium, as Van-Espen, in his Treatise *De Placito Regio*³, has at large demonstrated, which was very well understood by Bishop *Covarruvias*⁴, *Belluga*⁵, and the Cardinal *Di Luca*⁶, the last of which wrote, that for this End the Exequatur Regium was practised in our Kingdom.

WHENCE it comes, that no Bull, Brief, Rescript, Decree, or any other Writ whatsoever that comes to us from Rome, is exempted from it; and even the Bulls of Jubilees and Indulgences must have it⁷: Yea *Van-Espen*⁸, by many Arguments, proves, that it must likewise be obtained to the very Dogmatical Bulls: Not that it belongs to the Prince to decide or reason upon Matters of Faith; but because the Clauses, which are usually inserted in them, and with which, according to the Modern Style of Rome, they are generally coloured, the Manner, Time, Juncture, and the Occasion of publishing such Bulls ought to be known by the Prince, perhaps, to see, if, besides the Doctrine and the Spiritual Punishments therein defined, the Temporal be incroached upon; perhaps, for other weighty Reasons of State, it may not be proper to publish them at that Time, but to wait till a more fit Opportunity, and for other Motives and Reasons at large discussed by that Writer: Whence it likewise comes, that the Exequatur Regium is sought to all Decrees of the Tribunals of the Inquisition of Rome, and of the Index Expurgatorius, of which we have elsewhere discoursed at large. And whence it also comes, that the Manner of proceeding in such Cases, is not by the ordinary Way of taking Cognizance, but by an extrajudicial Method, and according to the Rules of State and Government, not of the Courts of Justice; so that we see how little this Matter is understood by the Casuists and Canonists, who, thinking that these Examinations ought to be made according to the Methods of the Courts of Justice, prate and write¹, that the Popes Bulls and Rescripts can neither be stop't nor examined by Laick Judges, because they have no Jurisdiction over Spiritual and Ecclesiastical Matters, handling this Subject after their own manner, and making use of Law Terms foreign to the Purpose.

WHENCE likewise proceeded, that all Tribunals of Justice, though Supreme, have not Power to grant this Exequatur Regium, but that Power is reserved to the King's Supreme Councils and Countellors only; so with us, it belongs solely to the Collateral Council, of which the Viceroy is Head, to grant it, but to no other Tribunal of Justice, be it ever so Supreme². And in the Dominions of the other Christian Princes of Europe, such as France and Spain, it is reserved to the King's Supreme Councils only: As in Flanders to the Supreme Council of Brabant, and the other Supreme Councils of those Provinces³; therefore in 1551. the Regent and Judges of the Vicariate were deservedly reprimanded by the Viceroy Toledo, for having taken upon them to grant the Exequatur Regium, by admonishing and ordering them to do so no more for the future, because that Prerogative belonged solely to the Viceroy and his Collateral Council, not to the Tribunals of Justice⁴.

NOR is this Prerogative peculiar to our Kings and Kingdom only, as some have believed; it is common to all Princes, who in their Dominions practise the same. In Spain, as *Covarruvias*⁵, *Belluga*⁶, and *Cevallos*⁷ testify, the Bulls and all other Provisions that come from Rome, before they are published, are examined in the Royal Council, and often, when they have no Mind they should be executed, they retain them; so that Salgado, in order to justify that Custom and constant Practice, wrote that Treatise De Retentione Bullarum, and that other, De Supplicatione ad Sanctissimum, &c. and Agostino Manuel, in his History of John II. witnesseth, that the same is practised in *Portugal*⁸.

IT is well known, that in France and Flanders, nothing that comes from Rome is published till it be first examined by the King's Officers; yea, they don't so much as make use of the humble and respectful Word *Exequatur*⁹ (although they once designed to have changed it into Obediatur) or, as is practised in *Milan*¹⁰, of Pareatis, but of Placet; and when the Provisions don't please them, they are rejected¹¹. The same, according to *Argentrens*¹², is practised in the Dutchy of Bretaigne, and in the Dutchy of Savoy, as *Antonio Fabro*¹³ witnesseth. In Sicily the same is practised; and *Mario Cutello*¹⁴ gives us the Form and Custom made use of in that Kingdom concerning it. P. Servita declares it to be the Practice of Italy and Venice: *Angelo*¹⁵ writes the same of the Dutchy of Florence; and Antonio Amato gives the same Account of all the other Countries of *Italy*¹⁶.

IT was unalterably practised in our Kingdom of Naples, not only under the Norman and Suevian Princes, but likewise under the Kings of the Family of Anjou themselves, who were very submissive to the Roman Pontiffs, and who in their Investitures gave up the Assent in the Elections of Prelates; which is a very convincing Proof, that the Assent formerly required, has nothing in common with the Exequatur Regium always retained, and never interrupted.

THE Archbishop of Siponto having presented to Charles Duke of Calabria, King Robert's eldest Son, and his Vicar-General, some Apostolical Letters from Pope John XXII. concerning a Cause depending in Rome about annexing the Monastery of S. John in Lamis in the Diocese of Siponto, to the Monastery of Casanova in the Diocese of Penna, he not only gave the Exequatur, but on the 1st Day of August 1321. wrote to the Justices and other Officers of the Province of Capitanata to see them put in Execution.

POPE Urban VI. having bestowed the Abbey of S. Philippo de Gerito, in the Diocese of Reggio, upon Fra' Girlando di Ponte Datilo; King Charles III. did the same, and on the 28th of November 1382. wrote to the Capitan of that City to assist him in taking Possession of the said Abbey.

A CERTAIN Fra' Elias having been made Abbot of the Monastery of S. Anton. in the Diocese of Rossano, by Benedict IX. King Ladislaus inquired into his Life and Conversation, and finding them good, gave the Exequatur to the Bull, and on the 6th of January 1403. ordered his Officers in Calabria to assist him in taking Possession; and the same King, particularly in the Time of the Schism, hindered others from taking Possession.

THE Pope having bestowed the Abbey of S. Mary of Melocco, in the Diocese of Reggio, upon Cicco Guassano, who having presented the Original Bulls to Queen Jean II. which being seen and read, she gave her Assent, and on the 20th of April 1419. ordered her Officers in Calabria to see them put in Execution².

Of the Kings of the House of Arragon.

THIS was practised not only by the Kings of the Family of Anjou, but likewise by those of the House of Arragon. After that King Alphonso I. had received the Investiture with the usual Clauses from Eugene IV. he represented to that Pope, that it was the Custom of the Kingdom, not to receive Prelates collated by Rome without the Good Will of the King, and the Pope made no Objection why that Prerogative should not be still continued; therefore, in 1451. the Bishoprick of Marturano in Calabria being provided, King Alphonso gave the Exequatur to the Elect, as may be seen in the Writ recorded by *Ughello*³. Pope Callistus III. having given the Abbey of S. Peter in Pariete, without the Walls of the Castle of Cilenza, of the Order of S. Benedict in the Diocese of Vulturara, to Baldassare di Montauro, a Monk of the Monastery of S. Peter della Canonica, without the Walls of Amalfi of the Cistercian Order, the same King gave the Exequatur to the Bulls, and on the 29th of July sent Orders to the Count of Termuto to see them put in Execution. The Great Master of Riodes, of the Order of S. John of Jerusalem, having given the Priory and Government of the Church of S. Euphemia of the said Order to Philippo Ruffo, the natural Son of Carlo Ruffo, Count of Sinopoli, the same King gave the Exequatur to the Bulls, and ordered his Officers to assist him in taking Possession and receiving the Revenues.

KING Alphonso being dead, was succeeded by Ferdinand I. his Son, who, in the Pontificate of Pope Sixtus IV. following the Footsteps of the Kings his Predecessors, some called this Prerogative in Question; on the contrary, he established a Pragmatick concerning it, after whose Example the Duke D'Alcala published another in 1561. of which hereafter⁴; therefore, when he found that no Inconveniences attended the Bulls and other Provisions sent from Rome, he gave the Exequatur. And the said Pope having bestowed the Bishoprick of Capaccio upon Lodovico Tassili, Archbishop of Damascus, the Bulls were no sooner presented to him, than he gave them the Exequatur, and on the 13th of May 1476. wrote to the Capitan of Capaccio, and his Officers, to see them put in Execution.

AT the Accession of Innocent VIII. to the Papacy, the Depravation of Manners was such, that Rome was arrived at the highest Degree of Corruption; in him was seen (but more in the Popes that succeeded him) so immoderate an Ambition, that his only Study was, by all Methods, to render himself absolute Monarch over all the Princes of the Earth; he began to be displeased with this Exequatur or Placet, which was practised in the Dominions of all the Christian Princes in Europe.

INNOCENT VIII. was the first, who, by means of a Constitution¹, sought to take it away from them, and first of all disputed it with our King Ferdinand; but as his Bull had no Consequence, and was looked upon in other Kingdoms to be impertinent and chimerical, it had the same Fate in ours; the Exequatur therefore was continued: And the same Pope having conferred the Bishoprick of Sessa upon a certain Fr. Ajossa, the Bull was not executed till it was first presented to Ferdinand, who, on the 3d of April 1487. gave it the *Exequatur*².

ALEXANDER VI. Innocent's Successor, a Pope indued with so many fine natural Gifts and Virtues, as is known all the World over, for the Reasons related in the 29th Book of this History, being a great Enemy to our good King Frederick, among other Things, impugned the Exequatur with all his Might; and seeing all his Attempts proved fruitless, he was so far led by his Passion, that on the 25th of June 1500. he did not stick to depose him; and amongst the other Faults which he laid to his Charge, this was one, that he had, on many Occasions, impeded the Apostolical Provisions, even when made in Favour of Cardinals, and would not suffer the Bulls from Rome to take Effect without the *Exequatur Regium*³. But the Misfortunes of this unhappy Prince proceeded from another Cause than Pope Alexander's Wrath and haughty Disposition; Frederick, during all the Time that he reigned among us, never suffered the Bulls to be received without the Exequatur; but now he exerted himself more vigorously than ever, for on the 3d of July the same Year 1500. he wrote a very serious Letter to the Bishop of Carniola, telling him, that in the Time of the Kings his Predecessors, and especially of King Ferdinand his Father, it had been the antient Custom continually observed, never to suffer any Provision coming from Rome, or any other foreign Part, to be admitted, read, or published in the Kingdom without the King's Licence: And thus it was likewise observed by Ferdinand's Successors, and the preceding Popes bore it patiently; but it appearing now, that some, through length of Time, excused themselves on the Score of Ignorance, therefore he was resolved to make it known to all his Subjects, by ordering, that no Bull, Brief, Excommunication, or any other Provision whatsoever coming from Parts without the Kingdom, be read, admitted, or published by any Person whatever, without his Letters of Licence, and that none presume to act otherwise upon Pain of his Displeasure. Pursuant to this Order, having heard, that a prohibitory Writ from Rome had been presented to the Maestrodatti of the Vicariate of Capua without the Exequatur, on the 3d of December the same Year, he wrote to the Capitano of Capua to procure the said prohibitory Writ, and send it to him, that he might consider what was fit to be done.

BUT the Observation of the Exequatur was never so rigorously enforced, as in the Reign of Ferdinand the Catholick, and while the Kingdom was governed by the Great Captain, and after him, by the Viceroy's his Successors.

IN the Viceroyalty of the Great Captain, we read in *Chioccarello*⁴ many Orders of his against giving Possession to Bishops and Abbots without the Exequatur; and if Possession was taken without it, he sequestered the Revenues; and the same was likewise practised with respect to Abbays bestowed upon Cardinals, who were not so much as exempted in that, and therefore they made no Difficulty to seek it, as the Cardinal of Arragon did for the Abbey of S. Maria dello Mito, situate in the Province of Terra d'Otranto, given him by Pope Julius II. in 1505.: So likewise when the said Pope, by the Resignation of Cardinal Oliviero Caraffa, Archbishop of Naples, gave the Bishoprick of Chieti to Gianpietro Caraffa, afterwards Cardinal and Pope, named Paul IV. the Bull was dispatched on the 30th of July the same Year, and being presented to the Great Captain, on the 22d of September following he gave it the Exequatur.

THE Great Captain likewise proceeded with much Rigour against those who presumed to make use of any Writ, even of Excommunication or Interdiction, coming from Rome, without the Placitum Regium. So having with great Concern heard, that Excommunication or Interdiction had been posted up on the Door of the Metropolitan Church of Cosenza, against Sister Arcangela Ferrara, a Nun of the Order of S. Bernard, without having first obtained the Exequatur Regium, on the 23d of December the same Year 1505. he wrote to the Governor of Calabria, ordering him to take Information of it; and if he should find that the said Censures had been posted up by a Laick, to punish him severely and exemplarily, if by an Ecclesiastick, to advise him of it, that he might proceed as he should see Cause. And the Placitum Regium was not only sought to Provisions of Benefices, or Censures coming from Rome, but likewise to Commissions from the Apostolical See. So the Pope having sent a Commission to D. Niccolò Panico, Apostolical Commissary, together with the Bishop of Melfo, to examine and punish some delinquent Priests of the Church of Melfo, the said Commission was presented to the Great Captain, and on the 20th of June 1506. he gave it the Exequatur Regium.

UPON Consalvo's going from Naples to Spain with Ferdinand the Catholick, the King left in his Place the Count of Ribagorza, Governor of Lupeña, an Arragonian, and gave him a Commission dated in Casertuovo the 5th of June 1507. wherein he calls him his Nephew¹. There remained likewise in Naples Queen Joan, the Widow of Ferdinand I. King of Arragon, Sister of Ferdinand the Catholick, the other Queen Joan the Younger, who was the Wife of King Ferdinand II. Beatrice Queen of Hungary, the Daughter of King Ferdinand I. and Isabella Duchess of Milan, the Daughter of King Alphonso II. who, by the Death of Duke John Galeazzo her Husband, having succeeded at the Time that Charles VIII. King of France came to Italy, was turned out of that Dutchy by Lodovico il Moro. Ferdinand the Catholick gave Orders that these Princesses should not in the least be disturbed in the Possession of the Cities and Lands which they possessed, and had been assigned to them in the Time of the Arragon Kings for their Dowries and Appenages, and confirmed by the Treaty of Peace concluded between Ferdinand and the King of France when they divided the Kingdom, in which, amongst other Conditions, we read, that these Queens were to hold, and quietly possess, during their Lives, all the Dominions, Lands and Revenues, which, on account of their Dowries, they possessed in the Kingdom, as well in the City of Naples, Terra di Lavoro, and Abruzzi (the Boundary assigned to the King of France) as in the Dutchies of Calabria and Puglia, the other Boundary belonging to King Ferdinand. Pursuant to which, Ferdinand always treated Queen Joan his Sister, and Widow of King Ferdinand I. with the utmost Respect, and maintained her in the Possession of her Estates with all the Royal Privileges, as if she had been free and independant Mistress of them.

THIS Queen possessed the City of Lucera in Puglia, called De' Saracini, the City of Nocera, called De' Pagani, the Cities of Sorrento, Cava, and, as Princess of Salerno, the City of Salerno, with their Appurtenances. The Count of Ribagorza, the new Viceroy, respected this Queen as his Mistress, and did not meddle with the Government of these Cities, where she exercised absolute and independant Authority. In these Times we find many Placita Regia given to the Writs coming from Rome, not only by the Count of Ribagorza in the Kingdom, but by Queen Joan in the aforesaid Cities belonging to her. All which are clear Demonstrations of the constant Practice of the Exequatur Regium, and that the Neglect of it was looked upon then as a great Crime.

BUT the most convincing Proof of the strict Observance required in this Practice, is a Letter written by King Ferdinand the Catholick to this Viceroy, full of Threats, and very severe, because the Count, perhaps out of Regard to Queen Joan, had been something remiss with respect to Rigour, upon an Occasion which we are going to relate. There having a Controversy arisen in the City of Cava, in which the Queen, as her City, was concerned, the Pope had sent an Apostolical Messenger with a Brief, who had the Boldness to make use of it without the Placitum Regium, and to notify it to the Viceroy himself, which occasioned great Disorders. The Count of Ribagorza wrote an Account of it to King Ferdinand; who then resided in Burgos. The King answered him with so much Resentment and Passion, that, among other Things, he wrote to him, that he was very much dissatisfied with him for not having proceeded in an Affair of so great Consequence with such Rigour as it deserved, having suffered so flagrant a Prejudice to be done to his Royal Dignity and Prerogatives, without immediately hanging the Apostolical Messenger for the Action; that it was an Incroachment upon his Right, and that there was no Instance of any such Thing having been attempted either against a King or Viceroy of this Kingdom; that he was resolved to have his Right maintained in the Kingdom of Naples, as it was in the Kingdoms of Spain, and as was practised in that of France; that, as was found by Experience, these Incroachments of the Pope tended to nothing else but the Augmentation of his Jurisdiction, therefore he had written in very strong Terms to his Ambassador residing in Rome, to complain of it to the Pope in home Expressions; for he was determined, if he did not revoke the Brief, and make void all the Acts following thereupon, to withdraw from his Obedience all the Dominions of the Crowns of Castile and Aragon; that he, the Viceroy, was to acquaint the Queen with this his firm Resolution, and to take care that no Bull, Brief, or other Apostolical Writ containing Interdictions, or other Provisions concerning that Affair, directly or indirectly, should enter the Kingdom, and not to suffer any other Writs of what nature soever to be presented or published.

THIS Letter, though not recorded by Chioccarello, was printed in the Original Spanish by the Author of the Treatise De Jure Belgarum circa Bullarum receptionem; and it is likewise in French by Van-Ispeu in his Treatise De Placito Regio in the Appendix², where he alledges this Practice as constant and never interrupted.

THE Count of Ribagorça, frightened at the King's Resentment, all the Time of his Government was more watchful than he had been before, that no Writ from Rome should be received without the Placitum Regium; and he punished the Transgressors, as he had already done upon the Possession of a Rectorship being given without the Exequatur, by imprisoning many, and among the rest a Priest, whom he obliged to find Bail to present himself, and then set him at Liberty.

HAVING been likewise advised, that a prohibitory Writ from the Pope had been presented in the Court of Civita Ducale, whereupon the Judge would not proceed in that Cause, on the 7th of April the same Year 1508. he wrote to the Governor of that City, that he was very much surprized at it, because he ought to know, that in this Kingdom no Apostolical Provisions can be presented without the Exequatur; and that inhibitory Writ having been presented without it, he ought to have no Regard to such a Writ, therefore he ordered him to cause the Judge to proceed in that Cause notwithstanding the said prohibitory Writ, and upon the like Occasion to continue to act so for the future. And on the 30th of June the same Year, he ordered the Archbishop of Nazaret, the King's Chaplain Major, not to give Licence for summoning to Rome the benediced Clergy, without knowing the Cause, and till he, the Viceroy be acquainted. And the following Year 1509. he caused a certain D. Felice, of the Diocese of Nola, to be imprisoned in Naples, for having made use of certain Provisions from Rome without the *Exequatur Regium*³.

QUEEN Joan of Aragon acted in her Territories, as the Count of Ribagorça did in the Kingdom. On the 1st of June 1510. as Mistress of Nocera de Saraceni, she gave her Exequatur Regium to an Order from Rome against the Patriarch of Antioch, Bishop of that City. On the 8th of June 1512. as Princess of Sulmona, she gave her Placitum Regium to Prospero de Rusticis, for the Bishoprick of the City of Sulmona bestowed upon him by Pope Julius II. by Apostolical Bulls dated the 30th of April 1512. As Mistress of the City of Nocera de Pagani, on the 3d of June the same Year, she granted the Exequatur to Dominico Jacobaccio for the Bishoprick of the said City, conferred upon him by the same Pope; as also on the 12th of February 1515. she granted it to D. Pietro Jacopo Veneto for the Parish-Church of S. Matthew in the said City of Nocera, conferred upon him by the Pope. As Mistress of the City of Sorrento, on the 8th of October 1514. she gave it to the Reverend M. Alberto, Brother to the Cardinal of Sorrento, for the Archbishoprick of that City, given him by the Pope upon the Resignation of it made by the said Cardinal his Brother. And lastly, as Mistress of the City of Civita, she gave the Exequatur to a Bull of *Leo X.*¹, who had published a terrible Constitution² against all Emperors, Kings, and Princes, that pretended their Placitum or Exequatur ought to be obtained to the Provisions of Rome; but that had not been accepted by any Prince, but proved useless, and had no Effect.

Instances of the Kings of the House of Austria.

IN the Beginning of the Reign of Charles V. the same Practice was constantly kept up by the Lieutenants which he sent to govern this Kingdom. The Viceroy D. Carlos de Lanaja gave the Exequatur to the Bulls sent by Pope Adrian VI. to Gianpietro Caraffa, Bishop of Chieti, for the Archbishoprick of Brindisi. And the Count of S. Severina, when he was Viceroy, wrote to the Capitano of the City of Aquila, that his Majesty's Service required, that the Cardinal of Sienna should not take Possession of that Church without his express Orders, and that he was to take special Care to prevent it: So that no Person whatever was to have Possession of it without his express Orders³.

THIS Custom was inviolably observed without the least Opposition in the Reign of Charles V. till the Pontificate of Clement VII. who used his utmost Endeavours to have it taken away. He following the Footsteps of his Predecessors, on the 11th Day of January 1533. published a Constitution like to that of Pope *Leo X.*⁴, and in order to have it obeyed in the Kingdom of Naples, he made Antonio Montalto, Attorney-General of the Kingdom of Sicily write to the Emperor, to order the Exequatur Regium to be abolished in Naples; in which Letter, dated the 20th of December 1533. are these Words, *His Holiness desires that your Majesty would take off that Slavery of the Exequatur Regium put upon the Apostolical Letters, as your Majesty is bound to do by the Conditions of the Investiture you received of that Kingdom, and by the Oath taken when you got it, &c.*⁵

BUT neither the Emperor, nor D. Pedro de Toledo, who was then Viceroy, took any notice of that Letter, and the same Custom was continued as formerly; on the contrary, Toledo, that his Prince's Constancy might be known to all, on the 3d of April 1540. wrote a Royal Letter to all the Governors of the Provinces of the Kingdom, in which he put them in mind of this antient Custom of the Kingdom, that whatsoever Provision came from Abroad, could not be put in Execution without his Knowledge and Licence; that therefore he ordered them to act accordingly in their Provinces; and if any Thing was done to the contrary, to take Information of it, and dispatch it immediately to him; and if Notaries and Laicks were concerned in it, to imprison them; and if Ecclesiasticks, to order them betwixt that and a certain Time, to come and appear before him in Naples, that he might proceed in that as he should see Cause.

AND on the 16th of June 1557. the Viceroy Francesco Pacecco wrote to the Governor of Benevento, ordering him not to suffer any Provision from Rome to be published in the said City without his Licence in Scriptis, and the *Exequatur Regium*⁶. Thus were Clement VII.'s Designs baulked, nor did the Court of Rome make any other Attempt till the Pontificate of Pius V.

BUT of all these Popes, none impugned this Exequatur more strenuously than Pius V. He by all means would have it abolished in the Kingdom; and King Philip II.'s Ambassador in Rome having endeavoured to dissuade him from it, his Answer, according to *Girolamo Catena*⁷, was, "That the pretended Exequatur Regium, or other Secular Licence, had nothing to do with the Execution of any Ecclesiastical Order. That it has clearly been so decided by the Sacred Canons and Councils, and such Orders are put upon the same Footing with preaching the Word of God, which requires no Secular Licence, &c. And he concluded with

AMONG the other Instructions given to Cardinal Alessandrino his Nephew, whom he sent to Madrid, this was one; and his Request to King Philip II. was this, “ To which Abuse many more were added in Naples, where in many Articles
 “ the Council of Trent was not observed, and a thousand Methods were fallen upon

 “ to your Majesty, to which you swore”¹.

THE Duke D’Alcala our Viceroy, whom kind Fate brought to the Government of Naples exactly at this Time, when there was most need of his Courage and Vigour to withstand the Efforts of Pope Pius, in order to oppose him, was not content with following the Example of the Viceroy his Predecessors, but imitating King Ferdinand, and the Custom of other Nations, where the Princes by constant and perpetual Laws and Edicts, had published this in their Dominions by way of written Law, he was resolved to do the same in the Kingdom of Naples.

’TIS well known, that there are many such Edicts in France, particularly of Lewis XI. in 1475. and of his Successors, which may be seen in the Treatise of the Proofs of the Liberty of the *Gallican Church*². We likewise find many such Edicts in the Provinces of Flanders of Philip the Good, Duke of Brabant in 1447. of the Archdukes Maximilian and Philip in 1485. and 1495. and others recorded by *Van-Espen*³. And, as Salgado witnesseth, in Spain likewise, which the Duke D’Alcala imitated.

THEREFORE, on the 30th of August 1561. he put forth a Pragmatick, whereby it was ordained, that no Rescripts, Briefs, or other Apostolical Provisions should be published without the Exequatur Regium, and his Licence In Scriptis obtenta, to the End that those, who should be so bold as to act otherwise, might be punished.

WE see this Pragmatick printed in the vulgar Editions under the Title *De Citationibus*⁴, which was subscribed by the famous Regents Villano and Revertera; and we likewise find it in the fourth Volume of the MS. Guirisd. of Chioccarrello: It was also printed in the antient Editions, and is cited by many Writers. In the Consultum made by the Council of Brabant in the Year 1652. to the Archduke Leopold, which is related by Van-Espen in the Appendix⁵. This Pragmatick of the Duke D’Alcala is quoted in these Words, As for the Kingdom of Naples, there is an express Statute in Pragmatica Regni Neapolitani, Tit. De Collation. prag. 6. (it should have been De Citationibus, prag. 5.) It is likewise quoted by *Van-Espen*⁶; and Regent Rovito, in his Commentaries, has made a long Catalogue of Italian Writers that have quoted it⁷.

IN Pursuance of this Law the Duke D’Alcala put forth several Edicts for the more exact Observance of it. In 1566. he wrote a Letter to all the Archbishops of the Kingdom, and also to the Archbishop of Benevento, on account of a Bull sent into the Kingdom by the Pope, seriously exhorting them, that since they knew, that such Bulls or Provisions from Rome could not be published and executed without the Placitum Regium, they ought by no means to publish it; and therefore they were to advertise the Bishops their Suffragans, and other Prelates not to do it. And in the following Years, particularly in 1568. he imprisoned and punished more severely those, who by transgressing this Law, presumed to make use of Writs from Rome without the Exequatur.

ON the other Hand Pope Pius made a grievous Complaint to the Great Comendator of Castile, then King Philip’s Ambassador in Rome, that these were intolerable Abuses, to the Dishonour of God and the Holy Faith, and that he could not bear them; and at last, the same Year 1568. he ordered Cardinal Alessandro his Nephew, in his Name, to write a Letter to all the Bishops and Prelates of the Kingdom, in which he told him, that his Holiness's Will was, that they should not subject the Bulls and other Rescripts which he sent into the Kingdom, to any Exequatur Regium, but put them immediately in Execution. But the Duke D'Alcala being advised of this by the Great Commendator, who sent him a Copy of this Letter, went still on in the old manner, and having given the King an Account of what had passed, he was punctually careful that no Writ should be received or published in the Kingdom without being first presented to him, examined, and the Exequatur obtained.

AND his Vigilance is both remarkable and commendable, that even to the Bulls of Jubilees the Nuncios required the Exequatur Regium; so that on the 14th and 15th of December the same Year, he sent Circular Letters to all the Governors of Provinces, and of some principal Cities of the Kingdom, giving them to understand, that his Holiness's Nuncio residing in Naples, had presented a Memorial to him, desiring the Exequatur Regium to a Bull of Jubilee sent into the Kingdom by the Pope, that it might be published, and that he had granted it; therefore he ordained, that upon this Intimation they might suffer it to be published in their Provinces and Cities.

THE Court of Rome seeing, that neither Flattery nor Threats had any Effect upon the Duke D'Alcala, with their usual Cunning, had recourse to the Court of Spain, giving it in Charge to the Nuncio residing in Madrid, to apply directly to the King for an Order to the Duke not to hinder the Execution of three Briefs about the Reformation of the Friars Conventuals of S. Francis, which they had a mind should be published in the Kingdom. But though the King wrote to the Duke, that it was his Will, that what was contained in the said Briefs should be complied with, yet at the same Time, in a Postscript written with own Hand, he ordered the Briefs to be put in Execution in the ordinary Form with the *Exequatur*¹.

THE Nuncio in Spain likewise endeavoured to have this Custom laid aside in Naples, as well because the Occasions of it were removed, because formerly in those troublesome Times of War, when one Pretender was driving out another, it was, perhaps, necessary, as because at present it served for no other End than to extort Money for granting it. The Year following 1569. the King wrote an Account of this to the Duke, desiring to be informed how much Money was exacted for granting the Exequatur, and to whom the Money belonged, that a Way might be found out for giving it Gratis, and by that Means to stop their Mouths. The Duke wrote to the King, giving him to understand, that the Nuncio had given him a false Information of the Matter; that this Exequatur was the greatest Prerogative the Kings of Naples had; that by most antient Custom, invigorated by a Pragmatick made by King Ferdinand I. in 1473. it had been in all Times observed; that no Money was extorted for granting it, except some small Dues, of which (by his own Appointment) and to whom they were paid, he had sent inclosed a particular and distinct Account; that, to remove all Grounds of Complaint, he had ordered, that the Dues belonging to the Chaplain Major, and his Counsellor, should not be exacted from the Parties, but be placed to the Account of the Royal Court during the Lives of those who held these Offices; and besides, he had ordered quick Dispatch to be made, that the Parties might not complain of Delay².

IN fine, 'tis owing to the Duke D'Alcala, that King Philip II. then doubtful and wavering, by the continual Sollicitations and false Informations of the Pope's Nuncio residing at Madrid, stood his Ground, and at last rejected so fulsome and insolent a Pretension. The Duke did not fail, by frequent Consultations, to advise him not to yield in this Point, which was the Foundation of his Royal Jurisdiction, and the greatest Prerogative he had in this Kingdom; for which cause the King took care always afterwards, whenever Application was made to him in Spain, to suspend his Judgment, and not to determine any Thing, but remit the Affair to the Viceroy of Naples and his Collateral Council.

THERE was an Instance of this in the Publication of the Bull De Censuris, established about this Time by Pope Paul V. whereby he regulated that Contract as he thought fit, and pretended that it ought to be observed, not only in the State of the Church of Rome, but in all the Dominions of Christian Princes. The Court of Rome did not think it convenient to apply directly to the Duke of Alcala about this, but ordered the Archbishop of Naples to send the Bull directly to the King, desiring that he would order it to be implicitly executed in the Kingdom. But the King, suspecting what the Matter was, and looking upon the Thing to be of great Importance, would not of himself determine any Thing, but on the 3d of March 1569. he wrote a Letter, and directed it to the Viceroy, his Collateral Council, and the President of the S. C. in which he acquainted them with the Request made him by the Archbishop; and thinking that it was an Affair that required mature Deliberation, and of great Consequence, therefore his Will was, that they should examine and discuss this Bull, and that not only the Regents of the Chancery, but Gianandrea de Curtis, Antonio Orefice, and Tommaso Altomare, then Royal Counsellors, should likewise be present at the Discussing of it, to the End, that it being examined, they might advise him if there was any Inconveniency in it, that he might take a suitable Resolution; repeating the same in another Royal Letter, dated the 13th of July the same Year.

THE Duke D'Alcala, in Pursuance of these Royal Orders, caused the Bull to be examined, and it was found, that in it the Pope arrogated to himself many Things which exceed his Spiritual Power, and took upon him to decide many Questions that did not belong to him, but to the Temporal Power of Princes; that it contained some Articles, which, if put in Execution, would be attended with Inconveniencies, and particularly if it should obtain in the Kingdom, the Subjects might bid farewell to free Contracts; therefore, though the Archbishop of Naples had at the same time given in another Memorial to the Viceroy, requiring the Exequatur Regium to the said Bull, yet he thought fit not to grant it, and therefore it was not to be received nor executed, as prejudicial to the Publick Good and Commerce. But the Archbishop of Chieti having given the Governor of Abruzzo to understand, that Cardinal Alessandrino had written to him, ordering him to cause the Bull to be published in his Diocese, and that therefore he was resolved to publish it; the Governor advised the Duke of it, who, on the 7th of April 1569. wrote him a Royal Letter, charging him to speak to the Archbishop, and tell him, that as that Bull contained some Articles, which, if put in Execution, would be the same as to abolish all Contracts, therefore it was under Examination in order to form a Resolution, and when that was done in Naples, Notice should be given over all the Kingdom; and in the mean time to exhort him, in his Name, by no means to publish it, or cause it to be published, and to take care himself not to consent to the Publication of it, or of any other Bull or Provision from Rome, without the usual Exequatur, and to advise him of what should happen¹. This Bull got no Footing in the Kingdom during his Government; and Cardinal Granville, Alcala's Successor, on the 31st of July 1571. wrote to the King, advising him, that the Execution of it in the Kingdom would occasion many and great Inconveniencies: Whence it came, that it was never received nor put in Execution with us, as at present it is not minded in the Tribunals, nor elsewhere². And the Bull of Pope Nicholas V. is observed because it was inserted by King Alphonfus I. in one of his Pragmatics, in order to give it the Force of Law, otherwise it would never have been binding upon us; for to lay down a Rule and Method to Contracts, belongs to the Temporal Power of Princes, and is peculiar to Empire, but not to the Priesthood; and such Bulls will have all Authority within the State of the Church of Rome, but not without it, nor in the Dominions of the Princes of Europe.

THE Order of Time would require, that an End should be made here of speaking of this Exequatur Regium; but, that I may not be obliged to resume this Subject, I chuse rather to prosecute it after the Death of the Duke D'Alcala, during the Times of the other Viceroys his Successors, to this Day, that the Extent of it may be laid before the Eyes of all, particularly of those who shall have a Share in the Government of this Kingdom, that knowing by what has happened, how odious this Exequatur has always been to the Court of Rome, and that they have left no Stone unturned in order to overthrow it; they may likewise be informed, that such strong Attempts were made, for no other End, but to strike at the chief Foundation of the Royal Jurisdiction, and the greatest Prerogatives that Princes have in their Dominions, which they ought to take for a Warning to be always watchful that it be not in the least touched, but, minding the Vigour and Constancy of the Duke D'Alcala, to take care to act so, as it may always remain intire and firm, that no Storm whatsoever may be able to shake it.

POPE Pius V. being dead, his Successors, as for the most part it commonly happens, following the same Footsteps, impugned the Exequatur as much as he, among the rest, the greatest Sticklers against it, were Pope Gregory XIII. and Clement VIII.

POPE Gregory, like Pius V. looking upon it to be the unhooking of the Authority of the Apostolical See, had always an Abhorrence to it, and did his utmost with King Philip II. to have it quite abolished in the Kingdom. But finding the King obstinate, by good Management he got the Matter to be referred to a Treaty, and the King to appoint his Ministers to go to Rome, in order to fall upon, at last, some moderate Temperament, seeing to abolish it quite, was found to be an Undertaking not only hard and difficult, but altogether desperate and impossible. Among other Differences about Jurisdiction, this Point was long debated in Rome between the King's and the Pope's Ministers; but, excepting that our Ministers promised, that a more quick Method should be taken in giving the Exequatur, without nicely examining into the Cause, or putting the Parties to great Charges, the Pope's Ministers gained nothing else: Whatever Bull, or other Provision came from Rome, was examined, nor was it put in Execution without the Royal Permission. This Pope, to whom we owe the Reformation of the Kalendar, likewise found, that D. Juan de Zuniga, Prince of Piedra Perla, who was then Viceroy, would never suffer the said Kalendar to be accepted and published in the Kingdom, till the King, by a particular Letter, dated the 21st of August 1582.¹, ordered him to allow it to be done; nor was it executed absolutely, but with some Restrictions and Modifications, as shall be told in the following Book, when we shall have Occasion to discourse more at large of this new Reformation of the Kalendar made by Gregory.

IN 1584. the Duke D'Osuna checked the Arrogance of the Bishops of Gracina, Ugento, and Lecce, the first of which had had the Boldness to publish some monitory Letters sent him from Rome without the Exequatur; and the other two had likewise published two Bulls without this indispensable Requisite. He called them all three to Naples, and sent two Consultations about the Matter to the King, representing to him, that these were pernicious and wicked Attempts, to which he ought to apply a quick and effectual Remedy in order to obviate greater Prejudices and Disorders; for the Court of Rome had presumed to send a Messenger to intimate a monitory Letter to the Princess of Austria, without the Exequatur.²

THE Count De Miranda, the Duke D'Osuna's Successor, was no less vigilant in this Point, to whom the Ambassador at Rome in 1587. having written about giving the Exequatur to a Bull, whereby the Pope, designing to erect in Rome a Place for keeping publick Writings, pretended, that Inventories of all the Writs of the Estates, Revenues, and Jurisdictions of all the Churches and Hospitals of the Kingdom ought to be sent to Rome; the Count answered him, that it could not be granted, and told him, that the putting of that Bull in Execution would be of dangerous Consequence.

IN the Pontificate of Clement VIII. when Cardinal Gesualdo was Archbishop of Naples, the Dispute grew as warm as ever, the Occasion of which we shall relate. In 1586. this Pope had directed a Brief to the Cardinal, by which he ordered, that all the Monasteries of Nuns of the Order of S. Francis, should be no longer under his own immediate Protection, but should acknowledge the Ordinaries, by removing the Monks that were there and performed Divine Offices, and putting Priests in their Places; in which Brief were likewise included the Monasteries of S. Clara, of Egizziano, and of Mary Magdalen in Naples, which are of Royal Patronage: The Cardinal had caused the Brief to be intimated to the Monks and Nuns without the Exequatur; whereupon Count Olivares, the Viceroy, sent the Secretary of the Kingdom with a Message for putting a Stop to the Execution of the Brief, and ordered a Guard to be put upon the Monasteries, and at the same time he advised the King of what had passed, and wrote likewise about it to the Duke of Sessa,

Ambassador in Rome, and even to the Pope himself. The Count might easily have guessed what Clement's Answer would be, who, no less than his Predecessors, hated the Exequatur. The Pope's Answer, besides expatiating upon the depraved Manners of those Monks and Nuns, contained, That the Exequatur was an Abuse, introduced into the Kingdom in the troublesome Times of War, when one Pretender was frequently turning out another; that now there was no more Occasion for it; therefore he commended the Cardinal's Conduct, who, without requiring it, had intimated his Brief. The Viceroy replied to the Pope, shewing him, that the Use of the Exequatur in the Kingdom was no less just than antient and uninterrupted; that it being one of the King's greatest Prerogatives, and the chief Foundation of his Royal Jurisdiction, he would not suffer it to be prejudiced in the least. He likewise wrote to the Duke of Seffa, that he was resolved to apply more effectual Remedies for repelling all other Attempts, and in January the following Year 1587. he sent the King an Account of what had passed.

CARDINAL Gesualdo, like a prudent Prelate, foreseeing, that to go on in the Way they had taken, would occasion greater Mischief, thought upon an Expedient for putting an End to all Dispute; he got the Monks to resign the Government of these Monasteries into his Hands, as the Ordinary, excepting however the Monasteries that were of Royal Patronage: This Resignation being made by a publick Instrument, the Cardinal wrote a Letter to the Viceroy, wherein, giving him an Account of what had been done, he declared, that he, as Ordinary, without standing in need of the Pope's Brief, and consequently of the Exequatur, intended to govern these Monasteries; and therefore, excluding the Monasteries that were under the Royal Protection, in which he did not intend to make any Innovation, having a Mind to visit in Person the Monasteries of Jesus, S. Francis, S. Girolamo, and S. Anthony of Padua, he begged of the Viceroy, that he would be pleased to order him all Assistance and Favour, that, as Ordinary, he may do his Duty without any Impediment: The Viceroy, upon Sight of this Letter, ordered the Regent of the Vicariate immediately to dismiss the Guards, which, by his Order, had been posted upon these four Monasteries, that the Cardinal might freely enter them. Thus ended this Affair, to the great Commendation both of the Viceroy and the Cardinal.

THIS Course was constantly pursued by the Viceroys that succeeded Count Olivares; and as long as Philip II. reigned, he maintained this Prerogative as it had been by all his Predecessors.

IN the Reign of Philip III. no Innovation was suffered with respect to this Exequatur, which, being now become famous on Account of the many Disputes that had arisen about it, was constantly kept up; and it being looked upon to be so precious a Jewel, it was judged, that to yield it up voluntarily, would have been one of the most valuable Presents that the Kings of Spain could ever make the Court of Rome; which would have put an inestimable Value upon it. Infomuch, that Tommaso Campanella, in his whimsical Treatise upon the Monarchy of Spain, which is handed about in Manuscript, designing, by new and strange Methods, to regulate the Monarchy, says, that in order to remove all Ground of Jealousy, the King of Spain should, in some measure, yield the Point of the Exequatur to the Pope, and send Bishops and Cardinals to govern Flanders and the New World, and by that Means every Thing would succeed to his Heart's Desire; for (subjoins he) 'tis seen, that the Pope's Indulgence of the Crusade yields him more Money than he spends in entertaining Cardinals, Bishops, and other Ecclesiasticks, and instead of being a Loser, he would be a Gainer. And elsewhere, in the same Treatise, he says, that there might be an Exchange made between the King and the Pope: Let the King give up the Exequatur to the Pope; and, on the other Hand, let the Pope give him the Power of giving final Judgment without further Appeal, so as there may be a Tribunal composed, where the King, as being of the Clergy, may be Head, and being joined with two Bishops, they may be Judges of all Appeals. But laying these Dreams aside, in our Kingdom, not only in the Reign of King Philip III. (when, to pass over other Instances, the Exequatur was not given to the Pope's Briefs of Counts Palatines and Knights, but with this Restriction, that they could only wear the Torquem, seu habitum Equitis aurati *) but in the Reigns of Philip IV. his Son, and of Charles II. the last of the Austrian Kings of that Race, there was not a Writ that came from Rome to which the Exequatur was not sought. They were all subjected to Examination, whether they were Commissions or Patents of Apostolical Nuncios and Collectors; whether they were Briefs, Decrees, or Edicts concerning the Holy Office, or the Tribunal of the Fabrick of S. Peter; whether they were for prohibiting Books, or for Indulgences and Jubilees: In fine, whether they were monitory Letters and Citations; and in short, whatsoever Provision came from Rome, was not suffered to be published, much less put in Execution, without this indispensable Requisite. The Viceroy, with his Collateral Council, commits the Examination of the Writ to the Chaplain Major and his Counsellor, who makes a Report of it to that Tribunal; and if there be no Inconveniency or Harm found in it, the Exequatur is granted, and even frequently denied. This is the inveterate and ancient Custom, introduced into the Kingdom when Principality was first settled in it; maintained by a Series of so many Ages, by all the Princes that have governed it, and in our Days more firmly established by our most august Prince, who, in the Years 1708 and 1709, residing in Barcelona, by many of his Royal Writs directed to Cardinal Grimani our Viceroy, ordered it to be inviolably observed with respect to all Provisions coming from Rome; so that at present it is more firm and stable than ever.

* Chiocc. loc. cit. in fin.

Disputes about Apostolical Visitors sent by the Pope into the Kingdom; and on account that Laicks were forbid to go to Rome when cited by that Court.

THE Custom of sending Apostolical Visitors by the Roman Pontiffs into these our Provinces, as Suburbicarian, is very ancient; we have related in the Tenth Book of this History, that Pope Nicholas II. gave that Charge to Desiderio the famous Abbot of Monte Cassino, that, as Legate of the Apostolical See, he should visit all the Churches and Monasteries of the Provinces of Campagna, Principato, Puglia, and *Calabria*¹; and the same was practised in the other Provinces of Europe. But what Damage these Legates occasioned in the Provinces committed to them, we have at large related in the said Book; so that they were so abhorred in France and other Kingdoms, that they were chased out of them, and by severe Edicts prohibited ever to return.

OUR first Norman Kings, with respect to the Kingdom of Sicily, found an easy Remedy; for by the famous Bull of Pope Urban II. the Foundation of that Monarchy, the King being declared Legate of the Holy See, they were no more received into that Island. But our Puglia and Calabria, under which Names all the other Provinces, of which the Kingdom of Naples is now composed, were then comprehended, continued in their former State. Whence it came, that in the Peace made in Benevento 1156. between King William I. and Pope Adrian IV. about these Legates, it was agreed for Sicily, that the Church of Rome had the Power of Elections and Consecrations in the Form there described, Excepta Appellatione & Legatione, quæ nisi ad petitionem nostram, & hæredum nostrorum, ibi non fiant. But as for Puglia and Calabria, it was agreed thus, Consecrationes & Visitationes liberè Romana Ecclesia faciet Apuliæ, vel Calabria Civitatum, ut voluerit, aut illarum partium, quæ Apuliæ sunt affines, Civitatibus illis exceptis, in quibus Persona nostra, vel nostrorum hæredum in illo tempore fuerit, remoto malo ingenio, nisi cum voluntate nostra, & eorumque hæredum. In Apulia & Calabria, & partibus illis, quæ Apuliæ sunt affines, Romana Ecclesia liberè Legationes habeat¹. Nevertheless there was some Care taken for preventing the Damages which the Churches of the Kingdom usually suffered by such Legations, by subjoining, Illi tamen, qui ad hoc à Romana Ecclesia fuerint delegati, possessiones Ecclesiæ non devassent.

ALTHOUGH the Church of Rome could freely send these Visitors or Legates into the Kingdom, yet their Commissions were constantly inspected. Sometimes it was found that they exceeded the Bounds of Spiritual Power, and often reached the Persons of Laicks, therefore their Commissions were examined before they got the Placitum Regium, as all other Provisions coming from Rome were; and so much the rather, if their Commissions were for the City of Naples, now declared a Royal Seat, where the Kings had taken up their Residence, and afterwards the Viceroy.

IN the Pontificate of Pius V. while the Kingdom was governed by the Duke D'Alcala, the Court of Rome abusing this Power, endeavoured to make Incroachments; for the Pope had sent a Brief to the Bishop of Strongoli, whereby, as his and the Apostolical See's Legate, he gave him Power to visit some Archbishopricks and Bishopricks, some of which were of Royal Patronage, such as Salerno, Gaeta, and Cassano, with all their Churches, and all the Ecclesiastical Persons, even those who were exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Ordinary. Moreover, in a separate Bull, many Instructions were given to the said Bishop most prejudicial to the Royal Jurisdiction and Prerogatives, as giving him Power to visit Hospitals, and take an Account of their Revenues and Incomes, though administered by Laicks; but what was most intolerable of all, was, that the Bishop had a secret Instruction and Order to execute these Commissions without asking the Exequatur; and he had already begun to visit some of these Churches without requiring it from the Viceroy. The Duke D'Alcala, out of Excess of Civility, caused the Bishop to be advertised not to execute these Commissions without having first obtained the Exequatur; and the Bishop saying, that he had Orders from the Pope not to take it, it was replied, that in the mean time he ought to forbear executing them till his Majesty should be informed. The Bishop did forbear, and in the mean time the Duke wrote to the King's Ambassador in Rome, to the Commendator D. Ernando Torres, and likewise to Cardinal Alessandrino, to intercede with the Pope to order the Bishop to take the Exequatur, for he was resolved not to suffer such an Incroachment to be made in his Time. But Pope Pius, offended at the Proposal, would not consent to it; so that the Affair being negotiated with the Nuncio in Naples, a new Expedient was fallen upon, but that did not please the Nuncio, therefore the Viceroy was forced to call the Collateral Council, and on the 29th of December 1566. they sent a full Information of the Affair to King Philip, in which they earnestly begged of him to consider the great Prejudice it would occasion to his Royal Jurisdiction, and with all haste to send them Orders how they were to behave in this and the like Cases that might daily occur; so much the rather, that the Pope threatened to forbid the Celebration of the Divine Offices in the Kingdom, always putting them in Mind of the Excommunications contained in the Bull In Cæna Domini.

KING Philip, seriously considering that it was an Affair of great Importance, wrote a very pressing Letter to his Ambassador in Rome, to use his utmost Endeavour to get the Pope to be satisfied with the Expedient concerted in Naples, of dispatching Writs of Execution according to the Draught offered by the Viceroy, with which the Pope was at last satisfied, only leaving out some Clauses, and that these Writs should be directed in general to all Persons, without mentioning either Ecclesiasticks or Laicks. The King wrote likewise to the Duke D'Alcala, not to suffer Hospitals governed by Laicks to be visited, and much less the Monastery of S. Clara, or any other Thing belonging to the Royal Patronage and Prerogatives; that he should oppose all those Articles in the Bishop of Strongoli's Instructions which concerned Laicks: And in fine, that he left it to his Prudence to make use of all Ways and Means that shall be found most conducive to his Service, and to do by the Pope what is just and reasonable. The Duke managed Matters so dextrously and effectually, that he brought the Nuncio to ask the Exequatur to all such Commissions; and the Viceroy and his Successors never suffered the Apostolical Visitors to execute their Commissions, till they had first presented them; and, being found reasonable, they gave them the Exequatur; however, with this Clause always, that they might execute them against Ecclesiastical Persons; and they often modified such Commissions as were thought prejudicial to the Royal Prerogatives and Rights of the Kingdom.

BUT at the same time this Minister had an Affair much more difficult and intricate to manage with Pope Pius. He had sent Pao'lo Odescalchi to be his Nuncio in Naples; to whom, besides the Commissions given him relating to Spoils and Tythes, and what in general concerned his Office, he had likewise given him particular Commissions about other Things; among the rest, he gave him Power to inquire into, and take Cognizance of the Ecclesiastical Estates, wrongfully alienated for a hundred Years backward, and of the Nullity of the said Alienations, though confirmed by the Apostolical See, or its Commissaries: Likewise to take Cognizance of the unjust Possession and retaining of the said Estates; and they being found to have been unjustly alienated and possessed, to restore them to those Churches from which it should appear they had been alienated and taken, with Power to force the Possessors of them, without Distinction of Persons, whether Ecclesiastical or Secular, not only to restore these Estates, but likewise to be accountable for the past Rents.

THE Nuncio presented all these Commissions to the Viceroy; to such of them as were regular, Licence was given for executing them with the wonted Conditions and Limitations; but as for this last, he was absolutely forbid to put it in Execution. The Nuncio acquainted the Pope with this Prohibition; and the Viceroy, on the other Hand, sent a full Information of the Matter to the King, in which he represented to him, that the Execution of this Commission would be most prejudicial to the Royal Jurisdiction, and that it would be the same as to erect a new Ecclesiastical Tribunal against the Laicks, contrary to the antient Custom, the Royal Tribunal having always proceeded in such Causes against Laicks that were sued, according to the Rule, Actio sequitur Forum Rei; and the Ecclesiastical Judges, whether Ordinaries or Apostolical Delegates, were never suffered to proceed against Laicks in the like Causes: Adding, that Pope Paul III having attempted the same Thing, by appointing Judges in this Kingdom with the like Commissions, and particularly this same Pao'lo Odescalchi, when Cardinal Perceco was Viceroy, a Licence for putting them in Execution was denied, and Pope Julius III was served the same Way; that if such a Practice got footing, it would not only disturb the Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom, but occasion great Detriment and Charges to the Subjects, by overturning all the Alienations of Ecclesiastical Estates made so long ago as a hundred Years, not only at the Suit of Parties, but ex mero Officio, and by way of Inquisition, as it is expressed in the said Commission. For which Reason the preceding Popes laid aside the like Attempt; and therefore his Majesty ought to interpose all his Royal Authority with the present Pope, that he may order the Nuncio to give over such a Pretension, as his Predecessors had done. These strong Insinuations had such Weight with the King, that he managed Matters so, as the Inquiry and the Nuncio Odescalchi's Commission took no Effect; the Pope recalled him, and on the 9th of February 1569. sent another to Naples.

BUT for all that, the Court of Rome did not give over the Undertaking; they attempted it afterwards by very scandalous Means. Cardinal Mercus, with Lorenzo de Torres, negotiated the Affair in Rome, and contrived an Expedient, which, as that Cardinal said, in a Letter he wrote to the Viceroy, dated the 18th of August 1570. was not only much for the Service of God, but honourable and advantageous to his Majesty, and redounded to the Praise of his Ministers. The Cardinal, perhaps, was ashamed to name this Expedient in his Letter to the Duke, but got D. Lorenzo to write and name it to him, who, inclosing the Cardinal's Letter within his own, told him, that provided he would suffer the Bull for taking Cognizance of the Possessions of the Churches that had been unjustly alienated, the Cardinal had told him, that his Majesty should have a Third Part of all that shall be recovered, and the Business shall be managed in the Kingdom, as that of the Fabrick of S. Peter, with the Assistance Assistance of such Persons, as he (the Viceroy) shall be pleased to appoint; and that without doubt his Majesty would thereby receive above 100,000 Ducats, and it will be much for the Service of God, of the Churches, and of the Souls of those who at present possess those Estates unjustly, of the Pope, and of the Fabrick of S. Peter; that therefore he was of Opinion, that he (the Viceroy) ought to give Ear to it; because he would thereby be able to gratify some Barons: He likewise wrote to him, that the Cardinal had told him, that the Pope had sent the like Bull to Spain, and over all Italy.

THE Duke D'Alcala, offended at this, returned no other Answer, but that he would advise his Majesty of it, and wait for his Resolution, not being able to determine any Thing of himself; so that on the 12th of October the same Year, he sent a full Account of all to the King, as also Copies of the Cardinal's and Ernando's Letters, not neglecting to represent to him the Inconveniencies and Prejudices that would attend the granting such a Liberty by such scandalous Means.

THE prudent King abhorring the Offer, and likewise ashamed of it, on the 7th of March 1571. answered the Duke, that it was not fit for him to meddle in that Affair, that therefore he might delay giving an Answer, and if he were obliged to give it, without taking notice that he had written any Thing of it to him, he might answer, that having better considered the Affair, he did not think it proper to mention it to the King; but considering the many grievous Inconveniencies that might follow, and being taught by Experience, he was resolved not to make any Innovation during his Government; that he ought to intimate this Resolution to the Cardinal by the Means of D. Ernando, and thus put an End to the Affair¹. The Duke did as the King had directed him, and so ended the Treaty; and as during the few Months that he survived (for he died soon after) no Novelty was introduced, so he set a good Example to the Viceroys his Successors, always to oppose the like Attempts of the Court of Rome, who not only obliged the Apostolical Visitors not to execute their Commissions without the Exequatur Regium; but when they did grant it, it was always with this Clause, Quo ad Ecclesias, & beneficia Ecclesiastica, & quo ad beneficia, & possessiones contra Personas Ecclesiasticas tantum; & dummodo non operetur directè, nec indirectè contra Personas Laicas; neque super Prelatis, Beneficiis, Monasteriis, & Hospitalibus, & Cappellaneis, qui sunt sub protectione Regia. And besides, there was great Care taken, that the Commissaries appointed by those Visitors, should not oppress, by Extortions, even the Ecclesiasticks.

THIS Minister likewise vigorously opposed the Inroachments of the Court of Rome, which often presumed to summon Laicks, even Subjects and Feudatories of the Kingdom in Ecclesiastical and Temporal Causes, though Defendants, to appear in Rome before any Tribunal there. Although King Ferdinand I. on the 24th of April 1474. by a particular Pragmatick, had, under the Penalty of Confiscation of Goods, forbid such Appearance², and King Frederick had invigorated the said Pragmatick in his Reign; and that in the Reign of Charles V. the Count of Ribagorça had strongly resented a Summons given the Duke D'Atri: Nevertheless in the Pontificate of Pius V. the Tribunals of Rome did not forbear to give such Citations; in 1567. Marcello Ciraccolo, at the Instance of the Exchequer of the Apostolical See, was cited to appear in Rome, and to give up the Village of Monte d'Urso near Benevento, with its Tenants and Jurisdictions. Giancamillo Mormile, on account of an Allom Pit which he possessed in the Lake of Agnano, was served the same Way, as also the Corporation of Montefusco, a Town belonging then to the Marquis of Vico, which was interdicted and suspended from the Divine Offices, because having been cited to appear in Rome and give up some Territories, they had not obeyed. But what was insufferable, it was alledged, that the Kingdom being subject to the Holy See, the Court of Rome had Power to command, cite, and force the Laick Subjects of it to appear. The Duke D'Alcala could not suffer these Abuses, but sent an Account of them to King Philip, representing the bad Consequences, and begging a speedy and effectual Remedy³.

THE Duke having so vigorously opposed the bold Attempts of the Court of Rome, the Viceroys his Successors, in Imitation of him, and encouraged by the King, who had been fully informed by the Duke, were very vigilant and rigorous against such Citations; infomuch that in 1582. a Messenger was imprisoned by the Duke D'Ossuna's Order, for having had the Impudence to cite D. Margarita of Austria, Sister to D. John of Austria, who lived in the City of Aquila, which had been assigned her as her Dowry, ordering her to appear in Rome, and answer to a Process taken out against her by the Queen Dowager of France. And the Count of Benevento's Resentment, on the like Occasion, was greater, for the Duke of Maddaloni, and the Marquis of Circello having been cited to Rome, the first about a Right of Patronage, and the other about the Bailiwick of his Village of Colle, which Cardinal Valente, as Abbot of S. Maria di Carato, claimed; in 1605. he made a heavy Complaint of it to King Philip III. who, in a Letter dated the 18th of March 1606. answered him, that he was not to suffer the Parties cited to appear in Rome, charging him, that, in order to repair so great an Injury, and of such bad Consequence, he ought to exert his Authority in such a Manner, as not only to serve for Reparation, but Example, and to banish out of the Kingdom the Clergyman that cited the Marquis, and sequestrate the Temporalities of the Abbot that employed him, and imprison his Relations: and in fine, to punish with the utmost Rigour for so heinous a Crime.

C H A P. VII.

Disputes about mixed Causes, and the King's Share of the Tythes imposed upon the Clergy of the Kingdom by the Pope.

E owe likewise to the Duke D'Alcala, the removing of that Abuse, that the Ecclesiastical Judges, when they got the Start of the Secular, could proceed against Laicks in certain Causes, which therefore they called Mix'd. Among other Inroachments of the Ecclesiastical Justice, as we have related elsewhere, the Ecclesiasticks had invented a certain Kind of Tribunal, called Forum Mixtum, thereby meaning, that a Bishop, as well as Secular Magistrate, could proceed against Laicks by Way of Prevention; in which the Magistrate was often disappointed, because the Ecclesiasticks, by their exquisite Diligence and Care, almost always took the Start, so that leaving no Room for the Secular Magistrate, they ingrossed all the Causes to themselves: Among others, they reckoned that Sacrilege, Usury, Adultery, Polygamy, Incest, Concubinage, Blasphemy, Perjury, Sorcery, and to enforce the Payment of Tythes, and the fulfilling of pious Legacies, belonged all to the Forum Mixtum.

POPE Pius, after his wonted manner, made his Nuncio at Madrid importune King Philip with Complaints of the Duke, that in the Kingdom he hindred the Bishops, though they had prevented the Secular Magistrates from proceeding against Laicks in the abovementioned Causes; so that on the 17th of July 1569. the King wrote a Letter to the Duke, ordering him to consult with the Collateral Council, and three or four Countellors of the Council of S. Clara, with the two Attorney-Generals, whether, when the Bishops get the Start, they can take Cognizance of the aforesaid Causes. The Duke convened the Regents of the Collateral Council, with all the others the King had named, and the Affair being nicely discussed, it was concluded with unanimous Consent, that it was an Abuse; whereupon the Duke, on the 19th of July the following Year 1570. sent to his Majesty a solemn and full Consultation of what had been determined in the Collateral Council, with the Assistance of those Ministers, and the two Attorney-Generals; viz. That the Cognizance of these Causes in this Kingdom, belongs privatively to the Royal Judges, Judges, and not to the Prelates, and that no Prevention is allowed, as the Bishops pretend: In Pursuance of which Decision, when it happened that the Bishops designed to meddle in the Crimes of Sorcery, Incest, &c. or in the exacting of Tythes, they were always vigorously opposed by the Duke, whose Footsteps Cardinal Granvela, and the Viceroys his Successors, afterwards followed, many Instances of which are to be found in the fifth Tome of Cibiccarelli's MS. Giurisdizionali.

IT was an antient Custom in the Kingdom, that whenever the Popes, either on Account of War against the Infidels, or for any other Reason, imposed Tythes upon the Ecclesiastical Revenues, the half of them belonged to the King; of which Custom there is Record in our Archives since the Times of Pope Sixtus IV. and of King Ferdinand I. Sometimes the Popes, conscious of this Right, consented to its being exacted, at other times it was done without their Consent; and the Collectors of the said Tythes, who were for the most part Bishops, gave in the Accounts of their Collections to the Royal Chamber, and the Money was put into the Royal Treasury, part of which was kept for the King's Share, and the rest given to the Persons appointed by the Popes. In the Pontificate of Pius V. the Turk threatening to make War in our Seas, and the War of Malta, so well described by Thuanus, then raging, this Pope, in order to assist the Christian Princes in opposing so powerful and implacable an Enemy, often taxed the Ecclesiasticks, and in our Kingdom, with the Placitum Regium, he imposed Tythes upon their Incomes. Pope Pius's Zeal for these Expeditions was truly commendable, but at the same time the Court of Rome endeavoured to get all the Money into their own Hands; they began to dispute the King's Right to his Share, and gave D. Juan de Zuniga, then Ambassador in Rome, and the Viceroy of Naples to understand, that they must shew the King's Title to that Right. The Duke D'Alcala gave a suitable Answer, and the King being advised of this Demand by the Ambassador, on the 1st of July 1570. answered, that he might tell that Court, that his King was under no manner of Obligation to shew the Title whereby he was in use to take his Share of the Tythes; that his Holiness had best let him possess that Right which had been handed down to him by his Predecessors, for he would never suffer himself to be robbed of it.

ALTHOUGH the Court of Rome, by these Disputes, gained nothing with respect to this Point, so strongly defended; yet the King, out of Piety, and because the Necessities of the War of Malta were truly great, was pleased to consent, that the Tythes imposed upon the Ecclesiasticks of the Kingdom for the Relief of that Island, should be collected by Ecclesiastical Ministers, who were to employ them all for that End; and that this Act might not prejudice the King's Right, a Declaration was ordered to be drawn up by Fra' Martino Reyes, the General Collector appointed for receiving the said Tythes, that his Majesty had graciously been pleased to grant the Half of the said Tythes belonging to him to the Knights of Malta, and had likewise consented, that the Money of the said Tythes should not be brought to the Royal Treasury, as usual, but might be received by Persons appointed by the said Knights, or, in their Name, by the said Fra' Martino. Moreover, the Pope intending to impose three Tythes upon the Ecclesiastical Revenues of this Kingdom, for assisting to complete the Fortifications of the City of Malta, provided his Majesty would remit the Half belonging to him in Favour of the said Knights, the King graciously consented to it; as afterwards, on the like Occasion, for assisting Christian Princes that were disturbed either by Infidels or Hereticks, he ordered his Ministers to suffer these Tythes to be collected and employed in such pious Expeditions, without exacting any Thing.

NEVERTHELESS this Piety of King Philip was not sufficient to stop the Mouth of the Court of Rome, for among the Instructions given to Cardinal Alessandro, in his Legation, this was one, to complain to the King, that the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction was incroached upon by the Difficulties it met with in collecting the Tythes which his Holiness had imposed upon the Clergy of Italy, under pretence, that a Part of them belonged to his Majesty; and besides to tell him, that although former Popes had obtained some Permissions concerning the said Collections, yet that not ought to be made a general Rule, and that therefore his Majesty would be pleased to leave it to his Holiness's Disposal, and if he pretended to have any Right in it, he might give his Holiness an account of it, that he might be able to quiet his Mind, and remove all Scruple.

BUT

BUT Cardinal Granville, the Duke's Successor, to whom the King communicated the Heads of the aforesaid Legation, answered the King by a Consultation, dated the 22d of March 1572. that his Holiness could easily remove all Scruple concerning that, because it was a most antient Custom, and of which the Kings his Predecessors had been in quiet and peaceable Possession, with the Consent of the Popes themselves, Time out of Mind; therefore it seemed very strange now, that the filial Love and profound Respect, which his Majesty had always had for his Holiness, should be so ill requited, as to demand the Title to a Right so clear, inherited by his Ancestors, and yielded to by so many Popes. The Count of Alvares, and the Viceroy's his Successors, took the same Course; so that this Custom continues in the Kingdom at this Day more firm than ever¹.

Disputes occasioned by the Knights of S. Lazarus.

It truly seems as if the Duke D'Alcala had been designed by Heaven to oppose the so many Inroachments of the Court of Rome, as were set on Foot in the Pontificate of Pius V. We shall now relate one very new and extravagant; and since the Subject has something of Dignity in it, we shall not grudge our Pains in tracing it back to the Institution and Origin of these Knights, and shew what Disorders they occasioned in the Kingdom.

THESE Knights boast of a very antient Institution, and carry it back to about the Year 363. under the Emperor Julian, in the Times of the Popes Basilus the Great and Damasus I. They confirm this Antiquity by the many Hospitals, which, under the Name of S. Lazarus, are recorded in History to have been built in those early Times over all the Christian World, and especially in Jerusalem and other Parts of the East¹. But this first Institution, by the Incursions of the Barbarians, and devouring Time, was in a manner buried in Oblivion, till Innocent III. and Honorius III. about the Year 1200. re-established it, and took it under their Protection. Afterwards Gregory IX. and Innocent IV. granted them many Privileges, and prescribed a new Rule to their Order, with Power to create a Master. Alexander IV. very freely confirmed their Privileges, and whatever had been granted them by his Predecessors.

THE Secular Princes, drawn in by the Example of the Popes, and the pious Design of their Institution, like to that of the antient Hebrews (of whom *Fleury*² bears Witness) with respect to Hospitalaty, and taking care of the Diseased, and especially of those who were infected with Leprosy, bestowed Temporal Riches upon them in great Plenty. The first were the Princes of the House of Savoy, and among the rest Frederick, who gave them many Possessions in Calabria, Puglia, and *Sicily*³. The Popes, and especially Nicholas III. Clement IV. John XXII. Gregory X. Urban VI. and Leo X. favoured them in their Acquisitions, and by granting them Power to retain those Possessions, and still getting more, they became exceeding rich. But it happened to them, what Experience has always shewn in the like Cases, that their overgrown Riches, the excessive Favour of Princes, and the so many Privileges bestowed upon them by the Popes, good Discipline and the antient Piety came to be neglected, whereby they sunk in their Reputation and Esteem with the Faithful. The Popes, among other Privileges, had granted them, that the Goods of those that died of Leprosy, either within or without the Hospitals, should belong to them; besides, that they could force the Leprous to stay in the Hospitals contrary to their Inclinations. The Princes assisted in seeing these Privileges put in Execution within their Dominions; whence we find, that our King Robert, on the 20th of April 1311. wrote to all the Officers of the Kingdom, telling them, that the Religious Brothers of the Hospital of S. Lazarus of Jerusalem had represented to him, that they, by Virtue of the Privileges given them by the Popes, had Power to oblige those that were infected with Leprosy, where-ever they should happen to find them, to retire to, and be confined within the said Hospitals appointed for such diseased Persons, and, if need be, to use Force in order to remove them from the Habitations of the Healthful, and to give them suitable Aliment; and seeing some infected with that Disease refuse to come to the said Hospitals, and are often borne out in it by their powerful Relations, therefore the King ordered his said Officers to give all Assistance, so these as leprous Persons might be confined to the said Hospitals, by forcing and taking them personally. And in the Reign of the Emperor Charles V. we likewise read, that Andrea Caraffa, Count of S. Severina, Viceroy of this Kingdom, at the Request of Alfonso d'Arziza, Master of S. Lazarus, on the 18th of December 1525. ordered all the Officers of the Kingdom to do Justice to the said Alfonso's Vicar, who was to go to several Parts of the Kingdom for recovering many Effects of Persons that had died of Leprosy, devolved to the Order by their Death, by Virtue of the Privileges and Bulls of the Popes.

THESE indiscreet Methods, frequently made use of as Traps for catching the Estates of those unfortunate People, in Time ruined their Reputation, and by Degrees they declined so much, that their Name was scarcely known. But upon the Accession of Pius IV. to the Papacy, he raised them again, and, like the other Religious Knights, adorned them with many and ample Privileges and Immunities, restored them to their antient Dignity, and created Giannotto Castiglione, Great Master of the Order. Pius V. likewise honoured and favoured them, insomuch that in the Viceroyalty of the Duke D'Alcala they were in great Esteem.

BUT if the Popes had contented themselves with heaping so many Honours and Prerogatives upon them without doing Prejudice to others, it would have been supportable, but to give them Prerogatives prejudicial to the Princes in whose Dominions they were entertained, was insupportable. They, though Laicks and married, by Virtue of these Papal Exemptions and Privileges, pretended, as well with respect to their Persons as Estates, to be exempted from Royal Jurisdiction, not to be liable to the King's ordinary and extraordinary Subsidies; and, what was not to be bore, with us, the Increase of their Number was endless, because they were made Knights not only by the Great Master, but likewise by the Pope's Nuncio residing in Naples, which, if it had been suffered to go on, would have been a vast Detriment to the Royal Prerogatives.

THEREFORE the Duke D'Alcala would not suffer their boasted Privileges to take Place in the Kingdom, but ordered, that they should be treated in all respects as mere Laicks, and on the 15th of May 1566. he sent a full Account of the Matter to King Philip, in which he acquainted him, that the Nuncio of Naples had made a great Number of Knights of S. Lazarus, and was daily making more, of purpose to exempt Laicks from his Majesty's Jurisdiction, which they laid hold of, though mere Laicks, and could marry, and do whatever they thought fit; and that if such Exemption were allowed, and they multiplying ad infinitum, a great Part of the Kingdom would soon be withdrawn from the Royal Jurisdiction. Some Time after, the Nuncio having applied to the Attorney-General for his Assistance in imprisoning one of these Knights, the Attorney refused to do it, telling him, that neither the Nuncio nor the Great Master had any Power or Jurisdiction over these Knights, as being Laicks, and subject to his Majesty's Jurisdiction; and the Nuncio having sent his Auditor to the Attorney's House to shew him the Privileges granted by the Popes to the said Order, he was answered, That these Privileges were not to be regarded, as well for want of the Exequatur Regium, as because they were most prejudicial to the Royal Jurisdiction; but the Auditor being put to a Nonplus, had no other Shift than to present to him the Bull In Cœna Domini, warning him, that as a Christian he ought to take care, that what his Holiness had granted to the said Grand Master should be observed, otherwise he would be excommunicated. The Duke therefore represented to his Majesty, that the Execution of these Privileges granted to the Great Master, besides lessning his Royal Jurisdiction, would be of great Prejudice in the ordinary and extraordinary Subsidies, which his Subjects were obliged to pay.

THE King on the 12th of July the same Year, wrote back to the Duke, commanding the Order of S. Lazarus to be abolished in the Kingdom, and that none should wear the Habit of it ¹.

THE Regents of the Collateral Council, by the Duke's Order, on the 13th of August the same Year, likewise drew up a Report of the Case, in which among other Things, they said, that the creating these Knights, and giving them the Habit, had, for the Time past, been done by the Great Master, and not by the Nuncio, and that the Masters had never had any Jurisdiction, excepting of separating the Leprous from the Commerce of the Healthy; and that the Privileges pretended by that Order were most prejudicial to his Majesty's Jurisdiction, and have been newly granted by the Popes Pius IV. and V. which were never received in the Kingdom, nor had got the Exequatur, which had always been denied them, as it was at present; and that these Knights had always been, and are proceeded against by the Royal Tribunals, both in Civil and Criminal Causes, as mere Laicks; and some of them having been imprisoned in the Prison belonging to the Vicariate, although the Great Master, or his Vicar have demanded their Release, it was never granted; and some have been likewise condemned to Exile. But when the Great Masters have pretended a Right to the Goods of the Leprous, it has been recommended to the Royal Officers to do them Justice; and one of Castellane, who was of that Order, pretending to be exempted from the King's Taxes, he was condemned by the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber to pay like all the other Citizens, and not to enjoy any Exemption.

THE Court of Rome seeing that the Duke made no account of these Privileges, had recourse directly to King Philip, by offering him the perpetual Administration of the said Order within his Dominions; but the King wrote to the Duke, that as for their offering to make him perpetual Administrator of that Order, he did not think fit to accept of it, therefore he desired it might be no more mentioned. Nevertheless they softened the King, insomuch, that as formerly he had commanded this Order to be abolished in the Kingdom, he afterwards allowed it to continue, but that the Knights should be looked upon as mere Laicks. So, in the Year 1579. he having a Mind to know the State of the said Order, by Command of the Marquis of Montferr, then Viceroy, the Royal Chamber drew up an Account of all the Benefices in Commendam which it had in the Kingdom, and of their Revenues, and at the same time made a Report, that the said Knights enjoyed neither Immunity nor any Franchise whatsoever.

BUT as the Duke of Savoy was afterwards created Great Master of this Order, so 'tis fit we should here take notice of it. Upon the Death of Giannetto Castiglione at Vercelli in 1562. and Gregory XIII. having mounted S. Peter's Chair, he, with a Design to render it the more Illustrious, created Emmanuel Philbert, Duke of Savoy, perpetual Great Master of this Order ², who, the Year following, having called a Meeting of the Knights in Nizza, by a solemn Oath, made them acknowledge him for their Great Master, and, for their greater Ornament, prescribed new Laws and Ceremonies to them; and having obtained a Confirmation of them from the Pope, he united and jumbled together into one the Order of S. Maurice (from whom the Dukes of Savoy boast their Descent ³) and this of S. Lazarus, which were formerly distinct Orders, and he assigned to them two Hospitals, one in Nizza, and the other in Turin. Whence it is, that these Knights call themselves of S. Maurice and S. Lazarus; and whence it likewise comes, that these Knights are created, and the Benefices in Commendam, which they still have in the Kingdom, are given by the Duke of Savoy; so that we read, that a monitory Letter having been dispatched by the Apostolical Chamber, in the Name of the Duke of Savoy, Great Master of the Order of S. Maurice and S. Lazarus, to all the Archbishops, Bishops, Prelates, and other Ecclesiastical Persons, to obey and observe the Privileges granted to the and Order by Apostolical Briefs, it was presented to the Collateral Council by the Great Commendator Giovan-Francesco Ravignone in 1608. in order to obtain the Exequatur; but it being examined by the Chaplain Major, he made a Report to the Vice-Chancellor, that the Exequatur could be granted with respect to Ecclesiastical Persons only ¹.

THIS Order had alternate Fortune in France; it was there, as in all the other Kingdoms of Europe, distinct from that of S. John of Jerusalem; but the Knights of this last Order, as their Rivals, endeavoured to have it abolished, which at last they obtained from Innocent VIII. who in the Year 1490. by his Bull abolished it, and confounded it with that of S. John of Jerusalem. The Knights of S. John for a long time kept this Bull concealed; but when the Knights of S. Lazarus got notice of it, in 1544. they appealed from the Bull, as injurious, to the Parliament of Paris. The Case was debated and decided in Favour of the Appellants; and the Pope's Bull being declared void, a Decree was passed, that for the Time to come the Orders of S. John and S. Lazarus should be distinct and separate. From that Time (for they durst not do so openly) the Knights of S. John secretly and craftily endeavoured by Degrees to have the Order of S. Lazarus abolished, procuring the Great Mastership of it to be lodged in their Order, and it continued there till the Time of Emarus Castus, who, out of a Principle of Honour and Justice, though of the Order of S. John, restored this Order to its ancient Splendour ²: Whence it came, that the Knights of S. John have always aspired to have the Superintendency of those of S. Lazarus; and whence we see still in Naples, in the Church of S. John a Mare (a Commendam belonging to the Knights of Malta) a Chapel of S. Lazarus erected, and therefore they pretend it subordinate to them.

Debates about last Wills, which the Bishops pretended to make for those who died Intestate; and about the 235th Usage of the High Court of the Vicariate.

THE Duke D'Alcala had likewise this Abuse to struggle with, which in his Time was become outrageous and insufferable. It had its Rise, as we have observed in the preceding Books of this History, in the Times of Ignorance, or rather of the Negligence of Princes and their Ministers; it started up when the Ecclesiasticks, without Opposition, maintained, that every Thing, where the Salvation of the Soul was in Question, was to their Jurisdiction: By Parity of Reason they maintained, that the Cognate of Wills, being a Matter of Conscience, belonged to them, and by the same Reason, that they were the proper Executors of them. They were not ashamed to say, that the Body of the deceased Testator, being left to be buried by them, he thereby became Mistress of his Moveables, in order to quiet his Soul, and execute his Will.

In fine, in England, the Bishop, or one appointed by him, seized the Goods of those that died Intestate, and kept them for the Space of seven Years, within Time the Heir, by compounding with him, might recover them. Barbosa writes, that in Spain of Old, the Ecclesiasticks would not bury the Dead till they were first Masters of the Will, otherwise a special Order from the Bishop must have been obtained; so that the Heirs, to save the Honour of the deceased Intestate, asked liberty to make a Will for him ad præsens causas; and when is more, there were some Ecclesiasticks, who obliged the Heirs of the Intestate to agree to take Umpires to determine what Share the Deceased ought to have left to the Church; but the Bishops took this Arbitration regularly upon themselves, and arrogated the Authority of disposing ad præsens causas for those that died Intestate. From this Inroad of the Ecclesiasticks, even in our Time it continued to be a Custom, that the Curates and Vicars are capable of drawing up Wills as well as Notaries. Therefore it continued in some Dioceses of our Kingdom, that the Bishops by antient Custom could dispose for the Soul of the deceased Intestate; and this Pretension was carried so far, that they imagined they could dispose of his Goods so, as even to apply them to their own Use: And in some Parts of the Kingdom, the Prelates without Distinction pretended to apply to their own Use the fourth Part of the Deceased's Moveables. The Cardinal *Di Luca*¹ condemns these Excesses, as abusive, and like a prudent Man would have them reformed and moderated. In Rome likewise, the Congregations of the Cardinals and of the Bishops, in order to make the Custom plausible, moderate and restrict it to certain Rules, but do not absolutely condemn it. So also Mario Caraffa, Archbishop of Naples, having in the Year 1567. held there a Provincial Council, wherein he declared it to be a condemnable Abuse, however, modified the Condemnation by saying, that where such a Custom was, the Bishop, with a becoming Piety, having regard to the Time, Place, and Persons, and with the express Consent and good Will of the Heirs, might dispense some moderate Share of Money for Masses, and other pious Offices for the Good of the Soul of the Deceased. After the Examination and Report of the Congregation of Cardinals, this, as well as the whole Synod was approved of by Pope Pius V.

BUT our Kings and their Lieutenants always prohibited and quite rejected it, as a pernicious Abuse. Some Bishops of the Kingdom, Sticklers for Custom, maintain this Pretension, such as the Bishops of Nocera de' Pagani, Alife, Oppido, S. Marco, and some others, which may be seen in Ughello's Italia Sacra.

THE Duke D'Alcala, not able to bear these Abuses during his Government, as they had been abolished in France and elsewhere, endeavoured likewise to root them out of our Kingdom; and seeing that some Bishops, and among the rest the Bishop of Alife, were obstinate in this Point, and denied Burial when this Custom was not complied with, besides having written to them serious exhortatory Letters to give over such Pretensions, in 1570 he wrote to D. Juan de Zuniga, the King's Ambassador in Rome, charging him to speak home to the Pope about these Customs committed by the said Bishops, that they may forbear them for the Time to come. The Ambassador spoke to the Pope, and all the Answer that he got was, that if the Deceased had Heirs, the Bishop could not, De Jure, make a Will for him, but if he had none, he could with respect to pious Uses.

THE Viceroys that succeeded the Duke D'Alcala followed his Example, the Bishop of S. Marco having excommunicated the Baroness of S. Donato, because she would not give him the fourth Part of the Moveables of D. Isabella Surferone, Baroess of S. Donato her Husband, who died Intestate, on the 21st of March 1566. the Count of Miranda wrote him a grave exhortatory Letter to absolve her, and to leave her no more Trouble; and the Bishop not obeying, he ordered all the Relations of his Vicar to be imprisoned, and his Goods sequestrated; and on the 10th of June the Year following, sent a Report of the Case to the King.

MOREOVER the Bishop of Nocera de' Pagani pretended, that Isabella Guerritore, Mother and Guardian of the Children and Heirs of Marcella, a Noble of the said City of Nocera, ought to pay him what he had disposed of in the Will that he had made for the said Marcella, ad præsens causas, he having died Intestate. The Viceroy wrote him an exhortatory Letter, desiring him to forbear, and not trouble the said Lady on that Account. When due Care is taken, the like Abuses are not now suffered in the Kingdom.

THE Disputes with the Duke D'Alcala about Jurisdiction did not end here, but pass over some of less Moment, that which he had to maintain about the vance of the 235th Usage of the High Court of the Vicariate, which the Ecclesiasticks pretended to make void and null, deserves to be related here.

IT was an antient Custom in our Kingdom, consonant both to Law and Reason, that when it was objected in the Royal Tribunals, that they could not proceed in the Causes of the Clergy, but ought to remit them to their proper Judges; it belonged to these very Tribunals to examine whether the Parties were of the Clergy or not. It was their Business to examine into the Bulls they were to produce, and the Requisites necessary to their being remitted, such as their wearing Clerical Habits, the Tonſure, living Clerk-like, not meddling in Merchandizing, or any Thing thereto belonging; as, without any Dispute, was practised all the Time that the Kings of the Illuſtrious Family of Anjou reigned among us, inſomuch that Queen Joan II. in the Collection of the Usages of the High Court of the Vicariate, among others, cauſed this likewise to be inserted.

IN the Pontificate of Pius V. among other Attempts of the Ecclesiasticks, we likewise see this, that the Bishops pretended, that upon their bare Assertion the Clergy ought to be remitted, and that it belonged to them to take Cognizance of their Clerkship, and whether they had the usual Requisites. The Bishop of Andria having pretended to this, and it being denied him, he excommunicated the Governor and Judge of that City, because they would not deliver up to him ſome Clergymen that had been imprisoned; but the Duke D'Alcala approved of the Governor's Conduct, and on the 19th of July 1570. he ſent a Report of it to the King¹, and wrote to the Ambaſſador in Rome, to repreſent to the Pope, the Prejudices and Innovations which the Bishops of the Kingdom attempted; and among others, to aſſume the Cognizance of Clerkship, by robbing the Judges of that Right which they have always had, conformable to the Usage of the Vicariate; and to give his Holineſs to underſtand, that this was a Matter of the higheſt Importance that could happen in the Kingdom, not only with regard to the Prejudice it would be to the Royal Jurisdiction and Authority, but likewise to the Quiet of his Maſteſty's Subjects. The Ambaſſador managed the Affair effectually with the Pope, who finding the Demand to be reaſonable, answered him, that the Custom ſhould not be altered.

BUT for all that, the Ecclesiasticks did not forbear afterwards to proſecute their Deſign, though they always found Oppoſition; and in the Viceroyalty of the Count of Miranda, there came a Letter from the King, dated the 12th of December 1587. ordering the Royal Tribunals to continue to take Cognizance of the Clerkship, without ſuffering any Innovation in that Matter. And in Times leſs diſtant from us, Fabio Capece Galeota, printed a Treatiſe dedicated to the Duke D'Alba, maintaining that Practice conformable to the Uſage, and demonſtrated, that it was not only lawful, but had been ſucceſſively approved of at different Times by the Popes; and D. Pietro Urries wrote a particular Treatiſe about it; and tho' the Court of Rome prohibited the Book, yet there was no regard had to the Prohibition, as we have related in the XXVIIth Book of this Hiſtory.

The Legation of the Cardinals Giustiniano and Alessandrino to King Philip II. concerning this and other Points of Jurisdiction; whence proceeded the Custom of sending from Naples a Royal Minister to Rome for settling them.

POPE Pius V. who was as assiduous as any of his Predecessors, by all Means possible, in extending the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction over the Dominions of Christian Princes, not pleased with the Duke D'Alcala, who, in doing his Duty, always thwarted his Designs, at last resolved to have these Points settled directly with King Philip, and for that End sent two Legates successively. The first was P. Vincenzo Giustiniano, General of the Order of Preaching Fryars, whom he afterwards made Cardinal; and the second was Michele Bonello, Cardinal Alessandrino his Nephew, who set out for Spain and Portugal with sundry Commissions, a little before the Death of the Duke D'Alcala, which happened in Naples in the Year 1571.

CARDINAL Giustiniano soon made an End of his Legation; for having represented to the King some Injuries (the greatest Part of which were those above-mentioned) which he said were done to the Bishops of the Kingdom, derogatory to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Immunity, and among others, that of not suffering them to take Cognizance of the Clerkship; the King took Care for some of them of small Moment, but considering that the rest were of great Importance, and required mature Deliberation, he said he could not determine any Thing in them, till he had first been fully informed by the Viceroy of Naples, and so dismissed him, with a Letter to Pope Pius, dated the 28th of September 1570. wherein, with great Respect, he wrote to him, that he had received his Brief which Cardinal Giustiniano brought him as his Credentials concerning the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction; and that what by some Progresses, what by his continual Affairs which had happened since, he had not had Time or Opportunity to examine into Affairs of so great Consequence: Nevertheless, to satisfy his Holiness, he had taken care for some of them, as the Cardinal would inform him; and that as soon as he had received the Information he expected from Naples, he would endeavour to take care for the rest, in such a manner as the Ecclesiastical Dignity should suffer no Prejudice.

AT the same time he wrote two very long Letters to the Duke D'Alcala, in which he sent him the principal Points represented by the Legate as prejudicial to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, charging him to communicate them to the Collateral Council, to be by them maturely examined and considered, and a particular Answer given to each of them, and then to send him a Report of the Whole, that he might the more maturely be able to consider what was fit to be done; which was accordingly obeyed.

THUS ended the Legation of Cardinal Giustiniano; but that of Cardinal Alessandrino, the Pope's Nephew, was much more Honourable; for Pius sent him to King Philip II. not only upon account of these Disputes about Jurisdiction, but for more weighty and serious Reasons, and no less for the Kingdom of Naples, than that of Sicily and the Dutchy of Milan, and especially on account of the War threatened by the Turk, who, being grown more formidable than ever, struck Terror, not only into Germany, but even into Italy. Pope Pius therefore, was wholly intent upon persuading Christian Princes to unite and hasten to the Defence of the Christian Provinces, threatened by so cruel and powerful an Enemy; for this End he sent Cardinal Commendone to the Emperor, with Orders, that after he had treated with him about the Affairs of Germany, to go to Sigismund Augustus King of Poland, and invite him to join in a War both profitable and necessary; and at the same time he sent Paolo Odescalchi, Bishop of Penna, to the Princes of Italy with the like Commission: He likewise sent Cardinal Alessandrino to King Philip in Spain, from whom, above all other Princes, he expected powerful Succours, charging the Cardinal to go afterwards and invite the Kings of Portugal and France to join in the Expedition¹.

UPON Cardinal Alessandrino's entering Spain, he was met upon the Borders, with great Honour, by many Noblemen whom the King had sent to receive him; Diego Spinosa, Bishop of Sagunto, who then had the Management of the most weighty Affairs of the Crown, likewise met him; and at last being arrived at Court, King Philip received him with exceeding Demonstrations of Honour and Esteem.

THE Cardinal begun with his chief Commission, which was, to exhort the King, in all haste, to furnish powerful Succours for the War against the Turk; that as they would be the greatest, so they would encourage the other Princes to follow his Example, and enter into the Alliance: In the second Place he begged of him, that, as he was obliged to go to Portugal and France upon the same Errand, his Majesty would be pleased, for rendering his Negotiations the more Effectual, to interpose his good Offices with those Kings, and likewise to invite the Emperor to be a Party in this most holy War. King Philip thanked the Pope for the good Opinion he had of him, but that his Holiness ought likewise to consider with how many Troubles and Difficulties he was surrounded, and what a burthensome War about Religion he had upon his Hands in Flanders, which, if not taken care of in time, might prove more detrimental to Christianity than that threatened by the Turk; as for the rest, that his Assistance should not be wanting, and what Supply his Dominions in Italy could bear should be furnished; nor would he neglect to interpose his good Offices with the said Kings, and especially with the Emperor Maximilian his Cousin².

THE Title of Great Duke of Tuscany, given to Cosimo Duke of Florence, was likewise brought upon the Carpet; the Cardinal maintained, that to suffer it was highly injurious both to his Majesty and the Pope; that it not only struck at his Royal Dignity and Authority, but at the Majesty of the Apostolical See: Nevertheless nothing was done in that Affair.

BUT at the same time that Pope Pius was shewing so much Zeal for the Christian Faith against its implacable Enemies, he did not neglect the Interest of his See; he made the Cardinal complain to the King, that the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in Sicily was greatly depressed by his Majesty's Ministers, by reason of that Monarchy invented by them, which has nothing else to support it, but a supposititious and apocryphal Bull of Urban II. And he said, that besides that the Bull could not comprehend but the Persons of Roger Count of Sicily and Calabria, and of Simon his Son, or of the Heirs of Roger only, both the Date and Place give great Ground for Suspicion; that 'tis dated in Saleruo in the Year 1095. at which Time Pope Urban was at the Council of Clermont, assembled in France on account of the Holy War, which Expedition took him up that whole Year; that Tommaso Fazello, the first Broacher of it, was an Upstart, and a Man of no Credit or Authority, who said he had it from Gio. Luca Barberio, a Sicilian, a Man of as little Account; that it was also attributed by Pietro di Luna, a Schismatick, to Ferdinand and Martin, Kings of Arragon; the last of which married Mary Queen of Sicily, to the End that the Bishops might not make use of the Ecclesiastical Censures against the Royal Ministers; but that afterwards, at the Request of the three Estates of the Kingdom, that Privilege was quite abolished, the Kingdom of Sicily confined to what is prescribed by the Council of Trent, and the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction restored to its former Authority and Splendor. King Philip considering with himself the Importance of the Matter, very gravely answered the Legate, that his Predecessors had transmitted to him these Rights together with the Kingdom, and that he could do no less than leave them to his Successors in the same manner as he had received them; as for the rest, if there has any Thing been done amiss in the Exercise of them, out of Respect to the Holy See, he would write and order it to be amended: With this Answer the Cardinal was dismissed. There was no more mention made of this Matter afterwards, till in the Reign of Philip III. that Cardinal Baronius took it in his Head, in the XIth Tome of his Annals, to controvert it; which, as we have told elsewhere, drew a severe Remonstrance from Spain. And lately in our Days, Pope Clement XI. having a mind to abolish it by his Bull; and taking Advantage of the Juncture of Time, when that Kingdom was in the Hands of the Duke of Savoy, his Attempt proved likewise fruitless, which induced the incomparable Du Pin, at the Desire of that Prince, to write that learned Treatise, wherein he not only maintains the Monarchy, but exposes the Weakness of Baronius's Arguments, upon which Clement had founded his Bull.

CARDINAL Alessandrino reserved to the last of his Legation, the Complaint to the King of the Prejudice done to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in the Kingdom of Naples, and Dutchy of Milan; but he got the same Answer that had been given Cardinal Giustiniano, that these were Matters of great Importance, and therefore he could determine nothing of himself, till he should be first informed by the Viceroy of Naples, and by his Ambassador residing in Rome.

IN the mean time, in the Month of April this Year 1571. the Duke D'Alcala had died in Naples, and Cardinal Granville being then in Rome, was ordered by the King to go immediately to Naples, and take the Government of the Kingdom upon him, which he accordingly did. The King, in order to fulfil what he had promised to the Cardinal Legate, this same Year wrote four Letters; one in the Month of November to D. Juan de Zuniga, his Ambassador in Rome, and in December following three others to Cardinal Granville his Viceroy in Naples. In these Letters he advised them, that Cardinal Alessandrino, his Holiness's Legate, being arrived in Spain, received and kindly entertained by him, as became a Person of his Dignity, and so near related to the Pope, among his other Commissions, had laid before him some Articles, by which he pretended, that the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction was prejudiced, as well in the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, as in the Dutchy of Milan; in Naples by the Exequatur Regium; in Sicily by the Monarchy; and in Milan by the Familia armata of the Archbishop, and by the Church of Malta; therefore he had sent them a Copy of the said Articles, with the Answers and Replies of the said Legate: He had likewise sent them a Copy of the Memorials given him by Cardinal Giustiniano, with the Answers made on the Margin of each Article, that the Ambassador, by this Hint, may be the better able to regulate his Conduct with the Pope. He enlarged upon the Subject much more to the Viceroy, giving him an Account, that as to the Points contained in the Memorials given him by Cardinal Giustiniano, and the Decisions of his Royal Council, with the Opinions of the Regents of the Collateral of Naples, although the said Cardinal Alessandrino had replied to them, yet having got such pat Answers, he was at last quiet, and therefore was resolved in three Days to set out for Portugal. As for the new Articles concerning the Kingdom, given him by the said Cardinal, he had sent him a Copy of them, in order to be examined by the Regents of the Collateral Council, and other Persons of Skill, Learning and Integrity. And lastly, he ordered the Viceroy to send him a very distinct Report of all, with his own Opinion, that if the Pope should reply, he might be able upon good Grounds to answer him, and by the good Management of this Affair prevent him. In the second Letter directed to the Viceroy, he gave him an Account of the Memorials given him about the Observance of the Council of Trent, and of his general Answers made to them; and in the Third he charged him to be careful in maintaining the Exequatur, that his Jurisdiction might not be lessened.

IN Answer to these Royal Letters, Cardinal Granville, with Advice of the Collateral Council, sent the King sundry Consultations, as well upon these Articles, as upon those contained in the Memorials given in to his Majesty by Cardinal Giustiniano, in which he gave him a full Account of all that had passed; at which the Court of Rome was much displeased, who seeing, that neither the controverted Points about Jurisdiction, contained in the Articles given in by the Cardinals Giuliano and Alessandrino, nor many others which were daily started, could be adjust'd to their liking, by Letters and Memorials sent to and again betwixt Rome, Naples, and the Court of Madrid, resolv'd to refer them to a Treaty to be held in Rome, whither the King might send his Ministers; therefore Pope Pius desired King Philip to send his Ministers, who, with those that he should appoint, might adjust and amicably agree the Points in Dispute. King Philip, not knowing the Secret, or out of Complaisance to the Pope, for whom he made a shew of great Respect, promis'd to send them; but soon after, on the 1st of May 1572. the Pope dying, the Promise had no Effect.

BUT Gregory XIII. who succeeded Pope Pius, did not fail, by frequent Messages, to put the King in mind of his Promise; so that in the Year 1574. the Ministers were sent. On the 4th of June the said Year, the King wrote a Letter to the Pope, wherein he told him, that out of Regard to his pressing Instances, he had sent D. Pedro d'Avila, Marquis De las Navas, and the Licenciate Francisco de Icaza, one of his Countellors, who, jointly with D. Juan de Zuniga his Ambassador, were to treat about the Points in Dispute concerning Jurisdiction in his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the Dutchy of Milan, in order to an amicable Agreement; for which End he sent them full Power, and likewise Instructions how they were to behave in the Treaty: Of all which he advis'd Cardinal Granville the Viceroy, that he might act accordingly.

WHENCE proceeded the Custom of sending Ministers to Rome for transacting such Affairs: Messages from their Beginning always fruitless. The Marquis De las Navas, and the Counsellor De Icaza, took a great deal of Pains to no Purpose. But for all that, this Custom, once begun, was kept up; for the Marquis dying in 1578 D. Alvaro Borgia, Marquis of Alcaniz, was sent to Rome in his Place. And the Governor of Milan having observed the same Custom of sending from that Dutchy a Person for managing those Affairs in Rome, in 1579. King Philip II. wrote to the Marquis of Mondemar our Viceroy, telling him that the Great Commendator, his Ambassador in Rome, and the Marquis of Alcaniz, had acquainted him, that, for keeping a good Understanding betwixt the Secular and Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of the Kingdom, it was very fit to have always in Rome a Person of such Skill and Knowledge as Doctor Giulio Riccardi, whom the Marquis De Agmonte, the Governor of Milan, had sent thither from that Dutchy; that therefore he ordered him to send from Rome to Naples, a Person, though it were a Regent of the Chancery, and particularly the Regent Salerntino, as most knowing in the said Affairs, or even a Regent of the Cipriota Council, or of the Chamber of Accounts, or be who it will that the said Ambassador and Marquis shall pitch upon, that by his Advice these Affairs may be carried on.

SO, in Times less distant from us, we read, that on account of the Controversies about Jurisdiction, between the Bishop of Gravina and the Arch-Priest of Altamura, the Cardinal Zapata sent the Counsellor Giam-Battista Migliore to adjust and decide them. And in the Time of our Grandfathers, the Counsellor Antonio di Gaeta was sent to Rome on account of the new Disputes occasioned by the Bull of Gregory XIV. which Message turn'd no Account; and in our own Time, the Counsellor Faletti, the Attorney of the Royal Chamber Mazzacorda, and the Counsellor Lucini, were successively sent to as little Purpose: Whence it may be seen, that it is in vain to expect to get an End put to these Differences about Jurisdiction by such Messages. The most proper and effectual Method for deciding these Matters, since the Spanish Way of curing these Wounds with Plaisters and Ointments must be followed, and not that of the French, would be such as has been demonstrated by the wisest and ablest Lawyers and Divines; viz. to appoint Persons of high Rank, by turns, to be Arbitrators, and to be obliged to stand blindly to their Award: This Method, which has been often practis'd in the Territories of Barcelona, is said by Jacopo Menocchio, a famous Lawyer of Pavia, in his Treatise De Jurisdictione, to be the fittest for entirely putting an End to these Controversies in Italy. The Romans, who, of all others ought to desire it most, have always shew'd an Abhorrence to it, because they know, that by keeping them in suspense and undecided, the Time may come, when, by their Vigilance and Cunning, they may be able to make use of them to their great Advantage.

All these Acts and Writs are insert'd in Chieccarelli's 14th tome De Legationibus.

C H A P. XI.

The Death of the Duke D'Alcala, and the good Laws he left us.

HIS prudent Minister, during the twelve Years that he governed, not only underwent the Fatigue of these troublesome Disputes, but was obliged to be constantly upon his Guard for fear of a cruel and bloody War, with which the Turks threatened our Coast. The War undertaken in 1565. for the Conquest of Malta, alarmed both the Kingdoms of Spain and Naples, it behoved him therefore to provide the maritime Cities with strong Garrisons; and the Kingdom being almost surrounded by the Sea, his Care and Charges were the greater.

BUT though at last that Island was freed from the Miseries of War, yet our Fears were not at an end; for the Year following, after the Turks, with a most powerful Fleet, had conquered the Island of Sey, for the Space of 300 Years possessed by the Genese, they advanced into the Adriatick; and not having succeeded in the surprise of Pescara, they laid Waste all that Coast, and pillaged all the Towns situate upon the Sea, where they made a great Booty of People and Goods, and then returned to the Levant. But in 1570. putting to Sea again, they gave a fresh Alarm to Italy; therefore the Duke having provided the Places most exposed, brought 3000 Germans for the Defence of the Kingdom: However the Storm fell upon the Venetians, by the unexpected Attack of the Island of Cyprus, to the Relief of which Granndrea Doria went with fifty Gallies, whereof Twenty-three belonged to the Squadron of Naples, with 2000 Soldiers commanded by the Marquis of Vila Maggiore, and a vast Number of Napolitan Knights.

THESE continual Apprehensions of War, which are worse than War itself, and especially that about Religion, which was still raging in Italy, by the constant and immense Expence, put King Philip II. to the Necessity of being sometimes heavy upon the Kingdom by frequent Contributions and Donatives. But the courteous Behaviour of the Duke, who managed this Matter with the Barons with great Gentleness and Address, and the Love he had gained of all the States, particularly of the Nobility, who having invited him to be a Member of their State, he was received into the Séggio at Managua, was such, that in the Space of six Years only, having, according to Custom, convened General Parliaments in S. Lorenzo, he drew profuse Donatives from the City and Kingdom. In 1562. Cristoforo Colanazzo presiding as Syndick of Porto, the King got a Donative of a Million of Ducats. In 1566. Fabio Roffe being Syndick of Managua, they gave him a Donative of 1,200,000 Ducats. In 1568. in which Year Giovanni Maria was created Syndick of Porto, a Donative of the like Sum was given; and in 1570. Paolo Peccorello being Syndick, another Donative of a Million was given. And on account of these Donatives, we read in the Volume of Favours and Privileges granted to the City and Kingdom of Naples, very many Privileges and Favors that were graciously bestowed upon them by King Philip II. particularly when the Duke of Alcala was Viceroy.

BUT behold at last it behoved this incomparable Viceroy to yield to the continual Application, and his so many troublesome and anxious Affairs had impaired his Health; he had often begged of the King to allow him to retire to his native Soil for the Recovery of his Health, and the King at last had given him a Leave; but, as we have seen, by reason of the impertinent pretensions of the Genese, of Rome, the King was obliged to recall his Leave, and order him not to go, nay, if he had been set out, to return: So, being weak and infirm, for the Benefit of the Air he often resided in Torre del Greco, in which Place we find some of his Pragmaticks dated; but in the Spring of this Year 1571. being seized with a violent Rheum, accompanied with a mortal Fever, on the 2d of April he ended his Days, in the 63d Year of his Age, and the 12th of his Viceroyalty of Naples. His prudent Government was commended by all People, and therefore every one bitterly lamented his Death; it was then thought, that Spain could not furnish the Kingdom with another like him; for truly since the Death of D. Pedro de Toledo, Naples had not had a better Minister than he. His Body was most honourably buried in the Church of the Cross, belonging to the Palace, from whence it was afterwards carried to Spain.

THE Virtues that adorned his Mind were truly admirable, and above all others that of Christian Piety; he was a great Adorer of the most August Sacrament of the Altar; when it was carried through the Streets to the Sick, he not only caused it to be accompanied by all the Pages of the Court with lighted Torches, but often when he met it, he came out of his Coach and accompanied it af or; he was compassionate and full of Charity towards the Poor and Afflicted; he frequently sent one of his trusty Gentlemen to visit the Sick, to whom the Viaticum was carried, in order to leave Charity in the House if the Person stood in need of it. Through the Scarcity of the Times, the Poor being reduced to extreme Necessity, he cald the City by that pious Work of opening the Hospital of S. Juan without the Walls, where he provided with Food more than a thousand Poor, and likewise added out of his own Pocket many thousand Crowns, which served for maintaining the bashful Poor. In order to prevent that wicked Traffick which the common Whores made of the Virginity of their Daughters, in 1564. he promoted that other Work worthy of his Piety, which was the Foundation of the Church and Store-House of the Holy Ghost, where, if young Women taken from their ravenous Mothers, will stay, they are handiomey maintained, and, if they have a mind to marry, are provided with a suitable Portion. The Piety of this Minister shined much more in the Disputes he had with the Clergy, wherein, although by their imperious and impertinent Methods, they were like to have wore out his Patience, yet at the same time that he was vigorously maintaining the Rights and Prerogatives of his King, he used them with all the Mildness and Respect imaginable, and the Apostolical See with the utmost Reverence and Submission.

HIS Prudence was wonderful, and especially the Care and Concern he had for the Preservation and Security of the State was very commendable; he provided all the Cities of the Kingdom that were exposed to the Incursions of our implacable Enemies the Turks: For the greater Conveniency and Security of Commerce, he enlarged the Highways, and built many new and stately Bridges in the Kingdom. To him we owe the high Road that leads all the Way from Naples to Reggio; the other that goes through Puglia and Sambrino to the Borders of the Kingdom; and likewise that from Naples to Pozzuolo. To him we owe the famous Bridges of Cava, Doria, Fusaro, and of the River Cramo or Laguna, commonly called Ponte a Selce, betwixt the Cities of Aversa and Capua; the Bridge of Rocca at Capua near Castell; the Bridge of S. Andrew in the Territory of Ugento; and many others, which may be seen in the Inscriptions of many Marble Monuments erected in sundry Parts of the Kingdom in Honour of his Name. In fine, 'tis to him we owe the little Gate on the Road to Rome, and the Bound-Stones of Marble, distinguishing and separating the Limits of the Kingdom from those of the Estate of the Church of Rome, in order to prevent all Disputes for the future.

TO his Magnificence and Care we owe not only all this, but upon Occasions that offered while he was at the Head of our Government, his noble and truly generous Spirit made a shining Figure. He endeavoured, by a lugubrious Apparatus, and pompous Obsequies, to alleviate the never-enough to be lamented Death of the Prince D. Carlos, which happened on the 24th of July 1568. In Spain they were celebrated in a most sumptuous Manner, and upon Advice of it, the Duke D. Alfonso's Performance in Naples was nothing inferior, for in the Month of September the same Year, he caused to be erected in the Church of the Cross, near the Royal Palace, a stately Mausoleum with costly Ornaments, where he himself, and the greatest Part of the Nobility and People were present to bemoan the Loss of that Prince. Not long after, Queen Isabel, King Philip's Wife, being seized with a lingering Fever, in the 22d Year of her Age, being five Months gone with Child, at last in October the same Year 1568. died in Madrid, and was buried in the Escorial. The Duke D'Alcala, upon Advice of it, in the Month of November, with the same Magnificence and Pomp, caused the Obsequies to be celebrated in the same Church. And two Years after her Death, King Philip having married a fourth Wife, which was Anne of Austria, the eldest Daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, and of Mary his own Sister; upon the News of the Bride's Arrival in Spain, in the Month of May 1570. the Duke D'Alcala made sumptuous Feasts, and publick Illuminations for three Nights running. To his Liberality the City of Naples likewise owes that large Street which leads from the Capuan Gate to Poggio Reale. He likewise erected on the Point of the Mole, that formerly fine Fountain, adorned with white Marble, with four Statues representing the four Rivers of the World. It was also he that began those two pleasant and Royal Highways, which lead from the Magdalen Bridge to Salerno, and from the Capuan Gate to Capua.

THE many Statutes that he left us, are lasting Monuments of his Justice. Of all the Viceroys that have governed the Kingdom, he left us most Laws, which amount to a Hundred. The many Events and strange Adventures that happened in his Time, the Corruption of the Age, and the lost Discipline, obliged him by these Means, the best Way he could, to remedy the Dissoluteness and Wickedness of Men.

FROM 1559. the first Year of his Government, to the Month of March 1571. the Year of his Death, with great Judgment and Frudence he established very many Laws, whereby, among other Things, he checked the Rapacity of the Advocates, by taxing their Fees: He was careful that Tradesmen should be honest in their Dealings and Handworks; he had a watchful Eye over the Modesty of Women, most strictly forbidding Night-Ladders, and imposing the Pain of Death upon those who kissed Women against their Wills, even under Pretence of Marriage; he exterminated the Banditti; he punished false Coiners with Death; he re-established the Tribunal of the Vicariate; and it was he that ordered the Archbishops and Bishops of the Kingdom, to injoin the Parish-Priests, and such as had Benefices with the Cure of Souls, to keep Books, in which they were, from time to time, to enter the Names of those they Christened, in order to know their Ages, and likewise for the good Government of the State. He also reformed the Provinces of the Kingdom, and ordered publick Archives to be kept in them, and made other Provisions for the Polity of the Kingdom, which may be seen in our Pragmaticks; and to save the making a long Catalogue of them here, according to the Order of the Times in which they were made, they are to be found in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of the said Pragmaticks, according to the last Edition in 1715.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXIV.

ALTHOUGH King Philip II's Marriage with Queen Anne, his Niece, had been solemnized in Spain with great Pomp and Rejoycing, nevertheless it created both Wonder and Indignation in Men of Judgment: They were surprized, as Tbuanus ¹ says, how a King, reputed to be so wise, without any urgent Occasion, without having the least Prospect of Advantage by it for the Good of Peace, without Hopes of extending his Empire, whereby he could expect no Profit, but much Hatred, should, notwithstanding all that, have been at so much Pains to compass it. The bad Example likewise gave Offence, that the first among Christian Princes should take a Dispensation from the Pope for marrying the Daughter of his own Sister. And it proved to be such by the Event; for this Example that he set, was afterwards, in 1580. followed in his own Family by Ferdinand of Austria, the Son of the Emperor Ferdinand, who married Anna Catherine, the Daughter of William Duke of Mantua, and Eleanor his own Sister ²: But what afterwards gave greater Offence, was, that this very Example was at last followed by the Nobility, and even by the Commonalty ³. But however, of this Marriage, which after ten Years was dissolved by the Queen's Death, King Philip III. was born, who succeeded him in the Kingdom; for though she had had four Children, two of which, to wit, Lernando and Juana, who died before their Mother, and D. Diego, who died soon after her, at eight Years of Age, Philip being the only Child left alive, he was sole Heir.

IN the mean time, by the Death of the Duke D'Alcala, according to Custom, the Collateral Council, in which at that Time presided the Marquis of Trivice, had taken the Government of the Kingdom upon them, which they held but a few Days; for upon the News of the Duke's Death, Cardinal Granville, who was then in Rome, by Virtue of the Power given him by the King, went immediately to Naples. By the continual Advices which King Philip had of the Duke's Indisposition, and the small Hopes of his Recovery, he had ordered the Cardinal, upon the first Notice of his Death, to go to Naples, and take the Government of that Kingdom upon him, which accordingly he did; so that on the 19th of April this Year 1571. he was received at the Mole with the usual Pomp of a Bridge, and as one, from whom, on account of the Fame of his great Knowledge and Prudence, much Good was expected; whose Government we are now going to relate.

C H A P. I.

Of the Government of D. Anthony Perenotte, Cardinal De Granville, and of the most remarkable Events in his Time: His Departure, and the Laws he left us.

HIS Minister, of whom we have discoursed elsewhere under the Name of the Bishop of Arras, was the Son of Nicholas Perenotte, Lord of Granville, a Burgundian by Birth, and first Counsellor to the Emperor Charles V. In his Youth having applied himself to the Study of Learning, he succeeded to Admiration; so that by the Favour of Charles V. on account of his Erudition, and the Merits of his Father, he was made Bishop of Arras: And being a very active and knowing Man, he was afterwards employed in Embassies in England and France; and he was in so great Favour and Esteem with the Emperor, that when he resigned the Crown to King Philip his Son, he gave him this Prelate to be his Adviser in the good Government of his Dominions. Being afterwards made Cardinal and Archbishop of Mechlin, he had the Charge of the most weighty Affairs of the Low Countries, under the Government of the Dutchess of Parma, the King's natural Sister; but being hated by that People, who could not bear his Rigour, which was not fit to be made use of in those ticklish Times, King Philip thought fit to recall him to his Court in Spain. There, by reason of his great Ability, he was employed in the most serious and weighty Affairs of the Monarchy. He went afterwards to Rome, where, as we have said, he remained by the King's Order, that he might be near at Hand to go and succeed the Duke D'Alcala in the Government of the Kingdom.

AT this Time nothing disquieted the Viceroy and the Neapolitans so much, as the continual Alarms given them by the IncurSIONS of the Turks; therefore all Means possible was thought of in order to prevent them. There was no fear of being attacked from other Countries, especially France, then so much taken up with their own Miseries and Revolutions. There was no Occasion to be afraid of Intestine Commotions; the Provinces being freed from the Banditti, were all in Peace and Tranquillity; only the frequent and sudden IncurSIONS of the Turks, our implacable and cruel Enemies, upon the Sea Coast, disturbed them.

THE Viceroy had yet another troublesome Affair upon his Hands ; King Philip, besides the War he was obliged to maintain against the Turk for the Defence of his Dominions in Italy, by the too rigid and haughty Conduct of his Ministers, was at this Time engaged in another War, no less cruel than chargeable, in the Low Countries, where there was not Money sufficient to support it.

SPAIN began to lose its Strength, and be desolate, by reason of the many Garrisons it maintained both at Home and Abroad, such as in Naples, Sicily, the Dutchy of Milan, but above all in Flanders, where, besides the Garrisons, it was obliged to maintain numerous Armies. It was likewise dispeopled and exhausted by the many Colonies that were sent to the Indies ; by the Unfitness of the Spaniards for drawing Traffick and Commerce to their Sea Ports, much less to their Inland Cities ; by the little Care they took of Agriculture, insomuch, that though their Fields were both spacious and fertile, yet, through the Scarcity of Husbandmen, and Laziness, they were not sufficiently cultivated : Whence proceeded an extreme Want of Money, and an Inability of supporting so great Charges. Wherefore King Philip, being obliged to bear the Expences of so great a War, began to make bold with the Funds of his Royal Patrimony, by selling the Excise, and pledging the Revenues of the Custom-Houses, and all the other Emoluments belonging to the Crown, to Italians, and particularly to the Genoese ; to whom, for the Loan of considerable Sums, he paid most extravagant Interest : Whence likewise, in order to satisfy the Creditors, proceeded the Alienation of the Cities and Lands of the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the Sale of Honours and Titles of Count, Marquis, Duke, and even that of Prince ; endeavouring by these Titles, without Substance, the best Way he could, to stop the Mouths of his Creditors.

ADD to this, that the Spaniards would not suffer one Farthing to go out of Spain for the Support of the Wars of Flanders and Italy, nor would they contribute to any Thing but the Defence of their own Country. The Mines of the Indies were in a manner exhausted by their Avarice, and much more by their not knowing how to make a right Use of them. There was nothing to be expected from Flanders, where a cruel War was raging, and all Commerce being interrupted, the Revenues of those Provinces were scarce sufficient for paying the Soldiers. To all this was added, some Years after, the War of Portugal, for which our Kingdom was also forced to give Donatives ; and the King went on, more than ever, alienating his Royal Demains, and the Revenues of the Crown.

THE Kingdom of Naples therefore, was, above all the rest, reserved for supplying those great Charges ; whence the pressing and continual Demands of Donatives and Taxes ; whence, in Time, the King was reduced to that Extremity, that, the Excise being sold, the Customs, and all the Revenues of the Crown pledged, there was little left him : So that in order to raise the Sums necessary for the Defence of the Kingdom, there was a Necessity of laying on new Taxes and Duties, and our Citizens were obliged to buy their own Chains never to be shaken off. Lordships, Fiefs, and Titles were made Subjects of Derision, and not given for the Merit of Virtue, but for Money ; and whence, in fine, proceeded, the so many Mischiefs and Disorders which shall be taken Notice of in the following Books of this History.

AMONGST the principal Anxieties therefore that disquieted our Viceroy, that of their being so frequently importuned, by the pressing Instances of the King, to raise Money in this Kingdom for Supporting so great Wars, was no less grievous than those occasioned by the Turk. Nor were they less disquieted by the insolent Behaviour of the Clergy, who endeavoured to incroach upon the King's Jurisdiction and Royal Prerogatives.

IN the mean time, Cardinal Granville having taken Possession of the Government of this Kingdom, as far as his own Circumstances, and those of the Times would bear, did not neglect in every Thing, and particularly in these three Cases, to employ all his Parts, and all his Vigour and Prudence.

THE Ottoman Power in these Times was become formidable, not only to the neighbouring, but to the remote Princes, and Italy was in Danger of falling under its Yoke ; for which Cause, the Politicians of best Judgment, and those who were well acquainted with the Strength of so powerful an Enemy, and the Extent of his overgrown Empire, did not fail to exclaim against the Christian Princes, in order to rouse them out of their long Lethargy, and by letting them see their imminent Danger, encouraged them to a glorious Union for crushing so great Power. Among the rest, we read in the Works of Scipio Ammiratus ¹, a long Discourse directed to the Princes of Christendom, wherein he lays their Danger before them, and exhorts them to enter into the League. But none was more zealous and warm for the Cause than Pope Pius V. who, after several Legations, concluded that famous League, of which Don J. Inghiera, the natural Son of the Emperor Charles V. was chosen Generalissimo, who, though but a Youth of Twenty-one Years of Age, had given great Proof of his Valour against the Moors in the Kingdom of Granada.

THIS Prince arrived at Naples on the 9th of August this Year 1571. where he was received by Cardinal Granville with the greatest Marks of Respect, and by the Napolitans with such Honours as were due to so great a Personage. The Gallies of Italy and Naples joined his Fleet; and besides a great many Spaniards, he was accompanied in this famous Expedition by the chief Barons, and many Noblemen of the City and Kingdom. The Turks, on the other Hand, were scouring the Archipelago with a most powerful Fleet, and after having pillaged the Cities of Buda, Belgrade, and Constantinople, they came in Sight of Cattaro; therefore to prevent their advancing further into that Gulph, at the Instance of the Pope and the Venetians for joining of the Fleet, D. John set sail from Naples on the 20th of August, and on the 24th arrived at Messina, where he found the Pope's Gallies, those of the Venetians, some Genoise, three Maltefe, and as many of the Duke of Savoy's. There was an Account soon after of the Loss of Tamagosa, whereupon it was resolved, without Loss of Time, to fight the Enemy; and the Turks having taken the same Resolution, the two Fleets set sail for that Purpose, without knowing one another's Intentions. Thus they went in quest of one another, till on the 7th of October they came in Sight, and met, just as the Christians had got clear of the Rocks of Cirzolari, and as the Turks had doubled Cape Metelegni. The two Fleets engaged with equal Boldness, and after an obstinate Fight, the Christians gained the Victory, to the inestimable Loss and great Reproach of the Turks. This was that famous Victory, which having happened on the first Sunday of October, on which Day the Dominicans were wont to celebrate the Rosary with Processions, gave Occasion to Pope Pius, and Gregory his Successor, both of the same Order, in Memory of so glorious a Victory, to appoint over all the Catholick World a solemn Feast of the Rosary, to be celebrated every Year on that Day; which is still kept up with great Pomp and Magnificence; and it was likewise the Occasion of erecting Churches and Hospitals in Naples under the Name of S. Maria della Vittoria.

THE Defeat was considerable; for, besides the taking of the Bassa and other Generals of Note Prisoners, of a Fleet of little less than 300 Sail, scarce 40 escaped, above 100 were sunk, and as many taken. D. John returned to Italy, and having made a triumphal Entry into Messina, he remained there, and the other Generals set sail for Naples, where, on the 18th of November they arrived, and brought with them Prisoners Mahomet Sangiac of Negropont, with two Sons of Ali, the Captain-General of the Sea, who had been killed in the Battle. The Bassa, with the youngest of the two Brothers, the other having died of Grief in Naples, were carried to the Pope, and being put into the Castle of S. Angelo, they were civilly treated.

THE following Year 1572. was not so prosperous to the Confederates as was expected from this Victory; for a new War being likely to break out with France, on account of the Revolutions in Flanders, did not allow King Philip and his General D. John, to give so great Assistance to the Confederates as was necessary. To this was added the Loss of Pope Pius, who died on the first Day of May this Year. To him succeeded Ugo Boncompagni, called Gregory XIII. who, though he was as much for the Continuation of the League as his Predecessor, yet being a Novice at such Expeditions, and the Turks shunning all Opportunities of fighting, the Year passed without making such Progress as was expected.

IN the mean time, by the Death of Pope Pius, Cardinal Granville being obliged to go to Rome to assist in the Conclave, D. Diego Simanca, Bishop of Badajoz, was left Lieutenant of the Kingdom; but his Government was of short Duration, for Gregory, the new Pope, being chosen on the 13th of May, the Cardinal returned to Naples on the 19th of the same Month, and resumed the Government, with the troublesome Cares; for he was no sooner arrived, than he was obliged to send to Messina the Squadron of Gallies with the Spanish Soldiers of the Garison of Naples, and 5000 Italians, commanded by D. Oratio Aquaviva, the Son of the Duke of Atri, to oppose the Turks. There likewise went from Naples many noble Volunteers of different Nations, among which there were seventy Neapolitans, under the Command of the Duke of Atri their General. In the mean time the Season advancing, and the Enemy's Resolution not to fight being known, in the Month of November this Year, D. John of Austria returned to Naples, where he was entertained all that Winter with continual Feasts and Tournaments, till the Spring of the next Year, when it was thought fit to make ready for a new Expedition.

THIS Year 1573. while D. John and Cardinal Granville were wholly intent upon furnishing the Fleet with Necessaries for an Expedition to the Levant, News came, that the Venetians, by the Mediation of the King of France, had concluded a Peace with the Turk, upon shameful Conditions, which afforded Pope Gregory Matter of Complaint, and King Philip no small Jealousy, who seeing, that the Turks were at a great deal of Pains to get the Duke of Anjou, the King of France's Brother, elected King of Poland, was afraid that the Venetians and French had a Mind to join in a League against him. The Venetians, in order to justify themselves, sent Ambassadors to the Pope and King Philip, representing that it was Necessity had forced them to make Peace¹.

AS soon as this Peace was published, the King, unwilling to keep his Troops idle, resolved upon an Expedition to Africa, whereupon he ordered D. John of Austria to attack Tunis. This Prince set out from Naples with his Fleet towards Messina, where he arrived in two Days; from thence pursuing his Voyage, he arrived at Goletta, where he landed his Troops, and marched directly for Tunis, of which City (it being unprovided of a Garison) he soon made himself Master, without striking a Stroke; but for all that he allowed his Soldiers to plunder it; and having built a new Fort, he left in it, with the Title of Viceroy, Mahomet, the Son of Affano, and Brother of Amida, whom he made Prisoner, being justly suspected by the Spaniards, and more by the Turks, and hated by the Tunefins, because he had most inhumanely murdered his own Father Affano. He sent Amida, with his two Sons, Prisoner to Palermo, who, by the Way, having understood, that Mahomet his Brother, whom he so much hated, had been left Viceroy of that Kingdom, fell into such a Rage, that had he not been prevented by Amida his Son, he had thrown himself into the Sea. In the mean time, for the better Security of that Kingdom, Biserta was likewise taken; and the Winter Season drawing near, D. John returned to Sicily, and from thence to Naples, whither he carried Amida and his two Sons with him, and sent them Prisoners to the Castle of S. Ermo. Thuanus says², that the Year following 1574. he, accompanied by Paul de Foix, having been sent to Italy to return Thanks to the Venetians, the Pope, and the other Princes of Italy, who had sent Ambassadors to France to congratulate the King upon his Brother's being elected King of Poland, after having visited the principal Cities of Italy, he likewise went to Naples, where he was curious to see Amida and his two Sons. The Governor of the Castle very courteously introduced him to Amida, who, by his Countenance, seemed to be about eighty Years of Age; and having had the Curiosity to ask the Governor how he passed his Time, he told him, that for all his being so old, there was not a Night but he had his black Concubine in Bed with him; that of the two Sons he loved the Ugliest, who was likewise lame, keeping him always in his Chamber with him; that he hated the other, though very handsome and lively, and on that account was in great Favour with the Spaniards, who allowed him to walk freely up and down the City, ride, and run at Tilt; and, if the State of Affairs had not altered afterwards, he would have succeeded his Uncle Mahomet in the Viceroyalty of Tunis, which was thought would have continued for a long time under the Monarchy of Spain.

BUT these fine Hopes soon vanished; for at the same time that Cardinal Granville was celebrating, with Carrouzels, Bull Feasts, and Tournaments in Naples, the safe Return of D. John, and the Birth of Fernando the King's first Son, News was brought, that the Turks were scowering our Seas, had advanced as far as the Cape of Otranto, and had pillaged the small City of Casiro; and this new Year 1574 having driven our Men out of Tunis, they had made themselves Masters of that Kingdom; for on the 23d of August this Year, Goletta having fallen into their Hands, on the 13th of September, the City of Tunis, with the Fort built by D. John, were taken, and Pedro Portocarrero, and Gabriel Sorbellon made Prisoners; both which Places they demolished from the Foundation, to prevent our ever attempting to recover them. Thus an End was put to the great Labour undergone for this Kingdom of Tunis, which being conquered by Charles V. and, at vast Charges and Trouble, maintained for the Space of forty Years by his Son Philip, was at last, without Hopes of ever recovering it, lost.

THESE anxious Cares rendered the Government of Cardinal Granville very troublesome; for to ward off the Mischiefs that were to be feared from so powerful an Enemy, required all his Vigilance and Foresight. He was the first that put in Practice in the Kingdom, the new Militia called Del Battaglione; it was composed of Soldiers, which, proportionable to the Number of Families, each Corporation of the Kingdom was obliged to furnish: They had no Pay in Time of Peace, but only some Franchises, and in Time of War they were paid as the other Troops; their Number was considerable, amounting to Twenty-five, sometimes to Thirty thousand Men; they had their Captains and other lesser Officers, but at present there is no Vestige of this Militia. We have no more Soldiers, we are all Pagans, and the War is now confined to Strangers, who govern us; the Arms are in their Hands, and to us only is left the Glory of obeying.

TO supply such great Wants required earnest Attention; the King solicited the Cardinal, and demanded frequent Subsidies and Donatives. The Viceroy, in order to draw in the People, and to find Ways and Means for raising them without Difficulty or Grumbling, first put in Execution all the Favours and Privileges, which in the Year 1570. were granted by King Philip to the City and Kingdom. Then, encouraged by the Presence of D. John of Austria, having demonstrated to the Barons the urgent Occasion of the War that out of cruel Necessity they were obliged to maintain against so formidable an Enemy, who threatened to enslave the Kingdom, on the first of November 1572. he called a General Parliament to be held in S. Lorenzo, of which Cesare di Gennaro, a Nobleman of Porto, was Syndick, (Speaker) and a Donative of a Million and One hundred thousand Ducats was given¹. Afterwards, upon Advice of the Loss of Tunis and its Forts, in 1574. another Parliament was called, of which Gianluigi Carmignano, a Nobleman of Montagna, was Syndick, and the King got another Donative of a Million and Two hundred thousand Ducats. 'Tis said, that D. John pretending to have a particular Present from the City for himself, the Cardinal, commiserating the Distress of the Neapolitans, dextrously prevented it; whence proceeded that Disgust between them, which occasioned the Cardinal's being recalled to Spain, as shall be told: Such was the Distress, which the Expeditions to Tunis, and the Wars against the Turks brought upon the Neapolitans. Summonte, a cotemporary Writer with these Events, says, that the Supporting the Fort of Goletta, sucked the very Marrow of the Neapolitans; for whenever there was a Scarcity of any Sort of Commodity, all the Blame was laid upon the maintaining that Fort: So that if the Price of Corn and Wine was raised, or if Salt Fish or Flesh could not be got, or if Oyl was sold at a dear Rate, all was said to have been occasioned by providing Goletta, and so of all other Necessaries of Life, and even the Price of Charcoal was raised, insomuch that it seemed as if that Fort had swallowed up every Thing; for through the Greediness of the tyrannical Ministers, every Thing was sent out of Naples under pretence of furnishing Goletta, but afterwards was carried elsewhere.

IN fine, Cardinal Granville had the Court of Rome to struggle with, in opposing their Incroachments upon the King's Jurisdiction and Prerogatives. They constantly pursued their Point in the old Manner, and, as Experience hath always shewed, one Pope was no sooner dead, than his Successor still harped on the same String, and, perhaps, out-did his Predecessor; thus Pius V. dying, Gregory his Successor, following his Steps, did not fail to imitate him; but the Viceroy's Steadiness was commendable, who, though a Cardinal, opposed him vigorously. With respect to all the abovementioned Points about Jurisdiction, he followed the Example of the Duke D'Alcala, but in that of the Causæ Mixtæ, upon an Occasion that offered, he very much out-did him. The Ecclesiasticks reckoned, that the Crime of Sacrilege belonged to the Forum mistum, and therefore was liable to Prevention: It happened that a Thief, after having stolen some sacred Furniture out of the Cathedral Church of Naples, succeeding so well that Time, ventured to do the same out of the Church of S. Lorenzo; but the Monks of that Convent having caught him in the Fact, after drubbing him soundly, delivered him over to Mario Caraffa, then Judge of the Archbishop's Court, who put him in his own Prison, and pretended, though the Thief was a Laick, to take Cognizance of the Crime, as having got the Start of the Royal Judges. The Viceroy required the Archbishop and his Vicar several times to deliver up the Thief to the King's Judges, to whom it belonged to take Cognizance of that Crime; but these Demands proved all fruitless, so that the Archbishop obstinately refusing to deliver him up, the Viceroy was forced to send the Attorney-General, with the Sbirri, to break open the Prison of the Archbishoprick, and seize the Thief. The Archbishop caused his Vicar to excommunicate all those who had a Hand in executing the Viceroy's Orders, the Employers, the Consenters, and all that were present at the Action, and caused Copies of it to be posted upon all the publick Places of the City. The Viceroy was even with him; for in the first Place he caused the Copies to be covered with Paper, and daubed over with Ink; he caused the Thief to be immediately tried, and, on the 10th of March 1573. he was hanged in the Square of S. Lorenzo; he ordered the Vicar to be gone out of Naples within 24 Hours, and so to go on till he should be out of the Kingdom, and not to return till his or the King's further Orders, which was immediately obeyed: The Beadles that had posted up the Copies were put in Prison; the Counsellors, the Advocate and Chancellor of the Archiepiscopal Court, being all Laicks, were all likewise imprisoned; and in fine, all the Archbishop's Revenues, even his Patrimonial, were sequestered. Which being done, on the 25th of the same Month of March, he wrote a full Account of all that had passed to King Philip, who, on the 13th of July the same Year, answered him, not only approving of what he had done in Maintenance of his Right, but charged him, that for the future, he should take care to preserve his Jurisdiction so, as that it may not suffer the least Prejudice upon any Account whatsoever; and by his Prudence and good Management, to take care that none of the Regents, nor other Officers, pretended to be excommunicated on that Account, go to Rome for Absolution, as the late Pope pretended in the Case of those of the Senate of Milan. He likewise wrote the same Day to D. Juan de Zuniga, his Ambassador in Rome, who had also given his Majesty an Account of what had happened, ordering him vigorously to expostulate the Matter with the Pope; and if he should be obliged to yield the Point of Absolution, and that the Excommunicated must be absolved, yet for all that, he would not have his Holiness to think, that any of the Regents of Naples, or the other Officers, ought to go to Rome for that Purpose, because that would quite overthrow the Authority of his Ministers'.

POPE Gregory, on the other Hand, ordered his Nuncio residing in Naples, smartly to expostulate the Matter with the Cardinal, and even to threaten him; but by the Mediation of the Ambassador Zuniga, and by the Means of Persons of Credit, and especially of the President of the S. C. Giovan-Andrea di Curte, a Minister of great Weight and Prudence, Matters were adjusted, and this Medium was fallen upon; that all those who had been excommunicated upon that Account, should be privately absolved in the Treasury-Chamber, and so the Affair was dropt.

AFTER that Cardinal Granville had so well discharged his Duty in the Government of this Kingdom, and now when Matters were somewhat set to rights, more Good being still expected from his Integrity and Prudence, we were robbed of him by an Order of King Philip, who called him to his Court in Spain to greater Honours, having made him his Counsellor of State, and President of the Supreme Council of Italy. It was reported, that D. John of Austria, for the abovementioned Reason, had procured his Removal, in order to have the Duke of Sessa put in his Place; but though at his Desire the King removed the Cardinal, yet, being jealous of D. John's Authority, on account of the chief Command he had of the Fleet, instead of sending his Favourite to Naples, he sent thither the Marquis of Mondejar, whom D. John hated. The Cardinal left Naples in the Beginning of July this Year 1575. having governed the Kingdom a few Months more than four Years. He left us 40 Pragmaticks, all wise and prudent, which still are so many Monuments of his excellent Talents. He severely prohibited the carrying of any Sort of short Weapons: He ordered that Deeds between the Living, such as last Wills, should be penned by none but by Royal Notaries only; he enjoined a strict Secrecy in the Ministers; he commanded, that no Porter, Trumpet, or Servant of the Palace, or of any of the Ministers, should go through the City to ask new Years Gifts, under the Pain of four Lashes of a Rope: He forbid the Ministers to ask, either for their Relations, or others, Benefices or Prebends, or Offices from Barons, without the express Licence of the Viceroy. He forbid Ecclesiastical Persons, though they were Knights of Jerusalem, to exercise Royal or Baronage Offices, either in the City of Naples or the Kingdom; that no Person should play at any Game for more than ten Ducats in one Day: He prohibited all usurious Contracts; and he made other wholesome Laws, which, according to the Order of Time, may be found in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Pragmaticks.

* Chiocc. tom. 5. M.S. de Casib. Missis.

C H A P. II.

Of D. Innigo Lopes Hurtado de Mendoza, Marquis of Mondéjar: His unhappy Conduct, and the Laws he left us.

THE Marquis of Mondéjar, who arrived in Naples on the 10th of July this Year 1575. not having narrowly inquired into the Characters of those, who immediately upon his Arrival, offered him their Assistance and Advice in the Government of the Kingdom, and crept into his Favour, made it soon to be discovered, that his Government would prove quite the Reverse of that of his wise and prudent Predecessor; for, by the Insinuation of these Flatterers, it was not long before he revoked many good Regulations made by Cardinal Granvelle: A most imprudent Conduct, for the Cardinal, as 'tis common to all Men to have a favourable Opinion of the Productions of their own Brains, offended at these Reforms, kept a watchful Eye over all his Actions. Whereupon the Marquis, sensible of his Error, resolved to amend it, but he applied a Remedy that proved worse than the Disease. There was at this Time at Court, as Provincial Regent of this Kingdom, one Scipio Cutnari, originally come from Antwerp, a Man of good Learning, cunning and ambitious; he, being bribed by the Marquis, advised him of the most secret Transactions of the Council of Italy, and of whatever the Cardinal spoke against him: As a Reward for this Service, he had prevailed upon the Viceroy to send to the King a false Account of his fictitious and boasted Nobility; by Virtue of which he obtained many Favours and Prerogatives from the King, and in particular a Power of chusing to be a Nobleman of any of the five Segni he should think fit. But that served only to discover the Imposture to the King and Council; for he having pitched upon the Segni of Naples, and the Viceroy, contrary to the Inclinations of the Nobility of that Segni, employing all his Interest to have him received, put them upon dispatching a Person to Madrid to represent the fabulous Genealogy sent by the Viceroy. Cardinal Granvelle favoured the Message, and having fully informed the King of it, his Majesty was no less displeased with the Cheat than with the Viceroy, insomuch that he revoked the Privilege, and ordered the Regent to be put in Prison, where he died soon soon after, and his Brother to be confined in Castel-nuovo, from whence, after a tedious Imprisonment, he was banished to Torre del Greco, where he ended his Days.

BUT besides, the little Correspondence the Viceroy kept with D. John of Austria, was a certain Presage of an unhappy and short Government. D. John still continued to divert himself in Naples with Feasts and Tournaments; and, as he had the supreme Command of the Fleet, the Neapolitans paid him the greatest Honours, insomuch that he made such a shining Figure, that the Viceroy was quite eclipsed: The Marquis, not able to dissemble, and much less suffer this, there arose great Heart-burnings and Disgusts between them, which came to such a Height, that D. John, upon a certain Occasion, did not stick to call him a Breaker of his Word; whereupon the Viceroy answering, that he would acquaint the King with his Insolence, D. John drew his Dagger, and run at him with a Design to stab him, which he certainly would have done, if the By-standers, by Prayers and Intreaties, had not pacified him.

THESE unhappy Adventures, and the Enmity betwixt him and Cardinal Granville and D. John of Austria, had that Effect, that whenever any Thing happened during his Government, it was not imputed to his Care, but, either to Chance, or the Prudence and good Management of others, or to a Miracle. This was evident upon two Occasions. This Year of the Jubilee 1575. by reason of the great Confluence of People that flocked from all Parts to Rome, so cruel a Pestilence was brought into Italy, that, except that which in the Year 1528. in the Time of Lautrech's Expedition, so much afflicted Naples, a greater had not been seen. From Trent, where it first broke out, it went to Verona, from thence to Venice, and at last it spread itself over all as far as Sicily. The most famous Physicians of those Times, such as Andrea Graziolo of Salona, Alessandro Canobio of Padua, and Antonio Gliscens of Brescia, maintained, that the Infection was owing, neither to the Influence of the Stars, nor the Malignity of the Air, nor the Concourse of Strangers, but that it was bred in the Cities themselves, from the Sluttishness and Dirtiness of Private-Houses. However that may be, Trent was left in a manner desolate, Verona was little better; and the Year following 1576. it made so cruel and lamentable a Slaughter in Venice, that it was computed above 70,000 Persons died. The two famous Physicians Girelamo Mercuriale of Forli, and Girelamo Caporacco of Padua, were blamed for this Destruction, whose Assistance and Advice being asked by the Senate, and they judging the Disease not to be Pestilential, but that it could be cured, occasioned, that the Infected were not, as had been begun to be done, carried out of the City to a Place apart, they exposing themselves (as by their Example, all the other Physicians and Surgeons did) to take care of the Sick. But the Disease increased to that Degree, and raging more furiously, in a short time it dispatched not only the Sick but Fifty-eight Physicians and Surgeons appointed for their Cure. Mercuriale and Caporacco did not mind their own Danger, but with Intrepidity for some time went on in applying their Remedies amongst the Infected; but at length, having asked Liberty of the Senate, they scampered away. In Milan, Cremenza, and Pavia, the Piety and Vigilance of the Cardinals Carlo Borromeo, Nicolo Sfondrato, and Ippolito Rossi, the Bishops of these Cities, were much commended, who with great Zeal and Intrepidity visited the Sick, and gave them their Assistance. After the Example of Borromeo, Agostino Valerio Bishop of Verona did the same, which City, as well as Padua, was most miserably afflicted. The Distemper spread itself as far as Sicily, and made a cruel Slaughter in Messina, and by the continual Commerce all our other Provinces were in Danger. Now the provident Care of the Marquis of Mondovì appeared, for he not only, by most severe Edicts, prohibited all Persons coming from infected Places to enter the Kingdom, but he caused the Gates of the City of Naples to be shut, and none were suffered to enter without the necessary Bills of Health from the Places they came from; he used extreme Rigour, even upon the least Suspicion; he caused many Bales of Cotton, that had come from Abroad, to be burnt in Naples; and he made a Bark that had come from Calabria to be burnt in the Harbour, though loaded with Bales of Silk, without any Regard to the great Loss of the Merchants: So that the City of Naples, and the Kingdom, were freed from that dreadful Plague, which was not quite extinguished in Italy till the following Year 1577. But all this was attributed, not to the provident Care of the Viceroy, but partly to the Foresight of the City of Naples, and much more to the Intercession of S. Januarius, and the other Saints its Protectors¹.

MORE OVER, Amurat the Emperor of the Turks, pursuing the Designs of his Predecessors, made his Fleet scowre our Seas: This Year 1576. his famous Admiral Ulzali began to pillage the Coast of Puglia; but being repulsed by some Horse and Foot sent thither by the Viceroy, he left that Coast, and sailed towards Calabria, where he landed his Troops near Trebisaccia, wasted the Country, and was carrying off many of the People into Slavery; they were likewise beat back, and forced to leave their Booty: But all this was ascribed to the Vigilance, Readiness, and Valour of Niccolo Bernardine, Prince of Bisignano, who, as *Thuanus*² writes, coming opportunely as they were imbarcking with 600 Horse, and 200 Musqueteers, forced them to leave their Prey, made 40 Prisoners, and killed above 50 of them.

TWO Accidents which happened some time after, and shall now be related, added to the Viceroy's Disquiet, insomuch that being hated by the Nobility and Commons, he was at last recalled to Spain by the King, and obliged to set out in the Middle of Winter. The first was, his giving Ear to a Friar, who, having been drawn in by the Promises of some covetous Merchants, insinuated to him, that for the Use of the common People, Bread could be made of the Meal of Corn, mixed with that of the Herb which the Botanists call Aren, and the Common

* In English People Calfs-Fest *, which is looked upon to be so nourishing, that Julius Cæsar maintained his Army with it in Albania. This Project seemed to be very advantageous and useful, not only for keeping low the Price of Corn, but would bring in great Profit to the King; but this Design had no sooner taken Air amongst the Commonalty, accustomed to eat Bread of pure Corn, than they, spurred on by the Nobility, who bore the Viceroy a Grudge, on account of the late Dispute about receiving Regent Cutani into their Number, openly declared, that they would not obey him in that; the Viceroy therefore seeing their Stedfastness and Obstinacy, in order to pacify them, dropt the Project. The other made a greater Noise in the World, and gave the finishing Stroke to his Removal: It was this; D. Anna-Clarice Caraffa, the Daughter of the first Marriage of D. Antonio Caraffa, Duke of Mendragone, by D. Ippolita Gonzaga, was in the Monastery of S. Sebastian for her Education, and for want of Heirs Male, being Heiress of all the paternal Estate, her Father had appointed her to be married to the Count of Serrano, the eldest Son of the Duke of Nocera, who was of the same Family; but the Prince of Stigliano, Grandfather of the young Lady by the Father's Side, unwilling to have his Family extinguished, married, though Old, D. Lucrezia del Tufè, of the Family of the Marquises of Lavello, and by this Lady had a Son, whom he designed to be Heir of that Estate, which divided the Family of Caraffa into two powerful Factions. On the other Hand, the Viceroy, flattering himself that he might be able to make Advantage by these Disputes, had contrived a Design to marry this Lady to D. Lorenzo Hurtado de Mendoza, Count of Tendilla, his eldest Son; and foreseeing the Difficulties he would probably meet with, under pretence of examining into her Inclinations, he resolved to take her out of the Monastery, and put her in a Place proper for his Design; and to compass this, seeing that all other Methods would be in vain, he thought fit not only to use Diligence, but Force; therefore he sent three Regents, with the Secretary of the Kingdom, and 150 Spaniards to bring the Lady out of the Monastery. This unlooked-for and scandalous Action moved the Nuns to take a very odd and noble Resolution; for all of them in a Body, with D. Clarice, whom they cloathed in a Nun's Habit, drawn up in order, and singing Psalms, with the Relicks of such Saints as they preserved in their Hands, caused the Gate of the Cloister to be opened, and met these Ministers, who being surprized at so uncommon a Sight, fell on their Knees, adored the Relicks, and immediately left the Convent. D. Clarice was privately conveyed to the House of D. Giovanni di Cordero, and according to her Father's Appointment, was privately married to the Count of Serrano, as she herself afterwards declared to the Collateral Council. Although this Action of the Viceroy had offended only these two principal Branches of the Family of Caraffa, which at this Time were the Prince of Stigliano, and the Duke of Noera, now extinct, yet it incensed against him the numerous noble Progeny of that Family, who, adding this to the old Grudges, sent Gianantonio Carbone, Marquis of Padula, to Madrid, to complain of it to King Philip. The Message was backed by Cardinal Granville, and the Complaint being laid before the King, he immediately resolved to recall him; and he ordered D. Juan de Zuniga, who had been a long time his Ambassador in Rome, without loss of Time, to go and take the Government of Naples upon him: So that on the 8th of November 1579. the Marquis was obliged to set out, and expose himself to a Sea Voyage in the severest time of that Winter. He set sail with two Gallies, accompanied rather with his own Repentance, and the Tears of his Relations, than with the Blessings of the Neapolitans, among whom, according to *Summonte*¹, he left a very bad Reputation of himself.

ALTHOUGH the abovementioned Adventures had brought the Hatred of every Body upon him, yet during the four Years and four Months that his Government lasted, he left us some Monuments, no less for the Good of Naples, than the King's Service. In his Time the King got three Donatives; one in November 1575. a little after his Arrival, when, upon Advice of the Birth of D. Diego, King Philip's second Son, a Parliament met in S. Lorenzo, wherein presided as Syndick, Gianfrancesco di Gaeta, a Nobleman of the Seggio of Perto, and gave the King a Donative of a Million²; another of a Million and Two hundred thousand Ducats was given by a Parliament which met in February 1577. of which Giangirolamo Mirmile, of the Seggio of Portanova, was Syndick; and the Third of the like Sum was given by the Parliament held the 23d of April 1579. for supporting the War of Flanders, of which Parliament, Fabrizio Stendardo, of the Seggio of Montagna, was Syndick.

IN 1577. he began the Fabrick of the new Arsenal on the Descent of S. Lucia, where it stands to this Day, under the Direction of Friar Vincenzo Casali, of the Order of Servites, a famous Architect of these Times. He had likewise begun to make the necessary Provisions for fitting out a Fleet against the Infidels; for which End Fr. Vincenzo Caraffa, Prior of Hungary, and Carlo Spinelli, were raising 3000 Foot Soldiers, and 4000 Pioncers, in order to join them to all the Forces of Italy, and to make one Body under the Command of Pietro di Medici, Brother to the Grand Duke of Tuscany; but this noble Design was dropt by his sudden Removal. In his Time, the Birth of Philip, the King's fourth Son by Queen Anne, born the 27th of April 1578. and who succeeded his Father, was celebrated with great Magnificence and Pomp.

THIS Minister likewise left us Twenty-four Pragmaticks, in which there are many prudent and commendable Provisions. He prohibited Gaming Houses under most severe Penalties; he suppressed the Importing of Counterband Goods; he laid down a Rule to the Tribunals concerning suspected Ministers; he ordered that Ministers should not contract Spiritual Relation, by being Godfathers at Christenings or Confirmations; and he made other wholesome Regulations for the good Government of the City and Kingdom, which, according to the Order of Time, may be seen in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Pragmaticks, printed in 1715.

Of the most remarkable Things that happened during the Government of D. Juan de Zuniga, Great Commendator of Castile, and Prince of Pietraperfia: His Conduct, and the Laws he left us.

JUAN ZUNIGA, a second Son of the Family of Miranda, of whom we had frequently Occasion to discourse in the preceding Book, when being Ambassador in Rome for many Years during the Government of the Duke D'Alcala, he so well managed the important Affairs about Jurisdiction, that he acquired the Reputation of consummate Prudence, and a sufficient Knowledge of the Affairs of our Kingdom; insomuch, that being pitched upon by King Philip to be Viceroy, he soon became acquainted with our Laws and Customs. The Choice therefore met with a general Approbation, and every Body promised themselves a happy Government from his known Prudence and Capacity. Nor did he fail to answer Expectation; for having arrived at Naples the 11th of November this Year 1579. he gave evident Proofs of his Magnificence and Piety, in refusing that vain Pomp of a Bridge ordinarily made for all Viceroys, which would have cost the City 1500 Crowns, but it was better bestowed upon the Hospital of the Incurables¹.

The Expedition of Portugal.

THE great Events that happened in this Viceroy's Time, rendered his Government very remarkable; while he governed the Kingdom the Expedition to Portugal was undertaken, in which he had some Share with respect to Men and Money, which by his Care and good Management, were sent from the Kingdom for that Enterprize. The History of the War of Portugal, made by King Philip II. as one of the Pretenders to that Kingdom, has been so well written by *Thuanus*¹, Bacon of *Verulam*², and other famous Authors, that besides its not being to our Purpose, it would be spending of Time idly to transcribe it at large from these Writers. We shall only take notice of some Events, in which our Countrymen, and Zuniga who governed them, had some Share.

KING Edward dying in 1521. left four Sons, John, Lewis, Henry, and Edward, and two Daughters, Isabel and Beatrice; the eldest of the Sons succeeded, and was called John III. and had a Son named Sebastian, who, upon his Father's Death, succeeded to the Kingdom. Lewis was never married, but by a Concubine had a Son named Anthony, the Prior of Castro. Henry entered into Orders, and was made Cardinal. Edward left two Daughters, Mary the Wife of Alexander Fernandez, Duke of Parma, and Katharine the Mother of the Duke of Braganza. Isabel was the Mother of King Philip II. and Beatrice of Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy. King Sebastian was killed in the Battle of Arzila, and his Body not being found, gave Occasion afterwards to that famous Imposture, of which we shall discourse by-and-by. King Sebastian having died without leaving Issue, the Cardinal Henry, his Uncle, the only surviving Brother of King John, succeeded to the Kingdom; who being a Priest, infirm, and old, resolved, in his Life-time, to appoint a Successor: But the Claim of so many Pretenders proving too troublesome, he called an Assembly of the States, who appointed fifteen Judges, to whom Henry gave Power to examine the Claims of the Pretenders, and determine the Succession, giving them likewise Power to decide it after his Death, in case it should happen before Sentence: In the mean time he appointed Governors, who were to have the Administration of the Kingdom; and he made ever Body swear to acknowledge for King whomsoever the said Judges should pronounce to be such.

THE Pretenders were Ranuccio Farnese, the Son of Alexander, and the Duke of Braganza, Katharine's Husband; King Philip II. the Son of Isabel, and the Duke of Savoy, the Son of Beatrice. There was likewise Anthony the bastard Son of Lewis, who, more by the Love he had gained of the People, than by any Right, aspired to the Throne; and lastly, the King of France, in order to have a Hand in this Affair, and to oppose King Philip, pretended to make good some old Rights derived from Katherin de Medici his Mother.

BY reason of the Competition of so many Pretenders, and of the natural Aversion, both of the King, and the States of the Kingdom to King Philip II. one of the most powerful of them, great Troubles being likely to ensue, another Device was proposed, of having recourse to the Pope for a Dispensation, to enable the King, though a Priest, to marry, and for that End Edward Castelblanco was sent to Rome. In the mean time the King frequently consulted the Physicians, whether they thought him able, at that great Age, to beget Children; for, though all his Life-time he had professed Chastity, yet, to exclude a foreign Heir, he was now disposed to marry.

KING Philip being advised of the Aversion of the King and the States of the Kingdom, and of the intended Marriage, in order to prevent it, wrote immediately to his Ambassador in Rome, strictly charging him to use his utmost Efforts with Pope Gregory not to grant the Dispensation; and at the same Time, with great Secrecy, he sent Ferdinando Castelli, a Dominican Friar, to King Henry his Uncle, to dissuade him from marrying, among other Things insinuating to him one very foolish Reason, but which he thought would have weight with the King, who, in other Things was most Superstitious, which was, to shew him, that it would be a very pernicious Example, and not to be practised in these Times without Danger, because the Errors of the Sectaries, who teach that Priests may marry, spreading more than ever in Europe, wicked Men, from his Example, might easily persuade others that they may do the same. The Message proved fruitless, for the Friar, contrary to Philip's Expectation, was not admitted into Henry's Presence, but, little to his Credit, was forced to return.

IN the mean time the other Expedient was carried on. The Judges summoned the Pretenders, who by their Ambassadors gave in their Claims. D. Pedro Giron, Duke of D'Offuna, appeared for King Philip; Carlo Roberto for the Duke of Savoy; and for Ranuccio Farnese, the Son of Alexander Duke of Parma by Mary, Ferdinando Farnese, Bishop of Parma, was sent, who having consulted the Case with the Lawyers of the famous University of Padoa, had published a Consultation signed by them, wherein, by most convincing Arguments, as he thought, they maintained Ranuccio's Right.

THE Duke of Savoy did not contend with King Philip, as being the Son of Isabel the eldest Sister, but only demanded, that in case Philip should die before Henry their Uncle, his Right might then take Place. Therefore they joined in excluding the Pretensions of the Duke of Braganza and Ranuccio Farnese: They maintained, that the said Dukes could not enjoy the Benefit of Representation, which they endeavoured to overthrow by many Arguments, but that they, as Males, and nearer of Kin, ought to be preferred to all others. On the other Hand, the Duke of Braganza and Ranuccio retorted the Argument, as making for them; but Ranuccio afterwards made use of the same Argument against the Duke of Braganza, because being the Son of Mary the eldest Sister, he ought to be preferred to the Duke. But the University of Coimbra being likewise informed of King Henry's Inclinations, who privately favoured the Duke of Braganza, published a Consultation in his Favour, by which these Lawyers, by many Arguments, strained hard, first to confute the Pretensions of King Philip and the Duke of Savoy, and then those of Ranuccio. However, all agreed in excluding Anthony the Prior of Crato (although he was cited) as a Bastard, as the King afterwards declared him by an express Decree.

ALTHOUGH the King of France was not summoned, yet he sent Urban Sangelas, Bishop of Cominges, to give in his Pretensions, who, after much Difficulty, was at last allowed to be present for proving the said King's Right. King Henry, in order to favour the Duke of Braganza, would willingly have excluded all the rest; but that King Philip might be excluded, all Claims were promiscuously admitted. The Pretensions of France, which were laid before that Assembly in the Name of Katharine of Medici, were derived from too old an Origine, and if ever they had been made good, they would have overthrown, not only the Pretensions of the Opposers, but would have called in Question both King Henry's own Right, and that of some of his immediate Predecessors; wherefore it would have been the Height of Imprudence in that Assembly to have examined into them, which would have been of very bad Consequence; for which cause *Thuanus*¹ says, that the French Ambassador obtained other Letters from his King, directed to the Assembly of Lisbon, wherein he offered the Portuguese all Assistance, provided they would reject King Philip, and not subject themselves to the Yoke of so powerful a Prince.

THE Spaniards, the Pope, and the other Christian Princes complained of this, and said, that the King of France, out of Envy and Hatred, intermeddled in this Affair of purpose to break all their Measures; for which cause King Philip began seriously to think, that his best Course would be to support his Pretensions by Force of Arms, rather than undergo these Discussions. Besides he was very sure, that not only the French, but the English, out of Jealousy, would oppose his having so great a Kingdom added to his vast Monarchy. He clearly saw the Aversion both of King Henry and of the People to him; and on the contrary the King's Inclination for Braganza, and the People's for Anthony; the States of the Kingdom, considering the Doubtfulness of the Rights which the Pretenders alledged, began likewise to claim, that it belonged to them to elect a Successor. King Philip therefore, in order to compass his Ends, resolved to assemble a powerful Army from all his Dominions, and to support his Right with Arms, rather than with the Quotations and Opinions of Lawyers: However, to make the intended War appear just and plausible to the World, he did not neglect to consult the most famous Lawyers and Universities in Europe; so that many Consultations appeared upon this Subject: Nor did he fail to consult Cujacius, the renowned Lawyer of these Times, who drew up for King Philip that Consultation which we read amongst his Works. Almost all the Universities of his vast Monarchy were employed to do the same; and our Neapolitan Lawyers, being likewise desired, bestowed their Labours upon this Subject². King Philip therefore, being resolved to maintain his Right by Arms, made the Duke D'Ossuna represent to King Henry, that there was no more Occasion for a further Examination; that his Title was most evident; that he had caused it to be examined into by the most famous Universities of Europe, and the most knowing Lawyers of the Age; that besides, out of Regard to the Publick Good of that Kingdom, he ought to declare the Succession in his Favour after his own Death. He got P. Leo Enriquez, Henry's Confessor, to represent the same to him, and who, having the Direction of the Conscience of this old timorous Man, wrought so upon him, that he perplexed him to that Degree, that he knew not what to resolve upon.

NOW the Preparations for War were carried on in good Earnest; Troops and Fleets were assembling, not only from all Parts of Spain, but from Italy, Sicily, and our Kingdom of Naples; and that the Popes and the other Princes might not conceive any Jealousy, it was given out, that the Preparations were made for the War of Africa. Therefore our Viceroy had Orders to have in Readiness for this Expedition, those Provisions which the Marquis of Mondejar had prepared against the Infidels. But the Pope, fuspicious of the Design, endeavoured to divert King Philip from it ; and he proposed an Expedient, which, if it had succeeded, would have redounded much to the Honour and Reputation of his See '. He made pressing Instances to King Philip, that, in imitation of many Princes, who had not scrupled, especially in the happy Pontificate of Innocent III. to leave the Decision of the like Disputes about Principalities and Kingdoms to the Apostolical See, he would be pleased to refer the Matter in Dispute to his Determination. But King Philip, pretending to take his kind Offer and Interposition in good Part, and, according to the Spanish Slowness, spinning out the Matter, pursued the military Preparations with greater Vigour ; and now Scouts were sent into Portugal to view the most convenient Part for beginning the War ; and at the same time the States of that Kingdom, having had Advice of the great Preparations, and finding that the Faction of the Duke of Braganza, and that more numerous of the Prior of Crato, daily increased, were providing against Revolutions and Disorders.

BUT behold, while these Things were doing, King Henry, after a Reign of one Year and five Months, in the 68th Year of his Age, on the last Day of January this Year 1580. departed this Life. The Prior of Crato, who had been removed from Lisbon by the King's Order, hearing of his Death, returned immediately ; and King Philip pushing on the Expedition more briskly, assembled two powerful Armies in order to attack Portugal both by Sea and Land, and made the famous Duke D'Alba Captain-General of both. Our Kingdom gave great Assistance in this War ; the Viceroy sent seventeen well provided Ships, with 6000 Soldiers, and 4000 Pioneers, commanded by the Prior of Hungary, and D. Carlo Spinelli ; a free Pardon was granted to all Exiles, Outlaws, Rebels, and False-Coiners, that would come and lift themselves Soldiers in this War : And, in order to support the Charges of it, notwithstanding, as we have said, that in April the preceding Year, a Donative had been given, on the 29th of September this Year 1580. a new Parliament was called in S. Lorenzo, of which Camillo Agnese, a Nobleman of Portanova, was Syndick, and another Donative of 1,200,000 Ducats was given.

'TIS truly worthy of Observation, that King Philip, having already resolved upon this War, and had his Armies ready for Action, and the Duke D'Alba, on the 20th of June this Year 1580. having entered Portugal with one of them, should, at the same time that the Fleet arrived, as if there had been Room for Repentance, and calling back the Steps so far advanced, think of consulting some Divines, whether with a safe Conscience he had undertaken this Expedition. Ibuanus ² says, that his Design was, thereby to put a Stop to the malicious Reports that were spread in Portugal and Italy of his Injustice, especially of his manner of invading that Kingdom. The Pope still sollicitated him, that, in order to save so great Charges to his Dominions, and the shedding of Blood, he ought to refer the Decision of the Dispute to his See. The States of that Kingdom complained, that their Right was subverted by Force, and that being obliged by Oath to acknowledge for King whomsoever the Assembly of Judges shall declare to be such, which Declaration not being as yet made, they could not acknowledge Philip for their lawful Sovereign. For these Reasons King Philip, who in the mean time did not neglect to pursue the War, ordered the Divines, the Jesuits and Franciscans of Alcala de Henares to examine, and, for the Quiet of his Conscience, give him their Advice upon the following Points.

WHETHER, though he was persuaded of his just Right to the Succession of that Kingdom, devolved to him by the Death of King Henry, he was obliged in Conscience to subject himself to the Decision of any Tribunal ?

WHETHER, since the Portuguese refuse to accept of him for their King, till both his own Right, and those of the Competitors, be discussed by the Judges appointed for that Effect, he can, of his own Authority, take Possession of the Kingdom, and attack all Opposers ?

SEEING the Governors and all the States of Portugal plead their Oath given, not to acknowledge any other for King, but him whom the Assembly shall declare such, whether that ought to be deemed a lawful Excuse ?

THE Jesuits, as well as all the other Divines, answered exactly according to the King's Wish. As to the first Point, they said, that he was not in Conscience bound to subject himself in that Cause to the Jurisdiction or Arbitration of another; that he could of his own Authority adjudge the Kingdom to himself, and take Possession of it; that the Pope could have no Share in it, because the Matter in Question was purely Temporal, there being nothing of Spiritual in it that required the Authority and Judgment of the Ecclesiastical Court, much less could the States of Portugal intermeddle in it, so as to oblige him to wait for their Decision; for Kings being once elected, all Right is transferred to them and their Successors, whence all Jurisdiction is lodged in them, nor can they be judged by others; therefore it being evident that Philip is the true and lawful Heir, he ought not to be subjected to the Jurisdiction of any other Tribunal but his own.

AS to the Second, That the Judges Delegate have no Power to take Cognizance of this Cause, all their Jurisdiction having ceased and been void by the Death of King Henry; nor can the Jurisdiction of Kings be prolonged after their Death: So that he can make use of his own Right in adjudging the Kingdom to himself, and by his own Authority take Possession of it.

LASTLY, to the third Point they answered, That the Portuguese are not bound to observe their Oath; nor can it be a lawful Excuse for their not receiving Philip as their King, because they not having any other Person of higher Dignity set over them, who can take Cognizance of, and decide this Cause, they ought to obey him as the true and lawful Heir.

KING Philip having got this Judgment of the Divines in his Favour, caused it to be published, and though he trusted more to his Arms, he sent it to be dispersed every-where, in order to wipe off the malicious Reports spread by his Competitors; and at the same time the Duke D'Alba, who commanded the Land Army, having joined the Marquis De S. Cruz, General of the Sea Army, the Kingdom was invaded; and after various Adventures, so well described by *Thuanus*¹ and others, that there is no Occasion to relate them here, the Prior of Crato, who of all the Competitors made the greatest Opposition, being totally routed by the Duke D'Alba, Lisbon, the Capital of the Kingdom, fell into the King's Hands, as also the greatest Part of the Provinces.

ON the 9th of November this Year 1580. our Viceroy Zuniga, having had certain Advice of this Victory, and of the Surrender of that City, for three Days and three Nights made pompous Feasts and Illuminations; and though Anthony, who had been assisted by the English and French, was at last driven out of the Kingdom, and had fortified himself in the Tercera Islands, from whence he flattered himself to be able, not only to interrupt the Commerce of the Indies, but with the Assistance of those Nations, jealous of so great an Accession, some time or other to come to that Crown; however, he came short of his Design, for King Philip having sent the Marquis De S. Cruz with his Fleet, in order to subdue him, the Marquis engaged the Competitor's Fleet betwixt the Island of Tercera and that of S. Michael, defeated and dispersed it in such a manner, that Anthony was forced to fly and take Shelter in England. Thus was the Kingdom of Portugal united to that of Spain, from which afterwards, in the Reign of Philip IV. it was again separated, and came under its own Kings as formerly, who still reign there.

IN prosecuting this Subject, we must not pass over in Silence the Imposture of the fictitious King Sebastian, which was brought to a Trial in Naples. A few Years before, such another had been hatched in England under the Person of Perkin, the pretended King of that Kingdom, of whom Bacon of Verulam discourses at large². King Sebastian, a young and gallant Prince, having given the utmost Proofs of his Intrepidity in the Battle of Arzila, was deserted by his own Men, and unhappily made Prisoner by some Moors, who, contending among themselves about so valuable a Prize, came to Blows, and some were killed in the Scuffle³. Their General run to pacify them, but to no purpose, so that with unheard-of Barbarity, in order to remove the Occasion of the Quarrel, he gave the Captive King a Stroke with his Sword on the Head, and repeating his Strokes, he left him dead on the Spot: In this Confusion and Disorder among the Moors, his Body was so disfigured, that when his own People came to look for it, they could not find it, which made them flatter themselves that he had not been killed in the Battle; whereupon a Report was spread, that he had made his Escape, which was the Foundation of the Imposture; for twenty and odd Years being past, when the Likeness could not be so easily discovered, there started up a Calabrian, named M. Tullio Cotizone, who gave out himself to be Sebastian King of Portugal; he laughed at the common Opinion of his having been killed in that Battle, and at the Mistake of those who thought he had made his Escape when the *Moor*s were quarrelling about the Booty. King Philip's Rivals encouraged the Cheat, insomuch that it passed for current that King Sebastian was alive, and wandering up and down in Italy incognito. There were Snares laid, and great Pains taken to have him seized, and it luckily happened that he was taken and carried to Venice; afterwards, out of Favour to the Spaniards, being chased out of the Dominions of that Republick, he came to Florence in Disguise, where, by that Duke's Order, he was arrested, and carried Prisoner to Naples, in the Viceroyalty of the first Count of *Lemos*¹. Great Pains were taken to unriddle the Matter, and the Process being drawn up, the famous Regent Gian-Francesco de Ponte, was appointed Judge Delegate of the Cause. This Writer says², that the Process being ended, the Imposture was discovered, for he was convicted by the Deposition of his own Wife and Relations, who lived in Calabria; and then he freely from his own Mouth confessed the whole Cheat. He was sentenced to be hanged, but before Execution, a Report of the Matter having been sent to King Philip III. in Spain, it was very prudently resolved not to put him to Death, but that the Cheat might be publickly known, and all Suspicion quite removed, the King ordered him to be condemned to row in the Spanish Gallies, to the End that he might be there exposed to the View of all the World, which was accordingly put in Execution; and thus ended this Imposture.

The Reformation of the Roman Kalendar.

AMONGST the remarkable Things that happened during the Government of the Prince of Pietraperfia, the Reformation of the Roman Kalendar, which rendered the Year 1582. memorable to all After-Ages, ought not to be passed over in Silence; so much the more, that not only in the other Kingdoms of Christendom, but in ours, it was nicely examined and discussed before it was received.

THE antient Roman Year was not composed of ten Months, as Junius Gracchus, Fulvius Varro, Ovidius, and Suetonius will have it, but of Twelve, as Censorinus, from the Authorities of Licinius Macro, and L. Fenestella, hath written, of which the first Month was March, and the last February.

THE Months of March, May, July, and October were each of them made up of 31 Days, the rest of 29, except February, which had 28 Days only: So that the antient Roman Year was made up of 355 Days, and was ten Days less than the Egyptian Year; whence there was a Necessity of Intercalation, which was done every two Years, in the manner related by *Thuanus*¹. But this Intercalation proving faulty, gave a free Scope to the Priests, who took upon them to rectify Time, to regulate the Course of the Year as they thought fit, by putting, to make up what was wanting, the intercalary Month, which they called Mercedonius, and made Numa Pompilius Author of it. But, as Plutarch shews in Numa's Life, this Help was not sufficient to correct the Errors and Confusions occasioned in the Months of the Year, whereby the Days of solemn Sacrifices and Feasts, as Plutarch says in the Life of Cæsar, in process of Time fell out in the opposite Seasons of the Year; the Priests therefore, to whom the Management of this Affair was committed, and frequently out of Hatred to the Magistrates, made the Intercalation sometimes sooner, sometimes later. For which cause Julius Cæsar took in Hand to make a more exact Reformation of the Year; and while he was in *Alexandria*², having got the Opinions of those able Mathematicians, and consulted the Affair with other Philosophers, and more carefully observing the Cœlestial Signs, he published by an Edict a new Reformation, and pointed out the true Way; and Plutarch declares, that the Romans observed it in his Time. Bacon of Verulam ' very much commends this Reformation, calling it a lasting Proof, no less of Cæsar's Knowledge, than of his Power; and that not only his having known the Laws of the Stars in the Firmament, but his having given these Laws to Men to be a Guide to them upon Earth, ought to be ascribed to his Glory. But there were not wanting envious Men, who, as Plutarch says, found Fault with this Reformation; and some Body having said to Cicero, To-morrow we shall have the New Moon, Yes, said he, by Cæsar's Order; as if Men were obliged to say and think according to his Edict.

BUT in process of Time, Cæsar's Edict being misinterpreted by the Priests, was not thought sufficient, and his Reformation wanted afterwards to be reformed; so that Claudius Ptolomæus, who flourished 180 Years after Cæsar, considering the great Variety of Opinions about determining the natural Year, made another Reformation, which, differing from the former, created great Disturbance and Confusion.

IN the Reign of Constantine the Great, the Fathers of the Council of Nice, in order to fix the Feast of Easter, made another Reformation, from which Time there happened great Confusion in the Equinoxes. Afterwards, about the Year 526, the Confusion still increasing, Dimysius Exiguus endeavoured to remedy it by a new Computation, but that was of short Duration, so that the Confusion was as great as ever.

THE Roman Pontiffs therefore, looking upon it as their Business to remedy this Confusion, to prevent other Princes, especially the Emperor, were careful to have a new Reformation made; and a hundred Years before, Pope Innocent VIII. had brought Joannes Regiomontanus, a famous Mathematician of those Times, to Rome, in order to correct the Errors of the Kalendar; but it was reported, that the Sons of Giorgio Trapezunzio, not able to bear that a German should be preferred to the Greeks, poisoned him, which prevented his answering the Pope's Design. At this Time Petrus Alliacensis, Bishop of Cambray, and afterwards Cardinal, Cardinal Cusano, and soon after Robert of Lincoln, and Paul of Middleburg, Bishop of Fossombrone, wrote about the just Computation of the Year; and the last dedicated his Work to the Emperor Maximilian I.

THE Council of Trent being afterwards opened, and it being expected that these Fathers, after the Example of those of the Council of Nice, would have made a new Reformation, the greatest Wits in Europe employed their Pens upon this Subject, and amongst the rest Joannes Genesius Sepulveda of Cordova, Giovan-Francesco Spinola, a Milanese, Benedetto Majorino, the famous Luca Gaurico, and Pietro Pitato, a Veronese, who by a particular Treatise confuted Gaurico's Opinion. But the Council breaking up in a Hurry, had not Time to meddle with so intricate a Matter, which required much Time to discuss.

NEVERTHELESS Gregory XIII. afraid of being prevented by the Emperor of Germany, as an Affair by Right belonging to the Empire, with great Diligence set about to hasten this Reformation, and for that End sent to all the Universities of Italy, and wrote to the Senate of Venice, to send him the Opinions of the Mathematicians and Philosophers of Padoa concerning this Reformation. The first that gave his Opinion was Giuseppe Moletio of Messina, who two Years before had published the Gregorian Tables. But the Opinion of the famous Nicholas Copernicus, a great Astronomer of these Times, being sought, there arose various Sentiments; and Sperone Speroni having likewise entered the Lists, the Disputes among them grew the warmer. Matthæus Maginas had also his Share in them. And the Pope having required the Opinion of Giuntinus, he agreed with those who were for cutting off ten Days of the Year; but Albertus Leonius of Utrecht, having wrote a Book of Purpose, proved that eleven Days ought to be cut off: Duke Francis Maria of Urbino, at the Desire of the Pope, likewise sought the Opinion of Vico Ubaldo, a most skilful Man in that Science, who gave it agreeable to the Reformation made by the Fathers of the Council of Nice. Gregory wrote likewise to the King of France, who consulted Francis Poix Candale, a famous Astronomer, who also published his Opinion about it.

IN the mean time Pope Gregory, that he might not lose so fair an Opportunity of raising the Authority of his See, though he sought the Concurrence of other Princes, yet he would have whatever he should determine therein to be agreed to; so that all the Opinions being examined, at last, by the Advice of Antonius Lilius, a famous Physician of these Times, he adhered to the Reformation of Lodovicus Lilius, the Doctor's Brother, which in short was, that ten Days should be cut off, which, through the Fault of Intercalation were superfluous; and he prescribed a Rule for preventing the like Fault for the future. After this Reformation, contained in a small Volume, had been approved of by Vincenzo Laureo, Bishop of Monreale, upon whose Judgment in these Matters the Pope depended very much, he sent it to all the Christian Princes, and to the most renowned Universities of Europe.

BUT this Reformation of Lilius had many Opponents, among the rest Joseph Scaliger, a very learned Man of these Times, who, in his admirable Work De Emendatione temporum, discovered his Errors. Michael Mestlinus, a Professor in the University of Tubingen, likewise impugned the Lilian Computation with large Commentaries. But in Opposition to these, Christophorus Clavius, a Jesuit, and famous Professor in Rome, and Hugo Martellus, Bishop of Glandeve, stood up in Defence of Lilius.

AS soon as Gregory had published this Reformation of his, in order to have it received by all the Catholick Princes, and especially by the Emperor and the Princes of Germany, he sent Cardinal Lodovico Madruccio, Bishop of Trent, to the Emperor; but this Affair being laid before the Dyet of Ausburg, the Princes assembled there, gave it as their Opinion, that the Pope, by having intermeddled in it, had committed an outrageous Incroachment both upon the Authority of the Emperor and the Empire; and that the Publication of the new Kalendar ought not to be suffered in Germany: That to regulate the Kalendar belonged to the Emperor, as Julius Cæsar did, and afterwards in the Empire of the West, Charles the Great, who gave the Kalendar to the Germans in their Mother Tongue; that what the Fathers of the Council of Nice did, was by the Authority of the Emperor Constantine the Great, by whose Command that Council had been called; that therefore the new Kalendar ought to be rejected, so much the rather, that it had been made without the Consent of the Princes and States of the Empire. The Emperor seeing the firm Resolution of the Princes, and of the Cities of Germany, that had received the Confession of Ausburg, not to accept of it, adjourned the Debate, and ordered the antient Form to be observed in the Decrees of the Dyet¹.

THUANUS * being dead, and Achilles Harley absent, it * Not the Historian. was not much examined into in France; the King put forth an Edict, which was obeyed by the Parliament, whereby the new Reformation was received; and ten Days being cut off from the Year, it was established, that the tenth Day of December should be reckoned the Twentieth, so that that Year Christmas was celebrated on the 15th of that Month. In Emulation of the King of France, and to gain the Good Will of the Pope, Francis the new Duke of Brabant, obtained even of the Protestants, that his Holiness's Reformation should be likewise received in Flanders, as it was also in Holland, West-Friseland, and in the other Provinces².

UPON the Publication of this Reformation by Gregory, before it was received in Spain and the other Dominions of our King Philip II. particularly in Naples, it was examined, and the King's Permission and Exequatur sought, as had been done in all other Kingdoms; it being the Business of Princes, out of Regard to their States, to regulate the Days, both on account of the Celebration of their Birth and Coronation Days, and the Vacation of their Tribunals. King Philip being informed, that this Reformation had been made with the Advice and Approbation of many Princes of Christendom, and that they had received it in their Dominions, he did the same in his Kingdoms; and the Prince of Pietraperfia being then our Viceroy, he sent him the new Kalendar reformed by Gregory; and on the 21st of August this Year 1582. wrote him, that Pope Gregory, with the mature Deliberation and Advice of the Princes of Christendom, and with the unanimous Consent of the College of Cardinals, in order to reduce Easter and the other moveable Feasts to the just and true State of their antient Institution, having reformed the Kalendar, therefore he ordered him to cause it to be put in Execution in the Kingdom of Naples, and in all the Churches thereof.

BUT there being something contained in this Kalendar prejudicial to his Prerogatives, he wrote another Letter at the same time to the said Prince, bidding him take special Care, that if, in the Prohibition subjoined to it, viz. that none must offer to print it but Antonius Lilius, or his Assigns, there be any Thing found prejudicial to his Royal Jurisdiction, or any other Innovation worth minding, to stop the Impression, give him an Account of it, and wait his Answer¹. In this manner, and with these Restrictions was the new Kalendar received and observed with us; and *Summonte*² writes, that this Year the 4th of October was reckoned the 14th, and ten Days were deducted in the Payment of all Rents: Moreover it was observed, that there being preserved a Vial of the Blood of S. Stephen in the Church of S. Gaudiosus, according to *Baronius*³, brought to Naples by S. Gaudiosus, an African Bishop, which of itself was wont to liquify on the 3d Day of August, according to the antient Kalendar; but after Gregory had made this Reformation, the Blood did not bubble up till the 13th of August, on which Day, according to the new Reformation, the Feast of S. Stephen falls: Whence *William Cave*⁴ writes*, that this was a manifest Proof that the Gregorian Kalendar had been received in Heaven, tho' some Countries on Earth have refused to follow it.

⁴ Cave's History of the Lives of the Martyrs.

* The Author has certainly either been imposed upon, or did not rightly understand the English Language; therefore, in order to clear Doctor Cave from this Imputation, I thought it fit to give the Reader the whole Paragraph from which this Quotation is taken, as follows: But the Miracle of the Miracle lay in this, that when Pope Gregory XIII. reformed the Roman Kalendar, and made no less than 10 Days Difference from the former, the Blood in the Vial ceased to bubble upon the 3d of August, according to the old Computation, and bubbled upon that that fell according to the new Reformation. A great Justification I confess (as Baronius well observes) of the Divine Authority of the Gregorian Kalendar, and the Pope's Constitutions; but yet it was ill done to set the Kalendars at variance, when both had been equally justified by the Miracle. But how easy it was to abuse the World with such Tricks, especially in these latter Ages, wherein the Artifice of the Priests was arrived at a kind of Perfection in these Affairs, is no difficult Matter to imagine.

S E C T. III.

The End of the Government of the Prince of Pietraperfia, and the Laws he left us.

FROM this Time forward we observe, that King Philip II. had prefixed a Time for the Government of his Viceroys of Naples, confining it regularly to three Years, whereas formerly it was during the King's Pleasure, and not limited to such Bounds; so that on the 11th of November this Year 1582. the Prince having governed three Years, it behoved him to go to Spain, and give Way to the Duke D'Offuna his Successor. His Departure was regretted by every Body; and on account of his Piety, Meekness, and courteous Behaviour, he left the Reputation of a most excellent Viceroy. During his Government, besides the remarkable Things abovementioned, on the 23d of October 1580. Queen Anne the Wife of King Philip, died in the City of Elvas, and left two Sons, D. Diego, who was then eight, and D. Philippo, two Years of Age, the other two Children, Fernando and Joanna having died before. He finished the Fabrick of the Arsenal, and built that magnificent Gate that faces the Mole. He founded in the Prison of the Vicariate the Infirmary for the Benefit of sick Prisoners; and lastly, as a lasting Monument of his Wisdom, he left us about 33 Pragmaticks, which may be seen in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

C H A P. IV.

The Government of D. Pedro Giron, Duke D'Ossuna, and his Laws.

TO make up, in some measure, the vast Charges which the Duke D'Ossuna had been at in the Service of the Crown of Spain, in the Wars of Granada, the Conquest of Portugal, and elsewhere, King Philip II. was pleased to bestow upon him one of the best Governments that any Prince in Europe can give, which is that of our Kingdom of Naples. In the Month of November this Year 1582. in great Pomp and Magnificence D. Pedro arrived at Naples. His natural Reservedness, and a too haughty and disdainful Disposition, made him soon to be hated by the Nobility, which rendered his Government uneasy to him, and not much to be commended; of which being sensible, though too late, and endeavouring to remove the bad Opinion that had been conceived of him, that he slighted the Nobility, he got himself to be aggregated into the Body of the Nobility of the Seggio of Nido. But the Adventure of Starace, the Clerk of the Market, so famous over all Europe, that *Thuanus*¹ thought it worth the while to relate it in his History, rendered his Government much more troublesome and uneasy. 'Tis needless to repeat that Story here, because not only Tommaso Costo, from whom Thuanus took it, but Summonte has described every minute Circumstance of it, and with which that Writer ends his History.

THE continual Demands of Money to be sent out of the Kingdom to Spain, for the King's pressing Occasions, much disquieted the Duke. It was proposed to lay a Duty of a Ducat upon each Hogshead of Wine; but all the Seggi not agreeing to it, that was dropt: However, by the Promise of new Favours and Privileges, during his Government the King got two Donatives; one of 1,200,000 Ducats, in the Parliament that met the 2d of January 1583. of which Muzio Tuttavilla, a Nobleman of the Seggio of Porto, was Syndick; and another of the like Sum in October 1584. Scipione Loffredo, of the Seggi of Capuana, being then Syndick: And the Favours promised were actually granted upon both the Occasions. Indeed, his Zeal for having Justice impartially administred to all, without Distinction of Noble or Ignoble, and his Diligence in dispatching Business, gained him the Good Will of the People. The many Benefits that the City of Naples and the Kingdom reaped from his vigilant Care and Application during his four Years Government, got him many Encomiums and Blessings. It was he that repaired the Aqueduct which conveys the Water from the Village of Polla to the Fountains of Naples. He built a stately Royal Riding-House without the Constantinople Gate, near the Duke of Nocera's Palace, instead of that formerly built on the Bank of the Sebeto, in a very unwholesome Air, by the Kings of Arragon. He levelled the Roads, and built many Bridges upon the Rivers that run between Puglia and the City of Naples, for the more conveniently transporting Provisions and other Necessaries from thence to the said City. In fine, he left us many prudent Regulations, which may be seen in 46 Pragmaticks, contained in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

C H A P. V.

The Government of D. Juan de Zuniga, Count of Miranda, which was much disturbed by the Banditi. The Monuments and Laws which he left us.

* This does not agree with the above Resolution of confining the Government to three Years.

AS Fame had before-hand proclaimed the Virtues of the Count of Miranda, not unlike the other Zuniga his Uncle, so his prudent Government answered Expectation; and his having been continued in the Government for nine Years together *, was a manifest Proof of his being acceptable both to his Prince and the People he governed. In the Month of November 1586. he was received in Naples with great Demonstrations of Joy and Satisfaction. But strange Accidents rendered his Government very troublesome and uneasy. Although in the Times of his Predecessors the Banditi had begun to disturb the Provinces of the Kingdom, yet the Mischief in its Beginning not being thought so great, if it was not overlooked, at least such Means were not made use of as were proper for removing and quite extirpating it: So that their Number still increasing, Gangs of them lay sculking in the Woods, murdered Travellers, and robbed the King's Messengers; and at last they became so bold, that they pillaged Towns, yea, some that were walled, and carried Desolation and Ruin every where, insomuch that Traffick and Commerce were interrupted. To all this was added, the Danger of applying a Remedy, which often proved worse than the Disease; for they had grown so numerous, that in order to destroy them, Soldiers were sent, who did more Damage and Mischief where-ever they went, and often without Success; for the regular Troops were of no use amongst the Rocks and Mountains, and they were frequently baffled and roughly handled.

NEVERTHELESS the Count of Miranda did not fail to use his utmost Efforts in order to root them out; and it happened that he got hold of that notable Bandito Benedetto Mongone, whose infamous Memory, for the many wicked Actions committed by him in the Neighbourhood of Eboli, is still kept up. That he might be a terrible Example to others, he was drawn through the Streets of the City in a Cart, and had his Flesh torn off with Pincers; and afterwards, on the 17th of April 1587. he was carried to the Market-Place, and broke upon the Wheel. But this terrible Spectacle availed nothing; for not long after there came an Account of Incursions made by another famous Robber named Marco Sciarra, born in Abruzzo, who, in imitation of King Marcone of Calabria, called himself King of Campagna: He had drawn together a Band of 600 Robbers under his Command; and by the Nearness of Abruzzo to the State of the Church, he kept a Correspondence with the Banditi of that State, and they mutually assisted one another. The Viceroy did not neglect to use proper Means for crushing them; in the first Place he solicited Pope Sixtus V. Gregory's Successor, that, by Virtue of the antient Agreement between the Holy See and the Kingdom, whereby it was allowed to pursue the Banditi in either of their Territories, and mutually to assist one another, he would grant him Leave to send Commissaries into the Ecclesiastical State for that End, without being obliged to ask Permission of any other Person; and on the 14th of May this Year 1588. Sixtus sent him a Brief, whereby he not only empowered the Viceroy himself, himself, but likewise the Commissaries appointed by him, to enter the State of the Church, pursue and seize the Banditi and Delinquents for the Space of three Months, without asking Permission of any other Person¹. Besides this the Viceroy sent Commissaries with Detachments of the regular Troops to destroy them; but all these Expeditions and Cautions were in vain, for Sciarra used the Inhabitants of the Places where he resorted, so kindly and generously, that they faithfully gave him notice of the Ambushes laid for him by the Viceroy; and he was so much upon his Guard, that he always took up his Quarters in inaccessible Places, posted his Guards, planted Centinels, and distributed his Men in proper Places. By these Means he was become, in a manner, invincible, insomuch that in many Rencontres he came off so well, that his Loss was but small, and that of the Aggressors very great.

AT this Time Pope Sixtus V. who, by his extravagant and vain-glorious Actions, gave no small Ground of Jealousy, being, as *Thuanus*² describes him, of a clownish Nature, neither Prayers nor Submission were able to move him, but only Fear or Force; wherefore King Philip had given the Count of Miranda Instructions, by these last Means, to keep him in Awe. The Viceroy therefore taking this Occasion of pursuing the Banditi, under Colour of destroying Sciarra, assembled 4000 Horse and Foot, and this Year 1590. having given the Command of them to D. Carlo Spinelli, he sent him against Sciarra; but the Success proved quite contrary to what was expected, for in this Expedition Spinelli had near lost his Life: So that instead of Sciarra's being suppressed, he grew so bold, that without Opposition he pillaged Serra Capriola, Vasto, and the City of Lucera, where the Bishop was unluckily killed with a Musquet Shot, while he was standing at a Window of the Belfry, whither he had gone for Shelter. The Insolence of this Bandito was much heightened by the Correspondence he kept with the Banditi of the State of the Church, who, notwithstanding the Agreement betwixt Sixtus and the Viceroy, mutually assisted one another. To all this was added, the Protection given them by Alfonso Piccolomini, a Rebel to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who having fled for Shelter to the State of Venice, was serving that Republick in the War against the Uscoks.

BUT new Incidents that happened soon after, deprived Sciarra of all these Supports. The Grand Duke of Tuscany, in order to get the Venetians to chase Piccolomini out of their Dominions, had proposed to them, and strenuously urged, that it would be much more for their Purpose to employ Sciarra against the Uscoks, than Piccolomini: but it happened, that what he could not obtain one way, succeeded another; for Piccolomini, upon a certain Occasion, having given too bold an Answer to the Chief Men of that Republick, was banished out of the Venetian Dominions; and having fallen into an Ambush laid for him by the Grand Duke, he was put to a cruel Death. The Venetians then invited Sciarra, in order to send him against the Uscoks, but he did not much like their Invitation. At last Pope Sixtus died, and was succeeded by Clement VIII. who being of the same Mind with our Viceroy, and wholly intent upon destroying the Banditi of the State of the Church, sent Gianfrancesco Aldobrandini against them.

ON the other Hand the Viceroy, not pleased with Spinelli's Conduct, recalled him from the Command of the Troops, and gave it, with absolute Power, to D. Adriano Acquaviva, Count of Conversano, who, on Palm-Sunday 1592. marched out of Naples with fresh Troops; and that he might not be chargeable to the Towns and Villages, he took with him some Peasants that were well acquainted with the Country, and took care not to quarter in Places that were inhabited, which so endeared him to the People, that they all joined in concert with him to ruin the Banditi. So Sciarra being deprived of Piccolomini's Protection, and hemmed in not only by the Viceroy's Troops, but likewise by those of the Pope, at last resolved to embrace the Offer made him by the Venetians; so that having embarked with sixty of his Men in two Gallies belonging to the Republick, he arrived at Venice: Nevertheless those that remained, headed by Luca, Sciarra's Brother, did not give over plundering the Country; and Sciarra himself returned frequently from Venice to encourage them, till at last having come to Marca with some of his Gang, he was killed by one of his Associates, named Battimello, who, as a Reward for his Treachery, obtained from Aldobrandini, a Pardon for himself and thirteen of his Companions. Thus died Sciarra, who for the Space of seven Years together, had disturbed the State of the Church and the Kingdom. His Death put an End to the Incursions of the Banditi, who were afterwards intirely rooted out by the Count of Conversano, who with great Honour returned to Naples, and was much esteemed and carested by the Viceroy. But though they were kept under for the present, yet some Years after they broke loose, and harrassed the Kingdom as much as ever it had been by Sciarra and Mangone. Heaven had reserved the Glory of quite extirpating them from among us, to D. Gaspar de Haro, Marquis Del Carpio, to whom, among many others, the Kingdom owes that inestimable Benefit.

NOT only these Incursions, but the continual pressing Demands that came from Spain, of Men and Money, lay heavy upon the Viceroy. The Expedition, in which King Philip had engaged himself, against England and France, compleated the impoverishing of our Kingdom, by the great Charges and Donatives it was obliged to furnish. Our Kingdom had likewise a Share in that great Armada unsuccessfully sent against England; there were built in our Arsenal four Galleasses, which the Count of Miranda sent to Lisbon to join that Armada, which in 1588. being dispersed by a Storm, and swallowed up by the Sea, ruined Spain, and brought all her Designs and ill-contrived Projects to nothing. In 1593. the French having invaded Savoy, the Count sent from our Kingdom 4500 Foot, under the Command of the Prior of Hungary, to be employed against the French in that Dutchy. In order therefore, to contribute towards the Charges of so many Expeditions during the nine Years of his Government, in the Years 1586, 1588, 1591, 1593, and 1595, five Donatives, each of them of 1,200,000 Ducats, were given by our Kingdom¹.

THE Expedition to England, and the Succour sent to Savoy against the French, were not the only Things that put the Viceroy to much Pain at this Time, but there being Advice that a strong Fleet was fitting out at Constantinople, put the Kingdom in great Fear and Consternation; in order to prevent the Mischiefs, the vigilant Viceroy caused immediately to be provided with Men and Ammunition the Places of the Kingdom most exposed, and particularly the Castles of Brindisi, Otranto, Taranto, and Gallipoli: He likewise raised the Horse and Foot Militia, and sent some Frigats to Sea, to observe the Enemy's Motions. And indeed these Precautions, though expensive, turned to Account; for in the Year 1593. the Turks having in vain attempted to make a Descent in Sicily, they came before Catona, a Place in Calabria near Reggio, whither Spinelli, then made Captain-General by the Viceroy, marching in all haste, they thought fit to retire with a small Booty; but having returned on the 2d of September with 100 Sail, they anchored in S. John's Bay, and pillaged Reggio and fourteen Villages in the Neighbourhood: Then they sailed towards Otranto and Gallipoli, but finding these Coasts well guarded, they retired to Velona.

BUT notwithstanding all these anxious Cares and toilsome Concerns, the Viceroy did not neglect, in imitation of his Predecessors, to improve both the City and Kingdom. To him we owe that majestick Plain before the Royal Palace, which serves not only for a Parade, but makes a noble Amphitheatre for Bull Feasts, Tournaments and other publick Shews. To him we owe the Road that leads from Naples to Puglia, which he caused to be levelled for the Benefit of Travellers. To him is owing the Inlargement of the stately Bridge of Magdalena upon the River Sebeto; and the Reparation of that which leads from the Root of Monte d'Eschia to Castello dell' Uovo. To his Generosity is likewise owing the Frontispiece of the Church of S. Paul belonging to the Theatins, where formerly stood a Temple dedicated to Castor and Pollux, by restoring it to the same Form it had before it was thrown down by the Earthquake that happened on the 5th of June 1588. And to his Piety is owing the Reparation of the Tombs and Sepulchres of the Arragonian Kings in the Vestry of the Church of S. Dominick, which he made to be covered with Cloth of Gold, and put in the same Place under rich Canopies. In fine, to prevent the Mischiefs that had frequently happened by Fire, he caused to be built in an uninhabited Place without the Gate Capuana, a stately Fabrick for the Manufacture of Gunpowder.

HIS Government lasted nine Years, in which he published about fifty Pragmatics, whereby may be seen how much he had at Heart Justice, the Uprightness of Magistrates, and the equal Distribution of Offices according to Merit. He removed many Abuses introduced into the Tribunals of the Vicariate and the S. C. and he made many Regulations for the Dispatch of Law-Suits, and sundry Provisions concerning the Price of Corn and other Necessaries of Life, which may be seen in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes. He set out from Naples on the 25th of November 1595. accompanied with the Blessings of the People, and, as a Pledge of his Love, left there D. Juana Pacheco his Grand-Daughter, married to Matteo di Capua, Prince of Conca, and High-Admiral of the Kingdom.

The Government of D. Enrique de Guzman, Count of Olivares ; his Virtues, and the Laws he left us.

THE Count of Olivares was one of the most wise and prudent Ministers that Spain had in these Times, and by his great Skill and Facility in dispatching the political and most weighty Affairs of the Monarchy, he acquired amongst the Spaniards the Surname of Gran Papelista *. For which Cause he was employed by King Philip II. a very good Judge of the Abilities of Men, in the Offices of greatest Trust ; having sent him his Ambassador, in very ticklish Times, to Pope Sixtus V. with whom, by reason of the extravagant and odd Humour of this Pope, for the Space of twelve Years he had many very troublesome and difficult Matters to transact. In the Time of this Embassy he had born to him D. Gaspar de Guzman, afterwards called the Count Duke, who in the Reign of Philip IV. had the Direction of the Monarchy for the Space of Twenty-two Years, with the Title of Prime Minister. From Rome he was sent to govern Sicily, and from thence to succeed the Count of Miranda in the Government of Naples. He arrived at Pozzuolo in the Month of November this Year 1595. and after he had stayed some Days there, he made his Entry into Naples, and was received with great Acclamations, and the usual Ceremonies of a Bridge, Syndick, and Cavalcade.

* A Spanish Term for a Man that is always busy among Papers or Writings.

IT was not long before it was perceived, that he was of a serious and severe Disposition, and an Enemy to Diversions: He did not much like that the Nobility should pay their Court to him at his Levee. He banished Dancing, Comedies, and Feasts, usually given by his Predecessors in the Palace. His chief Study was to give Audience at all Hours ; carefully to see that Justice was duly and rigorously administered ; and what distinguished him above all others, was the great Care he took about the Oeconomy of the Government, a Thing not much minded by the Spaniards, nay always quite neglected by them.

FOR this End he published many Edicts, whereby he reformed many Abuses, and particularly the Vanity of Titles, which both in writing and speaking many arrogated to themselves, and the immoderate Luxury in Womens Cloaths. To his own severe Temper, he added that of Lodovico Acerbo, a Lawyer, and a Genoese by Birth, whom he made Regent of the Vicariate, who was a just Revenger, not only of heinous but of slight Offences ; by which means he extirpated Robbers and Gamesters, and made the Country easy. He took care to keep Plenty in the City and Kingdom ; and for that End he caused to be built that spacious Granary, which still remains, for laying up Provision of all Sort of Corn that comes by Sea, for the Use of the Publick : And having accomplished these two most important Works, he applied himself to the beautifying of the City, under the Direction of Dominico Fontana, a famous Architect in these Times. He caused the Street which leads from the great to the little Mole to be levelled, and erected a Fountain there ; he began that other Street which leads from the Wine Key to the Fish-Stone, and which was afterwards finished by the Count of Lemos his Successor. He caused to be levelled, enlarged, and made in a straight Line, the Street that leads from the Convent of the Trinity to S. Lucia, and from his own Surname called it Via Gusmana. He finished the large Edifice of the Royal Custom-House of Naples; and besides his many other magnificent Works which adorned the City, he beautified the Tombs of Charles I. of Anjou, and Charles Martel, King of Hungary, and put them into that stately Form as we now see them above the Door of the Cathedral Church of Naples.

BUT the Death of King Philip II. which happened on the 13th of September 1598. (of which afterwards) whose Obsequies he celebrated in a most pompous Manner in January 1599. shortened his Government; for not being in so great Favour with Philip III. as he had been with his Father, it gave his Enemies Opportunity to complain of him to the new King, upon an Occasion which we shall relate. By the failing that had happened of several Bankers, many People who had Money in their Hands having sustained great Losses, one Saluzzo, a Genoese Merchant, proposed to the Viceroy the setting up a general Bank in Naples, where every Body, both of the City and Kingdom, might lodge their Money; the Deputies of the City opposed it, alledging, that there being many Banks for pious Uses, and managed with the utmost Fidelity, in which Money might be safely lodged, it was not reasonable to force the Citizens, against their Inclinations, to trust their Money in the Hands of Strangers. But the Viceroy, judging that the Expedient would prove very advantageous to the Publick; and taking the Opposition of the Deputies to be done out of Envy to his Glory, he caused the Prince of Caserta, Alfonso di Gennaro, and Ottavio Sanfelice to be imprisoned, as those who were looked upon to be of greatest Weight among the Deputies. The Seggi of Capuana, Porto, and Montagna being offended thereat, after having elected other Noblemen to fill up the Places of the Prisoners, sent secretly to the Court of Madrid Ottavio Tuttavilla, in order to represent to the King the Violence used by the Viceroy in trampling under Foot the Rights of the City, in the Persons of the Deputies. The Viceroy being informed that every Thing was done by the Advice of D. Fabrizio di Sangro, Duke of Vietri, who was then Register of Accounts, he caused him to be put in Prison, under pretence of Accusations given in against him by Giovan-Antonio Carbone, Marquis of Padula, the Duke's Enemy. The Imprisonment of the Duke of Vietri gave fresh Occasion of Complaint against the Viceroy, and encouraged Tuttavilla the more to exclaim against him to the King, and in the blackest manner to describe the Rigour and Violence practised by him against the Nobility and his Majesty's faithful Subjects, for satisfying his own Revenge, contrary to Justice. The King therefore, being a Stranger to the Government of his Kingdoms, resolved to remove him, and appointed the Count of Lemos to be his Successor, who coming unawares to Naples, Olivares was immediately forced to leave it, and retire to the Palace of the Duke of Nocera, from whence on the 19th of July 1599. he set out for Spain. It was believed, that his Government would have been much longer had not the Death of King Philip II. happened; for never was there a more just, a more prudent Man, or one of more indefatigable Application than the Count of Olivares. During the four Years of his Government he put forth about Thirty-two Pragmaticks, all of them useful and well digested, which may be seen in the often mentioned Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

C H A P. VII.

The Death of King Philip II. and his last Will.

IN the mean time King Philip, now full of Years, and labouring under many and different Infirmities, perceiving that his Days were drawing near to an End, began to think seriously upon Death, and to provide, as far as human Wisdom can reach, against the Misfortunes that might happen after his Death. D. Diego was already dead, and there was none left to succeed him in so vast a Monarchy but Philip, a Youth, and whom he well knew to be unfit, not only for the Mangement of the Affairs of State, but likewise for carrying on a War. Therefore he was eagerly bent upon clapping up a Peace with Henry IV. King of France, that upon his Death, his Son might not, in the Beginning of his Reign, be engaged in a War with so invincible and powerful a Prince: This Peace was concluded at Vervins on the 2d of May this Year 1598. the Instrument of which is inserted by Lionard in his Collection¹; whereupon, in the Month of June the same Year, in imitation of Charles V. his Father, he began to prepare himself for the next World, and to lay aside the Cares of Government; and finding himself much weakened by the continual Pains of the Gout, though the Physicians were against it, he by all means would be carried to the Monastery of S. Laurence belonging to the Escurial, six Leagues distant from Madrid. When he arrived at that Monastery, the Pains of the Gout increased both in his Hands and Feet; besides these he had a painful Swelling in his right Knee, which being laid open, though it eased the Pain, yet his Life was despaired of; nay, soon after, other four Tumours rose upon his Breast, which being likewise laid open, so filthy a Humour diffused itself over all his Body, that it turned into so great a Swarm of Lice, that four Men being continually employed, they were scarcely able to clear him of so much Filthiness: To all which were added a Hectick Fever, many Ulcers upon his Hands and Feet, a Dysentery, a Tenesmus, and in fine a Dropsy; and the Swarms of Lice still continued, which was not only a miserable Sight, but an evident Proof of the Vanity of all worldly Things. Nevertheless, in this pitiful and sad Condition, he shewed the greatest Constancy and Resolution, till being seized with a Paroxysm, he took the Viaticum, and prepared himself for the last Offices; therefore, before he breathed his last, he sent for Prince Philip, and Clara Eugenia Isabella, his beloved Daughter, and from the Hands of the Archbishop of Tiedo, in Presence of them, and of the Grandees of his Court, he took the Penance, which is a Sort of Consecration, that for a long time has been used in Spain among the Princes and Grandees, different from the extreme Unction, and mentioned by S. Isidore in the Chronicle prefixed to the Laws of the Westrogoths. Then turning towards Philip, he warmly recommended his Sister Isabel to him, and gave him some Instructions, which during the Course of his Life he had written, and preserved, in order to give them to him at his Death. He himself prescribed the manner of his Funeral; and the Agony increasing, he blessed and took Leave of his Children, and at last on the 13th of September 1598. he expired in the 72d Year of his Age, after he had reigned Forty-four Years.

KING Philip was of a short Stature, yet handsome, of a grave, but pleasant Countenance; had well proportioned Members, and fair Hair. He was a Man of a high Spirit, and sagacious; impatient of Rest; wary in transacting Affairs, and ready to take Advantage of other Peoples Calamities, by which means he not only preserved, but increased what his Father had left him: Fortune sometimes smiled, and sometimes frowned-upon him: It was found that he had made his Will in Madrid four Years before, in which, in the first Place, he ordered, that his Creditors should be faithfully paid; that the Damage suffered by private Persons, on account of the Chafes which he had reserved in the Woods, and the Inclosures he had made in other Places for that End, should be made up. He left many Portions to be distributed amongst poor Virgins of good Reputation; he left other Legacies for the Redemption of Christian Slaves from the Turks; he left many pious Legacies to sundry Churches, and ordered, that his Executors should sell his Moveables to answer them, and if they were not sufficient, to make up the rest out of the Imposts and Taxes of his Dominions.

HE recommended, that Respect and Reverence should be paid to the Church of Rome, ordering, that the Officers of the Inquisition, appointed for the Extirpation of the growing Sects, should be honoured and esteemed; and that if ever there should happen any Dispute about explaining this his Will, it should be referred to the Decision of the Lawyers and Divines of known Skill.

HE ordered, that all his Royal Patrimony, with the Rights, Privileges, and Revenues of his Kingdoms, States, and Cities should be carefully preserved, and not alienated, pledged, or divided, but all to be preserved to his Heir, that he might be able, with the greater Vigour, to preserve the Grandeur of his Empire and the Catholick Religion.

LIKEWISE, that the Kingdom of Portugal, lately fallen to him by lawful Succession, with all the Islands in the Atlantick Sea, and in the East belonging to it, should continue united to the Kingdom of Castile, so as that at no Time, nor upon any Account, it may be separated from it.

THEN he appointed his most beloved Son Philip, his universal Heir to the Kingdoms of Castile, Arragon, Portugal and Navar. Under the Kingdom of Castile are comprehended the Kingdoms of Leon, Toledo, Galicia, Seville, Granada, Cordova, Murcia, Jaen, Algarve and Cadiz; the Canary Islands, the Indies, the Islands and Continent in the Ocean, the North and South Seas: Those that are already discovered, and those that shall hereafter be discovered.

UNDER the Kingdom of Arragon are comprehended the Kingdoms of Valentia, Catalonia, Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, Majorca and Minorca.

UNDER the Kingdom of Portugal are comprehended Algarve, the Countries and Cities in Africa, the Islands and other Countries in the East-Indies.

HE likewise appointed Philip Heir to the Dutchy of Milan, and the Dominions belonging to Burgundy, repeating the Clause, that all these Kingdoms and Dominions are left to his eldest Son and Heir, nor are they, upon any account, to be separated, divided or pledged, excepting when it shall be done by a solemn Act of the Cortez of the Kingdom, according to the Form prescribed by King John II. in Valladolid in the Year 1442. and afterwards confirmed by King Ferdinand and Isabella, and lastly by the Emperor Charles V. his Father, likewise in Valladolid in 1523.

AND if Philip should happen to die without Children, he appointed Isabella his Daughter to succeed, and if she should likewise die without Issue, he appointed Catbarina and her Children in the same Order; upon Failure of all which, he appointed Maria Augusta, his Sister, and her Children; in the same Order: And lastly, upon Failure of these, he appointed him, who by the Laws should be called to the Succession, provided he be a true Catholick, not stained with Heresy, or suspected of it¹.

FROM the Union of these Kingdoms he excepted the Dominions of Burgundy, under which are comprehended the Principalities of Luxemburg and Limburg, Namur, Artois, Hainault, Flanders, Brabant, Mecblin, Zealand, Holland, Friseland and Guelderland, which he had appointed to be the Infanta his Daughter's Portion. Lastly, in order to prevent the Dangers of an Inter-reign under Tutors and Regents, he renewed the Law, whereby the succeeding Prince is to be reputed of Age at the Years of fourteen, and can take the Government upon himself.

TWO Years after, being in the Monastery of S. Laurence, he added a Codicil, in which, confirming the former Will, among other Things he recommended, that his Rights to the Kingdom of Navar, and to Final, which he had lately got Possession of in the Genoese Territories, should be nicely revised by Men of Probity and Skill, and if they were found not altogether sufficient, for the Quiet of his Soul, they should be amended. In the same Codicil, Gregoria Maximiliana, the Daughter of Charles Archduke of Austria was appointed to be Philip's Wife; but in case she should happen to die before the Consummation of the Marriage, he was to marry her Sister Margaret. The Infanta Isabella was likewise appointed to be the Wife of Albert of Austria, and to have Flanders for her Portion.

PRESIDENT Thuanus says^a, that besides this Codicil, it was said, that he likewise left some private Directions and Memorandums, drawn up with many Notes, which, in the same Codicil, he ordered to be burnt after his Death. Amongst other Things he therein ingenuously confessed, that he had to little Purpose spent many Millions, and had reaped no other Advantage but the Kingdom of Portugal only, which he judged might be as easily lost, as the Hopes of conquering the Kingdom of France had been; therefore he advised his Son, in the first Place, to have a watchful Eye over the Interests of the neighbouring Kingdoms, and to take his Measures according to their Revolutions: In order to govern Spain aright, to be very careful of two Things, of the Civil Administration, by gaining the Affection of the Nobility and the Ecclesiastical State, and of the Navigation of the Indies; to endeavour to keep in Friendship with the neighbouring Princes, and not to trust the distant. He enjoined him, above all Things, to cultivate a strict Friendship with the Roman Pontiffs, and to pay them Respect, and, upon all Occasions, to shew a Readiness to assist them; to gain the Love of the Cardinals residing in Rome, that by their Means he might acquire Interest in the Consistory and Conclave; to win likewise the Favour of the Bishops of Germany, and to take care that the Pensions allowed them should not go through the Hands of the Emperor, or his Ministers, as formerly, but that they be paid them by his own Ministers: Lastly, he advised him to recall Antonio Perez from France, whither he was banished, and to order him to retire to Italy, upon Condition however, that he should not set his Foot in Spain or Flanders.

THUS did Philip dispose of his Dominions and order his other Affairs, and being now dead, his Body was buried with little Pomp in the Church of S. Laurence, close by the Corpse of Queen Anne his last Wife, as he had ordered. And the same Day King Philip, whom henceforth we shall call III. wrote to the Pope, with great Grief and Respect, advising him of the Death of the King his Father, and begging to be comforted by him in his so great Affliction; and two Days after he and his Sister went to Madrid, where there was great Preparation making for celebrating the Obsequies with great Pomp and Magnificence. The Mausoleum was erected in the Convent of S. Hierom on the Feast of S. Luke; and the King, with his Sister, the Ambassadors of the Pope, the Emperor, and of the Senate of Venice, the Military Orders, the Presidents of the Councils of Castile, of Arragon, of the Inquisition, of Italy, of the Indies, and other Lords and Grandees, assisted at this mournful Solemnity.

THE sad News of his Death was brought to Naples in the Beginning of October this Year 1598. and King Philip III. did not fail to write to the Magistrates of that City, advising them, that it had pleased God to call his Father to himself, and therefore he expected, that, with their wonted Fidelity, they would do whatever was for the Good of his Service, and obey the Count of Olivares, whom he had confirmed his Viceroy and Supreme Minister, as he had been hitherto his Father's. Whereupon the Barons, and the greatest Part of the Nobility and Officers, on the 11th of the same Month of October, met in the Royal Palace, from whence, on Horseback, they accompanied the Viceroy, and with the usual Ceremonies and Solemnities, the new King was proclaimed over all the City, and especially in the five Seggi of the Nobles, and that of the People. The next Day the whole City appeared in Mourning, and the Viceroy gave Orders for sumptuous Obsequies. The Mausoleum was erected in the Cathedral Church, where the Funeral Ceremonies were to be celebrated with Royal Pomp, and becoming so great a Prince. The last Day of January 1599.

^a Thuan. lib. 52. Hist. tom. 3. pag. 831.

was appointed for this great Solemnity, on the Evening of which it began, and ended the next Morning, with so great Magnificence and Pomp, that the like had never been seen before in Naples; the Viceroy intrusted the Care and Contrivance of the Devices and Ornaments, as well of the Mausoleum, as of the Church, to Ottavio Caputi of Cosenza, who, besides having performed the Charge committed to him, afterwards published a Volume, wherein are minutely described these pompous Obsequies, and the Devices and Decorations thereof, contrived by the Virtuosi of Naples, and especially the Jesuits, to which Order Learning was then in a manner confined.

KING Philip II. as well as his Lieutenants, by whom he governed this Kingdom, left us many useful and wholesome Laws, which, during the Forty-four Years of his Reign, according to the various Occasions, he sent directly from Spain, and which may be seen in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

C H A P. VIII.

The Polity of our Churches during the Reign of King Philip II. and to the End of the Sixteenth Century.

FROM the preceding Book of this History may be seen, how strenuously the Roman Pontiffs endeavoured to make good their Pretensions upon this Kingdom. The Council of Trent strengthened their Power still more; but that not being thought sufficient, in order to radicate it the more, they thought fit to publish that terrible Bull In Cœna Domini: They did their utmost to suppress the Exequatur Regium, and to make other Incroachments.

S E C T. I.

Of the Reformation of Gratian's Decree, and of the other Decretal Collections.

BUT as Gregory XIII. being born for great Undertakings, had thought fit to shew his Power in the Reformation of the Kalendar, so he would likewise have the Glory of completing the Reformation of Gratian's Decree. Antonius Democarus, and Antonius Contius, two famous French Lawyers, had before, without any Authority, begun to make a Catalogue of fundry Errors they found in Gratian's Decree, with a Design to reform it¹. But there being greater Diligence, and the Labour of more than two required, as soon as the Council of Trent was over, Pius V. pitched upon some Cardinals, and several Doctors, for undertaking that Work, and afterwards Pius V. added other two². But this Work was not completed till the Pontificate of Gregory XIII. who, while the Roman Reformers were all intent upon the Reformation, pushed them on to that Degree, that in the Year 1580. the Reformation was finished; whereupon he published his Bull³, whereby he approved of the Reformation, and ordered, that nothing should be added to it, altered in it, or taken from it.

³ Bulla Greg. Præmissa Corp. Jur. Can.

BUT as the Reformation of the Kalendar was not thought sufficient, and therefore was rejected by some, so that of Gratian's Decree was not looked upon to be so exact, but some discovered other Errors, and found Fault with the Reformers for their Carelessness; among the rest Antonius Augustinus, Bishop of Tarragona, was one, who left us many of his Works, but the most learned of them all, was that upon the Reformation of Gratian's Decree, and Stephanus Baluzius was another.

IN the Pontificate of Gregory, the Decretals were likewise reformed, and restored according to the antient Collections, and the Pontifical Registers; so that more correct Editions were published, amongst which that of Petrus Piteus, and Franciscus his Brother, is the best. From these Registers were afterwards compiled those five Volumes which contain the whole Pontifical Constitutions, under the Title of *Bullarium Romanum*¹. And to this Pope is likewise owing that famous Collection of the Tractatus Legales, which take up many Volumes.

ABOUT the End of this Century Petrus Matthæus, a Lawyer of Lyons, without any Authority, observing the same Number of Books, and the same Order of Titles with the Gregoriana, made another Collection of the different Pontifical Constitutions, established after the Sixth, the Clementine, and the Extravagant now printed, and called it Septimus Decretalium, and dedicated it to Cardinal Gaetano, which, though it was not approved of, we find in the last Editions added to the Antient.

BUT Gregory seeing that this seventh Book wanted publick Authority, resolved to have a seventh Book of Decretals collected by his own Authority, and committed the Charge of that Work to the Cardinals Fulvio Orsino, Francesco Alciato, and Antonio Caraffa; but soon after, Death put a Stop to his Designs: So that Gregory being dead, Sixtus V. his Successor, charged the Cardinals Pinello, Aldobrandino, Matteo Colonna, and many others with that Work², who could not finish it during Sixtus's Life; but the same Cardinal Aldobrandino being afterwards elected Pope, by the Name of Clement VIII. insisted upon having the Work compleated; and there being a Question started, whether they ought to insert in it the Canons of the Councils of Florence and Trent concerning Doctrine, it was thought fit to insert them: So that this seventh Volume was finished the 25th of July 1598. containing the Pontifical Constitutions and Decrees of Councils for 300 Years back, divided into five Books, and disposed under many Titles. But because in this Collection there had been many Decrees of the Council of Trent inserted, and it being already in the Press, under the Title of Septimus Liber Decretalium Clementis VIII. a great Doubt arose, which at last stopt the Publication of it; because if this Volume had been published, some Doctors and Interpreters would have been apt to make Glosses and Comments upon it, notwithstanding the severe Censures fulminated by Pius V. against those that should dare to gloss, or otherwise interpret the Canons and Decrees of that Council: So that by suppressing the Publication of this Volume, the Doctors were prevented from falling under those Censures, and it remains in profound Obscurity³.

Of Monks and Temporalities.

IT is truly surprizing to find, about the End of this, and the Beginning of the following Century, how much the Riches of the Monks had increased, and how great the Devotion of the People has been, and particularly of the Neapolitans, in squandering away their Goods and Estates to enrich them still more, and in erecting new Churches and Monasteries; no Will was made but they had Legacies left them, or other Dispositions were made in their Favour. To this was added the Piety of the Spaniards, who, besides enriching the old, got new Religious Orders to be introduced into the City and Kingdom. The bare-footed Carmelites, instituted by S. Theresa, who made that Reform in the Convent of Avila in Castile, were kindly entertained, not only by the Spaniards, but by the Neapolitans; and they were so much much taken with them, that a Monk of this Order, named Fr. Pedro, a Native of Spain, by the Sermons he preached in the Church of the Annunciation of Naples, received of Alms from the Neapolitans and others, the Sum of 14,285 Ducats, with which he bought the Palace and Gardens of the Duke of Nocera, which we now see transformed into their stately Monastery, and a magnificent Church called the Mother of God ¹. They afterwards spread themselves over all the Kingdom, and in 1630. were admitted into Bari ², in which Province they made wonderful Progress.

SHORT time after, in the Beginning of the new Century, five bare-footed Carmelite Nuns came to us from Genoa, who being kindly entertained both by the Spaniards and the Neapolitans, gathered a vast Sum of Money in Alms, with which they bought the Palace of the Prince of Tarsia, and gave 16,000 Ducats for it, which they converted into a very large Monastery, and a Church named S. Joseph ³. These likewise spread themselves over all the Kingdom; and these Monks and Nuns being much caressed and esteemed by our Spanish Viceroys, increased in Riches, and likewise joyning their Industry in obtaining Legacies and Lands, which, though contrary to their Institution, by Explanations and Apostolical Dispensations, they were capacitated to acquire, they have extended their Acquisitions to that Pitch of Greatness which all the World now sees.

THE Brothers of Charity, instituted by S. Juan de Dios (S. John of God) a Portuguese, were likewise favourably received and caressed among us. They came to us from Rome, at the Request of the Spaniards, and arrived in Naples in the Year 1575. being at first appointed to have the Overseeing of the Hospital of S. Maria della Vittoria; but there arising some Differences between them and those of the Hospital, in 1585. they were forced to leave it, and the antient Monastery and Church of S. Maria d'Agnone, in the Ward Capuana, was given them for a Habitation; and in 1587. with the Help of the Neapolitans, they bought the Palace of the Family of Caracciolo, with some adjacent Houses, where they built their Monastery, with their Hospital and a Church, which they called S. Maria della Pace (of Peace) ⁴.

A NEW Order called Of the Oratory of S. Filippo Neri, made a wonderful Progress amongst us. This Order was founded in Naples in 1592. under the Pontificate of Clement VIII. while Annibale di Capua was Archbishop of Naples. The Fathers that came from Rome to found it, at first lived in the Hospital of the Incurables; but having bought the Palace of Carlo Seripando, overagainst the great Gate of the Archbishop's Palace, for 5500 Ducats, given them by several pious Neapolitans, they converted it into a Church, and went there to live; but it proving too narrow for the great Number of People that came to hear their Sermons, and the Alms daily increasing, they began, from the Foundation, to erect a new and magnificent Church, and to enlarge their Habitations ⁵. In process of Time, this Edifice became the most noble and sumptuous of all that ever had been built in Naples, and at present vies with the most stately and magnificent Palaces of Princes; and their Riches are grown to an amazing Greatness.

THE Order of the Servants of the Virgin Mary, met with a very kind Reception among us. They had been invited by the famous Poet Giacomo Sannazaro in the Year 1529. to serve in a little Church he had built in Mergellina, by the Name of S. Maria del Porto and S. Nazario, which he endowed with a yearly Income of 600 Ducats for maintaining eight Priests of this Order, who were to perform the Divine Offices. But Giancamillo Mormile, the Poet's Heir, afterwards enlarged the Church; and Eugenio ⁶ writes, that in his Time there were 30 Monks of this Order belonging to that Church.

BUT in 1585. one of these Monks, a Neapolitan, named Fr. Agostino de Julis, having rented a Piece of Ground belonging to Ugo Fonseca, with the Alms of the Neapolitans, built a new Church for this Order in Naples, and called it Maria Mater Dei; then Giambattista Mirto, likewise a Monk of this Order, taken with the Pleasantry of the Situation, enlarged not only the Church but the Convent, by building more commodious Habitations, which are still remaining ⁷.

⁷ Idem, loc. cit. pag. 663.

AT this Time the Camaldoni made a great Progress among us, by the Bounty of Giambattista Crispo. He had a rich Farm near an antient Church called Salvatore a Prospetto, because it was situate upon a high Hill, from whence may be seen the Tyrrhenian Sea, with the Islands as far as Gaeta, and almost all Terra di Lavoro: He, in order to have these Monks near him, obtained an Apostolical Brief, that this Church should be given to the said Fathers, to whom he likewise gave the greatest Part of his Farm; and in 1585. at his own Charges laid the Foundation of the Hermitage. In Emulation of Crispo, Carlo Caracciolo, for carrying on the said Fabrick, gave them a great Sum of Money; and D. Giovanni d'Avalos, Brother to the Marquis of Pescara, in his Will left them a Legacy of 500 Ducats yearly, for building a new Church, to be called S. Maria Scala Cæli. The Marquis of Pescara, who was Heir to his Brother, made an Exchange, and in lieu of this Legacy, gave them 10,000 Ducats, with which they enlarged the Hermitage, and built the new Church ¹.

AT this Time the Capuchins likewise drew the Devotion of the Neapolitans to them; for in the Year 1530. Vincenzo Caraffa, the Archbishop, and the Elects of the City gave them the Church of S. Ephraim; they had been brought to Naples by Fr. Lodovico di Fossombruno, a Marcheggian, though some will have him to be a Calabrian ².

BUT in the Year 1570. the Zeal of the Neapolitans for this Order being increased, some Capuchins, with the Alms they got from them, particularly from Gianfrancesco di Sangro, Duke of Torre Maggiore, and Prince of S. Severo, from Adriana Caraffa his Wife, and from Fabrizio Brancaccio, a famous Advocate in these Times, built a very large Convent, upon a Piece of Ground given them, with other adjacent Territories, by the same Prince; and they likewise built a Conventual Church, and gave it the Name of the Conception ³.

THERE were new Churches and large Monasteries built for the antient Orders; the Dominicans, with the Charity of the Neapolitans, allured by a miraculous Image of the Virgin Mary, found in that Place, laid the Foundation of that stupendous Church and magnificent Monastery Della Sanita (of Health) ⁴. There was another stately Monastery built for this Order, with a large Church called Jesus Maria ⁵. That of S. Severus, and many others. The Carmelites, the Augustines, and the reformed Hermits of S. Augustine, likewise built Monasteries and Churches. Even the Minimes of S. Francis, in 1587. built a new and large Convent, with a magnificent Church, and called it S. Maria della Stella. Not to mention the Jesuits, whose Acquisitions and Foundations of new Colleges, and professed Houses, were very great and numerous. In short, there never was seen so frequent Erections of new Churches and Monasteries, nor so great Profuseness in giving and leaving to the Churches and Monks, as in the End of this Century, and the Beginning of the following.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXV.

THE Reign of Philip III. in Comparison of those of his Father and Grandfather, was very short, and therefore, with respect to our Kingdom, void of great and signal Events. He succeeded to his Father at the Age of little more than Twenty-one Years, and, according to the Custom of his Predecessors, took the Investiture of the Kingdom from Pope Clement VIII. on the 9th of September 1599¹. He reigned Twenty-two Years and a half, and died in 1621. Philip his Father left him the Monarchy, though of immense Greatness, by the new Accession of the Kingdom of Portugal, yet very much drained of Men and Money. He was a Prince of singular Piety, but of no Application to Government; and being contented with the Royal Dignity, he left the Care of the State to his Counsellors, Favourites, and Ministers. During his Reign we had four Viceroys in Naples, the first of which was D. Fernando Ruy de Castro, Count of Lemos, of whom, and of the remarkable Things that happened during his Government, we shall now briefly discourse.

C H A P. I.

Of D. Fernando Ruy de Castro, Count of Lemos; and of the Conspiracy hatched in Calabria, by the Means of Tommaso Campanella, a Dominican, and of other Calabrian Monks of the same Order.

THE Count of Olivares, for the Reasons related in the preceding Book, being removed, Philip III. appointed the Count of Lemos to be Viceroy in his Place, who having arrived in Naples the 16th of July 1599. with D. Catarina Zuniga his Wife, and D. Francesco de Castro, his second Son, began immediately (being of a noble and generous Spirit) to complete and beautify the publick Edifices, which his Predecessors had left unfinished. But he was soon diverted by a Conspiracy hatched in Calabria by Tommaso Campanella, which we are now going to relate.

THIS Campanella, on account of his wicked Life, and being suspected of Incredulity, after having suffered a long Imprisonment in Rome, had felt the Rigour of the Inquisition; and retracting his Errors, and seeming penitent, was set at Liberty, but he was ordered to retire to a small Convent in Stilo his native Town, and not to stir out of it. But being of a turbulent and restless Spirit, in revenge of the severe Usage he had met with in Rome, he began in that remote Corner to attempt Innovations. He persuaded the Monks of that Convent, that in the Year 1600. according to the Aspect of the Stars, of which he had great Knowledge, great Revolutions and Changes of State would happen, and especially in the Kingdom and Calabria; that therefore it was necessary to be prepared for them, and to persuade the People to rise up in Arms, because he had a Mind, during that Revolution, to change Calabria and the Kingdom into an excellent Republick, by shaking off the Yoke of the tyrannical Kings of Spain, and their Ministers, by crying out Liberty: And being a very pragmatical Fellow, he frequently in his Sermons said, that he was appointed by God for such an Undertaking, as was plain from the Prophecies of S. Bridget, the Abbots Giacobimo and Savonarola, and even from the Apocalypse, although it was obscure to others, yet he himself saw it very clear. That for that End he had chosen two Expedients, viz. the Tongue and Arms. With the Tongue to preach up Liberty against the Tyranny of Princes and Prelates, in order to encourage the People to shake off the Yoke, and that he would find many Monks that would be his Fellow-Labourers in that Work. As for Arms, it would be an easy Matter to draw in the Banditi and other Fugitives, and then to raise the Commonalty, break open the Prisons, burn all Processes; and thus, by setting every Body free, increase in Strength: Besides, he was sure to gain over many Noblemen and Prelates to this Undertaking by Land; and by Sea, he did not doubt but the Turk would be very ready to give him his Assistance.

HE began to instil these Notions into the People of Stilo, in the Year 1598. a little after the Death of Philip II. as he confessed in his Deposition; and that Province being then full of Fugitives, and the People oppressed with many Taxes, he not only drew in the Monks, but many of the Inhabitants of Stilo and the neighbouring Villages, who longed for nothing more than an Opportunity to make an Insurrection and Revolution.

HAVING

HAVING done this, he pitched upon Fr. Dionizio Ponzio, of his own Order, to go to Catanzaro and Nicastro, who, with great Vehemency preaching up the same Doctrine, enlarged upon the Facility of the Undertaking much more than Campanella: He said that Campanella was a Man sent by God, and therefore they ought to give Credit to what he said; that he was the most knowing and learned Man upon Earth, who having found out that great Revolutions and Changes were to happen in the Year 1600. therefore they ought not to let slip this fair Opportunity of making themselves a free People; that for this End many Preachers of different Orders, and among the rest the Augustins, Franciscans, and the Dominicans had resolved to demonstrate to the People, that the Kings of Spain were Tyrants, and had tyrannically usurped this Kingdom, and that therefore they were a cursed Generation; and that the People, in order to be able to pay so many Taxes and Contributions, were forced to lose both Soul and Body; that God had revealed to many Religious, that it was his Will to have the Kingdom relieved from such Slavery, and the Injustice of the King's Ministers, who sold human Blood for Money, and oppressed the Poor; so that they ought to concur in facilitating the Undertaking, and with their Friends, upon an appointed Day, at hearing Liberty proclaimed, to rise all up in Arms, it being concerted to put all the King's Officers to Death, break open the Prisons, set free the Prisoners, and in Token of Liberty to burn all Processes: And the Undertaking ought to seem the more easy to them, that many Cities of the Provinces were ready and prepared, and kept a Correspondence with some of the Nobility and Bishops, who were ready to deliver up their Castles to them, and were treating about being Masters of the Castle of Cotrone likewise.

AMONGST Campanella's most faithful and zealous Fellow-Labourers, besides Ponzio, he had likewise Fr. Giovan-Battista of Pizzoli, Fr. Pietro of Stoli, and Fr. Dominico Petroli of Strignano; and of the Dominican Convent of Pizzoli, more than 25 Monks of that Order had already made great Progress in assembling many Fugitives, and bringing over to their Party many other Religious and Calabrians; and the Defection had not only spread itself in that Province, but likewise in the Neighbouring.

ACCORDING to the Proofs which are to found in the Process of this Conspiracy (a Copy of which, in Manuscript, we have in our Possession) carried on by the Monks of different Orders, among the rest, of the Augustins, Franciscans, and Dominicans, there were more than 300 Preachers, who had the Charge of going about secretly to encourage and persuade the People to rise up in Arms. Among the Bishops that were privy to it, and secretly favoured the Undertaking, the Bishops of Nicastro, Girace, Melito, and Oppido are named. Some few Neapolitan Barons were likewise privy to it, but the Number of the Provincial Barons was very great, whose Names, out of Regard to their Families, which are still extant, we shall not mention here.

THESE Sermons (at least as Campanella and Panzio bragged) had gained over to them many Inhabitants of the Cities and Towns both of Calabria and the neighbouring Province. They reckoned up Stilo, with its Villages; both the Nobility and Commonalty of Catanzaro, Squillace, Nicastro, Cerisfalco, Taverna, Tropeja, Reggio, with its Villages; S. Agata, Cosenza, with its Villages; Cassano, Castrovillari, Terranova, and Satriano.

NOT only the Expedient of the Tongue, but that of Arms had made wonderful Progress. By Land, besides the Castles that had been promised, they had assembled 1800 Fugitives; and, on Account of the promised Indemnity, and imaginary Liberty, their Number was daily increasing: They promised to set at Liberty all the Monks from the Monasteries, to kill all the Priests and Monks that would not adhere to them, and to put all the Jesuits to the Sword. They designed to burn all the Books, and to make new Statutes; that Stilo should be the Capital of the Republick, and its Castle be called Mons Pinguis; and that Fr. Tommaso Campanella should be called the Messias to come, and he was already so named by some of the Conspirators. By Sea, Campanella kept Centries upon the Shore near Guardavalle, who, when any Turkish Vessels should pass, under pretence of redeeming some Slaves, were to go aboard and treat with the Turks, and to acquaint them with the designed Insurrection, that they might be ready to come and assist them in the Undertaking; besides, he sent Maurizio di Rinaldo, with eight of his Associates, aboard of the Gallies commanded by Murath Rays, who was then upon the Coast of Castelveterz, in order to treat with the Bassa Cicala about the Assistance of his Fleet, offering him many Forts and Towns; and at last, in the Month of June, Murat's Gallies having appeared on the Coast of S. Caterina and Guardavalle, in order to conclude the Treaty, and settle the Measures they were to take, it was agreed, that the Fleet should come in the Month of September, and that upon its Appearance the Insurrection should be made, by entering the Cities, crying out Liberty, and killing the King's Officers, and all that should make any Opposition.

BUT as 'tis a very difficult Matter, when there is Time, and the Number of Conspirators great, to keep such under-hand Dealings long secret, the Conspiracy was discovered by Fabio di Lauro and Giovan-Battista Blibia of Catanzaro, Accomplices in it, who laid it open to D. Luigi Xarava, then Attorney-General of the Province of the Further Calabria, and by whose Means they gave a full and distinct Account of it to the Count of Lemos the Viceroy. The Count sent immediately D. Carlo Spinelli, with most ample Authority, to Calabria, who, under pretence of fortifying those Coasts against the Invasion of the Turks, resolved to imprison all the Conspirators; so that having gone to Catanzaro, and on the last Day of August this Year 1599. taken the Depositions of Fabio di Lauro and Giovan-Battista Blibia, he began privately to imprison some of the Conspirators; but the Flight of one, who, in making his Escape, had been drowned in the Sea, and his Body having been afterwards found on the Shore, discovered the Matter; whereupon the Conspirators betook themselves to their Heels, and Spinelli was forced to act above-board. Some of the Inconsiderate were taken without Opposition, amongst which Maurizio di Rinaldo, was one, who, both before and after the Torture, made a full Confession; others made their Escape; but Tommaso Campanella, who had run to the Sea-side in Disguise, with a Design to embark, was found in a Cottage by the Means of the Prince of Rocella. Although Fra' Dionisio Ponzio had endeavoured to make his Escape among the first, yet he was taken in Monopoli, disguised in a Secular Habit.

AND truly the Conspiracy was discovered in the very Nick of Time; for the Bassa Cicala, according to the Treaty, on the 14th of September the same Year, appeared off Cape Stilo with 30 Gallies, but not finding that Intelligence which the Conspirators had promised him, on the contrary, seeing the Coast well guarded with Soldiers ready to receive him, he retired to S. John's Bay, and after a few Days Stay, set sail for the Levant.

THE Prisoners were examined, and put to the Rack, who in their Depositions discovered others who had been privy to the Conspiracy, and they were sent to Naples in four Gallies; and upon their Arrival in the Harbour, the Viceroy, for a Terror to the rest, caused two of them to be torn in pieces alive by the same Gallies, and four to be hanged at the Yards; all the rest were sent to Prison, in order to be punished according as they should be found guilty. Campanella, Ponzio, and some other Priests and Monks, were conveyed to the Castle.

THERE immediately arose a Dispute about Jurisdiction; the Ecclesiasticks pretended to be their Judges, and on the other Hand the King's Ministers said, that it belonged to the Royal Tribunals to take Cognizance of the Crime of Treason, notwithstanding that many of the Conspirators were Ecclesiastical and Religious Persons. But a Temperament was fallen upon, that the Nuncio, by a Delegation from the Apostolical See, together with one of the King's Ministers, which was D. Pietro di Vera, should judge the Priests and Monks; and in regard of the many and execrable Heresies, with which they were charged, the Vicar-General of the Diocese, with the Assistance of Benedetto Mandini, Bishop of Caserta, should proceed.

THE Monks were severely tormented, but in the Midst of the Torment Ponzio did not drop so much as one Word. Campanella was likewise put to the Torture, of whom we read a long Deposition made in the Month of February this Year 1600. in which, like a Fanatick or Madman, whether out of Malice or Terror, sometimes confessing, sometimes denying, he confounded and perplexed the whole Matter; he uttered so many odd and silly Things, that he had the good Luck to be taken for a Fool, whereupon he was condemned to perpetual Imprisonment, out of which, at the long run, he found Means to escape; and having fled to France, in the Year 1639. he ended his Days in Paris.

THE Laicks being judged by the Royal Tribunals, where sentenced according to the Crimes of which they were convicted: Counsellor Marcantonio di Ponte was appointed Judge Delegate for trying them, and many of them suffered cruel Deaths. Maurizio Rinaldo being condemned to be hanged, when the Sentence was going to be put in Execution before the Gate of Castelnuovo, said, that in order to ease his Conscience, he ought to reveal some Things of great Importance; the Viceroy stopt the Execution, and caused him to be conducted to the Vicariate, where he made a long Deposition, in which he gave a particular Account how the Conspiracy was carried on, and discovered a greater Number of the Conspirators, which he confirmed on the Rack; and soon after being carried back to the Place of Execution, he died ignominiously on the Gallows.

THUS ended this Conspiracy; nevertheless, the Viceroy had no sooner returned from Rome, whither he had gone this Year of the Jubilee to pay Homage to Pope Clement VIII. in the King's Name, than he was alarmed anew by the Turk; for Amurath Rays with seven Sail appeared in the Month of August the same Year, upon the Coast of Calabria, and landed his Men on the Shore of Scalea, with a Design to pillage that City, and the neighbouring Places; but D. Francesco Spinelli attacked them so vigorously, that they were forced to retire, though he lost his Life in the Action.

THE Viceroy was afterwards Witness to the Comedy which an Imposture represented in Naples, under the Disguise of D. Sebastian King of Portugal, the Story of which we have briefly related in the preceding Book. And the Countess of Lemos, the Viceroy's Wife, having persuaded the King to make the Tour of Italy, in order to see the Kingdom of Naples, his Majesty acquainted the Viceroy with his Intention, who thinking the Royal Palace of Naples too small for such a Guest, and so numerous and splendid a Court, resolved to build another more majestick and magnificent; and having obtained the King's Consent, he ordered the famous Architect Fontana to draw the Design. Thus was the new Palace of our Viceroy begun, which being afterwards carried on by D. Francesco de Castro his Son, is now looked upon to be one of the most stately Edifices in Europe, sufficient to receive not only one, but many Princes and Royal Courts.

DURING his Government Spain still continued to drain the Kingdom by new Donatives; and a Parliament being called to meet in S. Lorenzo, of which Alfonso di Gennaro was Syndick, the King got a Donative of 1,200,000 Ducats, besides 25,000 given to the Viceroy.

BUT soon after the Count falling sick, the Disease was so obstinate, and still increasing, that at last, on the 19th of October this Year 1601. he died. His Body was carried in great State to the Church of the Cross, belonging to the Friars Minors, where pompous Obsequies were celebrated. He governed the Kingdom two Years and three Months, in which Time he published seventeen Pragmaticks, whereby many Abuses in the Tribunals are removed, and other wholesome Regulations are established, which may be seen in the so often mentioned Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

BY Virtue of a Royal Writ sent him while he was ill, he left D. Francesco de Castro his Son, Lieutenant of the Kingdom, a Youth of 23 Years of Age, but ripe in Judgment and Wisdom, who governed till April 1603. during which Time he published ten Pragmaticks, and had the Kingdom to defend against the Incursions of Bassa Cicala, who in 1602. landed his Men, and pillaged *Reggio*¹. He yielded the Government to the Count of Benavente, appointed Viceroy by King Philip, of whom we are now briefly to discourse.

C H A P. II.

Of the Government of D. Juan Alfonso Pimentel d'Errera, Count of Benavente; and of the Disputes he had with the Ecclesiasticks about the Bull of Pope Gregory XIV. concerning the Immunity of the Churches.

THE Count arrived in Naples the 6th of April this Year 1603. and assiduously applied himself to the right Administration of Justice; and seeing, that by a Remissness of the Government, many Abuses had crept into the Tribunals, especially with respect to Criminal Causes, he set about in good Earnest to remedy them, by ordering all the Processes that were lingering in the Tribunals of the Provinces, to be brought to Naples, where the Guilty were quickly dispatched, either to the Gibbet, or the Gallies, or were otherwise punished, according to the Crimes of which they were convicted. He was rigid and severe in punishing Delinquents, and he often caused them to be dragged out of the Churches; for as the Number of wicked Men was increased, so was that of the Churches, so that they easily got Shelter there, which raised new Disputes with Rome about their Immunity, of which we shall discourse by-and-by.

THE Count of Benavente was puzzled and perplexed, not only with reducing the Tribunals into good Order, but with the Oppression under which the Subjects of the Kingdom laboured, and the continual IncurSIONS of the Turks. The Kingdom having been so much drained of Money, by the frequent and great Donatives, could ill bear new Burdens and Taxes. The Demands of the Court for new Supplies were never at an End, so that at last, of Necessity, a new Duty must be laid upon Fruit. The Commonalty were highly offended at so scandalous a Duty, and though they bore the Yoke, yet they inwardly abhorred it, and never failed to shake it off whenever they found a fit Opportunity. It happened, that one of the Collectors of this Duty had caused to be painted in his Office, situate in the Market-Place, the eight Patron Saints of the City; this seeming indecent to the Vicar-General of the Diocese, and resolving to do himself Justice, he sent one of his Officers, with Assistance, in order to blot out these Images; these, in an imperious and indiscreet manner, entering the Office, defaced the Images, and made a great Noise. Many run thither, and in an instant the Market-Place was full of People; some, spurred on by the Malcontents, believing that the Tumult had been raised for having the Duty taken off, rushed into the Office, in order to level it with the Ground, that all Vestige of so abominable a Duty might be removed. The Tumult came to that Height, that if the Viceroy had not sent some of the Troops to quell it, it had certainly turned to an open Revolt. All was quiet at last, and the Viceroy was resolved to punish severely the principal Heads of the Riot, and especially the indiscreet Officer sent by the Vicar, as the Author of the whole Mischief: The Ecclesiasticks opposed him in that, by pleading Jurisdiction; but the Viceroy punished the Ringleaders severely, and sent the Vicar's Officer to the Gallies.

A NEW Duty upon Salt likewise occasioned Murmurings and Disturbance; but the greatest Grievance of all was, that a Stop was put to Commerce, and the Currency

Currency of Coin, by the insatiable Greediness of the Money-Clippers and False-Coiners, which had like to have occasioned an Insurrection in the City; but the Viceroy immediately remedied that, by ordering the Zannette (a Coin of the same Value with the half of a Carlino *) whether of full Weight or not, to pass current, and the other Money to be received by Weight, that the Money-Clippers might be thereby prevented from clipping for the future.

THE Incurfions of the Turks upon the Coast of Puglia were no less frequent than hurtful, by pillaging the Country, and carrying off many People into Slavery. They had made the City of Durazzo in Albania a Place of Retreat, which is only about a hundred Miles distant from the Cape of Otranto. In order to dislodge them, it was resolved by all Means to destroy Durazzo. The Command of that Expedition was given to the Marquis of S. Croce, who, with a Squadron of our Gallies, arriving upon the Coast of Albania, he landed his Men and Artillery, took the Castle by Storm, and pillaged and destroyed the City.

ON the other Hand the Banditi continued to infest Calabria, whither D. Lelio Orsini was sent against them, and of whom he destroyed a great Number, but did not quite extirpate them; for their Number being very great, many of them retired and sheltered themselves among the inaccessible Mountains.

BUT the Disputes which the Viceroy had to go through with the Ecclesiasticks, on account of the pretended Immunity, not only with respect to their Persons, but the Churches, were no less painful and troublesome. The great Piety of King Philip III. and his little Application to the Government of his Kingdoms, encouraged them to make new Incroachments, and especially to get Gregory XIV's Bull about the Immunity of the Churches to obtain in the Kingdom. They made the more bold with us at this Time, that they saw King Philip take Pope Paul V's Part in that famous Quarrel betwixt him and the Republick of Venice, upon which there has been many Debates, and much Writing; and notwithstanding that the Cause of that Republick ought to have been common to all Princes, they managed Matters so, that the King not only was at great Pains to obtain an advantageous Agreement for them, by sending D. Francesco di Castro, his Ambassador to Venice for that Effect; but they persuaded him to order the Count of Benavente, our Viceroy, and the Count of Fuentes, Governor of Milan, to assist and defend the Apostolical See upon all Occasions; whereupon the Viceroy for that End sent Twenty-two Companies of Foot under the Command of Giantommaso Spina, and other Twenty under the Marquis of S. Agata: Whence it came, that amongst the Crowd of those, who wrote in this Cause in the Pope's Favour against P. Paolo the Servite, Fr. Fulgenzio, and Giovanni Marsilio, Divines of that Republick, there were many Spaniards, and likewise Neapolitans, and among these Regent Di Ponte was one, undeservedly reputed with us the strongest Defender of the Royal Jurisdiction.

IN the Year 1591. Pope Gregory had published a Bull, in which, derogating from the Bulls of Pius and Sixtus V. he restricted the Number of Crimes excluded from the Immunity; and what was yet more intolerable, he would have it, that the Ecclesiastical Judges should determine the Nature of the Crimes, and which were to be excepted, so as the Criminals might be taken out of the Churches; and that the Secular Magistrate should not dare to take them out, but with the express Licence of the Bishop, after he had found that the Criminals were unworthy of Sanctuary, for having committed Crimes excluded by the Bull.

FORMERLY it belonged to the Emperors to declare Churches Sanctuaries, and likewise to distinguish the Crimes, as may be clearly seen in the Books of the Theodosian and Justinian Codes, and during five intire Centuries, the Church did not establish any Canon concerning that Matter¹; which Prerogative, as has been shewed in the preceding Books of this History, was for a long Time kept up by our Princes. Afterwards there were some Canons established about it, and the Popes then did not fail in their Decrees to confirm and assume that Right to themselves. But the first Canons, and their first Constitutions were moderate and tolerable, so that the Bulls of Pius and Sixtus made no great Alteration among us, nor were they so much amiss as to give Ground of Complaint, as happened upon the Publication of this of Gregory, which contained Things most prejudicial to the Prerogatives of the King and his Magistrates. The Count of Lemos therefore, while he was Viceroy, did not suffer it to obtain in the Kingdom, but on the 2d of August 1599. ordered the Regent Martos to draw up a Report to the King of the Prejudices it contained; and on the 27th of February 1600. the King answered the Viceroy, ordering him to suffer no Innovation in that Matter, but to continue, as formerly, to take out the Criminals that fled to the Churches, he having ordered Application to be made to the Pope, that Gregory's Constitution might be moderated. The Count therefore, without any Regard to the Bull, having caused the Marquis of S. Lucido to be taken out of a Church, and advised the King of it; on the 17th of October the same Year, his Majesty answered him, that he approved of what he had done, and that he was not to suffer the least Innovation to be introduced relating to that Matter ¹.

BUT in the Government of the Count of Benavente, the Ecclesiasticks, grown more bold, undertook, by all Means, to have the Bull put in Execution in the Kingdom, at a very unhappy Juncture, when the City, by the Remissness of the Government, was quite depraved; when Crimes were more frequent, and when Churches were grown so numerous, that there was not a Corner where they were not in Plenty. To this was added, that besides Gregory's Bull, the Canonists, and other Ecclesiastical Doctors had written upon this Subject of Immunity, and vented such odd and extravagant Opinions about it, that, according to them, there could seldom happen a Case that would allow Criminals, for any Crime whatsoever, to be taken out of the Churches; and ascribing to the Ecclesiastical Court only, the Power of declaring the excepted Crimes, they run out into such Excess, that, according to their Maxims, it was impossible to name one that was excepted. Besides, at their own Pleasure, they extended the Immunity of Places, not only to Churchyards, Monasteries, Chapels, Oratories, Hospitals, and to the Houses of Bishops, but also to the Porches, the Houses, the Cloysters, Gardens, empty Places, and even Bake-Houses, that were near the Churches. In fine, they are arrived at such an Excess, that they don't stick to say, if the Criminal, though a Laick, should commit any Crime, while in the Sanctuary, the Ecclesiastical Judge may bring him to his Trial, under pretence that he had abused the Sanctuary.

THE Frequency of Crimes, and the so great Number of Churches alone, was sufficient to keep the Bull from taking Effect; and the Viceroy had the Example and Wisdom of the Roman Senate to bear him out, for, according to Tacitus ², the Abuse of multiplying Sanctuaries in many Cities in Greece, still increasing, insomuch that these Cities swarmed with profligate Men, occasioned by the Immunity of these Places, to the great Detriment of the State; the Senate, to whom Tiberius had committed that Affair, thought fit to restrict the Number of Sanctuaries.

THE Count therefore, in order more vigorously to curb the Pretension of the Ecclesiasticks, on the 30th of May 1603. wrote about it to the King, and they still pursuing their Design, on the 19th of July 1606. he redoubled his Instances, begging his Majesty to apply a speedy Remedy to so great an Abuse, because his Ministers had continual Differences upon that Head with the Ecclesiasticks, who by all means would have Gregory's Bull put in Execution, and for that End were continually thundering out Monitories and Excommunications, which was the same as to disturb the Kingdom, and trample the Royal Jurisdiction under Foot ³. After these Representations had been made to the King, there happening a Quarrel in Naples betwixt two Noblemen, in order to prevent Mischief, by a Royal Mandate they were ordered not to stir out of their Houses; they, not minding that, took upon them to walk up and down the City, and having met, fought a Duel, wherein one of them was killed; the Killer, with his Second, who was a Knight of Jerusalem, and a Servant, immediately took Shelter in the Convent of S. Caterina a Formello, belonging to the Dominicans. But the Sanctuary did not avail them, for the Viceroy having caused the Convent to be surrounded by two Companies of Spaniards, and that of Captain Alonso Modarra, the Doors being broke open, they were all three taken out, and carried Prisoners to the Gaol of the Vicariate; and the Cause being tried, in the Month of May 1610. the Killer was beheaded, and out of Regard to the Habit of S. Jobn, the Knight was saved.

² Tacit. lib. 3. Annal. cap. 31.

³ Chiocc. loc. cit.

THE Vicar of the Archbishop of Naples did not fail immediately to declare the Regent and Attorney-General of the Vicariate excommunicated, and to affix Schedules against Captain Modarra and the Corporal of the said Regent's Guard, who had broke open the Doors of the Convent, and taken out the Refugees; but on the 6th of the same Month the Viceroy did not neglect to send a serious exhortatory Letter to the Vicar, advising him to declare the said Censures null, and to remove the Schedules; and the same Day he sent another by way of Embassy to the Nuncio, desiring that he would order the Vicar to remove the Schedules; and on the 10th of the same Month he sent another to the Vicar: So that by delivering up the Knight of Jerusalem to his Judge Competent, the Affair was compounded, and the Bull dropt. Upon this Occasion the Regent Fulvio di Costanzo, Marquis of Corleto, wrote a small Treatise, which he addressed to Pope Paul V. wherein he clearly demonstrated, that Gregory's Constitution ought to be repealed, or at least moderated.

BUT these Recourses to Rome proved always fruitless; so that the Ecclesiasticks, whenever they found a fit Opportunity, constantly insisted upon having the Bull put in Execution. In the Pontificate of Clement X. an Expedient was fallen upon, of sending two Ministers to Rome for obtaining some Reform in the Abuses of the Ecclesiastical Immunity, one for the State of Milan, which was the Visitor Casati, and another for the Kingdom of Naples, which was the Counsellor Antonio di Gaeta, who likewise wrote a learned Treatise upon this Subject, and addressed it to Pope Clement X. and the Marquis of Astorga, then Ambassador in Rome; but the Message turned to no account, as ever since all Application made to the Court of Rome for having that Bull reformed, has had no better Success: So that now there's no other Remedy left, but when the Ecclesiasticks will proceed to Excommunication on account of this Bull, to punish them severely, by chasing them out of the Kingdom, sequestrating their Incomes, and imprisoning their Relations, as has been practised in our Time in the Government of Count Daun, when, to the great Scandal of the whole City, Censures having been fulminated against the Judges and the Attorney-General of the Vicariate; for having caused a Sorceress to be dragged out of an Oven hard by a Church, who had poisoned a vast Number of People, and was still preparing Poison in the very Place of Sanctuary; the Archbishop's Vicar and his Officers were chased out of the City and Kingdom, and the Vergers that had affixed the Schedules, were imprisoned, and the Archbishop's Revenues were sequestrated, to the great Joy of all the City.

WHILE the Count of Benavente, with so much Care and Application, was governing the Kingdom, News came to Naples, that King Philip, by the Suggestions of his Favourites, by whom the Monarchy was ruled, had appointed the Count of Lemos, the Son of D. Ferdinand, to be his Successor; whereupon, with great Grief, and the Countess his Wife with more, he prepared to receive him, and yield the Government to him; and in the Month of June 1610. the Count of Lemos having landed in the Island of Procida, he went to meet him, and though he begged of Lemos to enter the City and lodge in the Palace, yet he would not leave that Island, that his Predecessor might, with the greater Ease, prepare for his Departure. At last on the 11th of July the Count of Benavente set out from Naples, after he had governed the Kingdom for the Space of little more than seven Years. He left shining Monuments of his Justice and Magnificence. His Generosity appeared upon all Occasions that offered during his Government, especially in the Feasts, which he celebrated in 1605. on the Birth of Philip Prince of Spain; and in 1607. on the Birth of the Infant D. Ferdinand, who, under the Name of the Cardinal Infant, made himself so famous all over the World, by the Victory over the Switzers near Norlingen. To his Magnificence we owe those large and Royal Streets, one of which, adorned with fine Trees and pleasant Fountains, leads to Poggio Reale; and the other, beautified with a stately Fountain, and Statues of most exquisite Sculpture, leads from the Royal Palace to S. Lucia. It was likewise he that caused to be built the Bridge, and that magnificent Gate of the City which lead to the Chiaja, and he ordered the Gate to be called after his own Surname Porta Pimentella; and during his Government was built that great Edifice, appointed for the Use and Habitation of the Officers who take care of the Corn laid up in the publick Granaries for the Provision of the City. In the Island of Elva, on the Coast of Tuscany, he caused to be built the Fort Pimentello, and in the Kingdom, the Bridges of Cava, Bovino, and Benevento.

HE left us more than 50 Pragmaticks, all wise and prudent. By these he regulated the Fairs of the Kingdom, and ordered them to be held at the Times appointed in their Patents, and no otherwise; he severely prohibited the wearing of short Arms, and he was a Terror to False-Coiners and Gamesters; and he made other wholesome Regulations concerning the Provision of Corn, all which may be seen in the so often mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. III.

Of the Government of D. Pedro Fernandez de Castro, Count of Lemos; and the Statutes he made relating to our University, in order to have Discipline and Learning to flourish among us.

ON Pedro de Castro was the Son of D. Fernando, who died in Naples while he was Viceroy, and Brother to Francisco, who likewise governed the Kingdom in Quality of Lieutenant, by Virtue of a Power given his Father by the King. Upon his Arrival in Naples, he found not only the Kingdom, but the Royal Patrimony exhausted, and the publick Provision of Corn many Millions in Debt, so that the City had not wherewithal to furnish the Granaries with Corn, nor was there Money in the military Chest for paying the Soldiers. But he having applied himself to favour the Corporations of the Kingdom, in order to make them the more ready in paying the Taxes due to the King: To cause the Accounts, as well of the Royal, as the City Revenues, to be revised: To prevent the Frauds which were committed by the Managers of them, by entering the Books into a Register; and taking special Care to see that the Money was frugally managed, the publick Treasure and Provisions increased; insomuch that during his Government the Kingdom enjoyed Plenty of all Things.

HE likewise studied to have Justice duly administred, and Law-Suits quickly dispatched; he was severe and terrible to Malefactors, and he awed the Judges into a strict Punishment of them, and a faithful Discharge of their Offices.

BUT above all, he was a great Encourager of Learning, and had the Good of our University much at Heart, of which he has left us lasting and shining Monuments. He erected a magnificent and stately Fabrick for a Mansion to the Muses, which cannot be paralleled by any University in Europe. The Professors of this University, not having sufficient Room for their Exercises, had been forced to remove from S. Andrew a Nido, where they formerly taught, to the Court-Yard before the Dominican Church, where, in some Vaults underground, divided into three Rooms, they instructed the Youth; in the first of the two towards the South, and opposite to the Church, the Canon Law and the Greek Grammar were taught, and the Civil Law in the Second; in the other Room towards the West, the Liberal Arts were taught. But the Narrowness of the Place, unfit for such Exercises, and the Building not answerable to the Magnificence of the City; the Quarrels and Disputes among the Scholars being heard in the neighbouring Church; the troublesome Noise of the Bells, which frequently disturbed the Professors, induced the Count of Lemos, out of his Love to Learning, in which he had made great Proficiency, Proficiency, when a Youth, in the University of Salamanca, effectually to remedy all these Inconveniencies; and judging it below so famous an University, for which the Emperor Frederick II. and the Kings of the illustrious Family of Anjou, had so great an Esteem, to be in this Situation, he resolved to build a Structure suitable to the Sciences therein professed. Therefore, under the Direction of the famous Architect Fontana, he caused a large Edifice to be built without the Constantinople Gate, in the same Place where formerly D. Pedro Giron, Duke D'Ossuna, had caused the Royal Riding-House to be built: There was a large Theatre erected for the Publick Disputes, and Halls fit to contain a vast Number of Students; but what made the Work most surprizing, was the magnificent Porches, and the Prospects beautified with Statues of most excellent Sculpture. There was only wanting Knowledge in the Art of Inscriptions which were disposed upon the stately Fronts and Gates. In these Times Poesy was at a very low Ebb with us, and the Jesuits had ingrossed all manner of Learning to themselves; therefore the ablest Criticks, of which there were very few in Naples at this Time, took notice of many Errors in these Inscriptions; and there being in one of them in Letters of a Cubit in Length, ULYSSE AUDITORE, gave Occasion to Pietro Lasena to compose a learned Treatise De antiquo Gimnasio Neapolitano, wherein he lays open the Blunders of the Author of that Inscription.

ALTHO' this great Work was not finished, yet the Viceroy laid out 150,000 Ducats, which he collected over all the Kingdom. He had not the Pleasure of seeing it intirely compleated, because his Government was but short; however, though the Fabrick was not finished, he would have the University to be removed from the Place it was in, to this new Building; and to shew the Esteem he had for it, he must needs be present at the Solemnity, assisted by the Tribunals, and a numerous Cavalcade, the like of which had never been seen in Naples; and the Novelty was, that the Doctors of the College, and the Professors of the University were dressed after the Spanish Fashion, with a kind of Doctoral Badge, which the Spaniards call Capiroto, composed of various Colours, answerable to the different Sciences they professed. The Doctors of Divinity wore white and black; the Philosophers blue and yellow; the Lawyers and Canonists green and red; and all of them had Caps with Tassels of the same Colours. Thus, in the Year 1616, was the Royal University opened in this new Building, where the Viceroy heard the Oration pronounced upon this solemn Occasion.

THE Viceroy not only erected this noble Fabrick for the University, but he provided it with most excellent Laws and Statutes, which we read in the Body of our Pragmaticks¹, whereby he confirmed the Chaplain Major in the Government of it; he prescribed the Number of the other Officers, and what was incumbent upon the Provosts and Rectors, and the Method of chusing them; the Duty of the Beadles, of the Master of Ceremonies, of the Captain of the Guard, and of the Porters. And the Count being resolved to provide the University with a copious Library, in these Statutes he likewise prescribed the Method to be observed in preserving the Books, and the Duty of the Library-Keeper. He likewise founded a Chapel, and appointed a Chaplain, and prescribed the Feasts that were to be solemnized in the University.

HE disposed the Chairs, and the Matters therein to be read, and likewise fixed the Salaries of the Professors of each Faculty; he determined the Times of Vacation, and how long the Lectures were to last; he prescribed the Method to be observed by the Professors in reading, and how the Provosts were to perform their Visitations; and that none of the Sciences taught in the University were to be taught in private Houses. And what this Minister is much to be commended for, is, his having by severe Laws ordained, that none should be admitted to be Professors, but such as gave Proof of their Capacity by Disputation. The Emperor Frederick II. after he had reformed this University, in the Year 1239. made a Law², that none could assume the Title of Master, which we now call Professor, unless he had been carefully examined in Presence of his Officers, and the Masters of that Science which he pretended to teach. This careful Examination was done by Disputation, a Method not invented by Frederick, but very antient, and transmitted to us by the Greeks, as we read in *Lucian*¹, that in Athens, under M. Aurelius, upon the Death of a Professor, whoever underwent the Trial of a Dispute, and got the better of it, by the Suffrage of the Magistrates was appointed in his Place. In Constantinople likewise, by a Law established by Theodosius the Younger, the Examination and Election of the Professors were made *Cætu amplissimo Judicante*². The same being inviolably observed in the Universities of Spain, as also in many others of Europe, the Count of Lemos was resolved by severe Laws to have it established among us. He ordained, that all the Chairs should be filled by Disputation, inviting by publick Edicts, all those who had a mind to dispute: He prescribed the Method that was to be observed in publishing these Edicts; the Exercises the Disputants were to go through, and what they were to observe during the Vacancy of the Chair: He fixed the Number of Magistrates and Professors that were to have Votes in the Elections; the Method to be observed in them; the Dues that were to be paid by the Elected, and the Oath they were to give before they could take Possession.

AFTER the Viceroy had made such provident Regulations concerning the Officers who govern the University, and about the Professors, and the Manner of chusing them, he proceeded to regulate what relates to the Students; he ordered them to be matriculated, and when they have done with Grammar, to be examined before they can proceed to another Science; he fixed the Time for finishing their Studies; he prescribed the Method to be observed in the Disputes and publick Conclusions; their Exercises in Rhetorick, the Greek Language, Mathematicks, and Anatomy: And in fine, the Repetitions they are to make every Year to the Professors.

THESE were the Academical Laws which the Count of Lemos established for our University; after whose Departure, D. Pedro de Giron, Duke D'Offuna, his Successor, seeing that they were not punctually observed, on the 30th of November the same Year 1616. published a new Edict, in which he inserted all the abovementioned Laws, and ordered them to be inviolably observed³.

LEARNING was so much encouraged by the Count of Lemos, that at this Time there flourished a great many learned Men in Naples, and the Institution of Academies, begun in the Time of D. Pedro de Toledo, was revived. Of all the rest, at this Time the Academy of the Ozioli (Idle) flourished most, which had its Rise under the favourable Auspices of Cardinal Brancaccio, and met in the Cloysters of the Convent of S. Maria della Grazie, near the Church of S. Agnello, of which Giambattista Manso, Marquis of Villa, was Head; besides the learned Men of these Times, there were a great many of the Nobility, who had a good Taste of Learning, that were Members of this Academy, among the rest D. Luigi Caraffa, Prince of Stigliano, D. Luigi di Capua, Prince of Riccia, and a great many more. But the Count of Lemos himself made the most shining Figure of them all: He frequently went and read his Compositions in this Academy with the rest, and once he recited there a Comedy of his own composing, which was heard with vast Applause.

AT the same Time, in the Cloysters of S. Peter a Majella, there flourished another Academy, of which D. Francesco Caraffa, Marquis of Anzi, was Head, and of which D. Tiberio Caraffa, Prince of Bisigniano, Monsignor Pier-Luigi Caraffa, Giam-Matteo Ranieri, Ottavio Caputi, Scipione Milano, and some others were Members.

BUT through the Fault of this Age, Learning was not taught with such Politeness and Purity as it was afterwards towards the End of the same Century. Our Jurisprudence kept on at the old Rate, and both in the Chair and at the Bar, our Professors followed the Footsteps of their Predecessors. Philosophy was still confined to the Cloysters, where it was taught after their Scholastick manner. Physick was professed by the Galenists. The Study of Languages, especially of Latin, and Learning, was ingrossed by the Jesuits. Poetry, being quite degenerated, and metamorphosed, was exercised by hair-brained Fellows; and History was managed by few with that Dignity and Exactness it required.

NEVERTHELESS there was not wanting some Men of great Parts, who leaving the beaten Path, went the right Way to work, and at length gave Light to Posterity to follow their Footsteps; but in these Times there being but few such, they could not put a Stop to so great a Torrent. The bright Men then were Giam-Battista della Porta, so famous for the Works he left us. Pietro Lasena, an Advocate, and a Man of profound Learning. Fabio Colonna, a famous-Philosopher and Mathematician. Mario Schipani, an able Physician, and an intimate Friend of the great Virtuoso and Traveller, Pietro della Valle. Constantino Sofia, to whom Lasena dedicated his Book De Vergati; and Antonio Arcudio, a Priest of the Greek Church, and Arch-Priest of Soletto, in the Province of Otranto. And though Francesco de Petris at this Time published his insipid History of Naples, yet there were some able Men, who searched into our Records, and gave evident Proofs that they out-did him: Amongst which, Bartolomeo Chioccarello ought not here to be forgot and robbed of his deserved Praise; he, by the Testimony of *Pietro Lasena*¹, who was his great Friend, yielded to none in the most laborious Search into our Antiquities, insomuch that he was called Can bracco (the Setting Dog). For the Space of more than forty Years, he spent his Time in searching all the Royal Archives of the City of Naples, of the Royal Mint, the Royal Chamber of Accompts, and of the Chancery; he pryed into all the Protocols and publick Deeds of the antient Notaries of Naples, the Writs and Archives of all the most famous Monasteries and Cities of the Kingdom: Whence, in 1626. by Order of the Duke D'Alba, then Viceroy, he compiled those 18 Volumes of Writs concerning the Royal Jurisdiction. A Collection no less glorious than painful, and worthy of immortal Memory, which serves as a Buckler and Defence to the Supporters of the Royal Jurisdiction, against the so many Incroachments of the Ecclesiasticks, whose chief Aim is to trample it under Foot.

DON Ferdinando della Marra, Duke of Guardia, and D. Camillo Tutini, a Neapolitan Priest, likewise famous for the Works he left us, followed Chioccarello's Example. If D. Francesco Capecelatro, his Cotemporary, had gone on in his Work, he certainly would have left us a complete History of Naples. And Antonio Caracciolo, a Regular Theatin Clerk, in the Books he left us, gives evident Proof how much he understood that Study. There appeared afterwards the famous Camillo Pellegrino, a Capuan, who exceeded all these, and was the most careful Writer, and the most learned and witty Critick in our Antiquities, of any that ever we had.

BUT to return to the Count of Lemos; After he had adorned Naples by raising the University, he did not fail to beautify it with other Buildings. To him the Jesuits owe the Founding of the new College of S. Francis Xavier. To him we owe the Mills without the Walls of the City near the Gate Nolana; and to him likewise the Kingdom is obliged for several new Bridges for the Conveniency of Travellers. But the News that the King had appointed the Duke D'Offuna, who was then Viceroy of Sicily, to be his Successor, prevented him from doing greater Services to the Kingdom. He immediately quitted the Government of the Kingdom, and left D. Francesco his Brother in his Room till the Duke's Arrival; and on the 8th of July this Year 1616. he set out for Spain, in order to take upon him the Charge of President of the Supreme Council of Italy. He left us more than 40 useful Pragmaticks, which according to the Order of Time are to be found in the so often mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Government of D. Pedro Giron, Duke D'Ossuna ; and of his Expeditions in the Adriatick against the Venetians, which proved very unfortunate to him.

THE Duke D'Ossuna, in the Beginning of his Government, shewed an unwearied Application in attending unto, and providing for the Necessities of the Kingdom, and was very rigorous in seeing Justice duly put in Execution, without Respect of Persons ; and at the same time, in order to gain universal Applause and Good Will, he was very magnificent and liberal : To win the Affection of the People, he took off two Duties ; and to prevent the Court of Spain from being jealous, he made them believe, that it would be of great Advantage to the King's Revenues, an Ease to the Subjects, and render them more able to bear the Taxes ; and to confirm what he had insinuated, he obtained a Donative from the Kingdom of 1,200,000 Ducats, which he sent to the King for the Necessities of the Crown.

BUT a new War breaking out in Italy by the Death of Francis Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, the Success and Occasions of which are at large related by the Cavalier Battista Nani ¹, intangled the Duke D'Ossuna in more difficult and weighty Matters. For the Reasons given by this Author, King Philip III. was induced to enter into this War, and oppose the Duke of Savoy, whom, with a Spanish Haughtiness, he had ordered to restore all that he possessed in Monferrat. On the other Hand, the Venetians supplied the Duke with Men and Money ; whence proceeded the Disgusts between the Court of Spain and that Republick. To this was likewise added, that King Philip was obliged to assist the Archduke Ferdinand, his near Relation, whom, on account of the Uscoks, the Senate of Venice had offended. But however there was not open War declared between the King and the Republick, nor had their Ambassadors been recalled from their respective Courts.

HOWEVER, the Duke D'Ossuna striking in with the Humour of the Spaniards, who gave out that they were resolved to march their Troops against the Venetians, at the same Time that Cardinal Borgia was endeavouring to stir up the Pope against them, did not slip this Occasion, both of obeying the Commands of the Court of Madrid, and gratifying his own Inclinations, which were always averse to the Venetians ; and for the War in Monferrat against the Duke of Savoy, he sent to the Governor of Milan four Troops of Light Horse, and sixteen of Spearmen, under the Command of D. Camillo Caracciolo, Prince of Avellino, and 600 Cuirassiers, under the Command of D. Marzio Caraffa, Duke of Maddaloni ; and to assist the Archduke against the Venetians, he fitted out Ships for infesting the Adriatick, for which the Republick had a tender Regard. The Viceroy knew very well, that he could not touch the Venetians more to the Quick, than by disturbing their boasted Dominion of the Adriatick Sea, to interrupt their Commerce, although the Subjects of the Kingdom, who drove a great Trade with the City of Venice, were like to be Sufferers ; therefore he was wholly intent, not so much upon assembling Troops for the Relief of the Milanese, as upon fitting out Ships for plaguing the Venetians ; and having broke through the Security of Harbours, he seized a Ship belonging to one Pellegrino

Rossi. Nani ¹ says, that the Republick having ordered their Ambassador Gritti, to complain of this to the Court of Spain, he obtained an Order, directed to the Viceroy, for restoring the Ship, but he very disdainfully refused to obey it, not without Suspicion of the Connivance of the said Court, which liked to cover their more secret Designs with the Disobedience of a capricious Minister. For which Cause the Venetians, earnestly bent upon the Defence of that Gulph, reinforced their Fleet in that Sea with two Galeasses and some Ships, and pitched upon thirty Captains of Gallies, as Occasion should offer, to be making ready to put to Sea by Degrees.

BUT on the other Hand, the Viceroy seeing that the Uscoks had lost many of their lurking Places, invited them, especially those that were most troublesome to the Venetians, to come and freely make use of the Harbours of the Kingdom, and he likewise promised them Rewards. Therefore, under the Favour of this Protection, they took the Ship Doria, with other small Vessels, that were going from Corfu to Venice with Merchandizes, and, under the Viceroy's Colours, publicly sold their Booty; and though the Collectors of the Customs of the principal Ports of the Kingdom complained, that by such Traffick the King's Revenues would be impaired, the Viceroy threatened to hang them if they should offer to make any more Complaints. Nani, who was both a good Subject, and a favourable Historian with respect to the Duke D'Offuna's Actions, writes, that being naturally conceited of himself, and apt to vent boasting Expressions, he not only undertook to disturb the Sea, but was constantly talking of surprizing the Ports of Istria, pillaging the Islands, and penetrating into the very Heart of the Capital City: That sometimes on Sea Cards, sometimes by Words, he was describing the Designs, and ordering flat-bottomed Vessels fit for Canals and Marshes, and contriving Machines; nor would he give Ear to any but to those who soothed him in the Facility of the Undertaking: But however, it was not that he believed it could be put in Execution, but he was willing it should be believed, to the End that the Republick being put to the more Charges, and diverted by such Preparations, might not be so able to annoy the Archduke, and assist the Duke of Savoy. Therefore in all haste he sent twelve well-armed Vessels into the Adriatick, under the Command of Francesco Riviera; and though, just as they were upon the Point of sailing, Orders came from the Court of Spain, for a Suspension of Arms, it seeming odd to them, that at the Time that a Treaty of Peace was set on Foot in Madrid, the Viceroy should be committing Hostilities; he immediately called the Collateral Council, and made them draw up a Report to the Court, representing, that some armed Vessels belonging to the Republick having taken a large Ship just as she was entering the Harbour of Trieste, it was fit, both for the King's Honour and Service, that Riviera should sail and be revenged of the Venetians: So that he ordered Riviera to depart, and that it might not be imputed to the King as an Act of Hostility done in his Name against the Republick, the Ships sailed under the Viceroy's Colours only.

THE Republick, therefore, ordered Belegno, who commanded their Fleet, to assemble that part of it that was nearest at Hand, in order to go to Curzola and cover the Islands, and particularly to frustrate the Viceroy's Design of appearing upon the Coast of Istria, for encouraging the Archduke Ferdinand's Troops, and diverting those of the Republick. Belegno followed his Orders, for the Viceroy's Ships were no sooner come to Calamota, than he set sail with his Fleet to meet them; whereupon Riviera, judging that he would be at a Disadvantage to fight in that Place, tacked about, and with a prosperous Gale arrived at Brindisi.

THESE Motions having given Jealousy to the Turks, they marched in all haste to the Sea-Coast in great Numbers to cover and garrison their maritime Places; whence the Viceroy took the Opportunity to ask Assistance from other Powers, giving out that he had no other Design than to infest the common Enemy, for which end he solicited the Pope, the Maltese, and the Duke of Tuscany to join their Gallies to his Fleet. But the Ministers of the Republick at these Courts made strong Instances to the contrary, saying, that the Viceroy had sent Slaves and Presents to the Prime Vizier, in order to induce and stir him up to make War upon the Republick; and they prevailed so far with those Princes, that they not only did not send him their Gallies, but endeavoured to divert him from the Undertaking, saying, that it would be a Means to encourage the Turk, and draw him into the Adriatick upon the Coasts of the Kingdom of Naples, and the State of the Church.

BUT for all that the Viceroy did not forbear to send Pietro di Leyva with nineteen Gallies to join Riviera, who with this new Reinforcement having failed to S. Croce, and finding the Venetians at Lefina of inferior Force, he endeavoured to draw them out to an Engagement; but they standing upon the Defensive, and the Night coming on, obliged the Spanish Fleet to retire to Brindisi, with a Booty of two Ships, one of them belonging to Sali, and the other to Holland, which having on Board some Venetian Soldiers, were surprized by the Viceroy's Fleet. The Venetians considering the Importance of the Affair, reinforced their Fleet; and on the other Hand the Duke D'Offuna increased his to 18 Ships, and 33 Gallies, which appeared off Lefina, with a Design to provoke the Venetians to a Battle: And in the mean time the Spanish Ministers, in order to alarm the Republick, had given out, that the Fleet of Gallions, that used to preserve the Navigation of the Ocean, having entered the Straights of Gibraltar, were bound for the Adriatick, and that a great Fleet was fitting out in Sicily; which Reports were partly credited by the bold Proceeding of the Viceroy, who, besides having augmented with some Gallies Leyva's Squadron, made the Uscoks scowre the whole Gulph, and in Sight of Venice itself, they made Prizes, and did great Damage; insomuch that the Senate was forced to appoint some Gallies for guarding Cbioggia, and to pick out a certain Number of Men in Venice to be ready at a Call with their Arms; which being a new Thing in that City, had put the People in a terrible Consternation, who, upon a false Report, that the two Fleets having come to an Engagement off Lefina, the Venetians had gained a signal Victory over the Spaniards, went in great Fury to insult D. Alfonso de la Cueva, Marquis of Bedmar, King Philip's Ambassador in Venice, who was thought to be the chief Instigator of the Viceroy's Attempts.

HOWEVER, though the Spanish Fleet had provoked the Venetian, yet they never came to an Engagement; so that Leyva, seeing that the Venetians stood upon the Defensive, steered for Old Trau, where he burnt the Country, and took many Barks; from thence he sailed towards Zara, where he fell in with some Vessels, which diverted him from a greater Victory; for, notwithstanding he had positive Orders to endeavour to surprize and possess himself of Polo, or some other Port of Istria, meeting with two Merchant Gallies, and covetous of Prey, he trifled away his Time in taking them, with some Vessels that were carrying Provisions to the Enemy's Fleet, which in the mean time came up with him unawares, and he being incumbered with the Prizes and the rich Booty, stood directly for Monte Gargano, and keeping close by the Shore, he at last arrived with his Fleet and Prizes at Brindisi, and soon after the Enemy's Gallies came out of the Gulph. The Viceroy gave Leyva a severe Reprimand for having lost the Opportunity of gaining a Victory, by taking Prizes; however, he bragged of the Booty, and ordered the Goods and Vessels to be brought to Naples, being very much rejoiced at the Discontent which the Loss occasioned in Venice.

IN the mean time the Ministers of the Republick in all Courts exclaimed against the Viceroy, who, in the midst of a Treaty of Peace, had committed these Hostilities, and insulted the Republick in their own Gulph, and who keeping a Correspondence with the Turks, was endeavouring to draw them into a War against the Republick, who besides were threatening to do themselves Justice upon it with Arms, for the Loss they had sustained in the said Prizes. But at the same time the Viceroy did not fail likewise to cry out against the Venetians, saying, that their bragging of a Dominion, which they imagined they had over that Sea, was intolerable; that by the Law of Nations Navigation was free, and much less could they pretend to deny it to the Fleets of the Catholick King, who owns no Superior in the World. At this Time, and upon these Emergencies, 'tis said, that the Marquis of Bedmar, the King's Ambassador in Venice, in order to touch the Venetians to the Quick, had caused M. Velfero, or, as some will have it, Niccolo Pierescbio (which is likewise suspected from what Gassendus says in his Life) to write that Book, intitled, Squittinio della liberta Veneta: A Book, which hit the Venetians so home, that they had much ado to find a Writer able to confute it; and at last, not finding any other, they made Theodore Grass-Winked, a Hollander, answer it, by a Treatise, intitled, Majestas Reipublicæ Venetæ; as Scipione Errico, and Raffael della Torre, a Genoese, did afterwards.

THE

THE Viceroy wrote likewise to Pope Paul V. representing to him how outrageous the Venetians were, and the Necessity he lay under to make those Expeditions in the Adriatick; and as to what they charged him with, of being in Friendship, and having a Correspondence with the Turk, he said, that the Spaniards had never had either Peace or Truce with him, as the Venetians had, and that the War he was carrying on against them, was not against Christians, because they were not such but only by Name; for in the late Disputes having shaken off the Obedience and Respect due to his Holiness, they could not pretend to be Christians; and so much the more, that they had banished out of their Dominions, an Order so Exemplary, and so full of Zeal for the Service of God, as that of the Jesuits; besides they supported the Hereticks of France, and employed them in the Duke of Savoy's Service, and in their own Armies and Fleets entertained the Hereticks of Holland, who profaned the Churches of the Archduke's Territories, and therefore he would fain know what Religion they were of, and whether they were not such Christians as the Moors and Hereticks?

BUT notwithstanding these hot Disputes between the Viceroy and the Republick, the Treaty of Peace was still carried on, which being removed from Spain to France, was at last concluded in Paris, and the Articles were drawn up and agreed to in Madrid, and accepted by the Republick; so that their Ambassador having complained to the Court of Madrid against the Viceroy, the King ordered him to restore the Vessels and Goods to their Minister residing in Naples.

TOLEDO the Governor of Milan, and the Marquis of Bedmar, the King's Ambassador in Venice, were no less displeased with the Peace than the Duke D'Offuna, and they did their utmost to obstruct the Execution of the Articles; but especially Offuna, who, under pretence that the Venetians were building a Fort at S. Croce, gave out that he was resolved to scowre the Gulph anew: And as to the Order for restoring the Ships and Goods, he seemed ready to obey it so far, as to deliver the Ships to Gaspare Spinelli, the Republick's Resident, but not the whole Goods, saying, that a great Part of them were confiscated to the King, as belonging to Jews and Turks, Enemies to the Crown of Spain; so that the Resident refusing to take what was offered him, the Duke sent Francesco Riviera, with 18 Men of War, to commit fresh Hostilities in the Adriatick. The Governor of Milan likewise started Difficulties in the Execution of what came to his Share; whereupon the Pope, the French, and the other Princes having interposed, the Marquis of Bedmar was forced to give his Parole to the Senate of Venice, that all should be restored, but for all that, there still arose new Difficulties, till at last the Peace being executed in Piemont and Istria, Riviera returned to the Harbour of Brindisi with his Fleet; and the Venetians crying out now more than ever at the Court of Madrid against Offuna, they got the Affair of restoring the Vessels and Goods to be referred to Cardinal Borgia, with an Order for him to compound the Matter with Girolamo Soranza, the Republick's Ambassador in Rome.

BUT in the Beginning of this Year 1618. the Reason was found out, why, notwithstanding the Peace, Offuna, Toledo, and Bedmar always kept armed Vessels in the Ports of the Adriatick, which never left off infesting that Sea, whereby the Venetians were provoked to make Reprizals, to the great Prejudice of the Neapolitans, who represented their Losses to the Court of Spain. All proceeded from the Issue that was expected of a Conspiracy carried on in Venice by the Marquis of Bedmar, to which Offuna and Toledo were privy and Partakers in it. The Marquis had endeavoured by all Arts to make a Faction in Venice, and had likewise found Means to intice many to leave the Service of the Republick, and to introduce others in their Room, in order to make use of them upon Occasion. Among these Offuna sent a certain Jaques Piere, a Frenchman of Normandy, and a Pirate by Profession, but a Man of a great Spirit. He, pretending to be disoblged by Offuna, feigned to be revenged of him, by entering into the Service of the Republick, into which he was gladly received, with an Associate, named Langlad, skilled in Fire-Works. Offuna pretending to be highly offended at this, ordered Piere's Wife to be put in Prison, and by sham Letters offering him a great Reward, invited him to return to his Service. On the other Hand, Piere, in order to make himself acceptable to the Venetians, produced the Letters, proposed many specious Things, pretended to discover the Viceroy's Designs, and suggested Means for blasting them. Thus having gained great Credit, he got Langlad to be employed in the Arsenal. Afterwards he he had secret Meetings with the Marquis, and a private Correspondence was carried on with the Viceroy; and in the mean time they had gained over some Burgundians and French to their Party. The Concert was, that Offuna should send, under the Command of an Englisbman, named Haillet, some Brigantines and Barks, fit to enter the Ports and Canals, of which they had taken the Breadth and Depth; then larger were to follow, and anchor off Friuli, under the Protection of which, and in the Confusion of the People by the entering of Haillet, the Conspirators were to perform the Parts that had been assigned them, Langlad to set fire to the Arsenal, others to different Parts of the City, some to seize the Mint, massacre the Nobility, and all to enrich themselves with the Plunder of the City.

BUT while the Brigantines were making ready to join, some of them were taken by Pirates, and others were dispersed by a violent Storm; so that the Conspirators being disappointed, they were forced to delay the Execution of their Design to the next Autumn. Piere and Langlad being ordered to go aboard of the Fleet, could not refuse to go along with the Captain-General Barbarigo. The rest, who remained in Venice, impatient of Delay, were still considering of the Method of Execution; but having frequent Meetings among themselves, and, in order to increase their Number, trusting others of their own Countrymen with the Secret, Gabriel Moncassin and Baldassar Juven, Gentlemen, the last of Normandy, and the other of Dauphine, discovered the Conspiracy to the Council of Ten; whereupon some of the Conspirators being imprisoned, the Plot was proved, both by Papers that were found, and the Confessions of the Guilty, who were brought to condign Punishment; However some, upon the seizing of their Associates, made their Escape, and run to Offuna for Protection; but Piere and Langlad, by an Order sent to the Captain-General, were thrown into the Sea. The City of Venice was struck with Horror at the Discovery of such a Conspiracy, and the Risque they had run of seeing their Churches and Houses on fire; the Marquis of Bedmar therefore, who was reputed the Director and Manager of so wicked a Design, seeing himself in great Danger of being sacrificed by the Fury of the People to the Publick Resentment, retired privately to Milan. The Senate had already sent a Messenger express to King Philip, resolutely demanding to have him recalled; whereupon the Court of Madrid disapproving his Conduct (it being usual, that the Effects of such Intrigues please Princes better than the Means) the Venetian Ambassador was answered, that Lodovico Bravo had been already appointed to succeed the Marquis, who was to go to Flanders to assist the Archduke Albert.

UPON the Discovery of the Conspiracy, our Viceroy denied his having had any Hand in it, though the World looked upon him as guilty, seeing that the Fugitives fled to him for Protection, and that Piere's Widow being set at Liberty, was honourably convoyed to Malta; but not troubling himself about such Reports, he continued to keep his Ships ready armed, in his own Name, and at vast Expences, though he provided them with Artillery by disgarnishing the principal Forts of the Kingdom; of which grievous Complaints were sent to the Court, to which those daily given in against him by the Venetian Ambassador being added, it was thought he would have been removed from the Government; but with the Assistance of the Relations and Friends he had in Madrid, and by the frequent Representations to the King of his signal Services, he still vindicated his Proceedings; and in the mean time he did not fail to plague the Venetians in the Adriatick.

MORE Complaints were always giving in against the Duke, among the rest, that he oppressed the Kingdom, by making the People serve as Soldiers; that he led a most scandalous Life, and, to the great Grief of the Dutcheß his Wife, not content with the publick Whores, he took the Liberty to converse too freely with the Ladies of greatest Distinction, thereby giving a Handle to the Vulgar to speak dishonourably of the most conspicuous Families of the Kingdom, to the great Indignation of the Husbands and Relations, who in Time may be provoked to some desperate Attempt; therefore the Nobility earnestly solicited the King to remove him from the Government; and they resolved to send secretly to Court F. Lorenzo de Brindisi, a Capuchin, who had the Reputation of a most holy Life, and was in great Esteem with King Philip on account of his Piety. The Duke having had notice of the Message, endeavoured to prevent it; for which end, by Order of Cardinal Montalto, Protector of the Franciscans, he got the Capuchin to be stopt in Genoa; but some Time after having got Liberty to pursue his Voyage, and being arrived at Court, he represented the Duke's Actions to the King; and to whose Relation, the Complaints of many of the Nobility, who had privately gone to Madrid, being added, although the Duke had left no Stone unturned in order to defend himself against what was laid to his Charge, his Favourers were not able to support him any longer, so that it was resolved by the Court to recall him.

IT was reported, and by some Events afterwards confirmed, and Nani takes it for granted¹, that the Duke finding that he was like to lose his Post, thought of changing his Ministry into Principality; for which End, by Means of Giulio Genuino, an Elect^{*} of the People, a Man of ready Wit, a * A Magistrate. Contriver of Novelties, and greedy of Commotions and Sedition, he had curried Favour with the Commonalty; besides he had foreign Troops in his Pay, and Ships of Force at his Command: He protected the People, without Distinction, against the Barons, and gave out that he would redress their Grievances, and take off the Taxes; nay, passing one Day, where, in order to adjust the Duty, some Provisions were weighing, he cut the Ropes of the Ballance with his Sword, giving to understand, that he would have the Fruits of the Earth to be free, as the Gifts of the Air and Heaven were gratuitous: And Nani adds, that hoping the Princes of Italy would back him in his Design, by most secret Methods he sounded the Duke of Savoy and the Venetians; the last by insinuating to them, that whatever he had done was by express Orders from the Court of Madrid; the first by inviting him to join in driving the Spaniards out of Italy; but the Republick, far from giving Way to such a Proposal, and always cautious, would not so much as hearken to it: The Duke communicated the Project to the Court of France, and the Duke De Lesdeguieres, Constable of France, sent a Person to Naples, to observe the State of Affairs.

THE Court of Spain, which, by reason of the great Distance from it of many of its Dominions, had a Maxim of being diffident of the Ministers that governed them, having a watchful Eye over the Proceedings of the Duke D'Offuna, easily found out his Intrigues, and resolved without Delay immediately to remove him; but afraid, that by sending him a Successor from Spain, he might take Advantage of the Delay to strengthen his Disobedience, they ordered Cardinal Borgia, with all Haste and Caution, to go from Rome to Naples, take upon him the Government, and turn out Offuna. But as the Cardinal was to set out in the Month of May this Year 1620. it could not be done with so much Secrecy but the Duke had notice of it; and having in vain endeavoured to delay his coming till October, when he saw that his Successor was come to Gaeta, he resolved to lay a Snare for him; he caused to be prepared for him in Pozzuolo, where he supposed he was to stay that Day, a Lodging fit for the Purpose; but the Cardinal being jealous, instead of lodging in Pozzuolo, went to the Island of Procida.

IN the mean time Genuino, exaggerating to the Commonalty the Benefits they had received from Offuna, and that if he should leave them, the Spaniards would treat them more harshly, had raised a Commotion in order to hinder the Cardinal from making his Entry into the City, and by that Means to prolong the Duke's Government; of which the Cardinal being advised, that he might not expose himself to the Insults of the Populace, he resolved to enter the City privately; and having concerted the Method with the Governor of Castelnuovo, who was to be ready to open the Gate of the Castle, he went aboard of a small Boat, and landed at Pozzuolo, from whence, hiddenly in the Night-time, he went in a Coach, and got into the Castle, and early the next Morning, the Arrival of the new Viceroy, and the Removal of Offuna, was proclaimed to the City by the firing of the Guns: Nevertheless, as much as the Shortness of Time would allow him, he did not fail, by fair Promises, to stir up the Commonalty, and the Troops by Presents; and he wrote to the King, complaining of the Cardinal for having entered the City by Stealth, when he had readily offered him the Gallies; but that he reckoned the putting up this Affront among the other important Services he had done to the Crown, because, as he could easily have hindred him from entering the City, so after he had entered, with his Sea-Forces, and 6000 Spaniards, who were all at his Beck, he could easily have driven out the Intruder, for such he ought to be reputed, because of the illegal and clandestine Possession, taken in an unusual Place, and without the wonted Ceremonies; that he likewise could have punished the Insolence of the Governor, who in the Midst of the Night opened the Gates of the Castle, and the Regents of the Collateral Council, and the Effects of the City, for having arrogated to themselves the Power of removing and posting Viceroy's at their Pleasure, but that he sacrificed every Thing to the Service of the Crown, and was coming to justify himself before his Majesty, in the Face of the Court. Therefore, on the 14th of June this Year 1620. he thought fit to set out for Spain, and left his Wife and Children in Naples, having first sent Gemuino to Piombino in the Disguise of a Sailer, in order to keep him from his deserved Punishment, where he afterwards took him on Board in his Passage, and carried him along with him to Spain; but to give Time to the King's Passion to be allwaged, he proceeded very slowly on his Voyage, and after two Months arrived at Marseilles, where he diverted himself with Feasts and Balls, and shewed a great Backwardness in pursuing his Voyage.

IN the mean time Cardinal Borgia, as soon as Offuna was gone, began to punish those that were guilty of the late Tumults, and committing their Trial to the Counsellor Scipione Rovito, Processes were entered against them, and many of the Guilty were put in Prison, and Gemuino was first declared contumacious, and then proclaimed a Rebel, all his Goods were confiscated, and his Moveables sold, although his Relations opposed the Sale, alledging he was of the Clergy. In order to undo what his Predecessor had imperiously done, he imposed again the same Taxes that had been taken off by the Duke, and he made other Regulations, which we read in the three Pragmaticks, that in the short Time of his Government he left us.

BUT at last, after so tedious a Voyage, the Duke arrived at Madrid, and, by the Means of the Duke D'Uzeda, and his other Friends and Relations, having made his Peace with the King, he so artfully cleared himself from what had been laid to his Charge, and on the contrary aggravated the Cardinal's Conduct, that he had the Assurance to desire, that the Cardinal might be removed, and himself sent back to continue the Exercise of his Charge. The Council of State, which, according to the lamentable Condition of that Court, was governed by the capricious Favourites, debated the Matter, and if the Ambassador of the City of Naples had not stoutly opposed the Duke's Pretension to return, a worse Decision had followed; even, although it was not resolved that the Duke should return, the Cardinal's Conduct was disapproved, and it was carried that he should be removed, notwithstanding the Complaints of the Dutches of Gandia his Mother, who cried out mightily against the bad Usage of her Son, after he had served his Majesty so well; and the Duke strenuously insisting upon his Returning, an Expedient was fallen upon, to suspend the Election of a Viceroy, and in Place of Borgia, to send Cardinal Antonio Zapatta, who was then in Rome, to be Lieutenant of Naples, and accordingly he went thither in the Month of November the same Year 1620.

BUT the Death of King Philip III. happening soon after, the Duke's Friends could protect him no longer; for King Philip IV. coming to the Crown, and the Count D'Olivares, who was no Well-wisher to the Duke, being made Prime Minister, the King ordered a new Juncto of Ministers to examine judicially the Crimes laid to the Duke's Charge, contained in the Reports drawn up by the Counsellor Scipione Rovito, and sent to the Court by Cardinal Borgia's Order. The Business was strictly examined, and the Duke being found Guilty, was ordered to be arrested, and with a strong Guard was sent to the Castle of Almeda, where, after a long Imprisonment, he pined away with Grief, and on the 24th of September 1624. ended his Days. He was so given to sensual Pleasures, and had such an immoderate Ambition to Command, that all his fine natural Endowments were eclipsed. He left us many prudent and commendable Regulations, which are to be seen in the Volumes of our Statutes, pointed out, according to the Order of Time, in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome.

C H A P. V.

The unhappy Government of D. Antonio Zapatta: The Death of King Philip III. and the Laws he left us.

UPON Cardinal Zapatta's Arrival in Naples (to whom Borgia yielded the Government on the 12th of December this Year 1620. and departed that same Day) he was received with the Approbation of the People, who having been oppressed by the late Calamities, wished for nothing but Plenty; therefore, in order to answer their Desires, he kept a watchful Eye over the Sellers of Eatables, lest they should alter the Prices regulated by the Elects of the City, punishing severely such as did not sell according to the Assizes. He visited the Prisons of the Vicariate, and being of an easy Access, he very readily heard all Sorts of Persons; and thus providing for the Necessities of the Subjects in the Beginning of his Government, he gained the Applause and Blessings of every Body. The Death of Pope Paul V. happening in the Month of January this Year 1621. he left as Lieutenant in his Absence, D. Pedro di Gambia y Leyva, General of the Naval Squadron of Naples, and went to Rome to assist in the Conclave; and on the 9th of February, Alessandro Ludovisi being elected, who took the Name of Gregory XV. he returned to Naples, resumed the Government, and went on with the same common Applause, which increased still more, when they saw the Tribunals reformed, the constant Attendance of the Judges ordered, and the quick Dispatch of Law-Suits, he having for that End, caused a Bell to be hung in the Capuan Palace, which, at an appointed Hour, being rung for calling the Judges and others concerned, left no Room for any pretence of Delay.

BUT two unhappy Emergencies interrupted the Course of his commended Administration, and rendered his Government troublesome and unfortunate. To the preceding Years of Dearth, another much worse had followed, so that an extreme Scarcity of Provisions ensued: To all this was added, that for four Months together, there fell from the Heavens such incessant Showers of Rain, that the Roads being rendered impassable, Provisions could not be transported from the Provinces to the City; and the continual Storms at Sea stopt Navigation, and some Ships, loaded with Corn, were miserably shipwrecked off the Harbour: The Turks likewise cruising every where upon our Coast, took the Ships which had been sent from Puglia loaded with Corn for the Relief of the famished City; the Price therefore of the Necessaries of Life rose to an excessive Height, insomuch that Misery and Dearth were seen every where.

TO this Calamity was added another most grievous Mischief, and hard to be remedied, occasioned by the Money commonly called Zannette, which, by the excessive Covetousness of the Money-Clippers, was reduced to a wretched State, not worth more than the fourth Part of the antient Value, which made them to be refused in all Payments; so that the Price of Goods being altered, the Money debased and refused, reduced many to Despair. It was resolved to coin a new Species of Money, and cry down the Zannette; and it was given out that none should lose by the Coinage. But that being found impracticable, by reason of the vast Quantity of Zannette that was in the Kingdom, and the Scarcity of Silver to be coined in place of these, great Disorders and seditious Tumults arose.

THE Scum of the People, who by all means would have Meat and Drink, without Regard to the Severity of the Weather, or the Sterility of the Land, seeing themselves in want of Bread, began to mutiny, and shew no Respect to the Officers who had the Charge of Provisions : One Day in the Month of October this Year 1621. Fulvio di Costanzo narrowly escaped being murdered by them ; and now all Things were prepared for a general Insurrection. The Counsellor Cesare Alderisio, Clerk of the Market, in order to pacify the Mob, persuaded the Cardinal to go through the City, and, in such a Calamity, to comfort the People ; and at last, in January 1622. they both went out in a Coach, but that increased the Mischiefs, for the insolent Rascality, upon seeing the Viceroy, upbraided him with the Badness of the Bread they were forced to eat ; and his German Guard being ready to curb their Insolence, they threw a Shower of Stones at the Cardinal's Coach, insomuch that he was forced to take Shelter in the Archbishop's Palace, and to order the Gates both of it and the Church to be shut, till many of the Nobility ran to his Assistance, and conducted him back in Safety to his Palace.

THE Disorders occasioned by crying down the Zannette, and not being able to coin new Money in their Place, increased the Confusion among the People, who, having lost all Sense of their Duty, on the 24th of April, the Cardinal having gone to take the Air in his Coach, when he had got without the Gate Capuana, he saw a Multitude of People following him, one of which, coming up to the Coach, with a Loaf of Bread in his Hand, very arrogantly said ; Your most illustrious Excellence may see what Bread you make us eat, and adding other Words full of Threats, he threw the Loaf into the Coach. The Cardinal suspecting worse, ordered the Coachman to drive on faster ; and having gone by S. Charles's Street, without the Gate of S. Januarius, he entered at the Royal Gate, which we now call the Gate of the Holy Ghost, and with full Speed drove to the Palace, where having consulted about the Matter, it was resolved to wink at it.

BUT this Connivance, instead of calming, fomented the Tumults, and brought them to the last Extremities, as was seen shortly after ; for at this Time the Count of Monterey, who had been sent by the King Ambassador-Extraordinary to Pope Gregory XV. having come to Naples, while the Cardinal and the Count were passing in their Coach through the City, in the Street Dell' Olmo, they were surrounded with a Mob, who cried out ; Viſtuals, Viſtuals, my Lord ; whereupon the Cardinal turning to them with a chearful Countenance, and laughing, one of them looking him boldly in the Face, said, 'Tis a lamentable Affair, your Lordship has no Occasion to laugh, and speaking some other Words full of Reproach, the rest were stirred up do the same, and to throw Stones at the Coach, so that they were forced to gallop with full Speed back to the Palace. Then it was found that all Connivance was dangerous, and therefore it was resolved to have recourse to severe Punishments ; whereupon four of the most renowned Ministers being appointed Judges Delegates, which were D. Giovan-Battista Valenzuola the Regent, and the Counsellor Scipione Rovito, Pomponio Salvo, and Cesare Alderisio, Actions were entered against them, and above 300 were put in Prison : The Guilty being convicted, on the 28th of May Sentence was pronounced against them, whereby ten of them were condemned to be broken upon the Wheel, after the manner of Germany, after being drawn through the publick Places of the City on a Cart, and having their Flesh torn off with Pincers ; their Houses were razed, and their Goods confiscated to the King ; their Bodies were quartered, and hung up without the Walls of the City, for Food to the Birds, and their Heads were put upon the most frequented Gates upon Iron Spikes. Sixteen others of the less Guilty were condemned to the Gallies ; and S. James's Magazine, in the Street of Porto, was likewise razed, and that Street which we now see, was opened : And thus ended the Tumults, which under the Government of Cardinal Zapatta, had been occasioned by the Famine and the Zannette.

AT this Time, while the City was involved in these Commotions, D. Francisco Antonio Alarcon, to whom the King had committed the Duke D'Ossuna's Case, came to Naples. In the mean time Genuino had been seized, and put in close Prison in Madrid, from whence he was carried under a strong Guard to Barcelona, and afterwards transported to the Fort of Portolongone, where he was kept many Months in close Prison : Alarcon in his Passage having brought him along with him to Naples, and shut him up in Castelnuovo, two Days after he was sent to the Castle of Baja, from thence to that of Capua, and then to that of Gasta. At last being brought to his his Trial, he was condemned to perpetual Prison in the Fort of Oran, and his Grandchildren and Accomplices were condemned to the Gallies. But after many Years Genuino at last obtained his Liberty; and 'tis said, the Reason was, his having sent to King Philip IV. who had desired it, a Model in Wood of the Fortress of Pignone, which he had made in the Prisons of Africa; and returning afterwards to Naples, though he took Priests Orders, it was he, who was the chief Fomenter of the popular Sedition which happened in the Kingdom in the Year 1647. of which hereafter.

IN the mean time the City of Naples, in order to have a speedy Remedy to so great Disorders, had secretly sent to the Court of Spain, Taruggio Taruggi, a Priest of the Congregation of the Oratory; and the miserable State of the Kingdom being taken into Consideration, and that for redressing the many Grievances occasioned by the want of Provisions and Money, it was found, that strong and speedy Remedies were necessary, and that the Cardinal's easy and indulgent Temper was not equal to the State to which Matters were reduced; therefore it was thought fit to remove the Cardinal, and to send the Duke D'Alba to be Viceroy of Naples, who immediately set out, and on the 14th of December this Year 1622. arrived at Pozzuolo, and a few Days after took the Government of the Kingdom upon him. The Cardinal left Naples with the Character of an unfortunate Minister, and that his too indulgent and mild Nature had encouraged the Disorders that fell out in his Government. However he left us prudent Regulations, which we read in the Volume of our Statutes, and are marked in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome.

DURING his Government, on the 31st of March 1621. King Philip III. died, in the 43d Year of his Age, of which he reigned Twenty-two and a half. The Cardinal, after having caused King Philip IV. to be proclaimed with great Solemnity, ordered his Funeral Obsequies, with great Pomp, to be celebrated in the Cathedral Church of Naples. King Philip died of a Burning Fever. By Margaret of Austria he had three Sons, and as many Daughters; D. Philip, who succeeded him in his Kingdom; D. Carlos, who died afterwards; and D. Fernando, Cardinal Deacon, by the Title of S. Maria in Portico, commonly called the Cardinal Infant. D. Anna, who was married to Lewis XIII. King of France; D. Maria, who was married to Ferdinand King of Hungary, and afterwards Emperor; and another who died a Child. He reigned rather in Appearance than Reality; for being content with the Royal Dignity, he left the Government to his Favourites and Councils. It was thought, that when, by the Instigation of the Duke D'Uzeda, and Fr Lodovico Aliaga, his Majesty's Confessor, Cardinal Lerma was ordered to retire, the King was to have taken the Government upon himself, but Death soon after prevented him. He was a Prince more adorned with the Ornaments of Life, than skilled in the Art of Government; and as his Goodness, Piety, and Continency raised him above his Subjects, so his want of Application to Government rendered him unequal to the Work. Being indolent, he believed that there was nothing else incumbent upon him, but to assent to whatever his Favourite thought fit: It was said, that in the Agony of Death, he was not so much comforted by the Remembrance of his innocent Life, as he was disquieted in his Conscience for having neglected the Government of his Dominions. Notwithstanding all that, from the first Year of his Reign, to the last but one, he established many good Laws for us, which, according to the Order of Time, are set down in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

T H E
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXVI.

PHILIP IV. succeeded his Father at the Age of Sixteen, having been born in Valladolid on the 8th of April 1605. His Reign was very long, having lasted Forty-four Years and a half, till 1665. the Year of his Death. It was hoped, that by the Accession of a new King, the Use of Favourites would have been left off, and that the King would have held the Reins of Government in his own Hands : but all these Hopes proved vain ; for the Dispatches having been carried to the King, he delivered them to D. Gaspar de Guzman, Count D'Olivares, who, though he wished for nothing so much, seeming averse to it, with his pretended Modesty, moved the King to command him to give the Dispatches to whomsoever he (the Count) should think fit. He, out of seeming Disinterestedness, resigned them to D. Baldassar de Zuniga, an old and experienced Minister ; but however, it had been concerted between them, for Zuniga being his Uncle, they had agreed to support one another : So that soon after throwing off the Mask, all Power and Authority lodged in the Count, who being likewise adorned with the Title of Duke, in the following Relations he will be found with this double Title of Count Duke. During this long Reign, Matters still growing worse and worse, this Kingdom was the unhappy Theatre of great and unfortunate Adventures, whereby it was drained both of Men and Money, and miserably disordered and afflicted. This King having taken the Investiture of it from Pope Gregory XV. in that Space of Time governed it by the Means of nine Viceroys, who successively took the Administration of it, the first of which was D. Antonio Alvarez de Toledo, Duke D'Alba, of whose Government we shall now briefly give an Account.

C H A P. I.

Of D. Antonio Alvarez de Toledo, Duke D'Alba, and of his unfortunate and troublesome Government.

THE Duke D'Alba came to retrieve the Kingdom from the preceding Calamities and Miseries; but to find out effectual Remedies for so many Mischiefs, proved a very hard and difficult Task. In order to shun the Confusion occasioned by the Currency of the Zannette, a greater had ensued by crying them down, when there was not Silver for coining new Money to supply the want of them, whereby not only the publick Banks, but their Creditors sustained a prodigious Loss; which Banks were found to have in Zannette, the Sum of 4,400,000 Ducats. Many other private Citizens had likewise great Sums in Zannette, which they were forced to sell by the Weight, whereby many Families were reduced to extreme Poverty and Beggary; whence proceeded a Scarcity of every Thing, and a Stop to Commerce. The Duke D'Alba, in the Beginning of his Government, gave his Mind to the redressing of these Grievances, and having formed a Juncto of Ministers, and other Persons of Experience, he left it to their Care to find out proper Expedients for restoring Plenty and Commerce in the Kingdom. The Matter being taken into Deliberation, it was resolved to lay on a new Tax, in some measure to make up so great a Loss, since it was impossible to repair it altogether. But a great Difficulty occurred, which was, how to find a Commodity upon which this Tax could be laid. The Kingdom was so loaded with Taxes and Duties, that almost all the Necessaries of Life were already burdened with them; at last, it being found, that the Wine retailed in Publick Houses only paid a Duty, and that what was brought into the City to be sold in Hogsheads or Butts, for the Use of the Citizens, paid nothing, it was resolved that the Duty of a Ducat should be laid upon each Hogshead: So this new Duty was imposed, which being farmed out for the Sum of about 90,000 Ducats yearly, that Revenue was assigned to the Creditors of the Banks for Payment of the Third Part of their Credit, of which they received another Third Part in ready new-coined Money; and the Revenue proceeding from the Tax upon Foreigners, was assigned to the Farmers for Payment of the Silver furnished by them for the new Coinage. To these Regulations was added the lowering of the Interest of Money, which had been raised to an intolerable Degree; so that there was a little Respite from Troubles, and Commerce began in some measure to be restored.

BUT in the following Years new Emergencies involved both the Kingdom and the Duke into great Trouble. In 1624. the Crop was so bad, that the City was reduced to the utmost Distress. To the Scourge of Dearth was added the Fear of a Plague, which was making a great Havock in the neighbouring Sicily; but what created the greatest Uneasiness to the Duke, was the War betwixt the Duke of Savoy and the Republick of Genoa, about the Marquisate of Zuccarello, in which War the Republick employed in its Service our Colonel D. Roberto Dattilo, Marquis of S. Caterina, the Son of Major D. Alfonso, who had made himself famous for his Courage in the Wars of Flanders and elsewhere, and gave him the Command of the mercenary Troops. Besides this, there was another War in the Valtelline, to both which, by the King's Order, the Duke was obliged to furnish both Men and Money. In order to support these Wars, Money was the chief Thing wanted; but the late Misfortunes in a Government without Oeconomy, always profuse, and committed to Favourites, who, not as faithful Stewards, but as Hirelings, did not mind the Calamities of the People, had not only impoverished the Subjects, but the Sovereign; and the Exchequer was no less drained than the Purses of the People; but for all that, the Count Duke pressed the Viceroy to send Supplies both of Men and Money. In order to comply with these Demands, it behoved the Duke to use gentle Methods, and that were least burthensome to the Subjects; for which End, at two different Times in one Year, the Revenue that had been assigned to the King's Creditors upon the Taxes and Royal Incomes was made use of, and an Equivalent given them out of the new Duty of five per Cent received at the Custom-Houses; Twenty-five per Cent. was raised out of the Estates of Foreigners, and two Carlini out of each Family of the Kingdom.

but

IN order to raise Men, a Pardon was granted to all Delinquents, Out-Laws, and Banditi, who would list in the Service. The Troops being assembled, the Duke reviewed them on the Plain near the Bridge of Maddalena: Besides the Spanish Troops, and the Italian Regiments of the Colonels Carlo di Sangro and Annibale Macedonio, there were the Battalions of the Provinces of the Hither Principato and Basilicata, under the Command of Major Marco di Ponte; those of the Contado di Molise and Capitonata, under the Command of Major D. Pietro de Solis Castelbianco; that of the Further Principato, under the Command of D. Antonio Caraffa, a Knight of S. John; that of Terra di Lavoro, commanded by Major Vespasiano Suardo; and that of Terra di Bari, commanded by Major Giantommaso Blanco.

BESIDES these, there were other Six thousand Men raised by the Corporations of the Kingdom, proportionable to the Number of Families, and these were likewise sent under the Command of the Colonels D. Antonio del Tufo and D. Roberto Dattilo, the same who was afterwards employed in the Service of the Genoese, as we have already told; and D. Ettore Ravoschiero, Prince of Satriano, had some other Troops under his Command.

BESIDES these Expedients made by the Duke D'Alba, he procured a Donative from the City of Naples of 150,000 Ducats, for the Charges of these Wars, towards which many of the Nobility and Knights of Naples likewise contributed. And the Duke was obliged not only to support the Wars of Italy, but to send both Men and Money out of the Kingdom as far as Flanders.

NOR was the Count Duke satisfied with this; for as the Wars of Italy were still going on, and others daily hatching, he had sent an Order to the Governors of all the Dominions which the King possessed on this Side of the Alps, to have Twenty thousand Foot, and Five thousand Horse, even in Time of Peace, ready to be employed where-ever the King should have Occasion for them, and to provide a sufficient Fund for maintaining them. But the Viceroy having laid this Order before the Council of State, it was resolved, that it should be represented to the King, that this would be an intolerable Burden to the Kingdom, so much oppressed already; and that to add more, particularly in Time of Peace, would be an Oppression that would render the Kingdom incapable of serving him afterwards in Time of War, and upon the most urgent Occasions.

AT the same time our Coasts were infested by the Turks, who, taking Advantage of the Absence of our Fleet, appeared in our Seas, and some Gallies of Biserta took six Ships off Monte Circello, that were going to load Corn for the Provision of the City; then they attacked the Town of Sperlonga near Gaeta, the Castle of Abate, and the Tower of Licosa. Other fourteen Turkish Vessels infested the Coast about the Cape of Otranto; and if the Marquis of S. Cruz had not come hither and chased them off the Coast, they would have done much more Damage.

LASTLY, to complete our Misfortunes, in the Month of March 1626. so terrible an Earthquake was felt in the City of Naples, and many other Parts of the Kingdom, that the City was full of Horror and Amazement. In the Month of April following, another yet more terrible was felt in Calabria, which did great Damage to Catanzaro, Girifalco, and other Cities. But in the Year 1627. there was one still more violent felt in Puglia, where it overthrew many Cities, and made so great a Slaughter of the Inhabitants, that there not being Room for burying them, to prevent the Air from being infected, their Bodies were burnt.

SO troublesome and full of anxious Cares was the Government of the Duke D'Alba; but for all that he was never in the least discouraged, nor did he fail, by his Courage and Constancy, to expose himself to all Dangers. In the Midst of so much Trouble, his Magnanimity and Generosity appeared upon all the Occasions that offered during his Government, as well in the publick Rejoycings on account of the Queen's being brought to Bed of a Daughter, and in the Solemnity performed in the Royal Palace, of investing the Princes of Roccella, Avellino, and Bisignano, with the Order of the Golden Fleece, as upon the coming to Naples of Prince Ladislaus, the Son of Sigismund III. King of Poland, and of other Lords and the King's Ambassadors, who had all been at Rome to partake of the Jubilee of the Year 1625. But above all, his Magnificence shined most in beautifying the City with new Edifices, and in repairing and enlarging the Old. He raised the Tower of the Light-House on the Mole, to that Height it is at present: He built a Bulwark at the Point of the Mole with four Towers, for the Defence of the Harbour; and he opened that magnificent Gate, which from his Name is still called Port' Alba, for the Conveniency of those that had Occasion to go to the Courts of Justice. He built the Bridge upon the River Sele in the Territory of the City of Campagna, another in the City of Otranto, and a Third upon the River Garigliano, for the Conveniency of Travellers. By reason of the Fear, occasioned by the Plague then raging in Sicily, he ordered the Lazaretto to be removed from the Place where it then was near Posilippo, to the Place where it now stands hard by Nisita. He likewise caused the Water of S. Agata and Airola to be brought into Naples, for the Use of the Citizens and the Fountains of the City, especially the Fountain near the Royal Palace, which he beautified. Besides, for a greater Ornament to the City, he opened a new Fountain in the Street S. Lucia, and enlarged the Street of Mergellina, that those who were Sea-sick might go conveniently by Land. He beautified the Royal Palace with Pictures drawn by the famous Painter Belisario. But above all, the Kingdom is most indebted to him for his having ordered the Regent Carlo Tappia to finish the State of the Revenue, and the Charges of all the Corporations of the Kingdom, and limit the Sum they were to spend yearly in the Publick Service, which, in a great measure, prevented the Managers from imbezzling the Publick Money. Much is likewise owing to him, for having in 1626. ordered Bartolomeo Cbioccarello to make that Collection of all the Writs concerning the Royal Jurisdiction, which he put into 18 Volumes, and which afterwards, in 1631. by Order of King Philip IV. he delivered to the Visitor Alarcon, to be carried to Spain, where they are preserved by the Supreme Council of Italy.

BUT while the Duke D'Alba, with universal Applause, was governing the Kingdom, having scarce finished the sixth Year of his Viceroyalty, Advice came to him that the Duke D'Alcala had been appointed by the Court to be his Successor; at which he was very much grieved, and though he could not shun going, yet he found Means to delay it; insomuch that Alcala having left the Court, and being arrived at Barcelona, where he waited for the Gallies to imbark, but these never arriving, he was forced, after having, for his Subsistence during so long a Stay, pledged his Plate which he was carrying with him for his own Use, to take shipping in a Galley of Malta, which unexpectedly brought him within Sight of Naples.

ON the 26th of July 1629. Alcala landed at Posilipo, and was lodged in the Palace of Trajetto by the Prince of Cariati, where, together with his Dutcheffs, the Marquis of Tariffa, his eldest Son, and all his Family, he was magnificently entertained. The Duke D'Alba was then lying Sick a-bed of a violent Nephritick Cholick, and the new Viceroy went to visit him; but notwithstanding his Illness, he did not neglect to apply himself to Business; and afterwards being recovered, and having returned Alcala's Visit, on the 8th of August he went to S. Lorenzo to put an End to the Parliament that had been already begun, which, by the Indisposition of D. Giovan-Vincenzo Milano the Syndick, had been adjourned. In these last Days of his Government he obtained a Donative of 1,200,000 Ducats from the Barons and Cities of the Kingdom, remitting all the old Debts they were owing to the Exchequer; and besides he obtained a Free Gift for himself of 75,000 Ducats. He still continued to govern, and to bestow many Favours, and dispose of several Military and Civil Posts; and in the mean while Alcala was passing away his Time in Devotions, and doing Acts of Charity at Posilipo. At last, on the 16th of August, the Duke D'Alba set out, leaving behind him the Character of a Just, Good, and Prudent Viceroy, as may be seen by the wholesome Laws he left us, which are to be found in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

C H A P. II.

Of the Government of D. Ferdinando Afan de Rivera, Duke D'Alcala.

WHEN this new Duke D'Alcala came to the Government, the Affairs of the Kingdom were reduced to such a wretched State, that he could ill follow the Footsteps of the other Duke D'Alcala, his Predecessor. The most skilful and prudent Minister would have been to seek in the midst of so many Disorders and Calamities. Although there was no War in the Kingdom, yet that of Lombardy occasioned more Mischief to it, than if a War had been carrying on in the very Heart of it. The Turks continued to infest our Seas, nor was there any Body to oppose them, because our Forces being employed elsewhere, little or no Resistance could be made. For the same Reason the Banditi never left off plundering the Country, and sometimes even wall'd Towns. The Earthquakes, the new Fears of a Pestilence, and other Misfortunes, put all in Consternation and Confusion.

THOSE, who ought to have reliev'd us, did us the most Mischief. The King, being guided by his Favourite, did not mind us; and the Count Duke, who governed the Monarchy, had laid his greatest Stress upon the Kingdom of Naples, for supporting the Wars of Lombardy. Notwithstanding that by the continual Oppressions it was so much exhausted and wasted, yet he never left off demanding Supplies of Men and Money, whereby the Viceroy and the Subjects were reduced to great Hardships; at last, in some measure, to supply the Necessities, an Expedient was fallen upon of suspending the Payment of the Sums assigned to the King's Creditors upon the Revenues of the Kingdom, and of taking 40000 Ducats out of the Revenues of the Custom-house; but that not being sufficient, the Viceroy was obliged to ask a voluntary general Contribution, which he regulated in such a Manner, that no Person was to give above a Thousand Ducats, and none less than Ten; by which Means the Nobility, Barons, and even the Advocates, down to the Mastrodatti and Clerks were obliged to empty their Purfes into the Viceroy's Hands, who thereby raised a vast Sum, which enabled him to support the War, both with Men and Money.

FOR which End the Viceroy appointed three Colonels to raise three Regiments, which were D. Giovan D'Avalos, Prince of Monte Sarchio, who afterwards, on Account of the Death of two of his Children, demitted in Favour of D. Luzio Caracciolo di Torrecuso, who was his Major, Carlo dello Gatta, and Mario Casarelli. The Prince of Satriano raised a Regiment of Twenty two Companies at his own Charges, all which went to serve in the Milanese, besides Six Hundred Spaniards, many Companies of the Militia, and the Regiment of Mario Galeota, which had embarked first of all, and had got as far as Gaeta, where it was stopped many Months, by contrary Winds.

BUT to what Purpose? These Succours, which, considering the Poverty of the Kingdom, from whence they were sent, might be termed powerful, in the Twinkling of an Eye were destroyed in that ill-managed and always unfortunate War. The Viceroy, therefore, was anew pressed to send others; but how could he raise Money, now that he wanted Funds, and all the Sources being drain'd? Then it was resolved to sell the Cities and Lands belonging to the Crown, and to encroach encroach upon the Regalia. The City of Taverna was sold to the Prince of Satriano, that of Amantea to the Prince of Belmonte, the Village of Fratta to Medico Bruno, those of Miano and Mianello to the Countess of Gambatesa, Marano to D. Antonio Manriquez, Marquis of Cerella, and some more Places to other Persons: This occasioned prodigious Disorders, for those Citizens, accustomed to be the King's immediate Vassals, abhorring the Servitude, which they might expect under the Barons, were so incens'd, that the Inhabitants of Amantea and Taverna shut their Gates upon the Buyers, refusing to give them Possession, and stood their Ground so well, that having entered an Action at Law, by paying down the Price, they were continued in the King's Demains.

THE Coming of Queen Mary, the King's Sister, who was going to her Husband Ferdinand of Austria, King of Hungary, compleated the Impoverishing of the Exchequer and the Corporations of the Kingdom. She, afraid of the Plague that was raging in Lombardy, accompanied by the Cardinal de Guzman, Archbishop of Seville, and the Duke D'Alba, with a splendid and numerous Court, came by the Way of Naples: It was thought, that the Duke D'Alba, in order to eclipse the Authority of the Viceroy, made her take that Road; and for that End perswaded the Queen to delay her Journey; for having landed at Naples in August 1630, she remained there four Months, and all the Time was most spendidly entertained with Feasts and Tournaments, as became so great a Princess. Pope Urban VIII. sent Monsignor Serra to present the Queen with the Golden Rose, and he continued with her as his Holiness's Nuncio: the Count of Monterey, the King's Ambassador at the Court of Rome, came to kiss her Hands, as did many other Lords and Princesses. There was no Mention made of departing, and in the mean time, this Delay fell heavy upon the Royal Patrimony: many Horses and other Beasts of Burden were ordered to be brought, and the Corporations of the Kingdom were forced to maintain them and their Guides. The Exchequer was already empty, so that to supply the Charges, the Viceroy was obliged to make Use of the King's Revenues that had been assigned to particular Persons, and that not being sufficient, he borrowed vast Sums of the Banks. The Count of Francburg, the German Ambassador, press'd the Queen to pursue her Journey, and perceiving, that she rather delayed it for that, at last he begg'd of her, that, since she had no mind to go, she would allow him to take his Leave of her. The Viceroy himself took upon him to say to her, that he wished she would be pleas'd to let him know her Resolution; because if she had a mind to delay her going, he would dismiss the Horses, and put a Stop to the other Preparations, which D. Francisco del Campo the Purveyor General had Orders to make: though the Viceroy did this purely out of Zeal for the King's Service, yet the Duke D'Alba made a Handle of it for getting him to be removed from the Government, of which hereafter.

BUT what also occasioned the Delay was, that the Queen intending to go to Trieste with the same Spanish Fleet, joined by the ordinary Squadrons of the Italian Princes, that had brought her to Naples, the Venetians opposed it, as an Incroachment upon their pretended Dominion of the Adriatick Sea; and they offered either the whole, or a Part of their Fleet, for conveying her to Trieste. The Spanish Ministers rejected the Offer, threatening to go in spite of them; but the Venetians having boldly declared, that if the Spaniards were resolved to prefer the Force of Arms to their friendly Offer, the Queen must fight her way to her Wedding through Fire and Smoak; the Spaniards thought fit to delay the Voyage, till they should receive new Orders from the Court, which shamefully submitting, accepted of the Republick's Offer. So that at last, on the 18th of December this Year 1630. the Queen set out, and, by the way of Puglia and Abruzzo, entered the State of the Church, and went to Ancona: from whence Antonio Pisani, the Venetian Admiral, with thirteen light Gallies convoy'd her to Trieste.

IN the mean Time the Duke's Government was made very uneasy to him by the frequent Descents made by the Turks, who plundered the maritime Places; and the Gallies of Biserta put the Coast of Salerno into such Confusion, carrying off many into Slavery, and setting Fire to the Town of Agropoli, that the Viceroy was forc'd to send eight Gallies to chase them off the Coast: Some Domesticks belonging to the Duke D'Atella, in going to his Estate in Calabria, were made ^a Nani, Istor. Ven. lib. 8.

Slaves by the Turks, but they had the good Fortune to be set at Liberty by the Florentine Gallies.

THE Banditi were likewise committing terrible Devastation in many Parts of the Kingdom, insomuch that the Viceroy was obliged to send D. Fernando de Ribera, his natural Son, with the Title of Vicar-General of all the Kingdom, with full Authority to extirpate them, and visit the Fortresses. The Earthquake that was felt on the 2d of April this Year 1630. occasioned great Fear and Consternation; but the Plague, which was making terrible Havock in Lombardy, and which broke out many times in the Borders of the Kingdom, struck much greater Terror. To these was added a Report, that some profligate Wretches were travelling up and down Italy, who contriving new Sorts of Death, with an Artificial Pestilence, did what in them lay, to extinguish Mankind, by poisoning the Water in the Churches and Streets, and in that manner went about spreading the Contagion. Although the Imaginations of the People, disordered by Fear, fancied many Things; however the Crime was discovered and punished, there being still remaining in Milan Inscriptions and Monuments of the Houses that were razed, where those Monsters met¹; wherefore it was ordered, that strict Guard should be kept over all the Kingdom, and that no Person should be suffered to enter it without sufficient Bills of Health.

THE Kingdom being in this Consternation, every Thing went to wreck. The little Justice that was administred in the Tribunals, and the filthy Avarice of some Judges, obliged the Viceroy and the Visitor Alarcon to suspend them. The Advocates cabal, and refuse to undergo the Examination appointed by the King, and leave off going to the Tribunals; and the Judges decide Causes without any Pleading; whereupon the Viceroy was forced to use Severities against the Advocates, to oblige them to resume their Calling. The Royal Jurisdiction being trampled upon, gives free Scope to the Ecclesiasticks to be more insolent; and the present Duke D'Alcala, so unlike the other, his Predecessor, suffers it, and does not chastise them, but, by mild Treatment, renders them more insolent, as may be clearly seen by what happened to the Auditor Figueroa. The Viceroy had sent a certain Spaniard with an Order to seize the Goods of some Inhabitants of Nicotera, which was put in Execution; but it being pretended, that among the Goods seized, there were some belonging to the Bishop, he, by his own Authority, ordered the Spaniard to be imprisoned. The President of the Province, in order to repair the Outrage committed, sent the Auditor Figueroa to Nicotera, to take him out of Prison; but in the mean time the Bishop had caused him to be removed to another Place under safe Custody: So that the Auditor being come to Nicotera, and having caused the Doors of the Prison to be broke open, he was disappointed, there being no Person there; and the Bishop, not content with having thus baffled him, because he had dared to break open the Prison, excommunicated him. Figueroa, not minding such Censures, which he looked upon to be fulminated without Reason, and therefore not to be feared, did not so much as think of getting himself to be absolved; but the Year being expired, he was cited to tell what his Opinion was of the Catholick Faith: He as little minded that Citation; but another Year being elapsed, he found, that the Inquisition of Rome had entred a Process against him, and by a solemn Sentence declared him a Heretick: Perhaps he would have taken as little notice of this; but the Inquisitors of Rome sent positive Orders to M. Petronia, Bishop of Molfetta, who was residing in Naples, with the Character of Minister of the Holy Office, by all means to put him in Prison. The Bishop, as Inquisitor, without acquainting the Viceroy, or asking of him the Exequatur Regium to the Orders sent him from Rome, having convened all the Serjeants and Beadles belonging to the Archbishop and the Nuncio, with whom he had concerted the Imprisonment; and knowing that Figueroa used to pass away his Time in the Convent of S. Lewis, belonging to the Minimes, without Regard to the Reverence due to the Place, much less to the Neighbourhood of the Royal Palace, ordered them to go immediately and arrest him. So flagrant an Outrage, committed in the Face of the Viceroy, provoked him to send a Company of Spaniards to curb so great Arrogance, who having set Figueroa at Liberty, brought him to the Royal Palace. At any other Time so scandalous an Insult would have been otherwise resentred, and the Authors severely punished ; but the King's Ministers being met, nothing else was determined, but only to disarm all the Serjeants belonging to the Archbishop, the Nuncio, and the Inquisitor, therefore in one Night the Arms were taken from all the Ecclesiastical Courts, but the Bishop Inquisitor was not in the least punished. Notwithstanding this Moderation, the Court of Rome was not pleased, which taking Advantage of the Time, made a terrible Noise about this Sentence, and dispatched Monitories and Censures against those who had put it in Execution, and all that had advised and ordered it ; which Censures disturbed the Feasts that were then celebrating in Naples on account of the Birth of Prince Baltazar Carlos, the eldest Son of King Philip IV. who afterwards removed the Fears by a Royal Writ, which he sent to the Viceroy, wherein, approving of what had been done, he commanded, that the Orders of the Holy Office of Rome, should by no means be executed in the Kingdom without the Knowledge and Permission of the Viceroy.

WHILE, by the Departure of Queen Mary, the Duke D'Alcala had resumed the Government of the Kingdom with more Freedom, Advice was brought him, that the Duke D'Alba, by the many Complaints he had made to the Court against him concerning his Behaviour to the Queen, had got him to be recalled. But it was not so much these Complaints that removed him, as that the Count Duke, who governed the Monarchy, having a mind to gratify the Count of Monterey, the King's Ambassador in Rome, doubly related to him, Monterey being married to his Sister, and the Count Duke to a Sister of Monterey's, greedily received the Accusations against Alcala, that he might have a specious Pretence. And that the Duke D'Alcala might be the less exasperated, to the King's great Expence, he ordered, that the Duke should come to Court to clear himself from what was laid to his Charge, not meaning thereby to deprive him of the Government, and therefore the yearly Salary of 24,000 Ducats was to go on ; and that in his Absence the Count of Monterey should govern the Kingdom, and be allowed a Salary of 12,000 Ducats only : But the Duke never returned, except when he went to the Government of Sicily ; and the Count remained six Years. Thus, the private Interest of the Favourite being preferred to the Service of his Prince, we lost the Duke D'Alcala, who setting out from Naples on the 13th of May this Year 1631. made way for Monterey, who had come to Naples on the 17th of April, and lodged at the Chiaja in the Marquis Della Valle's Palace, till the Departure of his Predecessor. The Duke was extremely beloved by the Neapolitans, who were grieved to the very Heart that he should have been so calumniated at Court. He left us twelve excellent Pragmaticks : He was a Terror to the Banditi, and those that harboured them : He forbid the Seggi of Naples, and all the Corporations of the Kingdom, to assign Salaries, or make Donations, even for pious Uses, without having first obtained the Assent and Permission of the Viceroy : He reformed the University, and ordered, that the requisite Age for receiving the Degree of Doctor should not be dispensed with : He made many Regulations concerning the Office of Commissary-General of Compagna ; and made other prudent Provisions, which are set down in the so often mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. III.

Of D. Emanuel de Guzman, Count of Monterey; and of the innumerable Succours of Men and Money which were sent out of the Kingdom during the Time of his Government.

THE Count of Monterey began his Administration with unlucky Omens, which portended a calamitous Government: in the Village of Vomero a Woman brought forth a strange Monster: In the Beginning of this Year a frightful Comet appeared; but the Earthquakes, the terrible Irruptions, the horrid Clouds, the surprizing Torrents of Fire, and the dreadful Showers of Ashes, which in the Night of the 15th of December, Mount Vesuvius began to throw out, not only filled the City and Kingdom with Fear and Horror, but presaged other Mischiefs, and new Calamities. The Mountain vomited Flames, with so great Violence, that Naples was like to be either swallowed up by the Earthquakes, or buried in the Ashes. The Shocks threw down the Houses, stopt the Course of the Rivers, beat back the Sea, and opened the Mountains. At last, by opposite and horrible Effects, the Water, Flames, and Ashes were exhaled, whereby not only some neighbouring Places were ruined, but the Air was so rarefied, that every Body was like to be suffocated. But Heaven being pacified by the publick Penances, such a fresh Gale of Wind blew from the opposite Point, as drove them over the Adriatick, as far as Cattara, and other Places of Albania and Dalmatia; and at last the sulphureous Matter in the Bowels of the Earth being consumed, the Fire went out.

BUT the greater Calamities, occasioned by the Wars of Italy, were not as yet at an End. The Count Duke, more famous than fortunate, by the unhappy Success of the Spanish Arms in Lombardy, saw, that the Ministers of that Monarchy had lost that Authority in Italy, which they formerly used to have there to that Height, that they often, with an imperious Tone, commanded the Duke of Savoy himself to disarm. At this Time the French had screwed themselves so far into the Affairs of it, that they made the Dukes of Savoy and Mantua their Dependants, the first by making Pinarola a Bridle upon him, and the last by keeping Possession of Casale and the Monferrat; and the other Princes, some out of Inclination, and some for Profit, had kept themselves in suspense between the Crown of Spain and the French. It was also thought, that Pope Urban VIII. having been formerly Nuncio in France, and being that King's Godfather, was inclined to favour him, and to thwart the Austrian Interest; and Cardinal Antonio Barberino, his Nephew, having accepted the Protection of that Kingdom, with a great Pension, was no small Indication of it: And it was said, that when the Germans entered the Mantouan, the Pope asked Assistance of the Cardinals for driving them out of it; and that when Religion was reduced to the utmost Distress in Germany by the Hereticks, and trampled under Foot by the Arms of the King of Sweden, he did not concern himself about it, altho' Cardinal Borgia, in the Name of the Catholick King, in a publick Consistory, made pressing Instances for it. Besides, the Rebuffs which the Spanish Ministers received in Rome, obliged Cardinal Sandoval to leave that City in Disgust, and retire to Naples.

THE Spanish Ministers therefore, were exasperated to the highest Degree, and the Count Duke frequently exaggerating the Matter, said, that they should never enjoy Peace till Italy was reduced to its former State. For which End, it was resolved, that the Cardinal Infant, the King's Brother, should go to Milan, and from thence to his Government of Flanders, and that new Preparations for War should be made, and particularly that the Kingdom of Naples should raise Men and Money, and fit out Ships.

IN order to baffle the bad Intentions of the Pope, who, it was said, had sent a good Number of Troops to the Frontiers of the Kingdom, the Viceroy was obliged to send thither 1500 Horse, under the Command of Annabale Macedonio, Marquis of Tortora; and for providing the Kingdom with new Troops, to order all the Barons, and the King's Patrimonial Cities, to furnish a sufficient Number of Soldiers.

BY these Heart-burnings betwixt the Courts of Rome and Spain, the Royal Jurisdiction, which, with us, had been greatly depressed, gathered new Strength; for the Court of Spain, to revenge one ill Turn by another, sent the Bishop of Cordova and D. John Chumacero, with the Character of Commissaries, to demand the Reform of many Abuses which the Datary of Rome had introduced into Spain, and which created many Grievances in that Kingdom¹, of which they had made a long List; and by a learned Memorial², in Answer to another given in by M. Miraldi, Secretary of the Briefs, by the Pope's Order, they proved them to be abusive and unsufferable; and it was thought, that they had private Instructions to demand a Council, and to put the Pope to a Non-plus by Threats and troublesome Demands, of which Urban being apprized, resolved, by spinning out the Time, to baulk the Designs; for which End, denying them Audience under the Character of Commissaries, saying, that that seemed to imply a certain Jurisdiction and Authority; what with that and other Difficulties and Delays, he put off the Business, and also cooled the Bishop, by giving him Hopes of Preferment; of which the King getting Notice, recalled him, and having given Chumacero the Character of Ambassador, while the Heat of Passion was abated, and the Spaniards, by Misfortunes, were grown more tame, the Affair dropt of itself.

IN the mean time, these Differences having encouraged the Viceroy and the King's Ministers, whenever Occasion offered they did not fail to proceed with Vigour; for some Priests having, in a cruel and barbarous Manner, killed the Governor of Sala, Brother to the Counsellor D. Francesco Salgado; although Francesco Maria Brancaccio, Bishop of Capaccio, in whose Diocese the Murder was committed, had taken Cognizance of the Crime, and condemned some of the Murderers to the Gallies, yet that being judged to be too slight a Punishment for so scandalous and heinous a Crime, by the Quality and Character of the Deceased, the Viceroy sent a Company of Spaniards to Sala, where they lived at Discretion, and used both the Ecclesiasticks and Laicks very roughly; wherefore the Bishop resenting this Treatment, by Monitories, D. Carlo Brancaccio, his Brother, was clapt up in Prison, and the Bishop himself was fain to fly the Kingdom, and take Shelter in Rome. The Bishop found his Account in this; for while he was at the Pope's Court, uneasy with Expences and Debt, having ingratiated himself into the Affections of Cardinal Antonio, the Pope's Nephew, for an Example to others (to be firm and constant in the Defence of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, in hopes of being well rewarded) in a Consistory held on the 28th of November 1633. without expecting it, he was raised to the Dignity of Cardinal; and out of Contempt, the Pope conferred the Archbishoprick of Bari upon him, and sent him into the Kingdom to take Possession of it. But the Viceroy, terribly enraged at this, upon his Arrival, instead of giving him Possession, ordered a Galley to be made ready for him, and sent him back to Rome, with Orders never to return any more to the Kingdom; whereupon the Pope made a mighty Noise, and was highly displeased: And to this Affront others were added soon after; for some belonging to the Court caused a Canon of the Church of Pozzuolo to be murdered; and there being a Criminal in the Prison of the Vicariate, who, because he had been taken out of the Church of S. John a Mare, pretended that he ought to be returned to the Church; while the Point of Returning was debating, he committed a new Crime in the very Prison; whereupon the Viceroy, on the Night of the 19th of April 1633. caused him to be hanged upon a Gallows which he ordered to be set up before the Palace of the Vicariate, slighting the Sollicitations of the Archbishop, and the Censures which he caused to be thundered out against those who had put the Criminal in Prison.

BUT this vigorous Way of Proceeding was of short Duration among us; for by the bad Success of the King's Arms, the Spaniards growing still more tractable, they were forced to employ all their Art for gaining the Friendship of the Pope and the other Princes of Italy; and seeing the French Ministers never left off instilling Jealousy in the Minds of these Princes, and exhorting them to join together, and, under the Protection of their Crown, to drive the Spaniards out of Italy: On the other Hand the Spaniards proposed great Advantages to them all. To the Great Duke of Tuscany, a large Pension; to the Duke of Modena, Correggio; to the Duke of Parma, the Office of General of the Sea, and a Viceroyalty; and, above all, in order to give Reputation to their Arms, they were very earnest in augmenting their Armies with fresh Recruits both of Men, Money, and other military Provisions which they expected from Naples.

THE Count of Monterey therefore, having constant Demands upon him of new Succours, ordered a hundred and fifteen Companies of Foot, consisting of 230 Men each, of the new Militia, called Del Battaglione, to be incorporated; and easing the Men at Arms of maintaining two Horses, he reduced sixteen Troops of them to Cuirassiers, and augmented their Number to 60 Men each Troop, besides the Officers. Moreover, in November 1631. the Prince of Belmonte marched to the Milanese with a Regiment of Italians of fourteen Companies, raised at his own Charges; and in the Month of January 1632. another Regiment of 1600 Italians, commanded by the Marquis of Torrecurso, took the same Route. In July 1633. there were likewise sent to Milan 4500 Foot, under the Command of the Colonels Luzio Boccapianca and D. Gaspare Toraldo, besides 1000 Horse, commanded by the Quarter-Master General D. Alvaro di Quinones, with which the Duke of Feria, the Governor of Milan, marched into Alsace to relieve Brisac.

THIS Kingdom was reserved not only for furnishing Supplies of Men and Money for the Wars of Italy, but likewise for those of Flanders, Catalonia, and Germany. In the Year 1632. 4700 Foot were embarked and sent to Catalonia, under the Command of the Marquises of Campolattaro and S. Lucido, besides eight Troops of dismounted Horse, with Money for mounting them in that Principality. In the Month of January 1633. 700 Recruits were sent to Catalonia, under the Command of Major Ettore della Calce, for filling up the Neapolitan Regiments which were in that Country.

IN the mean time the Cardinal Infant arrived at Milan, with the Title of Generalissimo of all the Armies of the Crown, D. Girolamo Caraffa, Prince of Montenegro, being appointed his Adviser, who soon after died, and was succeeded by Fr. Lelio Brancaccio, who immediately went to Milan, whither the Viceroy quickly dispatched D. Gaspare d'Azevedo, Captain of his Guards, to pay his Respects to the Infant; and in the Month of May 1634. he sent him such Succours, that the like had never gone out of the Kingdom; for he sent 6000 Foot, of which 1000 were Spaniards of the Regiment of Naples, commanded by D. Pedro Giron; the rest were Neapolitans, commanded by the Prince of S. Severo and D. Pedro de Cardenas, Colonels. The Marquis of Tarazena, Count D'Ajala, commanded a thousand Horse, and was General of this powerful Reinforcement, which made the Cardinal resolve to march into Germany, where, having joined the Troops of the Crown with those of the King of Hungary and Duke Charles of Lorraine, he fought that famous Battle of Norlingen, wherein the Swedish Army was routed, 8000 of them were killed, and 4000 taken Prisoners, besides 80 Pieces of Cannon, and 200 Colours. The Anniversary of which Victory is solemnized every Year on the 8th of September, as a Memorial, that thereby the rest of Germany was preserved from Heresy, and the Invasions of the Swedes, and shortly after it occasioned the taking of Ratisbone.

BUT the Succours did not end here, the Kingdom was obliged to furnish greater for the Defence of the Milanese, threatened by the French. First, it behoved the Viceroy to provide the Marquis of S. Croce, Lieutenant-General of the Sea, with ten great Ships, with 2200 Neapolitans, and great Store of Provisions, sent under the Command of the Admiral D. Francesco Imperiale, and eighteen Gallies, with 2000 Spaniards, and 1300 Neapolitans, commanded by the Colonels D. Gaspere Azevedo and D. Carlo della Gatta; and in the Year 1635. before the King of France attacked the Milanese, the Viceroy was obliged to send to Lombardy 2800 Foot, divided into two Regiments, commanded by the Colonels Filippo Spinola and Carlo della Gatta, and 1000 Horse, under D. Alvaro di Quinones the Quarter-Master General, with the necessary Money for hiring 4000 Swissers, in the Cantons that were in Alliance with the House of Austria. In the mean time the Fleet was ready to sail, and it was composed of 35 Gallies, and ten large Ships, in which were embarked 7500 Spanish and Neapolitan Soldiers. There were 2900 Spaniards, of which 2300 were of the Regiment of Naples, commanded by Azevedo, and 600 belonged to the Island of Sicily, under the Command of D. Michele Perez d'Egea. The rest were Neapolitans, divided into the three Regiments of the Colonels D. Giovan Battista Orsini, Luzio Boccapianola, and D. Ferrante delli Monti; and Fr. Lelio Brancaccio commanded the whole, with the Title of Colonel General. On the 10th of May this Year 1635. the Fleet set sail from the Port of Naples towards the West, and made but an unfortunate Expedition, being tossed by contrary Winds and Storms; insomuch, that the Marquis of S. Croce, having landed a good Part of the Troops in Savona for reinforcing the Army in Lombardy, where the French were besieging Valenza, he made no other Conquest but that of the Island of S. Margaret.

THE new Year 1636. produced fresh Alarms, which obliged the Viceroy to provide for the Defence of our own Kingdom. By the continual Fears that the French intended to make a Descent, an Augustine Monk, named Fr. Epifanio Fioravante of Cesena, being suspected of keeping a secret Correspondence with them, was arrested, who being put in Fetters, discovered, that the French intended to make a Descent in different Parts of the Kingdom, and that they even designed to attack the City of Naples; and besides, that the famous Bandito Pietro Mancino, in concert with them, was to make himself Master of Monte Gargano, in order to deliver it up to the Duke of Mantua, and to put all Puglia into Confusion. This being known, the Viceroy was obliged, at vast Charges, to fortify Barletta, Taranto, Gaeta, and the Port of Baja, where he caused two great Towers to be built; to repair the Fort of Nisita, and the Walls of Capua; to finish the Fortifications of the Island of Elva, commonly called Portolongone, formerly begun by the Count of Benavente; to provide all the maritime Places with Troops; and to fit out thirty Ships, and ten Tartans. And for the better guarding the City of Naples, he ordered 10,000 of the Citizens to take Arms, and gave the Command of them to D. Giovani d'Avalos, Prince of Montesarchio. But Time discovered, that the French gave these Alarms, for no other End, but, by obliging the Kingdom to be upon its own Defence, to put a Stop to the continual Succours that were sent from it to the Milanese: So that the Viceroy having found out the Design, hastened new Succours, and embarked for Lombardy, aboard of some Ships and Gallies, the Regiments of the Colonels D. Michele Pignatelli, Tiberio Brancaccio, Achille Minutolo, Giambattista Orsini, Pompeo di Genaro, Girolamo Tuttavilla, and Romano Garzoni, besides 1000 Horse which Giantommaso Blanco marched thither over Land. This strong Reinforcement encouraged the Marquis of Leganez to come to an Engagement with the Enemy near Tornavento, in which Girardo Gambacorta, of the Family of the Dukes of Limatola, General of the Neapolitan Cavalry, died gloriously, and Luzio Boccapianola had the same Fate near Vercelli.

SUCH frequent and powerful Succours had never been sent out of the Kingdom in any former Government, as were now in this of the Count of Monterey, not only to the Milanese, but to Catalonia, Provence, and elsewhere; and those who made it their Business to keep an Account of them, have computed the Number to be 5500 Horse, and 48,000 Foot; and that the Money amounted to the Sum of three Millions and a half of Crowns, besides what was spent in fortifying the Cities and other Places of the Kingdom, in levying so many Men, in the Naval Expeditions, in maintaining the Island of S. Margaret, in building six Men of War and some Gallies, for augmenting the Squadron to the Number of sixteen, and in providing 208 Pieces of Cannon, 70,000 Fire-Locks, Musquets, and Pikes for the Infantry, and Pistols and Cuirasses for the Cavalry.

SUCH great and insupportable Charges were squeezed out of the Estates of the Subjects, and the Revenues of the Cities and Corporations of the Kingdom, which were were continually forced to supply with new Sums the Occasions of so many unfortunate and ill-managed Wars, and the so great and constant Necessities of the Court of Spain; whence, in a great measure, proceeded the Debt of fifteen Millions, with which the Revenue of the City of Naples was burdened, the Interest of which was paid to the Creditors out of the Income arising from Customs belonging to the City. And that not being sufficient, the Revenues of Foreigners were frequently taken from them, and even those which had been assigned to the Natives upon the Royal Revenues. For this Purpose many other Duties were laid on, to that upon Meal, first five Grana * were added, and then other seven upon each Bushel: To that upon Flesh, one Grano per Pound, and a Carlino upon each Stajo † of Oyl. This was not done without Opposition, considering not only the vast Sums drawn out of the Kingdom in a few Years, but that a great Part of the Money was pocketed up by others, and went not into the King's Coffers, and that the Necessities still increasing, the People were terribly oppressed; wherefore it was resolved to send D. Tommaso Caraffa, Bishop of Volturara, to the King, to beg of him to take Compassion of them, and to relieve them in their so great Misery and Distress; but these Messages, by the pressing Necessities, which were daily increasing, proved fruitless. There was an absolute Necessity for paying the 600,000 Ducats demanded by the Cardinal Infant; for maintaining the Troops that guarded the Kingdom; for raising Recruits for the Army, which the Court of Spain had sent into different Parts; for keeping up the Fleet, and maintaining the Islands of S. Margaret and S. Honoratus upon the Coast of France, till in the Month of May 1637. they were retaken by Famine.

* The plural of Grano, a certain Coin in Naples.

† A Measure that answereth our Bushel.

HOWEVER, in the midst of so many Calamities, the Count of Monterey did not forbear to divert himself with Comedies and Hunting, to which he was much inclined; nor did he fail, in imitation of his Predecessors, to leave us noble Monuments of his Magnificence. He enlarged, and made more commodious, the Street of Puglia: He brought greater Plenty of Water to the Fountains of the City, and raised another upon the Wall of the Ditch of Castelnuovo; and he built that stately Bridge which joins the Ward of Pizzosfalcone with that of S. Carlo delle Mortelle. The Countess, his Wife, likewise left us a lasting Monument of her Piety, by founding the Monastery of Mary Magdalen, for a safe retiring Place to Spanish Women, who forsaking their Sensual Pleasures, have a mind to lead a chaste Life.

BUT though the Count of Monterey had so well deserved of the King, by the many Succours he had sent, yet the Count Duke, for the Advantage of his own Family, had like to have recalled him before the sixth Year of his Government was expired. The Reason was, that the Count Duke was very desirous of having D. Anna Caraffa, Princess of Stigliano, married to the Duke of Medina de las Torres. This Lady, by the Death of D. Antonio Caraffa, Duke of Mondragone, her Father, and of D. Luigi Caraffa, Prince of Stigliano, her Grandfather, had been left sole Heiress of most opulent Estates. Isabella Gonzaga, her Grandmother, Daughter and Heiress of Vespasiano Gonzaga, Duke of Sabionetta, had likewise left her that Estate and Title; the Count Duke therefore, seeing that he could not perpetuate his Family in the Descendants of his Daughter, who had been married to D. Ramiro Guzman, Duke of Medina de las Torres, and had died without Children, was very ambitious to have a second Wife for his Son-in-Law, whom he had raised from a Gentleman to be a Duke, nothing inferior to his first. He made the King believe, that by means of this Marriage Sabionetta might be recovered, of which the Princes of Italy were now jealous; and therefore, though the Lady's Grandmother was obstinately bent against the Marriage, yet, by means of the Cardinal her Uncle, he carried it on with her Mother, who, upon the Promise of making the Duke Viceroy, readily consented: The young Lady, ambitious of being Vicequeen, likewise agreed to it; whereupon the Duke left Spain with the Character of Viceroy and perpetual Governor of Castelnuovo, and with a Squadron of Spanish Gallies arrived at Naples, where the Marriage was solemnized in the Princess's Palace near the Gate of Chiaja.

IN the mean time the Count of Monterey was making ready to depart, but the Count Duke, having Advice that the Marriage had been consummated, wrote to Monterey, that it was not fit he should leave Naples at so troublesome a Juncture of the Wars of Italy, the sixth Year of his Government not being as yet out; so that the new-married Couple were baulk'd, and Medina was obliged to live in the Kingdom as a private Man, to the great Displeasure both of himself and Spouse, and much more of the Dutchess of Sabionetta, who, having always been averse to the Marriage, did not fail publickly to censure the Count Duke's Actions, and to blame the Simplicity of the Dutchess of Mondragone, the Cardinal, and of all her Grandchild's other Relations, who had suffered themselves to be bubbled by Olivares. But the Year being expired, and the Count Duke finding he could delay it no longer, sent an Order for giving Medina Possession of the Government. Thus did Monterey lay down his Office, after he had enjoyed it for the Space of six Years; and on the 12th of November this Year 1637. he retired to Pozzuolo, from whence afterwards he pursued his Voyage to Spain. He left us 44 most excellent Laws, whereby he adjusted the Tribunals, the Farming and Seal of the Revenues and Fiscal Estates, and the Interest and Value of Money: He prohibited Duels, and the Exportation of any Sort of Arms whatsoever, under severe Penalties: He made sundry Regulations for preventing the Frauds committed in the Custom-House and the great Magazine of Naples: He prohibited the Excess in Cloaths, Servants, and Coaches: He fixed a Reward of 3000 Ducats to be paid to whoever should kill the famous Bandito Manicini, besides the Power of pardoning four Persons: He took off the Duty upon Paper and Tobacco, though it was afterwards laid on again; and he left us many Rules for the Government and Discipline of the Soldiers of the Battaglione, and about conferring the Degree of Doctor both of Law and Physick, which may be seen in the so often mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Government of D. Ramiro Guzman, Duke of Medina de las Torres.

HE Government of the Duke of Medina (the same Occasions subsisting, or rather increasing) could not be less burdensome to the Subjects than the preceding. The unsuccessful Wars, which wasted the Dominions of the Monarchy of Spain, and were still carrying on, had already exhausted the Royal Treasury. Recourse was always had to our unfortunate Kingdom for Supplies of Men and Money, and without having the least Regard to the extreme Misery to which it had been reduced by the immense Sums drawn out of it in the Government of the Count of Monterey, new Supplies were demanded; therefore new Taxes and Duties were laid on, and the old augmented, particularly upon Silks, Salt, Oyl, Corn, Flesh, and Salt Provisions; as also upon Lime, playing Cards, Gold and Silver Thread, and upon all Contracts for Money lent both in the City and Kingdom. After the Custom of Spain, a Duty was laid upon stamped Paper, which behoved to be made use of in all Contracts and judicial Deeds, under the Pain of Nullity; although afterwards, as a Thing too odious, it was thought fit to suppress it. And Matters were carried to that Extremity, that it was proposed to lay a Duty of a Grano a Day upon every Inhabitant of the City of Naples, for the Space of four Years; and it was reckoned, that, exempting the Ecclesiasticks and Whores, it would have produced five Millions ions of Crowns: But afterwards, the Danger of putting such an Exaction in Execution being considered, and how intolerable this daily Burden would have been to the People, it was dropt.

HOWEVER a Tax of 200,000 Ducats was laid upon the Merchants for paying the Troops; the Villages all about Naples and Nola, and many other Places belonging to the King's Demains, that had not wherewithal to buy themselves off, were sold, lost the Privileges they enjoyed under the Royal Demains, and came under the Servitude of the Barons.

AND that nothing might be wanting, the Viceroy called a Parliament, of which D. Ippolito di Costanzo, a Nobleman of Portanova, was Syndick, and a Donative of a Million of Ducats was extorted from the Baronage and the Kingdom, in lieu of a Duty of five Grana on each Bushel of Corn, which was pretended to be laid upon all the Kingdom. Among so many Burdens and Duties, only that usually exacted in Naples from Whores, was taken off, which proved of great Advantage to the publick Tranquillity, because of the continual Scandal it occasioned.

BUT that the People, so much oppressed, might not be driven to the utmost Despair, it was resolved to send an Ambassador to Spain, to implore that the King, out of his Clemency, would be pleased to give some Relief to them in their so great Distress; and the Viceroy, likewise moved with Compassion, concurred in it, and Ettore Capecelatro was pitched upon by the City for that Embassy. The Kingdom was likewise reduced to a very pitiful Condition: Besides the many Taxes which impoverished the Inhabitants, it was seen that they daily dwindled away and were destroyed by Miseries and Misfortunes. The Fire of Vesuvius had made a terrible Havock among them; but above all, the Wars, which by Fatigue and the Sword cut off the Troops, had dispeopled the Kingdom: There had been an infinite Number sent abroad for recruiting the Armies, not only to Lombardy, Germany, the Low Countries, but to the Principality of Catalonia; and all these Expeditions having been attended with ill Success, few of them returned to their Families.

BUT the Earthquakes, which this Year 1638. laid Puglia waste, occasioned prodigious and irreparable Damage in Calabria. They were so terrible in these Provinces, that they overthrew the City of Nicastro, and the famous Church of S. Euphemia. Many other Places were likewise destroyed, such as Nocera, Pietramala, Castiglione, Maida, Castelfranco, and others of less Note. The City of Cosenza itself, with many of its Villages suffered extremely; Catanzaro, Briatico, and other Places underwent the same Misfortunes: In fine, there was not a Place in Calabria that did not suffer some Damage; and upon computing the Number of the Dead, it was found that above Ten thousand Persons had perished under the Ruins of the Houses; and the Counsellor Capecelatro, who was sent by the Viceroy to comfort these People (whom it behoved of Necessity not only to excuse from the Exchequer Payments, but to relieve them with large Alms, partly out of the Royal Revenues, and partly out of the Monte della Pieta *, * Charitable Banks. amounting to the Sum of 8000 Ducats) could, as an Eye-witness, declare the Miseries of those Provinces to the King. To these Calamities was added the Consternation into which a notable Impostor, named Pietro Paolo Saffonio, a Calabrian Physician, put these Provinces, who went up and down, giving out, that more dreadful Earthquakes were to happen; that not only the Kingdom, but the whole World would be shaken, the great Day of Judgment being near at hand; that the Sea was to break out of its Banks, swallow up the Fields, and drown the Cities; that the Heavens were to rain down Hail-stones of five Pound Weight each, and that the Mountains were to vomit out Flames for reducing the Universe to Ashes. These dismal Predictions, being partly verified by the late Earthquakes and Burnings of Vesuvius, put the Country People into such a Consternation, that believing Calabria was first of all to undergo these Desolations, which were to be the Fore-runners of the Destruction of the World, every Body deserted their native Country, and sought Shelter elsewhere; wherefore the Viceroy, in order to undeceive the Unwary, ordered Saffonio to be seized, and brought in Fetters to Naples, which was accordingly done, and then he was condemned to the Gallies.

THIS Province was not only afflicted by Earthquakes, but likewise infested by the Turks of Barbary, who having formed a Design of plundering Loretto, scowred our Seas with 16 Gallies, and pillaged the Sea-faring Men and the Coasts; insomuch, that had not the Venetians blasted their Designs, they had done a great deal more Mischief¹.

IN the mean time the French, always taking Advantage of the Disorders and Declination of the Spanish Monarchy, besides having counter-ballanced the Power of the Spaniards in Italy, by the Encouragement given them by some Malcontents, had resolved to invade the Kingdom of Naples. By the Means of the Marquis of Gevre, the King of France's Ambassador in Rome, and of Giulio Mazarini, then a simple Prelate, afterwards Cardinal and Prime Minister of that Crown, they, with a Man of Quality of the Kingdom, had hatched a Conspiracy for surprizing the City of Naples, and the manner was already concerting in Rome; but one of the Conspirators having discovered the Design to the Viceroy, the Man of Quality was arrested in Rome, and being brought Prisoner to Castelnuovo, he was in all haste brought to his Trial, for which the Viceroy appointed a Junctō, which was composed of the Regent D. Matthias Casanatte, the Counsellor D. Flaminio di Costanzo, D. Giovan-Francesco Sanfelice, Annibale Moles, D. Ferrante Mugnoz, D. Ferrante Arias di Mesa, and D. Diego Varelo. Partenio Petagno, President of the Royal Chamber, was Attorney-General; and the Princes of Rocca and Colle were his Peers. Pietro Caravita and Agostino Mollo, famous Lawyers of these Times, were Advocates for the Prisoner; and the Viceroy sitting upon the Bench in the Assembly of the aforesaid Ministers, assisted by the Serjeant at Arms, with all the usual Solemnities, pronouncing the Sentence, he was condemned to be beheaded on a Scaffold. So, being first degraded, and stript of the Habit of the Knights of S. John of Jerusalem, he died an ignominious Death upon the Market-Place.

BUT though this Conspiracy had been discovered, yet the French, laying Stress upon the Disaffection of the Neapolitans to the Spanish Government, did not fail to make an Attempt; so that in the Year 1640. a Fleet, under the Command of the Archbishop of Bordeaux, having sailed from Toulon, and stopt some Days in the Ports of Corfica, and from thence, steering towards the Coast of the State of the Church, advanced to the Road of Gaeta, where it anchored, in hopes of being able to master that Fort; but being gallantly repulsed by the Cannon of the Castle, it continued its Course, and arrived in the Gulph of Naples.

THE Viceroy having considered the Danger, immediately sent D. Francesco Toraldo, and Cesare di Gaeta, Major of the Battalion of the Province of Terra di Lavoro, to the Borders of the Pope's Dominions, in order to guard those Frontiers; and he committed the Defence of the City of Pozzuolo, and the Territories of Baja and Cuma, to Colonel D. Giovan-Battista Brancaccio. He sent to Salerno Fr. Giovan-Battista Brancaccio, a Knight of Jerusalem, to assist the Prince of Stratiano, Governor of that Province, in the Defence of that Country: Vincenzo Tuttavilla, General of the Horse, was dispatched to Gaeta; and Major D. Dione de Caraffa had the Charge of guarding the Island of Capria. Then he assembled the Magistrates of the City, with the Deputies of the Wards, for getting ready the Artillery, in order to be planted on the Bulwarks: He convened the Barons, that they might be ready for the Defence of the Kingdom; and Giovan-Battista Nauclerio, the Elect of the People, offered 30,000 Men, all armed, for the Defence of the City. But Money was wanting, and it was found to be a very difficult Matter how to raise it.

WHILE the City was in great Perplexity about raising Money, in the Middle of September this Year, the French Fleet, composed of 34 Men of War, appeared in Sight of Naples, which put it in greater Confusion. The Cannon were immediately taken out of the Steeple of S. Lorenzo, and planted upon the Towers of Carmine, S. Lucia, and Crocelle, and upon the Mole: Some others were planted upon that part of the Hill of Posilipo which faces the small Harbour of Nisita, under the Direction of D. Antonio del Tufo, Marquis of S. Giovanni, and of the Colonel D. Tiberio Brancaccio; and other four Cannon were placed upon the Island of Nisita, under the Charge of D. Antonio di Liguoro, Governor of the said Island: Scipione d'Afflitto, an old and gallant Soldier, guarded all that Coast called De'Bagnuoli. Eight thousand Burghers of Naples appeared in Arms, and were divided into 40 Companies, under the Command of D. Tiberio Caraffa, Prince of Bisignano, as their General. But what preserved Naples from greater Mischief, was the seasonable Arrival of D. Melchior di Borgia, with fourteen Neapolitan Gallies; to which other four, that were bringing D. Francesco Melo from Sicily on his Way to Milan, being joined, Borgia guarded the Sea, and prevented the Incursions of the Enemy, who had made many Attempts to land on the Shore of the Chiaja; but being repulsed by the Soldiers posted there, and the constant Fire from the Batteries on the Hills and Towers, and at the same time Borgia hovering about them with his Gallies, at last they retired towards the West, and returned to Ponza, Borgia following them as far as the Promontory of Minerva. Thus were the French baffled in their Designs, grounded upon the Hopes given them by the Malcontents, who had made them believe, that upon the bare Appearance of their Fleet, the People, dissatisfied with the Spanish Government, would rise in Arms, and introduce them into the Kingdom. But they had better Success in bringing about the Revolutions of Catalonia and Portugal, the unhappy Issue of which, with respect to us, we are now going to relate; for there being a cruel War kindled in the Principality of Catalonia, Supplies of Men and Money were obliged to be sent from our Kingdom to that long and expensive Expedition.

C H A P. V.

The Principality of Catalonia withdraws itself from the King's Allegiance, and puts itself under the Protection and Dominion of France. The Kingdom of Portugal likewise shakes off the Yoke, and proclaims the Duke of Braganza, King John IV.

AS the Monarchy of Spain was hastening to its Ruin, so the French were full of great Designs; whilst the Hopes of an universal Peace, which the Pope had undertaken to manage, were daily vanishing; therefore, wearied of the Expences, and the ill Figure he made in keeping his Legate idle in Cologne, he recalled him. The Revolts of Catalonia and Portugal, which filled the French with greater Hopes and deep Designs, rendered those Treaties of Peace more difficult afterwards.

THE Count Duke, who with absolute Sway governed in Spain, not only the King, but his Dominions, managed Affairs with a most haughty Temper, severe Maxims, and violent Counsels. He had proposed to himself to raise the Power and Glory of the King equal to the Title he had made him assume of Great; but Fortune, by unhappy Events, so ill backed his Design, that the Splendor of the Crown was in a great measure eclipsed, insomuch that the Count Duke's Enemies, with a Spanish Witticism, used to ridicule him, saying, that the King was Great, like a Ditch, which, by taking away the Earth from its Edges, grew the greater. Therefore Foreigners stood no more in Awe of the Power of Spain; and the Subjects, who, under the Shadow of Reputation and Prosperity, had been accustomed to reverence the secret Springs of Government, began now by Degrees to despise and hate both the King and the Favourite.

IT was plainly seen, that Olivares had a Design not only to extend the Monarchy beyond its former Bounds, but in the Dominions thereof to make the King Absolute, though in some of the Provinces his Power was limited by the Laws, Privileges, and Agreement. What pushed him on to this, was the want of Men and Money for supporting so many foreign Wars, because in being obliged to depend upon the Consent of the People, the Supplies did not answer the urgent Occasions.

Therefore

Therefore he resolved to abolish, or at least retrench the Liberty claimed by some, and especially the Catalans, who, being possessed of great Privileges, and exempted from many Taxes, preserved their Liberty with no less Zeal than they did their Religion. Some Years ago, the King having assembled the Cortes in Barcelona, they often refused to comply with Olivares's Demands, at which he being highly offended, ever after had it in his Head to depress and humble them. The Kings were wont to have a great Regard for the Catalans, on account of their natural Courage, and the important Situation of the Province, it being impenetrable by Sea for want of Harbours, and inaccessible by Land by reason of the Mountains; and these stretching a great way into the Country, and being divided into many Ridges, form as many Retrenchments and Bulwarks, in which are contained strong Forts, populous Cities, Towns, and a great Number of Villages: Besides, its Proximity to France, the Passes of the Pyrenean Hills, the Largeness of its Circuit, Populousness, and the warlike Disposition of the People, rendered this Province both considerable and formidable.

THE Count Duke was watching an Opportunity to curb this Province at any rate; but when he fancied it was in his Power to do it, he did not consider that the Grandeur and Safety of all Spain were at Stake. The French still enlarging their Bounds on that Side, were in hopes to create great Disturbance, and particularly, by the Misfortunes that attend War, to irritate the People, which accordingly happened; for the Spaniards having lost Salses, in order to recover it, were forced to make Catalonia the Place of Arms, and to quarter the Army there: So that, if during the Siege, the Province was miserably oppressed by the marching of the Troops, their Dissoluteness afterwards seemed the more grievous, that these People had not been accustomed to it; for nothing was heard but Extortions, Wrongs, the Prophanation of Churches, the ravishing of Women, and Robberies: To which Disorders the Generals giving no Redress, made People believe, that Olivares winked at them in order to create an Opportunity, under the Pretence of Self-Defence, to put the Yoke upon that Province; and 'tis certain, that the Count of S. Coloma the Viceroy, being pressed, by his frequent Letters, to raise Men and Money in the Province, made use of a certain Sum of Money in Barcelona, which was at the Disposal of the City, without minding its Privileges, or waiting for the Consent of the States; and one of the Jurats, a Magistrate of great Credit, having a mind to oppose so much Freedom, and likewise to make pressing Instances for having the Licentiousness of the Soldiers restrained, the Viceroy imprisoned him. This was enough to provoke a People, who bore with Obedience, but did not as yet know what Slavery was; whereupon they all rose up in Arms, broke open the Prisons, and run up and down the Streets in so tumultuous a manner, that the Viceroy was in such Terror, that he thought of saving himself by Flight. Therefore he run to the Arsenal, where not finding himself secure, because the People having set fire to the Palace, were in search of him every where, he ordered a Galley to be haled ashore; but as he was going to embark, the Mob overtook him, and put him to Death. Then the People, partly struck with Terror for what they had done, partly between the Apprehensions of Slavery, and the Prospect of Liberty, betwixt Hope and Despair, judged, that there was no Room left for Repentance, nor the Royal Clemency.

THEREFORE having shaken off the Yoke, they run out into sad Extremities, and the Confusion not being able to subsist of itself, an independant Government was framed under the Direction of the Council of a Hundred, and the other antient Magistrates of the City. After this Example almost all the Principality was turned topsy-turvy, and in the Cities and Villages, there was a general Revolt, and the Spanish Inhabitants were murdered or chased away.

THIS unforeseen Accident perplexed the Count Duke, he durst neither discover it to the King, nor conceal it; but he endeavoured to make him believe, that it was nothing else but a popular Tumult, which would vanish of itself, or being quickly quelled by Force, would render his Authority more conspicuous; for by the Force of Arms the Rebellion would not only be suppressed, but likewise the Pride of the Catalans, and those Privileges, which made them so obstinate, might be abolished. But reflecting more sedately within himself upon the Importance of the Province, the Nature of its Situation, and the great Damage that would attend the introducing the French into it, he was at a Stand, whether he should make make use of Art or Force. Nor was it certain, but that the other Kingdoms, particularly Arragon, might follow such an Example. First he tried, by the Persuasions of the old Dutchess of Cordona, who was in great Esteem and Credit with the People of Barcelona, and by the means of the Pope's Minister, who resided there, to quiet the Minds of the Inhabitants, and still the Commotion; but that proving in vain, he resolved to employ such Force, and so quickly, that the People should neither be able to resist, nor the French to come to their Relief.

THEREFORE he ordered the Army to be assembled, commanded the Feudatories, and invited the most suspected of the Nobility, particularly the Portuguese, that they might serve both as Soldiers and Hostages. However, the Provisions could not be got so soon ready, but the Catalans had Time, deliberately both to provide themselves, and send Deputies to France to seek Assistance. It cannot be expressed how greedily they were received by the Cardinal De Richelieu, then Prime Minister of France, who had artfully practised upon them before. He shewed them a great deal of Respect, and loaded them with Promises; but at the same time, taking Advantage of the Opportunity that offered, he did not only his utmost to foment the War in the Heart of Spain, but to reduce Catalonia to the Necessity of surrendering to the French. He sent Monsieur De St. Pol, with some Officers, Troops, and Cannon by Sea, in order to encourage the Catalans, and exasperate them against the Castilians; and he dispatched Monsieur De Plessis Bessazon, an eloquent and cunning Minister, to observe the State of Affairs, and the Disposition of the People.

ON the other Hand, the Count Duke having drawn together an Army of 30,000 Men, gave the Command of it to the Marquis De los Velez, a Native of Catalonia, and appointed to be Viceroy of that Province, towards which he was far from being disposed to shew any Favour, but rather Hatred and Abhorrence, because the People had razed his House in Barcelona, and confiscated his Estate. In the Month of December this Year, the new Viceroy marched to Tortosa, a City that had been a Complice in the Revolt; but either through the Inclination of the Inhabitants, or over-awed by the Army, was the first that submitted; he then advanced to Balaguer, many untenable Places surrendering as he marched. Though the Passes are so narrow here, that they may be defended by a small Number of Men, yet the Catalans had not the Courage to stand their Ground; so that the Marquis, breathing nothing but Terror and Severity, advanced to Combril, which the Rebels had made their Place of Arms. Though the Place was but weak, it held out five Days, and then offering to capitulate, no Terms were granted, but to surrender at Discretion; the Town was given up to be pillaged, the Officers were hanged, and the Soldiers put to the Sword. This Severity created Despair every-where, particularly in Barcelona, where the Citizens encouraged one another to suffer the greatest Hardships, rather than to fall into the Hands, and under the Government of so cruel a Conqueror and exasperated Viceroy. Their Liberty and Safety being at Stake, they prepared for a Defence, Monjou was fortified; and the Danger being common, it was unanimously resolved to act with Vigour and Resolution.

NEVERTHELESS they were afraid of not being able to resist so powerful an Army without a strong Support. On the other Hand the French Ministers fomented their Fear, sometimes laying before them their imminent Ruin, and sometimes the Relief at hand; but setting forth, that it could not be expected the Crown of France would neglect its own Advantage in procuring that of another, they insinuated how much it would turn to their Account to oblige so great a King, both out of Honour and Interest, to protect that Principality. The Artifice took; for the Fear of Danger, and the Hopes of Assistance, induced the Catalans to give themselves up to the Protection and Dominion of France, upon these Conditions, that they should enjoy their Privileges, especially those of the Consent of the People to the laying on of Taxes, and of bestowing Church Benefices and Civil Posts upon the Natives, excepting that of Viceroy, which might be exercised by a Foreigner. To which they all consented; the greatest Part, for Novelties Sake; the Simple, out of a Notion of bettering their Fortunes; and the more Discerning, because they saw, that whatever happened, whether Liberty or Slavery, they could not continue long under the French Government. This fell out in the last Days of this Year, at the very Time that Portugal, having likewise shaken off the Yoke, revived the antient Title of the Kingdom by a new King.

S E C T. I.

The Kingdom of Portugal shakes off the Yoke, and withdraws itself from the Crown of Spain.

THE antient Hatred which the Castilians and Portuguese bore one another, and that, like Heritage, had been transmitted from Father to Son, by the haughty Carriage and cruel Advice of the Count Duke, was at this Time much greater than when the Portuguese were forced to submit to the Dominion of Castile; so that they had been impatiently waiting for an Opportunity to change their present State. But the Power and good Fortune of the Castilians had hitherto, either prevented foreign, or dissipated domestick Designs; nevertheless their Uneasiness still increased, and they had the Dukes of Braganza in their Eye, who, being descended of Edward, King Henry's Brother, in the Opinion of many had the best Title, though they had been forced to submit to the Power of King Philip. The present Duke John, observing that the Castilians had their Eye upon him, shewed as if he had an Aversion to all manner of Business; and a few Years before, a Tumult having happened in some City, hearing his Name huzza'd, he contained himself with such Modesty, that he was looked upon to be equally averse from Ambition and Deceit. However, the Count Duke, considering both the Right of the Family, and the Affections of the People, besides the Riches and Estates, which exceeded the Rank of a Vassal, in order to make sure of him, invited him to Court, and with a pretended Confidence, bestowed Places and Titles upon him, which was believed to be designed rather to expose him to Dangers, than to do him Honour; particularly that in officiating his Office of Constable, he might have Occasion to go aboard the Fleet, or into some Fortrefs, where there might be private Orders for making him Prisoner. The Duke, by sundry Excuses, shunning to go to Madrid, carried himself so warily, that though he could not avoid being suspected, at least he eschewed the Dangers. The Count Duke made use of the Revolt of Catalonia, and of a Report, that the King was to go in Person to subdue it, for inviting the Portuguese Nobility, and among the rest, very pressing, the Duke of Braganza, with all their Followers, to attend the King on so remarkable an Occasion: But the Portuguese laid hold of the very same Opportunity to revive their former Resolutions; insomuch that many, who in private Conversations were wont to lament, that a famous Kingdom, and extended to the four Parts of the World, should be reduced to a Province, and be an Addition to the Dominions of their inveterate Enemies, now considered how much the Nobility was oppressed, and the People trampled upon; and, by the Jealousy of the Count Duke, the Country wasted, the Grandeos persecuted, the Privileges infringed, and that Shadow of Liberty, and seeming Decorum that were left to Portugal, quite vanished. Then, from complaining of the Times, proceeding to reproach themselves, as if the Portuguese wanted that Courage and Resolution, for which the Catalans were so much cried up; they imagined, that being governed by a Woman and an odious Minister, with few Garisons, and less Provisions, at a Time when all Spain was in Commotion, the Army divided, the King unable to resist in so many Parts, and France ready to give Assistance, they could with all Ease execute the most difficult Undertaking.

MARGARET of Savoy was at this Time Vicequeen, and the Affairs of the Government were managed by some Castilians, particularly Secretary Vasconcellos, who being a Creature of Olivares, and raised by his Favour, followed his Maxims, of humbling the Grandeos, and exercising absolute Authority. In this State of Affairs, as for an Insurrection, there seemed to be more Danger in the Discovery, than in the Execution of the Design; therefore some Noblemen having met in the Garden of Autan Almada, and considered the present Conjuncture, they all resolved to engage in it, taking one another by the Hands, swearing Secrecy, and never to desert the Cause. They were something puzzled about what Form of Government they should pitch upon. Some, after the Example of the Catalans, were for establishing a Republick; but the Majority considered the Confusion that would result from the Change of Government in a Country accustomed to absolute Monarchy.

Monarchy. Therefore they had recourse to Braganza, in whom, for supporting the Cause, and drawing in the People, the most essential Requisites, both of Right to the Kingdom, and eminent Rank, were to be found; therefore they sent, separately, Pedro Mendoza, and Juan Pinto Ribero, to offer him the Crown; but finding that the Duke started many Difficulties and Dangers, these Messengers endeavoured to remove all his Doubts, and Pinto particularly, to his Reasons and Intreaties, adding Threats and Protestations, declared to him, that even, will he nill he, he should be proclaimed King; and besides that, his Obstinacy would draw certain Destruction and Ruin both on himself and others. The Duke, upon so great and unexpected a Prospect of the Crown, was staggered; but his Wife, Sister to the Duke of Medina Sidonia, being a Lady of a noble Spirit, spurred him on, by upbraiding him with preferring a frail Life to a Crown. Nor did the French, who were privy to the Design, fail to encourage him by secret Messages, and the Promise of powerful Assistance, making him believe, that the Crown would sit the more firm upon his Head, that the rest were tottering upon King Philip's; therefore he was induced to consent, and the Time and Manner of proclaiming him were concerted.

ALTHOUGH this Affair was carried on with great Secrecy, yet there being many concerned in it, the Vicequeen had some Inkling of it, and frequently advised the Count Duke of the private Conversations and Designs of the Conspirators; but he, apt to believe himself rather than others, was too late in giving Credit to the Advice. Therefore on the first Day of December this Year 1640. many of the Nobility having gone to the Palace, in the Morning as the Clock struck Nine, which was the Signal agreed upon, at the firing off a Pistol, drew their Swords, and attacked the Vicequeen's Guard, who, sauntering about without Arms, expecting no such Thing, easily yielded. Having got Possession of the Palace, the Noblemen cried out Liberty, and at the same Time huzza'd John IV. King; and others, some in the Streets, and some from the Windows, and amongst these Michael Almeida, a reverend old Gentleman, encouraging the People, and stirring them up to take Arms, in a few Minutes the Multitude was so great, that, as if they had been all moved by the same Spirit, there was not one that dissented or waver'd. A Detachment of Castilians, that was marching to mount Guard on the Palace, was attacked by the Populace, and forced to fly. Antonio Tello, with some others, having forced their Way into the Apartment of Vasconcellos, who, upon hearing the Noise, had shut himself up in a Press, found him out, and having put him to Death, threw him out at the Window, that he might be a Gazing-stock to the People, and also to shew how little Blood the Revolution of a Kingdom cost. The Vicequeen, being in the Hands of the Conspirators, was treated with great Respect; but they obliged her to give Orders to the Governor of the Castle not to fire the Cannon, otherwise the Castilians that were in the City would be all put to the Sword. The Governor not only obeyed the Order, but immediately, either out of Fear or Necessity, surrendered, alledging that he was so ill provided, that he could not have defended himself if he had been attacked by the People. It was very surprizing to see a City, such as Lisbon, great, populous, and in Commotion, in so short a Time, not only Mistress of herself, but in such Order, and so quiet, that though nobody commanded, all Ranks of People, at the Name of the new King, readily obeyed.

JOHN, hearing that Lisbon had submitted, caused himself to be proclaimed King in his own Territories, and, on the sixth Day of the same Month of December, with unspeakable Pomp, made his Entry into that City, and having received the Oath of Allegiance from the People, he swore that he would maintain their Privileges. The News of this Event being spread over the Kingdom, there was not a Place that did not follow the Example of the Capital, with so much Unanimity, that the Government did not seem to be changed, but only the Name of the King, to the inexpressible Joy of the People. The Vicequeent was conducted to the Borders, and some of the Castilian Ministers were kept Prisoners, as Hostages for the Portuguese that were in Madrid. The Castilians in the different Garisons, and those in S. Gian, a Fort by Situation impregnable, struck with Terror, marched out without Resistance. In the Space of eight Days, the whole Kingdom was reduced to a peaceable Obedience. Advice of this Revolution having been quickly dispatched by Caravelle to the East-Indies, the Coast of Africa, and the Islands belonging to the Portuguese, as if it had been expected, with unanimous Consent,

the Castilian Yoke was shaken off, and King John IV. acknowledged and proclaimed.

THE Count Duke finding, that instead of aggrandizing the Monarchy, it behoved him to look to its Safety, was at a Stand whether he had best turn his Thoughts, and make the greatest Push upon Portugal or Catalonia. At last he resolved to reduce Catalonia, hoping to accomplish the Undertaking in a short time; for he was afraid, that if he made longer Delay, the strong Holds of the Country, the Ferity of the People, and the French Assistance, would render it more difficult. On the other Hand, the Borders of Portugal being open, far from Assistance, the People less Warlike, and by being Master of Lisbon, the whole Kingdom might be subdued, he imagined, that the Portuguese being left in Security and Carelessness, would not think of fortifying themselves before-hand, and that the Nobility, naturally very haughty, at the Long-run would not bear the Command of one, who had sundry Rivals, and many Equals. The War then being carried on in Catalonia, the Portuguese had Time to settle their Government, so that Olivares was grievously out, and Portugal continues to this Day withdrawn from, and not in the least dependent upon the Crown of Spain.

THINGS being disposed for the Prosecution of the War in Catalonia, even in Winter, the Marquis De los Velez laid Siege to Tarragona, the second City in the Principality. The Catalans, animated by the French, despised both the King's Indignation and Arms, insomuch that they maintained a long War, which cost our Kingdom a great deal of Blood and Treasure, as well as the other Dominions of the Monarchy. For which Medina, our Viceroy, obtained a new Donative, fresh Troops were raised, and new Ships fitted out, whereby the Subjects and Corporations of the Kingdom were oppressed with new Taxes and Impositions.

BUT our Miseries not ending here, a new War, which likewise broke out at this Time in Italy, betwixt the Pope and the Duke of Parma, about the Duchy of Castro, put the Viceroy and Kingdom to new Trouble and Charges; and they would have been greater, if the Spaniards had not been cooled; and being taken up with their own Misfortunes at home, by the Revolt of Catalonia and the Loss of Portugal, they had no mind to meddle with other Peoples Concerns, except by Mediation and good Offices: The Viceroy, therefore, being required by the Pope to send the 900 Horse, stipulated in the Investiture of the Kingdom to be furnished, whenever the State of the Church should be attacked, refused to send them, because the Quarrel did not concern the Church, but the Pope's own Family¹. Nevertheless, the Viceroy was obliged, at the Kingdom's Expences, to fortify the Garisons of Tuscany, and the Borders of the Kingdom on the Side of Abruzzo, whither he sent the Colonel-General Carlo della Gatta, and recommended the Defence of that Province to Acchille Minutolo, Duke of Belfano, Governor thereof. Many Companies of Germans, brought by the Way of Trieste, were likewise sent thither, and afterwards were brought to Naples by Colonel D. Michèle Pignatelli, and quartered in the Hospital of S. Januarius, without the Walls of the City.

BUT though the Kingdom wanted a breathing Time for repairing its own Misfortunes, yet the Demands of new Supplies for the Milanese were still continued: It behoved the Viceroy to send thither 3000 Foot; and that the Corporations of the Kingdom might be put upon an equal Footing in the Payment of the Donatives made to the King, he ordered a new Catasto (a Book so called, wherein the Means of the Subjects are set down) to be made in each of them, and deputed an Officer of the Chamber of Accompts to see that the Payments were proportioned to every Man's Ability.

THIS Year 1644 the Banditi infested the Provinces, and interrupted Commerce more than ever; and the Regular Troops not being sufficient for suppressing them, the Viceroy was forced to send D. Giuseppe Caracciolo, Prince of Torrello, with the Title of Lieutenant-General of Campagna, to curb their Insolence,

C H A P. VI.

The Fall of the Count Duke, and consequently that of the Duke of Medina, who yields the Government to the Admiral of Castile his Successor.

UT while Medina, in order to prolong his Government, which had already lasted six Years and some Months, was managing a new Donative for the Court, Advice was brought him, that the King had appointed the Admiral of Castile, who was then Viceroy of Sicily, to be his Successor. The Count Duke having incurred the King's Displeasure, by Consequence the Duke underwent the same Disgrace and Change of Fortune. The grievous Loss of Catalonia and Portugal, in a great measure imputed to the violent Counsels of Olivares, had cooled the King's Affection for him; either it was, that the continual Misfortunes made him hate the unhappy Director of Affairs, or he had found out, that the Favourite had imposed upon him, and represented Things to be quite otherwise than they really were. Many seeing such Ruin and Destruction, laying aside Flattery and Fear, found themselves obliged to speak their Minds freely; but none would venture to be the first, till at last the Queen, supported by the Emperor, who, with his own Hand, wrote Letters to the King, and by the Marquis of Gran, the Imperial Ambassador, resolved to unravel the Matter, and lay open the Intrigues. Then every Body spoke their Minds, and even the meanest of the People, either by Memorials, or publickly by Word of Mouth, solicited the King to dismiss the Prime Minister, and take the Government upon himself. He, amazed at his Ignorance of the Causes of the Misfortunes, and overwhelmed with the Knowledge of what had been discovered to him all at once, was at a Stand at first, being sensible of the Weight of the Government, and afraid that the ordinary Court-Tricks had been made use of against the Favourite; but at last, not able to resist the unanimous Desire of the People, one Day, all of a sudden he ordered him to retire to Loechos. Olivares readily obeyed the Order, and, afraid of the People, left the Court in Disguise. This Resolution was attended with the Joy and general Applause of every Body. The Grandees, formerly discarded and oppressed, flocked to serve the King, and grace the Court; and the People, animated by the Report, that the King was to take the Reins of the Government, hitherto neglected, into his own Hands, strove who should be foremost in offering him both Men and Money. But, either wearied of the Weight of the Government, or ignorant of Affairs, and with Ministers yet more ignorant, he would insensibly have restored the Count Duke to Favour, if the whole Court had not opposed it with a general Murmur, yea if Olivares himself had not forestalled his own Hopes; for having a Mind, by publishing some Papers, to vindicate himself, he offended many to that Degree, that the King thought fit to remove him much farther off, and confine him to the City of Toro, where, not accustomed to Rest, and being a Man of a great Spirit, he was tired of an idle Life, and soon died of Grief.

THUS fell Olivares, and though the King gave out that he would take the Government upon himself, yet, either because he could not, or that he would not govern by himself alone, he resolved to give up the Burden; and having expressed his Mind before some Grandees, who were aspiring after the Count Duke's Place, Lewis de Haro, Olivares's Nephew, and at the same time his Enemy, insinuated himself by Degrees, and with great Modesty, as if it had been in Obedience to the King, in a short time took upon him the Administration of the Government.

DON Lewis de Haro, looking upon the Admiral of Castile, who was then Viceroy of Sicily, to be one of the most powerful Pretenders to the Prime Ministry, in order to keep him at a Distance, and at the same time to please him, advanced him to the Viceroyalty of Naples, giving him for Successor in that Island, the Marquis De los Velez, who, from the Wars of Catalonia, had been sent Ambassador to Rome: For which End both their Commissions were dispatched; but, whether through Mistake, or the Cunning of the Clerks of the universal Dispatches, who had a good Allowance from the Duke of Medina, instead of sending each of them his own Commission, they came both inclosed in Medina's Letters, who, like Monterey, in order to prolong his Government, refused to deliver them their Letters; and though the Marquis De los Velez had come from Rome to Naples, on his Way to Sicily, Medina put him off from Day to Day, so that he could not depart for want of his Commission, which appointed him to be Viceroy: On the other Hand, the Admiral could as little leave the Government of the Island before the Arrival of his Successor; and though he had sent his Secretary to Naples to demand his Letters, he met with nothing but Delays, Medina being loth to quit the Government. But at last, finding that his Authority was daily dwindling away, and that he had not the same Respect paid him as formerly, he was forced to submit; but having a mind to get the Donative of a Million, which he had been soliciting for the King, granted by the Parliament, the Deputies, whether they were unwilling to lay on that new Burden upon their Country, or that they rather inclined to reserve it for the Beginning of the new Viceroy's Government, shunned coming into it. Medina, therefore, finding that he could no longer with Honour continue his Government, resolved to deliver the Commissions; so that the Marquis De los Velez having gone for Sicily, upon his Arrival there, the Admiral set out for Naples, where he arrived on the 6th of May this Year 1644. and Medina immediately quitting the Government, went to live in his Country-House at Portici, where he staid till the Gallies were fitted out for carrying him to Spain.

HE left us many stately Monuments, which still adorn the City. To him we owe that Fountain of admirable Architecture, with the God Neptune pouring most limpid Water out of his Trident, which being by him removed to the Glacis of Castelnuovo, enlarged, and plentifully supplied with Water, from him to this Day keeps the Name of Fontana Medina. To him likewise is owing that magnificent Gate of the City under the Declivity of S. Martin's Hill, which formerly was called Del Pertugio, because of a little Gap, which the Count D'Olivares caused to be made in the Wall for the Conveniency of the Inhabitants of that Neighbourhood, and which likewise from him retains the Name of Porta Medina. The Duke D'Alba and the Duke De Medina de las Torres had the good Fortune, that these Gates still retain their Names, because, being built in obscure Places, their antient Names have not eclipsed the new. It did not fare so with the Via Gusmana, the Porta Pimentella, the magnificent Street, beautified with pleasant Trees, which in our Time was made by the Duke De Medina Celi, and with other Buildings, because being built in S. Lucia, the Chiaja, and in other remarkable and frequented Places, they soon lost the Names their Founders had given them.

HE likewise repaired the Castle of S. Eramo. He beautified the Bridge upon the River Sele, without the Gate of Salerno, and he opened that large Street, which leads to the Monastery of S. Antonio di Posilipo. But of all the other Edifices, the Palace of Medina, which he built upon the Side of Posilipo, is the most stately, in building of which 400 Men were employed: A Work truly magnificent, and is one of the three most sumptuous Edifices at present in Naples, and vies with those of the University and the Royal Palace; but he had not the Pleasure to see it finished, (as the Count of Lemos had seen the Fabrick of the University) because of his leaving the Kingdom, and now a great Part of it is ruinous, uninhabited, and falling.

BUT we are much more indebted to him for having left us about fifty most excellent Laws, and erected two new Tribunals in the Provinces of the Further Abruzzo and Basilicata. He pitched upon D. Carlo Sanseverino, Count of Chiaromonte, to preside in Basilicata, and appointed Stigliano to be the Place of his Residence, but he did not remain long there; so that the Seats of the Presidents of that Province Province being removed, sometimes to one Place, sometimes to another, at last it was fixed in the City of Matera, where it still remains. The City of Aquila was appointed to be the Seat of the other President, and the first was D. Ferrante Mugnoz, a Counsellor of S. Chiana. Thus the Province of Abruzzo being divided into two, as King Alphonfus had done with respect to the Treasurers, and the Administration of the Royal Revenues; and a new Tribunal being erected in Basilicata, the Number of the Provinces, with respect to the Administration of Justice, came to be equal and answerable to the Number of Treasurers, which formerly was greater than that of Presidents or Justices. He likewise reformed the Tribunal of Otranto, and built its Prisons in the Form we now see them.

THE Statutes which he left us, contain many prudent Provisions. He renewed the Edicts against Luxury in Apparel, Servants, and Coaches: He prohibited, under severe Penalties, the Exportation of Arms, especially Fire-Arms: He was a terrible Persecutor of the Banditi: He chased all the Vagabonds out of the Kingdom: He prohibited the Students from going to any other Schools but those of the University; and made other wholesome Regulations, which are set down in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

UPON Medina's Arrival at Court, he was refused Audience of the King, who, at the Instigation of his Enemies (who, by the Fall of the Count Duke, his Father-in-Law, being become more bold, had accused him of imbezling much of the Donatives made to the King) made him give an Account of many Millions, which, during his Government, he had received from the Kingdom; but the Duke alledged, that the Viceroys of Naples were not obliged to give an Account, and that if his Majesty would exact that of him, he was very ready to give it, provided it was not done in a judicial Manner, but privately, that the succeeding Viceroys might not be prejudiced: The Affair was taken into Deliberation, and according to the wonted Spanish Slowness, it never having been brought to a Head, was for ever dropt. The Princess of Stigliano, his Wife, grieved for the Loss of the Government, was left big with Child at Portici, where she miscarried, and afterwards was seized with a Disease like that of King Philip II. and died of the same lousy Distemper: A miserable Instance of human Grandeur! Her Body was put in the Church of the Bare-footed Augustins of the Village of Portici; and her Relations, not being able to prevail with the Viceroy to allow it to be transported with Royal Pomp, which they pretended was her Due, as Dutches of Sabionetta, after some Time, it was privately conveyed to the Chapel of her Family, in the Royal Church of S. Dominico Maggiore of Naples.

C H A P. VII.

Of the short Government of D. Juan Alfonso Enriquez, Admiral of Castile.

THE Admiral having arrived in Naples, and, on the 7th of May this Year 1644. taken Possession of his Office, soon perceived the lamentable State to which the Kingdom was reduced: He saw the extreme Misery of the Subjects, oppressed with so many Taxes and Duties; all the Sources drained, and the Exchequer quite empty. But his greatest Trouble was, that he not only could not see how these Evils could be remedied, but the craving Necessities still growing greater, and the Ministers of the Court of Spain, accustomed to receive immense Sums from his Predecessors, Predecessors, never weary of seeking new Donatives of Millions, very much perplexed and disturbed him.

NEVERTHELESS this hard Beginning did not quite discourage him, but by his Prudence and Vigilance, the best Way he could, supplied the new Wants that occurred. Although by the Peace made ever since the Month of March this Year, between the Pope and the Duke of Parma, by the mutual Restitution of the Places taken from one another, that Fire had been extinguished, which, on account of the Possession and Demolition of Castro, belonging to the Duke, had been kindled in Italy; yet the Barberini had not laid down their Arms, nor dismissed the 4000 Foot and 1200 Horse, which they kept in Pay under the Command of the Duke of Bouillon; and the Pope being taken very ill in the Month of July, before he expired, our Viceroy caused pressing Instances to be made in Rome, that the Pope's Nephews should lay down their Arms, and he likewise made an Offer to the College of Cardinals, of his Person, and the Forces of the Kingdom, for the Freedom of the future Conclave; and the Pope having died on the 29th of the same Month of July, in all haste he dispatched some Troops to the Borders of the Kingdom; but the Consistory having ordered the Governor of Rome to disarm, and, on the 15th of September, Giovam. Battista, Cardinal Pamfilio, being elected Pope, who took the Name of Innocent X. the Troops returned to their former Quarters¹.

THESE Fears were no sooner over, than much greater followed; for soon after these very Troops were employed against the Turks, who, with a Fleet of 46 Gallies, commanded by Becbir, the Captain-Bassa, had appeared in Sight of Otranto. The Spaniards gave out, that this Fleet had been fitted out and sent at the Instigation of the French, in order to divert the Troops of the Kingdom: Others said, that it was the Beginning of a deeper Design of the Turks, and only for discovering in what Posture of Defence the Sea-Coasts of Italy were; however, tho' they were driven by a Storm upon the Shore of Verona, without doing any other Damage to Otranto, than striking Terror by the Remembrance of the past Invasions; yet they returned afterwards into the Gulph of Taranto, where they pillaged Rocca Imperiale, and carried off near 200 Persons into Slavery². And the Year following, having landed on the Coast of Calabria, they pillaged some Towns.

THE rich Booty, which the Maltese afterwards took from the Eunuch Zambula Aga, in his Voyage to Mecca (which was the Ground of the War of Candy) made the Turk threaten to invade Malta; whereupon the Great Master of that Order calling upon the neighbouring Princes for Help, made pressing Instances to the Viceroys of Naples and Sicily for immediate Assistance: So that the Admiral was forced to send him four Ships, two of them loaded with Ammunition and Provisions, and two with Spanish and Italian Soldiers; but the Turks having attacked the Kingdom of Candy, the Fear of the Invasion of Malta vanished, and the Great Master sent back the Troops, but not the Ammunition and Provisions.

THESE Succours could have been easily borne, but much greater were demanded for other Wars, and particularly for that of Catalonia, which lay very heavy upon Spain; therefore it behoved the Viceroy to send thither from Naples, 800 Horse, and 4000 Foot, in 26 Ships, under the Command of General D. Melchior Borgia: A Succour, as it was great, so it compleated the Impoverishing of the Kingdom. Yet for all that, the Ministers of the Court of Spain never gave over pressing the Admiral with new Demands of Donatives of Millions, for supplying the great Necessities of the Crown, which the bad Conduct of the Spaniards had occasioned; but the Indigence of the Subjects, so overcharged, was no less, and when the Viceroy believed he could ease them of their Burden, to satisfy the continual Cravings of the Court, he was forced to demand a new Donative of a Million, and there being no other Means left for raising it, but by taxing the Rents of the Houses of the City of Naples, it was resolved to take a List of all the Citizens that rented Houses, and to tax them; but when it came to be put in Execution, it occasioned a general Insurrection, and in the Suburbs of S. Antonio and Loretto, many of the Commonalty began to mutiny; so that the Viceroy foreseeing great Disorders, put a Stop to the Collection. Of which the Ministers of Spain being apprized, imputing this Stop to the Admiral's Weakness, they checked him severely, and with their wonted Haughtiness, ordered him to go on in the Collection; but this prudent Minister, who knew better the bad Inclinations of the City and Kingdom, continued firm in his Resolution of suspending the Collection, and wrote to the King, begging of him, that he would be pleased to remove him from the Government, that he might not be put upon carrying Things to sad Extremities.

THE Spanish Ministers laughing at the Admiral's Timidity, gave no Ear to his Request, but blamed his Conduct, and talked of him at Court as a Man of no Courage, and incapable of governing a Convent of Friars, much less so considerable a Kingdom as that of Naples. But the Admiral continued stedfast in his Resolution, declaring that he would serve, not betray his King; he renewed his Request of being removed from the Government; whereupon the Ministers at last induced the King to recall him, and order him, in his Majesty's Name, to go to Rome and do Homage to the new Pope; and thinking, that D. Rodrigo Ponce de Leon, Duke D'Arcos, a bold and resolute Man, would make up the want of Courage which they imputed to the Admiral, they appointed him to be his Successor: Wherefore the Duke used afterwards to complain, that all the dirty Work was reserved for him, and that he was come to atone for the Faults of the Viceroy's his Predecessors.

THE Admiral having notice of the Resolution of the Court, upon the Arrival of the Duke D'Arcos in the Kingdom, in the Month of April this Year 1646. left Naples, and on the 25th of the same Month made his Entry into Rome, and on the 28th did Homage to the Pope; from thence, after having made the Tour of Italy, he returned to Court to exercise his Office of Steward of the Household, and soon after, being taken ill with a Stranguary, on the 6th of February 1647. he died.

DURING the short Time of his Government, which was not quite two Years, he left us about twenty very good Statutes; he studied to extirpate the Banditi and Vagabonds: He took care to keep the Custom-House from being cheated, by forbidding Convents and other Religious Places to retail Wine: He prohibited the Making and Exportation of Arms, and made other prudent Regulations, which are set down in the so often-mentioned Chronology. But what gained him the greatest Applause in the Beginning of his Government, was his having removed many Abuses that had been introduced in that of his Predecessor Medina, amongst which, one was the scandalous Number of Judges in the Tribunal of the Vicariate, who were made rather to comply with the importunate Recommendations of D. Anna, Medina's Wife's Relations, who were then very powerful at Court, than for their Merit. The Admiral having left a competent Number for that Tribunal, sent the rest to sit in the Royal Provincial Courts. It was he that put an End to the Disputes with the Ecclesiasticks about the Book of Ceremonies, by ordering the Royal Functions to be performed no more in the Cathedral, but in the Royal Churches, or such as were under the King's immediate Protection. Upon the Death of Isabel of Bourbon, Queen of Spain, which happened in the Year 1644. the Admiral ordered the Funeral Solemnities to be performed in the Cathedral, according to antient Custom; and having caused a most magnificent Mausoleum to be erected there, when they were upon the Point of beginning the Function, Cardinal Filamarino, the Archbishop, rose up, and pretended, that a Cushion ought to be given to all the Bishops that were present; but the King's Ministers looking upon that to be a Novelty, by no means would consent: And on the other Hand, the Cardinal being obstinate, the Viceroy ordered the Mausoleum to be taken down, and carried to the Royal Church of S. Clara, which was accordingly done; where it being erected and adorned with Inscriptions and Elegies, for the most part composed by the Jesuits, particularly by P. Giulio Recupito, on the 21st of March 1645. the Obsequies of the deceased Queen were celebrated, and the Funeral Sermon was preached in Spanish by P. Antonio Herrera, a Jesuit: So that from that Time forward the like Functions have always been celebrated in that Church.

THE Duke D'Arcos having accepted of the Government of the Kingdom, contrary to the Expectation of the Spanish Ministers, found the Affairs of it in a very lamentable State; and it was his Misfortune, that so many Causes laid up in Store by his Predecessors, were in his Time to produce those calamitous and dismal Effects, which shall be related in the following Book of this History.

THE
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
NAPLES.

BOOK XXXVII.

THE Misfortunes of our Kingdom, which had been reserved to the Government of D. Rodrigo Ponce de Leon, Duke D'Arcos, shall be the Subject of this Book, and which, with the Loss of the Kingdom of Portugal and Flanders, and the Commotions of Sicily, plainly demonstrate to Princes, that the Government of the World, committed to them by God, as to lawful Governors, is treacherously, and, contrary to his Divine Will, intrusted with Mercenaries, whose ambitious Authority brings not only Slaughter and Calamities upon the People, but Ruin and Destruction upon the State. Our Kings Philip III. and IV. were truly religious Princes, but so incapable of supporting the vast Burden of so great a Monarchy, that having given themselves intirely up to their Ministers and Favourites, they were content with the bare Shadow and Name of Kings, suffering them to expose both Power, Authority, and every Thing else to a publick and most ravenous Sale: out of which Lethargy, neither the Intreaties of their Relations, nor the Groans of the oppressed People, nor the so many Misfortunes, were able to rouse them. This Slothfulness was likewise improved by the most refined Art of the Court and Favourites; for, in order to rivet it, and that no Remorse of Conscience might be able to shake it, they had gained over to their Interest even the Royal Confessors, who pryed into the most secret Recesses of their Souls and Consciences.

OUR

OUR Forefathers had hitherto feen thefe Diforders in many Dominions of that vaſt Monarchy at a Diſtance, but now they were both the Spectacle and Spectators. We have already ſhewn in the preceding Books, that Things having been brought to the utmoſt Extremity, foreboded nothing but Ruin and greater Diforders, and the more inevitable, that inſtead of endeavouring to prevent them, they were the more pushed on. The Wars that were raging in Germany, Catalonia, the Low Countries, and in the State of Milan, which kept Spain always in want of Supplies both of Men and Money, were not enough; but at this Time a new War broke out, which, for preſerving to the King the Garifons of Tuscany, attacked by the French, was in a manner to be ſupported by our Kingdom alone, which gave the laſt Push to the Revolts, which we ſhall briefly relate.

C H A P. I.

Of the Government of D. Rodrigo Ponce de Leon, Duke D'Arcos, and of the Expeditions which he was obliged to make for the Preservation of the Garifons of Tuscany from the Invasions of the French.

THE Duke D'Arcos having made his Entry into Naples on the 11th of February this Year 1646. and ſeen the deplorable State of the Kingdom, the People oppreſſed with ſo many Taxes; and on the other Hand, between the Neceſſity he was under of ſupplying the Wants of the Crown, and the Difficulty of finding Means for doing it, he thought it better to exact the Arrears of the Donatives that had been made to the King, under the Government of the Duke of Medina, than to load the Subjects with new Impoſts. For this End he appointed two Juncto's of Miniſters, the one to prevent Colluſion, by ſeverely puniſhing thoſe that ſhould be found guilty of it, and the other to find out Expedients for the ſaid Exaction, whence he was in hopes to draw immense Sums, without incurring the Hatred of the People, by impoſing new Burdens in the Beginning of his Government.

BUT the new War, which he was obliged to maintain for defending the Garifons of Tuscany againſt the French, forced him to follow the Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors, and, for ſupplying the new Charges, to lay on new Taxes.

CARDINAL Mazarin, who, in the Minority of Lewis XIV. governed France, being highly offended with Pope Innocent, who, notwithstanding the Mediation of the Republick of Venice, was proſecuting the Barbarini judicially; covering his private Revenge for the Pope's having reſuſed to make his Brother a Cardinal at the Nomination of the King of Poland, he gave the Queen Regent and the Royal Council to underſtand, that the Pope had already diſcovered himſelf to be no Friend to the Intereſt of France, and too partial to the Crown of Spain, as was evidently ſeen by the Promotion of Cardinals, who were all Subjects of, or Dependants upon that Crown; wherefore they ought not only to ſuſpend all Intercourſe with him, but likewise to uſe all Means for making him retract that Partiality. For which End it was reſolved to take the Barons under the Protection of France, and to terrify the Pope by fitting out a great Fleet for the Coaſt of Italy, which would touch Innocent to the Quick. In the mean time Mazarin deſired the Duke of Enguien to take the Command of the Fleet that was to be ſent to Italy, for attacking the the Spanish Garisons of Tuscany, but the Prince of Condé, the Duke's Father, would not consent to it, therefore the Cardinal invited Prince Thomas of Savoy to come to Paris, to whom he imparted, that the chief Design of the Expedition was against the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily; but to lessen the Envy of so great a Conquest, he was resolved to offer a great Part of it to the Princes of Italy, and especially to himself, who, for his Skill in the Art of War, and his many other Endowments, deserved to have his Temples girt with a Royal Crown. The Prince believing, or seeming to believe what the Cardinal had said, readily accepted of the Command, and it was resolved to attack Monte Argentaro, and the other Places which the Spaniards possessed in Tuscany; and on the 10th of May this Year, the Fleet, composed of 10 Gallies, 35 Men of War, and 70 Transports, under the Command of the Duke of Bresse, as Admiral, in which were imbarked 6000 choice Foot, and 600 Horse, sailed from the Ports of Provence. Prince Thomas, as Generalissimo, with his Followers, and some Troops, went aboard of the Fleet at Vado. The Fleet having coasted along the Shore of Italy, arrived at Telamone, which surrendered without striking a Stroke, as also the Forts of Saline and S. Stefano, the Governor of the last having a Mind to defend the Place without Troops, was killed in the first Attack; then it was resolved to besiege Orbitello, a strong Place both by Art and Situation. The Care and Defence of these Places concerned the Viceroy of Naples, therefore the Duke D'Arcos having smelt out the Design of the French, had sent thither Carlo della Gatta, a famous Captain, to command there: Then having made ready a Reinforcement of 700 Foot, good store of Ammunition and Provisions, and 3000 Pistoles in ready Money, he put them aboard of five well-armed Gallies and two Men of War, and sent them towards Tuscany, under the Command of the Marquis of Viso and D. Niccolo d'Oria, Son to the Duke of Tursi, who had the good Fortune to land the Men and Provisions at Porto Ercole, and to return safely to Naples. But the Viceroy, having a Mind to try his Fortune again, sent a great many Officers, and 400 Soldiers, aboard of 40 Feluccas and one Brigantine; the French, taking warning from the former Success, came upon them with the Gallies, and, under the Fort of Palo, took 27 of the Feluccas; then Prince Thomas pushing on the Siege, and these slow and weak Reliefs not being sufficient for the Defence of the Place, the Duke D'Arcos was forced to assemble new Troops, and to send a stronger Reinforcement, in order to raise the Siege.

MEAN while appeared the Spanish Fleet, under the Command of General Pimiento, consisting of 31 Gallies, and 25 huge Galeons, besides some Fire-Ships, but so ill mann'd, that the French, being reinforced with ten Gallies, did not fear, though inferior in Number and Quality of Ships, to come to an Engagement; therefore the Spaniards shunned boarding, contenting themselves with cannonading, whereby they disabled two of the Enemies Gallies, and shattered the rest; but the fortunate Shot that gained them the Victory, was a Cannon Bullet that carried off the Head of the Duke of Bresse, the High Admiral of France; for the Fleet having lost their Admiral, and there being no Retiring-Place at hand, they immediately set sail, and bore away for Provence.

THEN the Duke D'Arcos, being resolved to raise the Siege, caused the Infantry to be imbarked, under the Command of the Marquis of Torrecoiso, and sent the Cavalry over Land, under the Command of Colonel Luigi Poderico, who, without asking Liberty, marched thro' the Ecclesiastical State, Castro, and Tuscany (of which these Princes seemingly complained, but every Body was inwardly well pleased with it, and privately marked out the Rout for the Spaniards, being jealous of the too great Power the French were getting in Italy) and joined Torrecoiso; who had no sooner disembarked, and he burnt almost all the Transports which the French had left at Telamone, than he marched directly towards Orbitello, and forced Prince Thomas to raise the Siege. The Prince having lost a great many Men during the Siege, and the most part of the rest being rendered unfit for Service, through Sickness, occasioned by the unwholesome Air of the Marshes, retired to Telamone; and the French Fleet, by the express Orders of Cardinal Mazarin, having returned, he imbarked, and with his own Men landed in Piemont, and sent the rest to Provence. Carlo della Gatta, having marched out to the deserted Trenches, found a rich Booty and 20 Pieces of Cannon; and Pimiento's Fleet, content with the Victory they had obtained, contrary to the Opinion of the Spanish Ministers, immediately set sail for the Ports of Spain.

THE raising of the Siege of Orbitello rejoiced the Princes of Italy the more, that having smelt out the vast Designs of Cardinal Mazarin, they had looked upon the Undertaking with a jealous Eye, but of all the rest the Pope was the most overjoyed, who, though cautiously, supported the Spanish Interest. On the other Hand, it nettled Mazarin to the Quick, who, being upbraided for having deserted the Catalans, and weakened the King's Forces in Flanders, was wholly intent upon feeding his private Resentment in Italy. But having understood, that the Enemy's Fleet had returned to Spain, he called the Council of the Regency in Fountainbleau, where it was resolved to attack Piombino and Portolongone, thinking thereby to kill two Birds with one Stone; for Piombino being garrisoned with Spaniards, at the same time both the City and its small Principality belonged to Lodovico, the Pope's Nephew.

THEN it was seen what Force is able to do, especially when pushed on by Passion; for in an instant the Fleet was refitted, and the Troops being assembled, the Cardinal, suspicious of Prince Thomas's Conduct, gave the Command of them to the Marshals De Meillaray and Plessis Prassin, who making the same Dispatch, immediately put to Sea. The Design was scarcely known in Italy when the Fleet appeared, and having immediately taken Piombino by Storm, where there were only eighty Soldiers in Garison, they landed upon the Island of Elva, and having invested Portolongone, not ill defended, but badly provided, on the 29th of October this Year 1646. it was forced to surrender. This Conquest rejoiced the Cardinal, who put a greater Value upon Portolongone than Orbitello, because it being one of the strongest Fortresses of the Mediterranean, it not only cut off the Communication of Spain with the Dominions of Italy, but was a safe Harbour for the French Fleet, and a Retiring-Place for the Privateers that infested the Enemy's Navigation. This fresh Attack so terrified the Pope, that he sent for Cardinal Grimaldi, who was heartily in the French Interest, and granted him a Pardon for the Barberini, restored them to their Office and Estates, and revoked the Bulls and Censures, upon Condition, that they should repair to Avignon, and from thence, by Letters, pay their bounden Duty to his Holiness. But the Hopes he had thereby conceived of preserving the Principality of Piombino to his Nephew, were baffled by Mazarin, who knowing that Fear would do much with the Pope, let the Expedition go on, excusing himself, that the Marshals being already departed, it was not possible to recall their Commissions.

THE Loss of Portolongone very much grieved the Duke D'Arcos, because he saw the French nestled in a Place, from whence they could easily attack the Kingdom; therefore he thought fit to fortify the Places most exposed, and to make great Preparations, in order to be able to recover the Loss. For which End he made new Fortifications about Gaeta, and made the most wealthy Citizens defray the Charges of them; and he gave out Commissions for raising Twelve thousand Men. Of these 5000 were to be Germans, whom, upon the Promise of great Pay, he brought from Germany. He summoned the Militia of the Kingdom to come to Naples; but they declared, that being appointed to guard their own Country, they did not intend to leave it. But while the Viceroy was preparing to imbark Troops for the Expedition of Portolongone and Piombino, the French Officers, who commanded in these Places, were making ready an Expedition for invading the Ports of the Kingdom, particularly that of Naples, and to burn the Ships that were in them. With this Design the Chevalier Pol, having sailed from the Harbour of Piombino, with a Squadron of five Men of War and two small Fire-Ships, on the first Day of April, this new and most fatal Year 1647. arrived in the Gulph of Naples. He took some Barks in Sight of the City, which put it into a great Consternation; but there being at this Time thirteen Men of War and twelve Gallies in the Harbour, part of these were in all haste fitted out, and in which many of the Neapolitan Nobility having imbarked, they put to Sea, and drove the French off the Coast; but so fatal were our Misfortunes, that what the French did not do, was done either by Chance or Malice; for about eleven a Clock at Night on the 12th of May, the Admiral of the Spanish Ships having taken Fire, was intirely burnt, with 400 Soldiers, and all the Ammunition, and what is more, 300,000 Ducats, that were on Board in ready Money, Money, were lost. This Fire in the Night-time, and in Sight of the City, by the great Noise and Clamour, struck the Inhabitants with Terror and Amazement, and it was looked upon to be an unlucky Omen of the more lamentable Combustion that happened in the Kingdom soon after, of which we are now going to give a short Relation.

C H A P. II.

Of the Insurrections that happened in the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, which had different Success; those of Sicily were quieted, but those of Naples turned to an open Rebellion.

THE unhappy Events of these Revolutions have been described by many Authors; some will have them to be monstrous, and beyond the Course of Nature; others, by insisting too much upon Trifles, perplex the Readers, and give but a confused Notion of the Causes, Designs, Prosecution and End: We therefore, by following the most grave and prudent Writers, shall reduce them to their just and natural State.

OF the two Kingdoms of Italy subject to the Crown of Spain, that of Sicily bore the Spanish Government most patiently, either because the Land having been bathed with French Blood, the Fear of Revenge had created in that People an Aversion to the French Name, or because they were not so much burdened and oppressed, as the Opulency of these our Provinces invited the Spaniards to put in Practice upon the Neapolitans. Besides the French Nation was not so much hated by some of our Barons; for the Dominion of this Kingdom having been often alternately between the Houses of Arragon and Anjou, there were still left some Remains of the old Factions, and consequently wavering Inclinations; whence it came, that the French always kept up a Correspondence with some Barons; and the Spanish Ministers, sometimes winking at them, sometimes punishing them, took care to govern in such a manner, that the Minds of the People being divided, the Nobility impoverished, and Strangers put in Possession of Estates and Dignities, the People might not know their own Strength, nor how to make use of it.

IN these Times, the long Chain of Calamities had much diminished the Credit of the Spanish Government in the Minds of the Subjects of that Monarchy; and the Name of the King, formerly, in Prosperity and Power, in a manner adored, had fallen under a general Contempt, and, on account of the Grievances occasioned by the Wars, little less than abhorred. Besides it was considered, that the Prince D. Baltazar, King Philip IV's Son, by the deceased Queen Isabel of Bourbon, the Daughter of Henry IV. and Sister to Lewis XIII. Kings of France, having died in his Infancy, the Monarchy was like to be left destitute of Heirs, whereby the Subjects lost that Comfort, together with the Respect, with which the expected Succession of the Son to the Father, uses, either to allure the Malcontents, or bridle the Factious; and therefore those of turbulent Spirits run out in frequent Discourses upon that Subject, and the more calmly disposed, with inward Reflections, lamented the unkind Fortune, which would blindly transfer those noble Kingdoms to an uncertain Dominion, by how much the more unknown, so much the more hard.

THE People of both Kingdoms were complaining of the Taxes, not only made heavy by the Necessities of the Governments, but by the Avarice of the Viceroys and Ministers, Ministers, by whom they had been reduced to such a State of Misery and Dearth, that the Fertility of our Soil, nor that of Sicily itself, which is reputed a Kingdom fruitful of Corn, and the Granary of Italy, were not sufficient to prevent these Misfortunes, so that Penury was felt every where. Certainly, it was never more clearly proved to be true, than by these Events, that for establishing Empires God raises up Heroes, but for overthrowing them, he makes use of the most vile and wicked Wretches.

IN Sicily the Commonalty began to complain for want Corn; but their Complaints not being minded, on the contrary, instead of remedying it, by reason of new Duties, the Bread being lessened, they became furious, and then taking themselves to their Arms, the City of Palermo was all in an Uproar and Confusion. The Marquis De los Velez, who governed that Kingdom, at this Time, had not Forces for suppressing them, nor Advice for quieting them; so that giving Time for this Scum of the People to take Heart, they burnt the Custom-House Books, drove away the Collectors, took the Arms out of the Magazines, and even the Cannon from the Ramparts; and the Cry was, Down with the Taxes, and let the People have an equal Share in the Government with the Nobility. The Viceroy granted every Thing, and promised much more; but the Mob, at first content, afterwards being stirred up, run out into greater Excess, and more impertinent Demands; either because the Facility of obtaining, put them upon pretending to more, or that there were not wanting Incendiaries, who gave out, that the gentle Treatment they met with was all Sham, and that the Compassion of a Nation, naturally severe, and by Constitution a rigid Punisher of Crimes against the State, was dangerous. Therefore, if one Day, being carested, they laid down their Arms, the next, all in a Fury, they took them up again with greater Noise, and the Mutiny spread itself over all the Kingdom.

HOWEVER a Head was wanting, by a steady Conduct, to manage the Strength of the Populace, who, though they began with making a great Bustle, soon flagged, contenting themselves with a light Taste of Liberty by some Insolencies. Besides, the Nobility, little beloved by the Commonalty, could not lay Stress upon so great Inconstancy, and though some were resolved to take the Benefit of the Opportunity, it was then too late. Among the very same Commonalty, the more Substantial, being exposed to the Outrages of the Meaner, who out of Caprice plundered and burnt their Houses, were longing for their former Tranquillity. The very Dregs of the People were joined by Criminals and Prisoners for Debt, whom they released by breaking open the Prisons. It was said, that some drew Lots in a Tavern for the Command of the Rebellion, and that it fell to Giuseppe d' Alessi, one of the most abject of them all. He ordered and put many Things of great Consequence in Execution. He turned the Viceroy out of the Palace, and forced him to go on Board a Galley in the Harbour; then a solemn Covenant was drawn up, whereby such Privileges and Immunities were granted to the People, as even in a free Republick would have been too great; but at last, while Alessi was surrounded with his Guards, and carrying it high, having rendered himself odious to his own Accomplices, he was killed by the Mob. Nevertheless, from his Blood the Sedition started up anew; for some believing, that the Spaniards had plotted his Death, others aspiring at the Post, Things were in a very uncertain State, and were much more perplexed afterwards, when the Viceroy, through Grief of Mind, fell ill and died.

THE Marquis De los Velez, left the Government to the Marquis De Monte Allegro, who bore with every Thing, in order to keep up to Spain, at least the Shadow of Command, and to gain Time till the Arrival of Cardinal Trivulzio, whom the King had appointed to be his Successor. The Cardinal being come to Palermo, quieted the Tumults, and kept the Sicilians in Awe; so that D. John of Austria having afterwards gone to Messina with the Fleet, the Kingdom was restored to Peace and Tranquillity.

BUT the Flames of Vesuvius were nothing in Comparison to the Combustion into which the Kingdom of Naples was involved. As has been seen in the preceding Books, the Spaniards had laid their chief Stress upon this Kingdom, because being Fertile and Rich, it furnished them with Men and Money for defending them where-ever they were attacked. The Fecundity and Opulency, would have supplied the Wants, if the Avarice of the Ministers, always craving, had not exhausted every every Thing, and pillaged the very Riches of Nature ; but that Viceroy being best esteemed in Spain, who could raise the most Money, there was no Stone left unturned, in order to obtain the Consent of the Nobility and People, which was necessary for laying on the Taxes. The Customs were sold to him that offered most, the Burden was endless, and the Extortions grievous, for the Buyers being Strangers, and for the most part Genoese, who minding nothing but Gain, without any regard to the Calamity of the miserable People, there was no manner of Hardships but what they cruelly made use of. The Taxes were no sooner laid on, than more were wanted ; for the French having made an Attempt upon Orbittello, and possessed themselves of Portolongone, vast Sums were wanted, both for the Defence of the Kingdom, and supporting the foreign Wars.

THE Viceroy finding himself straitened for Money to raise new Troops, and maintain a Fleet at Sea, resolved to call a Parliament ; and having laid before them the Necessities of the Crown, and especially that the troublesome Neighbourhood of the French, who had got Footing in Tuscany, required the keeping up of an Army, he extorted a Donative of a Million of Ducats from them ; but in order to make it ready Money, he was forced to have recourse to the abhorred Remedy of the Duties ; and having so soon forgot what happened under the Government of the Count of Benavente, by imprudent Advice, it was proposed to lay a Duty upon Fruit, formerly imposed, but afterwards taken off, as grievous in the manner of collecting it, and odious to the Commonalty ; and it lay the heavier upon them, that the Country abounding with Fruit, and under a warm Climate, it was the most of their Food, especially in the Summer-time ; and every other Thing being burdened to that Degree, that no more could be laid on, the Seggi consented to it, and the Viceroy laid hold of the Expedient. But on the third of January this Year 1647. the Edict for collecting it was no sooner published, than the People began to murmur, and rise in Mobs, and always as the Viceroy came abroad, they surrounded his Coach, and bawled out to have it taken off : They were heard to mutter Threats ; many Libels were posted up, wherein they curied the Duty ; and one Night the Office, placed in the Middle of the Market-Place, where it was collected, was burnt.

LEST, from these Insolencies, they should proceed to greater Disorders, the Duke D'Arcos left it to the Seggi to deliberate about taking off the Duty, and finding Expedients for satisfying those who had advanced the Money upon it, by imposing other Duties less grievous ; but no Means could be found, because of the much greater Difficulties that occurred, if new Duties should be laid on : So that all their Meetings were in vain, and the People began to talk more insolently ; nor was there wanting Malcontents, who fomented the Sedition, of which the greatest Instigator was the Priest Giulio Genuino, who had gained over many of his own Rank, of no less turbulent and seditious Spirits than himself. Among the Drags of the People there likewise started up a certain Tommaso Aniello, commonly called Masaniello, of Amalfi, a very mean Fellow, and Servant to a Fisherman, of a low Stature, but lively and bold, who being terribly vexed on account of the ill Treatment of his Wife by the Tax-gatherers, who had found her with a Stocking full of Meal that had not paid the Duty, threatened to be revenged of them, and was watching an Opportunity to raise a Mob in the Market-Place on the Festival-Day of the Carmelites, usually celebrated in the Middle of July. For which End, under pretence of attacking a wooden Castle on the Day of the Feast, he had provided some Boys with Sticks, bought with Money given him by Fr. Savino, a Carmelite Monk, who, either through his own Disloyalty, or the Suggestion of the Malcontents, was the chief Man that prompted and pushed on Masaniello to make himself Head of the designed Tumult.

BUT there was no occasion to wait till the Middle of July, for on the 7th of that Month, a small and unforeseen Accident opened the Way. Some Peasants of the City of Pozzuolo having that Morning brought some Baskets of Figs to the Market, were pressed by the Tax-gatherers to pay the Duty ; and a Dispute arising between them and the Shopkeepers that were to buy the Figs, about who should pay the Duty, Andrea Naclerio, Elect of the People, coming in all haste to be Judge of the Controversy, decided, that those who brought the Figs from the Country ought to pay the Duty ; one of the Peasants, who had no Money, with a great Oath threw a Basket of the Figs upon the Ground, trampling upon them in great Rage. Many run to gather them up, some in Jest, some in Wrath, but all of them pitying the poor Countryman, and hating the Occasion. Upon hearing the Noise, Masaniello and his Boys, armed with Sticks, came, and encouraging the Mob, they all began to pillage the Office where the Duty was paid, and to drive away the Officers with Stones. The Minds of the People being thus exasperated, and their Number increasing, they plundered all the other Offices; and, guided by blind Fury, they run at random to the Viceroy's Palace, with Protestations of Obedience to the King, but with Exclamations against the bad Government.

THE Guards, despising this childish Commotion, did not oppose it, and the Viceroy, intimidated, fomented it, by lavishly granting all Favours. The Licentiousness thereby increasing, and the most Resolute beginning to pillage the Palace, he endeavoured to make his Escape into Castelnuovo; but the Bridge being drawn up, not knowing whither to fly for Fear, he shut himself up in his Coach, and drove towards Castello dell' Uovo; but being discovered by the Mob, he had certainly been murdered if he had not taken Shelter in the Convent of S. Lewis, nor would he have got there, if, in passing through the short Street, he had not diverted the Mob by throwing Pieces of Gold amongst them. From thence he dispersed Edicts, whereby he took off the new Duty upon Fruit; but notwithstanding that, the Mutiny, like an overflowing Torrent, increased; and the most Turbulent suggesting sundry Things to the simple Populace, they cried out, that all the other Duties ought to be taken off, and the Writ of Exemption granted by Charles V. delivered to the People. Those who sought it, neither knew where it was, nor what it contained, because the long Dominion of the Spaniards, and the Forbearance of the Subjects, had rendered the Government absolute, infomuch that that Writ had been quite forgot.

UPON so great a Commotion, Cardinal Filomarini, the Archbishop, running to quiet the Tumult, interposed with the Viceroy, who, finding himself in so difficult a Situation, that Severity and Indulgence were equally dangerous, and to grant all, or refuse all was the same Thing; at last he thought his best Course was to deliver a Writing, whereby he promised to grant them whatever they could pretend to, hoping, that the Hurly-burly being over, and the rascally People dispersed, every Thing would soon be set to rights again. But it happened quite otherwise, for the greatest Part, confounded with chimerical Notions of Liberty, without knowing what they would have been at, still craved more, so that the Disease was the worse for Remedies, and the Pain increased by Lenitives.

BESIDES, the cruel Hatred which the Commonalty for a long time had borne against the Nobility, broke out, infomuch that the Mob running up and down the Streets, killed some Noblemen, burnt the Houses of others, banished a great many, and having a mind to extirpate them all, the City was upon the Point of being all in Flames and Blood. And yet the foolish People fancied that they were still faithful to the King, and were only reforming the bad Government, and revenging the Injuries done them by the haughty Nobility, and wicked Ministers.

MASANIELLO, tattered and half naked, having a Scaffold for a Theatre, and a Sword for his Scepter, with 150,000 Men at his Back, armed in various manners, but all terrible, commanded every Thing with absolute Sway. He, as Head of the Seditious, and Soul of the Insurrection, proposed the Pretensions, imposed Silence, disposed the Motions, and, as if he had the Destiny of them all in his Power, killed with a Nod, and set fire with a Look; for to what Place soever he beckoned, Heads were struck off, and Houses fired. The Viceroy therefore, by the Mediation of the Cardinal Archbishop, was induced to deliver to the People the original Writ of Exemption that had been required, and to agree to a solemn Treaty, whereby those Duties that had been imposed since the granting of the said Writ by Charles V. were taken off; and for the Time to come, it was declared, that no new ones should be imposed: The Commons and Nobility were set on the same Level, with respect to Votes: An Act of Oblivion was promised, and the People were allowed to continue in Arms for three Months, in which time the King's Ratification was expected. All these Articles were ratified by a solemn Oath, in the Church belonging to the Carmelites, whereupon some short Breathing-time was given. Masaniello being excessively honoured by the Viceroy, as his Wife was by the Vicequeen, puffed up with Vanity, began to be disturbed in his Mind, and at last through want of Rest and too much Wine, grown delirious,

delirious, being unsupportable to his own Followers, and cruel to every Body, in the Morning of the 16th of July he was killed in the Convent of the Carmelites by some People hired for that Purpose, and some of his Confidants had the same Fate; and when it was seen, that the Populace were not in the least concerned about his Death; on the contrary, they seemed to be overjoyed at the Sight of his Head upon a Pole, it was thought, that nothing but Peace and Tranquillity would have immediately followed.

BUT by fatal Imprudence, some of the Commonalty being slighted by the Nobility, and the Day following, by ill Advice, the Weight of Bread being lessened, the Mutiny was revived with so great Fury, that having dug Masaniello's Body out of the Ground, and joined the Head to it, it was exposed with lighted Torches in the Church of the Carmelites; nor was the Concourse of the People, and their Curiosity of seeing it, like to have ended, if he had not been buried with most Solemn and Royal Funeral Ceremonies, as a Captain-General; and the great Steeple of the said Church was immediately possessed by the People; and other Posts, fit for commanding the Harbour, and resisting the Batteries of the Castles, were taken.

THE Duke D'Arcos having retired to Castelnuovo, found it disgarnished of every Thing, as all the rest were; for in order to supply the Garisons of Tuscany, the Viceroys had weakened the Bridle of the City and the Forts of the Kingdom. Though Money was wanted, none durst collect the Revenues, and every Body refused to pay the Taxes. The Troops had before been sent to Milan, and some few Foot, that had been called from the Provinces, had been beaten and dispersed on their March by the People. Then the Noise of what had happened in the City being spread over the Kingdom, as the Causes were general, so the Events were the same over all; for the Yoke of Duties being thrown off in every Place, and the People raising Mutinies against the Insolence of the Barons, the Provinces were full of Tumults and Slaughter.

THEREFORE on the 7th of September the Viceroy was forced to swear to another Agreement more shameful than the former; but the People still afraid, and the Duke no ways dissembling, the Calm was but of short Duration. Therefore, from Tumults proceeding to Rebellion, the People demanded the Castles, and the Viceroy refusing to give them, they were attacked. 'Tis certain, that if that enraged Multitude had at that Time had a Body of well-disciplined Troops, and an experienced and faithful Head, they would have taken the Castles, and driven the Spaniards out of the Kingdom. But the People abhorring the Name of foreign Assistance, and with the Prospect of imaginary Liberty, running Headlong into a more miserable Slavery, Francesco Toraldo, Prince of Massa (Carlo della Gatta having excused himself from it) was pitched upon to be Captain-General, who, in concert with the Viceroy, accepted of it. The Prince, under Colour of better securing the Attacks, spinning out the Time, and by voluntary Mistakes, and frivolous Delays, wasting every Thing, at the long run he could not conceal the Deceit from so many Eyes; wherefore being accused of keeping Intelligence with the Spaniards, he was cruelly put to Death upon a Gallows by the incensed Mob.

C H A P. III.

The Arrival of D. John of Austria, the King's natural Son, which the more exasperated the Seditious, who from Tumults proceeded to open Rebellion. The Duke D'Arcos yields the Government of the Kingdom to him, thinking thereby to put an End to the Revolt. The Duke departs, but the Disorders increase.

IN the mean time Advice of the Revolt coming to the Court of Spain, the Departure of the Fleet was hastened, in which D. John of Austria, the King's natural Son, embarked, with the Title of Generalissimo of the Sea, and full Power over the Affairs of the Kingdom; he was a Youth of 18 Years of Age, well made, of a courteous Behaviour, and a ripe Judgment. The Fleet arrived, and on the first Day of October anchored in the Road of S. Lucia. It was composed of 22 Gallies and 40 Ships, considerable for Number and Bigness, but very ill provided of Ammunition, and had only 4000 Soldiers on Board, and yet it was look'd upon by the Spaniards as the Bulwark of the Monarchy; for it was designed as a Bridle upon the two wavering Kingdoms, to relieve Italy, and recover Portolongone and Piombino from the Hands of the French. This Fleet was no sooner arrived, than the Viceroy, contrary to the Opinion of the Collateral Council, persuaded D. John to make use of Force.

THIS young Prince having left Spain with the Impression given him by his Flatterers, of vanquishing by his Presence alone, to his sad Experience saw, that so despicable a Populace durst still keep in Arms, and would capitulate upon even Terms. The Viceroy, on account of the Risques he had run, and the Affronts he had suffered, greedy of Revenge, imagined every Thing would go swimmingly on. Therefore D. John gave the People to understand, that they must deliver up their Arms; and that being denied, as was expected, 3000 Foot were landed, and having possessed themselves of the highest and most convenient Posts, the Castles and the Fleet began incessantly to cannonade the City on all Quarters. Though this, at first, struck Terror into the People, yet they were so far from being disheartened, that, on the contrary, being more provoked, they carried Matters to sad Extremities. The Churches, Houses and Palaces were ruined at random: The Innocent and the Guilty were equally Sufferers; but in so vast a City the Shot did not reach every where, nor, besides the Noise and Indamaging some Houses, did they any considerable Hurt. On the other Hand, the Firebrands of Sedition inflamed the Minds of the People against the Spaniards, branding them with the Character of Breakers of the Publick Faith, and telling them, that King Philip had sent his Son, that with the greater Fury he might wreak his Anger upon them, and that he chose rather to lose Naples, by an odious Example of Cruelty and Revenge, than to preserve it by a moderate and indulgent Government. They had no great Difficulty in confirming the Revolted in their Obstinacy through Despair of Pardon: but the Injury being common, they made it their Business to draw in the more peaceable, and encourage them all to hold out to the last.

T H E R E.

THEREFORE, the Defence being shared out, the Posts fortified, and the Arms and Cannon taken out of the Arsenals, every Body seemed obstinately bent upon defending themselves and their Country. The Spaniards soon found, that so great a City, full of an incensed People in Arms, was not to be reduced by Fear. Besides; their Powder and other Ammunition and Provisions quickly fell short, so that they were forced to slacken their Firing, and anchor the Fleet at a greater Distance, which discovered their Weakness, and made the People more bold. The Mob gave themselves over to all manner of Licentiousness. There was found pasted upon the Gallows where the Prince of Massa had been hanged, a Decree of perpetual Hatred against the Nobility; and in the private Meetings, nothing was heard but desperate Designs, and bitter Invectives against them.

THEY came at last to pull down the King's Colours, and trample upon his Pictures, hitherto, in a manner, adored; and the City of Naples assumed the Title of a Republick. It can't be expressed how much the giddy-headed Mob exulted upon this new Title, though few believed it would continue long to be the Form of their Government. There is not a People more covetous of Liberty than the Neapolitans, nor any less capable of it; changeable in their Customs; inconstant in their Inclinations; wavering in their Thoughts; who hate the present, and, with irregular Passions, are either too much afraid of, or hope for too much from the Future. By the Death of Toraldo, a certain Gennaro Anneſe was made Captain-General, he was a Soldier by Profession, but of mean Birth, cunning however, and as good at devising Tricks and Artifice, as bold in executing Mischief.

IN this State of Affairs, the Friends of the Crown of France did not fail to go about spreading abroad among the People, that in order to maintain that Government, they must have recourse to the Protection of so powerful a King as that of France; and shewing Letters from the Marquis De Fontaine, the French Ambassador at Rome, wherein he promised them all Favour, they were resolved, as the best Way, to apply to Henry of Lorrain, Duke of Guise, who was then at Rome on his own private Affairs, and to invite him to the Government of the new Republick, by declaring him Head of it. The Duke of Guise was a young Prince, of a lovely Aspect; Generous, Gallant, and Affable; besides of high Birth, and who being descended of our antient Kings, boasted of a Right to the Kingdom, and still kept up the Titles and Arms. It was thought, that though he was not very well pleased with the present Government of France, yet he might get Assistance from thence, but could not depend upon the good Will of the Ministers, nor the Interest of that Crown.

THE Duke, charmed with the Prospect of so noble an Office, consented, and, with a few Feluccas sent by the People for that Effect, having boldly overcome the Ambushes of the Spanish Fleet, on the 15th of November he arrived in Naples, where he was received with Acclamations and Rejoycings suitable to his Quality, and the Necessity of the City. The next Morning, accompanied by the principal Heads of the People, he went to take the Oath in the Cathedral Church, where he would have his Truncheon blessed: But having observed the licentious Behaviour of the indiscreet and insolent Scum of the People, who kill'd, robb'd, and burnt, only for satisfying their Avarice and Revenge, and that the regular Troops were not proportionable to the Necessity, he resolved to curb and put a Stop to the Insolencies of the Mob; therefore, under severe Penalties, he forbade Theft, Rapine, and Burning: He raised a Regiment at his own Charges, endeavouring likewise to gain over some of the Nobility to his Interest: He ordered, that the Spaniards should be treated according to the Law of Arms, and to supply the Want of Money, he caused the Mint to be opened, where there was a great deal of Silver and Copper coined, with the Impression of the new Republick, of which he made himself to be elected Duke, whereupon Gennaro Anneſe, being in a manner deprived of all Command, made a sad Complaint. He likewise endeavoured to disappoint the Attempts of the Barons in the Country, who being reduced to Despair, by the Hatred of the People, had joined the Spaniards, and, under the Command of Vincenzo Tuttavilla and Luigi Poderico, had assembled some Troops in Aversa.

AT this Time the French Fleet, consisting of 29 ill-provided Men of War, and five Fire-Ships, appeared in Sight of the City, not to assist the Duke of Guise in his Undertakings, but only to endeavour to draw some Advantage to the Crown of France from the Commotions and Tumults, the commanding Officer having no Orders to assist the Duke; for when the News of these Commotions came to France, and afterwards, that the Duke of Guise had gone to Naples, Cardinal Mazarin disapproved of his Conduct, because of his fickle Temper, not believing him capable of managing so ticklish a Business; therefore the French Fleet, after having viewed the Harbours, and at a Distance exchanged some broad Sides with that of Spain, being but weak, immediately retired. Nor was the Duke desirous of having their Assistance, because, as the Court of France did not approve of his having accepted of the Office he was in, so he was resolved to act by himself, and reap the Fruits of his own Labours, which proved a great Obstacle to his Design, the French Faction itself being divided, for some Heads of the People, by the Persuasion of some French Soldiers, laid a Plot for electing the Duke of Orleans King. Many others inclined to give themselves up to the Pope, as best able to protect them both by Religion and Arms; but though the Prospect of certain Advantage prevailed much with Innocent, yet after mature Deliberation, he considered, that this Kingdom has always been a Prey to the most powerful, and that he being so old, could not expect to see the Design brought to Perfection, and the Church being obliged to make use of foreign Troops, all Acquisitions would at last fall into the Hands of the Assistants. Therefore he chose rather to be a Mediator, for which End he gave full Power to Emilio Altieri, his Nuncio in Naples.

ON the other Hand Don John of Austria, the Duke D'Arcos, and all the Nobility, quite tired with so grievous and long Disorders, yea Annese himself, who could ill bear the Command of the Duke of Guise, were desirous of Peace; therefore an Edict was published, wherein was contained an ample Power, which the King had given the Duke D'Arcos, who offered to satisfy every Body, and for their Security the Pope was to interpose his Authority, for which End he had sent full Power to the Nuncio Altieri. But neither the Edict, nor the Letters, which the Nuncio caused to be delivered to Annese, had any Effect, he declaring that the Power was good, but not the Person to whom it was given, who by not having performed his Promises, had sown the Seeds of Dissention; and concluding, that to confide in the Duke D'Arcos would be to fall into the same Errors. D. John seeing, that all the Provinces of the Kingdom, as well as the Metropolis, being involved into Tumults and Sedition, were going to Ruin, had a Mind to try, if by removing the Duke D'Arcos, who was so odious to the People, the Treaty could be resumed; for which Purpose he renewed the Conference, and it was proposed to remove the Duke from the Government of the Kingdom, and put it into the Hands of D. John, who not being so much hated by the Rebels, as the Viceroy was, it was thought to be an effectual Means for putting an End to the Rebellion; so much the more, that the People had before solicited D. John to have him removed. The Duke D'Arcos seemed very ready to renounce the Government, provided that thereby the Peace of the Kingdom should follow; yea, he himself called the Collateral Council of State, in order to confirm and make Authentical his Renunciation. Some were of Opinion, that it was not in his Power to renounce, the Power of creating and removing the Supreme Governors of the Kingdom being lodged in the King's Person only; others (who were the Majority) were positive, that the Removal of the Duke, and D. John's succeeding him in the Government, were absolutely necessary for the King's Service, and the Good of the Kingdom. This being approved of by D. John, the Duke sent his Wife and Children to Gaeta, and on the 26th of January this Year 1648. left Naples, after having governed some few Days more than two Years.

THUS ended the unhappy Government of the Duke D'Arcos, who, in so lamentable a Revolution of Affairs, could leave us no other Memory of himself, but some Statutes, which, to the Number of fourteen, are still in Force with us, whereby, in order to supply the extreme Necessities, the best way he could, he endeavoured to prevent the Frauds that were committed in the Collection of the Taxes and Customs, and he renewed the Penalties against such as exported Salt-Petre and Gunpowder, and made other Provisions, which are set down in the so often-mentioned Chronology.

S E C T. I.

D. John of Austria takes the Government of the Kingdom.

DON John of Austria having taken the Government of the Kingdom upon him, applied himself to find out the most proper Means for extinguishing so great a Combustion, which was now raging, more than ever, not only in the Metropolis, but in all the Provinces; and for that End he published an Edict, whereby he exhorted the People to return to their Duty, and besides the Concession of many Favours, he promised them a general Indemnity; but this Edict being published at a Time when the Disorders were more increased, produced contrary Effects; for some Copies of the Edict having been affixed in the Quarters which were kept by the People, they were immediately torn, and a great Reward was offered to whoever should discover the Persons that had been so bold as to affix them in those Places. Yea, the more to shew their Obstinacy, Judges and other Officers were elected for filling up the Tribunals of S. Chiara, the Royal Chamber, the High-Court of the Vicariate, and that of the Admiralty, in order to administer Justice to every Body. In the mean time there were very bloody Skirmishes between the Spanish Soldiers and those of the People, which filled the City with Terror and Confusion.

IN this deplorable State of Affairs, the Duke of Guise, having a Mind to take all the Command to himself, struck great Terror into the Populace, and occasioned much Discord amongst their Heads, which proved the Cause of the Kingdom's being afterwards confirmed under the Dominion of the Catholick King; for Gennaro Anneſe, who had Possession of the great Tower Del Carmine, could not bear, that the Duke should be superior to him in Command, and the Duke would not suffer so mean a Fellow as he to be his Rival in Authority; and therefore continuing in Jealousy and Diffidence, they laid Snares for one another's Life; so that Affairs being unsettled both in the City and Country, the War was carried on with various Success. To this was added the Confusion among those of the French Faction, some of which, fomented by the Marquis of Fontaine, the French Ambassador at Rome, pretended to form a Faction distinct from that of the Duke of Guise. But these were few, and not very powerful; for the People having nipped in the Bud the Designs which France was carrying on with some Barons, these, in order to save themselves from the Fury of the Commonalty, had been forced to join with the Spaniards, and, contrary to their Inclinations, to conspire to the Establishment of that abhorred Government.

DON John, apprized of these Divisions, and the War going but heavily on, resolved to make Advantage of them, and by the Means of Cardinal Filomarini, the Archbishop, again to propose a Treaty of Peace: The Cardinal, knowing that it was to no Purpose to treat with the Duke of Guise, applied himself to the contrary Faction, in which he found a better Disposition, insomuch that he prevailed upon Anneſe to employ himself in good Earnest to forward the Peace, which he, as well as the rest, so eagerly desired, in order to be free from the Danger of his Life, for which the Duke of Guise had laid Snares.

IN the mean time the Court of Spain having received Advice, that the Collateral Council had confirmed the Duke D'Arcos's Renunciation of the Government of the Kingdom, and given the Administration to D. John, the Fact was disapproved; and it was very ill taken, that Subjects should arrogate to themselves the Power of removing one Viceroy, and appointing another. And out of Jealousy of State it was likewise highly resented, that, in such dangerous Conjunctions, D. John should have been pitched upon, insomuch that the Count D'Oniate, who was then the King's Ambassador in Rome, was immediately ordered to go to Naples, and take the Government of the Kingdom upon him, with the Title of Viceroy, who having received the Royal Dispatches, in all haste left Rome, and came to Gaeta, and from thence to Baja, from whence he sent his Secretary with Letters to D. John, acquainting him of his Arrival

Arrival and Commission, who, on the first Day of March this Year, yielded the Government to the Count; and during the short Time of his Government left us three Statutes, which are to be found in the abovementioned Chronology: They contain nothing but the Favours, Privileges, and the Indemnity granted to the People, as the King's Plenipotentiary.

C H A P. IV.

Of D. Inigo Valez y Tassis, Count D'Oniate, in whose Government an End was put to the Sedition, and the Kingdom brought again under the Dominion of King Philip.

PON the Count D'Oniate's Arrival in Naples, after having viewed the Posts of the City, and all the Trenches that fronted the Populace, he not only prepared for a Defence, but by all Means possible endeavoured to be Master of the Quarters possessed by the Duke of Guise; and to encourage the Troops, he distributed among them 180,000 Ducats, which he had brought with him from Rome. At the same time approving of D. John's Conduct, he did not neglect to carry on the Treaty of Indemnity, and the Agreement formerly begun with Annese; by which Means the Duke of Guise's Faction daily dwindled away. The Citizens were now weary of so great Confusion and Misery, and every Body longed for Peace and Quiet; for all Commerce being interrupted, and Civil Society disturbed, nothing was secure from the unbridled Rapacity of profligate Wretches, and the Boldness of the Rascality, who being used to gain their Bread by Labour, were now pleased with living idly by Rapine, and under the Cloke of Liberty, all manner of Licentiousness being practised, the greatest Part began to nauseate their own very Passions.

THEREFORE the Feast of Easter drawing near, when Men, by reconciling themselves with God, receive in their Hearts pious Desires of Justice and Peace, many Religious were secretly employed to instil and cultivate these Sentiments into the Minds of the Commonalty. The Viceroy likewise procured from some of the Heads of the Rebels, a Copy of the Terms they required, but being so extravagant, that they raised the Privileges of the People above the Authority of the King, he endeavoured to moderate them, by pardoning the Guilty, and taking off the Taxes; and, for their greater Security, he promised, that within three Days, by a publick Instrument, he would confirm and fulfil what he had offered, to their liking. In this Juncture of Affairs, before the Time was expired, the Duke of Guise having gone to the Point of Posilipo, in order to reduce the small Island of Nisita to his Obedience; D. John and the Count, laying hold of the Opportunity, all of a sudden, with armed Force, sallied out of the Castles, and entering the City, some Quarters, where they had a private Correspondence, gladly received them, crying out with joyful Voices, God save the King, and the neighbouring Quarters answering with the like Acclamations, and imploring Peace and Clemency, in an instant the Sedition vanished away, and the City was possessed. This Multitude of People was reduced to Obedience by 3000 Men only, and all went on smoothly without Noise or Blood. Annese being pardoned, delivered the Keys of the great Tower to Carlo della Gatta, who immediately took Possession of it with two Companies of Spaniards. Prayers of Thanksgiving were offered to God in the Cathedral. Thus in a Moment was extinguished that Combustion, which threatened the Destruction of the Kingdom; and what was still more surprizing, was the sudden Change of the Minds of the People, which, from Slaughter, Rancour, and Hatred, turned immediately to Compassion and tender Embraces, without Distinction of Friend or Foe; excepting some few; who being led by an ill Conscience, made their Escape, all the rest returning to their Employments, and cursing the past Confusions, gladly embraced the present Quiet. The Reduction of Naples happened on the 6th of April this Year 1648. being Holy Monday.

THE Duke of Guise, who, as we have said, was that Day at Posilipo; upon the News of the Revolution, was struck to the very Heart; whereupon seeking to save himself by Flight, he went towards Abruzzo, in order to join the French, but being pursued by the Troops, he was made Prisoner, and carried to Gaeta. It was long debated in Naples how to dispose of him; at last it was resolved to send him under a strong Guard to Spain, as was done, where he remained a long time Prisoner, till the Prince of Condé having declared for the Spanish Faction, and hoping to strengthen himself by the Addition of Guise, begged his Pardon of the King, who courteously granted it him; but the Duke thinking himself more obliged to be faithful to his own Prince, than to perform the Promises made to his Enemies, upon his Return to France would give Ear to nothing else.

THE Example of Naples had a great Influence upon the other Parts of the Kingdom; and though in some wavering Provinces, there were still some Commotions, and particularly in Abruzzo, whither some French had come from Rome to assist the Rebels, yet by the Help of the Barons, and the Authority of the Viceroy, they were easily dissipated: So that the Minds of the Commonalty, which, after so furious a Storm, had continued fluctuating, being intirely at Ease; on the 22d of September this Year D. John left Naples, and with the Fleet sailed for Messina, to confirm the Sicilians in the former Obedience and Submission to the King.

THE Rebellion being over, the Head removed; and D. John, who, by Nature, was rather inclined to be rigorous than clement, being gone, many were afraid of the Count D'Oniate. Nevertheless he made every Body easy by a general Pardon, immediately applied himself to set the Kingdom to rights again; and seeing, that the taking off all the Duties and Taxes occasioned great Confusion, not only in the Exchequer, but amongst the Citizens themselves, it was demanded of the Seggi; and particularly that of the People, to lay on a Tax of Forty-two Carlini upon each Family of the Corporations of the Kingdom, and the Half of the Duties that had been taken off, excepting that upon Fruit, Herbs, and Roots, which was never to be imposed again. And in order to provide not only for the Deficiency of the Royal Revenues, but likewise for the Interest of those who had bought them, it was ordained, that of the Product of all the said Duties, 300,000 Ducats should be paid in yearly to the Military Chest, and the Remainder applied to the Use of the Buyers, who were to manage and divide it amongst themselves. And as for the Royal Revenues, part of them was also assigned to the Buyers, and the Remainder put in the Military Chest. In this manner, and by the Imposition of Jus prohibendi upon Tobacco, both the King and Subjects were taken Care for, and Commerce began to be considerably restored every where.

AS it frequently happens, that though a Storm be over, yet the Surges of the Sea are not immediately laid, the Count took care to use the utmost Severity; for having established a Juncto of Counsellors for keeping a strict Eye upon all suspected Persons, he punished to the utmost Rigour such as had been guilty of the late Tumults, and shewing himself more ready to punish, than pardon upon Repentance, he spared none of the Ringleaders, for sometimes charging them with Crimes, sometimes inventing Pretences, some publickly, and others privately were put to Death, and many were forced to fly the Kingdom: This got him the Character of Severe and Cruel, and was one of the Reasons of his not being able to prolong his Government so much as he thought his Merit required.

C H A P. V.

The Count D'Oniate recovers the Garisons of Tuscany from the French, and puts a Stop to the Incursions of the Banditi. His Departure, Monuments, and the Laws he left us.

THE Count D'Oniate's Resolution to attempt the Recovery of the Garisons of Tuscany at this Time, when the Kingdom was so much exhausted and brought low, by the late Troubles, was not only surprizing, but gained him vast Applause. But on the other Hand this most prudent Minister considered, that the Kingdom would never be in Peace and Quiet, if the French were not driven out of those neighbouring Places; as well because of the Interruption they gave to the Communication and Traffick with the other States of the Monarchy in the Mediterranean, as because they were a Retreat to the Rebels of the Kingdom. The Count, therefore, resolved to exert himself to the utmost of his Power in this Expedition, being likewise encouraged by the News of the Prince of Condé's having at this Time raised some Commotion in France. He set about assembling the Troops, and fitting out a Fleet answerable to the Design; and, to give the greater Life to the Expedition, he went upon it himself, so that by his Example almost all the Nobility strove who should be foremost in serving the King at this Juncture. Before he departed, he left D. Beltran de Guevara, his Brother, his Lieutenant, who, for the Space of four Months that the Count was absent, governed the Kingdom with much Prudence, and above all he made it his Business to relieve the Corporations of the Kingdom, by ordaining, that the yearly Interest of whatever Sums they owed should be reduced to five per Cent. He repaired the Hall of the High-Court of the Vicariate, and made sundry good Regulations, which we read in the two Statutes he left us. On the 3d Day of May 1650. the Fleet sailed towards Gaeta, where it was joined by D. John of Austria, with other Ships and Troops, which he had brought with him from Sicily. The Fleet being reviewed here, it was found to consist of 33 large Ships, and 13 Gallies, besides seven of the Duke of Turfi's Squadron that had gone to Finale, to take on Board the Troops which the Governor of Milan sent to this Expedition.

ON the 26th of the same Month, the Fleet being got in Sight of Elva, it was resolved to recover Piombino before they should attack Portolongone; the Charge of which being given to the Count of Conversano, who, with the Title of General of the Horse, with 300 Foot, 80 Horse, and six Tartanes, all at his own Charges, had joined in this Expedition; he, with 1500 Foot, 400 Horse, and seven Cannon, besides the Troops of Niccolo Lodovisio, to whom the Principality belonged, went to invest the Place, and after many Hours of a furious Attack, the French were forced to abandon the City, and retire into the Citadel. Upon Advice of this, the Viceroy in all haste went with fresh Men to give Life to the Undertaking; so that the French, seeing the Besiegers drawn up in order to make an Attack, having no hopes of Relief, immediately surrendered upon honourable Conditions. After the Viceroy had put a Garison in Piombino, and restored Prince Lodovisio to the Possession of that State, he returned to the Fleet.

BUT though his Army had landed on the Island of Elva without Opposition, yet, as they were marching up the Hill where Portolongone is situate, they found the French had laid an Ambush for attacking them on their March, which was no sooner perceived, than D. Dionysio Guzman, Colonel General of the Kingdom, mounted his Horse, and with a Detachment of Musquetiers obliged them to retire under the Cannon of the Town. The Army having got up without Opposition, and being drawn up in the Plain, the Attack was begun. The Outworks being taken, and our Men having made a Lodgment in the Ditch, the French began to capitulate; upon the same Conditions granted to the Garison of Piommino; and to be allowed to march out with two Pieces of Cannon, provided that within 15 Days they were not relieved, which was agreed to. Therefore, no Relief having come, on the 15th of August, Novillac, the Governor, marched out with 700 Men, which were all that remained of 1500 that had been left in Garison, and being arrived at the Sea-side, they embarked in some Ships that had been hired for transporting them. Our Men having entered the Place, returned Thanks to God for the good Success of the Undertaking, which, though it cost a great deal of Blood, and vast Expences, yet might have been prolonged much more, and if the French had held out to the last, the Issue would have been uncertain.

French

DON John of Austria returned to Sicily, and the Viceroy, after having given the necessary Orders for repairing the Place, and putting it in a State of Defence, returned to Naples, where he resumed the Government, and with the utmost Rigour, and cruel Deaths, he rid himself of the Disaffected, and extirpated the Banditi, who were now more than ever infesting the two Provinces of Abruzzo.

BUT while the Count, with indefatigable Application, was wholly intent upon settling the Government, beautifying the City, and repairing the Losses it had suffered by the late Troubles, on the 10th of November this Year 1653. the Count of Castrillo, who, by the Court, had been appointed his Successor, unexpectedly arrived, which very much disturbed him; but he concealed his inward Discontent so well, that he never dropt a Word of Resentment, till after he had quitted the Government, and retired to the Convent of S. Martin, belonging to the Carthusians. Some imputed this Removal to his Rigour; others to the ill Offices done him by D. John of Austria, who, it was said, bore him a secret Grudge: It was likewise rumoured, that it was owing to the Suggestion and Instances of the Pope, who took it ill, that the Count had repulsed the Pretensions of Cardinal Filomarino, the Archbishop, and of the other Ecclesiasticks, who, delighting to fish in troubled Waters, had been insolent, and by Monitories and Interdictions had trampled upon the King's Prerogatives.

WHENEVER he had any breathing Time, he did not fail to beautify the City, re-establish the Tribunals, and resettle the University. He repaired the Fabrick of the Custom-House, almost quite ruined during the Troubles; he enlarged and gave a new Form to the Court-Yard, and rebuilt the Fountain in the Middle of it. In fine, he repaired all the Publick Buildings that had suffered any Damage during the late Commotions.

HE restored the Tribunals to their former Authority and Decorum; and he established very near fifty good and prudent Statutes, whereby he regulated the Tribunals, and the Fees of the Clerks and other inferior Officers thereof: He ordered all the Records that had been preserved from the Flames at the Burning of the Archives of the Chancery, during the late Troubles, and that were in the Hands of private Persons, to be delivered to the Secretary of the Kingdom: He imposed a severe Penalty upon Notaries, who neglected to register Contracts in their Protocols: He made many Regulations for preventing Smuggling; and he left other salutary Provisions, which are to be found in the often mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. VI.

The Government of D. Garcia d'Avellana y Haro, Count of Castrillo, in which the Duke of Guise, with a new Fleet makes a fresh Attempt upon Naples, and enters the Gulph, but with bad Success.

THE Court of Spain; in order to mitigate the Rigour of the Count D'Oniate, thought fit to send the Count of Castrillo to be his Successor in the Government of the Kingdom, who was of a more mild and indulgent Temper, and who having first applied himself to the Study of the Law in the University of Salamanca, and for many Years been employed in the Offices of the long Robe, had afterwards been advanced to those of the Sword. He arrived at Naples on the 10th of November this Year 1653. and to give a Proof in the Beginning of his Government how much he had the restoring of Plenty at Heart, he caused two Ounces to be added to the Weight of Bread. But very grievous and anxious Cares disturbed his Mind in these very Beginnings; for those who had fled from the Count D'Oniate's Rigour, having taken Shelter in France, did not fail to magnify at that Court their Correspondence in the Kingdom, the Discontent of the People in seeing themselves again fallen under the Spanish Yoke, and what an easy Matter it would be to conquer it. To these Motives were added the Insinuations of the Duke of Guise, who, as we have said, having obtained his Liberty, instead of performing his Promises of favouring the Malcontents of France, that he might not betray his natural Prince, had gone to that Court, and got himself restored to Favour; and still dazzled with the Splendor of the Crown of Naples, which he hoped to be able to obtain, he could not be at rest: So that being supported by the Sollicitations of those wretched Refugees, he was the more pushed on, magnifying the vast Number of Harbours that were in the Kingdom of Naples, capable of receiving the greatest Fleet; the Number of Friends he had in all the Provinces; the Affection which the lower Sort of People had for his Person; whence he flattered himself with the Hopes of a new Insurrection, if he once had the good Fortune to appear there, not disarmed, as formerly, but with Force able to support the Resolutions of the Malcontents, kept under through the Fear of Punishment; insomuch that he prevailed upon the Court of France to assist him, and Orders were dispatched for fitting out the Fleet, and the Command of it was given to himself.

UPON Advice of this intended new Expedition from France, the Count of Castrillo was forced to put the Kingdom in a Posture of Defence, and besides having ordered a new Draught to be made out of the Militia of the Bataglione, both of Horse and Foot, and out of the Company of the Men at Arms of the Kingdom, he caused new Troops to be raised, and having sent for all the reformed Officers, he formed them into two Companies, one of 300 Italians, and made his Son D. Gaspar de Haro, Captain of it, the other of Spaniards, and gave the Command of it to the Marquis of Cortes, his Son-in-Law. The Cities of Sessa and Teano were appointed to be the Places of Arms, where all the Militia of Bataglione, and the Men at Arms were ordered to rendezvous; and D. Carlo della Gatta, the Colonel-General, having reviewed them, Two thousand of them were sent to reinforce the Garisons of Tuscany, Tuscany, and all the Provinces of the Kingdom, most exposed to the Insults of the Enemy, were provided with Troops.

THIS provident Care being taken, the Month of October ended, and no French Fleet appearing, it was thought the Report of this Expedition had been industriously spread, in order to prevent the sending of Succours out of the Kingdom to Catalonia and Flanders, where the War was raging between the two Crowns more than ever. But it proved otherwise, for the Duke of Guise being obliged to spend more time than he expected in fitting out the Fleet, it could not be got ready to sail from Toulon till the Beginning of October. This Fleet consisted of seven large Men of War, fifteen Transports, six Gallies, and as many Tartanes, on board of which were embarked 7000 Soldiers, and 150 Horse, besides a great Number of Arms and other Accoutrements, designed for arming those, whom the Duke expected would join him, for which Purpose he had 200 Gentlemen on board with him to be their Officers. The Fleet being tossed by Storms, did not appear in our Seas till the 12th of November.

THE Viceroy, upon Advice sent him by the Governor of Gaeta, immediately fitted out sixteen Gallies that were in the Harbour: He distributed the Troops along the Coast, and in the Cities and Towns of the Gulph of Naples: He reinforced the Garisons of the City of Pozzuolo, and the Castle of Baja; and D. Diego Quirola, General of the Artillery, was sent with a Detachment of Foot and Horse, with some Cannon, to guard the Shore of Bagnuoli.

THE Enemy's Fleet, after having sailed along the Coast of Sorrento and Vico Equense, came to an anchor off Castell' a Mare. That City, after a short Resistance, surrendered upon Terms, into which the Duke of Guise, with fifty Knights of Jerusalem, entered, and went to the Cathedral, where, with solemn Ceremony, having returned Thanks to God, he set about fortifying the Place with new Trenches, well lined with Soldiers. To all those that were unwilling to stay in the City, he gave ample Passports, in which he intitled himself Viceroy, and Captain-General of the King of France in the Kingdom of Naples. The Loss of Castell' a Mare very much vexed the Neapolitans; and though both the Nobility and Commonalty offered to sacrifice their Lives and Fortunes to the King's Service, there were not wanting Malcontents, who did what they could to frighten the People out of their Duty; insomuch that the Viceroy was obliged to imprison some who had been Ring-leaders in the late Troubles, amongst which there were two Priests and a Monk, who were practising upon the People in Favour of the French.

IN order to prevent the Duke of Guise from enlarging his Conquest, the Viceroy granted an Indemnity to the Banditi, and took Possession of the Hill behind Castell' a Mare. Then he sent Orders to Carlo della Gatta, to the Prince of Avelino, and the other Officers that were in Sessa, first to provide the Places of Terra di Lavoro, and then to march with the Gross of the Army to the Neighbourhood of Castell' a Mare; and he sent six Gallies to Finale to take on board the Troops that were coming from the Milanese. In the mean time Relief hastening from all Quarters, although the Duke of Guise sallied out, with a Design to take Possession of the neighbouring Places, he found a stout Resistance every where, and in several Skirmishes having lost a good Number of Men, he was obliged to retire. But upon the Arrival of General Della Gatta, with an Army of 12,000 Men, consisting of Noblemen, Barons, and reformed Officers and Soldiers, and being afterwards reinforced by some Regiments, the ill-grounded Hopes vanished in an Instant; so that the French Generals resolved to abandon Castell' a Mare, and endeavour, the best Way they could, to embark their Troops, and return to Toulon. They considered, that to extend their Conquest by Land was an Undertaking, not only difficult, but desperate, all the Country round about being full of the Enemy's Troops; to remain in that unsafe Harbour all Winter, was exposing the Fleet to certain Shipwreck. The only Shift left them, was to put to Sea, where there being no Spanish Fleet, they had nothing to fear; nor was the boisterous Winter Season, already begun, proper for attacking any other Sea-Port. The Inclination of the People for the Duke of Guise's Person, which had been the chief Foundation of the Expedition, was now quite vanished, and the Duke too late perceiving the Inconstancy of the Nation, and not a little surprized at so great a Change, he was much more so, when he understood, that there had been a Writ affixed in Castell' a Mare, wherein was promised a Reward of 30,000 Ducats to whoever should cut off his Head.

THEREFORE a Council of War being held, it was resolved by all the French Officers to abandon the Place, and to return with the Fleet to Toulon, and not to suffer it to perish in that Harbour; whereupon the necessary Orders were given for departing. Upon the News of this the Soldiers began to pillage the Houses of the Inhabitants, nor did they spare the Churches, which were robbed of all their Furniture and sacred Vessels; and after having made a rich Booty, on the Evening of the 26th of November, they embarked; but being detained 15 Days by contrary and boisterous Winds, on the 10th of December, the Sea being something calmer, they set sail for Toulon; at the same time that a Squadron of 23 English Men of War appeared in our Gulph, which, at the Instance of King Philip, had been sent to oppose the French; so that there being no Occasion for their Assistance, after having anchored two Days off our Harbour, they set sail and steered towards the West.

THUS ended the Fear, which the Duke of Guise's Expedition had occasioned in the Kingdom; but the Viceroy's Cares, and the Necessity of making Provision for a new War, did not end here. The French never left off, by new Intrigues, disturbing the Peace of Italy: At this Time they had persuaded Francis Duke of Modena, a Prince of a warlike Genius, to raise Troops, in order to renew the War in the Milanese; whereupon the Marquis of Caracena, Governor of Milan, in order to bring that Prince to Reason, had entered his Dominions with Force of Arms. On the 7th of January this Year 1655. Pope Innocent X. had died, nevertheless the College of Cardinals being in the Conclave for the Election of a Successor, had not neglected to send Emilio Altieri, to interpose between the Parties; and afterwards, on the 7th of April, Fabio Ghigi being elected Pope, who took the Name of Alexander VII. he very earnestly employed his good Offices for preserving the Peace of Italy. But neither the Interpositions of the Pope, nor of the Venetians, availing any Thing, the Duke of Modena, being declared the King of France's General, marched and sat down before Pavia. Therefore, upon Advice of these Motions, Succours being demanded of the Viceroy, in the Month of May he sent seven Gallies with 1500 Foot to Finale; and soon after he fitted out a Squadron of Men of War and Gallies, in which he embarked and sent thither 4000 Men, under the Command of the Marquis of Bajona. And, these not being sufficient, in the Month of August he was obliged to send five Gallies, and 40 Tartanes, with other 2000 Foot, and 1500 Horse, under the Command of the Marquis of Cortes, his own Son-in-Law. The Viceroy had the Pleasure afterwards to see that all these Charges and Pains had been well bestowed; for the Governor of Milan's Army being so strongly reinforced, and Pavia gallantly defended against the French by Count Galeazzo Trotti, the Duke of Modena was forced to raise the Siege.

C H A P. VII.

A cruel Pestilence miserably afflicts the City and Kingdom: It ceases, and a new Viceroy is sent.

AFTER so many and so lamentable Events, after so many Miseries and Misfortunes, that no Mischief might be wanting, this Year 1656. the Kingdom was miserably afflicted with a cruel and deadly Pestilence. The so many Disorders and Revolts, the so many Afflictions, occasioned by cruel Wars, or by the Fear of them, which is worse, the Incurfions of the Banditi, the Invasions of the Turks, Dearth and Earthquakes were not sufficient; but for its utter Ruin, the Kingdom must undergo this pestiferous Scourge, so unmerciful, that we don't read of its having, in so short a Time, made such Havock and Destruction in any Country: That which raged in the Time of Lautrech's War, lasted almost two Years, and it was computed, that it did not carry off above 60,000 Persons; this, in less than six Months, dispeopled the Provinces of the Kingdom, and reduced the Metropolis to a Burying-place, by destroying about 400,000 of its Citizens. The Island of Sardinia had, for a long Time, been visited with a Pestilence, and therefore, not only the Count of Castrillo, but the other Viceroy's his Predecessors, had published severe Proclamations, forbidding all Commerce with it, but a Vessel full of Soldiers coming from that Island into our Harbour, whether thro' the Neglect of those that guarded the Harbour, or that in Place of Bills of Health of Sardinia, those of Genoa had been produced, or, that the Soldiers might not be detained on board, it had been done by the Viceroy's special Order, Prattick was given. It was not long before one of the said Soldiers fell sick, and being carried to the Hospital of the Annunciation, he died within three Days, his Body appearing full of small livid Spots; shortly after one of the Servants of the Hospitals, being seized with a Vertigo, died within 24 Hours, and soon after his Mother likewise died. The neighbouring Houses being infected, in a short time the Contagion spread itself in the lower Quarters of the City, particularly in Lavinaro, Mercato, Porta della Calce, and Armeri.

IN these Beginnings the Physicians ascribed such pernicious Effects to other Causes, some to malignant Fevers, some to Apoplexies, and some to other Distempers; they were not all of the same Opinion, one by a more nice Observation, looked upon the Disease to be pestilential; but it coming to the Viceroy's Ears, that this Physician gave out that it was contagious, he was clapt up in a Dungeon, where having fallen sick, as a great Favour he was allowed to go and die in his own House, of which the other Physicians being apprized, they went on to conceal the Nature of the Distemper. But it still increasing, and spreading itself in the Neighbourhood of the aforesaid Places, Cardinal Filomario, the Archbishop, thought it was his Duty to acquaint the Viceroy, that in an Affair of such Importance, more Circumspection was requisite. The Count of Castrillo was highly offended, that it should be rumour'd Abroad, that there was a Pestilence in Naples, for being obliged to send a Reinforcement of Soldiers for the War of the Milanese, still carried on by the French; these Rumours would put a Stop to it; so that he did what he could to smother the Report: Nevertheless, not being able to resist the continual Warnings sent him, and the Disease still increasing, he was forced to convene the most famous Physicians in these Times, that they might give him their Opinions of it. They, either out of Ignorance, or Fear, or to soothe the Viceroy, durst not declare the Distemper to be pestilential; but only advising, that Fires should be kindled in all the Quarters of the City, and that it should be prohibited to sell Salt-Fish, they slit their Necks out of the Collar. But it required other Things than Trifles to put a Stop to so impetuous a Torrent: The Distemper raged more violently, nor did the Advice of Physicians, nor the Virtue of Medicines seem to have any Effect: Hundreds died of it daily, and nothing else was seen in the Streets, but the Sacrament carrying to the Sick, and the Dead to the Grave. The Citizens struck with Terror, some by humble Supplications, some in confused Processions of Men and Women, and Virgins with their Hair dishevelled, others with the most worshipped Images carrying before them, and others in different manners were begging for Pity and Compassion of God and the Saints, and a Relief from so great Misery and Desolation. But they did not consider, that by thronging together in such Crowds, the Distemper had the greater Force, and that Thousands of them were seized with it at once.

THE Disease afterwards spreading its deadly Poison more furiously, it was noised Abroad, that Orsola Benincasa, a Nun, who had acquired the Reputation of a most holy Life, not having as yet found a commodious Habitation for her Sister Nuns, before she died had prophesied, that when the Calamity was at its greatest Height, if a Hermitage were built for them on the Declivity of S. Martin's Hill, the Pestilence would cease. The Draught was drawn, and the Viceroy was the first who, with his own Hands, carried thither twelve Baskets full of Earth: The Example of the Head moving others, the Magistrates of the City, and all the Citizens run thither in Crowds, and not only furnished Money, but wrought with their own Hands. It was surprizing to see Men and Women, Young and Old, the Nobility, Citizens, and Plebeians, strip themselves of their best Effects, and offer them in Charity for building that Edifice, which was to be the Deliverer of their City. There were placed in the publick Streets, not Coffers, but empty Hogheads, which, in an Instant were filled with Money of Copper, Silver, and even of Gold: The very Ladies, laying aside their natural Vanity, took the Rings off their Fingers, the Pendants from their Ears, the Bracelets and Necklaces from their Arms and Necks, and, as if they had been intoxicated, offered them to the rising Fabrick; and what was yet more amazing, Persons of Quality strove who should be foremost in performing the meanest Offices, some carrying a Basket full of Nails, some Lime and Stones, others, in assisting the Carpenters, loading themselves with Beams, were in Danger of sinking under the Weight of the Burden. But Effects are always proportionable to their Causes; while they were hard at Work, the Disease increased, and spread itself much more: The Concourse of so many People from all Quarters, sweating and striving who should work most, occasioned that the Malady, which at first was confined to a few Streets, spread itself over all the City. Thus, while the Building was near finished, the City was in a manner desolate.

TO this dismal Calamity new Confusions and Disorders were added. There were not wanting some Malcontents, the wretched Remains of the late Troubles, who, in order to raise new Seditions, went about insinuating to the People, that this Scourge did not proceed from the just Judgment of God, as a Punishment for their Sins, but from the revengeful Spaniards, in order to exterminate the Populace, and be revenged of them for the late Revolts: That it was plain from the Viceroy's Conduct, who had immediately given Prattick to the Soldiers to come from the infected Island of Sardinia; from his having afterwards endeavoured to conceal the Distemper, that proper Remedies might not be applied in the Beginning: They confirmed it by bidding them take notice, that neither the Forts, where the Spaniards were in Garison, nor the upper Quarters of the City, where they lived, were infected, but only the Wards of Lavinaro, Conciaria, Mercato, and the other lowest Palces, for the most part inhabited by the meanest Sort of People; and after having gained over many to their Opinion, they had the Impudence to give out, that there were People that went through the City sowing poisoned Dust, and that they ought to be traced and put to Death. So having joined in several Bands, they went about in quest of those imaginary Poisoners, and having met two Soldiers belonging to the great Tower of Carminè (in order to begin a Quarrel that might end in a Tumult) they fell upon them, pretending that they had found some of the poisoned Dust upon them. A great Crowd of People having gathered upon the Noise, by good

good Luck a Man of Integrity passing by, who, with soft Words, and moderate Advice, persuaded them to deliver up such wicked Wretches to the Civil Magistrates, to the End that, besides their being punished, the Antidote to the Poison might be got out of them, and by that means the Lives of many might be saved; but it was no sooner known, that one of the Soldiers was a Frenchman, and the other a Portuguese; and it being likewise rumoured, that 50 Persons in Disguise were going about spreading the poisoned Dust, than there arose a much greater Disturbance: for all those, who wore Clothes, Shoes, Hats, or any other Thing of a different Fashion from what the Citizens used to wear, were in Danger of their Lives. Therefore, in order to pacify the Mob, the Viceroy was obliged to cause Vittorio Angelucca to be broken on the Wheel, who, besides his being guilty of other Crimes, was still looked upon by the Vulgar to be a Disperfer of the Dust. But at the same Time the Contrivers of that fabulous Story were exemplarily punished: Many of them being clapt up into Dungeons, five of them were ignominiously hanged in the Market-Place, which put an End to the Rumour.

MEAN while the Magistrates of the City, seeing that the Malady not only dispeopled the Metropolis, but that it likewise spread itself in the Provinces, made pressing Instances to the Viceroy for applying the strongest and most effectual Remedies; and after the Collateral Council had had frequent Meetings, the Viceroy resolved to order the Seggi to appoint a particular Deputation, to which he gave all the necessary Authority, and likewise appointed D. Emanuel d'Aguilar, Regent of the Vicariate, to be their Head. The Deputation recommended to the most noted Physicians of these Times, not only to inspect the Sick, but the Bodies of the Dead by making a nice Dissection; so that being met, and the famous M. Aurelio Severino, so renowned in the World for his Works of Philosophy and Physick, and who died afterwards of the same Pestilence, presiding, it was concluded, that the Distemper was contagious, and that all Care imaginable was to be taken of the Sick, whose Infection was inevitable Death.

THEREFORE the Viceroy and the Deputation spared no Pains in applying the best Remedies they could for putting a Stop to the Distemper: It was ordered, that Guards should be kept in all the Cities and Towns of the Kingdom, and no Person to be admitted into them without the necessary Bills of Health: That in each Ward of the City of Naples, a Deputy should be chosen, to whom an Account of all the Sick of the Ward was to be given: That the Infected should be carried to the Lazaretto of S. Januarius without the Walls: That those, who had Conveniency of being taken Care of in their Houses, should be shut up in them: That no Physician, Surgeon, or Barber should leave the City, but attend the Sick, according to the Distribution that should be made by the Deputation: That Dogs and other unclean Animals should be killed; and other salutary Precautions were taken for putting a Stop to so great a Torrent. But all these Remedies proved fruitless; the Distemper raging still more violently, all the Hospitals were filled in an Instant, and new ones built, but these as little sufficient, the People perished in the Doors and upon the Stairs of the Houses, and in the open Streets. Coffins and Burying-places were likewise wanting, for not only all the Quarters of the City being infected, but all the Houses, it made a horrible and lamentable Slaughter; insomuch that it was said, that 8 or 10,000 died a Day, not only the Physicians, Surgeons, and all those who were appointed to take care of the Body, died, but likewise the Priests and other Religious, appointed to take Care of the Soul. There were none to bury the Dead, so that their Carcasses lay on the Streets, in the Doors, and on the Stairs: Confessions were made publicly, and the Sacrament was carried to the Sick without any Attendance, and it was given them from the Point of a Stick: Some, being seized with a Vertigo, fell down dead in the Streets. The Dead for the most part lay unburied in the Houses, or upon the Stairs of the Churches; but the Number of those was much greater, who lay unburied in the publick Streets; and those, who by great Favour, and vast Expences, were buried within the Churches, had not so much as a Priest to accompany them to the Grave: And instead of a Coffin the Corpse was carried upon a Table, or at most upon a Bier.

IN so great a Confusion there was no Room left for taking any more Precautions, except that, in order to prevent the Air from being more infected by the Stench of the dead Carcasses, it was resolved that the Dead should be buried; the Care of which was incumbent upon the Deputies and the Magistrates of the City, who caused about 150 Carts to be brought from the neighbouring Villages; and the Viceroy employed in that Work about a hundred Turkish Slaves belonging to the Gallies. It was a very dreadful and horrible Thing, to see the dead Bodies seized with an iron Hook, dragged through the Streets, and thrown upon the Carts, and frequently some not quite dead, but thought to be so, were served after the same manner. The Caves of Monte di Lautrech were filled, where afterwards a Church was built, and called S. Maria del Pianto: The Church-yard of S. Januarius without the Walls: Many Caves of Hills, out of which Stones for building had been hewn: The Plain of Pines without the Gate of S. Januarius: That other Plain before the Church of S. Dominico Soriano without the Royal Gate; and these not being sufficient, the Slaughter still increasing, particularly in the Month of July, in which there were some Days, that the Number of the Dead amounted to 15,000, there was a Necessity of burning the dead Carcasses, and some were thrown into the Sea.

NOT only the Metropolis, but the Provinces of the Kingdom underwent the same cruel Slaughter. Excepting the Provinces of Otranto and the Further Calabria, all the rest were left desolate. Of the Cities and Towns, 'tis said, that only Gaeta, Sorrento, Paolo, Belvedere, and some other Places were kept free of the Infection.

BUT after the Kingdom had been reduced to this unhappy State, about the Middle of August, a violent and plentiful Rain in some measure abated the Distemper, and the deadly Poison began to cease; none were any more seized with it, and those, who had been infected, were cured; insomuch that about the End of September, there were no more than 500 Sick in the City of Naples. Therefore the Deputation began again to use Precautions, and Orders were given for purifying the Goods of the Houses where the Contagion had been, and other Methods were taken to prevent the Sickness from breaking out again. Other two Months elapsed, and no unhappy Accident was heard of; whereupon some Physicians, who had escaped the common Slaughter, having met, on the 8th of December they made a solemn Declaration, that the City was intirely free from Infection.

THE Sickness was likewise still abating in the Provinces, but because it was like to be some Months before they could get quite clear of it, it was thought fit to keep up the Pallisados and Guards at the Gates of the City, in order to keep out those who came from suspected Places. For which End the Viceroy subscribed a rigorous Edict, whereby he ordered, under the severest Punishment, that no Stranger should be admitted into the City without his express Licence, after having been visited, and the Opinion of the Deputation obtained. At the Desire of the Viceroy, the Archbishopial Court of Naples subjected to the Ecclesiastical Censures, all those who had concealed infected Goods, if they did not discover them within a certain Time, and get them purified. But the Archbishop, taking Advantage of these Confusions, did not neglect to screw himself into other Peoples Matters, and pretend to a Share in these Precautions; for he took upon him to put forth another Edict like to that of the Viceroy, as if the first had not been binding upon the Ecclesiasticks, whereby he commanded that no Ecclesiastick should dare to enter Naples without his written Licence. The Viceroy, in order to suppress so pernicious an Incroachment, immediately published a rigorous Order, whereby he ordained, that no other Licences should be regarded, but those of the King's Ministers, to whom it solely belonged to preserve the Kingdom. Whereupon the Nuncio having interposed, an End was soon put to the Dispute, by ordering, that all the Ecclesiasticks that came into the City should observe the Viceroy's Edict, and be subject to the Inspection of the Deputation, and then, if they thought fit, they might go and present themselves before their own Tribunals. This Method was observed till the Month of November of the following Year 1658. when the Cities of Rome and Genoa being declared free from the Contagion, Commerce was every where opened, and the Baricados and Guards were taken off from the Gates.

THE Viceroy went on to set the disordered Affairs of the City and Kingdom to rights: To furnish the City with Provisions, and check the Avarice of the remaining Tradesmen and Husbandmen, who, being but few, and enriched with the Effects of the Dead, were either unwilling to return to their Employments, or imposed upon the People in the Price of their Work: Settling again the Prices and Wages, as they were before the Contagion. Then he applied himself to relieve the Corporations of the Kingdom, ordering, that such as had suffered by the Pestilence should not be molested for the fiscal Payments which they owed for all the Month of April 1657. and from the first Day of May the same Year, they had paid a fourth Part less than they were taxed in the antient Valuation of the Kingdom. Then publick and solemn Thanks were returned to God and the Saints: The Images of the Tutular Saints of the City were painted upon the Gates of it by the famous Pencil of the Cavalier Calabrese, and Statues were erected to B. Gaetano Tiene; and that Pyramid, with the Statue of that Saint, and the Inscription which we now see in the Market-Place of S. Lorenzo, was erected at this Time.

THOUGH the Kingdom, by Degrees, was recovering its former State, yet the Viceroy was again involved into new Troubles by the Banditi, particularly in Principato, where, being protected by some Barons, they began to multiply; therefore he resolved both to punish the Protectors, and dislodge the Protected from these Places; and that his calamitous and unhappy Government might receive some Comfort, Heaven had reserved for the last Months of it, that the Queen, on the 28th of November 1657. should be brought to Bed of a Son, who got the Name of Prospero Philippo, and was Heir to the Monarchy. The News of it came to Naples in January 1658. whereupon the Viceroy, in order to cheer up the People, and make them forget their late Calamities, caused most sumptuous and magnificent Feasts to be celebrated. And afterwards, on the 18th of July the same Year, Leopold being elected Emperor, the Feasts and Tournaments were repeated. But the Feasts were scarce over, when he had Advice, that the Count De Peniaranda, having dispatched his Affairs at the Dyet of Frankfort, where, as the King's Ambassador-Extraordinary, he had been present at Leopold's Coronation, had been appointed his Successor. Peniaranda, therefore, arriving in Naples on the 29th of December, on the 11th of January 1659. the Count was obliged to quit the Government to him. He left us many prudent and useful Laws, amongst which was the publishing of the Favour granted by the King to the Baronage and Kingdom, by extending the Succession of Feodal Estates to all in the fourth Degree, with Power to appoint the Heir, with all the Privileges belonging to the Right of Seniority, and to substitute Trustees; and he made other Regulations, which are set down in the often-mentioned Chronology; and though his unhappy Government did not allow him to leave us any Monument of his Magnificence, yet it was he, who by throwing down a great many Houses, made the Royal Palace stand by itself, as if it were an Island, and he caused all the Pictures of the Captain-Generals of the Kingdom to be hung up in the Hall of the Palace.

IT seems, that with the coming of the Count De Peniaranda, our Kingdom began to recover itself from the past Misfortunes, and being no more afflicted with such Calamities, to put on its former Countenance; therefore its Adversities having ended here, we shall likewise conclude this Book, putting such distinct Bounds betwixt this and the following, that the succeeding Events may not be defiled by the preceding Disasters, and lamentable Adventures.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXVIII.

APPY were the Beginnings of the Government of the Count De Peniaranda, not only by the Tranquillity reitored in our Kingdom, but by the Felicity of the Peace, which being for a long Time carried on betwixt the two Crowns, came now to be concluded by the Treaty of the Pyrenees by the two Favourites, Cardinal Mazarin for France, and D. Lewis de Haro for Spain. The Conclusion was facilitated by King Philip IV. having a second Son born to him, by whose Birth the Succession of the Monarchy seemed to be at a greater Distance in the Person of the Infanta D. Maria Teresa, of Austria, King Philip's Daughter of his first Marriage. These two Favourites were very ambitious to have it believed, that they were the Authors of the Peace so much longed for by the People, as they had been before reputed the Instruments of the so many Calamities of the War; and therefore they rejected all Mediation whatsoever, particularly that of Pope Alexander VII. who had made himself unacceptable to both the Crowns. Therefore the principal Conditions being concerted, which consisted in the Marriage of the Infanta to Lewis XIV. and in France's retaining a Part of the Conquests, and quitting the rest, these two Prime Ministers agreed to meet at the Pyrenees for stipulating and signing the Treaty. For which End Mazarin set out from Paris, and by the Way received from Madrid the Approbation of what had been concerted; but being come to the Borders, he found, that the Spaniards, even in the low Condition they were reduced to, would by all means maintain their Precedency; for though

D. Lewis de Haro ought to have yielded to the Dignity of Cardinal, yet he pretended, as being upon the Level with Mazarin as Prime Minister, to dispute the Precedency with him, and he managed Matters so dextrously, that he got the better of him; for an Expedient was found out, to build in the Island of Pheasants, which is made by the small River of Bidassoa that divides the two Kingdoms, a wooden House, into which each of the Ministers entering by a Bridge from his own Side of the River, they both met in a common Hall. In this Hall they had many Conferences, and after having had long Debates about including Portugal in this Peace, and restoring the Prince of Condé to his Estates and Employments in the Kingdom of France; at last Portugal was excluded, and the Prince restored to his own: On the 7th of November this Year 1659. the Peace was signed by the two Ministers, and solemnized with mutual Embraces, and the Acclamations of those that were present, the News of which was received with unspeakable Joy in all the Dominions of the two Crowns.

THE Articles of this Peace were many, and the first contained in few Words the usual Conditions of reciprocal Restitution of Goods, Honours, Dignities, and Offices to all the Subjects of both Parties, as well Ecclesiasticks as Seculars, who had espoused the opposite Interest, including expressly the Neapolitans, Catalans, and the Prince of Monaco; and others were likewise agreed to about restoring Commerce between the two Nations. The most material Article was the Marriage agreed upon between D. Maria Teresa and King Lewis, with 500,000 Ducats of Portion, whereby the Infanta, in Consideration of the Peace, and that these two Crowns, upon whatsoever Event, might not be united under one Head, in the most solemn Form, renounced her Right of Succession in the Monarchy of Spain. It was agreed, that of the Conquests, all the Province of Artois, except S. Omers and Aire, with their Dependencies, should remain in the Possession of France. In Flanders that Crown was to keep Possession of Graveling, Bourbourg, S. Venant, and the Forts annexed to them, and all that belonged to these Places, as also in Hainault, of Landrecy and Quenoy, in Luxemburg, of Tbionville, Dampvillers, Tvoix, and other Places of less Moment. France was also left in Possession of Perpignan, with the County of Roussilon, and of Conflans: And Commissaries were appointed by both Parties for regulating the Borders on this Side of the Pyrenean Mountains.

FRANCE gave La Bassée and Winoxberg in exchange for Marinbourg and Philipville; and besides, Spain gave up Ypres, Oudenard, Dixmud, Furnes, and the Towns upon the Lys, and some Castles in the County of Burgundy: Valenza and Mortara in Italy; Roses and Cadague in Spain, though situate on the other Side of the Pyrenees. Spain likewise yielded up Linclamp, as also Cbatelet and Rocroix, possessed by the Prince of Condé; and renounced its Pretensions upon Alsace and its Dependencies, formerly yielded to the French by the Emperor by the Treaty of Osnaburg.

AS for the Duke of Lorrain, if he had a mind to be included in the Peace, he was to be restored to the Possession of his Dominions, upon demolishing Nancy, and leaving France in the Possession of Mojenwick, the Dutchy of Bar, Clermont, Stenay, Dun, and Jametz, with a free Passage for the Troops to march into Alsace.

SPAIN restored Vercelli to the Duke of Savoy, to the Prince of Monaco his Possessions, and the Treaty of Cbierasco was confirmed. The Duke of Modena was comprehended, and the Spaniards evacuated Corregio; and there being several Pretensions on account of Portions, Assignments, and Interest betwixt the said Dukes and Spain, these were referred to an amicable Composition, as also the Differences that might happen with the Grisons about the Valteline.

THE two Kings took upon them to persuade the Pope to account with the House of Este for the Vallies of Comacchio, and to appoint a proper Time for the Duke of Parma's recovering of Castro.

IN fine, all the most solemn and binding Clauses, that could be contrived, were inserted, for confirming a perpetual Peace, and preventing Quarrels for the future. This being settled, the Ministers departed, and the Court of France, which was at Toulouse, continued in Languedoc and Provence all the Winter, not only till the Ratification came from Spain, but till the Bride, with her Father, came to the Borders.

IN order to comfort the People, this Peace was solemnly published every where; and in the Beginning of the new Year 1660. Advice of it came to Naples, King Philip, by his Letters dated the 10th of February, having ordered it to be proclaimed there, which, with great Solemnity, was accordingly done before the Royal Palace on the 6th of April. The King likewise, by a particular Order, commanded a Pardon to be published for all those who had espoused the French Interest, which was afterwards put in Execution by the Viceroy on the 11th of January the following Year 1661. and the Prince of Monaco, and the Duke of Collepietra were restored to the Possession of their Estates. Solemn and magnificent Feasts were likewise celebrated, both on account of the Peace, and of the Marriage of the Infanta to King Lewis, which was solemnized on the 29th of June this Year 1661. which Feasts were afterwards repeated for the Peace concluded between the Princes of the North. The Kingdom of Portugal alone was excluded in these Treaties of Peace, so that the Spaniards bent their Thoughts upon reuniting it to the Crown, and prepared a formidable Army for subduing the Portuguese.

C H A P. I.

The Count of Peniaranda sends Succours from the Kingdom to the Expedition of Portugal : Suppresses the Insolencies of the Banditi ; and makes Feasts for the Birth of Prince Carlos, and the Marriage of the Emperor Leopold with Margaret of Austria, the King's Daughter : Then, a Successor being appointed, he leaves the Kingdom.

THE War of Portugal being carried on by the Spaniards but with bad Success, obliged the Count of Peniaranda to send new Succours from the Kingdom ; therefore in the Month of May this Year 1660. he ordered to be embarked in 12 Vessels 1000 Germans, under the Command of the Prince of Montesarchio, and 800 Neapolitans, commanded by Colonel D. Emanuel Caraffa. There sailed likewise from our Harbour seven Gallies of Naples and Sicily to Finale, to take on board the Troops that were sent from the Milanese, in order to carry them to Spain ; and the Year following 1661. other 400 Soldiers were sent in three Sicilian Gallies, and the like Number of the Squadron of Naples. In 1662. 800 Foot, commanded by Colonel D. Camillo di Dura, were sent in eight Gallies of the aforesaid two Squadrons ; and in 1663. 1800 Neapolitans, commanded by Colonel Paolo Galtiero, were sent thither in four Vessels of the Squadron of the Prince of Montesarchio.

THE arrogant and insolent Banditi likewise made the Count's Government something uneasy ; for at this Time by their pillaging and robbing, the Country was deserted, the Cities and Villages were in continual Fear, and their Communication and Traffick were interrupted : Their Boldness arrived at that Height, as to rob the King's Messengers of their Dispatches, and to seize Persons of the greatest Quality, not sparing even the King's Ministers ; and whoever fell into their Hands, after being abused and tossed to-and-fro, were forced to buy their Liberty with vast Sums of Money : In fine, their Insolence was such, that they made Inroads to the very Gates of Naples.

IN order to put a Stop to so great Disorders, the Viceroy having sent Governors of Resolution and Courage to the two Abbruzzi, the two Principati, and to the the other Provinces, many of those Rascality were taken, others killed in the Field, some were hanged, some condemned to the Gallies for Life, and a great many obtained their Pardon, upon Condition of going to serve the King in the Wars of Portugal. But all this Rigour was not sufficient to extirpate them, by reason of the Protection which some powerful Barons gave them, so that the Viceroy was obliged to put forth rigorous Edicts against their Harbourers and Protectors.

THE so many Duels that happened at this Time amongst the Nobility, and the stealing of the Furniture and sacred Vessels out of some Churches, did not a little disturb the Viceroy; therefore, by rigorous Edicts, he renewed the Laws made by D. Pedro de Toledo and the Count of Monterey against Duellists, and declared, that those, who refused to fight Duels should not be branded with Cowardice: Those that were guilty of Sacrilege were put to cruel Deaths.

BUT these troublesome Cares were much alleviated, by Maria-Anna of Austria, King Philip's second Wife's having, on the 6th of November this Year 1661. brought forth Prince Carlos; and this Birth was so much the more desirable, that Prince Prospero was now dead, and the King uneasy lest he himself should die without leaving Male-Issue. The News of this Birth arrived at Naples on the 6th Day of December following, whereupon magnificent Feasts were celebrated, and great Illuminations were made, answerable to so happy an Event, and were continued in the Beginning of the new Year 1662. On the 25th of April the Year following 1663. the Marriage of the Infanta Margarita, the King's Daughter, with the Emperor Leopold, being celebrated, the Viceroy ordered new Feasts and Illuminations.

WHILE the Count of Peniaranda was thinking to pass the Remainder of his Government in Quiet, Advice was brought him, that his Successor had been appointed. This was the Cardinal of Arragon, who was then the King's Ambassador in Rome, and D. Pedro of Arragon, his Brother, being sent thither in his Room, he was appointed for the Government of Naples, and Peniaranda was ordered to go to Madrid to be President of the Council of Italy. The coming of the Cardinal was published in Naples on the 10th of August this Year 1664. and five Gallies were dispatched to Nettuno, to bring him from thence, and on the 27th of the same Month he arrived at Mergellina. The Count set out on the 9th of September, leaving a noble Character behind him, not only on account of his Piety and Affability, but especially his Integrity, Clearness from Peculation, and the great Aversion he had to all filthy Avarice, insomuch that 'tis said, which seldom or never happens, that when he left the Government of Naples, he was in Debt.

HE left us 14 wise and prudent Statutes, whereby he took care of the publick Provision: He was most severe against Duellists, and the Wearers of prohibited Arms, especially Swords with cut Scabbards: He prohibited all the Ministers of State to take upon them to be Guardians, Tutors, or Proxies of the Barons and Feudatories of the Kingdom; and he made other Regulations, which are set down in the often-mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. II.

The Government of D. Paschal, Cardinal of Arragon.

THE too great Indulgence and Affability of the Count of Peniaranda had occasioned a Remisness of Discipline, and not a little prejudiced the Decorum of the Courts of Justice: Crimes were frequent, and especially that of Murder, occasioned by the carrying of short Fire-Arms, and the Custom, in these Times introduced, of some Laicks wearing Clerical Habits, short and wide, called Half Cassocks, which afforded them means of concealing these Arms, and carrying them with Impunity through the City. Therefore the Cardinal, in the Beginning of his Government, published rigorous Edicts against such, and condignly punished the Offenders: A Proclamation was issued, ordering all Vagabonds to depart the City within three Days. Upon his Arrival he caused an Adulteress with her Gallant to be hanged, for having killed the innocent Husband: Many Thieves and Murderers were hanged, and many more condemned to the Gallies.

BUT these rigorous Proceedings and Severities of the Cardinal were not sufficient to bridle so depraved a City. Some withdrew themselves from the deserved Punishment by flight, others by the Privileges of the Ecclesiastical Court, and many by the Immunity of the Churches, which being still enlarging by the Clergy, is still the Occasion of continual Wranglings betwixt the Temporal and Spiritual Courts; wherefore there was a Necessity of sending the Counsellor Antonio di Gaeta to Rome, for obtaining some Redress in the Abuses of this pretended Immunity; but the Message proving fruitless, the old Disorders continued.

NOTWITHSTANDING these Severities, the Banditi were no less insolent than ever, who being protected by the powerful Barons, infested the publick Roads, robbing and carrying off many Prisoners, who were obliged to pay vast Sums for their Liberty, and sometimes, after having abused them, they barbarously murdered them. The Duellists likewise gave some Disturbance, notwithstanding the severe Prohibitions, and the rigorous Punishments inflicted upon them. But a new Fraud, invented by the Merchants in the Time of this Government, was of great Prejudice to Traffick and the publick Faith. These, by fraudulent Bankruptcies, after having received great Sums from such as gave them Credit, robbed with Impunity; and such Bankruptcies were so frequent, that almost all Dealers practised them. In order to root out so pernicious an Abuse, the Cardinal published an Edict, whereby the Merchants, who were found guilty of fraudulent Bankruptcies were to suffer Death, and they were deemed as acknowledging the Crime, if within four Days they did not appear; and the Concealers of their Effects, and such as pretended to be their Creditors, though they were not, were liable to the same Punishment: He likewise prohibited the Judges to give them Certificates, not only though the greatest Part, but even all their Creditors should consent.

WHILE the Cardinal was wholly intent upon setting these Disorders to rights, and restoring the Looseness of Manners, in October 1665. the sad News of King Philip IV's Death came to Naples, and that he had left the Guardianship of Prince Carlos, then but four Years of Age, and the Regency of the Monarchy to the Queen-Mother; but she being a Woman little skilled in the Affairs of Government, the King in his Will appointed a Junta, which was to be composed, among the rest, of the Archbishop of Toledo, the Inquisitor-General, the President of Castile, and the Chancellor of Arragon, ordering, that in case any of these four should happen to die, his Place to be filled up by the Successor in his Office. It happened, that the same very Day King Philip died, Cardinal Sandoval likewise breathed his last; it being the Queen Regent's Business to appoint his Successor, she named the Cardinal of Arragon, our Viceroy, to the Archbishoprick of Toledo; wherefore, in December the same Year, Advice of his Promotion to that See coming to Naples, after having first caused King Charles II. to be proclaimed in Naples, and pompous Obsequies to be celebrated to King Philip, he made ready to set out for the Court of Spain, whither he had been called, not only to govern his Church, but to a Share of the Government of the Monarchy in the Junta, in the Room of Cardinal Sandoval, Archbishop of Toledo, his Predecessor. On the other Hand, D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon, his Brother, who was then his Catholick Majesty's Ambassador in Rome, was appointed Viceroy of Naples.

DON Pedro delayed his coming to Naples on account of the hard Winter, which likewise stopt his Brother from setting out for Spain, till the Month of April this Year 1666. And in the mean time Pope Alexander VII. having dispatched the Bulls, and the Cardinal having a mind to be consecrated Archbishop in Naples, the Consecration was committed to the Archbishop of Otranto, who, with the Bishops of Pozzuolo, Monopoli, and Aversa, with the usual Ceremonies, consecrated him on the 28th of February in the little Church of S. Vitale, commonly called S. Maria delle Grazie, in the Diocese of Pozzuolo, and subject to that Bishop, situate without the Grotto which leads to Pozzuolo. There flocked thither, both on account of the Personage and the Rarity of the Function, seldom seen in Naples, an infinite Crowd of People, and a great Number of the Nobility and Magistrates; so that D. Benedetto Sanchez de Herrera, Bishop of Pozzuolo, in order to transmit the Memory of this Solemnity to Posterity, caused an Inscription to be ingraved upon a Marble Stone, which is fixed in this Church.

AT last, on the 3d of April, D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon arrived in Naples, and was received with great Pomp by the Cardinal his Brother, who on the 8th of the same Month resigned the Government into the Hands of the Collateral Council, and on the 11th embarked for Spain, accompanied by the Magistrates of the City, who begged of him, that seeing he was to have a Share in the Government of the Monarchy, he would be pleased to take the City of Naples under his Protection, and he very courteously assured them, that he would. The Cardinal departed after having governed the Kingdom nineteen Months: During so short a Time he could leave us no other Memorial of himself, but only five Statutes, whereby, besides having severely punished Merchants guilty of fraudulent Bankruptcies, he enjoined, that in order to keep the City clean, and to prevent the Damage they did, all the Swine, belonging to whatsoever Person, that went about the Streets of the City, should be driven out of it, as a very great Nuisance; and he made other Regulations to be seen in the abovementioned Chronology.

C H A P. III.

The Death of King Philip IV. his Will, and the Laws he left us.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Peace made with France, K. Philip IV. was still in Perplexity, and oppressed with melancholy Thoughts, and troublesome Apprehensions. He could not then conceal the Discontent, which a Peace so disadvantageous to Spain gave him, and what struck him to the very Heart was, that by the Marriage, he had been obliged to deliver into the Hands of his inveterate Enemies the dearest Pledge of his House, presaging (what has happened since in our Times) the Dangers and future Mischiefs; insomuch, that pensive, and little less than weeping, he was wont to exclaim, that France would insult over the Calamity of Spain. The unfortunate Expeditions of Portugal kept him afterwards in continual Trouble; for the Portuguese, in the Height of their Danger, having given the utmost Proof of their Valour, had often beat the Castilians, and having given the Sister of King Alphonfus, who had succeeded to his Father King John, in Marriage to the King of England, with a vast Portion, and the City of Tangier, they were preparing to make a more vigorous and obstinate Defence. Overcharged with so troublesome and anxious Thoughts, in the Beginning of September 1665. he fell ill, and on the 17th of the same Month died of a Burning-Fever, leaving, by his Queen, Maria-Anna of Austria, Prince Carlos, an Infant of four Years of Age. In his last Moments he called for the Prince, and with a broken Voice wished him Prosperity, and a more happy Reign than his had been.

PHILIP having been born on the 8th of April 1605. by the Death of his Father, which happened on the last Day of March 1621. became Heir of the most powerful Monarchy of Europe, but being of an Age subject to Temptations, he gave himself over to sensual Pleasures, and suffered both the Authority and Government to be snatched from him by the Art of his Favourite. Therefore he saw, by the violent Government of his Ministers, the Provinces and Kingdoms in Rebellion, besides the severe Blows received from the Arms of the Enemies; and when moved by Misfortunes, and the Groans of his Subjects, he removed the hated Author of the Mischiefs, he had not that Vigour of Mind, and that Experience, which the Weight of Affairs required; so that he fell again under the Guardianship of another more cautious, but no less absolute Minister; and Death had no sooner freed him of this last, than he died under the Weight of the Afflictions, wherewith, in a manner, he had been always oppressed. In the Midst of his Misfortunes he preserved a wonderful Constancy of Mind, he loved Justice, and was singular for his Piety.

HIS Will being read, it was found that he had appointed D. Carlos Heir, and in case of his Death without Issue, Margaret, his second Daughter, betrothed to the Emperor Leopold, and her Children were to succeed; and if she should happen to die without Issue, the Succession was to devolve to the Emperor. In the last Place the Duke of Savoy was named in the Succession, always excluding his eldest Daughter, the Queen of France, unless, being a Widow, and without Children, she should return to her paternal Kingdoms, and, with the Consent of the States, she should marry some Prince of the House.

THE Prince being left Successor, and the Queen considered as a Stranger, young, and not skilled in Government, leaving to her the Guardianship and the Education of the Prince, with the Regency, he appointed a separate Council, by the Spaniards called Junta, consisting of the Archbishop of Toledo, the Inquisitor-General, the President of Castile, the Chancellor of Arragon, the Count of Peniaranda, and the Marquis of Aytona. The first four were named, without regard to the Quality of the Persons, but of their Offices; and therefore, as we have said, the same Day that the King died, Cardinal Sandoval having likewise died, the Queen appointed the Cardinal of Arragon in his Room; and seeing he was Inquisitor-General, that Place was filled up by Father Everardo Nitardo, a Jesuit, born in Germany, who, like an Arbiter, had not only the Direction of the Queen's Will, but of her Conscience, as her Confessor, who, after having for many Years been one of this Junta, was raised to the Dignity of Cardinal.

ON the 13th of October, by Letters from the Marquis De Fuentes, his Majesty's Ambassador in France, Advice came to Naples of the King's Death, but the Viceroy thought fit to conceal it, till he should receive his Dispatches from Spain. First, with publick Solemnity and a Cavalcade, he caused the new King to be proclaimed, and having on purpose caused some new Money to be coined, from his Name called Carlini, as he rode through the Streets, he scattered it amongst the People.

AFTER the Proclamation, the doleful Sound of the Bells began, and the City was full of Grief and Tears, lamenting the Death of the late King. The Viceroy's Court, the Nobility, the Magistrates, the Officers, the Lawyers, in a Word, excepting the meaner Sort of People, there was none but put on Mourning. The Viceroy received Visits of Condolance from the Nobility and Gentry, from the Magistrates, the military Officers, the Ministers of foreign Princes, the Superiors of Religious Orders, and even Cardinal Acquaviva, who being then in Naples, paid him the same Compliment, and all the Time he staid wore Purple. Only our Cardinal Archbishop would not join in the common Grief, and, as if the Plague had been in the Palace, under pretence of Indisposition, shunned going thither. He was so great a Stickler for certain Ceremonials, that whatever might be the Result of so much ill Manners and want of Respect, he would not depart one Hair's breadth from them: He said that he was not obliged, nor did it become him, as a Pastor, to put himself and his Court into Mourning.

THE Viceroy, therefore, in order to shun new Disputes about Ceremonials, after having for nine Days celebrated the Obsequies in the Chapel of the Royal Palace, and in many other Churches, resolved to have the Funeral Solemnities performed, not in the Cathedral, but in the Royal Church of S. Clara, where a magnificent Mausoleum was erected; and the Contrivance of the Work was committed to D. Marcello Marciano, who besides took upon him to compose the Epitaphs and Inscriptions, and the famous Luca Giordano, was intrusted to take care of the Painting. All Things being put in order, on the 18th of February 1666. the Obsequies were celebrated with great Pomp and Magnificence; and, that the Memory of them might be preserved among us, the Counsellor Marciano published a particular Treatise, intitled, Pompe funebri dell' Universo, wherein he describes them minutely.

KING Philip, in his long Reign, beginning the 6th of April 1621. and ending the 4th of August 1664. established more than 50 Statutes for our Kingdom, which he directed to his Viceroys; by these he gave us many wholesome Regulations, which, without making a long and tedious Catalogue of them here, may be seen in the Volumes of our Statutes, and, according to the Order of Time in which they were made, are set down in the so often-mentioned Chronology.

C H A P. IV.

The State of our Jurisprudence in the Reigns of Philip III. and IV. and of the Lawyers and other Learned Men that flourished among us in these Times.

DURING these Reigns there was no Alteration in the Jurisprudence with us, but it continued, as formerly, to be managed by the Lawyers at the Bar, and the Professors in the Schools, without the least Tincture of Learning. But there was a great Number of Professors, and many more Writers, who have left us so many Treatises, Pleadings, Decisions, and other Works upon the Law, that they would make up half a Library. The Number of Authors was such, that their Works are innumerable, therefore we shall content ourselves with mentioning some of the most famous of them, which will serve for a Specimen of their Knowledge in the Law.

IT is really well worth our Observation, that notwithstanding the Kingdom was involved into so many Misfortunes and Calamities, yet the Number of our Professors, not only did not diminish, but increased and multiplied the more. But it will not seem strange to whoever considers, that when Revolutions happen, Disorders arise, and when Vice, Mischief, and Fraud abound, 'tis then that Professors and Lawyers increase, because they are most wanted. Where-ever there are many Diseases, there is need of many Physicians, so, in licentious Times, recourse must be had to the Laws, and the Professors of them, for preventing greater Disorders.

OF all the rest Scipione Rovito deserves the first Place. He was born in Tortorella, a small Village in the Province of Basilicata, and coming to Naples in a very low Condition, he acted as a Solicitor in the Courts of Justice; but being a Man of unwearied Application in the Study of the Law, punctual, and of great Integrity, he began by Degrees to appear at the Bar; and afterwards he published his first Commentaries upon our Statutes, wherein he was not ashamed to set down the Name of the Place of his Nativity, though afterwards, in the second Edition, he calls himself a Neapolitan. These Commentaries having gained him some Reputation, he commenced Advocate, and was employed by the chief Nobility of the Kingdom, as may be seen in his Consultations, and consequently he acquired both Fame and Riches. There flourished likewise in his Time three other famous Advocates, Gio. Battista Migliore, Ferrante Brancia, and Camillo Villano, who, together with Scipione Rovito, in the Year 1612. were made Counsellors by the Count of Lemos, then Viceroy, solely on account of their Learning and Merit, without their knowing any Thing of the Matter till it was done. While Rovito was Counsellor, he acquired the Name, not only of a Learned, but of a wise and prudent Man, insomuch that, as may be seen in the preceding Books, there was no Affair of any Moment but what was committed to him. He was afterwards made President of the Chamber of Accompts, and in 1530. was raised to the chief Dignity of Regent, which Office he exercised, perhaps, with too much Severity; and Pietro Lasena, who was his intimate Friend, declared to the famous Camillo Pellegrino, from whom Francesco d'Andrea had it, that as to his Morals he affected to be a Follower of the Doctrine of the Stoicks; yet he did not practise the same Rigour at Home, as he did Abroad, for though he had many Children, he brought them up so indulgently, that he had no great Reason to rejoice at his having had them. Besides his Commentaries upon the Statutes, and his Consultations, we have likewise his Decisions, which were printed in Naples in the Year 1633. At last being full of Years, and afflicted with many Infirmities, in the Month of June 1638. he died, and was buried in the professed House of the Jesuits in Naples.

TO him was nothing inferior in Application Carlo Tappia, who, by his most elaborate Works, which he left us, especially that of the Philippine Code, deserves to be reckoned among the chief Lawyers that flourished in these Time. He was the Son of Egidio Tappia, President of the Chamber of Accompts, who, after having gone the Circuit through the several Provinces of the Kingdom, as Auditor, and been made Judge of the Vicariate, in the Year 1597. was created a Counsellor. In 1612. he went to Madrid Regent of the Supreme Council of Italy, and at last, in 1625. he returned to Naples Regent of the Chancery, where he exercised that Office for many Years, and on the 17th of January 1644. died Dean of the Collateral Council, and was buried in the Chapel of his Family, in the Church of S. James belonging to the Spaniards. Besides his Codes and Decisions, he left us many other Works, of which *Toppi*¹ made a Catalogue.

MARCANTONIO DE PONTE, who for his Learning was raised to be President of the Council: Pietrantonio Ursino, an able Lawyer, as his Treatise De Successione Feudorum demonstrates, and who was likewise President; and Andrea Marchese, were all famous.

IN these Times flourished likewise Gianfrancesco Sanfelice, of the Seggio of Montagna, who, after having given a Proof of his Talents in the Provincial Courts, and the High-Court of the Vicariate, in the Year 1619. was made a Counsellor. Afterwards in 1640. he was raised to the supreme Dignity of a Regent, but he made himself much more famous by the Works which he published, such as the Decisions, comprehended in two Volumes, and the Practica Judiciaria, which he published afterwards in 1647.

ETTORE CAPECELATRO, of the Seggio of Capuana, was no less famous, for having applied himself to the Office of Advocate, he made wonderful Progress. By the two Volumes of his Consultations, which he left us, we see that he had been employed to defend Causes of very great Importance; and though he had no good Utterance in his Pleadings, his Learning and Pains supplied his Want of Eloquence.

AT the same time flourished Fabio Capece Galeota, of the Seggio of Capuana, who, by his Learning and Eloquence at the Bar, gained great Reputation.

WE must not pass over in Silence the renowned Marciani. Marcello Marciano made a shining Figure in our Courts, not only while he was an Advocate, but afterwards as a Counsellor. His Pleadings at the Bar gained him both Honour and great Riches. He was both very Learned, and a great Orator; and afterwards, on the 3d of November 1623. being raised to the Dignity of Counsellor, he exercised that Office with Integrity, and gave unspeakable Satisfaction. He left us two Volumes of his excellent Consultations, but much more is owing to him for his having left us Gianfrancesco his Son.

GIANFRANCESCO MARCIANO proved as learned as his Father, and in the Courts had the Character of a famous Advocate; and though he was no great Orator at the Bar, yet he wrote both learnedly and elegantly. On the 10th of May 1645. he was made a Counsellor, and after having exercised that Office for the Space of ten Years, in 1655. he was raised to the Dignity of Regent.

GIANFRANCESCO left us another Marcello, who treading in the Footsteps of his Father and Grandfather, in his younger Days followed the Employment of Advocate, for which Profession he had all the requisite Qualifications. He was a Man of a vast Capacity, great Learning, Boldness, and when a Youth, of ripe Judgment.

THERE were other able Lawyers, no less famous for Learning, than for the Posts they possessed. Francesco Merlino, tho' it does not appear that he ever followed the Business of an Advocate, but was employed in Offices, yet he proved a learned Man, and rendered himself famous, no less by the Employments he was raised to, than the Works he left us. By the Favour of Regent Tappia his Uncle, he was first made Auditor in Salerno, then a Judge of the Vicariate, afterwards Commissary of Campagna, and at last a Counsellor

HE having been a Creature of the Count of Monterey, was not acceptable to the Duke of Medina, so that, being upon his Guard, in all his Employments he shewed himself a Man of great Ability, Integrity, and Learning; and by the modern Writers of the Kingdom his two Volumes of Controversies are highly esteemed. He was afterwards elected Regent of the Supreme Council of Italy, and being returned from Spain, in the Year 1648. he was made President of S. C. which Office he exercised with great Decorum and Gravity. On the 6th Day of September 1650. he died, and was buried in his own Chapel, in the Church of the professed House of the Jesuits.

REGENT Merlino having been made President of S. C. Giancamillo Cacace, who was then President of the Chamber of Accompts, was made Regent of the Italian Council in Spain. He had been a famous Advocate in his Time, very Learned and Eloquent, and was wont to brag, that, while he was Advocate, there was not a Nobleman in the Kingdom but had consulted him. He was born in Castell' a Mare of mean Parentage, but having come to Naples, and acquired a moderate Fortune, by his Fees as Advocate, and extreme Parsimony, he became exceeding Rich. He was of a sullen Temper, and always abhorred Marriage; so that when he died, having no Heirs, he bestowed his Estate upon founding a Monastery of poor Women, called De' Miracoli, which in our Grandfathers Time was likewise called the Monastery of Cacace.

AT the same Time flourished likewise the Counsellor Filippo Pascale, a famous Advocate, and renowned for his Treatise, De viribus Patriæ potestatis. But Scipione Teodoro, likewise a famous Advocate, far exceeded him in Learning. Tommaso Carlevalio distinguished himself by the Works he published, especially his Treatise De Judiciis; and there were many more, who, by their printed Works, have transmitted their Names to Posterity. But the celebrated Orazio Montono, by his profound Knowledge, Elegancy, and great Skill, both in the Civil and Feodal Laws, eclipsed all these.

IN the Rear of all comes Donat' Antonio de Marinis. He was born in Giungano, a small Village in the Hither Principato, who coming to Naples, lived with great Frugality, and applied himself diligently to the Study of the Law, in which he made a notable Progress; and not having the Gift of Elocution, he gave himself to write upon some Causes, whence he afterwards compiled the first Tome of his Solutions. By his Integrity and open Temper, far from the least Affectation, he made himself acceptable to all the most noted Advocates of his Time, insomuch that he was called to consult in all Causes, which raising his Reputation, he likewise began to defend some Causes, and he published the second Tome of his Solutions. In his Time there were many renowned Advocates, such as Raimo di Ponte, Francesco Rocco, Francesco Maria Prato, Antonio Fiorillo, and others.

C H A P. V.

The Polity of our Churches in these Times, till the Reign of King Charles II.

IN the Reigns of Philip III. and IV. as may be observed in the preceding Books, Ecclesiastical Affairs were managed with us, according to the different Changes of the Courts. The Roman Pontiffs, intermeddling too much with the Concerns of Princes, sometimes out of Fear, sometimes out of Jealousy, forced these to make use of all Means, in order to gain them over to their Interests. They had likewise taken upon them to manage Peace betwixt Princes at War together, looking upon it to be their Office, as the common Fathers and Pastors, to bring them to an Agreement; therefore they sent Nuncios and Legates to manage the Peace, and they arrogated to themselves great Authority in the Agreements. But Cardinal Mazarin threw off the Mask, and in despite of Pope Alexander VII. he would not accept of his Mediation in the Peace of the Pyrenees, wherein he suffered none but himself and D. Lewis de Haro to have a Hand, which struck that Pope to the very Heart; from this Example it was afterwards seen, that in the other Treaties of Peace between the Princes of Europe, the Mediations and Interpositions of the Nuncios of the Court of Rome were little regarded.

ACCORDING to the good or bad Understanding between the Courts of Spain and Rome, our Viceroy managed the Disputes about Jurisdiction. Whenever there was any Misunderstanding, they suffered no Wrong to be done, and opposed the Incroachments more vigorously. The Court of Rome having disoblged the Spanish Ministers, the Bishop of Cordova and D. John Chumazzero were sent from Madrid to Pope Urban VIII. with secret Instructions to threaten him with the calling of a new Council, in order to redress the many Injuries done the Kingdom of Spain by the Court of Rome, by imposing an excessive Number of Pensions in favour of Foreigners, even upon Benefices with Cure of Souls; by appointing Coadjutors with Power of succeeding; by the Resignations of Benefices with Cure of Souls; by the Dispensations and other Provisions sent from Rome, and by the great Charges extorted for dispatching them; by the Reservations of Benefices; by the cruel Spoils committed at the Death of Prelates; by the Vacancies of Bishopricks; and by other intolerable Grievances exercised in these Kingdoms by the Nunciature of Spain: Our Kingdom suffered no less Injuries from the Nunciature of Naples.

NOT regarding the Agreements made with the Chapters and Clergy of all the Cathedral Churches, and interpreting them after their own manner, the Court of Rome exacted the Taxes with great Rigour and Injustice; for many of those Benefices which were comprehended within the Tax, being bestowed by the Datary upon Cardinals and other Prelates belonging to that Court, exempted from all Taxes, the remaining Benefices came to bear the whole Burden. The Apostolical Chamber likewise continued to commit cruel Spoils upon the Death of Bishops, Abbots, and other beneficed Persons, not included in the Agreement, with so much Barbarity, that in the Time of their Sicknes, and when they stood most in need of Comfort and Assistance, they saw with their own Eyes their Apartments stript and robb'd of all that was in them by the Commissaries. In the Spoils of Bishopricks, Abbeys, and other Benefices, not comprehended in the Agreement, the Nuncios took upon them to proceed against Laicks, charged with having in their

their Possession Goods belonging to the vacant Churches and Benefices, and to the Apostolick Chamber, as having a Right to those Spoils, by their own Authority sequestrating them by the Means of their Commissaries, and to excommunicate the Possessors, and all those that had opposed them in it.

GRIEVOUS Extortions were committed in their Tribunal, by exacting from the Parties, under pretence of Dues and Fees, much greater Sums than was practised in the Royal Tribunals of the City and Kingdom, and the Reason was, because the Court of Rome would have many Officers in that Tribunal, but would not allow them any Salary or Wages, as was practised in the other Tribunals, but made them depend solely upon the Emoluments and Fees for their Maintenance; whence it came, that the poor Parties were terribly fleeced by the Rapacity and Avarice of the Officers of the Court. The Royal Jurisdiction suffered no less Confusion and Prejudice, by the vast Number of Laicks, which they pretended to withdraw from it, by giving them Commissions to serve in this Tribunal, some as Notaries, others as Tip Staffs, whence many Frauds were committed, and a vast Number were exempted from the Royal Jurisdiction, not that they stood in need of them, but for the better Sale of their Commissions, which they sold at extravagant Rates, persuading the Buyers, that by Virtue thereof they were exempted from Laick Jurisdiction, and free from paying any Thing, either to the King or Corporations. The Nuncios likewise pretended, that all their Families, as well their Serjeants and Beadles, as their Domesticks and Palaces, were exempted from Royal Jurisdiction; whence proceeded great Disorders, and our Viceroy had these pretended Immunities to dispute, not only with the Nuncios, but with the Archbishops, who pretended to protect Villains, guilty of the greatest Crimes, only because they belonged to their Families and Palaces.

DURING the Misunderstandings betwixt the two Courts, and as long as the Commission of the Bishop of Cordova and Cbiumazzero lasted, our Viceroy maintained the Royal Jurisdiction with great Boldness and Vigour; but Pope Urban, as we have said, referring the Matter to a Treaty, which under various Pretences, he put off from time to time, took Advantage of the Juncture of Affairs; for the Spaniards, being still more and more unfortunate, were reduced to such a Condition, that they durst no longer disoblige the Court of Rome; therefore, the Commission proving fruitless, the Grievances in Spain and in our Kingdom, were not only not redressed, but aggravated by the Tribunal of the Nunciature; and the Ecclesiasticks, more bold than ever, did not fail to attempt new Incroachments upon the Royal Jurisdiction.

BY reason of the great Number of Churches, and of the frequent Crimes that were committed both in the City and Kingdom, it was thought necessary to find out a Remedy against the intolerable Abuses of the pretended Immunity of the Churches, so much aggravated by the Ecclesiasticks, and which they seemed now to defend more zealously than ever, at the very Time that they knew, the chief Cause of so many Crimes to be the Immunity of the Churches, so much extended, that it made those that were mischievously, inclined the more bold to commit them. It was resolved to send the Counsellor Antonio di Gatta to obtain of the Pope some Reform to Pope Gregory's Bull; but, as we have seen, that Message proved in vain, and without Effect, the Court of Rome taking Advantage of our Misfortunes, and the low Ebb to which the Court of Spain was then reduced.

S E C T. I.

Of Monks and Temporalities.

THERE needs not a more flagrant Instance, to make it plainly appear, that by how much the greater the Misfortunes and Calamities of the People are, so much the more do the Riches of the Churches and Monks increase, than what happened in our Kingdom in the Time of its greatest Misery and Destruction; for at such Times, more than at others, miserable Mortals, having recourse to God and the Saints, or returning Thanks for the Evils they have escaped, or begging that greater may not befall them, are more moved than ever to share their Riches with the Churches and Priests. Surely our Forefathers never saw more calamitous Times than those which passed from the Reign of Philip III. to the Death of Philip IV. There were either cruel Wars, or, what is worse, great fear of them: Eruptions of Vesuvius, Earthquakes, Incurfions of the Banditi, Invasions of the Turks, Seditions, Tumults, Dearth, Oppressions, intolerable Taxes, most cruel Pestilences, and so many other Mischiefs, that the very mentioning them strikes Terror. And even in the Midst of so many Misfortunes, the Churches and Monasteries of the Religious Orders already established, were multiplied, new Orders were introduced, new and more rich Acquisitions were made; and in fine, they purchased so much Land, that they were near ingrossing to themselves the poor Remainder that was left in the Possession of Laicks.

IN this XVIIth Century, new Religious Orders were introduced. In the Year 1607. D. Carlo Caraffa, a Neapolitan Gentleman and Priest, in the Church of S. Maria dè Monti, situate in the Suburbs of Naples, called S. Antonio, instituted the Congregation of the Pii Oratorii. But Cardinal Dezio Caraffa, the Archbishop, with the Consent of Pope Paul V. in 1618. gave them the Church of S. George, an antient Parish Church of Naples, and afterwards made Collegiate, and had once seven Prebendaries, and as many Priests, amongst which were included the Dean and Archdean. But at this Time it being like to tumble down, and there being no Fund for repairing it, it was thought fit to give it to the said Fathers. This Congregation was confirmed by Pope Gregory XV. by a Brief dated the 2d of April 1621. and in 1622. he gave them Power to administer all the Sacraments; and in 1635. it was confirmed by Urban VIII. In process of Time they made no small Progress, having in Naples and elsewhere founded other Churches of their Order, and made considerable Acquisitions, both of Riches and Farms.

IN the Year 1609. the Barnabites, or Clerks Regular of S. Paul, came to Naples. They came from Milan, where, in 1520. they had been instituted by Giacomo-Antonio Moriglia and Bartolomeo Ferraria, both Milanese, and Francesco-Maria Zaccaria, a Cremonese, who had been moved by the Sermons of Serafino Firmano, a Canon Regular. They were called Canons Regular of S. Paul, because among their other Institutions they were to preach upon the Epistles of S. Paul; and in 1528. and 1533. their Rules were confirmed by several Apostolical Briefs. S. Carlo Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, likewise favoured them, and gave them the Church of S. Barnabas in that City, whence they also got the Name of Barnabites. Having afterwards spread themselves all Italy over, at last in 1609. they came to Naples, where they were settled in the Church of S. Maria di Portanova, called In Cosmodin, likewise an antient, and one of the four principal Parish-Churches of this City.

IN the Year 1610. the Nuns of the Visitation of the Virgin Mary, for visiting the Poor and Sick, were instituted by S. Francis Sales, Bishop of Geneva. Being afterwards confined to a Cloister, they were obliged to receive those sick Maids who had not been admitted into other Convents. These came to us much later, and have built a very large and convenient Monastery, adjoining to the Church of S. Maria della Pazienza Cesarea.

OTHER Reformed of the antient Orders were likewise introduced. The Reformed of S. Barnard founded a magnificent Church without the Gate of S. Januarius, by the Name of S. Charles. The Reformed of S. Francis, assisted by several Neapolitan and Spanish Noblemen, founded a very large Monastery in a most pleasant Situation, with a Church finely built, under the Name of S. Maria degli Angeli. The reformed Bare-footed Carmelites built another in the Suburbs of Chiaja, towards the Erection of which the Count of Peniaranda gave 3000 Crowns, and on the 11th of March 1664. with the Ministers of State, assisted at the Opening of it. As the Count of Lemos had bestowed profusely upon the Jesuits, so did this Viceroy upon the Theresians. Out of his Piety, he not only contributed towards the Building of the Convent of these Fathers, but likewise towards enlarging the Monastery of S. Joseph, belonging to the bare-footed Theresian Nuns.

THE Jesuits likewise made prodigious Acquisitions in these Times. They had not only the Direction of the Consciences of the Nobility, but of their Families, as also of the Commonalty. By the Means of their Colleges and professed Houses, where they taught all Ranks of People, they drew the Devotion and good Will to themselves of every Body; they screwed themselves into their Affairs, managing them them (by the good Opinion they had acquired of Men of Worth and Prudence) as they thought fit. Even Law-Suits of the greatest Moment, by way of amicable Agreement, were referred to their Decision; and Regent Marinis, in his Solutions, relates many Awards given by the Jesuits in most weighty Causes, and of vast Importance. Never did any Viceroy give his Mind so much to building and repairing of Churches, as the Count of Peniaranda: There was scarce any sacred Place that did not receive from him large Alms. He assisted the Carmelites in repairing and parting their Monastery from the great Tower Del Carmine, that they might not be disturbed by the Spanish Soldiers that were in Garison there. He contributed largely towards finishing the Fabrick of the Hermitage of Sister Orsola, and of the Church of S. Maria del Pianto, where those who died of the Plague were buried. He contributed towards the Repairing of the Church of S. Nicholas al Molo. During his Government, the famous Disputes between the Dominicans and Franciscans about the Immaculate Conception having arisen (for quieting of which, several Popes were obliged to put forth many Constitutions and Bulls) and the Spaniards, who sided with the Franciscans, having raised the Devotion for our Lady much higher under this Title, than any other, he greedily laid hold of the Opportunity, and with great Pomp and Solemnity caused magnificent Feasts to be celebrated in all the Churches under this Title; whereupon the Devotion of the People increased to that Degree, that there was not a Church of that Denomination, but what received profuse Alms from the Devout.

THE Example of the Viceroy moved the Nobility and Commonalty to do the same. Therefore many other Churches were either founded anew, or the decayed were rebuilt. To this was likewise added, that the cruel Pestilence had left both the City and Kingdom in a manner void of Inhabitants, many, not having any Relations, to whom they could leave their Effects, left them to the Churches and Monks; so that their Riches were still increased. Others, being at Variance with their Relations, out of Hatred, and in despite of them, left their Estates to the Churches. To this likewise contributed not a little, the Doctrine instilled and well rooted in the Minds of the People in these Times by the Monks, that those who had robbed while alive, by leaving their Estates to the Churches, ballanced all Accounts with God; whence it is, that some reflecting Travellers, who, being amazed at the infinite Number of our Churches and Convents, and at their vast Riches, instead of concluding that it proceeded from Piety, are the more confirmed in the bad Opinion they have conceived of the Neapolitans, That they are a People accustomed to rob from the very Cradle; and that therefore they are so lavish in leaving to the Churches at their Death, because they had robbed them in their Life-times.

FOR these Reasons the Churches and Monasteries multiplied with us, infomuch, that from this Time forward, 'tis not possible to get an exact Account of them. Pietro di Stefano believed, that he had made a just Computation of the Number of the Churches in the City of Naples alone, when, in the Year 1560. he published his Volume Of the Description of the sacred Places of the City of Naples. But sixty Years had not passed, when Cesare d' Eugenio, by reason of the so many Churches newly built, was induced to make another, which he published in Naples in the Year 1624. under the Title of Napoli Sacra. But in less than thirty Years after that, Carlo de Lellis was forced to publish in the Year 1654. a third Volume under the Title, Additions, or a Supplement to the Napoli Sacra. Nor has that been sufficient, because they are now much more increased, so as to furnish Matter enough for a fourth Volume.

IN these Times the extravagant Doctrine of our Doctors likewise contributed to the Acquisitions of the Churches; they falsely applying the antient Rules to the present Times, wresting the Sense of the Laws, not well understood by them, and not minding the Circumstances of Times, nor the Alteration of the State of Things, pushed on by imprudent and mistaken Piety, to the utmost of their Power wrote in Favour of these Acquisitions, and were wholly bent upon increasing the Means and Causes of them, to the great Detriment of Civil Society, and of the Property which every Person has in his own Goods. They taught, as a Matter beyond all Dispute, that the Landlords of Houses, situate near Churches, could be forced, nil they will they, to sell them, if they were wanted for enlarging the Churches: And besides, that the Displeasure or good Will of the compelled Seller was not to be regarded in the Price, but the Value to be referred to skilled Appraisers. And this Favour was not only granted to Churches, but they extended it to Court-Yards, Porches, Vestries, Church-Yards, Cloysters, Stairs, Dormitories, even to the Kitchens and Gardens of the Monasteries. It was likewise extended, though there were a publick Street betwixt the House and the Church; and, what will seem more strange, even so far as to make a large Piazza, and a great open Space before the Building. In the famous Action, which Cardinal Filomarino, our Archbishop, entered against the Monks of the Monastery of D. Regina, for which Giulio Capone, who was Advocate for the Prelate, alledged two Instances: The Archbishop pretended, that the Monks ought to be compelled to sell him some Houses which they possessed before his Palace, though there was a publick Street betwixt them, intending to pull them down, in order to make a large open Place there, because there was not Room enough for a Coach and six to enter his Palace. The Cardinal De Luca, who was then Advocate in Rome, defended the Monks, and was amazed at the Pretensions, and by his Allegations, related by the said *Capone*¹, confuted all that had been alledged for the Archbishop. But to what Purpose? It was decided in Favour of the Archbishop, the Houses were pulled down and levelled with the Ground, and a large Piazza made, so that now a Coach and six can easily enter and go out of the Palace.

WHENCE it came, that the Convents, though at first but very small, take up the whole Neighbourhood from one Side to the other, till they reach the Street, so that there is scarce a Street in Naples where there is not some Convent or other; and if a Stop be not put to so great and destructive an Abuse, the Monks, in Time, may come to buy the whole City. Nor did the Acquisitions of the Churches and Monks end here, but proportionably to the Time, they grew much greater under the Reign of Charles II. which, in the following Books, we shall now relate.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XXXIX.

THE Death of King Philip IV. who, under the Regency of a Woman, being left the Successor at so tender an Age, made some believe, that great Alterations would happen in the Kingdoms of Spain, disordered by the War of Portugal, and not secure of the Peace with France; and there not having been seen (since these Kingdoms had been under the Dominion of the Family of Austria) the Minority of a King so young, nor the Regency of a Woman, a Stranger, and unskilled in Government, it was not known how the haughty Temper of the Spanish Nation would bear it; so much the more, that D. John of Austria, though a great Lover of the King, not having been so much as mentioned in the Will, took it very ill to lead a private and neglected Life. To this was added, that the Council of State, accustomed to great Authority, complained of being controuled by the Junta, who assumed to themselves the principal Direction of Affairs. Nevertheless, whether it was, that the Ambition of the *Grande*s, wanting Power, vented itself upon idle Quarrels, or that the Fear of France, and the Shame of not being able to subdue the Portuguese, kept them to their Duty, the Change of Government occasioned neither Tumults nor Commotions in the Kingdoms, much less in this of Naples, of which the King having this Year 1666. got the Investiture from Pope Alexander VII. the Original Bull whereof is preserved in the great Archives of the Royal Chamber, the Government of it, as we have said, was bestowed upon D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon, of whom, and the Events that happened in his Time, we shall now discourse.

C H A P. I.

D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon confutes the Pope's Pretension to the Government of the Kingdom. The King of France begins a new War on account of the Succession of the Dutchy of Brabant, and other States of Flanders, to which an End is put by the Peace of Aix la Chapelle.

HO' the Regency, in the Person of the Queen-Mother, and the Junta of those Ministers, named by the deceased King in his Will for the Government of the Kingdoms, of which the Monarchy of Spain consisted, had been established, and not only the Council of State, but the Grandeess had acquiesced to the Disposition made by King Philip; nevertheless Pope Alexander VII. did not fail to set up the old Pretension, which his Predecessors, in former troublesome Times, had in some measure made good in this Kingdom, of taking the Government of it into their own Hands during the Minority of the King, as the direct and sovereign Lords thereof. From the preceding Books of this History, it may be clearly seen, upon what slender Foundations this Pretension is built; however, the Court of Rome, improving the Instances that happened in the Pontificate of Innocent III. by the Minority of the Emperor Frederick II. the Legation of the Cardinal Di Parma in the Pontificate of Martin IV. and Honorius IV. during the Imprisonment of Charles of Anjou, Prince of Salerno, and some other misapplied Examples, had the Assurance at this Time to pretend to the same anew. It was then believed by those who were best acquainted with the Intrigues of that Court, that this was attempted, not that they expected to obtain it, but in order still to keep up their Pretensions, that upon a more favourable Opportunity, according as the Circumstances and Junctures of Time would bear, they might be able, some time or other, to reap more Advantage by it. Therefore, soon after the Arrival of D. Pedro in Naples, the Nuncio did not fail to wait upon him, and lay before him the Rights of the Apostolical See to the Government of the Kingdom, and consequently that it belonged to the Pope to provide it with a Governor during the King's Minority. The Viceroy answered, that his Holiness needed not trouble himself about the Government, since King Philip, by his Will, had taken sufficient Care for that, by establishing the Regency in the Person of the Queen, and appointing a Junta for the Government of all his Dominions; and the Nuncio having left a Memorial of all these pretended Rights, the Viceroy ordered the famous Marcello Marciano, who was then Attorney-General, to answer it.

THE Nuncio in Spain acted the same Part at that Court, to whom the same Answers were given; and he having likewise dispersed some Writings, wherein the Pretensions of Rome were represented, they were confuted, and the Foundations, upon which they were built, proved to be sandy and weak. But of all that was wrote upon this Subject, either in Spain or Naples, the Treatise published in Latin by the Fiscal Marciano, under the Title *De Baliatu Regni Neapolitani*¹, was the most learned and pithy. The Court of Rome finding so vigorous Opposition made, not only by the Court of Madrid, but by the Viceroy of Naples, dropt the Pretension for this Time.

BUT the Success was not the same with respect to the Pretension set up at this very Time by the King of France to the Dutchy of Brabant, and other States of Flanders; in which Dispute, though we got the better of the French in writing in Defence of our Cause, yet we came off Losers in the Issue of the War which the King of France made upon that Score in Flanders. By the Death of King Philip, the King of France, then a Youth, and impatient of Rest, was given to understand, that the Dutchy of Brabant, with some other States of Flanders, were devolved to the Queen his Wife, as the Daughter of King Philip by his first Wife, notwithstanding that he had left by his second King Charles, a Male; because the Custom of these Countries was, that in Successions and Heritage, the Females of the first Marriage were preferred to the Males of the second. The covetous King, under this Pretence, gladly laid hold of this Opportunity, in order to enlarge the Confines of his Kingdoms, by incroaching upon those of his Neighbours; but Queen Anna-Maria, his Mother, being then alive, no other Step was taken, but only making the Pretension publick, and exaggerating it in some Writings, as just and very well grounded. But soon after the Queen-Mother dying, the young King, freed from the Authority of a Mother, immediately caused his Pretensions to be printed, and marched his Troops for supporting them. On the 9th of May this Year 1667. he wrote a flattering Letter to the Queen Regent of Spain, wherein complaining, that the Proposal of an amicable Agreement, which he had offered for compounding the Affair, being rejected, he found he would be obliged to take the Field about the End of the Month in order to endeavour to put himself in Possession of what so justly belonged to the Queen his Wife, in the Low-Countries, or of some other Equivalent; however, he had commanded the Archbishop of Ambrun, his Ambassador, to present a Memorial, drawn up by his Order, wherein were contained the Reasons upon which his Right was grounded; to the End that being examined, the Proposal which he had caused to be made, and which he now makes, of adjusting the Difference by an amicable Agreement, may be accepted.

BY this Letter it was found, that he was seeking nothing but a Pretence for invading Flanders, before any Opposition could be made, seeing at the same time that he proposed the Agreement, he declares, that towards the End of the Month he was resolved to take the Field, and that before the Memorial he had sent could be read, far less examined, he was resolved to go, and by Force take Possession of the Provinces in Question, or of their Equivalent, in other States of the Catholick King. His most Christian Majesty was as good as his Word, for about the End of the Month he put himself at the Head of his Army, and arrived upon the Frontiers of Flanders, and having divided it into several Bodies, at the same time that he caused a Book of the pretended Rights of the Queen his Wife to be published in different Languages, he attacked the Cities of that Province.

ON the other Hand the Spaniards, alledging, that King Lewis was rather seeking a specious, than a just Cause of making War, vigorously refuted the pretended Rights, maintaining by much stronger Writings, that particular Usages or Statutes could not avail in the sovereign Succession of States; and that it was repugnant to Custom and the Nature of Things, that a Female of the same Degree should pretend to be preferred to a Crown before a Male. But they were not so well provided of Arms, as of Reasons, for defending themselves by Force. The Queen-Regent, alarmed at the unexpected Declaration of War, with Tears in her Eyes recommended herself to her Ministers; and one Day having caused the young King to be brought into the Council, she made him say with a childish Voice in his own Language: I am Innocent, assist me ¹.

THEREFORE the Spaniards, being resolved to make a vigorous Defence, at the same time that they were making ready for it, did not neglect to undeceive the People of the boasted Rights of the French, making them appear to be chimerical and unjust; magnifying the Injuries done by France to an infant King, so nearly allied to the Invader.

IN the Beginning of this Year, one of his Catholick Majesty's Ministers had caused a small Treatise to be printed in Flanders, wherein was demonstrated the

Vainness of the Pretension, in order to stifle the Uproars of the Vulgar, amongst whom the French were crying up the pretended Succession to the Dutchy of Brabant and other Provinces; and at the same time they assured those People, that they were to be preserved under the antient Dominion of their lawful Princes. But however convincing and strong (though short and plain) the Arguments contained in that small Treatise were, the French did not give over their Undertaking; on the contrary, besides Arms, they went about to defend their Cause by large Volumes; so that, though the said Treatise was thought sufficient for the People of Flanders, who knew their own Laws to a Nicety, yet it might be judged lame by other Nations; therefore it was thought fit to employ more Pens, and demonstrate King Charles's Rights with greater Vigour.

NAPLES may very well boast, that the best Writings which were published upon this Subject, in Defence of the King of Spain's Rights, were those penned by our incomparable Lawyer Francesco d'Andrea, then a famous Advocate. The Viceroy, D. Pedro of Arragon, had not a fitter Person than he for defending this Cause, and refuting the Pretensions of the French; therefore, being ordered by the Viceroy, he set about the Undertaking, and on the 28th of February the same Year, having finished a learned Treatise, written in Latin, with this Title, Dissertatio de Successione Ducatus Brabantiae, he presented it to the Viceroy, who received it with great Esteem, ordering him to subscribe it, which he did in his Presence, that, being to send it to Spain under his Name, already famous over all Europe, it might have the greater Weight and Authority. It was not thought fit in these Beginnings to cause it to be printed, that the French, who had not as yet published their Writings in Print, might not have Occasion to say, that we were the first that gave the Provocation. But the Issue proved afterwards, that they had only forborne printing, in order to attack us unawares; for, as we have said, about the End of May there was Advice, that the King of France, at the Head of his Army, was arrived upon the Frontiers of Flanders, and that at the same time he had caused to be published in several Languages a Book, setting forth the Rights of the Queen his Wife, to the greatest Part of those Provinces, which Book soon after appeared in Naples in the Spanish Tongue, with this Title: Traitado de los Derechos de la Reyna Christianissima sobre varios Estados de la Monarquia de Espana. A Treatise of the Rights of the most Christian Queen to sundry States of the Monarchy of Spain.

AS soon as this Book came to the Viceroy's Hands, he sent it to Francesco d'Andrea, ordering him to answer it; and then it was, that a larger Field being opened to him, for displaying his great Learning, and his Skill in History, both Foreign and Domestick, he published in the Italian Language, that so famous Treatise, intitled: An Answer to the Treatise of the Rights, &c. printed in Naples the same Year 1667. wherein with strong Arguments he demonstrates, that the so much magnified Custom of Brabant, and the other Provinces, could not take Place in the Succession of Dominion and Sovereignty; and that it is never regulated by such Custom, but is always conveyed by Law and a contrary Practice. And since the French, in order to remove the Objection of the most ample Renunciation made by their Queen, when she was married to King Lewis, had endeavoured by several Arguments to prove it void and null; he with pithy Answers overthrew their Sophisms, and with strong Reasons maintained the Validity and Firmness of it, which he had not done in the first Treatise, thinking, that it would have, in some measure, prejudiced the Cause, if, where it was so clear, that the Queen could not pretend to the least Right, he had done his utmost to demonstrate the Validity of the Renunciation. Upon this Occasion, this renowned Lawyer likewise answered another Book published in France, of other Pretensions to all the Seventeen Provinces, and to almost all the Kingdoms and Principalities of Europe, written by a certain Aubery, an Advocate of the Parliament of Paris, which was printed at the very Time of the Invasion of Flanders, under this Title, Of the King's just Pretensions to the Empire. And with profound Learning, and an exact Knowledge of History, he made it appear, that the Dutchy of Brabant, with the neighbouring Provinces, had not the least Dependence upon the Crown of France; and that that King could not pretend to justify the Conquest of them, as the Representative of Charles the Great, whose Rights he maintained to be lodged in the most August Family of Austria.

OTHER learned Treatises were likewise published in answer to the Book which the French had put out, and among the rest there was one very smart, written in French by a publick Minister, with this Title, Bouclier d'Etat & de Justice, &c. which was translated into Spanish, and immediately printed. But of all that appeared, in the Opinion of every Body, that of our Francesco d'Andrea was looked upon to be the most learned, pithy, and elegant.

BUT while our Lawyers were so vigorously defending the Rights of their Prince, and in supporting the best Cause, had got the better of the French Lawyers; on the other Hand, the Enemy's Troops being more numerous, had worsted ours in Flanders; they had surprized Doway, Tournay, Oudenard, Alost, Charleroy, Lille, Furnes, Dixmude, Courtray, and other Places of less Note: Nor did the Winter, which overtook them, put a Stop to their Career, but even in that Season, by secret Correspondence, they made themselves Masters of the County of Burgundy in an instant.

THIS sudden Motion of the French obliged the Spaniards at last to clap up a Peace with the Portuguese, in order with greater Vigour to oppose the French with Arms, as they had done with the Pen. Though the Death of King Philip had not made the Spaniards forget the Revolt of Portugal, yet it had extinguished the Aversion they had had to an Agreement; so that they were now easily induced to make Peace, and it was concluded with no other Conditions and Stipulations, but with that Pretorian Edict, Uti possidetis, ita possideatis: The two Kingdoms of Castile and Portugal were left in the same State they were before their Union, except as to Ceuta, which being in the Hands of the Castilians, they were allowed to keep it.

THE Peace being settled with Portugal, at the same time that it was proclaimed, with the usual Ceremonies, in Naples, War was declared against France, and Proclamations were published, ordering all the French that were in the Kingdom to depart in a few Days; and the Viceroy sequestrated the Estates which the Duke of Parma and the Prince of Monaco possessed in it, as Adherents to the Crown of France, which threatening likewise to attack Italy both by Sea and Land, obliged our Viceroy to reinforce the Garisons of Tuscany with 1800 Spanish and Italian Foot, and to get a Regiment of Germans to come from Germany. It also hindered him from sending to the Levant in the Beginning of the Campaign of this Year 1668. the Neapolitan Squadron of Gallies to the Relief of Candy: Of which the Pope made heavy Complaints; and considering, that by this War, made by the French, the Venetians, who were gallantly defending that Island, closely invested by the Turks, were deprived of Succours, he did his utmost Endeavour, in Conjunction with the other Princes of Europe, to bring these Rival Nations to an Agreement.

POPE Alexander VII. having died on the 21st of May 1667. on the 17th of June was succeeded by Cardinal Giulio Rospigliosi of Pistoja, by the Name of Clement IX. who seeing, that the Turks had invested Candy, was wholly intent upon assisting the Venetians both with Men and Money; for which End he abolished the Orders of the Jesuits, of the Hermits of S. Hierom of Fiesole, and of the Canons of S. George in Alga. He did not neglect, with pressing Instances, to stir up the other Princes of Europe to send powerful Succours to Candy; and he sent Letters to Solyman King of Persia, to persuade him to make War against the Turk. Seeing that a Stop was put to those Succours, by reason of the War which the French were carrying on in Flanders, in Conjunction with the other Princes, he did his utmost to bring about a Peace. The neighbouring Princes were not well pleased with the Success of the French in Flanders, and the News of their having made themselves Masters of the County of Burgundy vexed them not a little. The Switzers threatened to retake it by Force of Arms, as a State which was under their Protection. But the States of the united Provinces of Holland were the most jealous, who, abhorring to see the French approaching so near their Borders, had no sooner concluded a Peace with England in Breda, than they persuaded that King to join his Arms and Counsels with theirs; and then, by the Strength of Gold, having drawn-in Switzerland, they managed Matters so effectually by Conferences, and much more by threatening to have recourse to Arms, that they persuaded, or rather forced the King of France to consent to a Peace. Therefore on the 2d of May this Year 1668. it was concluded in Aix la Chapelle, and the French were thereby left in the Possession of their Conquests in the Low Countries, but they restored the County of Burgundy to the Spaniards. These confessed that they were chiefly beholden to the Dutch, not only for what they did not lose, but for what they had recovered; for, under the Appearance of Mediation, they had truly defended their Interest, and preserved what remained to them in the Province of Flanders. On the other Hand the King of France was highly incensed against the Dutch, but smothering it at present, he pretended, that out of Honour and Favour to the Pope, he laid down his Arms. Whatever Clement took to be the real Motives, he shewed himself grateful and most affectionate to the King, endeavouring to cultivate his Friendship, which he looked upon to be very fitting for himself, and beneficial to his Relations; and he made it useful to the Venetians, for whom he obtained 100,000 Crowns for the Relief of Candy, with Permission to levy both Officers and Soldiers in France.

THE Peace of Aix la Chapelle being proclaimed in Naples on the 4th of August, the Viceroy, having dismissed the Germans, according to the Promise made by the Queen Regent to the Venetians, and the Orders he had received from her, dispatched the Squadrons of Naples and Sicily for Candy. But not only these, but all the other Succours sent by the King of France, the Pope, and the Maltese having been to no Purpose, they returned, and soon after it was found, that in the Beginning of this Year 1669. the Venetians had been forced to surrender upon Capitulation, after a War of 24 Years, 28 Months, and 27 Days of a most obstinate Siege. This Loss sensibly affected all Italy, but it was more afflicting to us, because of the small Distance between the Cape of Otranto and the Turkish Territories; so that the Viceroy considering the Danger, not only provided the Fortresses of the Kingdom and the Garisons of Tuscany with Ammunition, but sent several Troops of Horse for guarding the Coast of the Adriatick. This News so much affected Pope Clement, that on the 9th of December he died of Grief. And on the 29th of April this Year 1670. Emilio Lorenzo Altieri was elected in his Place, who would likewise be called Clement, and he was the Xth of that Name.

C H A P. II.

The Viceroy of Sardinia being murdered, D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon sends Relief to that Island: Pursues the Banditi of the Kingdom: Brings the Computation of Families to Perfection: Goes to Rome, in the Name of the King, to do Homage to the new Pope: Upon his Return his Successor is appointed: The Monuments and Laws which he left us.

THAT the Kingdom of Sardinia might not be free from the common Calamities which those of Naples and Sicily had undergone, at this very Time it was full of Disorders and Tumults, occasioned by the Murder of D. Emanuel de los Covos, Marquis of Cameraissa, the Viceroy. The Court of Madrid, according to its wonted Custom, requiring Money of the Marquis, he pressed the Subjects to make a Donative to the King; but having met with vast Difficulties, he was forced to dissolve the Parliament, which for that End had been assembled in Cagliari, the Capital of that Kingdom, without being able to obtain it. The greatest Opposer was D. Agostino di Castelvì, Marquis of Laconi, who being murdered on the 20th of June

June 1668. it was rumoured abroad, that this Murder had been committed by Order of D. Ifabella de Portocarrero, Marchioness of Cameraſſa, with the Knowledge and Conſent of the Viceroy her Husband, in Revenge of the Oppoſition made by D. Agostino in the Parliament. Upon this Rumour, D. Giacomo Artal di Caſtelvi, Marquis of Cea, D. Silveſtro Aymerich, D. Antonio Brondo, D. Francesco Cao, D. Francesco Portogues, and D. Savino Grizoni, met in the Palace of D. Francesca Carillas, Marchioness of Laconi, the Deceased's Wife, where they agreed to put the Viceroy to Death; and in order to put this wicked Deſign in Execution, on the 21ſt of July the ſame Year, while the Viceroy, with his Wife and Children, was returning in his Coach from the Church of our Lady Del Carmine to his own Palace, ſeveral Muſquet-Shot were fired at him from the Windows of Antonio Brondo's Houſe, ſituate in Cagliari in the Street De los Cavelleros, whereby he was cruelly murdered. The Marchioness of Cameraſſa, terrified at ſo dreadful a Sight, for fear of more Miſchief, reſolved immediately to leave Cagliari, and the Night following having taken Shipping, with her Children and Family, ſet ſail immediately for Spain, leaving the Marchioness of Laconi at full Liberty to enter an Action againſt her in the Royal Tribunal of Cagliari, and to charge her with the Murder of the Marquis her Husband. The Viceroy's Murderers having taken Sanctuary in the Convent of S. Francis, continued there, with a Guard of armed Men, for the Space of a Month, and then embarked for Cape Saffari, where they aſſembled Men for their Defence.

OUR Viceroy, upon Advice of ſo outrageous a Crime, immediately cauſed ten Gallies to be fitted out, in which 2000 Spaniſh, Italian, and German Foot were embarked; and though they had ſet ſail for Sardinia, yet after ſerious Conſideration it was thought fit to recall them, it not being judged proper to render theſe People, (naturally fierce) jealous, by introducing new Troops into that Iſland. The Court of Madrid, in order to obviate greater Miſchief, immediately ſent to be Viceroy of that Kingdom, D. Francesco Tuttavila, Duke of S. Germano, a noble Neapolitan of the Seggio of Porto, Brother to D. Vincenzo Tuttavilla, Duke of Calabritto, Colonel General of this Kingdom, who, on the 10th of March this Year 1669. ſailed for Sardinia to aſſiſt his Brother with the Admiral Galley of the Squadron of Naples, and carried with him the Counſellor D. Giovanni d'Errera, who had been appointed Judge Delegate in the Trial of Cameraſſa's Murderers. In the Month of May following, other three Gallies were ſent with 500 Spaniſh and Italian Foot, and ſome ready Money; and a thouſand Soldiers were ſent thither from Finale in the Duke of Turſi's Squadron of Gallies, and 300 from the Iſland of Sicily; and laſtly, in the Month of March 1670. our Viceroy was obliged to ſend other 500.

BUT Matters were quickly ſet to rights again in that Iſland, for Errera made it plainly appear, that thoſe People had no Hand in the Murder of the Viceroy, and that the Murder had been committed by thoſe Noblemen only, in order to cover the Murder of the Marquis of Laconi, who had been killed by Villains employed by D. Silveſtro Aymerich, at the Deſire of the Marchioness D. Francesca, his Wife, in order to marry him (Aymerich) which had already happened. Therefore all thoſe who had had a Hand in the Death of the Viceroy, were, by a publick Ediſt, declared guilty of High-Treſon, and Rebels: A great Reward was offered to whoever ſhould catch them dead or alive: Their Goods and Eſtates were conſiſcated, and their Houſes were ordered to be demolished, levelled with the Ground, and ſtrewed with Salt. It was likewiſe declared, that thoſe People had carried themſelves faithfully towards their Prince, and that they had had no Hand in the Murder of the Viceroy. The Duke of S. Germano received hearty Thanks from all the States of that Kingdom, which continued peaceable under its antient Lord and Maſter.

BUT in the mean time the Banditi, now more insolent than ever, committed frequent Depredations in our Kingdom. They robbed the Travellers, and made them Priſoners, and plundered the Meſſengers of their Diſpatches: In ſine, the publick Roads were no more ſafe, inſomuch that a Stop was put to all Traffick and Commerce. Many Troops of them were encamped in the Abruzzi, and having fortified themſelves in ſundry Towns, they became ſo bold, as to diſpatch Orders to all the Neighbourhood for bringing in the Taxes to them, and not to the King's Collectors. By the Death of Cardinal Filomarino, Cardinal D. Innico Caracciolo being made Archbiſhop of Naples, and obliged to go to Rome to aſſiſt in the Conclave at the Election of a new Pope, to wit Clement X. was seized by these Banditi, and, to recover his Liberty, forced to pay them a Hundred and eighty Pistoles. Monfignor Toppa, Archbishop of Benevento, was likewise robbed by them near Naples, in the Village of Pomigliano d'Arco, and made his Escape by a Miracle. But the most troublesome of them all was the famous Abbot Cesare Riccardo, who after having murdered D. Alessandro Mastrillo, Duke of S. Paolo, with his Gang went about plundering the Neighbourhood of Nola, and even to the Gates of Naples: He robbed the Posts, frequently burning the Letters, not sparing those of the Viceroy: He came in and went out of Naples in Disguise; and he carried his Insolence so far, as to hinder Snow from being brought to Naples, threatening besides, that if the Magistrates did not procure him his Pardon from the Viceroy, he would likewise put a Stop to the carrying in of Corn.

THE Viceroy employed several Means for extirpating them, but none proved so effectual as to suppress them altogether. For which End he made the Counsellor D. Diego di Sorria, Vicar-General of Campagna: He sent some Companies of Spaniards to Abruzzo, to dislodge them out of those Parts: At last he erected a Juncto of Ministers for severely punishing them and their Abettors; but all was to no Purpose, for the regular Troops were of no use in those cragged and inaccessible Places: Some being taken, were hanged, but their Number still increased the more. The Juncto caused some Barons, their Protectors, to be arrested, but after a short Imprisonment, they compounded with the Viceroy for large Sums of Money; so that the Disorders were as great as ever.

THE Viceroy was blamed for this only, that in his Time the Laws had not been put in Execution, and that enormous Crimes had been committed, such as Incest, Peculation, Theft, Perjury, Murder, Duels, and other such shameful Offences, without being so severely punished, as the Guilty deserved; but frequently being Personally present in the Court of the Vicariate, whither sometimes he carried the Vicequeen his Wife with him, he either was too indulgent, or changed corporal Punishments into pecuniary Mulcts; by which Means having made vast Advantage (according to the Computation that was made by the Vulgar, he had made more than 320,000 Ducats by such Compositions) he got the Character of a sordid Minister; and many took Occasion to say, by way of Pun, that he punished the Purfes, but not the Persons.

NEVERTHELESS, the Kingdom was not a little indebted to him, for the general Computation of the Families, which having been begun by the Count of Peniaranda, and afterwards continued by the Cardinal of Arragon, was at last brought to Perfection by him; for he not only caused it to be published, but, from the first Day of January 1669. he began to bring it into Practice. The Corporations of the Kingdom were exceedingly eased by it; for they were obliged to pay Tax for no more Families than there really were; and all the Arrears were remitted them, which they owed to the King and those to whom the Revenues had been assigned, being content not only to remit the said Arrears, but likewise to bear the Loss of Twenty-two Ducats and One tenth upon every hundred Ducats of Revenue, which was necessary to be defalked, by reason that this Computation was about 100,000 Families less than the former. By this Means the Corporations of the Kingdom began to recover themselves, and consequently to be more ready to pay the Taxes, to the no small Advantage of the King and the Assignees. To this was added the Increase of the Revenue arising from Tobacco, which, from 45,000 Ducats a Year, at this Time amounted to 80,000, and that of Manna, which having been sold to particular Persons, the Viceroy redeemed it, and annexed it to the Royal Patrimony. In short, all the Revenues, Taxes and Customs were considerably augmented, to the great Advantage of all the Assignees, it being computed by Giovanni d'Alesio, Accomptant of the Royal Chamber of Accompts, that the Increase amounted to little less than nine Millions of Ducats: To which the Viceroy's Vigilance, and the Rigour which he exercised against those who committed Frauds in the Payment, contributed not a little.

S E C T. I.

D. Frederico de Toledo, Marquis of Villafranca, is left Lieutenant of the Kingdom, when the Viceroy went to Rome to pay Obedience to the new Pope.

THE Queen Regent, according to the Custom introduced by the Court of Spain, had ordered the Viceroy to go to Rome, in the King's and her own Name to pay Obedience to the new Pope, Clement IX. but he dying suddenly, before it could be performed, he had Orders to do it to Clement X. his Successor. At the same time the Queen had appointed the Marquis of Villafranca, who was then Captain-General of the Gallies, to govern the Kingdom in the Viceroy's Absence. It was disputed in the Collateral Council, whether the Marquis should be treated as Viceroy, or only as Lieutenant, seeing the Viceroy had Orders from Court, as soon as his Embassy was over, to return to his Government; but it was said for the Marquis, that he having a Royal Commission, ought to be reputed as true and independent Viceroy, therefore it was decided in his Favour. On the 3d of January this Year 1671. D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon having left Naples, the Marquis, in Presence of the Magistrates of the City, took Possession of the Office, and, seeing D. Pedro's Wife was in Possession of the Royal Palace, he chose that of the Prince of Stigliano, near the Gate of Chiaja, for his Habitation.

THE Marquis, following the Footsteps of his Great Grandfather, who had been Viceroy for the Space of 22 Years, governed the Kingdom with great Rigour and indefatigable Application; but his Government lasted only to the 25th of February, for D. Pedro being arrived in Rome, made what haste he could in performing his Commission, and on the 22d of January having made his publick Entry, the Day following, accompanied by the Marquis of Astorga, who was then his Catholick Majesty's Ambassador in Rome, he performed the Ceremony of kissing the Pope's Foot; and, after having spent some few Days more in that City in Entertainments and Visits, he returned to Naples to resume his Government, not well pleased with Villafranca's rigorous Behaviour, which ill suited with his courteous and indulgent Temper. The Marquis of Villafranca remained in Naples till the Month of July, and then set out for the Court of Spain, and upon his Arrival having represented D. Pedro's Avarice and Thirst after Money to be such, that when he went to Rome, he left not one Farthing in the military Chest, it was thought, the Ministers were thereby induced to remove him from the Government. Many Months had not passed, when he heard that he was to be succeeded by the Marquis of Astorga, who being Ambassador in Rome, in the Beginning of the Year 1672. set out for the Kingdom, and on the 11th of February arrived at Naples, where he was received with great Marks of Respect by D. Pedro, who, after having paid the wonted Visits, on the 14th of the same Month yielded up the Government, and, with the Dutches his Wife, went immediately to Pozzuolo, from whence, on the 25th of the same Month, he set out with four Gallies for Spain.

DON Pedro of Arragon ought to be reckoned amongst the Viceroys who have left us the most remarkable Monuments. Out of his great Inclination for Building, he adorned Naples with many Edifices. He put the Hospital of S. Januarius, without the Walls of the City, into that stately Form which we now see, by enlarging it with many Galleries and Apartments, and giving it a settled Government. He laid out a vast Sum of Money in building the Harbour for the Gallies, and he enlarged the Arsenal. He made that magnificent Street, adorned with Fountains, that leads up from the Arsenal to the Royal Palace, at the Top of which Street he caused the Statue of the God Terminus to be erected, which supports the Skin and Wings of a great Eagle. He beautified the Royal Palace, and added to the Foot of that stately Stair, built by the Count D'Oniate, the two Statues of the Rivers Ebro and Tagus, and over the Gate, which leads to the old Palace, that of the River Arga. He joined the Royal Armoury of Castelnuovo to the great Hall. He repaired the Spanish Barracks, and built from the Foundation, that vast Edifice for the Garison, capable to lodge 6000 Soldiers. He likewise repaired the publick Fountains of Poggioreale and S. Catarina a Formello, and many others, and he raised from the Foundation that of Monte Oliveto. He restored the Use of the Baths of the Mineral Waters, without the Grotto of Coccejus, and of those of Pozzuolo and Baja; and to preserve their Memory, he caused their Virtues and Efficacy, in curing Diseases, to be engraven upon Marble; whence Sebastiano Bartoli, a famous Physician of these Times, took Occasion to search more narrowly into the Quality of these Waters, and to write a particular Treatise upon them. In fine, he put our Tribunals into better Order, enlarging the Council Hall, those of the Vicariate and Royal Chamber of Accompts, in which last, by the Advice of Niccoli Toppi, the Master of the Rolls, he resettled the Archives, and whose Care this Writer¹ much commends, saying, that he was thrice to see them, and caused three new Rooms to be made, and a general Index to be begun of all the Writings, which were above Three thousand in Number, and he appointed a Salary for five Clerks, who were punctually paid every Month, that the Work might be finished. He also augmented the Salary of the Judges of the Vicariate, and he made sundry other Regulations about the equal Distribution of Causes, in order to shorten Law-Suits, and the Litigiousness of Parties.

BUT though this Viceroy left us such notable Memorials of himself, yet, on the other Hand, he robbed us of many famous Monuments. He took from us the Bones of the magnanimous King Alphonfus I. which, as we have related in the XXVIth Book of this History, had been deposited in the Vestry of S. Dominico Maggiore of Naples, whither King Alphonfus II. caused them to be transported from Castel dell'Uovo, when his Father was buried there. In the Year 1506. that Vestry happening to take Fire, a great Part of them was consumed, but the Scull and some few Bones escaped the Flames: By Order of Ferdinand the Catholick, the Scull was delivered to the Bishop of Cesalu, who carried it to Spain; the Bones only were left here, which coming to the Knowledge of D. Pedro, he undertook to carry them to Spain likewise, and put them in the same Place with the Scull. The Monks of that Convent opposed him, but the Queen Regent, at the Instance of the Viceroy, having sent a particular Order for transporting them to Spain, the Dispute ended, and the Monks, by a publick Instrument, delivered them to the Viceroy. In order to set off his Gallery in Madrid, he robbed us of many famous Pictures and Statues; among the rest those of the four Rivers, which adorned the Fountain on the Point of the Mole; that of Venus, which lay in the Fountain upon the Edge of the Ditch of Castelnuovo, and some small Statues and Steps of Marble, all of one Piece, which were placed upon the Fountain Medina, and cut by the famous Giovanni di Nola, all which were sent to Spain.

DURING his Government many provident and prudent Laws, to the Number of near 30, were established, whereby he put the Tribunals in good Order, reformed many Abuses in the Custom-Houses, and made other Regulations, which were set down in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

C H A P. III.

The Government of D. Antonio Alvares, Marquis of Astorga, which proved very troublesome and unfortunate, by the Disorders into which the Kingdom was involved, and much more so, by the Revolutions that happened in Messina.

UPON the Marquis of Astorga's Arrival in Naples, he found the City not only afflicted with a great Scarcity of Corn, but quite ruined by continual Crimes, and especially Robbery, which was committed in all Corners. Therefore he used all Means possible for bringing into Naples, not only from the Provinces, but from remote Countries, great Store of Provisions, insomuch that he supplied the Necessities of the People, and restored Plenty in the Kingdom. But though he exercised the utmost Severity, it was not possible (so wicked were Men grown, by the Looseness of Discipline in the preceding Government) to extirpate Robbery, and much less to put a Stop to the continual Depredations of the Banditi in the Country. They made Incursions to the very Gates of Naples: They robbed the Posts, pillaged the Villages, and committed innumerable Murders, Robberies and Rapes in the Country, and with great Boldness incamping in the Fields, they were constantly getting Followers, and increasing their Number. The Viceroy making use of the wonted Remedies, gave new Strength to the Governors of the Provinces, charging them strictly to give a helping Hand, and to make it their chief Care to root them out. A great Slaughter was made of them; and it was of no small Advantage, that the most profligate of their Heads, the famous Abbot Cesare, was killed. But for all that, like so many Hydras, others started up in their Places, and especially in Abruzzo, whither the Viceroy was forced to send five Companies of Spaniards, not only to curb their Insolence, but, suspecting that they might have been encouraged from Rome by the French Ambassador, likewise to guard against all Novelties, which, under such Protection, these Villains might attempt. But by the Revolt that happened soon after in Messina, the Kingdom got rid of a great many of them, whom the Viceroy pardoned, upon Condition that they should go to serve the King in Sicily, where they gave Proof of their Courage, whereby, in a great measure, they made Amends for their former Crimes. The rest that remained in the Kingdom, still multiplying, continued obstinate; for Heaven had reserved the total Extirpation of so mischievous a Breed to a more expert and illustrious Hand.

THESE were not the only Disorders, which rendered the Marquis's Government troublesome; for to the Straits to which the Kingdom was reduced, by Famine, Robbery, and these Rascality, another more vexatious Misfortune was added, which was the wretched State of the Coin, at this Time reduced to less than the fourth Part of its first Value. The Origin of this Evil was old, and the same, which occasioned the crying down of the Zannette; in the Government of Cardinal Zappatta; by whom, though new Money was ordered to be coined, and severe Punishments inflicted upon those who had the Boldness to clip or counterfeit it, yet the Greediness of Gain overcame the severest Punishment whatsoever. The Number of Clippers and false Coiners was such, that even in the Houses of Persons of Quality Clippings and Instruments for Coining were found; and it was said, that Women of no mean Condition, had likewise a Hand in that Practice. A whole

Gang

Gang of them was discovered in Naples, and in the Province of Terra d'Otranto a vast Number were impeached. The Viceroy did his utmost to root them out, many being discovered, were hanged, some suffered long Imprisonment, and others were pardoned, which gave a Handle to Detractors to affirm, that their Lives had been saved, but not their Purfes. Others again withdrew themselves from the deserved Punishment, some having recourse to the Privilege of the Clergy, some to the Immunity of the Churches, and others to flight. In order to put a Stop to so great a Mischief, the Viceroy began to think of coining new Money, which should not be liable to be counterfeited or clipped. The Matter was taken into Deliberation, and much Reasoning was spent about it, but all to no Purpose, for the Glory of so bold an Undertaking was likewise reserved to a more fortunate Hero.

THE Turks must likewise have their Share in disturbing the Marquis's Government; for scouring the Seas of the Kingdom, they landed in the Province of Bari, where, in the Month of June this Year 1672. they made Slaves of 150 poor Country People, who were reaping their Corn. And in the Month of August seven Gallies of Biserta appeared in the Gulph of Salerno, taking and destroying our Ships. The Year following they did great Damage on the Coast of Puglia, especially in the Village of S. Nicandro, from whence they carried off many People into Slavery; so that in order to repel their Insults, the Viceroy was forced to send thither three Troops of Horse, and to order the Squadron of our Gallies to cruize in the Seas of the Kingdom.

S E C T. I.

Great Subsidies are raised in the Kingdom on account of the Revolt of Messina.

BUT at this Time much greater and more grievous Cares came upon the Viceroy, and heavy Taxes and Fears upon the Kingdom. This Year the Kings of France and England, in Conjunction with the Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Munster, had declared War against the States-General of the United Provinces, and though they had got the better of the Fleets of England and France, yet the Armies of the Confederates made themselves Masters of the Provinces of Utrecht, Gelderland, and Overysfel, with a Part of Frizeland. Whereupon the Count of Monterey, Governor of the Spanish Flanders, took Occasion to put Spanish Garisons into the Dutch Towns; and the Emperor Leopold, with the Elector of Brandenburg, to send an Army into the States of Cologne and Munster, in order to oblige those Princes to observe the Peace of Cleves. But though the French, by having taken Possession of Mark and the Dutchy of Cleves, belonging to the Elector of Brandenburg, and sent the Marshal De Turenne into Franconia, had forced that Elector to lay down his Arms, they could by no means hinder many Princes of Germany to join with the Emperor and the Dutch for the Defence of their own Dominions.

THE Spaniards, not able to bear the Conquests of the French upon the States of Holland, much less upon the Empire, resolved likewise to enter into this Alliance, and having declared War against France, they gave the King of England to understand, that if he did not break his Alliance with the King of France, they would do the same by him; and having interposed as Mediators, they managed Matters so, that a Peace was concluded between the English and the Dutch. Thus the French, being obliged to make Head against the Imperial Army, which had advanced to the Borders of Flanders, abandoned all the Towns belonging to the Dutch, except Mastricht and the Grave, which last was forced by the Prince of Orange to surrender upon honourable Terms. Thus came the whole War to fall upon the Spanish Flanders, and the Countries situate on both Sides of the Rhine, which lasted many Years.

IN the Month of December this Year 1673. War having been declared against France in Naples, and a Proclamation published, ordering all the French to depart the Kingdom within a few Days, our Viceroy began to have troublesome Work upon his Hands; for this War being declared, lest the French should make a new Attempt upon the Principality of Catalonia, he was ordered to send Succours for the Defence of that State; so that he was obliged to send thither four Ships with 1200 Neapolitan Foot, under the Command of Colonel D. Giovan-Battista Pignatelli: And the Army of Catalonia still wanting to be reinforced, in the Month of March 1674. other 1500 were sent, under the Command of Major-General D. Antonio Guindazzo; and in the Month of June, other 500 were sent on board of five Gallies. But the Insurrections that happened in the City of Messina, which occasioned one of the most obstinate Wars that ever was heard of, put a Stop to the sending of any more Succours to Catalonia, and forced the Viceroy to send from our Kingdom much greater and more frequent to Sicily; so that we were obliged to be at the Charges of this cruel and obstinate War.

THE Messinese boasting of their most antient Privileges, Exemption, and other Prerogatives, in the Reign of King Philip IV. were made much more insolent, because that having been steady and constant in their Loyalty during the preceding Tumults of Palermo and Naples, King Philip not only confirmed their antient, but gave them new Favours and Pre-eminencies. By these Concessions that People enjoyed a Liberty, in a manner absolute; and it was allowed them by the Spaniards, because they considered, that that Freedom which they frequently took in defending their Privileges, did not proceed from a Contempt of the King's Sovereignty and Service, but from a certain Vanity, which they had of being singular amongst the other Subjects of the Crown of Spain. They elected out of their own Body the publick Magistracy, which they call Senate, with full Authority to command, and a Power to administer the publick Revenues of the City, and to distribute the inferior Offices: They had absolute Authority over the Citizens, and were always ready to resist, even their own Viceroys, whenever they thought, that any Thing was attempted, contrary to their so much boasted Privileges.

IN the Government of the Count of Ayala they complained, first, That that Viceroy had never resided in Messina: That he had imprisoned some People unjustly; and in fine, there was no Act of his, but what they interpreted as a Breach of their Privileges; and if they had kept within the Bounds of complaining, it would have been tolerable; but they proceeded to notorious Crimes, in declaring the Statutes made by that Viceroy null, as prejudicial to their Privileges, and in lifting Soldiers in Defence of them. They continued to treat D. Francesco Gaetano, Duke of Sermoneta, Ayala's Successor, after the same manner; for he having gone to Messina, they forced him to publish an Edict, prohibiting the Exportation of Silk from any Port of that Island, excepting from that of their own City. But the other Cities of the Kingdom having complained of that, the Execution of the Edict was superseded by the Court of Spain; so that they resolved to send two Ambassadors to Madrid for obtaining a Revocation of the Supersedeas. These pretended to be treated in their Audience as all the other Ambassadors of Princes were: That a certain Day should be appointed for it: That the Introducer of Ambassadors should accompany them; and that on the Day of Audience the King's Coaches should be sent to carry them to the Court. They alledged many Instances of their being treated so in the Time of King Philip IV. but the Queen Regent by no means would grant them that Ceremony; for it not only did not appear that it had been granted them with the Knowledge of the King her Husband, but on the contrary, that he had expressly ordained, that all the Ambassadors of the Kingdoms and Cities subject to the Crown of Spain, should enjoy the bare Title, but not the Privileges of Ambassadors. Therefore, that they might not prejudice themselves, having, with a new Memorial, given in a Protestation, they returned to Messina, without executing their Commission.

THE Messinese, provoked at this Rebuff, began to commit many Insolencies; and in the mean time the Duke of Sermoneta being succeeded in the Government of that Island by the Duke of Alburquerque, who shortly after being succeeded by the Prince of Ligni, the Disorders and Confusions increased, and at last ended in Factions, whence arose the Names of Merli *, which the Royalists took, and of Malvizzi †, which those of the opposite Party assumed, whereby the Messinese were reduced to a State, no less lamentable, than that to which formerly almost all Italy was reduced by the Factions of the Bianchi and the Neri, and of the Guelfs and Ghibellins.

BUT in the Government of the Marquis of Bayona, the Prince of Ligni's Successor, D. Diego di Soria, Marquis of Crispano, being Governor of Messina, the Factions, which kept it in the utmost Confusion, turned to open Rebellion; for in the Month of June this Year 1674. while the Messinese, with great Pomp and Solemnity, were celebrating the Festival of our Lady, under the Title of Lettera, on account of a Letter, which they believe she wrote to the Senate of Messina, wherein she assured them of the Protection of her Son Jesus; some mysterious Pictures were seen in a Taylor's Shop, which alluding to the present Transactions, represented the Faction of the Merli in a ridiculous Manner, not sparing even the Governor Soria. The Merli being apprized of this, threatening to blow up both the Taylor and his Shop, they were for taking to their Arms immediately, if the Governor had not run quickly to stop them. But the Taylor being afterwards imprisoned, the Malvizzi were so exasperated, that a great Number of them gathered together in Arms, in order, with open Force, to set him at Liberty, and then to put to the Sword all the Merli, and all those that favoured the King's Party. At the Sound of a Bell, the City, in an instant, was all in an Uproar, the Malvizzi possessed themselves of the most eminent Posts, slaughtered the Merli; and their Number increasing to Twenty thousand, they forced the Spanish Soldiers, who had hastened to quell the Tumult, to retire to the Royal Palace, in which they found it convenient to shut themselves up, and defend it the best Way they could; and to disturb the Siege of the Palace, the Governor ordered the Commanders of the Forts to fire Cannon against the City.

ON the other Hand, the Senators having openly declared for the Malvizzi, and preparing for the Siege of the Palace, fortified the Posts, and laid close Siege to the Governor. The Marquis of Bayona, the Viceroy, hastened to his Relief, but he was shut out of the City, and, by Cannon Shot, forced to retire to the Bay of Catana, and from thence to Melazzo. Then it was thought in good Earnest, that in order to reduce Messina, it would be necessary to besiege it in due Form; therefore the Marquis having pitched upon the City of Melazzo for a Place of Arms, assembled there the whole Troops of the Island: He summoned the Barons of the Kingdom, who appeared there with a good Body of Militia, raised at their own Charges; and it was resolved, not only to relieve the Governor and the Royal Forts of Messina, but likewise to block up the Passes of Teormina, to cut off the Communication of the Messinese with the rest of the Island, and reduce them to their Duty, both by Force and Famine.

OUR Viceroy was invited to take a Share in this Undertaking, with which complying, he appointed the City of Reggio to be the Place of Arms, whither he ordered a strong Body of the Troops of the Kingdom to march, under the Command of General D. Marc' Antonio di Gennaro, with Orders to pass over to the Island, whenever the Marquis of Bayona should think fit. He afterwards sent two Gallies to Melazzo with 400 Spanish Foot; and he caused the like Number of Italians to be embarked in one Ship and two Tartanes, with Ammunition and Provisions; and the Squadrons of Spanish Gallies not being in our Seas, those of the Republick of Genoa, and the Knights of Malta, were employed in the King's Service.

THE Messinese, foreseeing that of themselves they were not able to withstand so many, from Mutiny proceeded to open Rebellion, resolving to have recourse to the King of France for Assistance and Protection; and in the mean time amusing the Marquis of Bayona with Negotiations and Treaties, without concluding any thing, they sent D. Antonio Casaro to Rome to treat with the Duke D'Etré, the French Ambassador there, about uniting their Island to the French Dominions, and inducing the King to send them speedy and powerful Succours. The Duke, and the Cardinal D'Etré his Brother, not having any particular Instructions about this Matter from their Prince, and Casaro not having sufficient Power to perform what he offered, in order not to lose Time, resolved to send Casaro himself to France, that he might represent the State of Messina to the King, and persuade him to send them Relief, and they gave him Letters directed to the Duke of Vivonne, Vice-Admiral of France in the Mediterranean, who was then residing in Toulon. The Sentiments of the Court of France about engaging in this Undertaking, were different; some, mindful of the famous Sicilian Vespers, and of the Aversion which the Sicilians have to the French Nation, were against it: Others persuaded the King not to neglect it, because it would be of great Use in the War, which was then very hot between the two Crowns, and at least would occasion a great Diversion to the Spanish Arms. At last a Medium was resolved upon, to order the Duke of Vivonne to assist the Messinese, but before he should sail with the whole Fleet, to send a Squadron with with Relief, and at the same time confirm the Messinese in their Rebellion, in order to give the Spaniards a Diversion, and get a true Information of the State of Affairs, that then it might be more maturely considered what was fit to be done.

ON the other Hand, upon the Arrival of Advice at the Court of Spain of the Revolt of Messina, it was resolved, to use all Means, not only to reduce it by Force of Arms, but by an amicable Agreement, shewing Indulgence, and promising Pardon. But at the same time it was determined, that before Assistance could be sent to it from France (in case the Messinese should not embrace the Royal Clemency) to employ the whole Naval Force in reducing it. Therefore the Queen Regent granted them a general Indemnity, which was sent to the Marquis of Bayona, to be published in the Island; and the Marquis Del Viso was ordered to take the Command of the Spanish Gallies, and both he and D. Melchior della Queva, General of the Fleet, were commanded to join and sail with the Gallies and Men of War to the Coast of Sicily.

BUT both the one and the other Expedient proved unsuccessful; for the Messinese, grown insolent by the promised Assistance from France, and much more bold by having had the better in some Skirmishes, rejected the Indemnity which had been published in Melazzo: On the contrary, the General of the Gallies of Malta having sent Captain D. Francesco Antonio Dattilo, Marquis of Caterina, the Son of the renowned Colonel Roberto Dattilo, to carry their Pardon to them, with Letters assuring them, that it should be faithfully put in Execution; they not only slighted the Message, but made the Marquis Prisoner, and shut him up in a Dungeon.

UPON these unfortunate Advices, the Court of Spain resolved to change the Governor of that Island, and ordered the Marquis of Villafranca immediately to go and take the Government of it upon him; and at the same time the Marquis Del Viso, and D. Melchior della Queva, who had joined the Fleets in the Harbour of Barcelona, had Orders to sail in all haste to the Relief of that Kingdom. The General set sail with the Men of War on the 18th of September this Year 1674. but the Marquis Del Viso, being detained by the Winds, could not sail with the Gallies till the 18th of October, and it was the 5th of November before he could reach Cagliari in the Island of Sardinia; from whence, having on board the Marquis of Villafranca, the Sea being somewhat calmer, on the 10th of December he set sail for Palermo, where he arrived with the Gallies the 12th of the same Month. The new Viceroy having taken Possession of his Government in Palermo, went immediately to Melazzo, in order to be near Messina, whither also the Marquis Del Viso went with the Gallies; and making notable Progress, having taken Possession of the Tower of the Phare, it was resolved to besiege Messina, to cut off its Communication both by Sea and Land, and especially to hinder the French from sending any Relief to it; for which End, the General of the Fleet cast Anchor, with the greatest Part of the Men of War, in S. John's Channel, that all the Ships being in Sight of the City, it might give the greater Life to the Undertaking.

BUT while Things were so disposed, as gave Hopes of reducing the City in a few Days, on the first Day of January this new Year 1675. six French Men of War, with four Fire-Ships and some Tartans, were discovered steering towards Messina, with a Design to enter the Harbour. This was the Squadron sent by the Duke of Vivonne, which being commanded by Commadore Valbel, who had but just sailed from Toulon, was coming, by Stealth, to land a Reinforcement, at a Time, when the Spanish Fleet, either by reason of a Storm, or some other Occasion, should not be able to hinder it; nor had there been the least Notice of this Squadron, for all Advices mentioned the Royal Succour which was preparing by the Duke of Vivonne, who knew very well, that if he had waited till so great a Number of Ships had been fitted out, it would have been too late. Valbel having stood in near to Messina, suspecting that the Spaniards were in Possession of the Tower of the Phare, and having had notice, that the City was upon the Point of surrendring, though that very Day he might have got in to Messina without Opposition, for the Wind being favourable for him, hindered the Enemy's Fleet from coming out of S. John's Channel, yet he would not venture, for fear of being betrayed by the Messinese. But, whether it really was, that by reason of the contrary Winds, the Fleet, notwithstanding that all human Art was made use of, could not get out of that tempestuous Channel, to a Station where it could have prevented the Relief from getting in;

in; or really a Dispute amongst the Generals about the Command, or their Negligence, of which they were afterwards accused: the third Day Valbel being well assured, that the Messinese were obstinate, at last resolved to enter the Harbour, and on the 3d Day of January passed by in Sight of the Enemy's Fleet, without their being able to make the least Opposition.

HOWEVER, this Succour was not such, as ought to have made the Spaniards despair of the Undertaking. But the Messinese, became more bold, and, on the contrary, the commanding Officers of the Posts that had been possessed, struck with Fear, without waiting to be driven out by the Enemy, deserted them, whereby the Occasion was lost of being able, at that Time, to reduce the City by Force of Arms: Nevertheless the Spaniards were not discouraged, foreseeing, that by the Scarcity of Provisions the City would be reduced to its former Straits; therefore they were very careful to hinder any from being carried in by Sea. But while they were flattering themselves with these Hopes, the Duke of Vivonne, having Advice of the good Success of his Squadron, and of the Obstinacy of the Messinese, gave the King more certain Hopes of bringing that Kingdom under his Obedience; for which End, having assumed the Title of Viceroy of Messina, he set sail from Toulon with nine Men of War, three Fire-Ships, and eight Vessels loaded with Provisions, and having steered towards Messina, on the 10th of February he came upon the Coast of Sicily. The Spanish Generals, upon Advice of his approaching, joined all their Force to go and meet him, which they did, and on the 11th they engaged, and fought with so much Bravery, that the Battle began at nine a Clock in the Morning, and lasted till Night. But whether it was their Misfortune, or Negligence, or that the Wind changed in Favour of the French, it blew so hard, that their Gallies were forced to retire; so that Valbel was at liberty to go out of the Harbour of Messina with other twelve Ships, which putting the Spaniards in the Middle, they were obliged to fight no longer for Victory, but Life; till towards the Evening they were parted by a Storm, which gave the French an Opportunity next Day to enter into Messina without Opposition.

THESE Misfortunes likewise occasioned that the Gallies of Naples and Sicily, being found of no more Use in these Seas, were ordered to retire, and some of them steering for Melazzo, some for Naples, being overtaken with a Storm, two of them were shipwrecked off Palinurus, and another sunk off Maratea. The Spanish Fleet retired to Naples to repair the Damage they had suffered in the Battle. Many Men were lost in this obstinate War, which our Kingdom was forced to make up; and that not being sufficient, 4500 Germans were brought from Germany, and were no sooner come to Naples, than they fell almost all sick, so that it behoved the Viceroy to provide more Hospitals for them than Quarters; and the Hospitals of the City not being sufficient for them and the Soldiers of the Royal Fleet, new ones were erected in Pozzuolo.

UPON Advice of such unhappy Events, the Court of Spain, blaming the Conduct of the Spanish Generals, in great Wrath, by two Royal Writs, the one dated the 16th of March this Year 1675. occasioned by the Reinforcement that got in to Messina on the 3d of January, the other dated the 10th of May, ordered a Juncto of Ministers, as Royal Delegates, to be Judges of the Faults laid to their Charge. The Marquis of Bayona was accused of not having, by proper Means, which he might have made use of, reduced the Messinese in the Beginning. The Marquis Del Viso, General Della Queva, and Admiral D. Francesco Centeno, were charged with having been able, and not willing, to fight the Reinforcement put into Messina by Valbel. The Marquisses of Bayona and Viso were arrested in Sicily, and some Months after brought to Naples. Our Viceroy had Orders to arrest General Della Queva and the Admiral, and having quickly put his Orders in Execution, the first was sent to the Citadel of Gaeta, and the other to the Castle of Ischia. The Prince of Montesarchio was declared General of the Spanish Fleet, and came to Naples to exercise his Office. The Viceroy declared the General of the Artillery, Fr. Gio. Battista Brancaccio, Commander in chief of the Troops in Reggio; and the Marquis of Tufo, who had hitherto possessed that Office, was sent to have the same Command in the Province of Terra d'Otranto. The Juncto began to sit and take Cognizance of the Crimes imputed to those Generals, and the Regent D. Pietro Valero was ordered to examine narrowly into them; whereupon the Marquis Del Viso employed the famous Advocate Francesco d'Andrea to defend his Cause.

IN the mean time the Court of Spain was very pressing with the Viceroy to undertake a new Expedition for the Reduction of Messina; but it was in vain to expect it could be done, while the French were Masters of the Seas. Therefore it behoved him to think of refitting the Fleet, and, at the same time, of augmenting the Land-Forces of Sicily. However Money was wanting, and our Kingdom alone was obliged to furnish it; so that the Marquis of Astorga was put to hard Shifts in raising it. He exposed to Sale the Revenues of the Customs and Taxes, and sold them at a very low Rate, whereby many private Families became exceeding rich. The eminent Office of Auditor of the Exchequer, which had been exercised by D. Andrea Concublet, Marquis of Arena, being vacant by his Death, in the Month of June this Year 1675. was sold in a Hurry, for three Lives, to D. Emanuel Pinto Mendozza, for 46,000 Ducats; but the Sale not being approved of by the King, in order to obtain the Royal Assent, he was obliged to pay a thousand Pieces of Eight, besides other Charges which the King ordered to be paid to the Court of Madrid. The Viceroy likewise demanded of the Barons a Supply of Horsemen, armed and mounted at their Charges, which each of them furnished in Money according to their Abilities. And lastly, he took the third Part of the Revenues which Foreigners possessed in the Kingdom, for one Year. With this Money they began to refit the Fleet, for manning of which he brought 400 Seamen from Ragusi. But the Charges of refitting the Fleet being great, and a good Part of the Money employed to other Uses, the Work went on heavily; therefore the People, who saw the Royal Revenues alienated in a Hurry, and did not see the King's Service carried on with the same Care, grumbled at the Viceroy: The Soldiers complained that they were not paid. 'Tis not to be doubted, but the Charges and Succours that went out of this Kingdom for the War of Messina, under the Government of the Marquis of Astorga, were considerable, and of vast Importance: New Troops both of Foot and Horse were raised: The Militia of the Kingdom were ordered to march: 4500 Germans were brought from Germany, and all were sent either to Melazzo, Reggio, and other Places of Calabria, from whence they were transported to Sicily as Occasion required. Reggio, Melazzo, and Scaletta were provided with Ammunition and Provisions: Immense Sums of Money were furnished, not only for paying the Soldiers that guarded the Frontiers of the Kingdom, but likewise the Army in the Field and Garisons of Sicily. In fine, the Spanish Fleet was refitted, and the Crews were paid their Wages, which came to above 600,000 Ducats.

IN the mean time the Marshal Vivonne having reduced Messina under the Dominion of his Sovereign, and made himself Master of the Sea, was thinking of extending his Conquests over other Cities of that Island; but having made a Trial, he found the People steady and firm in their Loyalty to their own Prince, and ready to oppose him with great Intrepidity and Constancy. It behoved him to provide Messina with Provisions from remote Parts, and even to send for them to France, because the Spaniards had cut off all Communication by Land; and the Fleet, which was sitting out in Naples, disquieted him much, seeing, that the Spaniards were still resolved to do their utmost, in order to reduce that City. Therefore, after having scoured the Coast of Palermo with his Fleet, and in vain made Attempts upon the maritime Places of the Island, he stood for the Coast of Naples, with a Design to burn the Spanish Fleet, which was still in our Harbour; but having appeared in our Gulph in the Month of July this Year 1675: the Citizens were immediately up in Arms, and the most important Posts being well fortified, he was obliged to return to Messina, having only taken some Barks which had unluckily fallen in his Way.

THE Fleet being now refitted, with all Necessaries provided, and the Seamen and Soldiers paid, while the Viceroy was hastening its Departure, and the Prince of Montefarchio, the General, had actually got it under Sail, on the 9th of September this same Year, some Ships came into our Harbour, which unexpectedly had brought from Sardinia the Marquis De los Velez, to be our Viceroy. A Report spread Abroad, that the Marquis of Astorga, and his favourite Ministers, had made vast Profit by this War, and that the Expeditions went heavily on, because the greatest Part of the Money had been applied to other Uses, had reached the Court of Spain. That Court, which had nothing so much at Heart, as the Reduction of Messina, and the Marquis of Astorga having governed three Years complete, resolved to send the Marquis De los Velez to be his Successor, who being then Viceroy of Sardinia, favoured likewise by the Queen-Regent, by the continual Recommendations of his Mother, who was her first Lady of the Bed-Chamber, was thought capable to support the Weight, not only of the Government of the Kingdom, but of the War of Sicily. Therefore Astorga thought fit, upon the Arrival of his Successor, to surrender the Government, and retire to the Cbaja, where he remained till the 13th of October, when he set out for the Court of Spain, there to exercise his Offices of Counsellor of State, and General of the Artillery of Spain. The Marquis of Astorga left us seven Statutes, which are set down in the often-mentioned Chronology.

CHAP. IV.

The Marquis De los Velez, the new Viceroy, continues to send Succours for the Reduction of Messina, which, being at last abandoned by the French, returns under the King's Obedience.

THE Expectation with which D. Fernando Faxardo, Marquis De los Velez, was received, and the Hopes conceived, that by his Government the Kingdom was to be eased of the Burden of so troublesome and tedious a War, which had impoverished it much more than the former Misfortunes, run high in the Minds of every Body. It was expected, that for the future the Money would be employed to better Purpose, and consequently stronger Efforts made for putting an End to the War of Sicily: That the French would be driven out, the Rebels subdued, Tranquillity restored in that Island, and, which was of the greatest Importance, our Kingdom freed, not only from the Charges of sending thither continual Reinforcements, but from the Fear of Invasions and Insults; for the French, not content with stirring up Sedition in that Island, were endeavouring to do the same in our Kingdom, by a constant Correspondence with the Bandits of Calabria. Nor did the French Ambassador residing at the Court of Rome, neglect, by secret Practices, and private Commissions, for the most part to the Monks, to sound the Minds of the People, and disperse Manifesto's, encouraging them to follow the Example of the Messinese. Therefore the Marquis De los Velez was obliged to appoint a Meeting of Judges, called Giunta degl' Inconfidenti, who discovered many of the Disaffected; of which, according as they were accused, some were imprisoned, some banished the Kingdom, and others hang'd.

IN the mean, the Queen-Regent pressing the Reduction of Messina, and at the same time threatening rigorously to punish the Spanish Generals, urging therefore the Regent Valero to send the Processes, which had been carried on against them, to Court, our Viceroy was forced to think of sending, in all haste, powerful Succours for that Expedition. Therefore exaggerating to the Nobility and Commonalty of Naples the urgent Occasions, he got them to give the King a Donative of 200,000 Ducats, one Part of which was raised by the voluntary Contribution of the Citizens, and the rest out of the Salaries of the Judges Delegates, and of those who had the Management of the Revenues. And in this manner was the War of Sicily supported, whither from time to time were sent, not only Supplies of Ammunition and Men, but of ready Money every Month for paying the Army.

BUT the greatest Hopes of turning the French out of that Island, were grounded upon the coming of D. John of Austria, who having been declared by the Queen-Regent, Regent, the King's Vicar-General in Italy, was hourly expected with a Squadron of Dutch Men of War. At last, on the 30th of November this Year 1675. the Dutch Fleet, consisting of 18 Men of War, and six Fire-Ships, arrived at Naples, commanded by Admiral Ruiter, but D. John, by secret Orders from the King, being recall'd to Court, did not come. The Arrival of this Fleet much encouraged the Spanish Generals to undertake the Expedition, and Messina being now blocked up on all Sides, and the Besieged, sensible that the French, at the long Run, would not be able to hold out, began to mutter, that it was impossible for the French to keep Possession of Messina, and that the combined Fleets of Spain and Holland would certainly take it. They began likewise to be persuaded, that the King of France, not being able to conquer the whole Kingdom, had no Thoughts of keeping it, but only to give the Spaniards, with whom he was fighting in the Low Countries, a Diversion; and that therefore he sent them such Succours as were able to keep up this War in Italy, but not to free the City of Messina from the Straits to which it was reduced by the Spanish Troops. These Whisperings highly displeased the French, insomuch that in the Beginning of the Year 1676. they pushed on the War with greater Fury, and made new Attempts upon Palermo and other Places, but still with bad Success.

MEAN while the Marquis of Villafranca having gone for Spain, and the Marquis De Castel-Rodrigo, the Son of the Duke of Medina de las Torres, by D. Anna Caraffa, Princess of Stigliano, a Youth of about 35 Years of Age, being appointed Viceroy of that Island, and who, in the Wars of Portugal and Catalonia, had given Proofs of great Courage and Resolution, renewed the War with greater Vigour, and during this whole Year, and the Beginning of the following, he fought the French gallantly, so that the Messinese were in a desperate Condition. But in the Month of April this Year 1677. he dying of a Cholick, had not the Pleasure, with his own Hands, to put an End to the glorious Expedition. Before he died he committed the Administration of the Affairs of the Kingdom to the Marchioness his Wife, and the Command of the Troops to the Count of Sartirana, Colonel-General, till such time as the King should appoint a new Viceroy. But the King, by a private Letter, having ordered, in case the Marquis Del Castel-Rodrigo, by any Accident, should happen to die, the Cardinal Portocarrero, who was then in Rome, to take upon him the Government of that Island, the Cardinal immediately left Rome, and went to Gaeta, where having embarked on the 10th of May, he arrived safely in Palermo.

THE War was carried on all this Year with no less Heat than Intrepidity; but in the mean time there happened frequent and troublesome Tumults in Messina, not only on account of the Insolence of the French Soldiers, but of the Rumours spread Abroad amongst the People, that the French at last designed to pillage the City, and leave the Inhabitants to the Discretion of the Spaniards. Nor were the Rumours without Ground, for it had been already determined in the Council of France to abandon the Messinese; and it being a Secret from whence such a Resolution had proceeded, many took Occasion to pry into the Causes of it. Some attributed it to the immense Charges which France was at in transporting the Troops to Sicily, and much more in maintaining them there; and all Sorts of Provisions being wanting in Messina, they were obliged to carry them thither from distant Countries, not only for the Use of the Troops, but of the Citizens. It was computed, that of 20,000 Soldiers transported at different times into that Island, scarce the fourth Part was remaining, and all the rest were either dead of Fatigue or Diseases, or had fled, that they might not be exposed to Famine. That if they resolved to continue the War, new Squadrons must be sent to Sicily, seeing the Spaniards were making vast Preparations in all the Dominions they possessed in Italy. Besides, it behoved the French to maintain a Fleet constantly in these Seas, for keeping open the Passage for Provisions, and making Head against the Spanish Fleet, which would have been very strong, when joined by the Squadron of Men of War which the Dutch were sending to the Mediterranean, under the Command of Vice-Admiral Evertz; and that these Expeditions were vastly prejudicial to the War which the French were carrying on beyond the Alps, where they wanted Troops for reinforcing their Armies, and Ships for augmenting the Fleet, which they were forced to put to Sea, not only to oppose the Confederate Princes, but likewise the King of England, who being solicited by the Parliament, was threatening to join the King of France's Enemies, in order to oblige him to make Peace, upon such Conditions as he pretended to prescribe prescribe to him. It was considered, that France was not able to maintain one Fleet in the Ocean, and another in Sicily, especially at that Time, when the greatest Part of the Arsenal and Ammunition in Toulon, and the Magazines in Marseilles had been consumed by Fire; and when the Count D'Etrè had returned from America very much shattered and diminished in Number, in an Engagement off the Island of Tabago, with the Dutch Vice-Admiral Bink. But above all, it was considered, that France could never find her Account in the War of Sicily, for it had already been found by Experience, that no Sirefs could be laid upon a general Revolt of the Island, which the Messinese had given out; on the contrary, by the Stedfastness and Constancy of the Sicilians in their Loyalty to their Prince, every Inch of Ground had cost the French a Torrent of Blood; and besides it behoved them to have a watchful Eye upon the Messinese themselves, since they had found, that some through Affection for Spain, others through Inconstancy of Temper, and all of them wearied with the Length and Calamities of the War, had left no Stone unturned, in order to be reconciled with the Catholick King. And it was concluded, that it was not possible for the French to hold out both against their bosom and open Enemies, and much less against Famine, which was making a much more cruel War upon them in Messina than the Spaniards.

THESE were the Conjectures then about this Resolution, though there were not wanting some, who judged the Causes to be much more hidden and mysterious, and that Secrets of much greater Importance were concealed. Others believed, that it was a Prelude to the Treaty of Peace, which was concluded in Nimeguen in the Year 1678. Be that as it will, 'tis certain, that this quitting of Messina was resolved upon in the Council of France, long before it was put in Execution. The Marshal De Vivonne, that he might not be obliged to leave the Charge which he thought he had executed with Applause, by an Act of Weakness, was unwilling to be present at the abandoning of the City; so that the King of France appointed the Marshal De la Feuillade in his Place, at the same time that the King of Spain, having named Portocarrero to the Archbishoprick of Toledo, vacant by the Death of the Cardinal of Arragon, the Prince D. Vincenzo Gonzaga, descended of the Dukes of Guastalla, was sent in his Room to govern Sicily, who having arrived at Naples on the 22d of February this Year 1678. on the first of March set sail for Palermo, taking with him a Ship with 500 Neapolitan Foot, followed some Days after with two Ships loaded with Ammunition.

THE Marshal De la Feuillade having arrived in Messina, first giving out, that he was resolved to pursue the War with greater Vigour, began to imbark the French Troops, under pretence of carrying them to besiege Catania and Syracusa; then having sent for the Jurats of the City, he shewed them the King of France's Orders for abandoning Sicily. This News, like a Thunderbolt, struck the Messinese to the very Heart, who, terrified and confounded, were put to their last Shifts: They conjur'd the Marshal to stay, at least till such Time as they had put their Affairs in order. But that being denied them, many, despairing of Pardon, resolved to desert their native Country, and go to France: So many, both of the Nobility and Commonalty, imbarked in the Fleet which steered towards Provence. Thus Messina being deserted by the French, those that remained there gave immediately Advice of it to the Governor of Reggio, who presently went thither, with the Bishop of Squillacè, and some military Officers, and carried with him the Catholick King's Picture, at the Sight of which all the Citizens huzza'd. This happened in the Month of March this Year: Soon after other Officers went thither with a good Body of Troops, and at last the Viceroy, Gonzaga, likewise went, who dealing mercifully with these People, gave them an ample Pardon, and restored them to all their Goods that had not been alienated or sold; but he excluded all those who had rendered themselves unworthy of it by their Flight. He likewise commanded the French Fashion of Cloaths to be laid aside, and all the French Money to be carried to the Mint, in order to be coined with the King's Impression. He did not abolish the Senate, but waited for Orders about that from Court; however he forbade the Citizens to injure or revile one another on account of the late Rebellion; and having sent back all the Troops that were more than sufficient for the Garisons, the Forces likewise retired from Reggio to Naples.

BUT the Court of Spain was not pleased with the mild Treatment the Messinese received from Gonzaga, therefore he was recalled to Madrid to take his Seat in the Council

Council of State, and the Government of the Island was given to the Count of Santistevan, who being then Viceroy of Sardinia, immediately took shipping, and on the 29th of November arrived in Palermo, from whence, on the 5th of January this Year 1679. he went to Messina. The Count, according to his Instructions from Court, abolished the Senate, and changed that Form of Government, ordering, that the Magistracy should be no more called Senators or Jurats, but Eletti (Elects) and confined their Authority to very narrow Bounds. He deprived the Messinese of all their Privileges and Franchises. He caused the Town-House to be demolished, and having ordered the Ground upon which it stood, to be strewed with Salt, he caused a Pyramid to be erected, and upon the Top of it placed the King's Statue, made of the Metal of that very Bell, which formerly was rung for calling the Citizens together. He prohibited all Assemblies, regulated the publick Revenues, the Duties and Taxes; and in fine, according to the Instructions left him by Prince Gonzaga, in order to put a greater Bridle upon these People, he founded a strong and impregnable Citadel, in building of which, the best Engineers and Generals that Spain had in these Times, employed their utmost Skill.

C H A P. V.

The War of Messina being ended, the Marquis De los Velez resettled the Kingdom the best Way he could: His Regulations: His Departure, and the Laws he left us.

HIS cruel and obstinate War so impoverished the Kingdom, by the vast Expences it cost, that it was computed that little less than seven Millions were carried out of it. That the Succours might be ready and quickly dispatched, the Revenues of the Exchequer not being found answerable to the immense Sums that were requisite for lifting Soldiers, furnishing Provisions, Ammunition, Implements of War, and the Pay, as well of the Army in Sicily, as of the Fleet, and the Garisons of Calabria, it was absolutely necessary, not only, in a great Hurry, to sell Offices, but what was worse, the Funds, and at a very low Rate, to the so great Advantage of the Buyers, that all of them reaped vast Profit, and many had above Twenty per Cent. yearly. This having very much diminished the Incomes of the military Chest, many of these Sales were not only disapproved of by the Court of Spain, and the Royal Assent denied, but a Juncto of Ministers was appointed for examining the Sale of the Royal Revenues, Exchequer Payments and the Customs, as a Matter of great Importance. Many Expedients were proposed for remedying the late Disorders; but at last the Viceroy thought fit to make use of such, as were most consonant to Justice and Equity, therefore it was ordered, that all the said Contracts should be regulated according to the Price really paid, so as the Capitals of the Revenues and Customs might be reduced to Cent. per Cent.: The Exchequer Payments of the Province of Terra di Lavoro to Ninety; and those of all the other Provinces to Eighty per Cent. The Remainder was annexed to the Royal Patrimony; to which likewise was added, the Impost of the Jus prohibendi of Brandy, which at this Time amounted to 13,000 Ducats yearly.

THE Exchequer being thus resettled, other no less Disorders were next to be remedied. The Coin, notwithstanding the severe Executions in the late Governments, was daily more and more adulterated. The Severities were renewed by the Marquis, the Prisons and Gallies were filled with False-Coiners: Many of them were hanged; but for all that it was impossible to root them out, and they were so stiffly bent upon Gain, that many of them, who had escaped the Halter, and been condemned to the Oar, continued to coin in the very Gallies. The Contagion had even reached the Cloisters, and the Monks were become great Proficients in that Art. The Goldsmiths adulterated their Work, by putting more Allay in it than the Laws of the Kingdom allow, which proved a great Hindrance to Commerce; for those, who had wrought Silver in their Houses, were not sure that it was worth the Money they had paid for it; and every Body had conceived so bad an Opinion of the Coin, that it began to be no more current; and besides the want of Weight, there were none but took upon them to condemn it as faulty, either in the Coinage or Allay: In short, the very Copper Money was adulterated and counterfeited. The Viceroy set about to remedy such crying Disorders; and he caused Actions to be entered against such Goldsmiths as had sold Gold or Silver that was not according to the Standard: He cried down all Money that was faulty, either in the Coinage or Allay, and ordered it to be consigned in the Hands of Persons appointed for that End in the different Wards of the City; and in the Provinces, in the Hands of the Treasurers, who were to return the Value in good and current Money to the Owners; but notwithstanding this, there happened innumerable Disputes, because some refused, as false Money, what was actually good, and others maintained to be good what was really bad; wherefore, in order to decide such Disputes, the Viceroy was obliged to commit the Decision of them to some Persons of Skill in each Ward. But all these Remedies proved useless, and not answerable to the Greatness of the Mischief. The only Remedy left, was to cry down the old, and coin new Money; but that was a Work that required great Preparation, and many Years. Nevertheless the Marquis did as much, as his calamitous Times would bear, for having no other Shift, he caused Copper Money to be coined, of a Figure so exactly circular, that it served afterwards as a Pattern to the Silver Money coined in the Government of the Marquis Del Carpio his Successor; for which End he repaired and enlarged the Mint, though he knew, that that Undertaking could not be accomplished during his Government.

THE Kingdom was not only discomposed by the Money, but frequently infested by the Banditti; and though they had been very troublesome at other Times, yet they became much more so now, because of the War of Sicily. The Marquis of Astorga had pardoned many of them, upon Condition of going to serve in Sicily; and the Marquis De los Velez had followed his Example, particularly in pardoning those of Calabria, who, by reason of the small Distance, were the most liable to be practised upon by the Enemy. The Design partly succeeded, for those who went, of famous Robbers, became brave Soldiers. But though there was the most diligent Search made after those that remained, and that many of them were put to cruel Deaths, yet it was not possible to extirpate them, or prevent their infesting the Country.

AT his Arrival, the City was in a most dissolute State, by the Confusion which the Sailors belonging to the Fleet, and the Soldiers that came to serve in the War of Sicily occasioned, insomuch that there was nothing but Disorder, and the most heinous Crimes were committed, such as Theft, Sacrilege, Murders, and all manner of Vices. Both the Nobility and Commonalty were used with the utmost Severity, many of them died by the Hands of the Hangman, many of them were strangled privately, others were condemned to the Gallies, and a vast Number pined away in Prison; but these Severities did not avail, for by Intercessions and Supplications, many found means to escape.

THE Magistrates did not behave themselves with that Severity and Integrity which the Laws prescribe, but some, out of Greediness of filthy Lucre, others out of Complaisance, were too favourable. D. John of Austria being declared Prime Minister of the Monarchy, consulted the Good of the Kingdom, and moved by secret Informations, deprived two Counsellors, two Presidents, and four Judges of the Vicariate of their Dignities and Offices, besides some Clerks of the Secretary's Office. These degraded Ministers having complained of being condemned without a Hearing, the Deputies of the City begged of the King, that, according to the Custom introduced by King Philip II. he would be pleased to send a Visitor to proceed against the Guilty in a judicial Manner, that no Room might be left for Passion, Passion, or false Accusations, to which secret Processes were liable. The King complied with the Request, and sent Visitors to all his Dominions in Italy, ordering the Regent Valero to go Visitor to Sicily, and the President D. Francesco Melos, Duke of Parate, to Milan, and the Regent Danesè Casati to go from Milan to be Visitor in Naples. About the End of April 1679. he arrived, and having intimated his Commission, and received many Complaints, with a great deal of Circumspection he proceeded in examining the Causes, and nothing of any Moment was found amiss in the City, excepting, that some small Sums, wrongfully ordered to be paid by some Judges to Persons who had not a just Claim, were returned. All other Things went on smoothly; so that after Casati had staid two Years in Naples, in the Month of April 1681. he set out for Spain, in order to give the King an Account of his Proceedings. By the Event, it was believed, that, in the Report which he made of his Transactions, little or nothing was contained against the eight degraded Ministers; for, in process of Time, five of them were restored, some to the same, others to Offices of greater Authority; and the other three would easily have obtained the same Favour, if one of them had not contented himself with leading a private Life, and the other two were dead.

WHILE these Things were doing in Naples, on the 22d of July 1676. Pope Clement X. died in Rome, and the Cardinals being met in the Conclave, on the 22d of September following, elected Benedetto Livio Odescalchi of Como, Bishop of Novara, who took the Name of Innocent XI. By the Opinion which all the World had of his Integrity and innocent Life and Conversation, the Election was applauded by all the Princes of Europe, and there had not been a Pope in this Century, so much respected by them, as he was; so that the good Offices, which he interposed in promoting Peace among them, were kindly received, and had the desired Effect. A Treaty was set on Foot in Nimeguen, but the extravagant Pretensions of the King of France, and the different Interests of the Confederates retarded the Conclusion. But very opportunely this Year 1678. the Emperor Leopold, who had no Male-Issue, having a Son born to him, he seemed to be sent into the World as an Angel of Peace. The Demonstrations of Joy, which were made, not only in Naples, but in all the other Austrian Dominions, were exceeding great, for the Succession of that most august Family became thereby secured, and all Fear of future Revolutions and Disorders in the Empire removed. Therefore the Birth of this new Prince facilitated the Peace, which began with that made by the King of France with the States-General of Holland, to whom the King promised to deliver up the City of Maastricht, and to restore the Prince of Orange to the Possession of the Principality of that Name, and of all the other Territories situate in his Dominions which the Prince possessed before the War, without any other Obligation on the Part of the Dutch, but to observe an exact Neutrality, and not to give any Assistance to the Enemies of the Crown of France.

THIS Peace very much facilitated the concluding of another between Spain and France, which, after a Suspension of Arms for about a Month, was at last subscribed at Nimeguen, on the 17th of September this Year 1678. The Articles stipulated in it were many, a great Part of which related to the Contributions and Commerce of the Subjects of the two Crowns; and as for the Restitution of the Countries possessed, it was agreed, that the King of France should restore to the Catholick King, the Towns of Charleroy, Binch, Actb, Oudenard, Courtray, the Dutchy of Limbourg, the Country on the other Side of the Maes, the City and Citadel of Ghent, the Fort of Rondenbuis, the Pais de Waes, the Towns of Leurwe and S. Ghislain in the Low-Countries, besides the City of Puigcerda, in the Principality of Catalonia, with express Condition, that the Sluices and Fortifications annexed to Newport, should belong to the Spaniards, notwithstanding the Pretensions of the King of France, as Possessor of the Lordship and Jurisdiction of Actb. On the other Hand, the Spaniards were content to leave to the Crown of France, Franch Comté of Burgundy, the City of Valenchiennes, Bucbain, Condè, Cambray, Cambresis, Aire, St. Omer, Tpres, Warwick, Warnevor, Poperinghen, Bailleul, Coffel, Banay, and Maubeuge; as also Charlemont, in case the Catholick King, within the Space of a Year, yielded to the King of France, Dinant, belonging to the Principality of Liege. And lastly, Spain agreed to the same Neutrality which had been promised by the Dutch.

THEN followed the Peace between France, Switzerland, the Empire and the Emperor, which was intirely regulated according to the Stipulations of that of Westphalia Westphalia in the Year 1648. without any Alteration, excepting that Fribourg was yielded to France in lieu of Philipsbourg, which was left to the Emperor; the Bishop of Strasburg, and the Princes of Furstenberg, were restored to the Possession of their Dominions, Goods, Pre-eminencies and Prerogatives; and the Restitution of Lorrain to the Duke of that Name, to whom France gave the City of Toul, and a Provost-ship in the three Bishopricks, in Exchange for Nancy and the Provost-ship of Longovy, which it retained, together with the Sovereignty of four Highways through Lorrain, of the Breadth of half a League, for a Passage from S. Dizier to Nancy, and from thence to Alsace, Franch Comtè, and the Bishoprick of Metz.

THE last Treaties of Peace were those between the Duke of Brunswick, the Princes of the Lower Saxony, the Bishops of Munster and Osnaburg, the Elector of Brandenburg, and the King of Denmark with the Crown of Swedeland; which were likewise regulated by that of Westphalia. So, upon the Payment of some Money to the Duke of Brunswick, and the Bishops of Munster and Osnaburg, and the Elector of Brandenburg, all the Dominions which Swedeland had lost during the Course of this War, were restored: To the first were only left the Bailiwick of Tedinghausen, and the Provost-ship of Docuren; and to the last, all the Country on the other Side, and some Places on this Side of the Oder, which, contrary to the Tenor of the Peace of Munster, had been possessed by the Swedes. The Subjects of each of the Parties were included; and it was particularly stipulated, that the County of Rixingben should be restored to the Count of Alfeld, and to the Duke of Gottorp his Dominions.

ALL the abovementioned Princes ratified the said Treaties, though many of them had consented to them out of cruel Necessity. The Duke of Lorrain alone refused to come in to them; and chose rather to remain deprived of his State, than to recover it thus mangled and confounded, yea sullied with the Sovereignty of France in the Heart of it. The Emperor, his Brother-in-Law, reserving this Affair of the Duke to a more favourable Opportunity, declared him Governor of the Lower Austria and Tirol, and assigned to him and Leonora of Austria, Queen-Dowager of Poland, his Wife, the City of Innsbruck for their Place of Residence.

ADVICE of this Peace coming to Naples in the Beginning of October, magnificent Feasts were celebrated; but much greater followed upon Advice of the King's Marriage, which, for the better cementing the Peace, was concluded with the Princess Maria-Louisa of Bourbon, Daughter to the Duke of Orleans, Brother to the King of France, betrothed in Fontainbleau to the Prince of Conti, as the King of Spain's Proxy. For this Marriage a Donative was asked from the Seggi, but that meeting with a great many Difficulties, as a Thing not formerly practised in the like Cases, and much more on account of the Misery to which the Kingdom was reduced, an Expedient was found of imposing a new Jus prohibendi upon Brandy. This Solemnity was in some measure imbittered by the Death of D. John of Austria, which happened in Madrid in the Month of September; nevertheless the Feasts were not interrupted, but only deferred till the News of the Bride's Arrival in Spain, so that on the 14th of January this new Year 1630. they were begun again with pompous and numerous Cavalcades, and continued with Tournaments, Illuminations, and other publick Demonstrations of Joy.

BUT notwithstanding this Peace, and this new Band of Friendship, we were still afraid of new Invasions, and preparing to prevent them. The French, impatient of Rest, though with so much Earnestness they had solicited the Peace with Spain, the Dutch, the Emperor, the Princes of the Empire, and the Northern Crowns; whether puffed up with having obtained it on their own Terms, or that, in order to confirm them in the Possession of their Conquests, they had a Mind to break the Union of so many Princes confederated to their Disadvantage, and then being divided, to crush them separately, whereas when united they seemed to be Invincible, began anew to give great Jealousy, and very soon gave Proofs that it was not without Ground; for when the Commissaries, in Execution of the Treaty of Peace, were about to meet for regulating the Limits, they refused to proceed, pretending, that the Catholick King ought to renounce the Title of Duke of Burgundy, the antient Inheritance of the House of Austria, and that consequently it ought to be taken out of the Commissions which his Commissaries produced. Afterwards they opened two Tribunals, one in Tournay, and another in Metz; and assuming a Jurisdiction over their neighbouring Princes, such as never had been heard heard of before in the World, they not only caused to be adjudged to France, under pretence of Dependencies, the whole Country on the Frontiers of Flanders and the Empire, as they thought fit, but took actual Possession of it, compelling the Inhabitants to acknowledge the most Christian King for their Sovereign; prescribing the Bounds, and exercising all those Acts of Sovereignty, which Princes are wont to practise with Subjects. Moreover, during the Peace, they fitted out in their Harbours a most powerful Fleet of Men of War and Gallies, they filled their Magazines, and reinforced the Garisons of the Frontier Towns; which Preparations gave Jealousy to all the Princes of Europe. They deluded the Duke of Savoy with the Marriage of the Infanta of Portugal, then supposed to be Heiress of that Kingdom, with a Design, in his Absence, to take Possession of his Dominions, though afterwards, when the Duke was upon the Point of imbarking for Lisbon, the Snare being opportunely discovered, in order not to hazard the Possession of that noble Principality, upon the uncertain Hopes of the Succession of a Kingdom, the Treaty was broke off. To make themselves to be feared by all the Christian World, they solicited the Dutch to enter into an Alliance with them; and lastly, they made themselves Masters of the City of Strasbourg, situate upon the Banks of the Rhine, and putting a Garison into the Citadel of Casale, in the Marquisate of Monferrat, gave Ground to the Italians to be jealous of the excessive Covetousness of the French.

THESE Proceedings of the French occasioned great Jealousy likewise in Naples, so that whenever any of their Ships appeared off our Harbours, we were obliged to have a watchful Eye over them, for fear of being surprized. They were yet more suspected in the Milanese, and the Principality of Catalonia; therefore by the pressing Orders come from Spain, the Viceroy was obliged to raise 2000 Foot, and imbark them for Catalonia, under the Command of the Marquis of Torreuso; and likewise to send two Ships loaded with Ammunition: To take ten Crowns per Cent. of the Revenues of one Year, which had been assigned to private Persons upon the Customs, Taxes, and the Exchequer Payments, and in lieu thereof to give them an Assignment upon the Duty of Tobacco and Brandy: To summon all the Barons of the Kingdom to send some Horsemen for the King's Service; and accordingly each of them contributed in Money according to their Abilities; and the necessary Charges for raising them were calculated at the Rate of 75 Ducats a Man; and lastly, to put in Execution the King's Orders for paying only the half of what is commonly called Bounty Money, which is a Gratuity given by the King for past Services.

BUT while the Marquis De los Velez was busied in these Expeditions, he had Advice that the Court of Spain had appointed the Marquis Del Carpio, who was then his Catholick Majesty's Ambassador at Rome, to succeed him in the Government of the Kingdom. Soon after his Domesticks arrived, and he himself, preventing the Meeting, which Los Velez, with almost all the Nobility, was preparing to give him, on the 6th of January this Year 1683. arrived in the Convent of S. Maria in Portico, in the Suburbs of the Chiaja, before it was known that he had been near the City. He was immediately visited by his Predecessor, who on the 9th of the same Month yielded the Government to him, and quickly set out for the Court of Spain, where being arrived, he was kindly received by the King, and honoured with a Seat in the Council of State, and afterwards with the Office of President of the Council of the Indies.

THE Marquis De los Velez being so taken up with the troublesome War of Sicily, and in providing the immense Charges which were requisite for maintaining it, could not leave us Monuments of Buildings, Inscriptions, and Marbles, as his Predecessors had done. Nevertheless, during the seven Years and four Months of his Government, he left us Twenty-eight Statutes, all wise and prudent, whereby he made many wholesome Regulations, as well with respect to the Value and Quality of the Coin, as the keeping up Plenty in the Kingdom, which are set down in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of our Statutes.

BUT seeing his Successor relieved both the Kingdom and City of Naples from the so many Misfortunes, and put them upon a better Footing, so as to make a more handsome Figure, it will be necessary, in the following Book, to relate the generous and noble Exploits of this Hero.

T H E

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XL.

Y the Proceedings of the French it was plainly seen, that the Peace, settled at Nimeguen between the two Crowns of Spain and France, would be of a very short Duration; but after the Death of Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France, which happened on the 30th of July this Year 1683. it was openly broke; and in the Month of December, a Proclamation being issued out, ordering all the French, under severe Penalties, to quit our Kingdom, a most bloody and obstinate War, which lasted many Years, began anew; and tho' in the Month of August 1684. there was a Truce concluded between Spain, France, and the Emperor; yet the War was begun again more obstinately than ever, and continued till the Peace of Ryswick, which was concluded on the 20th of September 1697. This War kept our Viceroy continually employ'd in sending from the Kingdom strong Succours, especially to Catalonia, where the French, under the Command of the Duke de Noailles, made notable Progress. But by the provident Care and prudent Management of the Marquis del Carpio, the Kingdom was restor'd to such a State, as made these Burthens little felt. To him we owe, that not only during his Government, we enjoy'd Tranquillity; but that by Virtue of his good Regulations, it likewise continued in the Times of his Successors.

C H A P. I.

*Of the Government of D. Gasper de Haro, Marquis del Carpio :
His Virtues, Death, and the Laws he left us.*

IN the Month of January this Year 1683. the Marquis, upon his taking the Reins of the Government into his Hands, by his Prudence and the Knowledge he had acquir'd of the Affairs of the Kingdom while he was Ambassador at Rome, immediately found, that it was not that the Kingdom wanted provident and wholesome Laws, for the good Government thereof ; nor that his Predecessors had hitherto been ignorant of the Mischiefs, or had not endeavour'd to remedy them: He knew that there could be no more prudent nor salutary Laws than his Predecessors had enacted, and he was of Opinion, that the best Law-makers, next to the Romans, were the Spaniards ; but he was sensible, that too much Indulgence, and the not putting the Laws in due Execution, but too easily dispensing with them, had corrupted Discipline, occasioned Looseness of Manners, and put the State in Disorder. He saw that his Predecessors had taken all Pains imaginable for remedying these Evils, but that they had either been deceived or careless in the Choice of the Means. Therefore having firmly determined to regulate his Conduct by a constant and fix'd Resolution rigorously to follow the Rules of uncorrupted and inflexible Justice ; he began to invigorate the Laws and Ordinances already established, and to shew the great Desire he had to have them punctually observed, he added new and more rigorous Punishments.

I N the Beginning of his Government he found, that the Frequency of Crimes, both in the City and Kingdom, was chiefly owing to the carrying of Fire-Arms, and many other Sorts of offensive Weapons, with which every body was provided and girt. There were many Laws, severely prohibiting the carrying of such ; but Licence had been so easily obtained for it, not only from the Viceroy, but other Magistrates, who assumed such a Power, and the Indulgence in execution of the Penalties was such, that the Prohibition was render'd vain. Therefore, in the Month of February this Year, he published a severe Statute, whereby, besides invigorating the old, he took away the Power from all Magistrates of granting Licence for carrying such Arms, and imposed severe Penalties upon the Offenders, which were irremissibly put in execution. Being likewise sensible, that the so many Thefts, Murders, Assassinations, and other Crimes were owing, no less to the Multitude of idle Persons, Vagabonds, and good-for-nothing Fellows, of which Naples and the other Cities and Towns of the Kingdom were full, than to the carrying of Arms ; his Care was, not only to revive the old and new Laws, ordering all such to quit the Kingdom, but added new Punishments, and made the Laws to be put in execution, charging the Magistrates to see them strictly fulfilled and executed. So that in a short time, the two principal Occasions of so many Crimes and Disorders were removed.

He saw, that Frauds and Tricks were much practised in all Arts, particularly in those where they were the most pernicious and prejudicial ; to wit—the Gold and Silversmiths, and the Weavers of Gold and Silk-Stuffs. Therefore he did what in him lay to root out these Abuses ; and for that End, he caused many Regulations, prescrib'd by King Charles II. for removing those Frauds, to be publish'd, which he he order'd to be inviolably observ'd, and he set a Price upon Silk Stuffs, and made sundry Regulations for obviating the Frauds and Tricks of the Gold and Silversmiths. Perceiving, that both the City and Kingdom were going to wrack, by the pernicious Abuses introduced in the Richness of Apparel, the Number of Servants, and other Luxuries; by a severe Law he prohibited the excessive Number of Servants, embroider'd Clothes, and Cloth of Gold and Silver; likewise forbidding the Consumption of these Metals upon Sedans, Coaches, or Calashes, or even upon Saddles.

HE applied himself no less to the Reformation of our Tribunals, and with the utmost Care endeavour'd to root out the Abuses and Corruptions that had crept into them. The Visitor Casati, after visiting our Tribunals, having made a full Representation to the King of all the Abuses introduced into them, and particularly into the Council of S. Clara, of which he made a long Catalogue; the King, by his Royal Letters, dated in Madrid the 18th of September 1684. order'd the Marquis to use his utmost Endeavours in abolishing them; so that on the 19th of April 1685. by a publick Edict he put the King's Orders in execution; and at the same time likewise removed the many Abuses introduced into the Court of the Bailiwick of Naples, and prescribed many Regulations for its better Reformation.

BUT what with us render'd this prudent Minister worthy of immortal Glory, was his having restor'd the Kingdom to an entire Tranquillity, by two Actions truly noble, in abolishing the old, and coining new Money; and in having altogether extirpated the Banditi: In the preceding Books may be seen, how much his Predecessors had in vain toil'd to bring these Things about, because they had not the Dexterity to employ proper and effectual Means for putting an end to such hard and laborious Undertakings. On the one hand, considering the Difficulties he had to surmount, and on the other, how much it would redound, not only to the Welfare of the State, but to his own Glory, he laid himself wholly out in finding proper Means for bringing them to a happy Issue.

FOR which End he appointed a new Juncto of prudent and skilful Ministers, where, with the greatest Care and Circumspection, were to be thoroughly examin'd all the most proper Means for coining new Money of real Goodness and Weight, that Merchandize might thereby be brought to a just Price, the Citizens relieved, and foreign Traders might have the same Opinion of the Money of the Kingdom as formerly. It was in vain to think of abolishing the old, without first finding out Means for coining new Money; but that was an Affair of the greatest Importance, and which requir'd mature Deliberation, and an exact Scrutiny: Therefore, that the Disease might not grow worse while the Remedy was preparing, by rigorous Edicts, publish'd on the 29th of May 1683. the first Year of his Government, he revived the ancient Statutes against those who brought false Money into the Kingdom, against the Gold and Silversmiths, and other Persons, who should dare to melt down any sort of Money, adding to the Punishments already established, others more grievous and severe. Then, considering, that in order to make up the Loss which inevitably was to be the Consequence of abolishing the old, and coining new Money, it was absolutely necessary to find out a Fund for supplying that Loss; after various Scrutinies and nice Examinations, made in several Sessions of the Juncto, considering, that for compassing the Tranquillity of so flourishing a Kingdom, it would be no great Loss to the Subjects, if only some small Burthen were laid upon them; therefore it was resolved, that fifteen Grana should be imposed for ever upon each Bushel of Salt, above the Price it was then sold at, to be paid by all Persons whatsoever, without the least Exception, and also a Year's Rent of all the Incomes, as well of Neapolitans as Foreigners, and of Natives living abroad with their Families, without Exception of Persons, State, or Quality, to be exacted within three Years. All the Seggi, as well those of the Nobility, as that of the Commonalty, gave their hearty Concurrence in this Resolution; and in the Month of July the Royal Collateral Council confirmed it by a solemn and publick Decree, and the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber put it immediately in execution, by dispatching proper Orders for the Distribution and Collection.

THEN the Coinage of the new Money was immediately set about, and many Regulations were prescrib'd by the Viceroy about the melting Houses, the Artificers, Refiners, Gold Drawers, Merchants, Gold and Silversmiths, and Bankrupts; and sundry Provisions made for preventing Frauds and Tricks in a Work which requir'd the Height of Honesty. From 1683. to the last Year of his Government, four Species of new Silver Money were coin'd, all of the same intrinsick Goodness. The first, call'd Ducatone, which was made of the same Value with a hundred Grana, had on the one Side the King's Effigies, and on the other a crown'd Scepter and two Globes, with this Motto: Unus non sufficit. The second, call'd Mezzo (half) Ducatone, had likewise on the one Side the King's Effigies, and on the other the Figure of Victory upon a Globe, holding in one Hand a Shield with the Royal Arms of Aragon and Sicily, and on the other a Branch of a Palm-tree. The third, which was worth twenty Grana, has on the one Side the Shield with the Royal Arms, and on the other the Geographical Description of the Kingdom of Naples, adorn'd with two Cornucopia's, representing Justice and Plenty. The fourth, which was worth ten Grana, has on the one Side the King's Effigies, and on the other a Lion couchant, with this Motto: Majestate securus.

BUT while this great Work was going on, it being found, that though the giving this new Money such a Value answer'd the Viceroy's Ends, who was endeavouring, that the Money of this Kingdom by its intrinsick Goodness should not only relieve the Citizens, but be highly esteemed by Foreigners, yet it did not answer the Loss, which the abolishing of the old, and the Coinage of the new Money occasioned; and besides, it being likewise consider'd, that since the Coinage of the new Money had been begun, the Price of Silver had been alter'd, it would follow of course, that in a short time the Money would be destroyed, either by being melted down, or sent out of the Kingdom, as being of a greater intrinsick Value than had been put upon it; therefore it was propos'd to raise it Ten per Cent. more than had been resolv'd upon.

DIFFICULTIES were started by the Seggi about this Alteration, they looking upon it to be hurtful and prejudicial to the Kingdom; so that the Publication of it was delayed for that Time. And in the Year 1687. while this Affair was in Agitation, the Viceroy fell ill, and in November was snatch'd away from us by cruel Death. He died before he could enjoy the Fruits of this glorious Undertaking, and left that Advantage to his Successor. The Count of Santistevan, who succeeded him, that he might not lose so favourable an Opportunity, which in the Beginning of his Government might gain him great Reputation, greedily embraced it; and without any more ado, not minding the Difficulties started by the Seggi, approved of the designed Alteration of the Money already coin'd, and immediately in the Year 1688. coin'd other three Species of Money, and to one he gave the Name of Tari, which on the one Side has the King's Effigies, and on the other the Royal Arms, of the Value of twenty Grana: To another he gave the Name of Carlino, which has the same Impression, only adding to the Royal Arms the Badge of the Order of the Golden Fleece, of the Value of ten Grana; and to the third he gave the Name of Grana Otto, which has on the one Side the King's Effigies, and on the other a Cross Patee, with Rays issuing out of the four Angles; and on the 11th of December the same Year, he issued out a Proclamation, ordaining the Currency of the new, and the Abolishment of the old Money, and the Exchange of the one for the other, about which he prescribed several Regulations, not only for the City of Naples, but for the Provinces of the Kingdom, as shall be related, when we come to discourse of his Government.

BUT though the Marquis del Carpio had not the Pleasure of seeing this Work completed, yet he had a great deal in the other glorious Enterprize of quite extirpating the Banditi. He, among so many that had attempted it, with his own Eyes saw the Kingdom purg'd of that Vermin, and restor'd to its former Tranquillity. In order to the total Extirpation of them, after having, in the first Year of his Government, granted a full Indemnity to all Criminals and Outlaws, provided they should assist in the Pursuit of their Heads and Gangs, who were still infesting the Country, he laid himself wholly out for their total Extirpation: He sent the Troops against them, order'd all the Towers and Houses, where they were wont to haunt, to be demolished; and where he met with Resistance, he sent Cannon thither, and batter'd them, with a firm Resolution to destroy them entirely: He put a great Reward upon the Heads of such as could not be taken alive; and by these bold and effectual Means, he purged many Provinces of the Kingdom of that Plague. Nevertheless the two Provinces of Abruzzo continued to be still infested, in which these Villains, not only despising the Pardon offer'd them, provided that they they should alter their Course of Life, but the rigorous Punishments that had been inflicted upon the Obstinate ; grown more stubborn than ever, they went on in committing Robberies, setting fire to Houses, taking Ransoms, pillaging, and doing all other Mischiefs. Therefore he bent his Thoughts upon extirpating them likewise out of these Provinces, that all the Kingdom might enjoy Peace and Tranquillity. For which end, on the 12th of June 1684. he publish'd a severe Edict, containing many Heads, whereby not only the Presidents, but the Syndicks of the Corporations of each City and Town, were strictly charged to discover and pursue them, and threaten'd with severe Punishment, such as should conceal them alive, or bury them when dead.

BUT what most of all conduced to their total Extermination, was his having, by rigorous and effectual Means, endeavour'd to strike Terror into their Protectors, Harbourers, and Correspondents. The greatest Part were supported by sundry Barons, and other Persons of Note, who procur'd them Shelter and Victuals; and either by Letters or Messages advised them of the Ambushes and Snares that were laid for them. Therefore he enacted a severe Law against these, whereby, besides renewing the old, he added other more terrible Punishments, to which were likewise liable all such as should keep the least Correspondence with the Banditi, or give them any Assistance, Favour, or Victuals; or should send them any Advice, though they were out of the Kingdom, and under the Dominion of another Prince. But, if the Protection or Shelter should be found to be such, as to alter the Nature of the Crime, to wit, if such Harbourers should partake of the Robberies and Ransoms, or assist them in the Crimes, or furnish them with Arms and Powder, or any other Materials, for enabling them to keep the Field; in such Cases he left it to the Discretion of the Judge, to extend the Punishment, even to Death: Besides, in order to facilitate the Proofs, the Testimonies of two Banditi, and the Proofs of two Witnesses, though of different Facts, were to be admitted as a full Conviction. These Severities made their Protectors think in good earnest of quite abandoning them, for seeing that the Punishments were inflicted without Mercy, and that there was no room left them to expect Favour, they withdrew their Protections. When these Villains found themselves depriv'd of Shelter, they were so terrified, that some made their Escape by Flight, some submitted and took the Benefit of the Indemnity, and others being taken, suffer'd the just Punishment of their Wickedness. Thus were they altogether rooted out of the Kingdom, so that there remained not the least Vestige of them. And the Undertaking prov'd so glorious and successful, that with us the Breed of them is quite lost: So that the Quiet, which the Kingdom has ever since enjoy'd in the Security of Travellers, Trade, and Commerce, is altogether owing to the singular Vigilance and Foresight of this prudent and glorious Minister, whose Memory will, therefore, remain immortal with us.

WE are likewise very much indebted to him for having suppressed another pernicious and scandalous Mischief, which having spread itself not only in Naples, but in the other Cities of the Kingdom, occasioned infinite Disorders and Oppressions. Some rich Men maintaining in their Houses many Bullies and loose Livers, struck Terror in the more weak; threatening them, often cutting and stabbing them, and in a thousand Ways outrageously abusing them, and by force extorting from them whatever they had a mind to; they protected the most guilty; they screw'd themselves into every Body's Business, and forced the weaker to do whatever they thought fit; they compell'd the Masters of Families to give their Daughters in Marriage to whomsoever they pleased, and hinder'd them from marrying those they did not like; in short, they had brought the Citizens under a most cruel Slavery. This Hero, with great Courage, rooted up so pernicious a Nuisance; he punished the Bullies severely, and dispersed them all, and with rigorous Punishments struck such Terror in their Protectors, that no more Abuses were committed; so that afterwards no more Insults nor domineering were seen, and all Ranks of People stood equally in Awe of Justice.

BUT what made it more plainly appear, that all the most commendable Virtues center'd in this Minister, was, that at the same time that he was a Terror to the Imperious and Unjust, he was mild and gentle to the Virtuous and Weak. His Piety was wonderful; he reliev'd the Poor and Unfortunate with unspeakable Charity; he took special Care that the Weak and Impotent should not be insulted; he was a mortal Enemy to filthy Avarice; he was moderate and sparing in every thing, but at the same time generous and magnificent.

BEING sensible, that in order to keep the People in good Humour, they must be plentifully supplied with these two Things, which they ardently desir'd, Panem & Circenses; he did what in him lay to keep Store of all Sort of Provisions in the City, so that there never was a Viceroy so much beloved and respected by the People as he: Rapt up with Joy and Satisfaction, they took delight in running after him in the publick Streets, and extolling him to the very Sky, with great Tenderneſs call'd him their kind Father and Lord.

IN publick Shews he was an Imitator of the Magnificence of the antient Romans; there never had been more sumptuous and surprizing in Naples. We still retain the Memory of them, which neither Length of Time, nor Malice, nor Emulation will be able to blot out. His Successors, who had a Mind to imitate him, came far short of him. But whether it be, that Death, by her constant Custom, usually carries off the best; or rather, that the cruel Destiny of this Kingdom was such, as not to allow us long to enjoy so great a Blessing and Satisfaction, in the middle of his glorious Career, he was unseasonable snatch'd away from us. Being taken ill of a lingering Fever, the Physicians, at first, had Hopes of being able to recover him, but the Disease increasing, tho' slowly, on the 15th of November this Year 1687. he died. He was bitterly lamented by all Ranks of People, especially the Commonalty, who were inconsolable upon so grievous and irreparable a Loss. Cruel Death robb'd us of many Monuments, that might have been expected from his Magnanimity and admirable Wisdom. His Corps, with magnificent and military Pomp, was carried to the Church del Carmine, where stately Obsequies were celebrated. And in the mean time the Kingdom being left without a Head, D. Lorenzo Colonna, High-Constable thereof, came in all haste from Rome to take the Government of it upon him, till such time as the King should send a Successor. But his Government was very short, for the Count of Santistevan, who was then Viceroy of Sicily, being appointed to succeed the Marquis del Carpio, he came immediately to Naples, and took Possession of the Government, of whom we shall now discourse.

C H A P. II.

The Government of D. Francesco Benavides, Count de Santistevan : The Regulations and Laws which he left us.

THE Count de Santistevan having left the Government of the Island of Sicily, set out immediately for Naples, where he arriv'd about the End of December, and in the Beginning of the Year 1688. enter'd upon the Government of the Kingdom. In the first Year of his Administration there happen'd so terrible an Earthquake in Naples, that it threw down the most conspicuous Edifices: The great Cupola of the new Church of Jesus, and the ancient Portico of the Temple of Castor and Pollux, which was an exact Model of the Corinthian Order, tumbled down: Benevento, Cerreto, and other Cities were ruin'd. But above all, the Death of Innocent XI. a Pope of a most exemplary Life, which happen'd on the 11th of August this same Year, occasion'd much Grief, to whom, on the 6th of October, Cardinal Pietro Ottoboni succeeded, by the Name of Alexander VIII. The Count happening to succeed so great a Hero, from whom he had the Opportunity of taking shining Examples of a most excellent Government, endeavour'd to tread in his Footsteps. Therefore, by new Statutes, Statutes, he invigorated those establish'd by the Marquis about the carrying of Arms, the Provisions, and the Price of Goods. But especially, not only in this first Year of his Government, but in the following Years, he was wholly bent upon regulating the Exchange of the old Money with the new, by him, as we have said, publish'd, alter'd, and rais'd in the Value. This Year 1688. he prescribed many Regulations concerning this Exchange, pointing out the Places and Persons, both in the City, and all the Provinces of the Kingdom. He foresaw the Disorders that might happen, and provided against them. He caused the Coinage of the new Money to be continued, and in 1689. added other two Species, to wit, the Ducat, which on the one Side has the King's Effigies crown'd, and on the other his Arms; and the Half Ducat, with the same Impressions: Besides, he allow'd all Persons whatsoever to give in their own Silver to the Royal Mint to be coin'd of the same Standard with what had been already coin'd, paying only 32 Grana for each Pound Weight of Silver, for the Coinage and Labour. He order'd the old Money, tho' of a false Coin, to be taken in Exchange, provided the Silver were good. He regulated the Method to be practis'd in the Banks, and prescrib'd a Form about taking their Bills and Letters of Credit. He renew'd the old Laws against false Coiners, and the Clippers of the antient Coin, and made others more rigorous and severe against those, who should dare to adulterate the new. In short, he had the Glory of bringing this last Work to Perfection, whereby Commerce and Traffick were restor'd, and began to flourish in the Kingdom. And if this Minister had kept within these Bounds, he would have gain'd a noble Reputation among us; but not content with the Alteration already made, having, on the 8th of January 1691. by a new Edict, rais'd the Value of the new Money other Ten per Cent. which made it Twenty above its first Value, (by causing, on the 7th of April the same Year, other four new Species of Money to be coin'd, to wit, the Ducat, Half Ducat, the Tari, and Carlino, which, on the one Side, have the King's Effigies, and on the other, the Badge of the Order of the Golden Fleece) it not only hurt his Reputation, but was a great Detriment to the Trade of the Kingdom; and he was so much the more to blame, inasmuch as having declar'd in that Edict, that one of the Reasons, whereby he had been mov'd to make this Alteration, was, by raising the Money, which was in the publick Books, to extinguish the Duty of 15 Grana, laid upon Salt, for the Coinage of the new Money; which Extinction never happen'd, so that the said Duty not only continued, but we bore the Loss occasion'd by the Alteration.

IN the mean time, the Court of Spain being in great Anxiety, on Account of the Barrenness of the Queen, Maria Louisa of Bourbon, soon after had Occasion to lament her Death. This matchless Queen died on the 12th of February 1689. and King Charles II. her Husband, in Performance of his last Duty to her, order'd, that, with magnificent Pomp, solemn Obsequies should be celebrated in all his Kingdoms, at the Royal Charges. It was the Count of Santistevan's Business to see them perform'd in Naples: Therefore after having given strict Orders to the Presidents of the Provinces, to cause to be celebrated in the most conspicuous Cities solemn Obsequies to the deceased Queen, he order'd most majestick and sumptuous Funeral Solemnities to be celebrated in Naples. According to the Custom already introduced, the Church of S. Clara was pitch'd upon, where the Mausoleum was erected, the Magnificence of which, the Beauty of the Poetical Compositions, and the Solemnity of the Ceremonies were such, that greater had never been seen before. There was no Occasion at this Time, as formerly, to have recourse to the Jesuits for these Compositions, because, by the Progress, which Learning had made in Naples, there flourish'd in it many Men of great Erudition. These, therefore, were employ'd, and he, who had the greatest Share in them, was the famous Domenico Auliso, the Ornament of our University, who being endowed with uncommon Learning, compos'd most noble Elogies, and some most pure and elegant Inscriptions. The 9th Day of May was appointed for the sacred Ceremony, which being to last from the Evening to the next Morning, the Viceroy was obliged to watch the whole Night over the Grave, without stirring from that Place, whither, according to Custom, he had gone, with a solemn Cavalcade; in which the Magistrates of the City, with the Marquis of Fuscaldo, the Syndick, surrounded by the Barons, and many of the Nobility, accompanied him. Two great Detachments of Soldiers were posted in different Parts of the City, one of Foot, in the Square before the Royal Palace, the other of Horse and Foot, in the Square, at the Side of the Church of S. Clara, with all their Officers cloathed in Black, with their Arms reversed, according to the most antient Custom transmitted to us by the Greeks and Romans, who, at Funeral Solemnities, turned the Points of their Spears downwards, and inverted their Shields. The Viceroy having watched the whole Night, and the Ceremony being to be finished the next Morning, returned to the Church, where the Office was sung; then, at the Altar erected near the Mausoleum, Monsignor Francesco Pignatelli, Archbishop of Taranto, now Cardinal, and our most exemplary Archbishop, assisted by four Bishops, celebrated the Sacrifice of the Mass: Then P. Ventimiglia, a Theatin, pronounced the Funeral Oration in the Spanish Language, which being ended, the same Archbishop having censured and besprinkled the Grave, concluded the Ceremony. The Charge of composing an exact and distinct Description, not only of the Apparatus, the Mausoleum and Inscriptions, but of the Ceremonies and Solemnities performed over the Sepulchre, was committed to Aluisio, which he punctually executed in a small Treatise, under this Title, A Description of the Mausoleum, and of the Solemnities celebrated over the Sepulchre of Queen Maria-Louisa of Bourbon, wherein he displays his singular Learning; but having a natural Aversion to the Printing of any of his Works, though very elaborate, Manuscripts of this and his other notable and excellent Writings are preserved in Naples.

OUR King, now a Widower, in order to comply with the Desires of his Subjects, who longed for his having a numerous Progeny, on the 28th of August 1690. concluded his second Marriage with Mariana of Newburg, Daughter of the Elector Philip-William Count-Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Newburg. But in process of Time, it being perceived, that no Issue was to be expected by this second Wife, the Dominions, of which his vast Monarchy was composed, were in a terrible Consternation. Their Afflictions were augmented by the King's crazy Constitution, subject to continual Infirmities, which made the inestimable Loss of him much to be feared, because of the great Disorders and Revolutions it was like to produce. It was also seen, that by how much the Spanish Monarchy had declined, so much the more had that of France increased in Power and Strength: The French Armies, Victorious every where, had made surprizing Conquests in Flanders, Germany, and Spain, where the Duke De Noailles having besieged Roses by Land, and the Count D'Etrè by Sea, it was taken after eight Days Siege; and in the Year 1694. after the Duke De Noailles had defeated the Spanish Army upon the Banks of the Ter, he took the Cities of Palamos, Girone, Ostalrick, and Castelfollit.

IN the mean time the Count De Santistevan's Government being prolonged for other three Years, after having settled the Affair of the Coin, he had a mind to reform our Tribunals; and perceiving, that one of the chief Causes why Law-Suits came to be delayed, was, that the Judges too easily gave Ear to Objections, and their not deciding them so soon as they might, he prescribed certain and indispensable Terms for their Decisions, and for retrenching the Opinions of the Doctors, who, by various Interpretations, had, in a manner, rendered the former Statutes, made for that Purpose, useless: He prescribed Rules, and defined the Degrees of Consanguinity and Affinity, and, by a particular Statute, made other proper Regulations.

IN the Year 1690. a Report being spread, that, by the many and frequent Diseases in the Cities of Conversano, in the Province of Bari, and Civita Vecchia, in the Ecclesiastical State, the Sicknes was Contagious; in the Beginning of the following Year, upon Pain of rigorous Punishment, he prohibited all Commerce with that Province and Civita Vecchia, and likewise suspended it with the City of Rome and the Ecclesiastical State; and afterwards in July the same Year, he appointed proper Persons in each Ward of Naples to take care, not only of the City, but of the Suburbs and Villages, and not to suffer any Person to enter, without a Licence and the necessary Bills of Health. So that by the Rigour used in that Province, to prevent the spreading of the Distemper, the Kingdom was preserved, and shortly after all Suspicion of Contagion quite vanished.

IN the following Years of his Government other Regulations were made about the Provisions of the City and Kingdom; about the Frauds committed in Credit betwixt Man and Man: about the Importation of foreign Linnen and Woollen Cloth, and about other Affairs; and sundry other Provisions were made, which are

are to be found in the fourth and fifth Volumes of our Statutes. The Viceroy was not allowed to finish the last three Years of his Government, for the Duke of Medina Celi, who was then Ambassador from the King in Rome, with Pope Innocent XII. formerly our Archbishop, who had succeeded Alexander VIII. solicited the Court of Spain to be relieved from that expensive Embassy, and made Viceroy of this Kingdom. He arrived in Naples this Year 1695. and, to give time to his Predecessor to make ready for his Departure, he chose the Palace of the Prince of S. Buono, in the Square of Carbonara, for his Habitation, where he remained till such time as the Count of Santistevan, after having performed the ordinary Visits, set out for Spain, leaving us, besides those already mentioned, a lasting Monument of his Government, to wit, the small Fort which he caused to be built upon the Point of Castel del Uovo.

C H A P. III.

The Government of D. Lodovico de la Cerda, Duke De Medina Celi: His Conduct, and most unhappy End.

THE Duke De Medina Celi took the Government of the Kingdom with magnificent and noble Resolutions; and perceiving, that the Marquis Del Carpio, by his glorious and generous Actions, had left a shining Character behind him, he resolved to imitate him, at least in what he thought the Marquis had left undone. He was very sensible, that his Predecessor had rooted out the Banditi, and removed many Abuses that had been committed both in the City and Kingdom, but had not suppressed the contraband Trade, and the Frauds which were committed in the Importation of Merchandize, and in the Custom-Houses, whence proceeded vast Detriment, not only to the Royal Exchequer, but to the Assignees of the Revenues; therefore he did what in him lay, by severe Edicts, to prevent them. He allowed such slight Proofs to be admitted, that the Seggi, looking upon it as an Abuse, in order, in some measure, to mitigate the Rigour, thought fit to oppose him.

HE likewise pretended to imitate the Marquis in the Magnificence of publick Shews, so that in his Time most sumptuous ones were seen; and above all, he resolved to enlarge the Theatre of S. Bartholomew, and not only to provide it with costly and noble Scenes, but with the best Musicians that flourished in his Time in Europe; insomuch that it eclipsed the Fame of the Venetian Theatres, and those of the other Cities of Italy. He began, and brought to Perfection that noble Street, adorned with beautiful Trees, and most limpid Fountains, which he built upon the Sea-Side, all along the Chiaja. The Pomp and Grandeur of his Court was truly Royal and Magnificent, nor had there been seen at any time a more numerous and splendid. He encouraged Learning and Learned Men to a great Degree, assembling them in his Palace, where, with vast Attention and Complaisance, he heard their different Compositions. So that the Belles Lettres, which in the preceding Government had got footing among us, became more flourishing, and were more firmly established.

BUT all these noble and delightful Diversions came to be imbittered by most troublesome and grievous Cares. In process of Time the People were still more and more confirmed in their Belief, that the King would leave no Issue by the second Marriage, and they were firmly persuaded, that the Barrenness did not proceed ceed from the Queen, a healthful and vigorous Woman, but from the King and his crazy Constitution. His continual Indisposition alarmed us frequently, and though now and then he grew better, at the same time that, upon the News of his Recovery, we were making Feasts and Illuminations, he had already relapsed. The Duke, in order to cheer up the People, and divert their Minds from melancholy Thoughts, always upon Advice of the King's growing better in his Health, made magnificent Feasts, and, in the Royal Palace, kept Assemblies of the most famous Learned Men, in which they recited most noble Compositions in different Languages, both in Prose and Verse, upon the King's better State of Health, which were likewise printed. In the Year 1697. he also caused to be coined a Piece of Gold, which he named Scudo Riccio, on the one Side of which, alluding to the King's Recovery, were his Majesty's Arms, supported by a crowned Eagle, and on the other, the King's Effigy at half Length, and underneath a Palm-Tree, stretching its Leaves over the Head, with this Motto, Reviviscit. But notwithstanding, by contrary Advice, that the King was like to die very soon without Issue, we were again seized with our wonted Fears.

ON the contrary, France was grown most Formidable, and in the Year 1696. had sent into the Field five strong Armies, and maintained them the whole Campaign in the Enemy's Country. The King of France, full of Glory and high elevated Thoughts, was forming vast Undertakings; and, to gain over the Duke of Savoy to his Interest, had clapt up a Peace with him, and the better to cement it, on the 4th of July the same Year, he hastened the Marriage between Maria Adelaide of Savoy, the Duke's Daughter, and the Duke of Burgundy his Grandchild, the Son of the Dauphin of France. By which means he had been left at liberty to employ all his Forces against Spain and Flanders, in which last, in the Year 1697. he took many Places, and in Catalonia the City of Barcelona, at the same time that he had named his Plenipotentiaries for the Peace. And in order the more speedily to compass the grand Design, the same Year he hastened the Peace with England, Holland, and Spain, which, on the 20th of September, was concluded at Reiswick with these Powers, and seven Weeks after with Germany. But some time after the Conclusion of this Peace, a secret Treaty between England, Holland, France, and Savoy was signed at the Loo, whereby a Partition was made of the Spanish Monarchy, in case that our King should happen to die without Issue, as in all likelihood would fall out. The Emperor Leopold, though he saw all the other Princes agree to it, never would give his Consent to any Partition whatsoever.

IT was thought, that under this Report of a Partition, already rumoured Abroad, a more profound Mystery was hid; for the King of France himself foresaw, that nothing could touch the Spaniards more to the Quick, than to propose such a Thing to them, being sure that it would create the utmost Abhorrence in them, jealous, that so vast and extended a Monarchy, to the great Glory of their Ancestors united, and brought to such a Pitch of Grandeur, should be so miserably divided and torn to pieces, and the Name and Glory of it extinguished; as indeed, not only the Spaniards, but King Charles II. himself had an Abhorrence to it, and to prevent the Designs, and to break these impertinent and unseasonable Treaties, which were carrying on about his Dominions, in November 1698. he turned his Thoughts upon raising to the Throne Ferdinand-Joseph, Electoral Prince of Bavaria, born of Maria-Antonia, the Daughter of the Empress his Sister; but that young Prince dying on the 9th of February 1699. before he was eight Years of Age, the Design fell to the Ground; whereupon the King of France, with greater Vigour, resumed his Negotiations with England and Holland, still insisting, as he gave out, upon the concerted Partition, and in the Month of March 1700. he confirmed the Treaty of the Loo with these Powers, with this Alteration only, that to the Share allotted to the Dauphin, the Dominions of the Duke of Lorraine should be added, to whom the State of Milan was to be given in Exchange; and Spain, with the Kingdoms of Italy, to the Archduke Charles, in full of all the Pretensions of his Family: Likewise subjoining, that this Treaty should be communicated to the Emperor, that in the Space of three Months, from the Day of the Intimation, he might declare his Mind, and upon his refusing to accept of the Share assigned to the Archduke Charles, his Son, the two Kings of France and England, and the States-General of Holland, would assign it to another Prince, and that if any should offer to oppose what

what had been established with common Consent, they would attack him with all their Forces.

THE more they endeavoured to push on this Treaty, so much the more were the Spaniards provoked, and resolved not to suffer the least Partition in their Monarchy. And King Charles II. was exceedingly grieved to hear of it, and ordered his Ministers to complain of it at London, and the other Courts; and at the same time, out of a tender Regard for his own Family, he assured the Emperor Leopold, that he would never derogate from the Laws of Blood, and the Intentions of his Forefathers. This was enough to make the Emperor the more firm and constant in his Resolution of not accepting the concerted Partition; insomuch that he answered the Marquis De Villars, who had been sent by the King of France to solicit him to accept of it, that if the King of Spain should happen to die without Issue, which Event he looked upon to be distant, because of his middle Age; as he was inclined to Peace, he would then willingly condescend to more just and wholesome Advice. But in the mean time the King of France, assured of this his Resolution of not yielding to any Division, began his Intrigues with the Grandeess of the Court of Spain, whom it was easy to bring over to his Design, shewing them, that not only out of Justice, but for their own Interest, they ought to persuade their King to raise to the Throne, Philip Duke of Anjou, the Dauphin's second Son, because in none other they could expect that their Monarchy would be maintained firm and intire; that in whose Person, supported by his powerful and formidable Armies, they would be able to crush the Power of all those who should offer to insult, or in the least divide it.

WHILE this Affair, of so great Importance, was transacting at the Court of Spain, in the Month of September this Year 1700. Pope Innocent XII. was taken ill, and after having governed that See nine Years and two Months, on the 27th of the same Month, in the 86th Year of his Age, died in Rome. The Day following, Advice of this Death came to the Duke De Medina, our Viceroy, and to Cardinal Cautelmo our Archbishop; and the next Morning the Viceroy sent the usual Number of Soldiers to Rome to attend the Duke De Uzeda, then his Catholick Majesty's Ambassador there; where, after a few Days, the Cardinals shut themselves up in the Conclave for the Election of a Successor. On the 5th of October the Cardinal Archbishop caused solemn Obsequies to be celebrated to him in the Cathedral, where his Funeral Oration was pronounced in Latin by P. Partenio Giannetasio, a Jesuit, famous for his printed Works; and a Month after, the Nuncio caused other more pompous and magnificent Funeral Ceremonies to be performed in the Church of S. Maria della Nuova.

BUT while the Cardinals, divided into Factions, were debating in the Conclave about the Election of a new Pope, about the End of October the fatal News came to us, that the King being taken grievously ill, there was little Hopes of his Recovery; but soon after, Advice coming that he was better, the Viceroy, in order to cheer up the People, made publick and sumptuous Feasts, and all the Streets of the City were full of Bonfires, and the Windows of Candles, and the Illuminations continued for three Nights. But, alas! at the same time, that, with so great Pomp and Joy, we were celebrating the King's Recovery, he had died on the first of November; and at one and the same time we had the News of his Death and of the Accession of Philip Duke of Anjou to the Throne of Spain. This Incident hastened the Election of a new Pope; for the Spanish and French Cardinals joining together, by the Plurality of Voices, elected Cardinal Antonio Urbano of Urbino, who had been Secretary of the Briefs in the preceding Pontificate, and was only 51 Years of Age. He was elected on the 23d of November this Year 1700. at 10 o'Clock, the Festival of Pope S. Clement, therefore he took the Name of Clement XI. though he had been made Cardinal by Alexander VIII.

THE Duke De Medina, during the so many Turns of Affairs, which happened after the untimely and most fatal Death of King Charles II. was both the Spectacle and Spectator of various worldly Vicissitudes, which at last brought him to an unhappy and lamentable End. Of him, besides those abovementioned, we have other Monuments, which are to be found in the fifth Tome of our Statutes, according to the last Edition of 1715.

C H A P. IV.

The Death of King Charles II. the Laws which he left us ; and what happened to us after so grievous and inestimable a Loss.

THE French, by the desperate State of King Charles's Health, still insisting more and more with the Grandeess of the Court of Spain, and especially with Cardinal Portocarrero, Archbishop of Toledo, of whose Probity and Prudence that King had conceived a great Opinion, upon having Philip the Dauphin's second Son declared Successor in his Kingdoms if he should die without Issue ; they magnified, not only the Dauphin's Rights to that Monarchy, by Virtue of those of Queen Maria-Teresa of Austria, his Mother, and King Charles's eldest Sister, but their own (the Grandeess) Interest. Ever since the War, made on account of the Succession of Brabant, they had studied to invalidate her Renunciation, confirmed by an Oath, and with the greatest Firmness and Solemnity ; and at that time they had published a Book containing Seventy-four Reasons for proving the Nullity thereof. But upon those Occasions, it having been demonstrated by strong and pithy Writings, how weak and groundless these Reasons were, they now subjoined, that many of those Answers could not be applied to the present Case, where the Renouncer, who was dead, did not claim the Succession, but her Son, whom no Deed of the Mother could hurt, he being called to the Succession in his own Person according to Law, and to whom no Renunciation made by his Ancestors could be a Bar. But they got not off so, for besides the strong and ample Clauses which had been inserted in these Renunciations, of purpose to leave no Room for this Subterfuge : These Renunciations were not to be regulated by the common Conclusions of our Doctors, but by the most important and excellent Purpose for which they were made, to wit, the perpetual Separation of the two Monarchies of France and Spain, and to the End that, by no Event whatsoever, these two Crowns might be joined upon one and the same Head. The French, in order to remove this last Obstacle, proposed, that the Declaration might be made, not in the Person of the Dauphin, but in that of the Duke of Anjou, to whom he had yielded up his Rights. Thus was the Union disappointed, and the End, for which the Renunciations were sought, subsisted no more. But this Scheme, so well concerted and adjusted, could not deprive the Emperor Leopold and his Children of the Right already made over to them by Virtue of the Wills of the Kings of Spain, and of the Renunciations, to which, though the Emperor should give up his Title to the Archduke Charles, his second Son ; besides that, it did not obstruct the Design of the always abhorred Union, it would be a more ready way to bring it about : Moreover the French really assumed to themselves what was in Question, for it was positively denied, that the Dauphin, by reason of the Incompatibility of the two Crowns, could never acquire any Right, and consequently, he had nothing to renounce to the Duke of Anjou his Brother. What therefore chiefly pushed on the Spaniards to persuade that King, to his great Grief, to declare the Duke of Anjou his Successor, was lest, by doing otherwise, the so much abhorred Partition should take Effect. They represented to that most pious King, the Miseries and Calamities that his faithful and beloved People must inevitably undergo, and that his Piety would never allow him to expose them to so many many Misfortunes and Dangers. They put him in mind of the Grandeur and Generosity of the Spanish Nation, which would be deeply wounded and reduced to nothing, if, by doing otherwise, he should leave it exposed to the Insults of so formidable and potent a King. But above all, they recommended to him the Union of his Monarchy, which, to the great Glory of his Ancestors, being aggrandized, and brought to such a Bulk, that it had not its equal in the World, he ought not to expose it to be so miserably divided and torn to pieces, so as in future Ages there would scarce be any Memory of so noble a Structure. They likewise put him in mind, that the wise King Ferdinand the Catholick, though it was in his Power to have raised to the Throne at least of his own Kingdoms, and of those acquired by the Troops of Arragon, one of his own Family; nevertheless he called Charles of Austria, a Fleming, to the Succession of them all, because he knew very well, that in the Person of that most powerful Prince, and by what he was, and by what he was to be, these Kingdoms could be maintained united, making up a very large Monarchy, which would be able to subsist for many Ages, without being dissolved, to the Diminution of his own Glory, and that of the renowned Spanish Nation.

ABOUT the Beginning of October, the King being beset on all Hands by these Suggestions of the Grandees, especially of Cardinal Portocarrero, his Illness increased so much, that the Physicians despaired of his Recovery, and about the End of the Month the Pangs of Death coming upon him, he died on Monday the first of November 1700. His Body was embalmed on Tuesday, and on Wednesday exposed in the same Chamber where he was born. Many Altars were erected in a large Hall, where a great Number of Religious continued saying Masses till Friday, on which Day three solemn Masses were sung in the three Royal Chapels, and then a Pontifical one, at which all the Grandees assisted. Then the Corpse was removed to the Escorial, accompanied by all the Grandees, the Royal Household, and the four Mendicant Orders, where the Funeral Ceremonies were performed, suitable to so great and beloved a King. He was buried on the same Day and Hour which completed the 39th Year of his Age. He began to reign on the 6th of November 1675. which Day ended the Queen-Mother's Regency, and the Junta. On the 30th of August he married Maria-Louisa de Bourbon, and she dying on the 12th of February 1689. the Year following he married Mariana of Newburg; by neither of which he left Issue. Among his Virtues, his Piety and Religion were admirable; he never was heard to utter an offensive Word; he was much given to Business, often depriving himself of his Diversion, that he might not neglect to dispatch it; he never came to any Resolution without the previous Advice of his Ministers, and he was so exact in following their Sentiments, that he even forebore doing Things which he earnestly desired, and often ordered what was against his own Opinion, whenever he was so advised by his Ministers, judging, that by so doing, he had nothing to answer for to God in the Administration of his Dominions. He was greatly devoted to our Lady, and had a special and constant Veneration for the holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, insomuch that he never failed to assist at the forty Hours exposing of it.

THIS most pious Prince left us some Laws; and in 1675. the first Year of his Reign after the Regency, he established one, whereby he ordered, that, without his Royal Assent, Offices should neither be mortgaged nor sold: He likewise ordered, that nothing should be exacted from Persons impeached, before they were found Guilty: He prescribed Rules about manufacturing of Silk, Silver, and Gold, for preventing the Frauds, which, as we have said, were prohibited by the Marquis Del Carpio in the Time of his Government; and he made other Regulations, which are set down in the Chronology prefixed to the first Tome of Statutes, according to the last Edition.

THIS most clement King granted many Privileges and Favours both to our City and Kingdom, as well those sought during the Embassy of D. Ettore Capecelatro, which, though desired in King Philip IV's Life-time, were only fulfilled in the Year 1666. after his Death, as those asked by D. Luigi Podero, and D. Francesco Caracciolo, Marquis of Grattela, who were sent Ambassadors to the Court, and others, which we read in the second Volume of Privileges and Concessions, printed in 1719.

THE fatal News of the Death of King Charles II. came to Naples on the 20th of November this Year 1700. and at the same time the Advice of his having declared Philip Duke of Anjou his Successor in all the Dominions of the Monarchy of Spain; and the Duke of Medina Celi, in order to confirm the Advice, immediately caused to be published two Clauses, which were said to be extracted from the Will of the deceased King; in one of which the Succession of the Duke of Anjou was declared, and in the other was named the Junta of the Government, which he had appointed, till such time as the Successor should arrive in Spain, of which he made the Queen-Dowager the Head, and the Members were the President of the Council of Castile, the Vice-Chancellor or President of Arragon, the Archbishop of Toledo, the Inquisitor-General, one Grandee, and one Counsellor of State. To these Clauses the Duke of Medina added a Letter written by the Queen and the rest of the Junta, whereby he was charged to put in Execution whatever they ordered, and what in the like Cases was wont be practised. The People, astonished and surprized at so unexpected a Change, and moved with Grief for the Death of so pious and religious a King, lamented the common Misfortune by so great a Loss; and Medina, following the Example of the other Kingdoms of Spain, put his Orders in Execution, so that without the least Commotion or Disturbance, that Prince, which Spain had given us, was acknowledged.

THESE unexpected Events, not only very much astonished the Emperor Leopold, by reason of the great Injury done him with respect to his Right, in Vindication of which, in 1703. a Book was printed, with this Title, A Defence of the Right of the House of Austria to the Succession of the Monarchy of Spain; but the other Princes, Parties concerned in the designed Partition, who looking upon themselves as deluded by the Arts of the French King, and unsafe if they should suffer so great Power, and so many Kingdoms to be united in the House of France; and considering, that the Division of the Monarchy was what the Spaniards dreaded most, it was resolved to employ all their Power in placing upon that Throne Charles Archduke of Austria, Leopold's second Son, to whom not only the Father, but the Brother yielded their Rights; and accordingly he was declared King of Spain, and in all haste sent thither, in order to drive out his Rival. The Dutch declared for the Archduke; the Kings of England and Portugal, and afterwards the Duke of Savoy joined with the Emperor, and entered into a League for dispossessing Philip of the Dominions of Spain, and placing the Archduke Charles upon the Throne. This occasioned a bloody and cruel War between the Confederates and France, which was declared in the Year 1701. And the King of England dying soon after, Anne Stuart, the second Daughter of King James II. succeeding as Queen of that Kingdom, not only confirmed the Alliance, but more vigorously employed the Forces of her Kingdom for placing King Charles upon the Throne of Spain. Her Fleet carried him thither: Catalonia was taken, and the new King took up his Royal Residence in Barcelona, and afterwards, with the Imperial and English Troops, forced Philip to quit the City of Madrid; and if the Battle of Almanza, gained by the French on the 25th of April 1707. had not defeated the noble Design, Spain would have intirely submitted to his Dominion. The Emperor Leopold had not the Pleasure to see his Arms so well employed, and his Wishes backed by so prosperous Success; he was already dead, and in 1705. Joseph I. his Son, was elected in his Place.

AT this Time the glorious Imperial Arms were no less successful in Italy than in Flanders. The Siege of Turin was not only raised, but all the State of Milan, Mantua, and the other Places of Lombardy, were possessed in an Instant; so that the French were forced to abandon Italy, and retire with their Troops to France. The French, in order to relieve Milan, had drawn all their Troops out of our Kingdom; so that an Opportunity offered for making an Attempt upon it, which proved most successful. By reason of the natural Affection of the Neapolitans for the most august House of Austria, Count Daun, with a single Detachment of the Imperial Army, which the Emperor Joseph had in Lombardy, without the least Opposition, entered the Kingdom, and on the 7th of July this Year 1707. in the Name of King Charles, took Possession of the City of Naples, the Magistrates of which went as far as Aversa to present him the Keys. The Example of the Metropolis was immediately followed by the other Cities of the Kingdom: All the Castles surrendered: Pescara likewise submitted; only Gaeta, whither the Spaniards had retired, retired, stood out, but in less than three Months, after a short Siege, it was taken by Storm, and pillaged. In short, the Imperial Troops were received with universal Joy and Satisfaction, and without Commotions, Tumults, or those Disorders which usually happen upon the Changes of Governments, the Kingdom peaceably and in the greatest Tranquillity went under the Dominion of King Charles, who kept then his Royal Residence in Barcelona.

NO small Advantage was reaped by our returning under the Dominion of this most august Family of Austria, by the many Concessions and Privileges, which, with a liberal Hand, above all the Kings his Predecessors, were bestowed by this grateful and most indulgent Prince. Moved by the Fidelity and Readiness shewn upon this Occasion, he granted both to the City and Kingdom new Favours, and all very considerable, and what is more, the ready Execution of the Old.

HE bestowed new and more honourable Titles upon the City and its Magistrates. He advanced its Natives to Employments, Benefices, and Offices, excluding Foreigners. By many Royal Writs he established the important Right of the Exequatur Regium to all Bulls, Briefs, and other Provisions that come from Rome: He prohibited, under severe Penalties, the Alienation of the Funds of the Royal Revenues: He quite abolished all Vestiges of the Inquisition: By his Royal Edicts he ordered, that all Foreigners should be excluded from all Benefices, Bishopricks, Archbishopricks, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities of the Kingdom, and that no Pensions should be imposed upon them in Favour of Foreigners: He confirmed all the Privileges and Favours granted by his Predecessors to the Barons and Kingdom: He abolished the Tribunal of the Rolls: He ordered, that the Prescription of a hundred Years should be good in Law against his Exchequer, even with respect to the Regalia, Matters relating to Jurisdiction, and his other Fiscal Rights: He extended the Feodal Succession in favour of the Barons to all the fifth Degree. Nor ought it to be looked upon as a small Advantage, our being now comprehended in the Truces which are made between the Emperor and the Turk; and the Commerce which he intends to open between Germany and our Kingdom, by establishing Free-Ports: A Thing, which was not to be desired of the Spaniards, much less expected. In short, he granted us many other considerable Favours, which, both to our Surprise and Contentment, we now read in the second Volume of the Privileges and Favours, which our City caused to be printed in the Year 1719. that not only their Value might be known, but likewise the Munificence of so great a Prince, who has been pleased so profusely to bestow them upon it.

IN the mean time our King Charles III. married a Princess no less prudent than beautiful, to wit, Elizabetha-Christiana of Wolfenbuttel, who traversing Germany and Italy, was conducted to her Spouse; at which time his Arms, under the Conduct of the Count of Starembergh, made wonderful Progress and Acquisitions, penetrating with his Armies as far as Madrid; and if the Duke of Vendosme, upon whom the Command of the Spanish Troops had been conferred, had not vigorously opposed our Army, forcing it to retire to Catalonia; the War of Spain would then have been gloriously ended. The English and Dutch, on the other Hand, had intirely routed the French in Flanders, in the Battle of Oudenard upon the Scheld, the Consequence of which was the taking of Lille and Ghent, and the Year following of Tournay and Mons; so that they forced Lewis XIV. to make Proposals of Peace, which, though they were advantageous to France, in the Conferences which were held in Gertruydenberg betwixt the Plenipotentiaries of France, England, and Holland, were not accepted.

BUT the Death of the Emperor Joseph, which happened on the 17th of April this Year 1711. at the Age of 32 Years, 8 Months, and 23 Days, without leaving Male-Issue, broke all the Designs, and changed the Face of Affairs. All the Princes of Germany recalled our King to the Empire; so that, while he was in Barcelona, by their common Consent he was elected Emperor in Francfort, and was proclaimed Charles VI. always august Roman Emperor. Therefore, leaving Queen Elizabeth in Barcelona to govern Catalonia, he thought fit to return to Germany, and take Possession of the Empire. And in the mean time the King of France taking Advantage of this Change, and, by sundry Negotiations and Allurements, having brought the Queen of England into his Measures, with great Earnestness solicited new Treaties of Peace. From the Beginning he persuaded that Queen to consent to a Suspension of Arms between France and England, so that she ordered the Troops which she had in Flanders to retire from the Dutch Army: By which Separation that Army being much weakened, it was attacked by the French Army, commanded by the Marshal de Villars, and put so hard to it near Denain, that after a considerable Loss, the French made themselves Masters of the Enemy's Camp, took S. Amand and Marchienne, raised the Siege of Landrechies, and forced the Cities of Doway and Quesnoy to surrender.

THESE Advantages obliged the Confederates to hearken to the Proposals of Peace, so that Plenipotentiaries were named by both Parties, who having met at Utrecht (after a Suspension of Arms for Italy, and the Evacuation of Catalonia and Majorca, had, on the 14th of March, been agreed upon by the Emperor and the King of France) on the 11th of April 1713. a Peace was concluded between England, Holland, Portugal, Savoy, Prussia, France, and Spain. It was stipulated, that by means of the Renunciation made by Philip of his Right to the Crown of France, as well for himself as his Posterity, and of that of the Dukes of Berry and Orleans to the Crown of Spain, Philip should keep Possession of Spain and the Indies. Sicily was given to the Duke of Savoy, to whom likewise, and his Heirs, was promised the Succession of the Kingdom of Spain, in case Philip's Branch should fail. The Emperor was to keep Possession of the Kingdom of Naples, and the Dutchy of Milan. The Electors of Bavaria and Cologne were restored to the Possession of their Electorates. Queen Anne was acknowledged Queen of England, and after her Death the Duke of Hanover and his Heirs. The Fortifications of Dunkirk were to be demolished. The Towns of the Spanish Flanders were to be garisoned by the Dutch, in order to be restored to the House of Austria; and Lille and Aire were restored to the King of France.

THE Emperor, that he might not prejudice his Right to Spain, would neither ratify this Treaty, nor treat of a Peace with that Kingdom; therefore, on the 6th of March 1714. another particular Treaty was signed at Rastadt, between him and France, whereby the foregoing Conditions, with respect to all the other Powers, were confirmed, but he did not give over his Rights and Titles to that Monarchy, but was at freedom at any time to endeavour to recover it by Force of Arms. Nevertheless these Treaties were faithfully executed by all the Powers concerned, excepting Spain. Sicily was given to the Duke of Savoy, though Spain having afterwards a Mind to break this Treaty, by attempting to recover that Island, that Expedition occasioned the Change that afterwards followed, and which turned to the great Advantage of our Monarch, for having, by Force of Arms, recovered it from the Hands of the Spaniards, he gave the Island of Sardinia to the Duke of Savoy in Exchange for it; so that Sicily is now united to our Kingdom, as formerly, under the same Prince. Catalonia was evacuated, and the Empress Elizabeth returned to Germany, and joined her august Husband in Vienna, and being already big with Child, she soon after brought forth a Prince; but cruel and inexorable Death quickly deprived us of him, leaving us full of Sorrow and Affliction.

NEVERTHELESS, for the Government of those Dominions of Spain, of which the Emperor Charles was in Possession, a Supreme Council of State was erected in Vienna, composed not only of Counsellors of the long Robe, but of State, and of which the German Ministers have no Share. To this Council a Regent is sent from our Kingdom, as formerly had been in use to be sent to Madrid under the Government of the Spaniards. Therefore the same Methods are observed, and the Secretaries continue to act in the same manner as they did in Spain: The Royal Writs and Dispatches are penned in the Spanish Language, and the Spanish Ministers, who follow our most august Prince, retain their Share in this Council, whereof the Archbishop of Valencia is now the Head and President, and above all the rest is distinguished for his Loyalty and Zeal in the Service of our Prince.

IT was thought, that, by reason of the Competition and Dispute between these two Princes, Charles and Philip, each of which eagerly demanded the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples of Clement XI. upon this Occasion that Custom would have been abolished; for that Pope having stedfastly refused it to the Emperor Leopold, who justly sought it for the Archduke Charles, his second Son, he likewise (to shew a Neutrality) refused to give it to King Lewis of France, who, no less earnestly sought it for the Duke of Anjou, his Grandchild. By reason of this Competition, during all Clement's Pontificate, which was very long, the Competitors did not think fit any more to demand it, so that it was thought, that the Investiture which

Charles

Charles II. took in the Year 1666. from Pope Alexander VII. would have been the last. Upon the like Occasion the Investiture of the Kingdom of Sicily was dropt; for the Roman Pontiffs, to avoid giving Offence to Charles I. of Anjou, and the Anjoÿn Kings his Successors, having always refused to give it to King Peter of Arragon, and the Arragonian Kings his Successors; the Arragonians afterwards considering, that no Detriment had happened to them through the want of it, and that all they got was only a Bit of Paper, with four written Words, as King Charles III. of Durazzo was wont to say to Pope Urban VI. they had no mind to seek it any more, so that, as it had been introduced there by a certain Custom, by Disusage it is now quite abolished; insomuch that afterwards neither King Alphonfus I. of Arragon, nor Ferdinand the Catholick, nor the other Kings of the most august House of Austria, never demanded it, and it only continues for the Kingdom of Naples:

THE Roman Pontiffs formerly arrogated likewise to themselves the Power of giving Investiture of the Kingdom of Sardinia, as Boniface VIII. actually gave it to James King of Arragon; but those Kings did not think fit to seek it afterwards¹. And they even pretended the same with respect to the Kingdoms of Arragon and Valencia, particularly Martin IV. who deprived Peter King of Arragon of these Kingdoms, and gave Charles of Valois, the Son of Philip King of France, the Investiture of them. But five Centuries are now past since the Popes laid aside such Thoughts and Pretensions². They likewise pretended to it in the Kingdom of England, as was practised in the Time of King John, who thought fit to take the Investiture of it from, and be crown'd by the Pope, who, therefore, sent Pandolphus, as his Apostolical Legate to crown him³. But the other Kings of England by no means would have Investiture of it since that Time, nor was it ever since practised. They attempted the same in the Kingdom of Scotland, in the Time of Edward I. of England. But the English, not minding that, gave the Pope to understand, that he had nothing to do with the Scots, who were Subjects and Vassals of the King of *England*⁴. Lastly, the Attempts are notorious which the Roman Pontiffs have made upon the German Roman Empire, which has been reckoned up by them among the Fiefs of the Church of Rome, and that therefore it belonged to them to elect the Emperors. But all Subjection was afterwards abrogated, and the Power of electing remains now absolutely in the Electoral Princes, and the Ceremony of going to be crowned in Rome by the Hands of the Pope is likewise laid aside. Thus, as Opportunities offered, wise Princes shook off these Yokes, which being introduced in Times of Ignorance, as they were then established by Fraud, so, by a contrary Practice, they were abolished.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, Pope Clement XI. at the Age of 72 Years, after a long Pontificate, of little less than 21 Years, having died on the 19th of March 1721. and, in the Month of May the same Year, Cardinal Conti having been elected in his Place, who took the Name of Innocent XIII. who now, with great Applause, Conduct, and Prudence, governs the Apostolical See. In the first Year of his Pontificate, at the Desire of our Emperor (for Reasons, perhaps, more secret and prudent than are fit for us to pry into) has given him the Investiture of the Kingdom, and in the Month of May 1722. dispatched the Bull of it, in which, as Leo X. did by the Emperor Charles V. he dispensed with the Conditions of the antient Investitures, which prohibit the Kings of Naples to be Emperors or Kings of the Romans, and, upon accepting the Imperial Crown, declare them to have forfeited the Kingdom; as may be seen in the preceding Books of this History.

The State of our Jurisprudence, and of the other Arts and Sciences which flourished among us in the End of the seventeenth Century, and continue so at this Time.

THE Progress, which the Jurisprudence, and the other Sciences made among us in the Reign of Charles II. was truly wonderful. In the other Kingdoms of Europe, and especially in France, they were restored, and brought to the highest Pitch of Perfection from the Beginning and in the Course of the seventeenth Century. However it was later before they were improved and polished with us. Our Jurisprudence, as we have said, was put into a better Form by Francesco d'Andrea, and those that followed him, and not only in the Chair, but in the Courts of Judicature, the Laws began to be taught by new Methods, and Law Points to be disputed according to the true Principles of our Jurisprudence, and the Interpretations of the most learned Lawyers. Philosophy, which hitherto, with us, had been confined to the Cloysters, and reduced to logical and metaphysical Subtleties, or to some idle and useless Disputes, appeared with a new Lustre by the Study of natural Sciences, and by a vast many new Discoveries, and the right Method practised in treating of it. Medicine, by the Experiments of natural Philosophy, and the Use of many Medicaments unknown to the Antients, proved more beneficial to Diseases. The Mathematicks, and especially Algebra, and the other abstract Parts thereof, were much improved by the Invention of new Methods. The Academies instituted among us, and composed of Men famous for their Skill in the Languages, Eloquence, and Erudition, contributed not a little to the Perfection of the Sciences, and the Advancement of Learning. Lastly, the Correspondence which was settled among us, with France, Germany, and Holland, by means of the Journals of Literature, brought Learning to the highest Pitch of Perfection; for by means of the great Number of Journals which are published in these Countries, every Body may have an Account of the Books that are printed in Europe, of the Matters they contain, and of the News of the Commonwealth of Learning.

AS for the Jurisprudence, we have seen, that Francesco d'Andrea was the first, who both pleaded and wrote according to its true Principles, and the Interpretations of Cujacius and other learned Men; and having for many Years exercised the Employment of an Advocate, and acquired that Fame which is known to all the World, he likewise acquired many Imitators; so that in our Tribunals, mere Barristers began to be distinguished from true Lawyers. Being afterwards made Judge of the Vicariate by the Count of Santistevan, and, by his Means, soon after advanced by King Charles II. to be a Counsellor, and then Attorney-General of the Royal Chamber, in exercising which Office, in his Pleadings, and especially in that famous Feudal Dispute¹, he displayed his Learning, his Knowledge in History, and the true Jurisprudence. After having been three Years in that Office, he got Leave from the King to return to the Sacred Council; from whence afterwards, by reason of his many Infirmities, and the great Desire he had of retiring from all Business, in order, the more quietly, to apply himself to the Study of Philosophy, in which he took exceeding Delight, he retired to the Solitudes of Candela, a small Village in the Territories of Melfi, where this matchless Lawyer died on the 10th of September 1698.

THE next to him in Eloquence and Learning, and the Art of Pleading and Writing well, was the famous Advocate Serafino Biscardi. He had likewise for Collegues D. Niccolo Carovita and Amato Danio, but unequal to him in Eloquence, Knowledge, and Learning, and Pietro di Fusco and Flavio Gurgo, Men of profound Skill in the Law. There were also others who kept up in our Tribunals the true Art of Eloquence, who being still alive among us, and advanced to the chief Honours of Magistracy, I should be afraid of offending their Modesty in mentioning them; but out of Gratitude, and because I had the good Fortune to be the Disciple of one of them, who, in the Opinion of every Body, is without the Reach of Envy and Emulation, I cannot pass him over in Silence. This is the incomparable Gaetano Argento, who from his Youth, being Master of the most abstruse and uncommon Learning, of the Languages, History, and the Belles Lettres, he applied himself to the Study of the Laws, in which by the Penetration of his Divine Genius, his surprising Memory, and indefatigable Application, he succeeded to a wonderful Degree; insomuch, that by the Profoundness of his Knowledge, and especially in the Jurisprudence, he exceeded all the Lawyers that ever flourished among us. And being afterwards advanced to the Supreme Magistracy, and to the chief Honour of President of our Sacred Council, he acquired a most noble Character; for having the Superintendency of the Affairs of State of the greatest Moment, he discovered not only the Effects of his Learning, but of his Wisdom and the Art of Government.

THE Purity of our Jurisprudence was kept up in our Courts of Justice by these bright Men; but there were not wanting others of rare Talents in these Times, who likewise maintained it in the University. It had been, as we have said, begun to be taught in the University with greater Politeness than formerly; but it had not come up to that Perfection with which it was taught in other Universities, particularly in those of France; but as soon as the famous Professor Dominico Auliso began to teach in it, the Jurisprudence was brought to the utmost Height of Perfection. By his profound Learning, especially in the Roman and Greek: By his Skill in the Languages, and his vast Assiduity, he introduced the true Method of explaining the Laws. He was likewise the first that laid down a Rule to Opponents in the Chairs, how, and after what Method they ought to proceed, so as not making a Digression from the Text, as was usual formerly, into Premises, Amplifications, Restrictions, and Corollaries, they might come to the genuine Exposition and Sense of it, and then, with Perspicuity and Propriety of Speech, explain them. This Man was wonderful for his deep Knowledge in all manner of Learning. He was not only profoundly skilled in the true Jurisprudence, as his Works testify, but in the Mathematicks, the Latin, Greek, and other Oriental Languages. He was a great Antiquary, and had a particular Delight in the Study of antient Medals, and other Monuments of Antiquity. He was a great Philosopher, Poet, and Orator; and he made so great a Progress in the Study of Physick, that he wrote a most learned and accurate History of Physick, which he designed to have published, but by his natural Indifferency, always dubious and wavering, and never pleased with his own Works, being prevented by Daniel le Clerc, it remains in MS. with the other Works he left us. His Treatise, intitled Scholæ Sacræ, likewise he had made ready for the Press, but for the same Reason it is left to the Discretion of his Heir to publish it when he shall think fit. His Works upon the Law, which are now printed, were not designed by him to be published, but only for the Benefit of his Scholars, and he would have taken it as a great Affront, if, in his Life-time, any Person had taken upon him to do it; but the Good of the Publick has prevailed upon me, to whom, as one of his dearest Disciples, he recommended his Writings; more than his private Injury; for, though he, out of his natural Modesty, set no great Value upon his own Works, we are sure, that great Advantage will be reaped from them, and that the Judgment of the World will be very different from that of their Author. He has likewise left us many other Works upon Poetry, the Art of Oratory, De emendatione Temporum, Mathematicks, Philosophy, and diverse other Compositions; but all of them imperfect, and full of Erasurements, and short Expositions.

fitions in the Margin: Perhaps, at a more seasonable Time, and greater Leisure, the Republick of Letters shall partake of some of them.

ON account of his eminent Learning, in 1695: the primary Evening Chair being vacant by the Death of D. Felice Aquadia, with unanimous Voice he was placed in it, with a yearly Salary of 1100 Ducats, which he supported with the highest Splendor and Glory; insomuch that our University vied with the most illustrious Universities in Spain or France, and he taught in it to the End of January 1717. the Year of his Death. But though this was a grievous and inestimable Loss, yet neither the Chair nor the University suffered any thing by it; for amongst many Competitors for the Chair, with unanimous Consent it was filled up with an equally learned and famous Professor D. Niccolo Capasso, who at present supports it with Honour, and who having been the first that taught the Canon Law in our University, according to the true Principles taken from the Councils and Fathers, with the Help of the Ecclesiastical History, and according to the Interpretation of the most judicious and learned Canonists: As he formerly had adorned and made that Canonical Chair shine with more Lustre, so now, by his Eloquence, Skill in the Laws, great Erudition, and Knowledge in the Languages, he fills up the primary Civil Chair with no less Honour and Concourse of Students, than it was in the Time of his Predecessor.

IN these Times the other Chairs of this University, by the other Sciences taught there, were likewise put upon a better Footing. Tommaso Cornelio had introduced a new Philosophy into Naples, and got the Works of Renatus des Cartes to be taught there: In these Beginnings he had Lionardo di Capoa for his Colleague, who was both a Physician and Philosopher; so that they jointly began to promote the Belles Lettres, and especially Philosophy and Physick. Shortly after, some of more subtle Genius's, drawn in by their Example, likewise applied themselves to this new manner of Philosophizing, and laying aside all that they had learned in the Cloysters, they gave themselves to these new Studies. D. Andrea Concubletto, Marquis of Arena, was their Protector, who, moved by a passionate Inclination for such Studies, and also spurred on by a generous Envy, to see true Philosophy prevailing in the other Parts of Europe, and neglected and known by few in Naples alone, he did his utmost to get such as took Delight in it, to meet in some Place, where, by nice Examinations and Speculations, they might endeavour to make further Advances in the Knowledge of it. The Academy of Sciences had already been settled in Paris, and the Royal Society in London, therefore, in Imitation of these, the Marquis of Arena studied to establish his Academy. For which End the Marquis's own House was pitched upon for the Place of Meeting, into which the most learned Men of these Times were admitted. It was called the Academy Degl' Investiganti, and has for its Devise a Setting Dog, with a Motto out of Lucretius: Vestigia iustrat ¹.

THE most famous Men that were admitted into this Academy, and whose Memories are still preserved among us, besides Cornelio and Capoa, were the so famous Camillo Pellegrino, who, though he had spent his whole Life in different Studies, to wit, of History, and searching into our Antiquities, in his old Age was so fond of the new Discoveries, and Methods of this new Philosophy, that he found Fault with his Age, that would not allow him to apply himself to these Studies. The renowned Francesco d'Andrea, and his Brother Gennaro. D. Carlo Buragna, who restored the Italian Poetry in Naples, and besides his Skill in Geometry and Natural Philosophy, he was a great Master of Languages. Giovanbattista Capucci. Sebastiano Bartoli, a famous Physician of these Times, for whom the Viceroy, D. Pedro Antonio of Arragon, had a great Esteem. Lucantonio Porzio, a great Philosopher and Physician, who read noble and learned Lectures upon several philosophical Discoveries. The noble Daniello Spinola and D. Michele Gentile, Monsignor Caramelle, then Bishop of Campagna, and Pietro Lizzardi, a Jesuit, were likewise received Members of this Academy, besides many others of great Parts, who made it their whole Study to shake off the heavy Yoke which the Philosophy of the Cloysters had put upon the Necks of the Neapolitans.

THE Marquis of Arena having left Naples, and soon after died, this Assembly was dissolved; but for all that the Academists, some by teaching in the Chair, others by writing noble Treatises, continued to promote these Studies; so that in a very short time they made a most notable Progress, and gained over many Followers, diffusing not only this Philosophy, but the other Sciences; and they introduced new Methods in Physick, Anatomy, Botany, and the Mathematicks, and especially in Algebra, and very much extended the Knowledge of them. Those, who thought not fit to set up for the Chairs, signalized themselves in propagating the new Philosophy. Lionardo di Capoa made himself famous by his Opinions which he printed. Gregorio Calaprese, likewise a deep Philosopher, gave good Proofs, by his learned Writings, how great a Proficient he was in the Cartesian Philosophy, and many others of noble Genius's did the same.

THOSE who aspired after the Chairs, no less by their printed Works, than by teaching the Sciences publicly, very much raised the Reputation of our University; so that not only by the Civil and Canon Laws being taught there in the greatest Purity and Perfection, but all the other liberal Arts, it vied with the greatest Universities in Europe. The Chair of Medicine flourished under the famous Lucca Tozzi, renowned for his printed Works; and after his Death it flourished no less, but rather acquired greater Lustre, in being filled up by the so celebrated Niccolo Cirillo. That of Anatomy is likewise possessed by Lucantonio Porzio, famous over all Europe for his profound Knowledge, and elaborate printed Works. Those of Mathematicks and Eloquence, were supported, as they are still, by able Professors. By the preceding Misfortunes, the Chair of the Greek Language, in these Times had been suppressed; but in the Government of the Marquis De los Velcz, in the Year 1682. it was restored; and its being filled by D. Gregorio Messeri, a Priest, and a great Master of that Language, it became more flourishing than ever: So that all we know at present of that Language is owing to this renowned Professor.

THE same Year Botany was likewise restored to greater Advantage, by the Care of D. Francesco Filamarini, who being elected Governor of the Hospital of the Annunciation of Naples, for the publick Good, at his own Charges, caused a Garden without the Walls of the City, in a Place called Montagnuolo, to be planted with Simples, of which Tommaso Donzelli, a famous Physician in our Time, took the Direction, and enriched it with many Plants. Before him Mario Schipano had likewise cultivated that Study, which was transmitted to us by the celebrated Fabio Colonna; and in our Time Gio. Battista Guarneri, a renowned Physician and Professor, had made notable Progress in it.

AT the same time the Italian Poetry was restored to its antient Splendor among us by Carlo Buragna, Pirro Schittini, and other excellent Poets, who flourished then. The other Sciences, Learning, and the Languages, were brought to great Perfection under the Government of the Duke of Medina Celi, who protected them and their Professors. The Study of Ecclesiastical History and Positive Divinity, which had been brought to the utmost Perfection in France, came but of late to be cultivated among us; but some of bright Genius's having at last applied themselves to it, became most eminent in it: So that all the liberal Arts being introduced among us, Politeness and Learning were restored both in the City and Kingdom.

C H A P. VI.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of these Times.

URING the Reign of King Charles II. there was not the least Alteration among us, with respect to the Ecclesiastical Polity; but his Spanish Viceroys followed the Footsteps of their Predecessors. Two most exemplary Popes, who during that Time governed the Apostolical See, reduced Things to a more moderate State; and being zealous for the Honour of God, were more intent upon reforming the Manners of the Ecclesiasticks, than in promoting the Pretensions of that Court upon the Temporalities of Princes. Innocent XI. on account of his good Life and Conversation, drew Respect and Reverence, not only from the Catholick, but even from the pretended reformed Princes. He was wholly bent upon rooting out the Abuses which had crept into the whole Clerical Order; he condemned the Remissness of Discipline, and the pernicious Doctrines with which the scandalous Casuists had stuffed their Writings: He curbed the Insolence and Boldness of the Monks, and in the Year 1680. published a Bull against the ill-digested Method of preaching introduced by them, who being accustomed to the Sophistry of their Schools, and ignorant, not only of the Art of Eloquence, but of every Thing else, they gave themselves wholly to Quibbles, Antitheses, Illusions, and strained Metaphors; and, to serve their Purposes, also wrested both the Scriptures and the Fathers. Innocent XII. being a Neapolitan, studied the Quiet and Welfare of the Kingdom. He having been Archbishop of Naples for many Years, the Faults and Corruption of the Ecclesiasticks were well known to him, and especially the Extortions committed by the Tribunal of the Nunciature, and its Commissaries over the Kingdom, and the cruel Spoils that were practised: So that commiserating the calamitous State of our Churches, he resolved to remit the Spoils of the Churches, not comprehended in the Agreement, in favour of the Churches themselves, the Product of which was to be employed in repairing and beautifying them, with the Consent of the future Bishop or Prelate, and in Presence of a Person deputed by the Chapter, which he established accordingly by a Bull. And 'tis thought, that if the Neapolitans had insisted directly with this Pope, instead of applying to Charles II. for providing the Natives with Benefices, and excluding Strangers, perhaps he would have been induced to grant it. This zealous Pope removed many Abuses introduced into the Church, and, as much as in him lay, reformed the Court of Rome itself. He abolished the Scandal of Nepotism, and called his Nephews the poor Men, giving them the Lateran Palace, magnificently repaired, for their Habitation. He likewise abolished the selling of the Clerkships of the Chamber, and ordered, that for the future, Parish-Churches should not be burdened with Pensions. He appointed a particular Congregation for the Reformation of the Ecclesiasticks; and another for the Discipline of the Regular Clergy; and by a Bull he lessened the Authority of the Cardinals Protectors of Religious Orders. He prohibited Priests to enter into the Service of Laicks, moderated the Luxury of their Habits, forbid Ecclesiasticks to wear Periwigs, and made other Provisions for restoring good Discipline.

BUT these good Regulations were of short Duration, for he was no sooner dead, being succeeded by Clement XI. who had been accustomed all his Life-time to the Evasions of that Court, and bred up in its Maxims, than the former Disorders ders were renewed. The Constitutions of that Religious Pope, by various and forced Interpretations, were rendered useless: The Incroachments were revived; and there never was a Pope, who had so many Quarrels with different Princes upon his Hand all at once, as this. He had Disputes with the Duke of Savoy, Spain, and Germany: He attempted to abolish the Monarchy of Sicily, though in vain; and in short to invalidate, not only the Sovereign Rights of our Princes, but the very Concessions granted by his Predecessor to our Kingdom and Churches.

INNOCENT's Bull, whereby the Apostolical Chamber was deprived of the Spoils of our vacant Churches, by wrested Interpretations, was rendered of no Effect; for it was interpreted to be put in Execution, when the Bishop or Prelate dies within his Diocese, but not when he happens to die without it. And when the Prelate died within his Diocese, the Law was also set aside, for by the Clause subjoined in it, that the Spoils, with the Consent of the future Prelate or Bishop, were to be employed upon the Churches, Matters were so ordered, that they received no Benefit from the Spoils; for the Bishops and Prelates coming from Rome, so impoverished by their expensive living at that Court, the Charges of dispatching the Bulls, and other Acknowledgements, that what they found remaining, was not employed in repairing or beautifying the Churches, or the Relief of the Poor, but for their own Use and Benefit, and for satisfying the Debts they had contracted by the long Stay they had made in Rome; and if the Chapter happened to find Fault with it, which seldom fell out, being unwilling to quarrel with their Superior, such Recourses served for no other End, but to squander away the Remainder upon long and expensive Law-Suits at Rome.

ALTHOUGH Gregory's Bull, about the Immunity of the Churches, had not been received in the Kingdom, yet it was endeavoured to have it take Effect, even in the most enormous Crimes, by proceeding to Censures against the King's Ministers, who had a mind to punish the Guilty: The Exequatur Regium was looked upon as a Novelty; and the Incroachments and Irregularities of the Bishops of the Kingdom, who disturbed the Royal Jurisdiction, were vigorously defended.

BUT in the mean time our Kingdom having happily come under the Dominion of Charles, our most august Prince, who then had his Royal Residence in Barcelona, under his favourable Auspices the Incroachments of the Ecclesiasticks were not only vigorously opposed, but the Royal Rights, and the Privileges of his Subjects were more firmly established, and in so strong and resolute Terms, that in all the preceding Favours granted by our Arragonian and Austrian Princes to this City and Kingdom, there are not so pithy Expressions to be found. By many Royal Writs dispatched from Barcelona, he firmly established the Necessity of the Exequatur Regium to all the Bulls, Briefs, or other Provisions that come from *Rome*¹. He excluded Strangers from Benefices, and ordered the Revenues of those who had been provided of them, to be sequestrated². He abolished all Vestiges of the Inquisition, commanding, that, in Causes relating to our Holy Faith, the Ordinaries of the Places should proceed in the same manner as is practised in other Ecclesiastical Offences and Criminal Causes³. And being afterwards raised to the Imperial Throne, he continued stedfast in the same favourable Disposition towards us; insomuch that on the 6th of August 1713. at the Request of the City and Kingdom, he not only resolutely excluded Foreigners from all the Prelateships and Benefices of the Kingdom, ordering, that they should be conferred upon the Natives; but with the same Earnestness and Care he likewise endeavoured to prevent the Frauds committed in favour of Strangers, by Reservation of Pensions, &c. contrary to these his Royal Intentions: So that now, in order to avoid these Frauds, in granting the Exequatur Regium to the Provisions of Benefices conferred by Rome upon the Natives, the Supreme Collateral Council has made it a fixed Rule, to add this Clause, Exceptis pensionibus forsan impositis in Beneficium exterorum.

HOW much our Forefathers have laboured, not only with the Kings of the illustrious House of Arragon, but with those of Austria for obtaining so considerable a Benefit, the so many Requests, which we read, that have been made for that End to those most serene Princes by our City and Kingdom, sufficiently demonstrate; and in the Reign of King Charles II. in the Year 1692. we find two Resolutions made by a particular Deputation, for giving a new Memorial to the King about it ; and the learned Advocate Pietro di Fusco was pitched upon for drawing up the Petition, which was accordingly done, and presented to the Count of Sanistevan, then Viceroy. But Heaven had reserved so great and signal a Favour to be granted us in these latter Times by our most august, magnanimous, and clement Prince.

POPE Clement made a terrible Noise about it, and condemned the King's Edicts, as prejudicial to the Ecclesiastical Immunity. But by the Means of three learned and excellent Writings, penned by the most grave Lawyers, he was given to understand, that they were conformable, not only to the Laws and Customs of the other Nations of the Catholick World, but also to the Canons of many Councils and Constitutions of Popes, to the Doctrine of the Fathers of the Church, and to the general Opinion of the most grave and renowned Divines and Canonists.

IN the Reign of our most august Monarch and Emperor Charles VI. especially under the Government of Count Daun, our Viceroy, the Outrages of the Ecclesiasticks, and the Incroachments and Irregularities of the Bishops, were vigorously curbed, the Royal Prerogatives were boldly maintained, and the Prelates were punished by the Sequestration of their Revenues, and being summoned, and not appearing, they were frequently banished the Kingdom, which are Remedies, that not only the Laws, but the antient Usage of the Kingdom allow our Princes to make use of against them. The Immunity of the Churches was preserved according to the Prescription of the Canons, but not of the Gregorian Bull, which upon all Occasions had been rejected. The Exequatur Regium was indispensably to be sought and obtained to all Provisions that came from Rome. The Bishops were kept within their Bounds, and many Abuses were removed, which had crept into their Dioceses. The Franchises and Immunities of the Churches were maintained according to the Prescriptions of the Canons, and of our Laws, and Frauds were prevented : So that the Ecclesiastical Authority and Jurisdiction were confined to their just Bounds, leaving to the Priesthood what is of God, and to the Empire that which is Cæsar's. In which Work, no less glorious than acceptable to God, the most zealous Gaetano Argento, President of the Sacred Council, had the greatest Share, to whom our most august Monarch having committed the Defence of his Royal Jurisdiction, he maintained it with no less Learning than Vigour. He, who by profound Knowledge knew well how to distinguish the Limits of the Priesthood from those of the Empire, employed all his Care in keeping them within their just Bounds, that the one might not incroach upon the other. He was the first among us, who, according to the true Principles drawn from the Sacred Canons, Councils, the Sentiments of the Fathers, and of the most learned and grave Divines and Canonists, managed with Decency, great Learning and Judgment these Disputes about Jurisdiction, in which he soon became most accomplished, outstripping all that ever had undertaken that Charge before him. The so famous Regents Villano, Revertera, de Ponte, and many others, who signalized themselves in the Defence of the Royal Jurisdiction, came far short of him : Their Consultations being compared with his most learned ones, supported by Authorities and uncommon Observations, drawn not only from the Ecclesiastical History, Councils, Fathers, and the most excellent Canonists, but also from our Records, and the remarkable Instances of our Kingdom ; these as far over-top those, as the tall Cypress-Trees do the humble Shrubs. So that if any Thing was wanting, that hindered this Kingdom from vying with France, where these Studies are arrived at the utmost Perfection, to him is owing, that even in these we have no reason now to envy her.

UNDER the Reign of our most august Prince, the Grievances of the Tribunal of the Nunciature of Naples were likewise redressed, and, as we have said elsewhere, for the same Reason, the Tribunal of the Fabrick of S. Peter was suspended. Our Monarch being informed of the Spoils and Extortions that were committed in these Tribunals, to the great Detriment of his Subjects, in 1717. ordered the Nuncio to depart the Kingdom in 24 Hours ; which Royal Order coming to Naples in the Month of October the same Year, it was immediately put in Execution : The Nuncio departed, his Palace and the Doors of the Tribunal of the Fabrick were shut up. On the 4th of June the Year following, our Emperor being then at Luxemburgh, dispatched another Order, whereby he ordained the Revenues of the vacant Churches and Benefices to be sequestered, and employed in the Reparation and beautifying beautifying these Churches, and relieving the Poor. And on the 8th of October the same Year 1718. he sent another, directed to Count Daun, the Viceroy, whereby he charged him to give him a full Information of the Extortions and Incroachments of these Tribunals, and how they could be remedied. The Viceroy, with great Exactness, by a Delegate of the Jurisdiction, executed the Imperial Order, giving him a full Account of the foul Practices of these Tribunals, and of the proper Remedy. In the mean time Pope Clement, by means of his Nuncio in Vienna, and the Intercession of the Empress Leonora, endeavoured to mitigate the Severity of her Son; so that the Affair being taken into Deliberation, the Nuncio was allowed to return, however, with a limited Power, and upon Condition of removing the bad Practices of his Tribunal. He returned in the Month of June 1719. but, on account of some Difficulties that occurred in giving the Exequatur to his Brief, our Collateral Council would not suffer him to enter the City; so that he was obliged to wait till new Orders came from Court, and the Difficulties being removed in Vienna, Orders came for restoring him to the Exercise of his Office; therefore, about the End of this Year 1719. he was introduced into the City, and his Tribunal was opened, but that of the Fabrick continued shut and suspended, as it is at present.

SUCH were the Difficulties that occurred in the Pontificate of Clement XI. in maintaining the Royal Rights, and freeing the King's Subjects from the Impositions and Tricks of the Ecclesiasticks. But Clement dying soon after, and being succeeded by the present Pope Innocent XIII. a firm and undisturbed Peace was settled between the Priesthood and the Empire, and these two Powers were brought to a perfect Harmony and Correspondence. This Innocent, imitating the great Pope Innocent III. his Predecessor and Kinsman, and putting in Execution, what he had established by a Canon of the Lateran Council ¹, has shewn his pacifick and moderate Sentiments, that as it is his earnest Desire, that the Laicks should not incroach upon the Rights of the Clergy, so it is his Will, that the Clergy be contented with what the Canons, the Apostolical Constitutions, and the approved Usages allow them; and that under pretence of Ecclesiastical Immunity they should not invade the Rights of the Laicks, and extend their Jurisdiction to the Prejudice of the Royal; to the End that, by a just and well regulated Distribution, what is Cæsar's may be rendered unto Cæsar, and to God what is God's.

Of Monks and Temporalities.

IN these Times, though the Monks had lost the Reputation which formerly they had, of Sanctity and Learning, yet they went on in acquiring Temporal Riches: The Revenues of what they had already acquired, the new Legacies, and the Donations which were made to their Churches, yielded them so much ready Money, that when they were disappointed in Legacies, they bought the Farms, and in case of Competition, as the highest Bidders, having such Plenty of ready Money, not gained with the Sweat of their Brows, they were preferred to all others. It became a Custom in these later Times, that all Testators left Chaplainships to their Churches, and settled plentiful Funds for saying Masses, laying the Stress of the Salvation of their Souls, not upon keeping themselves unspotted from the World, and in their Life-times endeavouring to relieve the Widows and Oppressed, but upon building sumptuous Chapels, and causing Masses to be said at all the Altars ¹. And it is very surprizing, that notwithstanding the Monks had brought themselves into Disrepute, and that the Laity spoke of them with Disrespect, yet they are still Masters of the Minds of the People, who act in the same manner as those, who, though they despise the Physicians while in Health, looking upon them as useless in the Cure of Diseases, upon the least Indisposition are more submissive to them than others.

¹ Bossuet. Politic. lib. 7. par. 2. art. 4. propos. 11.

DON Pedro Antonio of Arragon, the Viceroy, favoured them in their Acquisitions, and in his Time, besides the Hospital of S. Januarius, without the Walls of the City, the famous Hermitage of Sister Orsola was finished. Under the Government of the Marquis De los Velez, the bare-footed Hermits of S. Augustin opened a magnificent Church, by the Name of S. Niccolo Tolentino. Gaspare Romer, a famous Flemish Merchant, at his Death, enriched not only the Hospital of the Incurables, but likewise the Monastery of the Nuns of the Sacrament. Other foreign Merchants, having no Relations to whom they could leave their Riches, founded new Monasteries, and invited Nuns from their own Countries to come and live in them. To these were added the excessive Portions given with the Nuns upon their entering the Monasteries, to which the Portions belong after their Death; and whereas of old it was strongly disputed, whether the receiving of such Portions was Simoniackal or no, yet they were received without the least Scruple. It likewise became a Custom, that the very Monks reserved to themselves considerable yearly Rents, and in these latter Times such Reservations are practised by the very Mendicant Orders; and they are in a fair Way to take the other Step at entering the Monasteries, that is to say, to settle their own Patrimonies upon themselves. For which End, in these latter Times we see no more Reforms of the antient Orders, but new Congregations of Priests: The Cowls are laid aside, in order to lead a more lazy Life, without being obliged to attend the Choir, or to be bound to other Duties and Inconveniences, to which the austere and rigid Cowl is liable, they now like better to wear the Cap.

FROM such a vast Number of Sources are the immense Riches of the Ecclesiasticks drawn, which are the evident Cause of our Misery. The publick Burdens are borne by the Laicks alone, and they are become now much more insupportable, because the Estates that formerly were in the Possession of the Laicks, being continually conveyed to the Ecclesiasticks, the whole Burden, which before was divided, falls upon the Remnant left in the Hands of the Laicks. 'Tis computed by the most expert Men, and those who knew the State of the Kingdom, that of three Parts of the Revenues, near two are in the Possession of the Clergy, which never can be recovered out of their Hands, by reason of the most strict Laws made in their Favour to prevent it. Others generally affirm, that if the Kingdom were divided into five Parts, it would be found, that the Ecclesiasticks have four of the five; for they have almost the Half of the whole Land, and as for the rest, they get another Part and a half in Legacies and such like Donations; for none die without leaving some Legacy to some Church or Convent. Besides that, in a short time they are in a fair Way to purchase the whole Remainder, because having plenty of ready Money, arising from Legacies and their vast Revenues, they are constantly buying Farms and Houses. So that judicious Foreigners, in their Travels, amazed at such boundless Wealth, and among the rest, the knowing and learned Burnet, are of Opinion, that if a Stop be not put to it, the Ecclesiasticks in a short time will not only purchase the whole City of Naples, but within the Space of an Age will be Masters of the whole Kingdom.

OUR Forefathers were sensible of the Consequences of such pernicious Practices, and endeavoured to curb such unbounded Acquisitions. When, in the Name of the City, Barons, and Kingdom, the Regent Ettore Capecelatro was sent to King Philip IV. among the other Favours that were begged of that Monarch, one was, that he would be pleased to put a Stop to the Purchase of Estates which the Ecclesiasticks were making in the Kingdom. And King Philip dying before any proper Measures could be taken, Application was made to his Successor King Charles II. but it being looked upon as a Matter of great Moment, all that could be obtained of that King, was a Promise that he would take it into Consideration*. But under the happy Government of our most august Monarch, the City and Kingdom being encouraged by his Magnanimity and Clemency, put up a new Petition to him, in which, representing the Miseries which such Purchases brought upon the Kingdom, to the great Detriment both of the Royal Revenues and of the Subjects; the indisputable Right he had to be obeyed; and the Examples of other most religious Princes, who, by prudent Laws have suppressed such Purchases in their Dominions; they earnestly begged of him, that he would be pleased to do the same in the Kingdom of Naples, so that for the future the Ecclesiasticks may not be capable of purchasing Immoveables, neither by themselves, nor by the Means of other Persons ; and that in case, by Legacy or any other way, real Estates should happen to be left to them, they may be obliged to sell them, and be contented with the Price. At this Time, in the King's Absence, Queen Elizabeth governing in Barcelona, that most prudent Princess, moved by the said Petition, was pleased, by her Royal Order, dated in Barcelona the 19th of March 1712. strictly to command Count Charles Borromeo, then our Viceroy, that after having advised with the Collateral Council, and the Tribunal of the Royal Chamber, he should send her a full Information, with his own Opinion, of what occurred concerning the Request made, that she might act therein as she shall judge most just and fitting¹. In pursuance of these Royal Orders the Royal Collateral Council having thoroughly canvassed the Affair, it was remitted to the Royal Chamber, by which Tribunal, so far as belonged to it, the desired Information was drawn up, and it remains only now, that the same be done by the Collateral Council ; which in the mean time, while this Affair is still depending, at the Request of the City, watchful to prevent any Novelty, which in the Interim might be attempted by the Ecclesiasticks in making new Purchases, ordered the said Information to be ingrossed and sent to her Catholick Majesty, and mean while, that no Innovations should be attempted.

'TIS not to be doubted, but that, among the so many and signal Favours which our most august Prince hath heaped upon this his Kingdom, insomuch that it never was seen in so flourishing a Condition in any former Reign, as it is at present under his most clement Government, he will put an End to, and complete that just and glorious Work. And we ought so much the more securely to depend upon it, that, among his other valuable Favours, he has been pleased to confer a greater upon us, in committing the Government of this Kingdom to the most prudent Cardinal Michael Federick d'Altham, our Viceroy, who, emulating the Glory of his most renowned and wise Predecessors, behaves so, that to the dear and honourable Memory which we still retain of the just and prudent Government of the Marquis Del Carpio, his may be joined ; and since he governs us with the same Care and Prudence, 'tis just, that his Glory and Immortal Name be also the same.

THE following Bull, whereby this History is censured and condemned, having been sent to the Translator by his worthy and learned Friend Doctor Richard Rawlinson, who took down the Copy of it from the West Door of St. John the Baptist's Conventual Church, in the Island of Malta, where it had been affixed by the Nuncio's Order, and a Reward was soon after offered for discovering the Person who had dared to take it down: It is hoped the inserting of it here, as a curious Piece, will be acceptable to the Readers.
